Following Mr. Anderson's elaborations of his proposal, Mr. Cabot stressed the urgent need for a solution which would enable the Chilean Government to go forward with its plans for fiscal and monetary reforms and for a revision of the impossible conditions under which American companies are currently operating in Chile. The Chilean proposal to stabilize her economy and handle the problems faced by the copper companies was included in a note presented to the State Department on August 6, 1953.[2] Mr. Cabot agreed that a plan along the lines outlined by Mr. Anderson should be considered and should be discussed with the copper companies to see whether it represented a possible solution of the current problem. Mr. Waugh stressed the importance of close cooperation with the companies pointing out that this problem involved both the Government and private business and that frank discussions should be held with the United States companies involved. Mr. Overby pointed out that the United States fiscal situation would make it next to impossible to approve any considerable stockpile purchase and he felt that every attempt should be made to have the companies handle this problem directly with the Chilean Government. He indicated that the American copper companies were in a very good financial position and that they should be able to work out some program for handling the accumulations of unsold copper in Chile. After considerable discussion, Mr. Flemming suggested that this problem was one which should be presented to the Defense Mobilization Board after full discussion with the companies and after consideration by the Board should probably be presented to the National Security Council.

It was agreed that Mr. Anderson would call in the top officials of the two copper companies and discuss this matter frankly with them. Mr. Flemming suggested that, following Mr. Anderson's discussions with the companies, it might be well to have another meeting of this group in order to determine what proposals should be made to the Defense Mobilization Board and/or the National Security Council. Mr. Anderson said that following his discussions he would report to the other members of the group.

Minutes of the 44th Meeting of the Defense Mobilization Board, Held in Washington, August 19, 1953 [1]

[Here follows a list of those present (33).]

The meeting convened at 10:30 a.m. in Room 100, Executive Office Building.

I. Chilean Request for U.S. Purchase of Copper

This item was not on the prepared agenda.

Assistant Secretary Cabot outlined the problem to the Board as follows: the Government of Chile faces a severe economic crisis. Its controls over the national economy have been ineffective in combating inflation and have generally distorted that nation's economic life. Among other things, its policy of purchasing copper from domestic producers at a fixed price of 24½ cents and selling it at 35½ cents has made Chilean copper uncompetitive in world markets and has resulted in the accumulation of about 85,000 tons of unsold copper. The Chilean Government has now requested the United States to purchase 100,000 tons of copper for our stockpile at the current price rather than at the previous fixed price. In exchange the Chileans have agreed to take steps to eliminate the artifical exchange rate, halt the trend toward nationalization of American-owned mines, prevent sales or transshipment of copper to the Soviet bloc, and sell current production at current prices.

The Department of State, taking into consideration the serious repercussions that might occur if no effective action were taken on the Chilean request, recommends that representatives of the United States Government meet with the representatives of the American copper companies concerned (Anaconda and Kennecott) to determine whether they can agree on a solution to this problem to be recommended to their principals, which, if approved by the latter, would be presented to the Chilean representatives. A solution would presumably include purchase at current market prices for the United States

[1] The Defense Mobilization Board (DMB), established Jan. 3, 1951, served as an advisory body to the Director of Defense Mobilization, and provided a means for coordinating the policies and activities of the principal agencies participating in the defense program. Its membership was comprised of the Director of Defense Mobilization (Chairman); the Secretaries of State, Defense, Treasury, Commerce, Agriculture, and Labor; the Administrators of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Economic Stabilization Agency, and the Defense Production Administration; and the Chairmen of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and the National Security Resources Board.

Mr. Waugh represented the Secretary of State at this meeting; he was accompanied by Mr. Cabot.

stockpile of part of the accumulated copper and the temporary sterilization of the rest of it by the companies with provision for its eventual resale.

After discussing the general problem, the Board indicated its agreement to the following course of action:

1. GSA to prepare a memorandum setting forth the status of existing DMPA and stockpile contracts, commitments and scheduled deliveries of copper for the stockpile.
2. GSA to furnish information in re possible cancellation of certain floor price contracts in order to compensate for any stockpile purchases from Chile.
3. ODM staff to outline the timetable for review of the copper stockpile objective.
4. Representatives of the Departments of State and Commerce to consult with spokesmen of the companies involved in order to obtain the latters' views with respect to this problem with emphasis on determining what the companies themselves may be able to do in order to alleviate the problem.

This matter will be reconsidered at the next meeting of the Defense Mobilization Board on August 26.

PROBABLE DEVELOPMENTS IN CHILE[2]

THE PROBLEM

To estimate the current situation and probable developments in Chile, with particular reference to the stability of the Ibanez government and the probable development of its foreign policy.

CONCLUSIONS

1. The present situation and trend in Chile are adverse to political moderation and stability. The gravity of Chile's economic situation and National Intelligence Estimates (NIEs) were high-level interdepartmental reports presenting authoritative appraisals of vital foreign policy problems. NIEs were drafted by officers from those agencies represented on the Intelligence Advisory Committee (IAC), discussed and revised by interdepartmental working groups coordinated by the Office of National Estimates of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), approved by the IAC, and circulated under the aegis of the CIA to the President, appropriate officers of cabinet rank, and the National Security Council (NSC). The Department of State provided all political and some economic sections of NIEs.

[2] A note on the cover sheet reads in part as follows: "The Intelligence Advisory Committee concurred in this estimate on 18 August 1953. The FBI abstained, the subject being outside of its jurisdiction."

a widespread sense of political frustration have increased demands for radical and nationalistic solutions.

2. President Ibanez was elected on the strength of his demagogic campaign promises and his personal reputation for vigorous action. He is hindered by lack of an established political organization and lack of an effective majority in Congress. On the other hand his political opposition, ranging from conservative landholders and big industrialists through the middle-class supporters of the preceding administration to labor organizations and the Communists, is divided and ineffectual.

3. In present circumstances Ibanez is capable of controlling Communist activities in Chile and will probably do so. However, a severe deterioration of the economic situation would greatly enhance Communist capabilities to foment labor disturbances and civil disorder. Should the Communists gain such influence as to threaten the government and Ibanez proved unwilling to take sufficiently vigorous action to control them, the armed forces would probably assume police powers, if not actually take over the government.

4. Ibanez' most urgent political and economic problem is to halt a severe inflation. He may succeed in checking temporarily the inflationary trend, but a lasting solution of this problem would require a substantial increase in production of consumer goods, which cannot be achieved during Ibanez' term in office without substantial foreign financial aid. In the absence of adequate foreign aid and of more drastic domestic action, it is likely that the unsolved problem of inflation will lead to a political crisis in Chile during Ibanez' term.

5. Chile will almost certainly support (or at least not oppose) the United States in the UN on major issues arising from the East-West conflict. At the same time Chile will increasingly seek to demonstrate independence of the United States and, in economic matters, to act in concert with other Latin American countries regardless of the position of the United States.

6. Economic cooperation between Chile and Argentina may increase, but in the development of such cooperation Chile will exercise care to avoid economic and political domination by Argentina.

7. As long as Ibanez has any hope of US financial aid he is likely to take care to avoid antagonizing the United States, but he may seek to extort such aid by threatening cooperation with Argentina, with the USSR, or with the Arab-Asian bloc in the UN. If he is seriously disappointed in his expectation of US aid and faces a severe deterioration in the economic and political sitaution in Chile, he will probably attempt to regain popular support by a return to Yankee-baiting.

8. In the event of such a deterioration in the internal situation it is likely that Ibanez will find it impossible to cope with the problems which beset him by constitutional means and resort to arbitrary rule.

9. Given the probable support of the armed forces, it is likely that Ibanez could rule arbitrarily for some time. His exercise of dictatorial powers would probably not relieve the economic situation substantially, however, and it is likely that there would be efforts to overthrow his regime. If, in these circumstances, political opposition and popular hostility became so general and intense as to lead to widespread disorder, the armed forces would probably withdraw their support and the regime would fall.

10. Any estimate of future developments in Chile must be qualified by reference to Ibanez' advanced age and reported ill-health. He may become physically or mentally incapable of acting vigorously on either a constitutional or a dictatorial basis.

11. In the event of Ibanez' death or removal from office, any successor government would face the same economic problems and would be subject to the same radical and nationalistic pressures as affect the present regime.

DISCUSSION

Introduction

12. Chile normally supplies the United States with about half of its copper imports, or about 20 percent of US copper consumption. Moreover, Chile's standing in the Latin American community is such that the character of its political relations with the United States (or with Argentina) is a matter of general significance.

13. The world-wide depression in the early 1930's made Chile acutely conscious of its excessive dependence on the proceeds from copper and nitrates. Succeeding administrations attempted to promote rapid industrialization. They also sought a less unequal distribution of income. However, the manner in which these programs have been carried out has led to a severe inflation. Meanwhile, as a result of the development of industries in urban areas, the preponderance of political power has shifted from the landowners to new urban interests. These new political groups have been unable to unite on a program for solving Chile's problems and are becoming more inclined to advocate radical and nationalistic solutions as these problems become increasingly severe.

Political Situation

14. The present economic trend in Chile is adverse to political moderation and governmental stability. This trend is more fundamental than the character of any particular administration as a determinant of political developments.

15. The dominant personality in the present political situation is that of seventy-five year old Carlos Ibanez del Campo, who succeeded to the Presidency in November 1952. In the course of a stormy political career Ibanez has proved himself to be an opportunist addicted to strong personal rule. A professional Army officer, he achieved political prominence in 1925 as leader of a coup by younger officers which overthrew a military junta and restored a reformist civilian regime. In this way he became Minister of War and, two years later, President. His regime was based on military force, but nevertheless collapsed in 1931 under the impact of the depression. After a period of exile in Argentina, Ibanez reappeared in 1937 as leader of the Chilean Nazis, whose disorders led to their suppression. In 1942 he was the unsuccessful presidential candidate of a conservative coalition, and subsequently on several occasions he was suspected of plotting to overthrow the duly elected government. In 1949 he was elected to the Senate, from which position he ran for the Presidency in 1952.

16. In the presidential election of 1952 the mood of the Chilean electorate was one of intense dissatisfaction with the administration of Gabriel Gonzalez Videla. He had been elected in 1946 as the leader of a leftist coalition which promised the laboring classes a larger role in the national life and a greater share of the national income. Gonzalez Videla estimated that, with US financial assistance, his industrial expansion program could be accomplished before inflation became unmanageable. In order to make Chile eligible for US assistance, among other considerations, he expelled the Communists from the three cabinet posts which they had been awarded and officially outlawed the Communist Party under the Defense of Democracy Law, which he sponsored for this purpose. This law alienated organized labor, which complained that the government used it to circumscribe legitimate trade union activities. Moreover there was general reaction against the runaway inflation. Ultranationalists succeeded in intensifying anti-US feeling by charging that Gonzalez Videla had surrendered the national sovereignty to US interests.

17. Ibanez successfully exploited this rising tide of discontent. He avoided identification with any established political party and ran on his personal reputation for forceful action. To the workers he promised economic and social improvement and repeal of the Defense of Democracy Law. To ultranationalists he promised to vindicate the national sovereignty, and curried favor with them by severely criticizing the military assistance agreement with the US. To all segments of the population he promised elimination of corruption and waste in government, a "more balanced" economic development policy, and a lower cost of living. Ibanez was elected President with a popular plurality, though not a majority.

18. Ibanez' most reliable political support comes from the middle sector of society, which embraces small industrial and agricultural proprietors, professional men, government officials, and white-collar employees. Widely divergent views on both political and economic policies are held within this grouping. The Ibanez Administration's most intimate relations appear to be with those elements which admire the authoritarian regimes of Peron and Franco[3] and which favor a corporate form of government (like that of Salazar[4] in Portugal), State control of labor, and emphasis on agricultural development. However, the only strong ties uniting Ibanez' middle-class supporters are their distrust of the more conservative political parties, their anti-US nationalism, and their belief that Ibanez is the only man who can overcome Chile's economic ills.

19. Most of the middle-class elements which supported the preceding Radical Administration oppose Ibanez. Most intellectual and student groups (traditionally an important factor in Chilean politics) oppose him, primarily because of his authoritarian associations. The Radical party, since its fall from power, has attempted to regain some of its former political influence by advocating pro-labor programs and generally outbidding Ibanez for mass support.

20. Organized labor, which constitutes roughly 20 percent of the total labor force, has been a political force in Chile for the past fifteen years. Its support was an important factor in Ibanez' election, although his mass vote came primarily from unorganized workers. In the first few weeks of his regime Ibanez adopted a friendly policy toward labor, intervening in strikes to award benefits to workers and expressing a direct personal interest in the problems of individual workers. However, he soon began to criticize organized labor by claiming that it placed its own interests above those of the national welfare. A target of Ibanez' criticisms has been the new national labor confederation, CUTCH,* which was organized in February 1953 to provide labor a unified leadership free of government control. Virtually all labor organizations in Chile are affiliated with CUTCH. Despite active Communist collaboration in the unity movement and Communist influence in constituent unions, CUTCH has so far avoided Communist domination. At present CUTCH is evincing opposition to Ibanez, in part because some of his followers have created a rival labor organization. Still in the embryonic stage, this new pro-Ibanez labor group as yet poses no serious threat to CUTCH.

21. Conservative elements in Chilean society have on the whole been opposed to Ibanez. These elements are represented primarily by the large landholders and the business interests, which comprise the most cohesive social, economic, and political groups in Chile. Their opposition to Ibanez is based primarily on their dislike of social welfare schemes and increased government controls, and their fear that Ibanez may again resort to personal dictatorship. The large industrialists resent the reduction in emphasis on industrial expansion. Although some large landholders approve Ibanez' emphasis on agriculture, they fear that the Administration may intervene in marketing processes and may press legislation for minimum agricultural wages.

22. During recent years there has been an increasing fragmentation of political parties. Thirty-six parties participated in the March 1953 congressional elections, and twenty won seats. The Administration's main strength lies in two parties, the Agrarian Laborites and the Popular Socialists, which differ on many issues, particularly on the proper relationship between government and labor. Together with a group of small factions which normally support Ibanez, they have barely half of the seats in the Chamber of Deputies and are a minority of less than one-third in the Senate. The principal opposition parties are the Conservatives, Liberals, and Radicals, which, together with a group of small anti-Ibanez factions, control the remaining seats in Congress. However, on both sides party loyalties constantly shift, and there is a continual regrouping of loose, ad hoc alliances.

23. After the Chilean Communist Party was outlawed by the Radical Administration in 1948, it ceased to constitute an effective direct political force. The Communist political front, the People's Front coalition, polled only about 50,000 votes in the September 1952 and March 1953 elections and won only 10 seats in Congress. The Communist Party's membership is estimated at about 35,000. Its principal immediate objectives appear to be to win control of labor organizations and of student and intellectual groups; to further the influence of anti-US ultranationalists in the Ibanez Administration; to press for legalization of the Party through repeal of the Defense of Democracy Law; and to secure the re-establishment of commercial and diplomatic relations with the Soviet Bloc. Although the Communists opposed the candidacy of Ibanez, they hailed his victory as a defeat for the US and offered him support for an anti-US program. For a while Ibanez maintained a tolerant attitude toward the Communists. More recently he has caused difficulties for the Communist press, harassed individual Communists, and given warning that he would not tolerate strikes threatening the national interest. This shift in Ibanez' attitude probably reflects a sense that the Communists challenge his personal authority and a desire to win US and conservative approval. Nevertheless, in June Ibanez acceded to Popular Socialist demands that he support repeal of the Defense of Democracy Law, which would have the effect of restoring important political and organizational rights to the Communist Party. Ibanez stipulated, however, that repeal of the Defense of Democracy Law must be accompanied by a strengthening of the basic Internal Security Law.

24. The Communists virtually control the labor unions in the nitrate fields and coal mines. The major copper workers' federation is anti-Communist, but the Communists nevertheless command a minority following among copper mine workers. As copper mining is now entering the deep-pit phase, Communist opportunities for sabotage are increasing. The Communists have some influence in the maritime and port workers' federation, but at present are not strong in the railway federation or in telecommunications. The Communists have so far failed in their efforts to gain control of CUTCH, but have won important influence in the Santiago provincial affiliate of CUTCH.

Armed Forces

25. The Chilean armed forces have a total approximate strength of 67,500 men, a strength surpassed in South America only by Argentina and Brazil. These forces include: Army–24,000; Carabineros (security police)–21,000; Navy–17,500; and Air Force–5,000, including 250 pilots. Army and Carabinero leadership, discipline, and training are well above the Latin American average. However, there are serious deficiencies in arms, equipment, and supplies. Combat effectiveness of the Army is low by US standards, but high in comparison with other Latin American forces. The Navy is perhaps the most efficient in Latin America. The government is making efforts to expand and modernize its small, US World War II-type air force by acquisition of US or British jets. The morale of the armed forces is normally high and remains good despite the adverse effects of inadequate pay in the face of inflation and of the threat of political interference implicit in recent high-level retirements. Communist efforts to penetrate the armed forces have been unsuccessful. The armed forces (including the Carabineros) have shown themselves capable of suppressing civil disturbances and strikes and of guarding against sabotage in the copper mines and other strategic industries.

26. The Chilean armed forces actively supported the Ibanez dictatorship, 1927–1931. Since then they have remained aloof from politics, loyally supporting successive constitutional governments. On taking office, Ibanez retired an unusually large number of senior officers in order to put personal adherents in positions of command. The armed forces will certainly support Ibanez as constitutional President, and would probably continue to support him if, in critical circumstances, he were to resort to dictatorial methods. If, however, an Ibanez dictatorship failed to relieve economic distress and faced nearly universal political opposition and popular hostility, the armed forces would eventually withdraw their support, as they did in 1931.

Economic Situation

27. The survival and future course of the Ibanez regime depends largely upon its success or failure in dealing with Chile's serious economic problems. Severe inflation and an imminent decline in Chilean copper export earnings are the two immediate threats.

28. The cost of living, which had been rising rapidly during the postwar period, spiralled upward at the rate of 22 percent per annum during 1951–1952. Since January 1952 the dollar value of the free peso has depreciated by about 90 percent. This inflation was stimulated by direct governmental promotion of industrialization through large-scale and long-term development programs which diverted resources from production of foodstuffs and consumption goods. Industrial development was promoted by central bank loans, by direct subsidies, and by preferential exchange rates to facilitate imports of materials and equipment. The growth of bank-held government debt resulted in a secondary expansion of bank credit, permitting a speculative boom. More recently additional impetus to inflation has come from increases in wages and welfare benefits.

29. Agricultural production has received comparatively little governmental aid or attention, and has not kept pace with the growth of population. Since 1947 Chile has been a net importer of foodstuffs. Cultivation and distribution methods are poor. The use of fertilizers is extremely limited despite Chile's position as the world's largest producer of natural fertilizers. Imports of farm machinery have been hampered by deterioration in the terms of trade of Chile's agricultural products.

30. In February Ibanez obtained from Congress special powers, terminating 4 August 1953, to carry out a broad program of administrative reforms and anti-inflationary measures. Under the authorization all measures decreed by Ibanez before 4 August would remain in effect after that date. Numerous administrative changes were effected under these powers, including measures to rationalize the government's credit machinery, and to reduce anticipated budget deficits through governmental reorganization and economy measures. It was not until 2 July 1953, however, that Ibanez took important anti-inflationary steps, a delay owing partly to differences of opinion in his cabinet over specific measures and partly to a reluctance to antagonize vested interests until he had improved his political position. On 2 July he ordered: (a) aboliton of preferential exchange rates on most imports in order to alter the pattern of trade; (b) a general price rollback to 15 June 1953 effective for two years; (c) wage rises of 10 to 15 percent affecting medium and low wage workers to compensate for higher prices on the imported foods and materials formerly subsidized by artificial exchange rates. On 14 July the Administration outlined to Congress a comprehensive economic plan including austerity measures, fiscal and financial reforms, and a production policy designed to emphasize agricultural and service industries.

31. Increased domestic production of consumers' goods and foodstuffs is one element essential to a lasting solution of the inflationary problem. Incentive prices and subsidies would stimulate increases in agricultural output, but unless carefully managed would in the short run contribute to inflationary pressures. Ibanez hopes to obtain short-term US Export-Import Bank loans and a long-term World Bank loan to increase agricultural investment. The World Bank has estimated that, in order to ease the growing burden of food imports and to raise consumption levels slightly, it would be necessary to increase investment in agriculture by about $300,000,000, one-third in dollar-financed imports, over an eight-year period. This would approximately double the present rate of investment in agriculture, which is now about 2 percent of gross national product.

32. The Chilean economy is heavily dependent on copper exports. The copper industry normally provides about two-thirds of Chile's total foreign exchange earnings and a substantial portion of its budgetary revenue. The government controls the sale of Chilean copper. It derives revenue from the US companies through the differential between its buying price from the companies and its higher export prices and through income and indirect taxes. It is highly doubtful that the current export price of Chilean copper can be maintained in the face of competition from other copper-producing areas, and the increasing availability and use of aluminum and other substitutes. In addition the demand for copper for rearmament and stockpiling purposes will almost certainly be reduced in the immediate future. A reduction in earnings from copper exports would aggravate the imbalance in Chile's international payments.

33. Friction has arisen between the Chilean Government and the US copper companies (Kennecott and Anaconda) operating in Chile. The companies maintain that the government pays them an unjustly low price (the former US ceiling price) for their copper, and that by asking an artificially high price abroad it has curtailed export sales. At present there is an accumulation of some 60,000 tons of unsold metal, equivalent to about seven weeks' production. They also complain that the income taxes are exorbitant and discriminatory, and that the arbitrary exchange rate is unfair to them. On the other hand, the Chilean Government complains that the local US managers are offensive in their dealings with the government and that the companies have not trained Chileans for higher executive positions. It also complains that the copper companies' labor relations have been unsatisfactory.

34. At present the Chilean Government is considering a revision of its policy toward the copper companies in order to maximize its profits from the sale of copper. The government has initiated consultations with the companies with a view to maintaining the present level of governmental revenue and making governmental control of the marketing of copper more effective.

Foreign Policy

35. Chile's foreign policy is conditioned by a strong desire to retain the friendship and support of the United States, its most important copper market and the prospective source of needed financial and technical aid. Chile has generally cooperated with the US in the Organization of American States and has supported the US in the UN on major East-West issues. It has ratified the Rio Treaty and entered into a bilateral military assistance agreement with the US. Although Ibanez severely criticized this agreement during his campaign for the Presidency, his Administration has taken steps to implement it.

36. In recent years, however, increasing nationalism in Chile has complicated relations with the US. In common with other Latin American nations, Chile resents the alleged US neglect of Latin America since the end of World War II. It is strongly conscious of its position as an underdeveloped nation importing capital goods and manufactured equipment with the exchange earnings of its exports of raw materials. It has a constant fear of deteriorating terms of trade and is sympathetic to the point of view that underdeveloped countries have the right to nationalize their natural resources and to receive increased financial and technical aid from industrialized nations. On these issues Chile has exhibited over the past few years a willingness to cooperate in the UN with other underdeveloped countries such as the Arab-Asian bloc. Moreover, some elements in the Ibanez Administration favor the reestablishment of diplomatic and trade relations with the Soviet Bloc, hoping thereby to expand Chilean exports at higher prices. Thus far these elements have been overruled by Ibanez, who in a recent speech before Congress, attacked Soviet imperialism as being responsible for world tensions. Notwithstanding publicly declared support of the provisions of the Battle Act,[5] Chile has not thus far adopted effective safeguards against the diversion of strategic materials to the Bloc. Substantial amounts of copper were shipped to the Bloc in 1951 and 1952 via third parties, and Soviet buyers continue to make special efforts to obtain additional amounts.

37. Ibanez is a personal friend of Peron and his following includes elements disposed to favor closer political relations with Argentina. Some of these individuals have a genuine admiration for Peron's nationalistic authoritarianism; others wish to make an alliance with Argentina as the nucleus of a solid Latin American bloc; still others hope to exert pressure on the US by making friendly overtures to its major opponent in the Western Hemisphere. However, a traditional Chilean fear of Argentine domination and a desire to avoid alienating the US have thus far inhibited a close alignment of Chile with Argentina. Ibanez himself has been wary of a close political relationship with Peron. In particular, he resisted Peron's attempts to include political clauses in the economic agreement signed by the two presidents on 9 July.[6]

[5] Reference is to the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951 (Public Law 213), approved Oct. 26, 1951, commonly referred to as the Battle Act after Representative Laurie C. Battle of Alabama; for text, see 65 Stat. 644.

38. This Argentine-Chilean agreement contains no specific economic commitments. It is simply a general statement of hopes for the future expansion of trade between the two countries. Chile requires foodstuffs, especially meat, from Argentina, while Peron desires to increase imports of Chilean copper, iron ore, and iron and steel manufactures. In any case the amount of trade involved represents only a small percentage of the total foreign trade of each nation.

Probable Developments

39. Ibanez' most urgent political and economic problem is to halt inflation. His capabilities in dealing with this problem will be limited by softening of the world price of copper, by his lack of an effective majority in Congress, and by the diversity of his Congressional support. Requisite domestic measures to curb inflation will require further Congressional action and each will tend to antagonize some important interest. Nevertheless, Ibanez may succeed in carrying out a program which would temporarily check the inflationary trend. No lasting solution of this problem is possible, however, without a substantial increase in Chilean production of consumer goods. Such an increase cannot be achieved during Ibanez' term in office without substantial foreign financial aid. There is no assurance that such aid will be forthcoming or that it would be put to effective use. In the absence of adequate foreign aid and drastic domestic action, it is likely that the unsolved problem of inflation will lead to a political crisis in Chile before the expiration of Ibanez' term.

40. A decline in Chile's copper export earnings is apparently impending and inevitable. Such a decline would reduce both foreign exchange availability and government revenue, and would thereby aggravate Chile's already serious economic difficulties. This development would probably stimulate demands that the US support the price of [6]The text of the referenced agreement, signed at Buenos Aires, providing for an economic union between Chile and Argentina, was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 28, from Buenos Aires, dated July 10, 1953, not printed (425.3531/7–1053).

Chilean copper or make up the difference through other forms of economic aid.

41. To the extent that Chile is unable to sell copper in the free world at a satisfactory price there will be increasing pressure to sell to the Soviet Bloc. Ibanez' statements of policy in relation to this subject have been equivocal or contradictory.

42. Chile will almost certainly support (or at least not oppose) the United States in the UN on all major issues arising from the East-West conflict. At the same time Chile will tend increasingly to demonstrate its independence of the United States, and, in economic matters, to act in concert with other Latin American countries regardless of the position of the United States.

43. Economic cooperation between Chile and Argentina may increase, but in the development of such cooperation Chile will exercise care to avoid economic and political domination by Argentina.

44. As long as Ibanez has any hope of US financial aid he is likely to take care to avoid antagonizing the United States, but he may seek to extort such aid by threatening cooperation with Argentina, with the USSR, or with the Arab-Asian bloc in the UN. If he is seriously disappointed in his expectations of US aid and faces a severe deterioration in the economic and political situation in Chile, he will probably attempt to regain popular support by a return to Yankee-baiting.

45. Ibanez would prefer to maximize government returns from the US copper companies in Chile without proceeding to the extreme of nationalization. If denied US aid, however, and facing a desperate economic and political situation, he would be likely, for political as well as economic reasons, to take steps against the copper companies which might lead eventually to nationalization of the industry. In the short run at least, nationalization would be more likely to reduce than to increase the revenues that the Chilean Government derives from copper. Nationalization would not eliminate Chile's imperative need to sell copper to the US.

46. In present circumstances Ibanez is capable of controlling Communist activities in Chile and will probably do so. However, a severe deterioration of the economic situation would greatly enhance Communist capabilities to foment labor disturbances and civil disorder. Should the Communists gain such influence as to threaten the government and Ibanez proved unwilling to take sufficiently vigorous action to control them, the armed forces would probably assume police powers if not actually take over the government.

47. Ibanez is apparently concerned to redeem his reputation by ruling constitutionally during his present term. It is likely, however, that his regime will become unpopular and that he will be unable to obtain effective support in the Chilean Congress. It is likely that sooner or later impatience, frustration, and the real need for drastic action will move him to abandon constitutional political processes and resort to arbitrary rule.

48. Given the probability of continued division among his political opponents and of the continued support of the armed forces, it is probable that Ibanez could rule arbitrarily for some time. It is likely, however, that his exercise of dictatorial powers would fail to relieve the economic situation substantially, and that there would be efforts to overthrow his regime. If, in these circumstances, political opposition and popular hostility became so general and intense as to lead to widespread disorder, the armed forces would probably withdraw their support and the regime would fall.

49. Any estimate of future developments in Chile must be qualified by reference to the advanced age and reported ill-health of President Ibanez. He will be eighty-one at the expiration of his term in 1958, if he survives that long. He may become physically or mentally incapable of dealing vigorously with the difficult problems which beset him. If he should die in office, the Minister of the Interior, under the Chilean constitution, would assume the functions of the Presidency, pending a special election to be held within sixty days. The present Minister of the Interior is Osvaldo Koch, Ibanez' son-in-law. Koch was an active Chilean Nazi before and during World War II. Like Ibanez, he has no present party affiliation. If he came to power in the circumstances envisaged he would presumably endeavor to continue the Ibanez regime and policies. He lacks, however, the personal prestige and political strength of his father-in-law.

50. In the event of Ibanez' death or removal from office, any successor government would face the same economic problems and would be subject to the same radical and nationalistic pressures as affect the present regime.

Minutes of the 45th Meeting of the Defense Mobilization Board, Held in Washington, August 26, 1953 [1]

1. Chilean Copper Problem

At the Defense Mobilization Board Meeting this morning, General Smith said that State considered that the question of buying Chilean copper was primarily a defense decision. The State Department would no longer use the argument that a weak government must be bolstered up by measures of this kind for fear it would be replaced by something worse; it was impossible to buy strength. If on the basis of coldly calculated defense considerations it was determined that we should buy the copper, State had plenty of arguments to support this position but would not take it on political considerations alone.

Secretary Humphrey said that he welcomed this change in the State Department's attitude with regard to bolstering up weak governments. Nevertheless, he did feel that there was something more involved in this question than defense. The fact was that Chilean copper is essential to American economy in peace as well as in war. Secretary Humphrey intimated that he was inclined to accept the proposal to buy the copper.

A lengthy discussion followed as to the statistical position of copper. In the course of it, Mr. Flemming brought out the desirability of preclusive buying since there was strong reason to believe that the Russians would take the larger part, if not all of it, once given a chance; they had bought 50,000 tons at high premium prices despite the western world's rigid controls. Mr. Vance[2] pointed out that although the stockpile might be filled under floor-price contracts in several years, at the moment the stockpile was not full; in fact, we had less than a year's required imports at peace-time levels in the stockpile today. What would happen if a crisis arose before the floor-price contracts filled the pile? Moreover, a substantial part of the copper included in the estimates for meeting war-time requirements was to come from Chile and even more distant sources which we could not count on in an emergency. This being the case, the stockpile was unrealistically small.

The sense of the meeting was that the copper should be purchased at market prices for the stockpile for preclusive purposes. Mr. Flemming pointed out that the Defense Mobilization Board had authority to engage in preclusive buying.

Assistant Secretary Anderson[3] agreed, but pointed out the strong desirability of attaching definite conditions to the purchase to rescue the American copper companies from an intolerable situation and to help out the Chilean financial situation.

General Smith said that he did not like to tie the negotiators' hands by telling them that they should secure conditions in connection with the pile. He understood that it was agreed that it was in the national defense interest to buy the copper and, if that was the case, conditions should not be attached tying down the negotiators.

Secretary Humphrey said that he did think that it was highly important to straighten the situation out with the American copper companies involved. General Smith agreed provided our negotiators would be given room to maneuver. That appeared to be the sense of the meeting.

There was considerable discussion as to terms. It was suggested that it would be better to purchase the amount of copper over a 12-month period at market prices since prices were showing a tendency to sag. In this way the companies would be left with the present accumulation to liquidate in an orderly manner. It also appeared to be the sense of the meeting that we should offer to buy 85,000 tons but that if better conditions could be secured by upping this figure by 5,000 or 10,000 tons, the negotiators might do this.

Mr. Flemming stated that he would write a letter[4] to State setting forth the agreed points and informing us of the man appointed to represent the defense mobilization agencies in the negotiations.

The Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization (Flemming) to the Secretary of State

SECRET WASHINGTON, August 28, 1953.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: At the August 26 meeting of the Defense Mobilization Board consideration was given to a proposal calling for the purchase of copper from the Chilean government.

It was the consensus of the Board that: (1) it would be in the interest of national security to purchase up to 100,000 tons of copper at the market price prevailing at the time of delivery; (2) any such purchase should be accompanied by an agreement on the part of Chile not to sell copper to the Soviet bloc; and (3) as a condition to the purchase Chile should agree to eliminate present economic practices which jeopardize American investments in that country and render it an unstable source of U.S. copper supply.

In view of the fact that the Administrator, General Services Administration, is the person authorized to enter into procurement contracts under programs approved by the Office of Defense Mobilization, I am asking Mr. Mansure to designate a representative to work with the Department of State on this matter. I am designating Mr. Charles Kendall of my own staff to work with your people and the representative of the General Services Administration.[1]

Sincerely yours, ARTHUR S. FLEMMING

[1] For a list of the U.S. and Chilean representatives who participated in the copper discussions initiated at Washington on Sept. 21, 1953, see Department of State press release 510, dated Sept. 21, in Department of State Bulletin, Oct. 5, 1953, p. 442.

825.2542/9–3053

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 30, 1953.

Three formal meetings were held with the representatives of the Chilean Government on September 21, 23, and 28.[1] A formal meeting with representatives of Anaconda and Kennecott copper companies was held on September 24.[2]

The United States position as developed in the meetings with the Chileans emphasized that US agreement to purchase Chilean copper at the market price prevailing at the time of delivery was based on the condition that the Chilean Government: (1) agree to adequate measures to prevent sales of copper to the Soviet bloc; (2) agree to work out mutually satisfactory arrangements with the American producers which would not jeopardize their investments and would assure the availability of Chilean copper to the United States; and (3) agree to approve the sale of copper from current production at market prices.

These conditions were spelled out in detail and the point was emphasized that Chile had indicated on its own accord the decision to take these actions at the time the proposal was made to the United States regarding the purchase of surplus Chilean copper.

The Chilean representatives agreed that Chile had intended to do the things outlined since they were required to strengthen the Chilean economy. However, during the two-week period which MacKenna spent in Chile awaiting instructions from his Government, the political atmosphere in Chile had worsened and the "Commies" were embarrassing the Chilean Government to such an extent that it could not agree to have any "conditions" attached to the United States purchase. To be able to justify a sale to the United States rather than to accept better offers from the USSR and others, Chile would have to receive a "few cents" more per pound than the market price (it was later indicated that 32 cents was the figure the Chileans were thinking of).

If the United States could agree to this overprice, Chile would agree to: (1) prevent sales to the Soviet bloc by taking administrative action without publicity; (2) permit the current production of copper to be sold at market prices but under existing procedures; and (3) work out a mutually satisfactory arrangement for a copper-contract law with the copper companies as soon as politically possible following the purchase of 100,000 tons for the stockpile.

[1] Minutes of each of the formal meetings between the U.S. and Chilean representatives, and extensive related documentation, are in file 825.2542 for 1953.

[2] A memorandum of conversation at the referenced meeting, dated Sept. 24, 1953, is in file 825.2542/9–2453.

The US reply to the "new" Chilean proposal and the Chilean "political" justification for the drastic changes requested was firm, perhaps a little rough, and limited to the original US position. Stress was placed on the necessity of a competitive market price for Chilean copper if Chilean production and sales were to continue and on the complete lack of any sound justification for the US to consider paying more than the market price. Obvious reasons for no sales of free world copper to the Soviet bloc were repeated and no doubt was left that adoption by Chile of procedures to prevent such sales would be a sine qua non of any agreement. The desire for a mutually satisfactory settlement with the US copper companies was placed in its perspective, i.e. as a part of the need for a stable, productive and balanced economy in Chile.

The Chileans, apparently recognizing that their request for an overprice would be resisted, countered by asking for an agreement to extend loans as a means of supporting the Chilean Government in its difficult decision not to sell to the bloc. The Chileans were informed of the difficulties involved in obtaining possible loans. A balance of payments loan was described as currently out of the question and furthermore not in line with the objectives of the negotiation. Any request for a development loan would, of course, have to be considered on the regular bases with which the Chilean representatives were fully cognizant. The final decision would have to be made by the Bank and the NAC, based on the soundness of the project submitted. In any event, a development loan would not be considered as a "substitute" for the extra price requested on the copper purchase.

Probable Final Chilean Negotiating Position Under Current Conditions

As a result of the arguments submitted by the US negotiating team, tacit agreement has been reached that the stockpile sale will be made at market price (30 cents). On its part, Chile will agree to take administrative action, without publicity, to prevent sales to the Soviet bloc by adoption of the IC/DV procedure.[3] It will announce publicly, after the US purchase of 100,000 tons of accumulated copper for the US stockpile, that the next step required to strengthen the copper industry and enable Chile to sell at competitive prices will be a new arrangement with the US copper producing companies re taxes and exchange rates. Chile will agree, after the US purchase, to have Chilean copper sold at the competitive market price under existing Chilean procedures. In short, they will substantially meet all our conditions except the one for a mutually satisfactory arrangement with the American companies prior to consummation of the transaction.

[3] For information concerning the Import Certificate/Delivery Verification (IC/DV) procedure, see the Department's circular airgram, dated Apr. 16, 1952, p. 186.

It is not believed possible that the Chilean negotiators, under instructions from the present Chilean Cabinet and in view of the political atmosphere in Chile, could agree to a new contract law with the American producers as a prerequisite to the stockpile sale. We are currently exploring with them the possibility of having Chile take unilateral action on taxes and the exchange rate, leaving the negotiation with the companies and the passage of a contract law to a later stage.

Advantages of an Agreement and Risks of No Agreement Under Current Conditions

An agreement under present conditions without a change in the current status of the American companies would have only limited value. At the most, the US would obtain a Chilean reaffirmation, although secret, not to sell copper to the Soviet bloc, and current production would be sold at market prices. Such an agreement (under current conditions) would have little or no value to the US copper companies and would not succeed in having the Chilean Government face up to the facts of life and reorient its extremist, socialistic economic and political policies which are associated with anti-US demagogery and increasingly unsatisfactory relations. The risks of an unproductive agreement as well as the risks of failure to reach agreement must however be faced—Such risks include continued government policies favoring government ownership of industry and government control or ownership of trade, transportation, communications, and agriculture.

With regard to the risk of nationalization, the US copper companies, with over one-half billion invested in Chile, are willing to take the risk resulting from a break-down in the negotiations. They will not give their approval to an agreement which does not improve their relationship with Chile and would go along without protest only if it were determined that the US national interest would be really served by such an agreement.

With regard to the political advantage of an agreement under current conditions, it is hard to see how much can be achieved unless the agreement is productive in reorienting Chilean government policies. This is not likely to occur as long as the present Cabinet remains in control. An unproductive agreement or no agreement seem to carry about equal risks.

With regard to the value of the secret reaffirmation not to sell to the bloc, it must be measured in the light of previous Chilean Government actions. (a) The Chilean Government signed and ratified a Mutual Assistance Agreement which contains a promise that Chile will take measures to regulate commerce with nations which menace the security of the Continent. (b) During negotiations the Chilean Ambassador showed the US negotiators a telegram[4] from the Foreign Minister of Chile which stated that the President of Chile and his Cabinet had determined that regardless of the derogation of the Chilean decrees halting sales to the bloc, no sales of copper would be made to the Soviet bloc. Although this message was sent during negotiations, the Ambassador said it was not contingent on an agreement being reached.

The opinion of the US copper companies, based on reports which they consider very reliable, is it is practically certain that Chile did not receive an acceptable offer from the USSR and there is little chance of any appreciable sale to the bloc. However, there are conflicting reports. The negotiating team believes that the risk of sales to the bloc remains ever present, despite Chilean promises and assurances.

Under conditions currently existing in Chile and barring determination by the President to orient the Cabinet away from the extreme popular Socialist and Commie slant, there does remain a risk that an overt sale may still be made to the Soviet bloc. The best insurance against such sales would be the sale of Chile's full current production through the American producers at market prices and the purchase of the present accumulation by the US Government. A new accumulation of unsold copper or a sharp price depression would increase the risks regardless of what the US does with respect to the 100,000 tons now under discussion.

Pending instructions from you we intend to continue negotiations with the Chileans with the object of attempting to work our some acceptable formula along the lines of getting the Chilean Government to take action with respect to the companies without necessarily involving direct Chilean-Company negotiations to which the Chileans seriously object at this time.

Subject: The Opinion of the US Producing Companies on Copper Negotiations

Mr. R. H. Glover, Vice President & General Counsel
Mr. T. A. Campbell, Exec. Vice Pres. Chile Exploration Co.
Mr. Elmer Lang, Vice President, American Brass Company

Mr. Frank R. Milliken, Vice President
Mr. Carl Lenz, Pres., Kennecott Sales Corporation
Mr. Elwood S. Hann, Treasurer
GSA—Mr. Irving Gumbel
State—Mr. Atwood, Mr. Getzin, Mr. Barall

Mr. Atwood reviewed the Chilean and US positions as developed during the current negotiations pointing out that the US has not retreated from its position of requiring action with respect to the companies prior to the stockpile purchase, while Chile maintains that a contract law prior to the purchase is absolutely impossible.

The Anaconda officials quoted a Chilean businessman now in the US (Señor Heiremans) to the effect that Chile would not do anything for the companies until such time as they face a desperate situation. It is the consistent attitude of the Chilean Government not to do anything until there is absolutely no other alternative. Any promises made would not be fulfilled and the stockpile sale would be considered a victory for the Popular Socialists. Mr. Dwyer said the most important feature, for Anaconda, would be recapture of control of sales and pricing. Without the derogation of the present laws the companies would still be subject to the whim of the Chilean Government. Negative action, i.e. failure to issue decrees under the present laws, would not be enough. A new law would be needed to return control to the companies.

When the companies were shown copies of the Chilean draft of a public announcement and the US draft counter proposal,[1] Mr. Milliken had a strongly adverse reaction. In Kennecott's opinion any statement is meaningless. It may have value to the US Government but is of no value to Kennecott. In Mr. Milliken's opinion, any negotiations between the Chilean Government and the companies will be one of extreme pressures and Chile will "give" only when it has no alternative. If the stockpile deal is completed without changing their situation, the companies would have to bring to bear any remaining pressures available to them. Even a formal agreement between the two governments, without concrete prior action, would be valueless in view of Chile's past record of non-performance. The Anaconda officials were not so firm as Mr. Milliken but agreed with his general approach and they, too, feel that a statement from the Chilean Government is valueless.

Mr. Atwood then asked if, since a contract law was an impossible prerequisite, were other steps short of the passage of new legislation acceptable to the companies. Mr. Milliken again reacted strongly against any intermediary position. He stated his company was willing to take the risk of breaking off negotiations if these conditions were not met. However, if the US felt it must reach some agreement in the national interest, there were some steps Chile could take administratively, without resorting to legislation. After a long discussion of what Chile could do unilaterally it was agreed that as a minimum Chile could: (1) derogate decree 245 of January 8, 1945, which established the present exchange rate of 19.37, and issue another decree establishing the rate of 110; (2) derogate that article of decree 397 of February 29, 1952 which provides that a supreme decree shall fix, each three months, the quantities of copper for export. This could be replaced by a decree authorizing the companies to export all production above that required for internal needs of the country; (3) though the Banco Central could be deprived only by law of the power to fix the price paid to the producers, by means of article 11 of law 11151 (Special Powers), the Banco Central could wipe out the overprice. It was made clear that these actions, even if taken by decree, would not be really satisfactory from the viewpoint of the companies inasmuch as the basic discriminatory legislation, which should be superseded by a contract law, would remain in effect as a constant threat of a return to the previous system.

Thus, administrative action by the Chilean Government would have limited immediate value, but would fail to provide guarantees for the future. Though the Kennecott officials felt these intermediary actions would not have great value, Anaconda thought they would be of definite advantage as a step toward improvement of the situation. If Chile were to move the exchange rate to 110 or to eliminate the overprice, this would automatically commit the government to the passage of new tax legislation as a means of recapturing the revenues lost. Mr. Milliken would agree to the intermediary steps only if the US retained some power, perhaps by agreeing to purshase 50,000 tons now and the additional 50,000 after performance. Otherwise, Kennecott would prefer the risks of a complete and final solution at this time, with the US and the companies retaining all the bargaining strength possible. However, Milliken subordinated his company's position to the US and Anaconda. In general the position of Anaconda was less firm than Kennecott. It stated it has in Chile the greatest copper mine in the world with reserves equal to the total reserves in the US. In addition, two thirds of Anaconda's total supplies come from Chile whereas for Kennecott it is considerably less than one third. Anaconda cited the advice of their representative in Chile, ex-Ambassador to the US, Rudolfo Michels, who had reported that Chile could not possibly pass a contract law immediately but that progress could be made by steps, the first being the administrative actions described above. Mr. Campbell of Anaconda seemed to have a firmer position than Messrs. Dwyer and Glover but he pointed out the danger that if we forced these two decrees, Chile might take reprisals in the form of a very high tax rate unilaterally imposed. Thus, the administrative action would have value only if the decrees were issued in good faith and with good grace. If they can be achieved only by force and pressure, they may be hazardous.

Mr. Atwood asked how much harm would be done to the companies if the US buys the copper without insisting on prior action, relying only on the public statement of intentions. Anaconda replied that the companies' position would be no worse, but it would mean to Chile that it could get away with its arbitrary practices without being penalized. Mr. Atwood then asked what would happen if we called off the negotiations. The companies replied that Chile would be forced to sell at the market price, but it might also sell to the Soviet bloc. There is an additional threat in that the Banco Central might reduce the price paid to the companies below the present 24½ cents. This points up the necessity of returning control of sales, with full proceeds, to the companies.

In summary, it appeared that the best that could be achieved in straightening out the economic difficulties, short of prior legislation, would be (1) a decree by the President to let the companies sell abroad all copper above Chile's internal requirements; (2) if this decree is politically impossible, the Banco Central could authorize the companies to sell at the market price and retain the full proceeds; (3) establish the 110 rate by decree; (4) issuance by the Chilean Government of a statement of intentions regarding the submission to the congress of a new tax law based on income.

Subject: Minutes of the Eighth Formal Meeting US–Chile Copper Negotiations October 30, 1953

Participants: Ambassador Jara, Chilean Embassy
Sr. MacKenna, Central Bank of Chile
ARA—Mr. Woodward[1]
GSA—Mr. Gumbel
OMP—Mr. Getzin
OSA—Mr. Barall

The meeting today was held at the request of the Chileans. Mr. Woodward reported briefly on his discussion with Ambassador Jara and MacKenna at the Embassy on October 28[2] where the Chileans had urged the US to buy on the basis of promises while Mr. Woodward urged the Chileans to find some way whereby at least the non-discriminatory rate be eliminated prior to the purchase. He informed the Chileans that, unfortunately, we are still in a situation where we feel unable to go ahead just on the basis of the promises contained in the draft note. He asked what the Chileans had learned in the interim.

The Ambassador reported that del Pedregal was in touch with the committee in Congress which wanted to know exactly what terms could be reached in Washington. The Ambassador and MacKenna mentioned the 40–60,000 ton proposal which we had submitted and the alternate proposal of substituting 110 for the current 19.37 rate with the idea that the companies could compensate the Chilean Government for what they gained by means of paying the companies a lower price, e.g. below 24½ cents for the copper bought. MacKenna explained that this would have the advantage of doing away with the artificial exchange rate with no loss to the government. He said the Minister of Finance does not refuse to study this formula but in MacKenna's own opinion this latter plan would not be desirable although it would be considered a transitory formula only. Mr. Getzin pointed out that there would be no advantage to the US on this latter arrangement. We had wanted the 110 rate to insure automatic revision of the tax structure. This proposal would fail to accomplish that end. He said we had thought of the 110 rate in combination with a retroactive income tax as a transitory measure but that it would not be desirable from our point of view to eliminate one discriminatory practice and compensate for it by extending another discriminatory practice. Such an arrangement would have bad repercussions in the US if it became public. MacKenna pointed out that the companies were now protesting that the increase in taxes from 50 to 60% retroactively was illegal and therefore such a solution was not desirable for recapturing the loss on the exchange rate.

MacKenna then stated rather disingenuously that he had an idea for a possible solution though he had not tried it on the Ambassador or the Chilean Government. He said we must seek a way for mutual faith and then suggested that a public announcement could be made that 100,000 tons had been sold at 30 cents. The US would pay for 50,000 tons immediately and the balance would be bought after the necessary legislation is passed by the Chilean Congress. There would be no time limit for the additional 50,000 tons.

Mr. Woodward referred to our previous proposal of a 40–60,000 split and said we might make it 50,000 but on the question of price for the second half, it would be a great deal easier to get approval from ODM if a definite time limit could be established. Mr. Gumbel pointed out that the absence of a time limit would give Chile the opportunity to change the market and if the price goes up Chile would be able to sell without living up to its promises. MacKenna said this would not happen since Chile desires to sell its accumulated stock as soon as possible, especially since there were now 120 to 130,000 tons on hand. In reply to our query as to how long it would take to get the necessary legislation, MacKenna replied that Chile would start negotiating with the companies at once on a contract law but he did not know how long it would take to get approval by Congress—perhaps two months. The Ambassador said the problem is one of presenting the situation to the Chilean Congress in its most favorable light. If the administration could avoid the appearance that terms were imposed by the US, there would be a better chance of obtaining the necessary legislation. Mr. Gumbel expressed the opinion that we must make the purchase at a fixed price but there must also be a time limit. Since it was explained that the ODM offer could not be kept open indefinitely, it was finally decided to try to get approval on a six-month period at a fixed price of 30 cents.

Mr. Woodward asked if del Pedregal had already discussed this proposition with Congressional leaders. The Chileans replied that he had discussed the draft note and the legislation to be required but not the details of this 50–50 proposal because MacKenna had not yet suggested this idea to the Minister of Finance. However if the Ambassador and MacKenna recommended acceptance of this proposal, they believed the Minister of Finance would accept. (Note: Of course the 40–60,000 ton proposal had been discussed by Counselor of Embassy, Claude Courand, with del Pedregal, Fenner[3] and Cuevas,[4] and the Chileans were acting on instructions. See Embtel 125, October 29.[5])

The US team said it preferred this proposal to administrative action on the exchange rates but the announcement would have to be worded carefully and the text should be submitted for joint approval. The companies would sign a contract with GSA for the delivery of 100,000 tons at 30 cents, of which 50,000 would be delivered at once for payment in cash. After some discussion it was agreed that the balance would be delivered within a six-month period upon notification from the State Department to the GSA. If the implementing legislation was not passed within the six-month period, the contract would lapse with only 50,000 tons having been delivered. It was made clear to the Chileans, however, that if Chile failed to perform because of an increase in price during the six-month period, the US would still have the authority to call for delivery of the additional 50,000 tons at the agreed price of 30 cents. On this basis the negotiating team agreed to try to get approval from ODM next week. It was agreed that the public announcement could be made as soon as the ODM gives its approval and the necessary Confidential Notes are exchanged. It was suggested to the Chileans that they obtain approval from their government of the exact text of the draft note. MacKenna said this would be done.[6]

[6] By Oct. 30, 1953, U.S. and Chilean representatives had held eight formal meetings, but they reached no conclusion concerning United States purchase of Chile's accumulated copper stocks. In early November, the discussions were briefly transferred to Santiago, where representatives of the Embassy, the Chilean Foreign Office, and President Ibáñez also failed to reach agreement. On Nov. 9, the Chilean Government suspended the negotiations, and recalled its special representative, Luis MacKenna, from Washington.

Editorial Note

On December 16, 1953, the Chilean Government indicated its desire to renew the copper discussions at Santiago (telegram 189, from Santiago, dated December 16, 1953, 825.2542/12–1653). In telegram 157, to Santiago, dated December 30, 1953, the Department of State instructed Ambassador Beaulac to inform the Chilean Government that the United States was willing to resume the copper talks either in Santiago or Washington (825.2542/12–2353), but in telegram 188, to Santiago, dated February 9, 1954, the Department of State indicated that it preferred to have the discussions reopen in Washington because interagency consultation was required (825.2542/2–554). The discussions were renewed at Washington in late February 1954.

Subject: US-Chilean Relations

Participants: Tobias Barros, Chilean Foreign Minister-designate Ambassador Jara, Chilean Embassy
ARA—Mr. Cabot
OSA—Mr. Atwood
Mr. Barall

Following the luncheon given by Mr. Cabot at Blair House in honor of the Foreign Minister, the latter called on Mr. Cabot in his office for the stated purpose of obtaining a first-hand impression of the problems of the two countries and establishing a cordial relationship with US officials. He expressed his gratitude to Mr. Cabot for the warm reception he had received and for the opportunity to discuss matters of mutual interest. He stated frankly that he was only generally familiar with the situation in Chile and, except for what he had heard from Ambassador Jara, did not have detailed knowledge of bilateral problems such as copper. Referring to the upcoming Caracas Conference,[1] the Foreign Minister said he had received word from General Ibañez that Chile was firmly and decisively on the side of the United States in its desire to root Communism out of the Western Hemisphere and preserve democracy. He explained his pleasure in receiving this information because it coincided with his personal convictions. He said he had observed the operations of Communists in Europe and was aware of the threat they posed.

Barros then referred to economic matters which would be discussed at Caracas, stating these will be of greatest importance to Latin American countries. He expressed the hope that the United States would be "generous" in its assistance to Latin America in solving economic problems. He feels it is urgent that the United States and the other American Republics cooperate at Caracas to come up with a constructive and cooperative program. He referred to Chile's efforts to relieve its dependency on copper and mentioned the importance of developing uranium resources and agricultural production. He was particularly interested in the IBRD–FAO agricultural program[2] in Chile which he had discussed at the FAO meeting in Rome.[3]

The Ambassador added that the Communists, in Chile as in other Latin American countries, were trying to make the most of economic difficulties and to translate them into political difficulties. He expressed the fear that people were receptive to Communist propaganda and that Communism would progress rapidly in Latin America once it gets a foothold. He said a reasonable loan program by the United States, making sound loans only, could head off the menace. He and the Foreign Minister were optimistic about a solution to Chile's immediate copper problem and felt substantial progress had been made by the government in eliminating the political difficulties which had been created by the Popular Socialists and the government now had the go-ahead signal to work out a copper program. Jara said the only questions still remaining concerned the level of production to be attained and the construction of a refinery. Barros said Communist propaganda had been taken care of by the President's firm statement against sales to the bloc, even though a market exists there. He said it was his personal conviction that, willy-nilly, Latin America was in the "Lebensraum" of the United States and it would cause social and economic dislocation in Chile to try to reorient trade and traditional friendships.

Mr. Cabot said he was pleased to hear of progress in Chile's plans for the diversification of its economy and was glad to have Chile's collaboration in the struggle against Communism. He mentioned that Secretary Dulles was planning a factual speech[4] for Caracas which would expose Communist methods of infiltration and point out the dangers of Communist operations. With respect to uranium, the Chileans were informed that US cooperation in this field was not contingent on Point 4 funds and that the AEC was prepared to proceed with assistance in development when conditions warrant.

Mr. Cabot stated that while the long-range outlook for copper is very good, there is the immediate problem of the unsold accumulation. He reviewed the copper negotiations in the United States and explained that there had been an unfortunate misunderstanding with respect to timing. There is no basic disagreement between Chile and the United States on what course of action should be followed but Chile wanted the United States to make the purchase before such a course was followed. Referring to the Ambassador's note of August 6,[5] Mr. Cabot said the United States, on the other hand, had always understood that Chile would take corrective action either prior to or in conjunction with the stockpile sale. He described US interest in a stronger Chilean economy and in improved operating conditions for the American companies. Approval of the stockpile purchase had been obtained only on the basis of achieving these two objectives and we would have to show evidence of substantial progress before the sale could be completed. The US did not need copper and stockpile requirements were taken care of by existing contracts. Mr. Cabot told the Foreign Minister that the United States was ready to renew negotiations in Santiago at the convenience of the Chilean government and that Ambassador Beaulac had been informed of this. Mr. Cabot made it clear, however, that the United States was prepared to buy at 30 cents only if this is market price at the time of the contract. He said a drop in the price would create enormous difficulties for us since, by law, purchases for the stockpile could be made only at the going price.

The Foreign Minister said he understood the problem. He described himself as a man of executive temperament, who likes to get things done. To the extent that he is included in the copper discussions and in the formulation of policy, he will work for a rapid solution.

With respect to economic matters at the Caracas Conference, Mr. Cabot said he recognized their importance but stated frankly that the US position had not yet been established. He said the Randall Commission[6] had not yet issued its report[7] and the role of the Eximbank and US loan policy had not been crystallized. He explained, however, that President Eisenhower's point of view was favorable to increased international trade and expressed the hope that ultimate US action would be helpful to Latin American countries. Mr. Cabot mentioned that technical assistance to Latin America would not be cut in fiscal 1955. He also discussed the role of private investment in Latin America from a favorable point of view.

At the end of the meeting, Mr. Cabot said he hoped there would be further discussion and collaboration on the Caracas Conference, either in Washington or in Santiago through Ambassador Beaulac. The Foreign Minister said he was looking forward to a very friendly relationship with Ambassador Beaulac and he was sure they would be able to exchange information and opinions on mutual problems.

The Ambassador in Chile (Beaulac) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY SANTIAGO, February 19, 1954—5 p. m.

241. (a) In order understand clearly relationship which exists in Chile between proposed legislation and proposed stockpile purchase must be borne in mind that because of course of negotiations in Washington and publicity concerning them in Chilean Congress and public have impression which it is impossible eradicate that proposed legislation is by-product of negotiations for purchase stock and results from our insistence expressed during negotiations.

(b) Most important factor in copper situation now and future is attitude Chilean Government (including Congress) toward companies.

(c) It is in interest Chilean Government give companies reasonable and friendly treatment order they may remain strong and productive and there is evidence government recognizes this.

For example, unfriendly and flippant attitude Chilean officials toward companies reflected in press toward end negotiations in Washington has been absent two months.

During past month government in contrast to earlier attitude has made what appears be sincere effort draft with help companies a bill which government says it believes Congress will approve. Whereas bill less favorable in some respects than bill sent Congress by Gonzalez Videla in 1951, government representatives have reminded us Gonzalez Videla bill never considered by Congress.

Government consulted Senate before drafting present bill and Senate replies to consultation in terms which obligate it morally approve substantially kind bill government has drawn up. This constitutes new and presumably important step in direction of solution copper problem.

Government, furthermore, has pledged it will fight for bill in Congress and that President will use veto power to remove changes which affect companies' interests. No similar pledge received from Chilean Government in past.

Government has stated Liberal and Conservative Parties and certain members Radical Party have promised support bill in Congress. Probably more accurate say leaders Liberal and Conservative Parties have agreed support bill as described to them. Foreign Minister says government also expects support of PAL.

Press urging solution problem through legislation.

There is urgent need improve situation companies apart from government's desire US purchase stock. Probable companies will reduce operations in Chile soon, but if improved conditions not created reduction eventually will be on more drastic scale even though stock purchased. Government told this.

Chile requires additional cooperation from US including loans, particularly for agriculture, and hopes loans forthcoming if it solves copper problem. Until problem solved, Embassy considers mistake grant loans to Chile and Chile has no right expect loans. Some Chilean officials acknowledge this.

(e) In any consideration of whether and when US should buy stock following considerations are pertinent: Chileans' desire US purchase stock has strongly influenced government to draw up present bill. We cannot assume that desire would influence Congress to approve bill. Anaconda believes unpurchased stock would defeat legislation. Kennecott's local representative has held this view but Milliken has attached importance to pressure value unpurchased stock. He has tended also to be indifferent to possibility bills being defeated. Government says purchase stock prior to consideration of bill by Congress would facilitate approval. Companies, Chilean officials and advisers consider Congress will not approve bill unless US first purchases stock. They consider there is a chance of approval if US has purchased stock.

If Congress approves bill and we subsequently purchase stock immediate position companies will have improved, but there will be resentment against companies for having obtained improved treatment through pressure exerted by US. To extent this resentment exists it will be harmful to companies and probably result in worse treatment by government later.

If stock not purchased by time legislation considered by Congress many and perhaps majority members Congress will oppose bill as protest against US pressure. Some American company officials consider no member Congress will defend bill. If bill fails because of issue of pressure, position of companies and of US in Chile will gravely deteriorate.

If we purchase stock prior approval bill worst that may happen is Congress will not approve bill or will approve less favorable bill even over President's veto. Anaconda officials consider latter only remote possibility. (Braden officials not here today for consultation.) If bill not approved we then will own stock. We will have made contribution to stability international copper market. Companies will be in same position with relation to government as now (except in remote contingency worse legislation approved). We will have abandoned position which company officials who have participated in conversations with government believe has lost its bargaining value. Way will still be open for new legislation and internal pressures for new legislation or for administrative action will remain. When companies have reduced operations in Chile these pressures will be even stronger than now.

If we do not purchase stock and if Congress does not approve legislation it can be anticipated that price copper will fall; copper mining industry throughout world will be affected; companies will drastically reduce operations in Chile; overprice now being collected by government will diminish and, perhaps, disappear and total government revenue derived from companies will sharply decline. This will precipitate political crisis with possibility that military dictatorship headed by Ibanez or someone else will be set up. Communists would, of course, make great effort bring about condition of anarchy they could take advantage of.

We will be blamed by many for these results.

If crisis should develop there would be pressure from leftists for expropriation, but believe present government would recognize expropriation would make its copper problem worse and would also create new problems which country could not solve or withstand. What attitude a successor government would take cannot be predicted.

There also would be pressure from leftists and probably from others to sell to Russia. Present government has said it will not sell to Soviet orbit. Successor government might take different view. If stock unsold possible sale to Soviet orbit will become lively political issue.

(f) The two large American companies tend to reach somewhat different conclusions on basis foregoing considerations.

Shortly after his arrival here Milliken of Kennecott tended to argue that principal pressure on Congress to approve legislation will come from Chile's desire that we purchase stock and that once we purchase stock pressure will be removed. However, he is least familiar with local background and his attitude believed dictated by New York. Michaelson has not expressed that attitude.

Representatives Anaconda, which has greatest stake here, believe value stock purchase as a source of pressure to obtain satisfactory legislation is played out and that if we persist in using it as pressure it will become liability instead of asset as it has been up to now.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] February 27, 1954.

Subject: Chilean Copper Purchase

Discussion:

The Chilean Government has shown us, and is prepared to introduce immediately after Congress reconvenes on March 2, a more or less satisfactory bill regarding the American copper companies operating in Chile. Ambassador Beaulac and Anaconda now strongly recommend that we make the purchase of 100,000 tons of copper as provided by the DMB decision of last August. Kennecott is unenthusiastic but state that they will not oppose a decision to purchase.

Recognizing that there is a possibility that the Chileans will walk out on us if we purchase before the bill is enacted, I nevertheless am inclined to agree that the time has come to make the purchase. We must remember that the Chileans have steadily felt that we were employing pressure tactics and it is Beaulac's opinion that further delay is more likely to defeat our purpose than to accomplish it. At worst we will have a reasonably useful, marketable commodity at the market price.

MY DEAR MR. FLEMMING: I refer to your letter of August 28, 1953,[2] addressed to the Secretary of State expressing the consensus of the Defense Mobilization Board that it was in the national interest to purchase up to 100,000 tons of copper at the market price prevailing at the time of delivery provided that Chile agreed not to sell copper to the Soviet bloc and that it "should agree to eliminate present economic practices which jeopardize American interests in that country and render it an unstable source of US copper supply".

During the months which have elapsed protracted negotiations have been conducted between the United States Government and the Government of Chile concerning the conditions under which the United States would be willing to purchase for the United States stockpile 100,000 tons of Chilean copper. Simultaneously, but independently, the Government of Chile carried on negotiations in Santiago, Chile, with the representatives of the two United States owned Chilean copper companies. The latter negotiations have culminated in preparation of the attached bill[3] to be submitted to the special session of the Chilean Congress when it convenes on March 2. Though the bill is not as favorable a solution of the problem as the Department would have desired, it does embody the essentials of the principles which were put forward by the United States negotiators. If enacted in its present form, the bill will tax income rather than production, provide a non-discriminatory exchange rate, eliminate the price differential which now goes to the Chilean Government, make copper available to United States consumers at market prices, and repeal the present laws which place control of sales under the Chilean Government instead of the American producers. Although the basic tax rate of 75% is very high, it represents a considerable reduction for the American companies whose total taxes now range between 84 and 94%.

It is the consensus of observers most familiar with Chilean economic and political problems, including our Ambassador in Chile, that this is the best bill obtainable under prevailing conditions and that this is the strategic time for the United States to purchase the accumulated copper. It is our judgment that in this way we will have derived the maximum advantage inherent in United States willingness to purchase the copper stocks, and any effort on our part to force further concessions, or delay the purchase, would be likely to operate against the best interests of the United States and of the American producing companies. Should we further postpone purchase of the copper, it is almost certain that the bill will either not be enacted or that seriously damaging amendments would be passed. Chile's copper problem and its general economic situation would undoubtedly take a sharp turn for the worse and cause renewed agitation for nationalization of the American-owned mines and for sales of copper to the Soviet bloc. If the Government should be overthrown in the ensuing economic crisis, many Chileans would blame the United States. There would be much anti-US sympathy for Chile in Latin America and the Communists would be provided with a powerful propaganda weapon.

I do not wish to contend that all the arguments are in favor of the immediate purchase of the copper. The unfavorable aspects of the proposed legislation are recognized; it is impossible to give absolute assurances that the bill will be enacted in its present form; the Congressional debates are likely to produce strong anti-US propaganda from the opponents of the measure, and we cannot be sure that the Government will not be overthrown in the near future despite our actions. Unfortunately there is no agreement between the two American producers on what the United States should do at this time. On February 19 the Board of Directors of the Kennecott Copper Corporation rejected the legislation as unsatisfactory and inadequate from that Company's point of view. However, this Company has not taken a stand with regard to the United States course of action. It neither approves nor disapproves the United States purchase of surplus stocks. The President of Kennecott has indicated informally that he will not pass judgment on the decision of our Government. On the other hand, the Chairman of the Board[4] and the President of the Anaconda Copper Mining Company—whose production in Chile is by far the largest—traveled to Washington on February 23 for the express purpose of urging the Department of State negotiators to make the purchase at once in order to facilitate passage of the bill.[5]

It is my opinion that Chile's action to date, though it is still to be completed, constitutes agreement to the maximum degree feasible, in view of the balance of authority between the executive and legislative branches of the Chilean Government, for purposes of eliminating the present economic practices toward which the Defense Mobilization Board directed its authorization of August 28. The proposed legislation has received the unanimous endorsement of the Chilean President and the Cabinet. In addition, the President has the power to veto specific provisions in the law and has promised to use the veto against any undesirable amendments which may be introduced by the Chilean Congress. The Chilean Senate, in advance consultation with the Administration, recommended this type of legislation. Chile has consistently abstained from copper shipments to the Soviet bloc and has also reassured the United States that it will institute the recommended IC/DV system designed to strengthen safeguards against the shipment of strategic copper to the Soviet bloc. The bill itself by returning control of copper sales to the American companies would also greatly improve the possibility of preventing sales to the Soviet bloc in the future.

In the long-range interests of the United States and of the American companies concerned, I recommend that the purchase of 100,000 tons of copper for the strategic stockpile be completed at once at the prevailing market price of 30 cents per pound delivered in the United States. Since the bill will probably be presented to the Chilean Congress on March 2, it would be most desirable that the General Services Administration be authorized to sign a contract with the American producing companies immediately.

Sincerely,

WALTER B. SMITH

Summary Memorandum Prepared in the Office of Defense Mobilization[1]

SECRET

SUMMARY MEMORANDUM ON CHILEAN COPPER PROPOSAL

On August 26, 1953, the Defense Mobilization Board agreed that (1) it would be in the national security interest to purchase up to 100,000 short tons of Chilean copper at the market price prevailing at time of delivery; (2) any such purchase should be accompanied by an agreement on the part of Chile not to sell copper to the Soviet Bloc; and (3) as a condition to the purchase, the Chilean Government should agree to eliminate present economic practices which jeopardize American investments in that country and render it an unstable source of U.S. copper supply. On the basis of the preceding conditions, negotiations were thereupon begun with the Chilean Government. The Defense Mobilization Board again discussed the problem at its meeting Wednesday, March 10,[2] when it reviewed a letter from the Department of State to the Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization.[3] This letter outlined the status of negotiations as of March 1, and recommended that the proposed purchase be completed at once at the prevailing market price of 30¢ per pound delivered in the United States.

With respect to point (1) above, it should be noted that about 76,000 tons of Chilean copper are now in storage in the United States. Moreover, there are now in storage in Chile about 103,000 tons. Since 24,000 tons of this supply could be sold at once to the U.S. Government with freight to the U.S. allowed, it would be feasible to get immediate delivery of the total 100,000 tons "at the market price prevailing at time of delivery," namely, 30¢.

With respect to point (2) above, it was stated by the Department of State representative that the executive branch of the Chilean Government had now agreed to this condition, and that as soon as written confirmation of this is received, the Department of State will consider that this condition has been met.

With respect to point (3) above, it can be noted that the legislation in question has been introduced, that it has received the unanimous endorsement of the Chilean President and his Cabinet, and that the Chilean Senate has recommended this type of legislation. Moreover, the President has agreed to veto any undesirable amendments that may be introduced by the Chilean Congress. Nevertheless, no assurance can be given that the described legislation will be passed. It is held that any suggestion that the U.S. is using its economic power to dictate Chilean legislation may cause the failure of the Bill to pass, and that the only way to demonstrate convincingly that the Chilean Congress is free to make its own decision is to sign a purchase agreement at once, in advance of the passage of the legislation.

The question to be decided is whether we should contract to purchase the copper under this condition, assuming that written confirmation has been received of the agreement not to sell copper to the Soviet Bloc.

[2] In a letter dated Mar. 12, 1954, Mr. Barall informed Counselor of Embassy Courand at Santiago that at its meeting on Mar. 10, the ODM decided to refer the question of purchasing Chilean copper to the Cabinet (825.2542/3–1254).

Minutes of a Cabinet Meeting, Held at the White House, 10:05 a.m., March 12, 1954 [1]

CONFIDENTIAL

[Here follow a list of those present (25) and discussion of matters unrelated to the purchase of Chilean copper.]

Purchase of Chilean Copper—Dr. Flemming reviewed the Defense Mobilization Board consideration of a proposal for purchasing 100,000 tons of Chilean copper at the prevailing market price provided the Chilean Government agrees not to sell copper to the Soviet Bloc. He placed before the Cabinet the question as to whether the US should, before making the agreement, insist upon passage by the Chilean Government of legislation eliminating economic practices which jeopardize American investments in that country.

Gen. Smith favored completion of the agreement prior to passage of the legislation so as to avoid any charge of pressure on the Chilean Legislature. Asst. Sec. Wormser noted the dependence of the US on Chile for copper. Sec. Humphrey agreed with Gen. Smith even though he disliked many aspects of the proposal and he urged care to prevent the development of any similar situation in the future where the US would have great need for Chilean copper.

In a discussion of the impact of the agreement on domestic copper producers. Gen. Smith noted that the action would tend to support the price at home and Mr. Flemming pointed to current improvement of the domestic copper situation.

It was agreed that the purchase should be carried through without insistence upon the Chilean legislation.

[Here follows discussion of other matters.]

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of International Materials Policy (Evans)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 18, 1954.

Subject: 1. Purchase of Chilean Copper Participants: U—General Smith

Dr. Flemming—Director, Office of Defense Mobilization
Mr. Kendall—General Counsel, Office of Defense Mobilization
Mr. Wormser—Assistant Secretary, Interior Department
E—Mr. Kalijarvi OMP—Mr. Evans

1. Purchase of Chilean Copper.

The Under Secretary opened the discussion by referring to a "ticker" item to the effect that the Chilean Cabinet had announced its intention of selling copper to the Soviet bloc. He then read aloud the telegrams[1] from Santiago which gave the text of the Chilean Cabinet announcement and which left a clear implication of the intention to explore the possibility of sales behind the iron curtain. One aspect of the Chilean Cabinet statement to which the Under Secretary, Dr. Flemming and Mr. Wormser attached particular importance was the indication that the Chilean Government would not permit the American companies in Chile to reduce their production. The Under Secretary pointed out that if this had the effect of continuing to pile up surplus copper stocks in Chile, part of the purpose of the proposed purchase would be defeated.

There was some discussion as to whether the Chilean Cabinet's action required any reconsideration of the United States Cabinet decision to purchase 100,000 tons of copper. It was agreed that this was not necessary, since the United States Cabinet decision was clearly conditional upon the Chileans giving satisfactory assurances with respect to East–West trade.

Dr. Flemming then indicated that his purpose in requesting the meeting had been to discuss the worry that Mr. Wormser and others had as to the possible market effect of the purchase, and he suggested that some of the risk might be removed if we were to spread the purchase of the copper over a period of several months. Mr. Kalijarvi pointed out that the question of market effect had been discussed in the Defense Mobilization Board and presumably was also a consideration before the Cabinet at the time it made its decision. The decision was made in spite of any danger that might be involved. Mr. Evans asked Dr. Flemming what he had in mind in connection with a gradual purchase. Dr. Flemming indicated that purchases would be on the basis of market price at the time of delivery, and that this would reduce the total price to the United States Government if the market should fall after our initial purchase. Mr. Evans pointed out that it had been contemplated throughout the negotiations that Chile would be able to make prompt delivery of the entire 100,000 tons, and that the kind of arrangement suggested would be considered by the Chileans to represent bad faith on the part of the United States and would probably do more harm to our relations than no purchase at all. The Under Secretary said that this was his view, and Dr. Flemming agreed that he found the arguments persuasive.

The conclusion was that Ambassador Beaulac should be informed that we would take no action concerning the purchase or notification to the Chileans pending the Ambassador's further analysis and a statement from him as to whether authority to tell the Chileans of the decision to purchase would be helpful in obtaining the desired East–West trade assurances. The Under Secretary also said the Ambassador would be informed of the concern which was felt here about a cutback in United States production if this cutback were not matched by a similar reduction in Chile.[2]

[2] In telegram 265, to Santiago, dated Mar. 24, 1954, the Department instructed Ambassador Beaulac to inform President Ibáñez that the U.S. decision to purchase 100,000 tons of Chilean copper was contingent upon assurances from Chile that it would (1) reverse or interpret favorably the Cabinet statement concerning the sale of accumulated copper stocks to Soviet bloc countries, (2) institute the IC/DV system, and (3) not prevent the copper companies from making reasonable decreases in production (825.2542/3–2454).

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 26, 1954.

MY DEAR MR. FLEMMING: The Department is now in receipt of information from Ambassador Beaulac that the President of Chile and the Cabinet approve the continued prohibition of sales of copper, from whatever source, to the Soviet orbit, and a note[2] to this effect has been provided. The Chilean Government has also agreed to adopt the IC/DV system as a control measure.

With respect to reasonable curtailment of production by the American producing companies, the President, the Minister of Foreign Relations and the Minister of Finance have promised to permit necessary cutbacks after April 3 if the companies are unable to reach an agreement with the mining unions before that date. The cutbacks would be in addition to the substantial cutbacks that have already taken place. These were detailed in a letter of March 23[3] to Mr. Wormser, a copy of which was sent to you.

The Ambassador has therefore now informed the Government of Chile, in accordance with our instructions, that the United States Government is prepared to proceed with the purchase of copper.

In pursuance of the Cabinet decision of March 12, it is requested that you authorize the General Services Administrator to negotiate at

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 12, 1954.

Subject: The Situation in Chile

It is almost impossible to talk with any one familiar with the situation in Chile without getting a very gloomy picture. There appear to be no hopeful signs on the horizon as political and economic problems multiply, with no effective program to combat them. Chileans apparently feel that when conditions appear to be hopeless the US will step in and provide the necessary assistance.

Political

After a demagogic election campaign in 1952 in which Ibañez and his supporters promised to curb the inflation and end graft and corruption, Ibañez was elected by a 47% plurality in a 4-way race. The popular vote was largely a repudiation of the organized political parties which had ruled for more than a decade in various coalitions whose backbone was the Radical Party. In November 1952 Ibañez was inaugurated and tried to form an effective Cabinet composed partly of old cronies who had served with him during his first administration (1927–31), and partly of the extremist or independent splinter parties which had rallied around him. As it became obvious that no one could implement the wild campaign promises which had been made, and as it proved to be impossible to weld into a harmonious political coalition the various extremist groups of both the right and left, a series of internal quarrels broke out which led to almost continuous cabinet changes, with each new grouping apparently weaker than its predecessor. Ibañez failed to achieve unity or to exercise the strong leadership which the voters had hoped for and his administration thus far has been characterized by the absence of political leadership—almost by the absence of effective government. This situation is especially grave in Chile, which has averaged about 20 political parties recently, with none representing as much as 20% of the popular vote. Congress accurately reflects this fragmentization and Ibañez has failed to develop the sort of coalition Cabinet which would provide even a temporary majority. In the March 1953 Congressional elections the various Ibañez groups won about half the seats of the Chamber of Deputies, but only ⅓ of the Senate. With the fourth new cabinet already in disrepute and torn by internecine ideological battles, there is talk of the creation of a really competent cabinet of qualified technicians, non-political or with a broadened political base, to cope with the mounting economic problems. There is also a report that Ibañez has decided to dismiss Congress and rule by decree, either alone or in a Junta, with the support of the armed forces. The military holds the balance of power but for the past 20 years it has been non-political and has developed a tradition of non-interference.

Economic Situation

Since 1940 Chile has followed a program emphasizing industrialization at the expense of agricultural production. Socialist or frankly Marxist economic theories have been in the ascendency and have left their mark in increasing government controls over the economy. The Ibañez regime has strengthened the trend toward a centrally directed economy by the creation of INACO (a state trading corporation patterned after the Argentine IAPI), a Ministry of Mines, and a State Bank. There have been efforts to take over the Central Bank, the steel industry, the nitrate industry, and to make the copper industry subservient to the needs of the government. Controls over prices and foreign-exchange rates have been intensified and the government is now trying to pass an "Economic Crimes" bill to force compliance with administrative regulations under threat of heavy fines or imprisonment. Fortunately, lack of control over Congress has prevented the adoption of the more extreme economic projects and the political parties in favor of a sounder economy continue to frustrate them.

With the tapering off of the shortages and high prices brought about by the fighting in Korea, the Chilean economy has started to run downhill and deficits in the national and foreign-exchange budgets have mounted. The national budget in 1952 was 29 billion pesos; in 1953—47 billion; and for 1954 it is 62 billion. With no corresponding increase in productivity, the natural result has been inflation, which in 1953 amounted to 56%. The 1953 foreign-exchange budget included a $70 million deficit which was to come from future receipts. However, the 1954 budget, instead of taking up the slack, shows a gap of $98 million, with estimated expenditures at $390 million as compared with estimated receipts of $292 million, and almost all of the missing funds in dollars. To make matters worse, $20 millions of the latter sum is to come from anticipated loans. Exchange difficulties have led Chile to resort more and more to barter or compensation agreements with other countries, Argentina, Germany, etc. and have turned Chile's emphasis toward the soft-currency areas at the expense of dollar trade. Recently, even copper has been sold out of the dollar area and this, together with artificial exchange controls, has intensified the present balance of payments difficulties so that Chile may have to default on its debt service next month. In June payments of 5½ million come due. Our Embassy reported on May 4 that dollar balances in the Central Bank were below 5 million. Over $10 million is owed for oil imports and the companies threaten to cease shipment of fuel.

The accelerated inflation (14% in the first 3 months of 1954) has been accompanied by insistent demands for wage increases for labor, both private and public, to which the government has almost invariably yielded. At the end of 1953, to avoid a general strike threatened by the school teachers, the government granted an annual bonus to all its employees. The money for this payment had to be borrowed or printed. Mounting labor costs, higher costs of production, higher prices, and greater currency circulation have kept the inflationary cycle going, with the government either unable or unwilling to call a halt. The fluctuations in the curb rate of exchange and the reported flight of capital indicate loss of confidence in Chile's currency.

Copper

Under present legislation, the American copper producers provide about 50% of government revenues and about 65% of all foreign exchange under a complicated tax system which keeps the cost of production artificially high and taxes away 80 to 90% of the total earnings, as follows:

(a) 3% import duty on mining supplies.
(b) Cost of production returned at 19.37 pesos to the dollar as compared with the bank rate of 110 and the curb rate of over 300.
(c) The "overprice" or spread between about 24 cents and the sales price of about 29 cents goes entirely to the government.
(d) Income tax of 60%.

In addition, the Central Bank has been placed in control of sales of copper, the government has engaged in price fixing, and other laws interfere with control over the industry by the American mine owners. Small wonder that production has increased everywhere in the world except Chile.

When Chile's artificial price of 35½ cents broke down and unsold surpluses accumulated, the US was requested to buy 100,000 tons for the stockpile as part of Chile's program to curb inflation, return the copper industry to a competitive basis, and strengthen the economy. After months of fruitless negotiation the US decided to buy the copper, partly with the hope that this would enable Chile to strengthen its economy and enact new copper legislation which, though it embodies several undesirable features, would also provide:

(a) a single tax on income, starting at 75% and decreasing as production is stepped up.
(b) a non-discriminatory exchange rate (now 110 pesos, though this is artificial).
(c) sales at world prices.
(d) return to the companies of control over sales.

Apart from this legislation, which was introduced in the Chamber of Deputies March 2, with no progress so far, Chile renewed its pledge not to sell to the Soviet bloc and promised to adopt the IC/DV control system to prevent transshipments to iron-curtain countries. To Chile's credit, it should be stated that despite the political difficulties caused by this promise, so far its record of compliance has been quite good. However, the question of sales to the Soviets remains a leading political issue and we can anticipate periodic threats.

Chile's surplus is still over 50,000 tons and production has been curtailed correspondingly. Last month sales exceeded production for the first time in almost a year and the prospects for the copper industry in general are improving. However, it remains to be seen whether Chile will get its full share of the market.

Nitrate

The nitrate and iodine industry is the second largest producer of foreign exchange but Chile's natural product no longer enjoys the monopoly it once had. Synthetic production has been stepped up throughout the world, frequently with the aid of Marshall Plan funds or Eximbank loans. Chile's nitrates, burdened with high taxes, artificial exchange rates and antiquated methods of production, cannot compete freely with synthetics. Nitrate is politically important in that the northern provinces live almost exclusively on this and the copper industry.

US Private Investment

In addition to heavy investments in copper and nitrate, US capital is found in iron mines, the steel mill, industry, sales, and in electric power. American and Foreign Power has an investment in Chile of almost $100,000,000 but its operations are hampered by government competition in generating power, inadequate sales rates, artificial exchange rates, and lack of dollars for the remittance of earnings. With difficulties experienced by almost all US investors in Chile, it is understandable that new investments have fallen to a small trickle.

Agriculture

Agricultural production has been falling off in Chile for many reasons, including:

(a) Emphasis on industrialization.
(b) The semi-feudal status of agricultural labor.
(c) Government price controls.
(d) Inadequate rainfall or irrigation.
(e) Lack of capital investment in machinery and other means of improving production.
(f) Inadequate roads and distribution system.
(g) Lack of land conservation.
(h) Inadequate use of fertilizers.

As one result, Chile has switched from a net exporter of wheat to an importer of sizeable quantities—about 250,000 tons for 1954. Shortages of beef, sugar, dairy products and edible oils further complicate the picture and cause a heavy drain on foreign exchange availabilities. Chile's current balance of payments situation has led to speculation that there may be no funds for food imports later this year and Chile may face a food shortage and perhaps some actual starvation. This is a ridiculous situation for a country with agricultural prospects as good as Chile's. Rehabilitation of agricultural production is the major target in Chile. The FAO/IBRD study[2] calls for increased production of 38% over an eight-year period with an investment of about $280,000,000, about ⅓ in foreign currency. Chile has been preparing detailed plans for the implementation of this report for the past year but none of the projects is complete.

Our FOA program in Chile lists increased agricultural production as its chief objective but progress through the Servicio operation takes a long time, especially in the absence of capital investment. Within the limits of the program we are attempting to improve soil conservation methods, improve the livestock and dairy industry, develop hardier strains of wheat, improve irrigation, etc. Through CARE some dried milk has been distributed in Chile but there has not been any large-scale program involving the use of US agricultural surpluses. After stockpile objectives are revised and funds set aside for this purpose, it may be possible to exchange agricultural products for copper or other strategic materials from Chile. If actual starvation threatens Chile, the US would probably make a grant of foodstuffs, as it has in other areas of the world.

Loans

The Eximbank has extended to Chile loans of about $138,000,000 and the IBRD about $37,500,000. In addition, Chile has drawn its gold tranche of 12½ millions from the IMF and it borrowed 12½ million from the National City Bank. There are also short term commercial debts to be paid and balances due under compensation agreements. Total reserves have dropped in the year March 31, 1953–54, from $115 to $81 million, with almost $42 million in gold. Many close observers feel that Chile is about loaned up and requests for further loans would not be approved readily. The IMF and the two banks would be likely to defer any consideration of loans until the inflation has been curbed. Chile would be interested in the following:

Eximbank (a) A line of credit of $100,000,000 for economic development.
(b) $14 million for the nitrate industry.

IBRD (a) Agricultural loans, up to $100,000,000.
(b) $17 million for modernization of coal mines.
(c) $25 to 35 million for rehabilitation of railroads.

IMF Additional drawing of $12½ million.

However, none of these is a likelihood under the present circumstances and Chile may have to sell off some of its gold reserves to meet necessary payments this year.

General

No country in Latin America has had more friendly cooperation or more economic assistance (on a per capita basis) from the US than Chile. Despite this, anti-US sentiment runs quite high and many people in responsible positions really believe that Chile is being exploited by the US or by US private capital. While striving to preserve such goodwill as we still have, we should make it clear to Chile that for continued economic development it will have to rely primarily on its own resources and on its willingness to permit competitive and profitable operation of Chilean industries and on its ability to attract new capital investment. Any further US measures of assistance to Chile should come only after visible signs of progress in combatting inflation and strengthening the economy, probably by a reversal of the economic policy which now prevails. Except in case of a need for emergency food or if US national interest should dictate, the US should not even discuss any measures of assistance to Chile until copper legislation is enacted in accordance with the promises of the administration and preferably not until there is some evidence of economic responsibility on the part of the government.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 4, 1954.

Subject: Chile's Request that the U.S. buy more Copper.

Despite Chile's claims to the contrary, its copper difficulties are due almost entirely to government control over the industry, including the establishment of a rigid minimum price which led to the eventual accumulation of half a year's unsold production. Ambassador Jara's first request to the U.S. to buy copper was made in July 1953, as part of a plan to solve the overall copper problem and establish a new relationship with the companies. By August, the original amount of 25,000 tons had grown to 100,000 and a representative of the Central Bank was sent to the U.S. to help the Ambassador negotiate. They informed Mr. Cabot on August 4 that the stockpile purchase would be part of an overall settlement of the copper problem, including a "mutually satisfactory" new law improving operating conditions for the American companies and making Chile's copper competitive again. This talk was followed by a Chilean note, August 6,[2] which claimed "Chile has placed in operation a complete plan for unification of the exchange system and for economic stabilization, destined fundamentally to establish a sound economy and to combat inflation, which has reached alarming proportions. The government is determined to deal with the inflationary process by attacking its most pernicious causes, i.e., an unbalanced budget, monetary and credit expansion, inadequate orientation of public and private investments". The note then argued that the success of this plan was contingent on the purchase by the U.S. of 100,000 tons of copper. (Note: None of this has taken place. Instead, the rate of inflation has increased, and for the period April 1953–April 1954 reached 78.9%.)

The U.S. took the Chilean promises at face value and agreed, after a difficult decision by the DMB, to negotiate for the copper. The U.S. desired only that Chile implement its promises with respect to its own economy and the copper industry, and that it adopt the IC/DV system to prevent sales to the Soviet bloc. During the course of the negotiations, the Chilean position changed and our efforts to secure positive action by the Chilean Government prior to the stockpile purchase were labeled intervention in internal affairs. Chile also tried to extract a higher-than-market price or a line of credit of $100,000,000 as compensation for not selling to Communist countries. As you recall, the negotiations were deadlocked for several months and the U.S. Cabinet finally agreed to the purchase on the strength of Chile's promises not to sell to the Soviets and to pass new legislation for the copper industry. The only promise kept by Chile so far concerns sales to the Soviets and we can never be sure that it will not be broken if Chile receives an attractive offer.

The lesson to be derived from the above seems to be that we should not agree to consider any proposal until Chile has first implemented its previous promises—in Chile's own interest. The $100,000,000 Chile earned on the copper "overprice", at a time when its entire economy was booming and its balance of payments was favorable, did not enable the country to balance its budget, stop inflation, or spur economic development. The $60,000,000 stockpile purchase now under way (first payment of almost $19,000,000 was made to Anaconda June 3) has not helped Chile solve any of its problems. In his annual message to Congress on May 21,[3] President Ibanez tried to blame the falling copper price and the paralyzation of sales for the country's failure to balance the budget. He argued that external conditions were responsible for Chile's economic difficulties and nowhere did he suggest an anti-inflationary economic program. Under these conditions, if we bail Chile out once again, it would appear that we are aiding neither Chile nor the U.S., but just postponing and making more difficult the eventual day of reckoning.

As a practical matter, I am certain the ODM would not take under consideration the purchase of a substantial amount of copper over an extended period of time. Nor do I believe we could have the Cabinet again consider a copper purchase while Chile's recent promises are still unfulfilled and when President Eisenhower is facing difficult decisions on the subject of imported versus domestically-produced metals.

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, November 27, 1954.

Subject: Chile Wheat Emergency

In August of 1954, FOA submitted Chile to the Department of Agriculture for priority consideration in Public Law 480[1] because of our appraisal that there would be a serious food need in that country.

Thus far, the Department of State has not concurred in the urgency of the need, and Assistant Secretary Holland specifically requested that all Public Law 480 programs be postponed until after the Rio Conference.

[1] Reference is to the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 (Public Law 480), approved July 10, 1954; for text, see 68 Stat. 454.

State Department cable No. 176 of November 22nd from the United States Ambassador in Santiago and Tousfo 148 of November 24th[2] from our Mission Chief in Santiago both indicate an extremely critical situation reflecting the possibility of a bread shortage within the next few weeks.

A CIA evaluation has also indicated a critical situation.

Therefore, I respectfully suggest further consideration by the Department of State of its position. If authorized, FOA could proceed with some early emergency wheat shipments, pending a decision on the total Public Law 480 program for Chile.[3]

In the meantime, the Department is exploring the possibility of meeting a Chilean Government request to expedite the shipment of 4,500 tons of cottonseed oil under the proposed agreement prior to completion of negotiations." Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL QUITANDINHA, December 2, 1954.

Subject: Discussion of Chilean Problems

Participants: Under Secretary Herbert Hoover, Jr.
Chilean Finance Minister Jorge Prat
Assistant Secretary Henry F. Holland

The Minister said that he had just talked to Santiago. It is urgent that Chile have 10,000 tons of wheat in order to cover the period elapsing until their harvest season gets under way in January and February.

Chile has just received a shipment of 11,000 tons of vegetable oil. It was paid for with a dollar promissory note falling due in 180 days. This arrangement for payment was made because of the fact that the regulations permitting payment in local currency had not yet been adopted. At the time the dollar obligation was issued it was understood that it would be converted to Chilean pesos before maturity. He hoped that this could be worked out.

[1] This conversation took place during the course of the Rio Economic Conference at Quitandinha, Brazil. For documentation on the conference, see pp. 313 ff.

Mr. Hoover said that the United States could be helpful on the wheat problem and that he would look into the vegetable oil problem.

The Minister said that Chile would like to receive 20,000 tons of vegetable oil, 50,000 tons of wheat and 12,000 tons of cotton. He said that the latter was an exceedingly important item, because the Chilean textile mills were working at less than capacity because of the country's inability to import cotton. Cotton is one of their dollar imports. A sale of cotton under the agricultural excess program would not only help the local mills but would also lighten the burden on their dollar exchange.

The Minister said that several problems had been encountered as to the use that we would make of Chilean pesos generated through sales of agricultural excesses. The Government wants the pesos lent to it for use in constructing roads. The Ambassador is reported to want the pesos to be used for loans to private enterprise.

Mr. Hoover said that we had held preliminary conferences with other interested United States agencies and that we were prepared to negotiate with respect to the total amounts to be sold of products sought by the Minister, the rate of exchange to apply in those sales, the reconversion rate to apply to Chilean pesos, the uses to be made of Chilean pesos, and with respect to any conversations that should be held with alternative suppliers of these products.

The Minister said that as regards cotton some problem might be encountered with Peru and Egypt which were traditional suppliers.

The Minister said that in the field of financing his government was planning to attempt to achieve convertibility. He felt that if the Export-Import Bank could lend Chile $50 million and if the International Monetary Fund could establish a $25 million exchange guarantee fund, Chile could be successful in its attempt to achieve convertibility. The Minister said that he hoped the Department could help Chile in these purposes. Mr. Hoover said the Department would want to be helpful.

The Minister said that an alternative course would be for the United States to contract to buy 100,000 tons more of copper. Mr. Hoover said that he felt this would be impossible. Mr. Hoover then pointed out that Chile has a refinery that is worth $25 million. It might sell this asset if the political problems were not too great an obstacle. Mr. Hoover went on to explain that Chile has spent many millions of dollars in exploring for oil, achieving its production, constructing the refinery and other installations necessary for the oil industry. The real profit in the oil industry lies in the sale of production after you discover it. If Chile could find some politically acceptable means for selling its oil production in the southern field, it would recoup all of the investment in them and a profit as well. Thus, instead of waiting for slow recovery of its investment and profits over a period of many years, Chile would immediately have available very large sums of money for its road programs and other government projects.

The Minister said that the political obstacles to any such course would be well nigh insuperable.

Mr. Hoover pointed out that in the case of established production such as that in the southern fields this might not be true. The political obstacle to a sale of an oil concession lies in the argument that the asset sold might have been proven to be worth more than the price obtained. In the case of established production, the recoverable reserves of the structure sold can be computed with great accuracy. Thus, the sale is not of an asset whose value cannot be determined, but is of an asset whose extent and value can be determined with great precision. Chile instead of selling the contents of the field slowly and over a long period of years would be in the position of selling these same reserves in one operation and receiving the full price in one payment. Mr. Hoover pointed out that under these circumstances the price per barrel would be reduced on account of the long-term over which the purchaser would receive the benefits of his purchase.

The Minister was intensely interested, and said that when he returned to Chile he would investigate the possibility of making this kind of a sale.

Mr. Hoover said that if the Minister so wished the Department might be willing to send an expert to Chile who could look into the possibilities of effecting this type of sale.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of South American Affairs (Atwood) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Sparks)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 21, 1954.

Subject: Proposed Program of Economic Assistance to Chile

The following tentative program has been prepared as an alternative to granting a balance-of-payments loan to Chile for $50 million.

1) The sale under Public Law 480 of 9,000 tons of cottonseed oil and approximately 34,000 tons of wheat having a total market value of $5 million (ccc. value $8 million). This program has been approved and instructions have been sent to the American Embassy in Santiago to proceed with negotiations.

2) The Chilean drawing of $12.5 million from the International Monetary Fund. Chile previously requested a stand-by credit from the Monetary Fund of $25 million on the basis that this would be necessary in order for Chile to go forward with her proposed changes in exchange rates. The Monetary Fund has determined that it is not willing to grant the stand-by credit and has sent Fund representatives to Chile to discuss certain steps which Chile must take in order to be eligible for Fund assistance. It is believed that the Fund representatives will return with the facts which would enable the Fund to grant a $12.5 million drawing if and when Chile requests it.

3) Export-Import Bank assistance: (a) A loan of approximately $10 million for the purchase of cotton; (b) A loan or export guarantees totalling approximatley $10 million to cover capital equipment (road building, power, agricultural, and railroad) which Chile has budgeted and considers essential to import during 1955.

These Export-Import Bank transactions should be dependent on Chile's providing us with a satisfactory program for handling her backlog problem and a list of essential capital equipment that must be imported during 1955 and will be of direct assistance to Chile's economic development program.

4) Increase of Chile's lines of credit with U.S. banks: Chile has $36 million of gold on deposit and could without much trouble increase her lines of credit by $18 million with a gold pledge. This could probably be done on the basis of five years the same way that Brazil handled her problem.

Recommendation: I suggest that ARA and E, after consultation with Treasury and the Export-Import Bank, prepare a telegram to our Embassy in Santiago, outlining the above program and instructing the Embassy to discuss it with top Chilean officials. I feel that the conditions which are a prerequisite to Export-Import Bank action, plus the fact that Chile itself is taking part in this program as well as the International Monetary Fund, make it unnecessary to tie up our assistance to specific performance on the part of the Chilean Government.

COURSES OF ACTION ON CHILE

ANALYSIS

The Working Group concluded that the present situation in Chile was serious but that the country was not likely to fall under Communist control in the near future. The political scene is marked by weakness and ineptitude in the Executive and a high degree of Congressional irresponsibility, and

---

[1] A covering memorandum, transmitting this paper to the OCB, by OCB Executive Officer Elmer B. Staats, dated Dec. 17, 1954, is not printed. The paper was prepared on a priority basis by the OCB Working Group on NSC 5432/1.

For text of NSC 5432/1, a statement of policy titled "United States Objectives and Courses of Action With Respect to Latin America," dated Sept. 3, 1954, see p. 81.

the two branches are currently in conflict. The Communists, strongly entrenched in Chile since the days of the Popular Front in the '30's wield great influence among the students and in the labor movement, where efforts of the free trade union movement to displace them have not to date been successful. The armed forces, however, are believed relatively free from Communist influence.

Chile's economy is in a lamentable condition. The country is currently in the grip of galloping inflation: prices rose 71.85% between September 1953 and September 1954 and the Government's budget is and for years has been hopelessly unbalanced. The exchange rate system has operated to distort trade patterns, misdirect investment, subsidize favored groups and contribute to the depression of agriculture. Efforts at applying direct economic controls have been uncoordinated, ineffective and have distorted domestic productive patterns. Agricultural production has been falling off, forcing Chile, which was at one time an agricultural exporting country, to devote roughly 25% of its foreign exchange income to food imports. Industrial productivity is low and there have been a series of labor disputes and strikes, usually motivated by the need for higher wages to keep pace with spiralling prices, which lend themselves to exploitation by the Communists for political ends.

Finance Minister Jorge Prat recently initiated a program intended to stabilize the economy over a period of two to three years. The obstacles in Prat's way are enormous: the Government's political position is weak and he has to overcome the opposition of vested interests among capital, labor and the bureaucracy who are not convinced of the necessity of making short-term sacrifices for long-term gains. Despite these obstacles and the serious shortcomings of the plan itself, the Group believes that Prat's program offers a better chance of starting Chile on the road to recovery than any other program now in sight.

BASIC APPROACH

The consensus of the Group is that only the Chileans can bring about the reforms necessary to stabilize and strengthen their economy and that U.S. aid cannot be effective unless the Chileans enact and implement the required reform measures. But it also recognizes that a certain amount of United States support may be desirable concomitantly with a reform program. It is believed that the limited progress achieved by the Chileans to date justifies an initial step to show that we are ready to help Chile as long as she is moving in the right direction. The extension of U.S. support must be timed in such a way as to bring the Chileans to the realization that the primary responsibility for the improvement of conditions in Chile rests squarely with them but that the U.S. is sympathetic with their problems and will help when our help can be useful.

No need is seen at this time for a "crash" program; on the contrary, such a program would in all probability defeat the objective of inducing the Chileans to carry forward their own reform program. The economic assistance measures which follow are therefore designed to be contingent upon Chilean progress in putting their house in order and to be put into effect step by step as they demonstrate such progress. Additional measures which are recommended and which do not depend for their implementation upon economic improvement should be carried out in accordance with the capabilities of the responsible agencies.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Economic

1. Shipment of Agricultural Commodities

Every effort should be made to expedite action on the Chilean request for wheat, vegetable oil and cotton under P.L. 480.

2. Support for IMF Drawing

In the light of appraisal by the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems of Chile's financial program, the NAC should consider the appropriateness of instructing the U.S. Executive Director of the IMF[2] to support:

a. IMF pressure on Chile for further economic and financial reforms, and

b. An IMF drawing by Chile.

3. Export-Import Bank Loan

If the Chilean economic program shows promise of success, the Export-Import Bank should consider the appropriateness of further loans to Chile within the established lending policies of the Bank to help ameliorate the existing crisis.

4. IBRD Loan for Economic Development

If the Chilean economic program shows promise of success the NAC should consider on its economic merit the appropriateness of the development plan based on an FAO–IBRD study or any other proposals for development loans to Chile which may be put before the Executive Directors by the Bank Management.

Diplomatic Action

5. Diplomatic Support

The continuing efforts of our Ambassador and his staff at Santiago to impress on appropriate officials and key individuals the necessity for taking measures to check inflation and stabilize the economy, should be given every support.

[2] Frank A. Southard, Jr.

6. Creation of Anti-Inflation Advisory Committees

Recognizing that support from the widest possible segments of public opinion will be required if Prat's economic rectification program is to have any chance of success, it is recommended that the Working Group on NSC 5432/1 appraise the experience of the Austrian Government with anti-inflation advisory committees and consider the desirability of suggesting the use of similar committees in Chile. If the appraisal is favorable, Ambassador Beaulac should be provided with the necessary information so that he can decide whether it should be called to the attention of the appropriate Chilean authorities.

7. Potential Coal Emergency

If it is established that the Chilean coal supply situation is grave and that a strike by communist-dominated coal miners' unions is imminent and would have an immediately crippling effect on the Chilean economy, the U.S. should give consideration at once to an emergency shipment of coal to that country. There should, however, be discussions with appropriate U.S. trade unions before a decision is reached to make such shipments.

Labor

8. Additional Labor Staff

Labor Department and FOA believe that provisions need to be made for additional staff assistance in the labor field to handle increased programs resulting from FOA Technical Assistance and Exchange activities. The State Department agrees that additional labor staff should be made available if after the arrival of the Labor Attaché it becomes evident that it is needed.

9. Labor Institute

A labor institute should be established with labor sponsorship in order to provide training and information on free trade union leadership and union organization and on general labor problems for present and prospective labor leaders and others interested in labor. At first emphasis should be on short-term courses held in the major labor centers of the country. The interested agencies are collaborating in the preparation of a detailed program for this project. As soon as this program is prepared by the agencies, it should be submitted to the Ambassador for his views and suggestions.

10. Labor Leader Exchange Program

The labor leader exchange problem should be maintained.

Technical Cooperation

11. Technical Cooperation Program

The Technical Cooperation Program in Chile should be strengthened and serious consideration should be given to diversification and expansion of technical assistance activities, utilizing both U.S. technician and trainee techniques.

Certain recent Chilean requests merit attention. These include: (a) a request for a Hoover-type commission to study the governmental operations of Chile; (b) a request for a university contract in the field of general resources planning and management; and (c) a request for a U.S. advisor to assist the Chilean Council of University Presidents in the methodology of, and in planning activities for, increasing productivity, for improving the organization of economic activities and for promoting the rational utilization of national resources.

12. Need for Inter-Agency Agreement

The Working Group noted that the Department of State and FOA have not been able to agree upon the desirability of establishing positions for general labor officers and investment advisors, as well as upon other activities which do not in themselves affect the Chilean programs. Pending a decision on these matters, the FY 1955 Technical Cooperation Program in Latin America has not been implemented. It is recommended that these differences be resolved immediately.

Information and Cultural

13. Intensification of Information Program

There should be an intensification of the information program in Chile primarily in terms of content and following the guide lines of the short-term objectives now being established by USIA in consultation with the Embassy and the State Department. This intensification should provide maximum information support in Chile to one or two objectives supporting the U.S. on major issues and permitting a concentration of film, press, radio and Information Center activities over the next six months on groups whose opinions will be playing a key role in the present crisis.

14. Increased Support for Binational Centers

Binational Centers are regarded as a highly important means of reaching influential groups. Their ability to utilize Chileans to influence Chileans should be extended. The three centers now receiving regular support from USIA (Santiago, Valparaiso and Concepcion) should be provided with additional support necessary to permit the extension of their programs to larger audiences, particularly university and labor groups.

It is of special importance to support Centers in the provincial areas. Centers in Osorno, Maria Elena, and Antofagasta, which heretofore have received only sporadic or no assistance, should be provided with support adequate to reach key groups in these cities. Such support should include American personnel and funds for rent of adequate quarters if necessary. Also, it is suggested that other Centers in provincial areas be assisted similarly, if, in the opinion of the PAO, an extension of their activities would support U.S. objectives.

It is suggested that additional Smith–Mundt visiting lecturers be sent to Chile to lecture in the Binational Centers.

15. Comment on Chile in U.S. Newspapers

In view of the influence public opinion in the U.S. has on Chilean leaders, it is desirable to encourage the expression of such opinion supporting the U.S. position in American newspapers and magazines with subsequent publication of such articles in Chilean media.

16. Indigenous Source for Free Labor News

[3] In a memorandum to Under Secretary Hoover, dated Dec. 21, 1954, Deputy Assistant Secretary Sparks recommended that Mr. Hoover favor adoption of the proposed courses of action with respect to Chile at the OCB meeting scheduled for Dec. 22 (S/S–OCB files, lot 62 D 430, "Chile").

Memorandum by the Operations Coordinator (Bishop) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Sparks)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 23, 1954.

For your information, there is quoted below an excerpt from my preliminary notes on yesterday's OCB meeting which is of interest to your office:

"Courses of Action in Connection with Current Developments in Chile

"Mr. Hoover reported that Ambassador Beaulac would be coming to Washington early in January and that he would be invited to the OCB to discuss Chilean problems with the Board. He remarked that the paper before the OCB was a valuable one but that, because of the proposed visit of Ambassador Beaulac, the State Department requested that the paper be tabled with the OCB pending Ambassador Beaulac's discussion of these problems.

"Mr. Atwood gave a brief résumé of the situation in Chile. Mr. Stassen said that, while FOA would go along with State's request that this matter be tabled for a few weeks, FOA doubted that Prat would be able to carry through on his program and that strikes and trouble are to be expected. FOA sees a deficit in the balance of payments of about $90 million this year. If Chile were near the USSR and facing a situation as serious as this, Mr. Stassen said that the risk would be too great and would be unacceptable. However, because of the remote location of Chile, Mr. Stassen felt we probably would be able to solve this problem over a period of time with some difficulty. Mr. Hoover pointed out that many of the proposals in the staff paper before the OCB were long-range and that, therefore, it would be wise to wait until we could staff them properly within the respective departments and agencies and until we could discuss them with Ambassador Beaulac. The most important proposal, he pointed out, is that, if the President decides to take over the government without Congress, would the President be faced with a revolution and would he be able to carry on. Mr. Overby of Treasury injected that the planned program was not really the full or final answer to Chilean difficulties and that even if they do carry out this program they will be 'by no means out of the woods'. Whereas last year there had been a 75 percent increase in prices, the best that Prat hopes for this year is not more than a 30 percent increase in prices.

"Mr. Streibert, USIA, wondered if it would be possible to get full cooperation of the Government of Chile, somewhat similar to the arrangement we have with Spain, so that the United States would get full credit for whatever help we give Chile and so that we could work together with Chile in a public relations program. The difficulties in achieving such a relationship in Latin America were briefly pointed out by Mr. Hoover who added that there are plans going forward for certain discussions with CIA and that these discussions will be developed while Ambassador Beaulac is here.

"Mr. Staats raised the question of the possible coal crisis in Chile. Mr. Atwood pointed out that, after investigation, the Department of State had informed the Government of Chile that no government agency could handle shipments of coal to Chile and that they should handle their coal purchases through commercial channels. Mr. Stassen said that FOA does have a coal program and that, if it is agreed that it is a desirable thing to do, FOA could make coal shipments to Chile in a manner similar to the PL 480 shipments for surplus agricultural products. The local currency generated by the coal shipment is loaned to the local government and control kept in United States hands.

"Mr. Overby of Treasury indicated that Treasury has serious reservations and questions regarding item 6, 'Creation of Anti-Inflation Advisory Committees' but he did not wish to bring them up at this time because of the postponement of consideration of the whole paper.

"In response to Mr. Dulles' question whether the present policy is to build up the existing Chilean Government or not, Mr. Hoover replied in the affirmative and described briefly some of his discussions with Mr. Prat at Rio.

"'General Cutler asked whether the program which had been described by Mr. Atwood envisaged placing requirements on Chile. It was pointed out that, to the extent that such requirements were practicable, this was true. Mr. Stassen said that he would describe FOA's program as 'walk together' instead of the 'short tether' which was the term used by Mr. Atwood. Mr. Rockefeller said that, while he agreed with the program which had been described under the term 'short tether', he felt that the description 'walk together' was psychologically a better one and that, because catch phrases had a way of leaking out of meetings, we should avoid a catch phrase which might be embarrassing. It was the general consensus that 'walk together' was a more acceptable terminology than 'short tether' although they both had almost the same meaning."

Representatives of the United States and Colombia initiated negotiations for a bilateral military assistance agreement at Bogotá on January 21, 1952. Memorandum of Conversation, by Maurice M. Bernbaum of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 6, 1952.

Subject: Visit of the Colombian Minister of War to Discuss the Purchase of Military Equipment

Participants: Dr. Cipriano Restrepo-Jaramillo, Ambassador of Colombia
Dr. Misael Pastrana, Minister Counselor, Embassy of Colombia
Mr. Edward G. Miller, Jr., Assistant Secretary
Mr. Maurice M. Bernbaum, OSA

The Ambassador stated that he had just been advised of the probable visit to Washington some time next week of the Minister of War, Dr. José Maria Bernal, accompanied by representatives of the Colombian Army, Navy and Air Force and officers of the U.S. Armed Forces Missions. Purpose of the visit was to discuss with officers of the State and Defense Departments the urgent requirements of the Colombian Government for military equipment. Such equipment was required in order to prepare the Colombian armed forces for their responsibilities in hemispheric defense as well as the maintenance of public order. He expressed the concern of his Government over the mounting wave of disorder in Colombia, particularly in connection with growing guerrilla activities, and pointed out the likelihood that such disorder was not only playing into the hands of the Communists but was also most likely stimulated by them. He mentioned in this regard that Communism had always done best in an atmosphere of public disorder and guerrilla activities. The Ambassador then went on to say that it was hoped that the equipment required could be furnished his Government under the recent Military Agreement, but that Colombia would be prepared to purchase the equipment if that were not feasible.

In discussing the visit, the Ambassador stated that the opinion was widely held in Colombia that the United States Government had not treated Colombia as well as she deserved, particularly in view of her contribution to the United Nations campaign in Korea. He hastily added that neither he nor high Government officials held this opinion but that it was of importance to us to know that such an opinion was widely held in Colombia even if outside Government circles. He then went on to say that from his own experience he could certify that Colombia's requirements had received not only careful but even deferential consideration, the only possible exceptions involving military equipment. As an example he mentioned that Peru had received three destroyers and a number of submarines while Colombia had not received any consideration at all. Colombia had been able to purchase only a frigate.

Mr. Miller expressed his thanks for the Ambassador's appreciation of the good treatment being received by his Government from the United States, but pointed out that the Colombian Government had actually been getting equal consideration with Peru and other Latin American countries in the recent distribution of vessels to Latin American countries. He stated that invitations had been sent to all Latin American countries concurrently but that failure of the Colombian Government to respond in time had resulted in the earmarking of the available vessels to the other countries. Further sales and transfers were subsequently prohibited by a requirement that the transport or sale of any vessel ranging upward in size from destroyers would require Congressional approval in each case. As regards submarines, he stated that the Peruvian Government had been making direct contracts with the Electric Boat Company for various submarines. The United States Government was not involved in these contracts. As regards other equipment, Mr. Miller emphasized the fact that there just was not enough equipment available at this time to go around. He pointed out that even France was worried about inadequate delivery of U.S. equipment. In these circumstances the U.S. Government was just not in a position to furnish Colombia, other Latin American countries and allies outside the Western Hemisphere all of the equipment required by them. He did assure the Ambassador, however, that within limitations imposed by shortages the Colombian Government would get the most favorable consideration possible. Mr. Miller expressed his pleasure over the prospective visit of the Minister of War and stated that he would receive a most cordial welcome.

Note: The subject of Colombia's requirements for military equipment had been raised previously with Ambassador Waynick by Acting President Roberto Urdaneta. He then mentioned the equipment necessary for 13 infantry battalions, aviation spare parts and planes. The Ambassador had then assured Acting President Urdaneta that all possible consideration was being given Colombia's military requirements.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 6, 1952.

Subject: Request for cooperation of the Department of Defense and of the Treasury in negotiations with the Colombian Ambassador for reimbursement of the logistical support furnished Colombian Armed Forces in Korea

Discussion:

The Department has been informed by the Colombian Ambassador that his Government will not be able to reimburse the United States for the logistic and other support furnished the Colombian battalion and frigate which have been serving with the United Nations Forces in Korea since June 16 and May 9, 1951, respectively. He intimated that our insistence upon reimbursement would force the withdrawal from Korea of these units for lack of resources with which to maintain them, but impliedly left the door open for negotiation as to amount.

The interested areas of the Department agree that the withdrawal of the Colombian contingent might have such a damaging effect upon the concept of collective security through the United Nations as to justify the acceptance of less than full payment. Oral assurances of our eventual willingness to accept less than full payment had, as a matter of fact, been made to the Colombian Ambassador during the latter part of 1950 by Generals Ridgway and Bolte.

Negotiation to arrive at a settlement on such terms is authorized by the directive dated September 1, 1950[2] of the Secretary of Defense to the Armed Services approved by the President, which states, in part, that "To the extent that the foreign Government cannot make prompt reimbursement in U.S. dollars, the U.S. Government and foreign Government will negotiate the terms of settlement". We believe that the directive constitutes sufficient authority for the immediate initiation of negotiations designed to insure continued Colombian cooperation in Korea on the best possible terms consistent with that country's ability to pay. The Department of Defense has agreed that less than full payment may be acceptable in cases involving our general foreign policy, but proposed in a letter dated March 4, 1952[3] that such cases be referred to the National Security Council for decision.

The Department's response of May 29, 1952,[3] to the above letter stated that the National Security Council was not regarded as the appropriate mechanism for the consideration of such financial questions and invited proposals for alternative inter-agency arrangements. However, I believe that negotiations with Colombia should not await resolution of this procedural problem, and that we should seek to obtain the concurrence and cooperation of the Departments of Defense and of the Treasury in the prompt initiation of negotiations with the Colombian Ambassador.

Draft Letter From the Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Lovett)[5]

CONFIDENTIAL

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The Department of State is in receipt of a note dated March 31, 1952,[6] from the Colombian Embassy regarding the problem of reimbursement for the logistical and other support furnished the Colombian ground and naval units in Korea. The note pointedly stresses the importance of Colombia's contribution to the United Nations Forces as an example for other countries, particularly Latin American; refers to its initial preoccupation over the cost of maintaining the two units; emphasizes the increasing concern of the Colombian Government over the unanticipated scope and duration of the operation; and concludes that except for its support in men, as well as in supplies and equipment belonging to it that the Colombian troops are using in Korea, it is able to bear the cost only of the pay and benefits of personnel assigned to that theater and not of other expenses which such collaboration involves.

In discussing the matter on May 14, 1952,[7] with Mr. Edward G. Miller, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, the Colombian Ambassador reaffirmed his Government's inability to reimburse the United States for the logistical and other support furnished the Colombian units in Korea. While not stated in so many words, he conveyed the impression that United States insistence on full reimbursement would lead to the eventual withdrawal from Korea of the Colombian units for lack of resources with which to maintain them.

[5] This is an unsigned draft by Mr. Bernbaum. No copy of the original, signed by Under Secretary Bruce and sent under date of June 25, 1952 (bearing file number 795B.5/3–3152) was found in Department of State files. The original as received by the Department of Defense is in JCS files, CD 092 (Korea).

[6] Reference to Colombian Embassy note no. 380, not printed (795B.5/3–3152).

[7] A memorandum of the referenced conversation, dated May 14, by Mr. Bernbaum, is contained in Miller files, lot 53 D 26, "Colombia."

However, he impliedly left the door open for further consideration regarding the extent to which his Government might find it possible to meet the costs of the participation of the Colombian ground and naval units in Korea.

In these circumstances it is not realistic to expect that the United States will be able, either now or in the foreseeable future, to obtain full dollar reimbursement from Colombia. Moreover, if the United States allows the matter to rest, Colombia may assume that the continued, and perhaps the past, participation of the Colombian units in Korea will not involve any payment for logistical support. A prompt negotiation with Colombia to arrive at terms for past and future logistical support provided by the U.S. is, therefore, indicated. The United States should be prepared in these negotiations to consider a settlement that provides for less than full reimbursement, or reimbursement other than in dollars, or a combination of the two, but should also seek to obtain the best possible terms of settlement that are commensurate with Colombia's financial position.

While the Colombian note has, at least by implication, associated the continued participation of the Colombian units with concessions by the United States on terms of settlement that may go as far as a complete waiver, the Ambassador's remarks provide a basis for believing that some formula of settlement, short of complete waiver, will be acceptable to Colombia and consequently insure continued Colombian participation in Korea.

The Department believes that continued participation of Colombia in Korea is in the national interest of the U.S. If this proves not to be possible without a complete waiver, the matter will have to be given further consideration within the Executive Branch.

In its preparation for and conduct of the negotiations, the Department of State will, of course, welcome the cooperation and assistance of the Department of Defense. I would appreciate the designation of one or more persons to represent your Department in this regard.

Since further delay in resolving the reimbursement question with the Colombian Government would be undesirable, it is hoped to start the negotiations shortly. It would be useful for the Department of State to have data to support the United States claims for reimbursement well in advance of the initiation of the negotiations.

I am sending a similar letter to Secretary Snyder with a request for the cooperation and assistance of his Department in this matter.[8]

Sincerely yours,

[8] In a letter dated July 18, 1952, the Secretary of Defense informed Secretary Acheson that two representatives from the Office of the Secretary of Defense (Lt. Col. Craig C. Davis and Robert E. O'Hara) had been designated to work with representatives of the Department of State to prepare for eventual negotiations with Colombia (795B.5/7–1852).

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 11, 1952.

Subject: Colombian Participation in Korean Effort

Participants: Señor Dr. Don Cipriano Restrepo-Jaramillo, Colombian Ambassador
Mr. Miller
Mr. Bennett

Mr. Miller, accompanied by Mr. Bennett, called on the Colombian Ambassador this afternoon for a further discussion of Colombian participation in the Korean effort and problems involving Colombian reimbursement for the expenses of Colombian troops in Korea. The purpose of the conversation was to explore further the Ambassador's remarks to Mr. Miller on June 6[1] regarding the possible withdrawal from Korea of the Colombian battalion.

Mr. Miller informed Ambassador Restrepo that the Department was giving further consideration to the reimbursement problem. He said that, as had been indicated in previous conversations, we were fully aware of the severe financial burden which participation in the Korean effort involves for Colombia. We realized the desirability of early agreement with Colombia on the terms of payment and the Department of State was prepared to take as liberal a position as possible on the reimbursement question, considering both Colombia's capacity for payment and the important contribution Colombia was making in Korea. While there are definite difficulties in the matter since settlements arranged with other countries, including those with countries receiving no U.S. financial aid, have for the most part called for 100 per cent reimbursement, the Department is prepared to attempt to persuade the Treasury and Defense Departments toward a realistic settlement with Colombia. Mr. Miller mentioned that there are now on his desk letters in the promises for transmittal by the Secretary of State to the Secretaries of Treasury and Defense.

Mr. Miller said, however, that the problem of payment is inseparably linked with the plans of Colombia with respect to troops in Korea. He said that, while no one questions the right of Colombia to withdraw her troops if she considers it necessary and it would be her decision alone, such action would have most serious effects. Quite aside from the loss of Colombia's valuable military contribution, it would be the first "break in the line" and as such would have very serious consequences on the entire UN effort. The Assistant Secretary considered it necessary therefore, before taking up the problem with other government departments, to inquire further regarding Colombia's intention. If Colombia were planning an imminent withdrawal, then the Department of State would be in a very poor position in urging on other government departments a generous reimbursement formula.

Ambassador Restrepo replied to this remark by recounting the conversation which he had had with Acting President Urdaneta since his discussion on the matter with Mr. Miller the other day. He said that he had informed the President of Mr. Miller's comments on the possible Colombian withdrawal and had transmitted this Government's views as to the seriousness of such a step. He said that he had now been authorized by President Urdaneta to assure the U.S. government that Colombia has no intention of withdrawing her troops from Korea. He said that the President had asked him to state that, notwithstanding the financial burden involved and the great need for the troops, especially the officers, at home in view of current disturbed conditions there, Colombia was determined to fulfill faithfully its undertaking in Korea. He said that the Colombian government would continue in Korea by the side of the U.S. as an act of friendship and an act of faith. The Ambassador was firm and categoric in these statements. In that connection, Ambassador Restrepo expressed very pessimistic views about the situation in Korea and said that he could see no end to the problem.

During the conversation the Ambassador mentioned the scheduled arrival tomorrow of the Minister of War of Colombia for an unofficial visit of two or three weeks connected with the procurement of arms and equipment. He emphasized that Colombia's most pressing problem today is that of internal order and that the armed forces must be strengthened. He said that the plans to be presented by the Minister of War had been drawn by the Colombian armed forces with the advice and collaboration of the U.S. Military Mission. He expressed the hope that the Minister would be able to proceed with the plans while here. The Ambassador reverted to the assertions made by him in the June 6 conversation concerning opinion in Colombia that the U.S. Government had not treated Colombia as well as she deserved. As in the earlier conversation he disassociated the Colombian government from this alleged opinion.

Subject: Outstanding Military Problems with Colombia

Participants: Sr. don Cipriano Restrepo-Jaramillo, Colombian Ambassador
Sr. don José María Bernal, Colombian Minister of War

ARA—Mr. Edward G. Miller, Jr., Assistant Secretary for ARA

The above officers of the Department were invited for luncheon at the Colombian Embassy to discuss, among other things, the acquisition of military equipment by the Colombian Armed Forces, the manner in which the recently signed Bilateral Military Pact is to be implemented, and reimbursement for the logistical support furnished Colombian Amed Forces in the Korean theater.

The Ambassador stated that conversations already held by Minister of War Bernal at the Pentagon had been most satisfactory. As a result of these conversations and with the assistance of appropriate officers of the Pentagon, the Colombian Embassy had prepared a request list of military equipment valued at approximately $3 million which was to be presented to the Department the same afternoon. This list represented a boiled down version of a previous list from which, as a result of the conversations at the Pentagon, non-available items had been deleted.[1]

The Ambassador stated that the Pentagon was extremely anxious to have the Department's approval on the Colombian purchase order by Tuesday in order that the matter be taken up by the Allocations Board meeting the following day. He conveyed the impression that assurances had already been given by the Pentagon that the matériel requested would be furnished subject to approval by the State Department. The Ambassador was most emphatic regarding such assurances and requested the Department's cooperation in getting the list to the Pentagon before the deadline.

The Ambassador then inquired regarding the military equipment to be made available to Colombia under the recently signed Bilateral Military Pact. He wanted to know the kind of equipment which was to be furnished in general as well as the exact composition of the initial shipment to be made in the near future. Mr. Miller stated that available information would be furnished him as soon as possible.

The Ambassador then stated that he and the Minister of War had taken advantage of their recent visits to the Pentagon to discuss the question of logistical support for the Colombian Armed Forces units now serving in Korea. He expressed himself as completely satisfied with the understanding attitude displayed by the unnamed high-ranking officers in the Pentagon who stated that they would give the most sympathetic consideration to Colombia's problem.

Both the Colombian Ambassador and Dr. Bernal repeatedly emphasized throughout the luncheon the urgent character of Colombia's requirements for the requested military equipment. Dr. Bernal stated that the question of internal security was of paramount importance to the Colombian Government which transcended in significance its operations in Korea and its preparations to collaborate in hemispheric defense. He described the anarchy now prevalent in many sections of Colombia as a result of guerrilla activities and stated that until this problem was solved the Colombian Government could give no assurances that it would be in a position to collaborate in hemispheric defense. He repeatedly emphasized, as did the Ambassador, that the guerrillas had no real political significance and were, as a matter of fact, being stirred up in their own activities by the small but forceful Communist minority which was interested only in the fomentation of disorder. The situation was such that anybody venturing into the territory now covered by the guerrillas would do so at the risk of his life. All efforts made by the Government to solve this situation through conciliation had thus far been unavailing. As a result, only military force could be counted upon to do the job. It was for this reason that Dr. Bernal was now visiting the US in the hope that he would, by his presence and through the first-hand knowledge imparted, be successful in expediting the purchase and sale of the necessary military equipment.

Dr. Bernal stated in response to queries from Messrs. Miller and Bernbaum that the guerrillas were not well equipped. Available evidence indicated that they were in possession of only rifles, most of them of a poor quality, hunting pieces and machetes. Only in the Eastern part of the country close to the Venezuelan border had there been found any machine guns. Guerrillas were apparently being supplied from Venezuela and Panama. They apparently enjoyed the cooperation in Venezuela of left-wing sympathizers among whom he named Jóvito Villalba, leader of the URD. He remarked that the Venezuelan Government had only recently suggested that it would take measures necessary to stop the traffic of arms from Venezuela into Colombia in return for Colombian cooperation in preventing similar traffic from the Colombian Guajira Peninsula into Venezuela.

Subject: Protestant Difficulties in Colombia

Participants: Sr. don Cipriano Restrepo-Jaramillo, Colombian Ambassador
Sr. don José María Bernal, Colombian Minister of War
UNA—Mr. John Hickerson, Assistant Secretary
ARA—Mr. Edward G. Miller, Jr., Assistant Secretary
OSA—Mr. W. Tapley Bennett, Deputy Director
OSA—Mr. Maurice M. Bernbaum, Officer in Charge, NWC

The difficulties being experienced by Protestant Missionaries in Colombia were discussed at a luncheon held today at the Colombian Embassy.

The subject was raised by Dr. Bernal in connection with his description of current guerrilla activities (see memorandum of conversation of same date[1]). He stated that the difficulties now being experienced by the Protestants were to a very considerable extent related to civil unrest. As in the case of the guerrillas who were being incited by the Communists for the purpose of fomenting disorder, the Communists were taking advantage of antagonism between the Catholics and Protestants for the same purpose. Dr. Bernal went so far as to state that most of the atrocities being committed against the Protestants were Communist-inspired. He immediately back tracked, however, when queried as to whether the Priests who had reportedly led the mob action against the Baptist Church in Bogota of last December were Communists. He admitted that these as well as many other Priests in Colombia were fanatically opposed to the Protestants and often went out of their way to oppose them. He emphasized, however, that such activities were in no way a reflection of either church or government policy. When asked regarding the prospects of a solution to the Protestant problem, Dr. Bernal responded that the prospects were indeed good. He felt, however, that since the difficulties being experienced by them were so closely related to civil strife the solution to their difficulties would be dependent upon the ability of the Government to suppress guerrilla activities. When this objective was achieved, he stated that the Protestants would have nothing to fear.

The foregoing was to a large extent contradicted, however, by the Ambassador, who entered the conversation with the statement that the Protestant Missionaries could not legitimately expect to operate unmolested in a predominately Catholic country. He stated that regardless of the attitude of the Government, it would be impossible for anybody to insure immunity for Protestant Missionary activities in out-of-the-way parts of the country. He then drew a parallel with the southern part of the United States, particularly the bombings of Catholic Churches which had taken place during the last year in the state of Florida. He then inquired regarding the treatment to be expected by Catholic Missionaries in small, predominately Protestant communities.

Mr. Miller remarked at this point that the treatment accorded Catholic Missionaries in the U.S. could hardly be compared with that being experienced by Protestant Missionaries in Colombia. He remarked that of all Churches, the Catholic was one which had the greatest stake in the concept of the freedom of religion in view of its extensive missionary interests all over the world. He pointed out that Catholic Missionary activities were most intensive in the Far East and Near East amongst the predominately Moslem and Hindu populations. He then went on to say that the Department held no brief for any particular missionary activity and had, as a matter of fact, been instrumental in securing the admission into Guatemala of a representative of the Catholic Maryknoll Order.

Mr. Miller went on to say that the Protestant Missionary problem in Colombia was a matter of increasing concern to the Department, which had been experiencing considerable pressure from Members of Congress as well as private individuals from all parts of the country. While realizing the problems being faced by the Colombian Government, he expressed the hope that something could be done to eliminate this most unfortunate irritant in the relations between the two countries.

Obviously uncomfortable, the Colombian Ambassador reaffirmed the impracticability of expecting the Protestants to be immune from opposition, particularly in a Catholic country undergoing civil strife. He added, in response to Mr. Miller's statement regarding Catholic Missionary activities, that he did not believe there were any Colombian Catholic Missionaries in the United States requiring protection. He then laughingly remarked that he was probably in receipt of as many letters of complaint as was the Department. He attributed this to the recent propaganda campaign of the Presbyterian Life which was making a special point of stimulating protests.

Although the conversation terminated amicably, it had been made clear to the Colombian Ambassador and to the Minister of War that the Protestant Missionary problem was a most important factor in Departmental thinking regarding US relations with Colombia.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 23, 1952.

The Colombian Minister of War is in Washington and has indicated that he does not intend to leave until he gets a definitive answer to his request for equipment needed to round out the equipment needed by thirteen infantry battalions. Attached is a note dated June 19, 1952[2] from the Colombian Embassy which lists the equipment desired. Also attached is Ambassador Waynick's despatch of June 13[3] recommending that "friendly and helpful consideration be given to the current request for small arms and other equipment for the infantry battalions." The Colombian Minister of War and his staff have already had some informal conversations with our Department of Defense, and it is our understanding that the list which we have received from the Colombian Embassy was approved by our people as suitable equipment for them to obtain although we are informed that no commitment was made by the Pentagon on availability.

OSA and I would like to turn the Colombians down on their request for all of this equipment, since it is pretty obvious that the Colombian Government wants this to "maintain internal order" with all that this implies in the present state of Colombian affairs. Unfortunately, however, if we were to do this we would risk antagonizing the Colombian Government to the point where they might resurrect their proposal to withdraw their battalion in Korea on the ground that the battalion and its equipment are needed at home in view of their inability to obtain equipment from the United States. We would like at least to minimize this risk to the extent that it is possible for us to do so.

Probably the best solution would be to offer the Colombians as attractive a package as possible on their overall military requirements while attempting to reduce as far as possible equipment of anti-personnel character which is likely to be used primarily against the Colombian opposition. The package which we have tentatively in mind is the following:

(1) The best official assurances we can give the Colombians on the question of reimbursement. This question has been hanging fire as it were for many months and it would be helpful from a number of standpoints to get it resolved favorably during the visit of the Minister of War.

[3] Reference is to despatch 1110, from Bogotá, not printed (721.5 MSP/6–1352).

(2) Informal but firm assurances that Colombia's allocation under the FY 1953 MSA will be substantially increased. In this connection, I think that Colombia's participation in Korea entitles them to a larger share, and the equipment which they would receive under the grant program would be committed to a definite task in hemisphere defense. Presumably a substantial part of this would not be equipment designed for maintenance of internal order.

(3) Approval on this request of some useful equipment which they desire but scaling down all equipment which is primarily anti-personnel in nature to a minimum, say enough for approximately one battalion. In that connection, we might find a way to imply to the Colombians that, while we are prepared to assist Colombia strengthen itself on the defense of the hemisphere, it is not the policy of our Government to furnish armaments to be used against an opposing Colombian political party.

(4) Approval of the transfer to Colombia of certain training aircraft and naval equipment which they have requested but which have not for various reasons been immediately available.

Before proceeding with any recommendation to Defense on the details of this package, I believe that you should discuss the problem with General Bolte informally to get his agreement to this line of approach.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 25, 1952.

Participants: [Lt.] General Charles L. Bolte, [Maj.] General R. L. Walsh, [Brig.] General George C. Stewart;
Mr. Edward G. Miller, Jr.,
Mr. Thomas C. Mann

The problems arising out of the request of the Colombian Government for equipment for thirteen Colombian battalions were discussed.

Mr. Miller and Mr. Mann discussed the general political situation in Colombia. They said that according to Colombian representatives, the arms were to be used for the purpose of maintaining internal order and explained the problems which this presented, both for the Department of Defense and the Department of State. They also explained that the arms going to Colombia under the hemisphere defense program were in an entirely different category, both because of the purpose for which the arms were being supplied and because the anti-aircraft equipment given to Colombia was not so easily adaptable to use against Colombians.

It was the consensus of the meeting that the best procedure would be for the Defense Department to accept whatever funds the Colombi-ans wished to deposit for the equipment described in the lists furnished to us by the Colombians and to delay delivery of those items of an anti-personnel character until the situation should become better clarified in Colombia. At the same time equipment such as trucks, radios, and things of a similar character would be made available without delay additional to that imposed by circumstances. Representatives of the State Department and the Pentagon would consult with each other concerning the different categories of equipment and the timing of their delivery.

It was also the consensus of the meeting that it is important for the Defense and State Departments to present a united front on this issue to the Colombians and to explain to them delays by referring to problems of priorities and other technical considerations rather than our fears that the equipment would be mis-used.

Mr. Miller handed to General Bolte a copy of the State Department's letter[1] to the Defense Department concerning the problem of reimbursement for equipment furnished the Colombian battalion in Korea. General Bolte expressed informally his sympathy with the approach suggested in that lettter.

The Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board (Nyrop) to the Acting Director of the Office of Transport and Communication Policy (Klemmer)

WASHINGTON, July 10, 1952.

DEAR MR. KLEMMER: During a conversation on June 6, 1952[1] with members of the staff of the Department of State, the Colombian Ambassador proposed that in view of the inability of the United States and Colombia to reach an accord on a new bilateral air transport agreement, an informal arrangement be effected for a period of about one year to test Avianca's ability to compete successfully with U.S.-carrier competition. Upon inquiry, the Ambassador stated that his Government would reserve the right to restrict the frequencies operated by U.S. carriers.

It is not clear whether the Ambassador contemplated an exchange of notes or a verbal arrangement, but in either case the proposal is wholly unacceptable to the Board. To agree to a restriction on frequencies, even for a so-called test period, or to permit a U.S. carrier to accept an operating permit containing such restrictions would be tantamount to conceding the validity of Colombia's arguments in behalf of predetermination of capacity, and would be so construed by the Colombians. Our position in any future agreement negotiations would be extremely difficult to maintain.

Another objection to the Colombian proposal is that it is quite unlikely that Colombia would be willing to authorize Braniff to serve Bogota, even on a temporary basis, without expecting some "reciprocal" benefit for Avianca. Since the Braniff route would be a new and additional route from the United States to Colombia, it is possible (and even probable) that Colombia would ask for an additional route for Avianca under the Kellogg–Olaya Pact.[2]

The United States has made extraordinary efforts during the past five years to meet the Colombian viewpoint on various proposals for a new bilateral air transport agreement to replace the out-moded Kellogg–Olaya Pact of 1929. Despite the fact that the concessions offered exceed those offered any other foreign government to date, we have been unable to satisfy Colombia's desire for protection of its national carrier. The present proposal for an informal arrangement clearly reveals that the Colombian position has not changed, and it appears extremely unlikely that we will be able to conclude a satisfactory air agreement with the Colombians so long as they can rely on the broad grant of rights established in the Kellogg–Olaya Pact. The Board, therefore, recommends that appropriate steps be taken to denounce the Kellogg–Olaya Pact.

It is hoped that this drastic measure will impress upon the Colombians the seriousness with which we view their intransigence and that, within the ninety-day period between notice of denunciation and termination of the agreement, Colombia will offer acceptable proposals for a new air transport agreement.

Sincerely yours, DONALD W. NYROP

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 28, 1952.

Subject: Negotiations for a Bilateral Aviation Agreement with Colombia

Participants: Sr. Don Cipriano Restrepo-Jaramillo—Colombian Ambassador
Sr. Don Misael Pastrana—Minister-Counselor, Colombian Embassy
The Honorable Josh Lee—Member of the CAB
Mr. Hill—AV
Miss Hillyer—AV
Mr. Bennett—OSA
Mr. Bernbaum—OSA
Mr. Nolan—AR
Mr. Gerberich—OSA

The meeting was held for the purpose of presenting to the Colombian Ambassador a memorandum [2] prepared by the CAB in accordance with the request of the Colombian Foreign Minister to describe the procedures followed by the CAB in making subsidy payments to US airlines. The request was made by the Foreign Minister during a visit to his office on July 16, 1952 by Mr. Birgfeld, Counselor of Embassy at Bogotá, and Mr. Bernbaum of ARA (Embassy, Bogotá tel. No. 44, July 16, 1952 [3]). It was motivated by the realization of the Foreign Minister that the Department and CAB would not agree to an agreement based on frequency or capacity restrictions; the probable fear that failure to reach an agreement would result in US denunciation of the Kellogg–Olaya Pact under which Avianca enjoys favorable operating privileges in the US; and the corresponding desire to have at hand sufficient evidence regarding the painless character of free competition to mollify the Colombian Congress in the event that a non-restrictive agreement were presented to it for approval.

The memorandum also included a summary of the various arguments previously adduced by the CAB to demonstrate that the Colombian Aviation line, Avianca, need not fear the results of free competition with American airlines.

Although previously informed by both the Foreign Minister and a Departmental officer of the purpose of the memorandum, the Ambassador's reaction to it was characteristically critical as representing only a rehash of information already reported to his Government. Making a very good presentation of the Colombian case, he urged that the CAB reconsider his proposal for the informal application of the terms of the agreement for a trial period of one year. He was not, however, willing to consider Mr. Hill's suggestion that the trial period be based on complete freedom for Braniff (the only US airline thus far certificated to serve Bogotá) to operate without any frequency or capacity restrictions.

The ensuing discussion again demonstrated the determination of the US to insist upon full facilities for free competition and that of the Colombian Government to press for restrictions on frequency and capacity. In summing up the problem, the Colombian Ambassador emphasized the probability of rejection by the Colombian Congress of any agreement considered to jeopardize the welfare of Avianca. While expressing his readiness to recommend acceptance of the United States position as involving over-all advantages to Colombia, he pleaded for sufficient concessions by the CAB to insure acceptance by the Colombian Congress. He then requested to be informed of the final United States position sometime before his departure for Bogotá at the end of September.

Senator Lee expressed his appreciation of the Ambassador's viewpoint and stated that, although he would be glad to bring the matter again to the attention of the CAB, he did not personally see any reason for believing that the previously unalterable decision of the five CAB board members not to permit frequency and capacity restrictions would be changed.[4] [4] On Sept. 12, 1952, Ambassador Restrepo-Jaramillo was informed at the Department of State that the CAB refused to consider any arrangement involving restrictions on frequency and capacity (memorandum of conversation, by Mr. Bernbaum, Sept. 12, 1952, 611.2194/9–1252).

STATE–DEFENSE–TREASURY POSITION PAPER ON COLOMBIAN REIMBURSEMENT FOR LOGISTICAL SUPPORT

Problem:

What should be the position of the U.S. negotiators in the forthcoming negotiations[2] with Colombia for reimbursement for the logistical support furnished Colombian forces in Korea?

Background:

In negotiating with governments whose forces have been furnished logistical support, the United States has followed the uniform practice of requesting full reimbursement in U.S. dollars on a current basis. These terms are embodied in the standard draft agreement which is presented when negotiations are initiated. Such agreements have already been signed by four countries—the Netherlands, the Union of South Africa, Norway, and Sweden. In addition, informal arrangements have been made with Canada on the same basis. Negotiations are pending with twelve other countries.

Colombian forces, consisting of a frigate and an infantry battalion, have been participating in the UN action in Korea since May and June 1951, respectively. It is estimated that the U.S. Government has furnished logistical support amounting to roughly $8 million through July 1952. The Government of Colombia, in its note of November 14, 1950,[3] "recognizes that there will be an obligation to reimburse the United States Government for the training, logistical support . . . the details to be arranged later between the Government of Colombia and the Government of the U.S." Subsequently, in a note dated March 31, 1952,[4] the Colombian Ambassador stated, "after very careful examination of the problem and the actual potentialities of the country from an economic and fiscal point of view, my Government considers that . . . it is able to bear the cost only of the pay and benefits of personnel assigned to that theater, and not the other expenses which such collaboration involves".

In reply to the Colombian Ambassador, the U.S. assured him that we "fully appreciated the difficulties being faced by Colombia in the maintenance of units now serving in Korea" and that we were ready to give "most sympathetic consideration to Colombian problems arising from the undertakings of the Colombian Government with respect to the reimbursement of the United States . . . ." In a subsequent conversation, the Ambassador implied that his Government would be forced to withdraw its forces in Korea in the absence of assistance from the United States. He then referred to verbal assurances given his Government before its ground and naval units were sent to Korea that payment might be deferred to the future on the basis of a settlement understood to involve only a nominal sum. Assistant Secretary of State Edward G. Miller recalls having been present at a meeting in which such assurances were give the former Colombian Ambassador by Generals Ridgway and Bolte.

[2] On Aug. 19, 1952, at a meeting which took place at the Department of State, representatives of the Departments of State, Defense, and Treasury tentatively agreed that formal negotiations looking toward a settlement of the reimbursement question should be initiated with the Colombian Government (memorandum for the files, by Mr. Mackay, dated Aug. 19, 1952, 721.5 MSP/8–1952).

[3] Reference is to Colombian Embassy note no. 2539, not printed (795B.5/11–450).

The Ambassador inquired in a later conversation with Assistant Secretary Miller regarding our reaction to the temporary withdrawal of the battalion now serving in Korea to assist in restoration of internal order in Colombia. Following the informal but nevertheless definite adverse reaction of Mr. Miller, he later stated that his Government had given up any idea of withdrawing the battalion and that it would be kept in Korea as an act of friendship and faith. This assurance was at least impliedly qualified on that occasion, as previously, by emphasis on Colombia's limited resources as a factor in its ability to carry on in Korea without relief from the obligation of reimbursing the United States for logistical support.

Discussion:

The conflicting character of the Colombian Ambassador's statements leaves open to question the willingness of the Colombian Government to carry on in Korea for any prolonged period of time without a United States commitment to waive all, or at least a substantial part, of the cost of the logistical support furnished.

That Government's ability to pay, as distinct from its readiness to do so, is indicated by a sound budget and favorable balance of payments position. Budget surpluses were achieved in 1950 and 1951 and there are strong indications that the record budget of 1952 will be in approximate balance. Colombia's gold and foreign exchange position has improved remarkably in 1951 with holdings increasing by almost $25 million, and it is expected that there will be an increase in reserves of the same magnitude in 1952.

Assuming, therefore, that Colombia's stake in the Korean operation is so great as to justify the budgetary outlays, there would appear to be no economic justification for negotiating an agreement providing for less than full reimbursement. In actual fact, however, first priority is being given an extensive program of economic development which was drawn up in consultation with the IBRD. Parts of the program, including the rehabilitation and improvement of road, rail and air transportation has already been started. It involves extensive loans from abroad as well large internal expenditures. To the Colombian Government, this program and the military repression of the growing guerrilla movement in Colombia are probably of considerably greater importance to the national welfare than is the United Nations operation in far-off Korea. The Colombian Government probably feels, that, in any case, the United Nations operation will be carried on regardless of the presence of Colombian troops. Given these circumstances and regardless of the good will involved, it is not improbable that Colombia would withdraw from Korea in the absence of relief from the United States. It is generally agreed that such a development would not be in the national interest of the United States, as indicated by the Department of State in its letter of June 25, 1952, to the Departments of Defense and of the Treasury.[5]

Some additional factors must be taken into consideration in meeting this problem.

(1) The Colombians are already on record in their note of March 31, 1952 as being unwilling to pay for logistical support. Continued delay in meeting the issue might, therefore, create the undesirable impression that the U.S. has, in effect, acceded to its request. The Colombian Government might not, accordingly, feel either morally or actually obligated to the United States for the support furnished since, if not before, March 31, 1952.

(2) It will be difficult to deal with a Colombian reference to assurances by high ranking United States Government officials that the eventual bill for reimbursement will be settled at a nominal rate.

(3) Any final settlement at the present time involving less than full payment might reduce our bargaining power in negotiations with the remaining twelve and conceivably could jeopardize the full-reimbursement agreements already reached with five countries.

(4) Almost four months have elapsed since the time (May 14) when discussions with the Colombian Ambassador were adjourned pending the establishment of a unified U.S. governmental position. It would be embarrassing and probably detrimental to U.S. financial interests to resume negotiations and then be forced to postpone them for another prolonged period of time in the event of the Colombian Government's refusal to consider payment on the same terms as have been agreed to by other countries.

In view of Colombia's stated position and our desire that Colombian forces remain in the Korean operation, the U.S. should be prepared to indicate to Colombia that the U.S. would be receptive to funding the Colombian obligation over a suitable period of time, or to any alternative solution offered by the Colombians that embodies the principle of full reimbursement. While, as indicated above, a final settlement for less than full reimbursement would have adverse repercussions on negotiations with other countries and while it would not be otherwise tactically desirable for the U.S. to propose such a settlement, the U.S. should consider any such proposals by the Colombian Government to determine whether acceptance at this time would, on balance, be in the best interests of the U.S. The U.S. may also consider, if no acceptable definitive settlement appears possible through current negotiations, the desirability of suggesting an interim settlement under which Colombia would make periodic payments of some moderate amount, the balance to be negotiated at a specified time in the future.

[5] For a draft of this letter, see p. 770.

Conclusions:

1. Formal negotiations with Colombia should be initiated in the near future to obtain reimbursement for U.S. logistical support.

2. The U.S. negotiators should inform the Colombians that the U.S. has given careful consideration to Colombia's situation in connection with its obligations to reimburse the U.S. In view of Colombia's generally satisfactory financial situation, internal and external, the U.S. does not find justification for departing from the principle established in agreements with other countries which provide for reimbursement in full.

3. The U.S. negotiators may also inform the Colombians that, although other countries have agreed to pay on a current basis, the U.S. would not be adverse to a definitive settlement that would provide for payments by Colombia over a reasonable period of years (to be determined by the negotiators).

4. The three Departments recognize the paramount importance of the retention of the Colombian forces in Korea. In the event the negotiators have good reason to believe during the course of the negotiations that the Colombian forces will be withdrawn from Korea if the U.S. does not agree to grant particular financial concessions or assurances, the Departments will reconsider the situation on an emergency basis. Subject to these principles, the following will apply:

(a) If it becomes clear that the Colombian Government will not presently agree to full reimbursement on either a current or funded basis, the Departments will consider (i) concessions (scaling down) that the U.S. may agree to in a definitive settlement, or (ii) the terms that may be offered in an interim settlement.

(b) If inter-Departmental concurrence is reached as to specific concessions or interim terms that should be agreed to by the U.S., the Departments, without clearance of higher authority, will instruct the negotiators to proceed on the basis thereof. It is understood, however, that approval for a complete waiver cannot be given without the consent of the President.

(c) If the Departments can find no satisfactory basis for a definitive or interim settlement that is also acceptable to Colombia, the negotiators will be instructed to seek agreement to adjourn the discussions, preferably to a specified future date.

Subject: Arms Shipments to the Colombian Government.

In view of your concurrence in Ambassador Waynick's recommendation regarding the prompt shipment to Colombia of the arms requested by Colombian Minister of War Bernal (see attached Embdes No. 225 of September 11[2]), we plan to take the following action on this and three other pending Colombian requests for military and naval equipment each of which is in a different stage of consideration in State and Defense.

(1) Inform Defense that our informal agreement of June 25, 1952[3] with Generals Bolte, Walsh and Stewart can now be relaxed, and the anti-personnel material requested by General Bernal can be released in limited amounts to the extent that it is available.

(2) Authorize MD to release the export license for the shipment of a long-delayed consignment of light and heavy machine guns (50 each); pistols and sub-machine guns (76 each); and nominal amounts of ammunition and grenades. This order, placed by Ambassador Zuleta Angel on August 23, 1950, is valued at $136,235.

(3) Approve to Defense from a political and economic viewpoint the Colombian request made August 14, 1952 for an additional frigate, subject to current availability, and Defense's finding that this type of vessel is needed by Colombia in connection with hemisphere defense.

(4) Inform Defense that we cannot approve the Colombian request of August 4, 1952 for demolition, fragmentation and napalm bombs, which the Colombians state "are needed by the Colombian Air Force in connection with the Joint Western Hemisphere Defense Effort," unless Defense can adduce some overriding military reason why these are needed by Colombia at this time.

If you agree with the foregoing, and will so indicate,[4] we shall proceed along these lines.

Subject: Replacement of Colombian Battalion in Korea

Participants: Ambassador Cipriano Restrepo-Jaramillo
Minister-Counselor Misael Pastrana
Assistant Secretary Edward G. Miller—ARA
Mr. Wainhouse—UNP
Mr. Gerberich—OSA

The Ambassador said he had received instructions from his Government to ascertain whether it would be possible to withdraw the Colombian battalion of infantry which has been fighting in Korea beside the United Nations forces and substitute for it a battalion of artillery. He said that Colombia would like to have an opportunity to train artillerymen as well as footsoldiers at the front. He also mentioned that rumors had reached him from various sources that the Colombian battalion was to be withdrawn entirely. He said such rumors are entirely without foundation, and he had been instructed by his Government to say that no one is authorized to make any statements regarding the battalion except the Foreign Minister in Bogotá or the Colombian Ambassador in Washington.

Mr. Miller said he wanted to state at the outset that we are all proud of the brilliant account the Colombian Battalion has given of itself in Korea. We are also proud of the brilliant intervention of the Colombian Ambassador at the United Nations in the discussions regarding Korea, and he wanted to thank the Ambassador personally and in the name of the United States Government. Regarding the change from an infantry to an artillery would have to be taken up with the appropriate Defense authorities. However, he thought that it would be unwise to make the change in the immediate future, as it could easily be misinterpreted and distorted during the present debate on Korea at the United Nations.

He asked the Ambassador if the present request was tied up with the question of reimbursement for logistic support, which the Ambassador has discussed frequently with the Department of late. The Ambassador said that whether Colombia maintained an infantry or an artillery battalion at the front would have no effect on Colombian Korean policy. Mr. Miller said we have been hoping all along to be ready to begin negotiations with the Ambassador on the subject of reimbursement, but in spite of our best efforts the preliminary interdepartmental discussions have not yet been completed. He could only say that he hoped to be able to tell him very shortly that we are prepared to meet with him. The Ambassador thanked Mr. Miller and said he would be glad at any time to sit down with us.

Mr. Miller asked Mr. Wainhouse if he had anything to add to what had been said. Mr. Wainhouse said he thought the effect of a change in the Colombian contribution to the UN effort in Korea might have a bad psychological effect on the other nations who are also contributing. He said he also hoped that the Ambassador would not bring this matter directly to the attention of the United Nations, as he understood he had planned to do; he said the United Nations is merely a "post office" in this matter, and all discussions should be with the Unified Command. The Ambassador said he did not believe the change from infantry to artillery would have a bad psychological effect; the Colombians would not pull out their troops, and all the allied units would see that they were still out there fighting beside them. He added he had no intention of taking the matter to the United Nations; that immediately upon receipt of his instructions he had gotten in touch with Mr. Bernbaum at the United Nations only for advice as to how to proceed.

Mr. Miller at this point alluded to the fact that casualties amongst foot soldiers are some 40 percent higher than in the other line components.

He handed Mr. Miller a formal note[1] requesting authorization to withdraw the infantry battalion and substitute for it a battalion of artillery, and said he would appreciate it if Mr. Wainhouse made the necessary arrangements for bringing the subject to the attention of the military technicians.[2]

In a memorandum, dated Sept. 9, 1954, the United States informed the Colombian Government that the UN Command in Korea had been requested to discuss with the Commander of the Colombian Battalion the necessary arrangements for the withdrawal of Colombian ground forces (795B.5/8–2654).

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to a draft position paper,[1] prepared by the Department of State to serve as guidance in conducting negotiations with Colombia concerning reimbursement for logistic support furnished Colombian ground and naval units in Korea. The draft was forwarded for clearance by the Department of Defense on 15 September 1952.

The Department of Defense concurs in the conclusions of the paper, subject to the following comment. Agreement by the United States to a settlement with Colombia providing for other than full reimbursement on a current basis would involve the exercise of the President's emergency powers. A letter from the Department of Defense to the Department of State dated 27 September 1952,[2] which was concerned with the general subject of reimbursement, expressed the view of this Department that the decision to utilize the President's emergency powers in such cases should be made by the President. This Department accordingly does not agree with the concept underlying paragraph 4(b) of the Conclusions that the President's approval should not be sought unless a complete waiver of reimbursement is involved. This Department interposes no objection, however, to proceeding with the negotiations and resolving any difference of opinion on that point at a later time if it should become necessary to do so.

The draft position paper refers on page 1 to the Colombian note of 14 November 1950,[3] in which Colombia recognized an obligation to reimburse the United States. That note refers, however, only to reimbursement for logistic support and services furnished to the Colombian infantry battalion. Assurances concerning payment for logistic support provided by the United States Navy are contained in separate correspondence between the Chief of Naval Operations and the Colombian Naval Attaché, Washington.

It is requested that the Department of Defense be given as much advance notice as possible of the date selected for the negotiations with Colombia in order that representatives to take part in the negotiations may be designated. Informal notification will be acceptable.[4]

Sincerely yours, WILLIAM C. FOSTER

[Subject:] Reimbursement Negotiations with Colombians

I am agreeable to the proposal to initiate negotiations with the Colombians as soon as possible concerning reimbursement for the battalion. I also have no objection to requesting from the Colombians in the first instance full reimbursement for the cost which the U.S. Government has incurred in connection with the training, transportation, equipment and maintenance of the battalion.

However, I wish to reiterate that as the principal civilian involved in the negotiations which led up to the Colombian offer of the battalion, it was the distinct understanding at the time of the negotiations that the terms of the reimbursement, both as to amount and the currency of payment, was to be left for subsequent negotiations. In the conversations which General Ridgway and General Bolte had with Ambassador Zuleta and the then Minister of War Dr. Roberto Urdaneta, now Acting President of Colombia, it was repeatedly stated to them that our principal concern was the urgent necessity of getting other UN units in the field in Korea and that the question or reimbursement was of minor importance as compared to the principal objective. The Colombian Government would never have made the offer of troops for Korea if they had expected to bear the full expense in dollars. In my opinion the fact that we have not settled the Colombian case on a basis satisfactory to Colombia in accordance with that understanding is the primary reason why we have not obtained other troop offers from Latin American Governments all of which are worried about the high cost involved in participating in the Korean operation in proportion to their annual budgets.

Furthermore, during the discussions which Mr. Acheson and General Bolte had with the Foreign Minister of Brazil[2] during the Foreign Ministers' Conference in March 1951[3] and that General Bolte and I had with the Chileans and Peruvians at that time, we repeatedly stressed the fact that reimbursement for any troops they might send would be subject to negotiation both as to amount and as to the currency of payment. The Acting Secretary of Defense (McNeil)[1] to the Secretary of State

SECRET WASHINGTON, January 27, 1953.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to a letter from Assistant Secretary of State Hickerson dated 4 December 1952[2] concerning a proposal by Colombia to substitute a field artillery battalion for its infantry battalion in Korea.

Attached is a memorandum from the Joint Chiefs of Staff dated 5 January 1953 containing conclusions and recommendations concerning this matter, with which I concur.

In any discussions with Colombia of a 105mm howitzer battery to supplement Colombia's infantry battalion, it appears likely that the financial obligation to be assumed by Colombia would be an important consideration from Colombia's viewpoint. It would be undesirable if Colombia were to gain an impression that the United States affirmatively desires that Colombia supplement its infantry battalion with an artillery battery. If the matter is discussed, it is suggested that it be made clear to Colombia that the United States is simply attempting to cooperate with Colombia's stated desire to obtain a nucleus of combat-trained artillerymen, and that Colombia should expect to reimburse the United States for services, equipment and logistic support furnished to the unit by the United States.

Sincerely yours, W. J. MCNEIL

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] 5 January 1953.

Subject: Substitution of a Field Artillery Battalion for the Colombian Infantry Battalion in Korea

---

[1] W. J. McNeil, Assistant Secretary of Defense (Comptroller).

[2] The referenced letter reads in part as follows:

"The Department is considering the political implications of such a change on the United Nations collective effort in Korea. While we assume it would be preferable that the contingent of Colombian infantry in Korea be maintained in its present form, we recognize that the Colombian Government might become more insistent that its request for substitution be granted. In order to assist the Department in its consideration, it would be helpful if the Department of Defense would determine whether such a change-over would be desirable and feasible from a military point of view." (795B.5/12–452)

1. In response to your memorandum, dated 12 December 1952,[3] subject as above, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have considered the proposal by the Colombian Government to replace its infantry battalion in Korea with a field artillery battalion and have concluded that, from a military point of view, it is neither practicable nor desirable to effect this change-over.

2. The foregoing conclusion is based on the following considerations:

a. The requirement for infantry units in Korea exceeds the requirement for additional 105mm artillery units.

b. Such substitution could conceivably form the basis for similar requests from other nations.

c. The language barrier inherent in having a Colombian artillery battalion supporting U.S. infantry units.

d. The logistical problem created by the addition of another battalion of artillery from the standpoint primarily of availability of weapons and ammunition.

3. Although it is desirable that member nations of the United Nations be encouraged to increase their contributions in Korea to units of at least regimental combat team size, it is recognized that Colombia and other small nations cannot afford to contribute and support such large units. The substitution of an artillery battalion for an infantry battalion would constitute an actual reduction in personnel and overall combat effectiveness.

4. If the Colombian request is prompted by a desire to obtain a nucleus of combat-trained artillerymen, this objective could be attained by their furnishing a 105mm artillery battery to supplement their infantry battalion, such as presently provided by the Philippine Government. However, it is recognized that the administrative burden placed upon the U.S. unit to which the Colombian battery is attached would far outweigh any tactical value such a unit would have.

5. The Joint Chiefs of Staff recommend that the request of the Colombian Government to substitute a 105mm artillery battalion for their infantry battalion in Korea be denied.

6. It is further recommended that, should the Colombian Government offer to furnish a 105mm howitzer battalion in addition to their infantry battalion, such an offer be refused. Such a unit would not have the same utility to the United Nations Command as a similar U.S. battalion, and for such a battalion to continuously support the Colombian infantry battalion would be economically and tactically unsound, based upon the number of artillery units presently available. Moreover, it is understood that Colombia does not have more than 8 105mm howitzers at the present time, thus requiring a considerable number of 105mm howitzers to be furnished by the United States. However, in view of the expressed desire of the Colombian Government to train artillerymen as well as infantrymen, the Joint Chiefs of Staff recommend favorable consideration be given to the furnishing by the Colombians of a 105mm howitzer battery in addition to their infantry battalion. The Colombian Government should be requested to provide the major items of equipment for this unit to the maximum extent practicable.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 28, 1953.

Subject: Failure of Colombia to Receive Military Supplies

Participants: Ambassador Cipriano Restrepo-Jaramillo
Mr. Bernbaum—OSA–NCA
Mr. Gerberich—OSA

The Ambassador stated that there has been great dissatisfaction in Bogotá over the failure of the Colombian Government to receive military supplies promised as a result of the visit of Minister of War Bernal to the United States last July.

The Ambassador said that following Bernal's conversations with high officials in the Pentagon, the Colombian Government presented a requisition for materials amounting to about $3,500,000. The export of these items was finally approved by the Allocation Board and the Colombian Government deposited the required amount with the U.S. Treasury, insisting on the urgent need for shipping the supplies for use in anti-guerrilla operations. The Ambassador stressed strongly the tieup between Communists and guerrillas in the forces operating against the Government, and said that notwithstanding all the proofs of friendship that Colombia has given the United States none of these supplies whatsoever have been delivered.

He went on to say that under the Bilateral Pact the Colombians were told that they would receive four B–25J's and two F–47's during 1952 and six B–25J's and eleven F–47's during 1953. The Minister of War was told that these planes would be delivered to the Colombians in the Canal Zone or its neighborhood. Not one has been received; nor is there any reason to hope for the receipt of any in the near future.

The Ambassador said he could not recall that the Colombians have received any military supplies promised them under the Bilateral Agreement besides certain spare parts for planes.

He emphasized strongly that this situation is making it extremely difficult for the Government to resist pressure from the Army to pull back its troops in Korea. He said he is really surprised at our failure to cooperate, in view of Colombia's participation in the Korean warfare. He handed Mr. Bernbaum a memorandum [1] on the subject.

Mr. Bernbaum told the Ambassador we would study his memorandum and inform him at our earliest opportunity just what the facts are in the issues he has raised.

The Ambassador in Colombia (Waynick) to the Department of State [1]

SECRET BOGOTÁ, June 3, 1953.

Subject: Our Policy With Respect to the Protestant Difficulties in Colombia

The present Ambassador for the United States in Colombia presented his credentials in August 1951. At that time I was advised that the most troublesome matter affecting our relations was the persecution of Protestants in this strongly Catholic country. Nearly two years have elapsed and I am unable to report basic improvement in the conditions which control the intolerance.

For what value it may be to the Department in current appraisal of the problem, I am attempting analysis of existing conditions and forwarding a brief review of the cases of persecution which have been the subject of protest by the Embassy during my stay in Colombia. We have had 11 of these cases and in a tabulation, which is made part of this despatch,[2] I am indicating what they were and what was done about them. During the same period there have been many other instances of the persecution of Protestants but these have involved Colombians only, or other nationals than those of the United States.

I have felt that the Colombian Government has manifested an increased degree of concern over the cases we have protested, but evidence of this lies more in an abortive effort to establish a formula for religious peace and in prompter response to the Embassy Notes than in any substantial basic effort to change conditions, either by punishment of offenders or by efforts to reduce the incitation to persecution.

The agitation against Protestant missionaries and congregations by certain priests of the Catholic Church, in spoken and written word, continues unabated and the harsher efforts by provincial priests have met with no positive and effective condemnation by clerics in high position. On the contrary, the utterances of some of the more scholarly members of the Catholic hierarchy have appeared to be encouraging to the agitators. There is frequent repetition of the claim that the Catholic faith and the unity it provides is the foundation of Colombian solidarity and that the Protestants are enemies of the State as well as the one "true Church". Much of the propaganda against the Protestants condemn them as political meddlers, and frequently they are denounced as Communists and supporters of the banditry which disturbs the public order.

It is important to recognize that some of the persecution is based in sincere belief of a portion of the priesthood that it is better for a Colombian to "go to the street of the prostitute" than to "go to the street of the Protestants". The Catholic Church was established in Colombia by the Spanish conquerors and priests who came with them nearly a century before European colonization began in the United States. It was founded here by Catholics from a country that for nearly 800 years had struggled with the Moor and identified loyalty to the Church and the State as one and the same thing. They speak of the importance of their Catholic solidarity which they claim the Protestant infusion is endangering, while ignoring the fact that Catholics in various parts of Colombia are murdering each other, engaging in a species of civil war. Their scholars charge the recurrent wars of modern Europe to the schismatic effects of Protestantism and ignore the fact that their own country has been torn with even more constant warfare. Their conviction about the importance of supporting the Church is deep and a more positive policy with respect to the persecution than we have employed will be required to effect important change. A firmer policy would risk the loss of what good will we have in the country.

One inspiration for this present discussion of the problem is the fact that the Minister with whom I have dealt is now being replaced by a new appointee who comes fresh from his post as Ambassador to Spain where he consummated a treaty recently which emphasizes anew the kinship of Colombia with the old fatherland. That treaty pledges the two countries to guard each other against adverse publicity and even pledges the rewriting of text books where needed to promote the consciousness of common hispanidad. This new Minister, son of a poet of the city of Popayán, an ancient center of Catholic culture, is not likely to have any more friendly concern about the Protestant problem than the man whom he succeeds has. So a pertinent question exists for the Embassy and for the Department: Are we to continue treating these instances of persecution of Protestants only as protection cases when Americans or American property are involved, or is there a better and more basic approach with hope of success? Another question: Should a positive new effort be made before a new Constitution is promulgated?

Some months ago a native Colombian who is pastor of a well-attended Presbyterian church in Bogotá made the suggestion during a visit to the United States that we might employ economic sanctions to compel Colombia to honor some of the commitments she has made with respect to religious freedom. The fact of this suggestion got back to Colombia and President Roberto Urdaneta Arbelaez denounced this pastor as disloyal, during a personal conversation we had about the religious intolerance. The position of the Colombian Protestant pastor was that various forces are being applied in all parts of the world, including the United States, to make the people more self-conscious and concerned about injustice to minorities and he thought that we might use sanctions here if we really believed in the freedoms we have professed.

Our policy has been sufficiently tolerant of the crucifixion in Colombia of several of the freedoms to which we have dedicated our democracy and which we have supported in international convenants as to give rise to question among "liberal" Latin Americans as to whether we will risk anything important in times of peace to substantiate principles upon which we go to war. Many with whom I have talked who are most inclined to favor our brand of democracy accuse us of arming and supporting dictators in governments who show little respect for any one of the basic "Freedoms" we advocate. I have noted what seems a lessening of concern about our faith in the freedom of religion, the freedom of speech and press, and the freedom from fear. Perhaps there is a little increased emphasis for political purposes on "freedom from want", as most of the governments trampling on other freedoms protest that they are concerned about lifting the level of the well-being of the masses.

We have been pressing upon the Latin republics, where scant respect is shown these freedoms, both technical aid in their domestic economy and military aid. Even here, where opinion is vigorously suppressed when it is in opposition to the government, more than a hint of Liberal condemnation of this cooperation of ours is manifest. So even when we gain the support of a Latin government like that of Colombia for our international purposes, we run the risk of increasing the conviction among the people of the country who have the highest respect for our enunciated principles that our professions of faith are not to be construed as something for which we will take any considerable chances in countries with which we are at peace.

Very recently the head of the Catholic Church, in a public address, called for the marshalling of Christian forces for something like a Holy War. All comment upon that war cry here indicated that Christian is generally interpreted to mean the Catholic faith.

There may be some justification for the charge leveled against us that we have catered unduly to the Catholic majority in our relations with Latin America. We have sent into Latin countries some Catholic clerics whose lectures intended to promote better understanding between our country of religious freedom and a country like Colombia that may have had the opposite effect, and the feeling has grown in strong Catholic circles that there is no need of beng too tender with the schismatic "hill billy" cults of the United States where Catholicism is making headway against "heresy". That is not conducive to conditions under which we may expect revision of the resolve of ruling forces of Colombia to maintain intact the "Holy Catholic Faith", even with physical force, if necessary. Certainly no authoritative voice is raised in this country against the persecution of Protestants and when some Liberal newspaper, or individual, dares to advocate tolerance, that spokesman is bludgeoned into silence as hostile to the true Church and the "democratic" order of the nation.

We have been confronted for some time with a somewhat arrogant position of the Colombian Embassy in Washington with respect to the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation, negotiated during the time when Dr. Eduardo Zuleta Angel was Colombian Ambassador to the United States. That Treaty has been awaiting confirmation by the Senate of the United States and the Senate of Colombia. Repeatedly, the Washington Embassy has informed the Department that there is no likelihood of the Treaty being confirmed in Colombia as written because of the fear that under its terms the Protestants would demand privileges. As Colombia gets ready to formulate a new Constitution, there is good reason to believe that the guarantees of religious freedom will be reduced and weakened at the instance of Catholic leadership. It seems probable that the new Constitution will spell out in clear terms the most repressive interpretation given to the present constitutional guarantees of religious liberty. It seems likely that the provision will be tolerance for worship behind closed doors by those who are not of the Catholic faith, and that that will be the extent of "religious freedom" under the law.

In handling the overt cases of attacks on American nationals and property in the religious cases, I have seen no advantage to be gained by any procedure other than prompt protest and demand for protection and investigation of the charges of injustice. Great public disorder has afflicted the country during my presence here and I know that for every Protestant missionary, or Protestant, who has been attacked or killed, hundreds of other and frequently Catholic nationals of Colombia have died under circumstances of equal brutality. It would be extremely difficult for the government to give protection in all cases of violent outbreak even though it earnestly desired to do so.

Tolerance inspired by these special conditions has little bearing upon what should be our basic long-range policy with respect to our relations with nations which do not honor perhaps the most prized of the freedoms to which our own democracy is dedicated. Any stronger effort to affect the behavior of Colombia in the matter of religious freedom should be fashioned at a very high level. To put it another way, do we need to deliberate now whether we should be satisfied with a policy that regards these instances of attacks on our nationals and their rights as individual protection cases, or whether we are ready to be more positive in insistence upon religious liberty for which guarantees have been written in some of the recent charters for world-wide adherence?

Recently there has been a tendency in some quarters to hold that most of the intolerance here is directed against "Yankees" rather than against Protestant missionaries or Protestants. In my opinion, the element of truth in this is that more of the missionaries and missionary efforts originate in the United States than in other countries. Actually, the persecution seems to be no respecter of nationalism.

From time to time the concern about these matters has reached Protestant areas of the old world. The reports of persecution were discussed in the Dutch Parliament last year, and within the past month the matter has been brought up in the House of Commons in London. The incident that occasioned the comment in the Commons was an attack on a British Protestant missionary, Samuel Heap, who was operating in the Cundinamarca town of Ubaté. The new British Ambassador, R. Keith Jopson, told me that a Note of protest in the Heap case was sent to the Foreign Office of Colombia while he, the Ambassador, was waiting to present his credentials. He informed me that the Foreign Minister was reasonably prompt in promising full investigation and that "depositions are being taken" in the case. He has heard nothing further.

Ambassador Jopson advised me that his Foreign Office has communicated to him additional information about the English reaction to the persecution. He has been informed that further repercussions may be expected as the stir caused by the reference to the matter in the Commons was spreading and that the Protestant bodies were becoming more insistent on a firmer policy, looking to a basic assurance that religious freedom will be protected in Colombia where British nationals are concerned.

The Ambassador advised me that his Foreign Office, believing that nothing was to be gained by a vigorous change of policy, has been trying to treat each case as an ad hoc matter of protection, but advised the Ambassador that this position is going to be increasingly difficult to maintain in the face of a rising concern in England about the matter.

The Ambassador was wiring his Foreign Office which had suggested that he might want to discuss the matter fundamentally, not only with the Government but with the new Cardinal of Colombia, with a view to trying to promote a definite stand by the Catholic hierarchy against persecution. The British Ambassador was inclined to recommend that the approach to the hierarchy be made through the Vatican and the new Nuncio who is expected to report here in June. He stated to me that he wanted to add to his telegram that he recommended that any such approach be sought to be made jointly with the United States and he asked me if I had any objection to his making that recommendation, or saying that the U.S. Ambassador agreed with him. I suggested that he limit his reference to the statement that he had quoted to me, making it his recommendation, as I would wish to discuss more fully with him what fundamental approach might be made and how such an approach would be influenced and affected by the peculiar circumstances of public disorder existing in Colombia.

This despatch is little more than a review of former reports but it seems to me a desirable recapitulation in view not only of some suggestions made to the Department that we should be more positive here in support of the persecuted but of the suggestion that there may be more pressure soon from other nations, whose nationals are involved in instances of violence. The fact that most of the American missionaries with whom I have dealt express approval of the course the Embassy is following does not obscure the basic failure of policy to afford guarantees of protection.

No doubt, this country could be bludgeoned into an improved policy or into what would amount to a break with the United States by threat of economic sanctions. We buy most of Colombia's coffee which is her principal export and a chief base of her economic life. There is an increased flow of investment capital from the United States here and an increased consciousness of the need for it. The country is taking intelligent advantage of our technical aid and of loans from U.S. banks. So we have the power to wreck the country economically but naturally it is a power we have no disposition to employ.

I have hoped that Colombia's increasing pride in her international status would promote adulthood in observance of international codes which incorporate guarantees of religious freedom. The Embassy has sought to encourage a change of conditions by emphasizing the readiness of the United States to cooperate in the great potential development of Colombia. These efforts are inadequate to effect great or quick change. While I offer no definite recommendation based upon the facts discussed in this despatch, I point out that one possibility would be a conference of representatives of countries interested, with outstanding Colombian leaders of Church and State, with a view to a frank discussion of the terms under which non-Catholic religions can have their being in Colombia and of the conditions under which Protestant educational and religious institutions might exist in peace. I mention this as a possible device because of the fact that the new Constitution is to be expected in a reasonable time with new language bearing upon these issues. If such a conference were to be promoted, it should be after full discussion in the Department and overtures to certain Catholic leaders in the United States who might be influential in the matter.

Enclosed is the tabulation of the cases referred to at the beginning of this despatch.

Editorial Note

On June 13, 1953, Lieutenant General Gustavo Rojas Pinilla launched a successful Army coup d'etat against the regime of President Laureano Gómez, which resulted in the deposition of Gómez and his replacement by a military junta of 13 officers under the leadership of Rojas Pinilla. The progress of the coup and related political developments were reported in despatch 990, from Bogotá, dated June 17, 1953, not printed (721.00/6–1753). Additional pertinent documentation is in file 721.00 for 1953.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 15, 1953.

Subject: Recognition of New Government in Colombia

The attached telegram [2] foreshadows recognition of the new Colombian Government and I therefore feel you should approve it.

Quite apart from the question of the Korean negotiations, we feel that the new Government is one to which we can by implication extend a positive welcome in that it appears to have the support of the majority of the Conservative Party and to be viewed benevolently by the Liberal Party. It also appears disposed to return Colombia to the democratic paths from which it has recently strayed. Moreover, the new Government should certainly be no worse than the old in regard to persecution of Protestants in Colombia.[3]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 20, 1953.

DEAR CABOT: Your letter of September 24 [2] to the Secretary on the question of Colombian reimbursement, in which was enclosed the memorandum given to you by Ambassador Urrutia, has been considered by the Department.

Having actively participated in the recent top-level review of the reimbursement problem, you will recall that the National Security Council adopted a new formula in July which would give the Department of State greater flexibility in settling bills such as that owed to the United States by Colombia for logistic support received in Korea at an amount less than full reimbursement.[3] As you are aware, the new formula would also assist the Department in conducting negotiations looking towards an increase in the participation of other United Nations Members in Korea. However, the new NSC policy has not been put into effect, awaiting the opinion of the Attorney General requested by the President, on whether there exists a legal basis in present legislation for the new reimbursement formula, and if not, on the nature of any new legislation which would be needed. Our concern over the delay in rendering the legal opinion prompted me to raise this matter with Mr. Robert Cutler on October 2. I am enclosing a memorandum of conversation[4] for your information.

You will note from the memorandum of conversation that Mr. Cutler has requested Mr. Brownell to draft a statute which could be used as a basis for new legislation. It is Mr. Cutler's intention to submit Mr. Brownell's draft to the NSC Planning Board. Since there is no assurance that the new reimbursement formula can be implemented without obtaining new legislation, we can expect substantial delay before we can consider settlements with present participants in Korea at less than full reimbursement. The Department prefers that no suggestion regarding possible action by the Executive Branch to secure new legislation be given to the Colombians at this time as they are not adverse to converting such information to their own use.

With respect to Ambassador Urrutia's memorandum, we do not believe there is much to be gained from an attempt to refute the arguments contained therein. We have always considered the problem of Korean military assistance apart from the aid which countries have been given by the United States. The Colombian Government is well aware that a number of Governments which have received substantial aid from the United States suffered considerable damage during World War II. However, we believe that it would be helpful if you could inform Ambassador Urrutia that the matter raised in his memorandum is under active consideration in the Department and that Ambassador Zuleta-Angel will be requested shortly to call on Assistant Secretary John M. Cabot for an exchange of views.

Without making reference to the article which appeared in the October 1 issue of the New York Times, in which a Colombian official is reported to have said that if his country was expected to pay for the equipment issued to the battalion which it had sent to Korea, the troops should drop that equipment and come home, you might also emphasize to Ambassador Urrutia the desirability of avoiding public statements which might make more difficult the amicable settlement of this problem and undermine our negotiations with other United Nations members with forces in Korea.

Sincerely yours, ROBERT MURPHY

821.413/11–1253

Memorandum by Albert H. Gerberich of the Office of South American Affairs to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 12, 1953.

Subject: Briefing memo on Protestant situation in Colombia; recommendations.

Since the coup d'état of June 13 incidents of violence against Protestants in Colombia have virtually ceased (there has been one against a British missionary, but I have heard of none against any American.) In this respect the Rojas Government has brought about a healthy improvement in the situation, and one that had been devoutly wished for.

The Rojas Government has taken one step, however, that is fraught with danger not only to the Protestants in Colombia, but to the existence of religious freedom in that country. On September 3 the Secretary General of the Ministry of Government published a circular to all departmental and territorial governors, informing them that no "Protestant pastors or missionaries" were in the future to be permitted to carry out their religious functions in those parts of Colombia classed as "Mission Territory" in the Concordat with the Vatican. The term "Mission Territory" was redefined on January 28, 1953, by the "Convenio de Misiones" with the Vatican in such a manner that it takes in more than half of the territory of Colombia and affects the largest Protestant congregation in the country (at Barranca Bermeja), as well as the San Andres y Providencia Archipelago, where over 90% of the population is, and always has been, Protestant.

The inclination of both the Embassy and the Protestants at first was to wait and see whether the Government would actually enforce the terms of the Ministry of Government's circular. Many are of the opinion that President Rojas had nothing to do with the circular, that it was promulgated at the instance of extremists in the Church, and that he does not approve of it. Certainly his statement to Mr. Barber[1] on October 23, that he had "every belief that there could be a friendly resolution of the problem" points in that direction.

Nevertheless, in the last few weeks notice has been served on American Protestant missionaries at Istmina and Noanamá in the Chocó (Mennonite), at Barranca Bermeja in Santander (GMU), and at Leticia on the Amazon (Baptist), that they shall abandon their missions and cease their activities. In the two Chocó towns there was an actual order of explusion; in the Leticia case the authorities sealed up the Baptist Church; in the Barranca Bermeja case the local alcalde permitted the church to remain open but forbade public proselytizing.

The Embassy has protested the Chocó and Leticia cases and the attached telegram[2] gives the latest ruling by the Foreign Office: (1) the Chocó cases have been referred back to the Governor of that Department and meanwhile the order of expulsion is suspended; (2) pastors may hold services indoors but may not propagandize or proselyte. My information (from the National Association of Evangelicals) agrees with the Embassy's statement that the Protestants will accept the terms under (2) above, as a last resort, in order to remain in those areas till better days.

The Embassy urges that this issue be taken up with Foreign Minister Sourdis[3] while he is in Washington, and I would indorse that recommendation. Our Embassy people have not discussed this problem directly with Dr. Sourdis. The British Ambassador raised the question with Sourdis, according to Embassy Bogotá, but received a pretty cold response. I would suggest that if such talks fail, we should seriously consider a joint approach to the Colombian Government with Great Britain, Canada, Switzerland, Holland, and Sweden, all of whom are interested in the problem, as they have nationals who are missionaries there.[4] We have never had a satisfactory reply to any of our twelve notes of protest on incidents of religious persecution involving Americans in the last two years. The British Embassy has had the same experience.

If the circular of the Ministry of Government stands, Protestantism is practically proscribed in more than half the territory of Colombia. Colombian citizens who are Protestant pastors may no longer carry on public worship; Colombians who are Protestant laymen will find no place in which to worship. This last telegram even hints that permission may be refused to Protestants to attend Protestant services, which would be a violation of the ideal of religious freedom unique in this hemisphere, so far as my knowledge goes.

There is attached a sheet[5] giving some statistics on Protestant missions in Colombia and some facts on churches located in what is now known as "Mission Territory" and thus threatened with closure in light of the recent circular. In my opinion this list of 37 churches and chapels, which I have put together after consulting the best sources available, does not contain all of them. I am also unable to say positively what their total value is or how many of them are owned by the local congregations rather than the U.S. I have the figures for Istmina and Noanamá, where the missionaries have been ordered to get out.

[7] In a memorandum of conversation between Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Woodward and Colombian Ambassador Zuleta Angel, dated July 12, 1954, concerning the religious situation in Colombia, the Ambassador is recorded as having stated that "the most that Colombia is willing to concede to the Protestants is that they may worship in their own churches, chapels and other places of worship . . . and that they will be permitted to have schools in which to educate Protestant children." The memorandum, drafted by Mr. Gerberich, reads in part as follows: "The Ambassador made it abundantly clear that he and his Government are thoroughly anti-Protestant in sentiment, and that the Conservative Government is determined to prohibit any deliberate proselytizing and will give no assurance of protection to Protestants who are attempting to convert Catholics to Protestantism." Memorandum by the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Intelligence (Armstrong) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 20, 1954.

Subject: Intelligence Note: The Political Climate in Colombia

In the first six months of his administration, President Rojas of Colombia has redeemed his promise to restore public order. His promise to restore constitutional processes remains to be fulfilled.

The ending of more than four years of savage and ruinous guerrilla operations in Colombia was accomplished by proffers of amnesty and of rehabilitation aid to the guerrillas. Beyond this basic and indispensable achievement, Rojas has formulated a program with wide potential appeal. He has pledged that his administration will rehabilitate areas damaged by civil strife, reestablish civil liberties, protect capital, institute agrarian reforms, raise rural standards of living, and hold elections. Thus far, however, his "non-political" government has done little to deliver on any of these promises and, what is more, has shown little evidence of being able to do so.

Rojas's political strength has deteriorated. His main support comes from the Church and from a minority Conservative faction led by Gilberto Alzate Avendano, an opportunist and extremist primarily interested in furthering his own presidential ambitions. The majority group of Conservatives, the moderates, is dissatisfied, largely because it has not been given any decisive voice in either government or party affairs. The aggressive followers of former President Gomez, many of whom have lost lucrative government posts, are reportedly organizing in some regions for armed action. The Liberals, who hoped the Rojas regime would provide the auspices for their political comeback, have become somewhat disillusioned by the growing militarization of the government and by the President's increasingly apparent intention of perpetuating himself in office. Important industrial and agricultural interests are disturbed because of recent tax increases.

Despite the President's pledges to hold national elections, the administration is expected to depend more and more upon authoritarian controls to maintain power. At the same time, Rojas may strive to build up a pro-government labor group in the manner of President Peron of Argentina. The deciding factor in Rojas's political future will be the military establishment. Thus far the armed forces are as a whole loyal to the President, although dissension, involving personalities as well as policies, has occurred among top army officers.

Reimbursement of Logistic Support for the Colombians in Korea

Mr. Murphy mentioned this matter had been discussed with Admiral Davis. We would like to pare down the charges against the Colombians, by way of making a gesture to them at the opening of the Caracas Conference.[2] Ambassador Lodge was supporting a bill which would give the President a freer hand in reducing the financial burdens of foreign forces supplied from U.S. logistic support. The Colombians had raised the question of their capacity to pay and even though this may not be a valid consideration, we had hoped that some relief might be given them before the Caracas Conference, but this now seems impossible.

Admiral Carney favored relief for the Colombians, expressing admiration for their willingness to participate in Korea.

Admiral Radford pointed out that we control the amounts charged. Out of $10 million expenses incurred, we had already billed the Colombians for $5 million and presumably it might be possible to arrange the matter in their interest. Some other nations, particularly the Philippines, had indicated they might pull out of Korea owing to the heavy expenses involved.

Mr. Murphy suggested the possibility that Secretary Dulles might confidentially work out some arrangement with the Colombians at Caracas.

Admiral Radford pointed out that it was fair to charge the U.K. for the logistic support since they were receiving other military aid. The Colombian case might be different.

Mr. Murphy mentioned that financial questions will assume importance at Caracas, particularly Export-Import Bank loan policy. The State Department wished to put the Colombian problem before the JCS and would appreciate any help which the latter might give.[3]

[3] The notes of the Secretary's staff meeting, held on Mar. 4, 1952, designated SM N-211, read in part as follows:

"4. The Acting Secretary [Mr. Smith] and Mr. Murphy pointed out that the JCS and Defense were taking contradictory positions on the question of Colombian reimbursement. General Ridgway had informed Mr. Murphy that the JCS was ready to concur in any recommendation which the Department might make to reduce the Colombian payments while Mr. Kyes, on the other hand, had stated to the Acting Secretary that such payments could not be scaled down." (Secretary's Staff Meetings, lot 63 D 75)

The notes of the meeting also indicate that Acting Secretary Smith directed Mr. Murphy to draft a letter to Secretary of Defense Wilson to obtain a clarification of the matter, in order that the Secretary might be in a position to discuss it with Colombian Foreign Minister Sourdis at Caracas. No such letter was found, however, in Department of State files.

to go ahead this session on the combined bill to authorize transfer of military equipment to the ROK and settlement with the participating UN countries for logistic support." I suggest the following:

1. That Mr. Murphy telephone his counterpart in Defense with a view to getting a definite commitment from Defense that the Colombian Government would not be expected to pay more that the amount for which it has already been billed ($5,950,000).

2. I would urge, however, that we go ahead on legislation limited to UN participants (excluding ROKs) regardless of the response given to us by the Defense Department. While the problem of Colombian reimbursement is more immediate, there are other participants in Korea with whom negotiations are pending. Moreover, we should not lose sight of the fact that we are seeking legislation in order to implement the policy adopted by the NSC in July 1953. This policy has a two-fold purpose: (1) to permit reasonable settlements with participants in Korea at less than full reimbursement; and (2) "to obtain and retain the maximum contributions of effective manpower from nations allied with [the U.S.] in the effort of the UN to repel aggression in Korea." This means that we would want to have flexibility in offering financial inducements to present or future participants in Korea in order to maintain the present line or to increase UN contributions in the event of a renewal of aggression.

3. In the event we decide not to seek legislation, the Department should consider the advisability of informing the NSC that the policy adopted in July 1953 cannot be implemented under present circumstances.

4. I understand that there is a cleared State Department draft of legislation[3] limited to UN members which would be appropriate for submission immediately. Moreover, UNA and E have prepared a draft letter of transmittal[3] which could be sent with slight modification by the Department to the Vice President with a view to having the bill considered in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Dr. Chaves said he wished to convey a message to the Department from Amb. Zuleta relating to the problem of Colombian reimbursement for logistic support provided to its battalion in Korea by the U.S. He said that Amb. Zuleta had been told by the President at a White House tea, at which the For. Minister of Colombia was present, that a decision had been taken by the U.S. Government that no reimbursement was expected from the Colombian Government. Dr. Chaves went on to say that Secretary Dulles at Caracas had visited the Colombian Minister of Foreign Affairs and had made a similar statement to him. Dr. Chaves also said that Messrs. Cabot and Holland had likewise given similar assurances to Amb. Zuleta. In light of these commitments, Dr. Chaves said he was requesting that the Department put the above assurances in writing. Dr. Chaves also said that this matter has been under consideration within the U.S. Government for over a year and that in his view it cannot be left up in the air. He said that Amb. Zuleta intended to go to the President on this matter if necessary.

I said I was aware that we had informed the Colombian Government previously that we had the matter under consideration and that we were looking into ways in which the Colombian reimbursement problem might be solved. However, I was not aware of any specific commitment given to the Colombian Government which freed it entirely from reimbursing the U.S. I acknowledged that the matter had been under consideration for some time, and I indicated to him that the Department would give early consideration to his request for a written assurance.[1] legislation would be required to permit settlements at less than the full amount due. Although the Department offered a draft bill for this purpose, differences between Defense and the Budget Bureau prevented its presentation to the Congress at the last session.

In order to avoid waiting until the next session of Congress, we have developed a new approach to the legal question that may enable us to obtain an opinion from the Attorney General authorizing us to proceed without new legislation. After discussion with the Executive Secretary of the National Security Council,[2] it was recently decided that General Cutler, the President's assistant, and the Legal Adviser's office in the Department would raise the matter with the Attorney General. We hope this will be done in the next few days.

Until the Attorney General changes his position or, if necessary, new legislative authority is obtained, we cannot make a settlement with Colombia that involves even a partial write-down of its obligations for logistical support in Korea. While the Department will press for an early decision by the Attorney General, we do not know when he will give his answer or what it will be.

BOGOTÁ, December 2, 1954.

Subject: Colombian Interest in Further U.S. Military Assistance

Summary

The Colombian Government has repeatedly expressed its desire for additional military assistance from the United States. Requests of this nature may be made to Secretary of Defense Wilson when he visits Colombia in January 1955. In considering such a request, the Embassy recommends that certain factors be carefully examined. These factors include the recent interest of Colombia in seeking arms and military training from non-United States sources, and consequent disregard for arms standardization; the ability of Colombia to utilize increased amounts of military equipment; the effects of increased military expenditures on Colombia's economy; and political criticism, particularly by the Liberal Party, of United States military assistance to Colombia.

The visit to the United States of Foreign Minister Evaristo Sourdis, other recent reports of pending Colombian requests for large-scale additional grants of MDAP equipment and the probable motivation behind President Rojas Pinilla's invitation to U.S. Secretary of Defense Wilson to visit Colombia all highlight the interest of the Colombian Government in an expansion of its military facilities through U.S. assistance. It is, therefore, timely to examine the extent to which U.S. military assistance is fulfilling certain facets of U.S. military and political policy objectives in Colombia.

Arms Standardization

[Here follows discussion of Colombia's efforts to purchase arms and to secure military training in countries other than the United States.]

It is, therefore, evident that the Colombian Government is failing to fulfill completely the U.S. objectives of standardization of equipment and training. In addition to arms received from the U.S. or purchased in the U.S., Colombia is seeking military equipment and, to a lesser degree, military training and advice, from non-United States sources for a variety of reasons. These include such technical motives as prices, availability, and delivery terms and also, it is believed because certain non-United States sources provide more likely opportunities for remuneration in terms of kickbacks and "special commissions".

Utilization of MDAP Equipment

Despite the known desire of the Colombian Government to expand its military facilities, reasonable doubt exists as to its ability to absorb more rapidly greater quantities or more complicated types of military equipment. The degree of utilization of equipment furnished to date under the MDAP, particularly Army equipment, is not entirely satisfactory. Despite the fact that equipment for an antiaircraft automatic weapons battalion has long been furnished, the Colombian Army has not been able to organize this battalion on a satisfactory basis. The general level of education of the Army, particularly given the relatively short period of service of the recruits, the failure of the Armed Forces to provide an attractive career for enlisted men, especially those who receive technical training, psychological reasons inherent in the Colombian mentality, and the fact that the trained officer category of the Army has been utilized in civilian administrative positions by the Government of the Armed Forces have all contributed to this situation. Except for acquisition of two destroyers and limited numbers of small amphibious craft, Colombia, at present, cannot readily absorb large additional increases in U.S. military grant aid assistance.

Budgetary Burden Represented by Military Expenditures

During the last three years, expenditures on its armed forces by Colombia have increased dramatically. The following table gives in millions of pesos* military and total appropriations from 1952 through 1955:

Year	Military Appropriations (Armed Forces National Police)	Total Appropriations
1952	185.2	750.7
1953	255.4	943.5
1954 (thru Sept.)	307.4	1,129.7
1955 (initial budget)	243.0	939.2

To the 1954 military appropriations should be added 6,000,000 pesos for the Colombian Intelligence Service and a high percentage of the 17,400,000 appropriated for the Presidential Office. The 1955 figures are taken from the initial budget. Based on previous experience, supplementary budgets will increase these figures by anything up to 50 percent during the course of the year. The 1955 military appropriations cited do not include initial appropriations of 8,000,000 pesos for the Colombian Intelligence Service and 17,400,000 pesos for the Presidential Office. In addition to the figures cited, other military costs are scattered throughout other budget categories, particularly under Public Works, Colonization, etc.

Effects of Military Expenditures on Economic and Social Planning

The ever increasing military expenditures enumerated above raise a question concerning the ability of the Colombian economy to support the ambitious military programs of the present Government and at the same time carry out the policies of education, improvement in the standard of living, industrialization, diversification of the economy and other programs which support U.S. political, economic and social policy objectives in Colombia. The Colombian Government is a military government. There is no effective civilian counterbalance within it to the aspirations and desires of the military. Recent Colombian newspaper comment has pointed out the discrepancies between the economic and social needs of Colombia and the military burden she is required to support. An editorial in the November 30 El Tiempo commenting on the need for domestic Colombian efforts to improve her own lot following the Rio Conference stated "If we dream a senseless and vain dream of being a militaristic country with great armaments which are equally great anachronisms in this atomic era; if we play with great plans . . . and ignore the humble, hard and tremendous necessity of the Colombian people . . . then we are headed straight for a catastrophe."

Political Criticism of U.S. Military Assistance

The current U.S. policy of emphasizing the role of U.S. private investment in economic assistance to Latin America contrasts in the eyes of some segments of the Colombian population with our military assistance which of necessity is on a Government to Government basis. In Colombia the Liberal Party in particular has been the spokesman for that group which in its partisan press gives a distorted picture of U.S. policies towards Latin America. Dr. Eduardo Santos, ex-President of Colombia and owner of the influential Bogotá El Tiempo, emphasized this view in a speech he delivered during a conference on "Responsible Liberty" at Columbia University in October 1954. In his speech in New York, Dr. Santos said "In this era of the atomic bomb with these new and fabulously expensive arms, these systems based on thousands of millions, what are our poor countries going to do ruining themselves with armaments which would represent absolutely nothing in an international conflict? Then we are creating armaments insignificant in international life but crushing to the internal life of each country. Each country is being occupied by its own army."

Frequent reflections of this same opinion have appeared in the Liberal press. The Rio Conference and the consequent enumeration of domestic economic goals and of economic assistance desired from the U.S. have increased the number of these references.

The Liberal criticism of U.S. military assistance policies should not be taken entirely at its face value. To the Liberals, criticizing U.S. military assistance also represents a method of attacking the Government of the Armed Forces and of emphasizing the burden of military expenditures in Colombia at the cost of needed economic and social improvements. Nevertheless, these views are those of what is probably the majority party in Colombia and express in the only way possible under present censorship conditions the civilian reaction against the spendthrift military policies of the Government of the Armed Forces.

Conclusion

In considering further increases of military assistance to Colombia, therefore, both military and political considerations should be taken into account.

1. Militarily, the Embassy questions whether Colombia can effectively expand its military machine at a more rapid pace than is envisioned under the existing MDA program for Colombia.
2. It might be well to remind Colombia of the desirability of observing a greater degree of arms and personnel training standardization in the interests of continental defense than she has recently shown.

3. Economically, the Colombian economy is approaching the point where the military establishment can only be supported at the cost of needed social and economic advances.
4. Politically, there exists a danger of further alienating the Liberal Party by supplying large additional amounts of military equipment, and thus "abetting" Colombian militarism.

In view of the proposed visit of Secretary of Defense Wilson to Colombia in January 1955 (Department's Telegram No. 63 [62] of September 28, 1954[1] and Embassy's Telegram No. 86 of October 4, 1954[2]) it is suggested that the problems involved in increased military assistance to Colombia enumerated above be reviewed by the Department, and should the Department perceive no objection, be brought to the attention of Secretary Wilson prior to his departure for Colombia.

Memorandum by George O. Spencer of the Office of Regional American Affairs to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Sparks)

Colombia is receiving grant military assistance required to activate the following military units which Colombia has agreed, under a bilateral military assistance agreement and a secret military plan, to prepare and commit for collective hemisphere defense: one anti-aircraft battalion, one infantry battalion, two destroyers, two patrol craft, one fighter squadron and one light bomber squadron.

The Colombian commitment to designate the infantry battalion specified above for hemisphere defense was made very recently and the commitment made it possible for us to permit the Colombian battalion returning from Korea to retain military equipment in their possession valued at about $400,000.

Several months ago the Colombians submitted a note[1] which complained rather bitterly that Colombia had not received its fair share of U.S. military and economic assistance provided Latin American countries during the last few years. The Colombian Ambassador was informed that if he would indicate specifically the additional military equipment desired by Colombia, we would take the request under consideration in consultation with the Pentagon. About ten days ago we received a cable[1] from our Embassy at Bogota warning us that the

Colombians would submit a detailed list of equipment which, in the opinion of the Embassy and the U.S. military representatives in Colombia, had no relationship to Colombia's bona fide military requirements or capabilities for maintaining and using such equipment. Shortly afterwards we received a formal Colombian request[2] attaching several long lists of equipment which have been transmitted to the translators and duplicating people in the Department to be put in shape for submission to the Pentagon. The lists bear out our Embassy's view that the Colombians appear to be literally asking for the moon. Among other things they want equipment for several infantry units, a squadron or more of aircraft, a submarine, several destroyers, etc.

There is no money available out of existing appropriations to meet a request of this size submitted by any Latin American country. No final decision on the amount of money to be requested from the Congress for the Latin American program next year has been made, but preliminary plans for next year's program developed by the Pentagon call for no increase in the number of Colombian units to be supported by U.S. grant assistance. However, we understand that the Joint Chiefs plan to review the whole problem of grant assistance for Latin America and it is barely possible that they will recommend a small increase for Colombia, although it is extremely unlikely that they would approve anything like the increase desired by the Colombians.

Recommendations:

(1) The Colombian Ambassador may be informed that we do not have funds to comply with the Colombian request during the present fiscal year; (2) he may be told that the Pentagon and other concerned agencies are at present developing plans for foreign military assistance programs to be conducted during FY 1956 and that the Colombian request is being referred to the Pentagon for consideration in connection with the development of those plans; (3) it should be made plain to the Ambassador that if it is considered desirable from the U.S. military point of view to comply with the request, necessary funds will be required from our Congress next year; (4) the Ambassador should in no way be encouraged to believe that it will be possible for the U.S. to comply with the request.

POLITICAL, ECONOMIC, AND MILITARY RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND COSTA RICA[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 29, 1952.

Subject: Costa Rica's Desire to Purchase New Arms in the United States and Dispose of its Present Stock of Military Equipment

Participants: Ambassador Oreamuno of Costa Rica
Ambassador Albert F. Nufer, Director, MID

At the Cuban Embassy reception yesterday evening, Ambassador Oreamuno inquired about the latest developments with regard to Costa Rica's desire to purchase new arms in the United States and to dispose of its present stock of military equipment. He was particularly anxious to know when arrangements for the sale of the latter could be completed. I told the Ambassador that I would investigate and report back to him today.

In discussing this matter with Mr. Siracusa and Mr. Spalding, I learned that Defense had written Ambassador Oreamuno on January 12 listing the arms and equipment available and the cost thereof which, I understand, totals about $830,000. Defense asked the Costa Rican Government to place its order within thirty days for the equipment it desired to purchase. . . .

Ambassador Oreamuno telephoned me this morning and I told him that I understood he had received a letter from Defense to which a reply had not yet been received from his Government. I also said I had been informed that someone would be sent to Costa Rica as soon as possible to negotiate for the purchase of Costa Rica's present stock of arms. The Ambassador said that Costa Rica found itself in a vicious circle in so far as this problem was concerned; that his Government had been able to set aside $100,000 for the purchase of some of the equipment it most urgently needed, but that it would not be able to make out its order for transmission to Defense until it knew definitely what the proceeds from the sale of its present stock of arms would be. If these proceeds total $100,000 as he had heard they might, his Government could at once submit to Defense an order for $200,000 worth of new equipment which, he said, would take care of Costa Rica's most urgent requirements. In view of the thirty-day deadline specified in Defense's letter,[2] it was therefore extremely urgent that the person charged with arranging for the purchase of Costa Rica's present equipment proceed to San José without delay, and he expressed the hope that the Department would do whatever it could to hurry his trip.

DEAR ERNIE: I have no doubt that it still is the desire of the Department to bolster the Ulate Administration for the reason stated in your letter of last July 11.[1] That letter spoke of the basis on which the Department could support Costa Rican loan applications. I'm writing you now because of the change in the local attitude toward the need for loans and in line with your suggestion that we tell you of any ideas we might have to accomplish the Department's objective.

As you probably know, the IBRD mission that visited Costa Rica was of the general opinion that the country's financial position and outlook warrant the granting of loans up to an unstated amount. The Bank's reaction to Ambassador Oreamuno's attempt to discuss loans, however, caused deep resentment here with unfortunate reflections against us because of the fact that even among people who should know better (Mario Echandi,[2] for example) there is a conviction that the United States has practically a decisive voice in IBRD decisions. The Costa Rican decision to carry out its public works and agricultural development programs without IBRD assistance is sound even though it was prompted by resentment against the Bank's rebuff.

It is the present intention to apply to the Bank only for a loan for electric power development and at the present rate of progress such an application will not be ready for submission within several years.

I can't help but feel that the decision to discontinue negotiations with the Foreign Bondholders, an Ulate decision apparently reached in anger, was unwise if only for the reason that resumption of payments will continue to be a prerequisite of such a loan. As the opportunity offers we shall continue to point out the desirability of resuming payments on the foreign debt.

[2] Costa Rican Minister of Foreign Affairs.

From our position, slightly behind the eight ball because of IBRD's handling of Oreamuno, the situation appears about as follows. Ulate has spent the first two years of his term in doing a splendid job of recuperating the country's financial position. This sort of accomplishment does not impress Fulano de Tal, as Otilio knows, and so his plan for the last two years of his term is to accomplish things which will impress Fulano—a new airport, more roads, more schools, assistance toward improved and increased agricultural production, etc. He has until November 1953 to do that but the elections will be held by July 1953 at the latest.

There are indications that Figueres[3] is not as strong a candidate today as he was a few months ago but it would be unwise to underestimate his possibility of election.

There are several things we might concentrate on in the economic field during the time that is left to us to attain our objective.

1. Make our Point IV program effective to the extent that by the end of this year, 1952, we can point to accomplishments rather than plans. Toward this end I suggest you look over Ambassador Fleming's[4] despatch no. 828, January 16, 1952.[5] I understand that IIAA already is planning for local publicity and this work could be coordinated with 5 below.

2. Reexamine the Alajuela Airport project to determine how we can contribute to the fullest extent to the speedy construction under Costa Rican financing. Our Civil Aviation Mission (Mr. Vigna) already has suggested changes in the plans which will effect considerable savings in construction time and costs. Experts on other phases of the project might examine it to advantage. Advice and assistance on supplies and equipment might expedite work and effect savings.

3. Periodic reexamination of the Inter-American Highway project in Costa Rica with the ultimate objective of completion of as much of that work as funds possible to allot to it will permit by the end of the dry season in 1953.

4. (This is a tough one but with delicate handling may be possible now that Cía. Nacional's[6] position vis-à-vis the Government has improved so substantially during the last year.) Through three-way cooperation between the local Government, U.S. agencies in Washington, and Cía. Nacional, (1) attempt to evolve a long range electric power development program in spite of local apathy, (2) draw up plans and specifications for the necessary generating plant or plants, (3) work out a satisfactory plan for financing the plant, and, (4) assist within our possibilities in obtaining an IBRD loan authorization for the project.

If there is any possibility of accomplishing all this in one year the most positive contribution a third party could make perhaps would be to overcome some of the irritating antagonisms that now exist. There remains the possibility that technical problems would prevent completion in a year.

5. Conduct a sustained and discreet but effective publicity program in Costa Rica and designed for Costa Rica by OIE (in conjunction with IIAA) to keep pounding away on the main theme—United States contributions to the development of Costa Rica, where democratic principles now are being so well upheld. Do you recall a talk you and I had during your visit about direct application of OIE facilities in this field?

6. (This one is awfully vague.) Now that United Fruit is beginning to become aware of its need of a public relations program, it might be possible for the Department to point out to them how they might attempt to overcome some of the antagonism toward Cía. Bananera by showing how it contributes to the country's over-all development. We would not take part in their campaign.

The above program is ambitious and there is no guarantee that it would be successful. If it's worth trying, it will take concerted effort here, in the Department, and among the agencies that will be involved. Any chances of success would require a lot of time by someone who would be made responsible and see it through.

The Ambassador and Phil[7] agree that these thoughts might merit some consideration; we recognize that it is extremely vague.

Sincerely yours, FRED CUNNINGHAM

ARA—Mr. Miller
MID—Mr. Ohmans

The Ambassador called at his request to introduce Colonel Ventura, the Military Secretary to President Ulate and to discuss Costa Rica's desire to negotiate a Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement with the United States.

After commenting on the impressive ceremony at Arlington Cemetery where Colonel Ventura laid a wreath, and also upon the accident of President Ulate in the morning, the Ambassador inquired whether Mr. Miller knew of the note[2] which the Costa Rican Foreign Minister[3] had delivered to Ambassador Fleming concerning the Costa Rican desire for a military agreement. Mr. Miller said that he was familiar with the Costa Rican aspirations, but in all frankness he said that the United States could not take such an action at this time. He explained that in reality the United States and the Costa Ricans were talking about two different things when speaking about the proposed pact. He assumed that Costa Rica was principally interested in developing its force for the maintenance of internal security. He contrasted that desire with the agreements with such countries as Ecuador, Brazil, Peru, and Cuba for the preparation of forces to handle definite larger responsibilities with respect to the defense of the continent. Mr. Miller said for example that this included anti-aircraft battalions and air squadrons for missions outside their own countries.

However, Mr. Miller was happy to state that as a result of Costa Rica's request, the Departmental officials had been studying very seriously steps which could be taken to help Costa Rica, and he understood that it was possible for the Western Arms Co. to facilitate the purchase by Costa Rica of ammunition at a substantially lower price than had previously been offered. . . .

The discussion then turned to congressional legislation on the Inter-American Highway. Mr. Miller pointed out that progress thus far was quite satisfactory, and while it was not thought likely that the $8,000,000 a year would be authorized for the highway construction, it might well be that $6,000,000 would be approved by the congressional leaders. Ambassador Oreamuno was very pleased to hear this information and told Mr. Miller of Costa Rica's desire to accelerate construction work on the northern part of the highway, and affirmed once again that Costa Rica would put in $700,000 as its matching funds share for the construction work.

After the meeting the Ambassador and Colonel Ventura went to Mr. Ohmans' office where they were joined by Mr. Spalding. Mr. Spalding said that the Western Arms Co. was prepared to sell the Costa Rican Government the ammunition at a price considerably lower than the price which had been quoted by the Department of the Army. This news was received with much gratification by the Ambassador. In response to Mr. Spalding's request Ambassador Oreamuno promised to supply him with an exact list of the amounts of ammunition desired by his government.

Subject: Costa Rican Arms Exchange

Costa Rica finally has taken some definite action in the prolonged arms transaction. Legislative approval was obtained to sell arms up to the value of $100,000 to the Western Arms Corporation. At the moment, however, nothing more than the first shipment of $11,000 worth of antique and obsolescent arms can be shipped until suitable replacement material is received.

The matter has been pending since early in 1951 when Costa Rica desired assistance in obtaining arms from the United States. They did not have funds to purchase them, however. We offered our cooperation and even agreed to grant them a more than favorable price for their obsolescent arms to aid in the purchase. There has been a long delay on the part of Costa Rica in the sale of the old arms, and money originally budgeted for the purchase of arms in the United States was later taken from the budget to be used on public works projects.

[1] Addressed also to George O. Spencer of the Office of Regional American Affairs.

In April of this year we asked the Embassy four questions and a short time ago received these answers:

a. Ques. Does Costa Rica wish to purchase all or any part of the arms which the Army offered in accordance with its letter offer of August 30, 1951,[2] to Ambassador Oreamuno?

Ans. Yes. According to Oreamuno, Costa Rica is interested in purchasing the entire lot of arms listed on the enclosed[3] photostatic inventory which are valued at $224,579.50. However, in view of the fact no funds are available this fiscal year, the purchase cannot take place until some time after January 1, 1953. Ulate told Oreamuno he would ask Congress to appropriate the necessary funds at the start of the next fiscal year in January; however Ulate stipulated that he reserved the right to decide when he would place the order spending these funds. Oreamuno added that Congress would probably put a time limit of November 8, 1953 (Inauguration Day) on the spending of this special appropriation.

I advised Oreamuno that it is doubtful whether the Department of the Army will be able to continue to hold available that equipment which has been set aside for delivery to Costa Rica.

b. Ques. If Costa Rica does wish to purchase any or all of the arms, when can its letter of acceptance and payment be expected?

Ans. Not until sometime after January 1, 1953. Although Oreamuno feels that no difficulties or delays will be encountered when Ulate asks Congress for funds for new arms, past experience suggests that a month or more may be required to obtain Congressional approval. On this basis, funds conceivably would not be available until February or March, 1953.

c. Ques. If the arms are purchased, does Costa Rica wish to negotiate with the Western Arms Company for the purchase of the ammunition?

Ans. No. Despite the possibility of lower prices, both Ulate and Oreamuno feel that any purchase of new arms or ammunition should be made from the U.S. Government. Apparently, Ulate is fearful of adverse criticism resulting from any negotiations with a private firm for purchase of munitions, it being noted that previous Administrations have been heavily censored for alleged "dubious" transactions.

d. Ques. Does Costa Rica intend to sell all or any part of its old arms which were tentatively purchased by the representative of the Western Arms Company; if so, when and under what conditions will Costa Rica ship the $11,000 worth of antique rifles?

Ans. Yes. Present plans contemplate sale of all current arms to the Western Arms Corporation as authorized by the contract which was approved by Congress on July 28, 1952. This contract will expire on September 10, 1953. However, nothing more than the first shipment of $11,000 worth of antique arms can be sold until suitable replacement material is received.

The $11,000 worth of antique rifles will be shipped during the last week of August, 1952 according to Colonel Ventura.

Proposed Course of action—We should tell the Army the next time it inquires as to the disposal of the arms set aside for Costa Rica that the possible purchase of arms by Costa Rica is somewhat indefinite and the arms should be released. Costa Rica may seek some additional funds after January 1953 and may attempt to order arms later that Spring. Yet it seems reasonable to assume that the small amount of arms which Costa Rica desires to obtain can be obtained easily from stocks on hand and prepared for fairly prompt delivery.[4]

We may now with confidence sit back and wait further Costa Rican action. The record will show that we have endeavored to facilitate shipment of new arms to Costa Rica in every way that we can.

We can expect possible Costa Rican action early in 1953. At that late date I predict its officials will ask for arms on a rush basis to help assure order during the bitter campaign and vote election. It is also quite likely that there will be a continued effort on the part of Costa Rica to obtain free grant aid as part of the Military Aid Program.

Subject: Costa Rican Elections: Action Required by ARA

1. The presidential and congressional elections held in Costa Rica on July 26, 1953, were marked by orderliness, calm, and high voter participation. Women voted for the first time in Costa Rica, apparently about evenly divided between the two candidates. The Embassy reported the elections as "an example of democratic education rarely seen in Latin America or elsewhere and a tribute to the country's history and to President Ulate who maintained the highest degree of neutrality".

2. The elections resulted in an overwhelming victory for José Figueres and his National Liberation Party. Figueres was elected President by 121,108 votes against Castro's[1] 65,625 votes, 65% of the ballots cast. The National Liberation Party elected 30 of the 45 Deputies to Congress, against 11 for Castro's Democratic Party, 1 for National Union and 3 for National Independent Republicans. The opposition to Figueres is decimated and demoralized. Apart from Castro's overwhelming defeat, note must also be taken of the crash of Mario Echandi who joined forces with Castro but was able to elect only one deputy for his National Union Party.

3. On a plebiscite to change the Constitution, allowing an ex-President to be a candidate again after the lapse of one instead of two terms, the amendment was adopted by a vote of 110,049 to 47,230, or 70% of the ballots cast. This amendment is important, in that it opens the way for President Ulate to run again in 1958 instead of 1962.

4. The resounding victory of José Figueres enables him already to boast of the "mandate of the people". His sweeping control of the Congress will assure him a free hand to push through his own legislative program, prominent among which will probably be measures affecting the United Fruit Company, and the American and Foreign Power Company, the two leading American investments in Costa Rica.

Among many reasons for Figueres' victory are his vigorous two-year grass roots campaign and his appeal to the masses in promises of a better life; and the colorless, conservative character of Castro, handicapped by the taint of the "Calderonistas",[2] and standing on a negative platform of "anti-Figuerismo".

5. Figueres' triumph has been publicly applauded by the Guatemalan Foreign Minister[3] and privately deplored by Somoza.[4] No reaction from Honduras, El Salvador, and Panama has come to notice, but all three governments are (in an ascending scale) apprehensive of Figueres as a "stirrer-up of trouble" in Central America.

6. Predictions of Figueres' defeat or narrow victory having proven false, the net result is a striking advance for leftist liberalism in Central America, with its well-known implications on relations with the dictator countries, Caribbean stability, and large American investments. Whether it will mean Communist progress remains to be seen; Figueres' party led the successful movement to outlaw the disguised Communist Party in Costa Rica and, for whatever motives of political expediency or political sincerity, proclaims an anti-Communist platform. The Communists supported the conservative Castro in the campaign.

7. Figueres has already taken steps to reassure our Ambassador that he is anti-Communist and citing as proof his move to outlaw the Communist Party, both in 1948 and 1953, and the label of "Yankee agent" put on him by the Communist press of Guatemala. He repeated that he is pro-U.S., and says there is no reason why he cannot be anti-United Fruit Company on its contracts in Costa Rica and friendly to the American Government and people at the same time.

8. The inauguration of Figueres as President will take place on November 8, 1953, one week after Panama's Fiftieth Anniversary of Independence. Since this date is approximately three months away, we should give immediate consideration and prompt action to the following:

Nomination of American Ambassador to Costa Rica.[5] Assignment of well qualified FSO as Deputy Chief of Mission (to arrive about October).

Organization of delegation to inauguration. (Perhaps some of delegation to Panama can attend Costa Rica's inauguration.)[6]

It is suggested that these points be reviewed as soon as possible and MID/P will be glad to have the opportunity to discuss them with you.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 4, 1953.

Subject: United Fruit Company Officials Describe their Operations in Costa Rica

Participants: The Under Secretary[1]
Messrs. Joseph Montgomery (Vice President), Kenneth H. Redmond (President) and Jefferson Coolidge (Chairman of the Board)—United Fruit Company
Charles R. Burrows, Director, MID

Mr. Montgomery suggested that Mr. Redmond describe to the Under Secretary his recent conversation in Costa Rica with President-elect Figueres. Mr. Redmond stressed throughout his discussion of this conversation the apparent change in the direction of a more pronounced extremism in Figueres' attitude toward the Fruit Company. Figueres made it clear to Redmond that his intention first is to increase income tax rates from their present 15% maximum to a 30% maximum for Costa Ricans and to 40% or 50% for the Company. As far as the Quepos area is concerned, where the Company is now growing crops other than bananas, Mr. Redmond said he was told it would be expropriated. Figueres said the Company owes a great deal of money in back taxes but that the Government will give the Company a receipt for these taxes and "one dollar" in return for these lands. In reply to suggestions by Mr. Redmond that the action Figueres had outlined would be violations of the Company's contract, Figueres said much has happened since that contract was signed and that he will have only a four-year term of office during which he has much to accomplish.

Mr. Montgomery produced a copy of The New Leader of August 31, 1953, which contained an article by Figueres; he described the article as setting forth Figueres' attitude toward foreign capital as a short-term loan and not a permanent investment.

The Under Secretary asked how much the Company could "take" and what they thought Figueres really intends to do. No direct answer was given to the first question; Mr. Coolidge, however, said that whatever the Company accepts in Costa Rica it will be under pressure to accept in other countries where they have holdings. He said they expect Figueres to advance demands which the Company will have to refuse, and then to instigate labor troubles which will lead to progressive stoppage of operations. The result would be extremely costly to both the Company and the country but he said the Company would win out if it is forced into "economic warfare".

The Under Secretary made reference to the difficulty of effective counter action and asked what the Fruit Company representatives had to suggest. Mr. Coolidge spoke of the desirability and urgency of an official statement, not directed against Figueres, but emphasizing the sanctity of contracts. (He left a suggested draft of a paragraph[2] along these lines with Mr. Burrows.) The Under Secretary expressed his distaste for public statements of this kind without more effective action of some other kind to back them up, but said that at least that much could be done. All three of the Company representatives said they did not expect more at this time and that their position would be strengthened if they could refer to moral support of this kind at an opportune moment. There ensued some discussion of the desirability of conveying a private message to Figueres with reference to the interest of the Department of State in proper and fair treatment of American investments abroad, to the importance of economic cooperation and to the sanctity of contracts in general. It was agreed that if this is to be done it should be accomplished before Figueres' inauguration and before his inaugural address.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 17, 1953.

Subject: Departmental Action Supporting United Fruit Company Negotiations with Costa Rica.

Discussion:

Three top officials of the United Fruit Company informed you on September 4 of the expected contract difficulties with President-elect Figueres of Costa Rica. They urged that this Government make an official statement prior to Figueres' inauguration emphasizing the sanctity of contracts which would give moral support at least to the Company's contract position; and that this same attitude be brought privately to Figueres' attention.

ARA believes that Figueres will attempt to renegotiate the 1949 contract for more national advantages. While Figueres believes that new conditions should bring about changes in contracts, he is nevertheless on record as favoring prompt and effective compensation in case of any nationalization of foreign-owned properties. Figueres may be willing to compromise on his extreme demands. However, should negotiations fail, he may be expected to increase United Fruit's taxes in violation of the Company-Government contract. There is also some reason to believe that the Company may be disposed to compromise with Figueres.

Recommendation:

Your approval of the following courses of action is recommended:[2]

(a) I intend to make speeches on October 9[3] and 14[4] which will provide a forum for a reference to this Government's traditional view on the sanctity of contracts.

(b) Mr. Burrows, MID Office Director, and Congressman Donald Jackson will visit Costa Rica on October 24 as one stop on an area-wide trip. A meeting with Figueres will be arranged, and the United States position on the sanctity of contracts and compensation in the event of expropriation will be explained to the President-elect in a way which, it is hoped, will help to facilitate an amicable arrangement between Costa Rica and the United Fruit Company.

(c) As an alternative, or in addition to (b) above, Mr. Allan Stewart,[5] FSO–2, who is being assigned to Costa Rica as Deputy Chief of Mission, and who will arrive there about October 15, will be instructed to call on Figueres and exchange views with him on the Fruit Company problems prior to the inauguration.

Editorial Note

In his inaugural address, delivered on November 8, 1953, President Figueres stated that the Costa Rican Government planned to review its relations with the United Fruit Company. He also proposed the renegotiation of the Company's contract, which had been signed in 1948 and was not scheduled to expire until 1988. 811.05118/11–1653

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 18, 1953.

Subject: United Fruit Company in Costa Rica.

I am inclined to agree with Mr. Woodward's points in the attached memo.[2]

It is to be noted that we have steadily urged the United Fruit Company to adopt a broadminded attitude with regard to Figueres' demands. On October 10, for example, I emphasized this to Mr. Coolidge, Chairman of the Board of the United Fruit, as well as to Mr. McClintock.[3] They are fully aware of our view that it is better that they bend before they are broken, and I trust that they share this view at least within limits.

I have also told Ambassador Hill to remind Figueres of the desirability of negotiating an agreed settlement with the United Fruit Company. It seems to me that our attitude should be that we want an agreed settlement rather than an arbitrary stand by either party which, as Mr. Fishburn points out,[4] would place us in an embarrassing position.

I question whether we are in a position to determine the equities of the situation and whether we should make such a determination even if we could. If the position of the United Fruit Company were clearly an abuse, then I think we should strongly urge them to change it but, since it rests on a perfectly valid contract which is not demonstrably unfair to Costa Rica, I do not feel that we should go further than I have suggested above.

Clearly the United Fruit Company is in a different position from the oil companies in that the oil companies are taking a government-owned asset from the ground. The Fruit Company has to buy the land which it uses and pay all costs of improving it and producing the bananas. It takes nothing permanently from the country. To my mind it is questionable whether the mere right to produce bananas in a given country is necessarily equivalent to all the costs and risks of producing them. There is, moreover, the question of whether the rules of the

[2] In the referenced memorandum, which is undated, Deputy Assistant Secretary Woodward stated in part that he doubted if it was "feasible for the State Department to suggest a specific type of business settlement between the United Fruit Co. and the Costa Rican Government." He also stated that the "magical sound" of a 50–50 profit split could easily turn out to be "something of a delusion" for Costa Rica.

[3] John G. McClintock, Assistant Vice President, United Fruit Company.

[4] In a memorandum, dated Nov. 16, 1953, attached to the source text, but not printed, Mr. Fishburn recommended that Assistant Secretary Cabot should attempt to persuade United Fruit Company officials to accept the idea of a 50–50 split of net profits with the Costa Rican Government.

game should be unilaterally changed in a major degree against an American company after it has made a bona fide investment; in this respect it is the reverse of the argument which the Latin Americans use about our tariffs.

I understand that the Fruit Company plans to offer Honduras whatever concessions it makes to Costa Rica, so the question of discrimination against countries will presumably not arise.

Beyond urging the two parties to get together for an agreed settlement, I feel that we can watch the course of the negotiations and decide what to do as the negotiations develop. Due to the deplorable public relations of the United Fruit Company, I quite agree that we should be subjected to quite a lot of criticism in Latin America regardless of what happens. I repeat that I do not feel we should uphold the United Fruit Company in anything which appears abusive, but I do feel that the Company has legitimate rights which we should not prejudice ourselves or permit others to prejudice inequitably.

[1] President Figueres' expropriation plan, as reported in despatch 389, from San José, dated Nov. 20, 1953, not printed (811.05118/11-2053), proposed the Costa Rican Government's purchase of United Fruit Company's physical assets in Costa Rica, amortized over a 12–14-year period, and an arrangement whereby the Costa Ricans would produce the bananas and United Fruit would market them in the United States.

[2] Despatch 389, which contains a summary of a meeting held on Nov. 19, 1953, reads in part as follows: "Ambassador Hill, in the conversation, told the President that he was instructed to closely observe the United Fruit problem but that it was a matter for the government and the company to resolve. If the negotiations became stalemated, the Embassy would be willing to do what it could to get things moving again, but that it was taking no sides in the matter."

I see no advantage for Figueres want Embassy carry this message unless for future exploitation in press but Esquivel, by placing it on personal basis, makes turn-down difficult. I perfectly willing advise Hamer[3] of United Fruit that government wants begin negotiations as Stewart and I agree it unlikely we can remain aloof from this problem, but prefer Department express its views soonest.[4]

Every indication government will drive hard bargain. On November 23, Official Gazette published text projected expropriation law which when passed (Esquivel says quick passage by Congress certainty) would give government right expropriate property with little recourse appeal. Esquivel frankly admitted it presented in Congress as means pressuring Fruit Company.[5]

SAN JOSÉ, February 9, 1954.

On February 6, President José Figueres received Ambassador Hill and the reporting officer at the Casa Presidencial. A Memorandum of Conversation, largely self-explanatory, is enclosed.

It was the feeling of Ambassador Hill and the writer that the President's attitude toward United Fruit Company and U.S. private investment had softened considerably. Ambassador Hill, reporting on his trip to Washington, spoke frankly of don Pepe's detractors on Capitol Hill, information which amply confirmed what had been told him innumerable times before by the Ambassador and the writer.

It is felt that President Figueres has received the friendly advice in the spirit given and is altering his attitude in order to conform to the realities of U.S. policies.

The conversation was carried out in a completely friendly and frank atmosphere and the President's attitude was in sharp contrast to that of last November when he lashed out at United Fruit and became notably agitated when discussing the possibility of attending the Caracas Conference[1] while the Perez Jiménez regime "tortured and killed" his friends.

President José Figueres expressed a desire to talk with Ambassador Hill following his return from the United States and on February 6 a meeting was held at the Casa Presidencial.

Congressional Attitude Toward Figueres

Ambassador Hill expressed his pleasure at being back in Costa Rica and told the President he would be pleased to give him his impressions of the visit to Washington if the President was interested. He said he was considerably surprised by the attitude of certain Congressmen who criticized President Figueres for his stand on United Fruit Company and the failure of Costa Rica to make its stand known on attending the Caracas Conference. The President's views on private investment, as published in the New Leader and made during the presidential campaign, Ambassador Hill said, caused resentment in certain congressional circles.

The President listened attentively, and when Ambassador Hill was finished said he was glad to receive this frank information. He stated that his feeling toward private investment was completely misunderstood in the United States and was due in a large measure to the title put on the New Leader article. He pulled out a letter written to that magazine, mildly complaining that his heading, "A Bold New Program," had been changed to "We Do Not Want Foreign Investments." In the letter he asked the magazine to publish excerpts from his inaugural address to clarify his position.

"For us to not want private investment would be completely crazy," the President said.

He then went on to say that a liberal government such as his would always be criticized by certain Congressmen and others of an extremely conservative bent. He said he realized that his socially inclined government would be accused of being communistic. "I do not get mad at them," the President stated. "One has to be very patient with those kind of people, who generally mean well." He stated that he was convinced that there were no more than five per cent of this type of thinkers who really thought U.S. business should completely control Latin America.

Inter-American Highway

The Ambassador then outlined in detail the thinking of the House Appropriations Committee on the Inter-American Highway. He said that during his testimony before this group that the chairman was openly hostile to appropriating further funds for the road. A more moderate member (Rep. Frank Bow, Ohio), suggested that a sub-committee from the group visit Costa Rica to see the highway and that he (the Ambassador) had forwarded an invitation asking it to come sometime in February.

The President said he was very anxious to have the group visit Costa Rica. Not only would it see what great strides were taken by the Public Roads Administration but also it would give him an opportunity to set the boys straight on his economic philosophy. The President stated that he would personally devote much of his time to the sub-committee during its visit in Costa Rica.

International Bank Loans

The President was interested in news from the International Bank on a $15,000,000 loan for Costa Rica. Ambassador Hill stated that he had talked with Eugene Black, President of IBRD, who expressed interest in the affair and planned to visit Costa Rica around February 25.

The President was pleased to hear this and at the Ambassador's suggestion promised to instruct his various ministers to have detailed studies available for the IBRD head. The President reiterated that he wanted the loan for (1) hydroelectric projects; (2) improvement of secondary roads, and (3) for refinancing and completion of the El Coco airport.

Plans are drawn for the hydroelectric projects. The President's idea regarding secondary roads is to use $2,500,000 for improving some 2,000 kilometers of roads now in use. He said that most of these feeder roads were impassable in wet weather and terribly dusty in the dry months. By surfacing them they would become all-weather arteries and enable farmers and ranchers to reach the main highways.

The President confirmed what everybody knows at present: the El Coco airport cannot be finished until the government obtains more money. This is a field that will replace the present La Sabana airport in San José, which accommodates nothing larger than two-engine planes.

The President repeated that Black's visit would give him a chance to set the record straight on his feeling toward private investment in this country.

United Fruit Company

The President was asked about the United Fruit situation and he began by saying that he had had to settle the strike which tied up operations in the Puerto González area for some weeks. He said negotiations for revision of the present contracts were progressing favorably both in San José and in Washington. The company representative here, Walter Hamer, was in contact with Minister of Finance Jorge Rossi, and the latter had received the terms of the Baggett offer the day before. He added that Foreign Minister Mario Esquivel and Sam Baggett, general counsel of United Fruit, had met several times in Washington.

The President seemed quite pleased that negotiations were moving along and the Ambassador and Stewart had a feeling the company and government were not too far apart on the financial aspects of an agreement. Figueres indicated that the company was willing to waive exemption on several items now imported duty-free and he stated that the government would impose a ridiculously small duty on such items as fertilizer, materials for insecticides, etc. The President quite contentedly said this would be the beginning of an ending of discriminations in favor of United Fruit Company, but he said the period of transition would continue for some years.

The President's reasoned attitude and apparent delight that United Fruit was cooperating satisfactorily in the negotiations contrasted greatly with that of a few months ago, when he bitterly complained of a "country within a country," and described Baggett as a "fiera."

The President said he was still studying a reply to United Fruit's letter[2] of last month. In view of Ambassador Hill's adverse report on the feeling toward him on Capitol Hill, he said he would re-state his attitude on nationalization as well as rights of private investment, and investment itself, when he made his reply.

[2] A copy of the referenced letter, from Walter Hamer to President Figueres, dated Jan. 18, 1954, is contained in MID files, lot 57 D 15, "Costa Rica—United Fruit Company, 1954".

Both Ambassador Hill and the writer were completely astounded by all the sweetness and light. All of it could not have been the result of February 6 being his wedding day.

Dominican Charges

President Figueres said Trujillo's charges of harboring communists was part of a campaign by the dictators to discredit his government. However, he said that Luis Alberto Monge, ORIT Secretary General, had reported that the communists planned to concentrate their labor activities in Costa Rica and Chile and to that end, planned to bring into his country some 20 agitators. The President said Trujillo might have got wind of this move. In any event, the President stated, he would welcome any information Trujillo had and a close watch would be kept on commie activity in the country.

Caracas Conference

With regard to the Caracas Conference, the President said that his country would make its decision about attendance when Foreign Minister Esquivel returned from his trip to the United States. Esquivel was expected in San José around February 10.

The President inquired whether there was any indication that the Perez Jiménez regime would release all political prisoners before the meeting was held. He was told that there was no such indication and it was the Embassy's opinion that any move of this nature would not occur. He said he had heard no more than 200 prisoners were released in the New Year's amnesty and asked whether we had received any estimate. He was told his estimate was higher than ours.

The President was told that the U.S. would present some rather far-reaching economic proposals at the conference and that the Guatemalan situation undoubtedly would be aired. The presence of Costa Rica at the conference would be important in view of these topics, the President was told.

The President made no comment except to state that morality in the hemisphere was at a pretty low ebb at this time.

Lack of Latin American Statesmen

The report of Labor Minister Juan Lechin's resignation from the Bolivian cabinet was brought to the President's attention and he said this development might weaken the Paz Estenssoro government. However, he said, the government would be better off with Lechín in an opposition role, as long as it didn't bring about Paz' downfall. As in the past, he spoke deprecatingly of Lechín, crediting him with little intelligence. "He was just a football player," said the President, which got a big laugh from a couple of broken-down U.S. athletes.

Seriously speaking, the President declared, statesmanship in Latin America was at a pretty low ebb at this time. [Here follow personal remarks.]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 12, 1954.

DEAR HENRY: I am greatly interested in your letter of March 15, 1954,[2] which I have now read on my return from Caracas. The views of Pedro Estrada, Chief of the National Security of the Venezuelan Government, on the dangers of Communist activities in the Caribbean area, merit careful consideration, as was indicated by the favorable impression he made on you and the Secretary.

The question of whether the Venezuelan Accion Democratica leader, Romulo Betancourt,[3] and other members of that party, are Communists is one which has been carefully studied in this Department, and although our conclusions do not agree with Estrada's, there are undoubtedly reasons which support his case. As for the situation in Costa Rica, we do not regard Figueres as a Communist himself or that his well-known friendship with Betancourt is ground for the charge of Communist sympathies.

There is a long history of charges and defenses on both sides of this question; the available evidence has been reviewed from time to time by the Department and intelligence agencies of our Government, and in balance simply does not support the conclusion that Figueres is a Communist, or even ideologically favorable to Marxism. His program is basically nationalistic and partially socialist, but he and his party have consistently fought the Communists. The Costa Rican legislature, under leadership of the Figueres forces, outlawed the Communist Party in 1953, before Figueres was inaugurated as President. Figueres has also sought to persuade President Arbenz of Guatemala to alter his course of encouragement to the Communists in that country.

Many exiled members of the Venezuelan Accion Democratica Party are living in Costa Rica, and it is known that some of them return to Venezuela from time to time as underground agents, since their party has been outlawed since 1948; but any real alliance between the Accion Democratica and the Communist Parties as such has not been established, although there are cases of direct collaboration between individual party members.

It is my belief that, while distinctions between extreme leftist parties and the Communists are often fluid, we should exercise caution against judging leftist leaders such as Betancourt or Figueres as Communists. This identification is made by some Venezuelan officials, but we must recognize that from their viewpoint the Communist Party and the Accion Democratica Party are both enemies. Accion Democratica is not considered here to be an enemy of the United States.

We are studying every means of solution to the Guatemalan problem, which you saw has considerable potential dangers. The support of the rest of the hemisphere is essential to our purposes, and we believe that Costa Rica may go along with further inter-American decisions. Although Costa Rica did not attend the Caracas Conference, Figueres sent his Ambassador in Washington to call on the Secretary after the conference to assure him of Costa Rica's support of the anti-Communist resolution. It is under this resolution that any specific steps affecting Guatemala would most probably be taken.

Your support at Caracas was invaluable. We need and count on it in facing our problems in Latin America.

Sincerely yours, HENRY F. HOLLAND

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 19, 1954.

Subject: United Fruit Negotiations with Government of Costa Rica.

Participants: Mr. Thomas Corcoran, Attorney for United Fruit Company
Mr. Joseph Montgomery, Executive Vice President, United Fruit Co.
Mr. Henry F. Holland

Today at the invitation of Mr. Thomas Corcoran I lunched with him and with Mr. Joseph Montgomery in a private room at the Carlton Hotel. They wanted to discuss negotiations beginning next week between the United Fruit Company and the Costa Rican Government regarding an amendment of the contract between the two. Mr. Corcoran asked that I report the substance of the conference to General Smith.

Mr. Corcoran stated that a number of the Company's Board of Directors were frightened by the prospects of oppressive moves by the Costa Rican Government and anxious to reach an agreement on amendments to the contract even if it required substantial concessions.

The United Fruit negotiating team is composed of its local manager in San José, Mr. Sam Baggett, its General Counsel, and Mr. Joseph Montgomery, its Executive Vice President. Mr. Corcoran said that he feared that the first two reflected the views of the conciliatory group referred to above, whereas Mr. Montgomery and he, as one of the Company's lawyers, felt that the Company should not be quick to reach an agreement and should hold out for more favorable terms.

Mr. Corcoran said that within the next few days General Cutler would invite me to have dinner with him and with a Mr. Coolidge, the Chairman of the Company's Board of Directors. He urged, first, that I attempt to have Mr. Montgomery included at that dinner and, second, that I recommend there that the Company take its time in the Costa Rican negotiations and not be quick to reach a settlement.

I said that within the limits of courtesy, if an opportunity presented itself, I would be glad to suggest that Mr. Montgomery as one of the members of the negotiating team be included in the dinner.

As regards recommending a firm attitude at the negotiating table, I replied that it seemed to me unwise for a representative of the Government to be urging officers of any American company to take any particular attitude in their substantive negotiations with a foreign government. If we do, and if the results are unfavorable to the Company, we will obviously be held to blame.

As a lawyer I have at one time or another done some negotiating with representatives of Latin American governments, and I expressed the purely personal opinion to Mr. Montgomery that if you go into one of these negotiating sessions with the idea that you have to reach a quick solution you are liable to make a poor settlement. The Latin American government officials are usually prepared for a somewhat long session, and in my personal opinion the American businessman should be prepared for the same thing.

I said that I felt that the first responsibility of the Department of State was to attempt to serve the interests of our Government. However, I recognized that a very important secondary responsibility was to further the legitimate interests of American business abroad. I said that in the discharge of that important secondary responsibility we would stand ready to do anything that we properly can to help the Company in its negotiations. In this connection I said that if, after a reasonable period of negotiation, it was apparent that the two parties were making no headway, we would be glad to consider the advisability of asking Ambassador Hill on an informal basis to see if he couldn't suggest to the Costa Rican Government the desirability of a more flexible attitude on their part.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 27, 1954.

Subject: Military Assistance Agreement with Costa Rica

Participants: Ambassador Antonio A. Facio of Costa Rica;
Mr. Henry F. Holland, Assistant Secretary, ARA;
Mr. John L. Ohmans, MID

Ambassador Facio was invited to call on Mr. Holland to receive a note from the Department in reply to the note of the Embassy of Costa Rica of April 16.[2] The note which Mr. Holland intended to deliver, but did not,[3] expressed the inability of the United States Government to enter into negotiations for a military assistance agreement with Costa Rica but indicated that the United States was prepared to sell arms to Costa Rica on a reimbursable basis.

Ambassador Facio's reaction to the proposed note and statement was immediate and vehement. Upon reading the note, he said this would fall like a bombshell in Costa Rica and that it would be very poorly received and misunderstood by the ordinary people. He took particular exception to the statement which said that a military defense assistance agreement could not properly be undertaken with Costa Rica. Mr. Ohmans attempted to explain to the Ambassador the meaning of that sentence and said that the Joint Chiefs of Staff had certain plans about the defense of the hemisphere and that the size and nature of the military forces in Costa Rica were not of the type which would fit into the plans of the American military planners.

The Ambassador said that he could understand that point of view but he felt that Costa Rica should not be discriminated against and that, if an agreement were negotiated with Nicaragua, the United States should also negotiate a similar agreement with Costa Rica to avoid this discrimination. He said that it was still very urgent that a public statement be made which would indicate the readiness of the Government of the United States to consider the request of the Government of Costa Rica to enter into negotiations with the United States. The Ambassador was relatively pleased about the references in the proposed note regarding the willingness of the United States to sell military equipment to Costa Rica under the terms of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act,[4] and he asked that a note[5] be sent to his Government referring specifically to that point.

Mr. Holland admitted to Ambassador Facio that he saw the merits of the Ambassador's point of view, and he said that he would discuss once again with the officials in the Department of Defense the possibility of making a public statement which would indicate that the United States is disposed to consider the negotiation of a military assistance agreement with Costa Rica. At the same time, he and the Ambassador could understand clearly that the chances of an agreement eventually being reached would be very unlikely. Mr. Holland asked the Ambassador whether the reaction later in Costa Rica, when the United States had to tell that Government that it was not prepared to negotiate an agreement, would be as serious or more serious than the reaction which Ambassador Facio now felt would come about.

The Ambassador believed that the reaction at some time in the future would not be a serious one, especially after the current difficulties between Costa Rica and Nicaragua[6] had calmed down.

The meeting concluded with Mr. Holland's promise to Ambassador Facio that he would discuss with the military officials the possibility of a statement being made regarding the disposition of the United States to talk to Costa Rica about a military assistance agreement.[7]

[5] On Apr. 30, 1954, Deputy Assistant Secretary Woodward handed Ambassador Facio a note of the same date which stated that the Department would be glad to consider a Costa Rican request for the purchase of arms under current legislation (718.5 MSP/4–1554).

[6] These difficulties stemmed in part from Nicaraguan President Anastasio Somoza's accusation against President Figueres and other high Costa Rican officials of complicity in an abortive attempt on President Somoza's life on Apr. 4, 1954. The resulting tension between the two countries, exacerbated by periodic border incidents and charges of hostile political activity, continued throughout 1954. For additional documentation, see pp. 847 ff. and 1378 ff.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 7, 1954.

Subject: United Fruit Company Loan of $1 million to Costa Rica

Participants: Mr. Sam Baggett, Vice President, United Fruit Company
MID—Mr. Leddy

Mr. Baggett telephoned from Boston and said that, since the new contract between UFCO and the Costa Rican Government was signed on Friday, June 4,[1] the company would now consider Figueres' request for a loan of $1 million, as an advance against future taxes, and possibly to be followed up by another loan of an equal amount later on. He wanted to know whether the Department had any objections.

I told Mr. Baggett that I felt sure that the Department's position would be the same now as it was when he raised this subject two weeks ago, namely, that the loan should be divorced from the contract, and immediate action in granting it need not be taken. He confirmed that divorcement had been made, and the contract signed without any reference to the loan; nevertheless, Figueres was ready to press for the loan and the company would not wish to antagonize him under present conditions when they have just achieved a substantial agreement which they hope will endure—Figueres could, for instance, easily stir up labor trouble on the west coast. I replied that, although the company's position could be clearly understood, our reasons for desiring no immediate action should be of equal importance to the company and had been outlined in a conversation between Mr. Holland and Mr. McClintock on Saturday morning, June 5, of which he, Mr. Baggett, was not yet apprised. I indicated that in the present circumstances in Central America we felt it desirable not to accede at once to petitions from Figueres, but to hold in abeyance all pending matters in order to get a clear idea first of where his Government will stand on the several highly important pending questions hinging around Guatemala. The action of UFCO's Executive Committee, today, could easily be one of postponement of final decision; and thereafter, it could surely be possible to postpone action. Mr. Baggett said he felt he understood and would be in Washington tomorrow to discuss the matter further.

[1] A copy and translation of the amended contract were transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 920, dated June 15, 1954, not printed (811.05118/6–1554).

SECRET OFFICIAL–INFORMAL [WASHINGTON,] July 7, 1954.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: Developments over the Fourth of July weekend[1] regarding Costa Rica's arms purchases have made it important that you have a clear idea of the Department's line of thinking on this matter. You will recall from the earlier telegrams that the Department refrained from expediting the shipment of arms which Costa Rica purchased in order to be able to count on the support of the Costa Ricans at the then planned OAS consultative meeting on Guatemala.[2] You realize, of course, that the press release which the Costa Ricans made on this matter had unfortunate aspects, especially on Venezuela and Nicaragua. Now that the Costa Ricans have gone ahead and made this public announcement the United States is, as is too often the case, in the middle.

We here had to explain to both Venezuela and Nicaragua that we had finally consented to the delivery of the arms in an effort to secure the goals that they are also seeking (the departure of Betancourt; the vote in the meeting of consultation; an affirmative action against Arbenz in Guatemala). Now Figueres' public statements make it look as if the shipment of arms to Costa Rica is action by the United States against Nicaragua and Venezuela.

In the event we are asked up here about the shipment we intend to say simply that this is a commercial transaction being directed through one phase of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act legislation and that Costa Rica is paying for the arms and is flying them to their country at their own expense.

There is some assurance from Ambassador Whelan in Managua and Ambassador Sevilla-Sacasa[3] up here that the Nicaraguans are unconcerned about the shipment, although naturally nettled about the political approach which Figueres is taking. Venezuela is a bit more difficult to understand. The plane flight over San Jose was extremely ill advised in our estimation and their representatives in Washington and in Caracas appear to take Figueres, Costa Rica, and Betancourt as their principal enemies of the moment.

With regard to Betancourt I can assure you that Venezuela is definitely out to make life miserable for him. Of course that is no secret, but in making life difficult for Betancourt they are also making life difficult for Figueres and for Costa Rica. This Henry Holland has already pointed out to Ambassador Facio, and for your background information, the Ambassador has agreed completely. He has told us that he will tell Foreign Minister Esquivel to get Betancourt to leave Costa Rica.

You have a far better knowledge of how effective Dr. Facio is with his Foreign Office. We are inclined to think that it isn't much. However, it would be useful up here to know whether Facio has really made any approach to his Foreign Office or to President Figueres about the disturbing effects about having Betancourt in San Jose. This I know you can handle in your own casual and effective way.

Switching to another subject—referred to in the Department's telegram No. 5 to San Jose[4]—we recognize that the Justice Department action re UFCO may look bad from your point of view. On the other hand, this action proves to the world that the position of the United States regarding Guatemala was not dictated by the United Fruit Company and had nothing to do with that issue. From that angle it was extremely well timed. However, we had nothing to do with the Department of Justice action either to hurry it or to delay action at this moment. The Department of Justice was acting on its own volition, and except for the effort last year, we in the Department of State made no attempt to intervene in any way. There is also attached[5] for your information an editorial from today's Washington Post on the United Fruit Company.

I also have your letter[6] regarding Congressman Sikes' visit.[7] That trip is on once again and no doubt you will receive a revised schedule and probably be hearing from him. [Here follow further comments about Congressman Sikes.]

Sincerely yours, JOHN L. OHMANS

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 9, 1954—9:10 a. m.

Subject: Costa Rican Situation

Participants: American Ambassador Robert C. Hill—San José, Costa Rica
Assistant Secretary Henry F. Holland

Ambassador Hill telephoned Mr. Holland and asked if he had received . . . cables[2]. . . . Mr. Holland had not.

Ambassador Hill reported on developments up to seven o'clock last night. He said the information was from the two top men in the government. They had told him that Somoza was moving troops to the frontier; that they were going to make landings at El Coco and Sabena, the airport in the city; that the plan is to attack the presidential palace, garrison, the gas depots, railroads and cut communications to the north; that they also planned to try and suck troops from San José up to the border, leaving the area around San José open territory. Up until seven o'clock the Costa Ricans did not know the date of the proposed invasion. Ambassador Hill said Ambassador Whelan in Managua had suggested a meeting at the border between representatives of the two countries. President Somoza said he couldn't remain President unless President Figueres goes.

Ambassador Hill reported then on developments from seven o'clock to ten o'clock last night. He said President Figueres called him to the presidential residence last night and said that he had just received a cable from Managua stating that there would be an air attack on Costa Rica last night. (Ambassador Hill said it was now seven o'clock in the morning and nothing had happened. The lights were shut off at 2:00 a.m. There was a heavy garrison of troops around the palace. The airport was under guard, and they had put heavy trucks across the runways. There had been no public alarm or newspaper reports due to lack of power.

Ambassador Hill said the Costa Rican President had asked for considerable assistance. Ambassador Hill then put . . . on the telephone to outline his needs. (In reply to Mr. Holland's inquiry Ambassador Hill said he was speaking on the private telephone at the Embassy.) . . . said he wanted:

Ambassador Hill said he had instructed Col. Welsch[3] at twelve o'clock last night to alert his men and cooperate fully in line with the military agreement with Costa Rica. He explained that the military mission there has an agreement which says what they are to do and that they are at the Ambassador's instructions under the circumstances. On Mr. Holland's further question Ambassador Hill said it meant that the military mission was to be cooperative but was to wait for further instructions from Washington.

Ambassador Hill said . . . .

Ambassador Hill said again that he had sent several very important cables to Mr. Holland . . . which would give full details on the information given in this phone call.

Ambassador Hill said that Somoza had made the statement that he would do what he could to harry Figueres. Hill said it wasn't being taken in that way in Costa Rica and they are alarmed. He said there are supposedly two areas they are going out for—San Carlos and Peña Blanca. He said that the No. 1 man there had been assured of all-out support of the country by Chamorro who is the opposition leader in the country to the north of them.

In reply to Ambassador Hill's inquiry, Mr. Holland said he did not have any further instructions at the time but that he would look at the cables and would get in touch with the Ambassador later.

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 9, 1954—1:50 p. m.

Subject: Costa Rican Situation

Participants: President José Figueres, of Costa Rica
Foreign Minister Mario Esquivel, Costa Rica
Ambassador Robert Hill
Assistant Secretary of State Henry F. Holland

Ambassador Hill said that the President was standing beside him and was anxious to talk to Mr. Holland. The Foreign Minister was also there. They had discussed the matter about which Mr. Holland had telephoned earlier.

The President greeted Mr. Holland and said he was pleased over the cooperation he was receiving from Ambassador Hill and from us. . . .

Mr. Holland then asked the President if he had any news concerning the shooting in Las Cruces. The President said there was nothing there. Mr. Holland said that he might be mistaken but we want to avoid any possibility of violence and we want to give that country an opportunity to work out a practical solution of this problem, which is of interest to all of us. The President said they were counting on our collaboration here in Washington and that of Ambassador Hill in Costa Rica. The President went on to say that Ambassador Hill had been more than cooperative, he had gone out of his way to be helpful. . . .

The President concluded by saying that he was looking forward to Mr. Holland's visit to Costa Rica so that they could have a long conversation. He hoped that it would be soon and that Mr. Holland would not make his stay too short.

The Foreign Minister came on and said he wanted to thank Mr. Holland for the cooperation he was giving them on the matter. He said that they had not been able to confirm some of the information of what was happening at the border, as it had been raining rather hard and they had not been able to reach anyone. They did know that there were 250 men in Rivas near the frontier, and he thought they were getting orders from the North, and that they were following the same procedure as Somoza did when he trespassed the frontier and entered Costa Rica in 1948.[1] The Department might be interested in looking up the report[2] on the invasion of 1948. The Foreign Minister said he had talked with Ambassador Facio suggesting that the matter be taken up with the OAS. But they would want to do the necessary consulting before taking this step. He mentioned in this connection the Governments of El Salvador, Uruguay, and the U.S.A. Mr. Holland said that he hoped that, working on the basis of the note which the Foreign Minister had sent to Nicaragua, a solution of the problem could be worked out. Mr. Holland said he had talked with the Nicaraguan Ambassador today who gave the impression that he was pleased regarding the various aspects of that note and indicated that with the collaboration of friends we could, on the basis of the note, work out a solution of this problem. Mr. Holland had told him that he could count on our help.

Mr. Holland told the Foreign Minister that he was sending a cable to Ambassador Hill today expressing some points of view regarding the contents of the note and asked that the Foreign Minister give his opinions on the observations made.

Mr. Holland then told Ambassador Hill the gist of his conversation with the Foreign Minister and said that he was sending him a telegram today to take up with the Foreign Minister.

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in Guatemala[1]

CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY WASHINGTON, July 9, 1954—8:46 p. m.

22. In view repeated reports invasion of Costa Rica imminent from Nicaragua, to overthrow Figueres Government, following positive steps were taken today materially to lessen this danger:

(1) In talks with Ambassadors of Costa Rica and Nicaragua[2] here, Holland emphasized sharp US concern any political upheaval at this time following so closely events in Guatemala.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Ohmans and Raymond G. Leddy. Sent also to San Salvador, Tegucigalpa, Managua, San José, Panama, and Caracas.

[2] Guillermo Sevilla Sacasa.

(2) Holland also informed Nicaraguan Ambassador here US confident no invasion of Costa Rica would be allowed proceed from his country and instructed our Ambassador Managua inform Somoza in similar terms.

(3) In response Sevilla Sacasa's memo[3] citing 15 Nicaraguan exiles in Costa Rica as danger to Nicaragua, Holland later urged Costa Rican Foreign Minister and Ambassador Facio exceed substantially previous offer expel three Nicaraguan exiles, to which they assented; meanwhile, Embassy San José has received Betancourt visa application which now being studied for possible recommendation as visitor.

(4) Instructed Embassy Caracas tell Foreign Minister[4] US opposed to any violence in Costa Rica and would if requested comply OAS obligations. Possibly as consequence, Ambassador Gonzalez, to whom our previous efforts to procure departure of Betancourt from Costa Rica have been explained, was summoned to Caracas.

(5) Assured Costa Rica initial shipment 14 tons on $491,000 amount arms purchased from US two months ago (but held up during Guatemalan crisis) will be delivered by USAF San José July 14 via Panama. This sale and delivery had previously been explained to Nicaragua and Venezuela and apparently accepted; Figueres assured Holland today this shipment would not be publicized, but Costa Rican papers have previously exploited forthcoming delivery as evidence US support for Figueres.

Although reports of invasion plan not yet substantiated, Department regards number of circumstantial developments as indicating definite scheme afoot, headed by Costa Rican exiles but with Venezuela and Nicaragua implicated. Firm US policy in this situation is to ameliorate political tensions creating excuse for movement against Figueres, and reestablish stability in area especially in relations Nicaragua–Costa Rica. We also concerned adverse world reaction from overthrow legitimately elected liberal democratic Costa Rican Government, for which US would be censured because of our predominant position in area and alleged role in recent change of government in Guatemala.

You may use foregoing in your discretion. Important and useful to Department you evaluate realistically and report factually any developments bearing on problem.

SECRET PRIORITY MANAGUA, July 9, 1954—5 p.m.

10. Re today's phone call Holland and Burrows.[1]

President Somoza reiterated today no training, no plotting, no bases in Nicaragua against Figueres. Information my telegram 9 July 6 still correct.[2] He added, however, Figueres still plotting against him and other countries and was crying wolf to try to get sympathy and arms from US. He exhibited report that Costa Ricans had left for Miami Tuesday to buy three P–47 planes and arms and that a Jaime Solera had check for $460,000 to pay cash. He added "I admit I am getting blankety-blank sick and tired Figueres' constant plotting. He is slapping the Department and me around, but I won't do anything without telling you first and then I will do it so fast Figueres won't even have time to put his pants on."

Other diplomatic officers tell me there is general hatred Figueres, his Caribbean Legion backers and his long record mixing in others affairs. They openly predict trouble will eventually arise from many sources unless he cleans house and shows by action instead of words he desires to cooperate other states this area. In fact many tell me that Haiti, Dominican Republic, Cuba, Venezuela and Panama are bitterly and actively anti-Figueres and growing resentful what they regard as our apparently staunch support of him. They must be counting on support other countries, the Argentine Ambassador having been quoted as saying he hoped Nicaragua would break relations Costa Rica. The Peruvian Minister told me his country would break relations at slightest excuse. On other hand many admit they do not want Somoza to emerge as strong man of Central America and I do not believe they would give Somoza the leadership in anti-Figueres move. For example, Salvadoran Ambassador told me his country was sure Somoza would come to Salvador's aid and that his country would reciprocate but not to extent making him Central America's chieftain. He said "The thing we are afraid of is Somoza may build ring around Salvador". Moreover, my colleagues know Somoza strongly pro US and unwilling embarrass US in UN and OAS and they do not consider him absolutely safe.

[1] Assistant Secretary Holland telephoned Ambassador Whelan in Nicaragua at least three times on July 9 expressing concern over the growing tension along the Costa Rican-Nicaraguan border; memoranda of these conversations, dated July 9, are contained in file 617.18.

[2] The referenced telegram reported that although President Somoza was dissatisfied with Costa Rica's reply to his note of May 17, 1954, detailing charges against Costa Rica with respect to its alleged complicity in the assassination attempt of Apr. 4, he was neither planning to break diplomatic relations with Costa Rica nor plotting against President Figueres (617.18/7–654).

President's son Tachito, the Chief of Staff, hinted . . . that Venezuela and Cuba had a tie-up with proposed bomber flight across Costa Rica, the plane recently dropping leaflets being trial run. He also hinted enough anti-Figueres countries to block action by OAS.

From this point of view it does not add up to Somoza starting action though his hatred Figueres and anger at Costa Rica's whitewash note might easily lead him to lend at least moral support ~~if other~~ nations acted first.[3]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 29, 1954—7:55 p. m.

Subject: Nicaraguan-Costa Rican Relations

Participants: Ambassador Robert C. Hill—San José, Costa Rica
Assistant Secretarty Henry F. Holland

Mr. Holland telephoned and told Ambassador Hill that after talking with him earlier he called Ambassador Whelan and asked him to go back and see President Somoza and tell him that we would do our best to get something accomplished on the three requirements[2] that the President had established but that Mr. Holland would like assurance that there would be peace and tranquillity during period of time we would be working on it and asked Ambassador Whelan to determine whether we could count on it. Ambassador Whelan said that he would.

Ambassador Whelan told Mr. Holland that the President had told him that he was conducting military maneuvers of about 1000 troops at the following places: Rivas, Pena Blanca, Cardenas and Las Bohenes. Mr. Holland told him that any such maneuvers as that would make it impossible for him to accomplish anything and that if the troops were sent to those places Mr. Holland would feel compelled to drop his efforts to mediate because he would feel that the situation was hopeless. He asked Whelan to speak to the President and call him back. Amb. Whelan had called back and said the President has reiterated that if the three requests were met he would immediately invite a meeting of the Foreign Ministers.

As regards the troops Amb. Whelan said that they were already at those places and therefore he could not call them off, but Somoza did invite him to send the head of our MAAG Mission and our Military Attaché to inspect those troops to be certain that they were doing nothing but maneuvering. Amb. Whelan is sending the officers, both colonels, immediately to go and inspect the troops and be certain that they are doing nothing but maneuvering. So Mr. Holland thinks that Amb. Hill can properly report to the Costa Rican Government that, though they get reports of troops, our officers are with the troops at the request of the Nicaraguan President to make certain they are doing nothing but maneuvering. Amb. Hill said they have already received report of the troops and report is that they have gone down with tanks as well as men. He said that from Nicaragua there is an INS article in Prensa Libre headlining, "If Figueres wants war, he can have it," and naturally they are being bombarded as to what is going on. Amb. Hill said he assumes that the man north of them is playing up the war of nerves to the nth degree until the requirements are satisfied. Mr. Holland asked Amb. Hill what he thought the reaction would be if the reply comes through us. Mr. Holland had told Amb. Whelan that if he ran into difficulty in obtaining the note he was going to suggest as an alternative that it come through Department. He said he didn't know what the reaction would be.

[2] In telegram 21, from Nicaragua, dated July 28, 1954, the Embassy reported that President Somoza had set the three following conditions which the Costa Rican Government would have to satisfy before he would agree to a meeting between their respective foreign ministers for the purpose of reducing tension between the two countries: (1) an indication in writing that Rómulo Betancourt and others allegedly involved in the assassination plot had been deported from Costa Rica, (2) a full investigation of all officials suspected of involvement, and (3) the return of three persons taken the previous week on Nicaraguan soil (617.18/7–2854).

Amb. Hill said Foreign Minister Esquivel has just talked with him and said he was working on the note and will have it in Amb. Facio's hands this evening. Mr. Holland said he had talked with Amb. Facio who had a conference call set for 8 p.m. Mr. Holland said they were doing their part here.

Amb. Hill asked for suggestions as to what he might do. Mr. Holland said he would have no objection to Amb. Hill, and Amb. Hill only, saying to press that with respect to any reported concentration of troops on Nicaraguan side we have been advised that they are routine maneuvers and that the Government of Nicaragua has invited the head of our MAAG Mission and our Military Attaché to inspect the troops in the course of their maneuvers and that the invitation has been accepted. Mr. Holland said Amb. Hill should use the authority he has given him only in the event that Amb. Hill thinks it is necessary to allay real unrest there. Mr. Holland repeated that Amb. Hill is to make statement that he is advised by the Department that the Government of Nicaragua has advised the Department that this movement of troops is purely military maneuvers and that head of our MAAG Mission and our Military Attaché have been invited to inspect the maneuvers and have accepted the invitation.

Amb. Hill said he would keep us posted.

of G–3, on July 31, 1954.[2] General Vittrup wished to insure a clear, concise understanding for planning purposes, on action to be taken by United States armed forces in the event that Costa Rica requests assistance under Article III of the Rio Treaty; he stated that it is essential that precise instruction be obtained on what action the Department of State wishes the military to undertake.

It is contemplated by the Department of State that before any employment of United States armed forces in Costa Rica, in response to a request of the Government of Costa Rica under the obligations of the Rio Treaty, efforts would have been exhausted to arrive at a solution to the conflict without resort to the use of our forces. However, in the event of failure of these efforts, final reliance on United States armed forces to defend Costa Rica would be made on authorization of the President of the United States. It is understood that no such action of United States armed forces would occur until such authorization.

The purpose of alerting the Department of Defense on the possibility that the Rio Treaty might be invoked by Costa Rica was to permit time for advance planning on the nature of military action which would be necessary to defend Costa Rica against armed attack by Nicaragua. The nature and extent of military action suitable for defending Costa Rica from such attack is a military decision on which the Department of State is not qualified to pass. The Department of State nevertheless appreciates that problems may arise on which the unit commander might wish a broad definition of policy for his guidance, which is offered as follows:

1. The minimum forces numerically sufficient to perform the mission should be assigned;
2. Extraordinary care should be exercised to limit objectives to hostile military units and to avoid causing death or injury to Costa Rican or Nicaraguan civilians;
3. The border of Nicaragua should be the point of maximum advance, wherever it can be clearly defined, and in other cases no advance should be made into doubtful territory except as a military necessity to repel or prevent armed attack on Costa Rican soil.

The effective cooperation of the Department of the Army, which has enabled the Department of State to determine its policy in this problem, is deeply appreciated.

Subject: Warning to President Figueres on Foreign Adventures

It is quite likely that the Department or the Embassy will receive some sort of note of thanks from the Costa Rican government if the present difficulties with Nicaragua are satisfactorily settled. It is the Embassy's opinion that in answering such a note a polite warning be given President Figueres in event his scheming mind is thinking up any additional foreign adventures.

It does not seem too far out of line to point out to Figueres that the United States unhesitatingly sided with Costa Rica—a model democracy with no standing army—when it appeared there was danger of undue pressure being exerted from outside. Thanks to the cooperation of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, an amicable settlement was reached.

It could be pointed out, however, that the United States is fully aware of the personal animosity that exists between Presidents Figueres and Somoza and that such feelings are hard to hide. Nevertheless, it would be hoped that President Figueres would contribute to hemispheric peace by restricting his verbal and written attacks and maintaining a close watch on Nicaraguan exiles to prevent a recurrence of the April assassination plot against Somoza.

A note of this content, diplomatically worded, would be valuable as a record of mild reproof toward the Costa Rican government for having permitted—to put it mildly—the preparation of the plot against Somoza. Furthermore, it might act as a deterrent against further adventures of this type by don Pepe. In event another plot were hatched on Costa Rican soil the United States, if it felt that Figueres merited no further support, need only make the note public to indicate that Figueres had been warned in advance to refrain from meddling in the affairs of other countries.

The Embassy feels that the presentation of a note of this nature to the Costa Rican government is advisable and if the Department concurs, preparation should be undertaken by the Department. With Venezuela in mind, perhaps the admonition might be made more general, but it is believed such a note would lose its force vis-à-vis the Costa Rican-Nicaraguan situation.

In event no note of thanks is received we should send a warning to Figueres.[1]

For the Ambassador:
C. ALLAN STEWART
First Secretary

MID files, lot 57 D 15, "Costa Rica—Political 1954"

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 18, 1954.

Subject: Imminent Attempt to Overthrow Figueres Government

1. Current information indicates that the plan to overthrow Figueres, formulated but aborted last summer and then postponed until mid-November, is now about to be put into effect.

(a) The participants are the same: the Costa Rican opposition to Figueres headed by ex-Presidents Calderon Guardia and Picado,[2] with covert assistance or tacit consent of present "outs" Echandi, Ulate, and perhaps Castro Cervantes—all spearheaded by activist Roberto Tinoco, aging revolutionary; Somoza of Nicaragua, who has furnished safe haven for training of Costa Rican irregulars and very likely arms; Perez Jimenez and Estrada of Venezuela, who have supplied funds and very probably arms, via Nicaragua and Panama. The assistance of Trujillo of the Dominican Republic is not visible, but would be consistent. The help of Castillo Armas of Guatemala is doubtful, but participation by individual members of his "Liberation Army" still sitting out at Chiquimula, is not unlikely—we have positive evidence that the unanimous impression existed among these stalwarts last June that after they overthrew Arbenz they would knock off Figueres.

(b) The form of action is now different. Instead of "invasion" from abroad, which ran athwart of U.S. opposition in July–August, the affair will be purely domestic. The infiltration of irregular forces back into Costa Rica, after training northward, is reported imminent. If proof of the nature of the present operation were needed, it can be found in the glee of Foreign Minister Otañez of Venezuela over the prospective fall of Figueres as "result of internal conditions . . . accomplished by Costa Ricans" (Embtel Caracas 146 [147], November 17).[3]

[1] Addressed also to Deputy Assistant Secretary Sparks, Ambassador-designate Woodward, and Director of the Office of Middle American Affairs Newbegin.

[3] Not printed (617.18/11–1754).

(c) This "internal" action can well be considered by the plotters as obviating hostile reaction from the Department of State, and any resulting assistance to Figueres under inter-American treaties; it could also insulate the movement against OAS action, at least for the time needed to do the deed, which may be 24 to 48 hours. The lesson was learned last summer that the overthrow of Figueres could not be accomplished by a military operation from outside the country, in which governments of one or more neighboring countries would necessarily be accused of intervention, and the revised plan would subtract this overt feature of foreign military action.

2. The imminence of putting this plan into action, possibly on the week end November 20–21, would be suggested by the following factors:

(a) Assistant Secretary Holland will be either in flight to Rio or occupied at Rio[4] during these days, eliminating him from the decisive role he played last July.

(b) The American Government is represented at San José by Chargé Stewart and Ambassador Woodward will not arrive until the latter part of the coming week, the effectiveness of U.S. on-the-spot representation will be accordingly reduced during this period.

(d) The beginning of the dry season right now in Costa Rica makes both land and aerial operations feasible.

(e) Since the Figueres regime is weak militarily and is devoid of air defense, the sooner action is taken the better, before any additional military equipment (particularly airplanes currently under consideration) is arranged.

3. Prospectus of success of the movement is fairly high.

(a) Division, tensions and confusion within the Figueres regime are considerable. Cohesive and determined action, on a sufficient scale, might be hard to muster over a week end. Figueres' personal custom of spending the week end at La Lucha is a favorable factor for the plotters, who might even endeavor to assassinate Figueres on the road or at the finca itself, which is very lightly guarded.

(b) The real key to any visible struggle would be in air power. The revolutionaries can probably count on availability of two or more war planes of the P–47 type which were sufficient to bomb and strafe the resistance out of Guatemala's armed forces. Adventurer pilots, such as Jerry DeLarm, U.S. citizen, are still in the area and will fight anybody

[4] Assistant Secretary Holland was scheduled to attend the Meeting of Ministers of Finance or Economy of the American Republics as the Fourth Extraordinary Meeting of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council (commonly referred to as the Rio Economic Conference), which convened at Quitandinha, Brazil, Nov. 22, 1954; for documentation on the meeting, see pp. 313 ff.

for pay. Without a single plane to put in the air against them, the Figueres forces could probably not resist.

(c) The organization of opposition to Figueres in Costa Rica is broad, determined and well financed. It represents the power of the conservative class of the country which views with horror, as a threat to its own existence, three and a half years more of Figueres in power. As land holders, this group can afford facilities in the interior to irregular forces.

4. The United States position should be determined in advance on the following recommended basis:

(a) There is no basis for United States action unless inter-American obligations are invoked in the face of armed intervention by one state against another. In the present case, however, this possibility will probably not arise, as steps have been taken to avoid it.

(b) Although it is our policy objective to foster democratic representative government in Latin America and to oppose political change by force, we cannot adopt a position of policing this continent against internal disturbances and changes of government.

(c) The above interest in our policy objectives also implies that we maintain cordial and friendly relations with a liberal democratic government, such as that of Figueres, because of the effect on relations with other such governments, such as Uruguay, Bolivia, Chile, and Ecuador. However, these objectives should not require that we anticipate a crisis or volunteer our assistance unilaterally.

(d) Costa Rica has not asked for U.S. assistance and has not made any move in the inter-American system. Until Costa Rica does so, there is no justification for the United States to move on its own, with the resulting harmful effects on relations with the governments desirous to see Figueres overthrown, such as Venezuela, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Panama, Nicaragua, Honduras, and Guatemala.

(e) Effective action at this time by the United States, to deter the "internal" revolution, could only be in the form of force, such as a sweep over Costa Rica by a half dozen U.S. fighter planes and their landing at San José airport. In the present shortness of time, arrangements for this purpose would have to be effected on Friday, November 19. It would not be unwise to make inquiries as to the availability of this or similar military show of force, should a Costa Rican request come over the week end.

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 20, 1954.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On August 4, 1954, Assistant Secretary Henry F. Holland addressed a letter[2] to the Secretary of the Army requesting that advance planning be carried out concerning the nature of military action which might be necessary to assist in the defense of Costa Rica in the event that the Government of Costa Rica should request such assistance under Article 3 of the Rio Treaty. A copy of the letter of August 4 is enclosed[3] for your convenient reference.

The Department of State has received continuing reports of the possibility that Costa Rica might be subjected to such an attack. Although the probability of such an attack is very difficult to estimate and may not be great, it does appear probable that if such an attack should occur it would involve the use of aircraft, since the potential attackers are believed to have been impressed with the effective use of aircraft in the recent revolution in Guatemala. Since the Government of Costa Rica possesses no military aircraft, such an attack would probably be clearly identifiable as coming from outside the territory of Costa Rica.

As stated in the letter of August 4, United States armed forces would be used to defend Costa Rica only upon authorization of the President of the United States after the evaluation of a direct attack. I believe the present circumstances are such that it would be advisable to have a small number of intercepter aircraft, possibly six airplanes, based in as close proximity to Costa Rica as practicable. If these aircraft were in the Canal Zone, they would be less than an hour away from Costa Rica. The movement of these aircraft to the Canal Zone might, in itself, if it were permitted to be known discreetly to the potential attackers, have the effect of deterring an attack. As a part of, or supplement to, the existing planning operation, the Department of State would appreciate this precautionary action. The Department of State would arrange for the discreet mention of this action to persons who are believed to be in touch with the potential attackers.

Sincerely yours, HERBERT HOOVER, JR.

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Sparks) to the Secretary of State[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 22, 1954.

Subject: Possible Attempt to Overthrow Figueres Government in Costa Rica

Discussion:

Reports from our missions and CIA in the first half of November indicated preparations of an "internal" uprising to overthrow Figueres, by his foreign enemies, (principally Somoza of Nicaragua and Perez Jimenez of Venezuela) in alliance with domestic opposition, initiated over the week end of November 20, with air support which Costa Rica cannot combat. A summary of this evidence is attached (Tab A).[2]

The plan avoided any overt invasion or foreign intervention, which was threatened last July, when we acted to preserve peace in Central America by warning the interested governments we would fulfill our obligations under the Rio Treaty if Costa Rica were attacked, and sent five United States Air Force C–47 transports from Panama on a tour of the five countries. Nevertheless, there is a possibility of international conflict, as shown by President Figueres' statement to our Chargé that if an uprising occurs he will immediately declare war on Nicaragua in order to force OAS action.

The Under Secretary and Mr. Holland decided on November 19: (1) to ask Defense to make six United States interceptor planes available in the area, should we be called upon to fulfill our treaty obligation; (2) . . . and (3) to inform the Costa Rican Government that, although concrete evidence of any attack was not seen, the United States would honor its commitments under the OAS should such evidence develop. Action was accordingly taken: (1) Defense agreed to send six interceptors to Panama; (2) . . . and (3) instruction was sent to Embassy San José by the Department. Later information shows plan postponed but still pending.

When AP despatch from Panama on November 20 reported "United States sending interceptors under Rio Treaty to protect Costa Rica from attack", which was apparently learned from unauthorized sources, AP in Washington expanded on the report, mentioning Nicaragua specifically as the offending country but also referring to support of plot by elements in Venezuela, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, and Honduras.

Ambassador Sevilla Sacasa called today to request clarification. We ascribed the plane movement as routine and have so stated to press.

Recommendation:

That we continue to play down the incident publicly.[3]

Memorandum by the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Secretary of Defense (Wilson)[1]

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, 26 November 1954.

Subject: Military Support of Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance.

1. Reference is made to your memorandum, dated 23 November 1954,[2] subject as above, and the letters from the Under Secretary of State and Assistant Secretary of State attached thereto,[3] wherein you requested the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, on an urgent basis, regarding the deployment of U.S. aircraft to a location in close proximity to Costa Rica.

2. Specific plans are in existence in Headquarters, CINCARIB for the expeditious deployment of U.S. military forces to Costa Rica in support of U.S. obligations under Article III of the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance (Rio Treaty). These plans have been reviewed by the Department of the Army but not by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. U.S. forces are capable of rapid deployment in the event the President should authorize U.S. armed assistance in Costa Rica. The Troop Basis of the Caribbean Command is under study by the Department of the Army with a view to improving the flexibility of U.S. armed forces to meet such requirements in CINCARIB's area of responsibility.

3. With regard to the psychological aspects of deterring aggression the Joints Chiefs of Staff are of the opinion that the movement of 5 F–84 Thunderjets of the U.S. Air Force scheduled to arrive in Guatemala on 28 November 1954 for demonstration purposes will depict adequately the U.S. capability for rapidly moving its armed forces to any area in Central America. Thus, if this capability should be properly exploited through publicity and other means the Joint Chiefs of Staff believe that the desired deterrent effect could be achieved without the deployment at this time of additional aircraft to the Canal Zone.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 26, 1954.

Subject: Imminence of Invasion of Costa Rica

Participants: Ambassador Antonio Facio of Costa Rica
AR—Mr. Jamison
MID—Mr. Newbegin

In connection with Ambassador Facio's call on Mr. Sparks this morning when he reviewed the Costa Rican situation and suggested the dispatch of two U.S. destroyers, he called this afternoon at my request. When he arrived it was suggested to him that if the Costa Rican Government believed the evidence in its possession showed an imminent threat of invasion it would be desirable to resort to the procedures of the OAS for inter-American peace rather than to request unilateral U.S. action. The Ambassador made a note to this effect and stated that he would inform his Government of his conversation immediately. He gave the impression of not being particularly pleased with the suggestion and that he would have preferred some direct U.S. action. He made a comment to the effect that he doubted that he would be in Washington very long; he was not the type of person who enjoyed having to go through these various maneuvers but favored more direct action. He emphasized again that his one interest was to avoid bloodshed and to maintain peace among Costa Ricans.

Mr. Jamison stated that Costa Rica had referred problems to the OAS before and he believed with considerable success. The Ambassador agreed but replied that the OAS had taken its action only after some 3,000 people had been killed. This was an apparent confusion of the issue since it was clear that the Ambassador was referring to the revolution of 1948 which preceded OAS action at that time. As regarded a statement by the Ambassador that it took too long for the OAS to take action, Mr. Newbegin stated that there was no need for this; that it was of course a matter for decision by the Costa Rican Government, but if the matter were referred to the OAS this could presumably be done as soon as the Costa Rican Government cared to do so.

Mr. Jamison inquired as to whether the Costa Rican Government had informed the Nicaraguan Government of developments. The Ambassador replied that he believed it had although he could not so state categorically.

Memorandum by the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Intelligence (Armstrong) to the Under Secretary of State (Hoover)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 6, 1954.

Subject: Intelligence Note: Mounting Tensions Threaten Figueres Regime

Recent reports of conspiracies to overthrow the government of constitutionally elected President Jose Figueres Ferrer of Costa Rica[1] underscore the deterioration of Figueres' position at home and in neighboring countries during the year since his inauguration. His socialistic theories and international policies not only have alienated influential sectors of national opinion, but have intensified old enmities with powerful foreign adversaries, notably long-time dictator Somoza of Nicaragua. Threats of invasion involving Costa Rican exiles, coupled with mounting criticism from "loyal" opposition elements, may in time cause Figueres to feel compelled to break temporarily with Costa Rica's tradition of respect for constitutional processes. Figueres will brand any invasion as foreign-based and invoke the Rio Treaty.

Foremost among Figueres' "loyal" critics is his former friend, ex-President Ulate, who resents the rejection by the pro-administration majority in the legislature of a constitutional amendment which would have paved the way for Ulate to be a presidential candidate in 1958. A powerful newspaper publisher, Ulate has consistently denied involvement in conspiratorial activities. In the face of mounting internal and external pressures, however, he might consider it his duty to assume a leading role in an anti-Figueres movement.

Articulate Costa Ricans have criticized Figueres for making a fetish of opposing Caribbean dictatorships, for boycotting the Tenth Inter-American Conference at Caracas because of the alleged undemocratic character of the Venezuelan Government, and the government's alleged connivance in a plot last April to assassinate Somoza.

[1] A memorandum for Assistant Secretary Holland, dated Dec. 23, 1954, by Robert Amory, Jr., Deputy Director for Intelligence, Central Intelligence Agency, reads in part as follows: "The rumors [of an impending attempt to oust Costa Rican President Figueres] have been difficult to evaluate since their circulation appears a key weapon in the 'war of nerves' which the Nicaraguan and Venezuelan governments have been waging against Figueres since last July. In addition, many of them originate with the Costa Rican government itself, which may be exaggerating them in an attempt to impress the other American republics, especially the United States, with the seriousness of the situation in an effort to enlist their support." (718.00/12–2354)

Militant opposition to dictatorships has left Figueres alone before a formidable array of opponents. Closely linked with Somoza in various alleged anti-Figueres plots are Jimenez of Venezuela and Trujillo of the Dominican Republic. His other enemies include Carias, ex-dictator and presidential contender in Honduras, Castillo Armas of Guatemala, Remon of Panama, and Batista of Cuba.

A similar memorandum has been sent to the Secretary.

CUBA

POLITICAL, ECONOMIC, AND MILITARY RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND CUBA[1]

Editorial Note

On January 29, 1952, representatives of the United States and Cuba initiated negotiations for a bilateral military assistance agreement at Habana. Documents pertaining to the negotiations are in Department of State file 737.5 MSP for 1952. The Agreement was signed on March 7, 1952, and entered into force on the same date; for text, see United States Treaties and Other International Agreements (UST), volume 3, page 2901, or Department of State Treaties and Other International Acts Series (TIAS) No. 2467.

Concurrent with the negotiations for the military assistance agreement, representatives of the United States and Cuba conducted negotiations for a supplementary military plan, which was initialed on March 7, 1952, by Ambassador Willard Beaulac and Cuban Minister of State Aureliano Sánchez Arango. The "Plan of the Governments of Cuba and the United States of America for Their Common Defense" was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 1504, from Habana, dated March 14, 1952, not printed (737.5 MSP/3–1452).

Editorial Note

On March 10, 1952, General Fulgencio Batista y Zaldívar led a coup d'etat against the regime of President Carlos Prío Soccarás which resulted in the latter's deposition and the formation of a new government by General Batista, who became President of Cuba on April 4, 1952. The coup and related events were reported in despatch 1472, from Habana, dated March 11, 1952 (737.00/3–1152), and more extensively in despatch 1693, from Habana, dated April 10, 1952 (737.00/4–1052). Additional pertinent documentation is in Department of State file 737.00 for 1952.

The notes of the Secretary's staff meeting, held at 9:30 a.m. on March 11, 1952, read in part as follows:

"3. Mr. Miller reviewed some of the details of the revolution in Cuba. He explained that this revolt came as a complete surprise to the U.S. Batista is basically friendly toward the U.S. and undoubtedly his government will be no worse than Prio's probably better. Batista may have considerable trouble with the trade unions. Mr. Miller explained that Prio had a corrupt government and gave in almost completely to labor demands. The Secretary asked whether we were going to consult with our other Latin American neighbors to determine what should be done in this case. Mr. Miller felt that we should wait and see what happens before we commit ourselves." (Secretary's Staff Meetings, lot 63 D 75)

SECRET HABANA, March 22, 1952.

[Participants:] Dr. Miguel Angel de la Campa, Minister of State
The Ambassador

I saw Dr. Campa at the country home of Pedro Rodriguez Capote, Assistant Chief of Protocol of the Foreign Office.

Dr. Campa looked worn out. He immediately asked me to tell him frankly, based on our old friendship, why the United States hadn't recognized Cuba.

I reminded Dr. Campa that he was familiar with American practice so far as recognition was concerned. We took a good look at the new situation, we submitted it to the conventional tests, and then we made a decision concerning recognition. We had to think not only of the country involved but also of all the other American Republics. There were countries where revolutions and upsets might be encouraged by a precipitate act of recognition by the United States. We had to think of all those things. Furthermore, two weeks had not yet passed since Batista's coup d'etat. This might seem a long time to the Provisional Government in Cuba, but it was not a long time to the rest of the world.

I told the Minister that I was going to ask him certain questions and raise certain points; not that I had any doubt about them, but because other people might have doubt about them and therefore it was good for the United States and for the Provisional Government of Cuba to have them on the record.

I asked him whether the expression "in accordance with the Constitution or emanate from the laws" contained in his note No. 662,

[1] Transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 1561, from Habana, dated Mar. 24, 1952. In the despatch, Ambassador Beaulac stated in part the following: "I consider that our conditions for recognition have been met by the new regime and that we should proceed to recognize." (737.02/3–2452)

March 11,[2] to the Embassy was intended in any way to limit the international obligations that the Cuban Government was prepared to fulfill. He said that it was not intended in that way at all. It was a perfectly conventional phrase. He could tell me formally that Cuba would fulfill its international obligations.

I reminded Campa that General Batista used to have close relations with the Communists. I asked whether we might expect that these close relations would continue. Dr. Campa said that the Provisional Government and he himself would do what could be done under the law to eliminate the freedom and privileges which the Communists were now enjoying in Cuba.

I asked Dr. Campa whether he had anything to say on the treatment of private capital. I said I had in mind the situation deriving from Article 77 of the Constitution, which made it nearly impossible for a company to discharge a man and which therefore discouraged foreign investment and which led to such things as "interventions," which in my view amounted to expropriations. I referred to the case of the United Railways, a British concern, and to the case of the Orange Crush Company, which included American interests.

Dr. Campa said that he could not predict in detail what the Government would do in the field of private investment, but he thought General Batista's statements concerning private capital had been excellent. They had been very well received, and I doubtless knew that business men were among the most enthusiastic supporters of the new regime. He said he was confident that the new regime would do everything reasonable and practicable within the law to attract and protect private capital.

I asked Dr. Campa whether we could expect that there would be any steps taken in the near future toward more constitutional forms. I asked particularly whether the Congress might resume its functions or whether a Provisional President might be named.

Dr. Campa said that he did not think any steps of the kind suggested in the press would be taken at this time. He thought most of the suggestions were being made by people trying to confuse the situation. He said he thought Batista would instead concentrate on calling elections at the earliest possible moment. He said the press speculation had caused the regime a lot of trouble so far as recognition was concerned. If a Provisional President were named it would not be a case of a new regime. It would be the same regime.

I told him that my information was that Batista had offered the Provisional Presidency to Saladrigas[3] the day of the coup, but that Saladrigas had not accepted it.

[3] Carlos Saladrigas y Zayas, President, Cuban Consultative Council; and member of President Batista's Council of Ministers.

Dr. Campa then said he thought the events of March 10 were of importance to the United States. He said that an intolerable situation had developed in Cuba. Graft, gangsterism, and favoritism had made a travesty of democracy. He himself had been particularly worried about the interventions in which Cuba, together with Guatemala and other countries, had engaged. He said that the kind of government the Dominicans had, for example, was no business of Cuba's, and Cuba had pledged itself not to intervene in the Dominican Republic; but it had intervened, nevertheless. He said the results of all the activities of the former Cuban Government and its accomplices in the Caribbean had been so damaging to the cause of democracy and friendly relations among the countries of the Caribbean that he would [could] not help asking himself whether our enemies were not behind all these activities.

Dr. Campa said that, as I knew, he was not a politician himself. He was sixty-nine years old, had been a career diplomat most of his life, and this was going to be his last service to Cuba. Batista once before had brought order out of chaos and Dr. Campa thought he was going to do it again. Batista was in even a stronger position this time because he had no commitments with the army or any one else. His civilian supporters didn't even know about the coup until after it had occurred. The military, instead of being induced to follow Batista, had asked Batista to assume the leadership. The initiative had come from the officers, and not from Batista.

I asked Dr. Campa if he was sure of this and he said that he had been given to understand that that was the case.

Campa said that Cuba intended to respect its international obligations. It intended to restore normal relations with countries toward which the former Cuban Government had had an attitude of hostility. He mentioned Spain and the Dominican Republic in particular. He said he thought the United States should recognize promptly; that it was in our interest that the situation should develop in an orderly way. I reminded Dr. Campa that our Government had not been consulted about the coup d'etat and that Cuba could not expect automatic recognition from us. I asked whether our failure to recognize so far constituted a threat to the stability of the regime. Dr. Campa said that it did not.

I told Dr. Campa that I would transcribe faithfully what he said to the Department of State in Washington. I was sure our conversation would be helpful to my Government, and I hoped it would be to his.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 24, 1952.

Subject: Continuation of Diplomatic Relations with Cuba

In this memorandum I recommend for your consideration the continuation of diplomatic relations with the Batista Government in Cuba. If you approve the recommendation, I suggest that you authorize me to make the announcement on Thursday, March 27.

As you know, on the early morning of Monday, March 10, General Fulgencio Batista with the support of a group of officers of the Cuban Army overthrew the duly constituted Government of President Carlos Prío Soccarás. Batista's revolution came as a complete surprise both in Cuba and in this country and his revolution was carried out with remarkable ease and over virtually no resistance. Ambassador Beaulac in Habana has followed the situation with great care and he has reported that Batista is in complete control of the Cuban national territory and machinery of Government and that there is virtually complete acquiescence in his regime on the part of the Cuban people. Batista has not interfered with the Cuban labor unions or with the operations of the Inter-American Regional Office of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions which is located in Habana. Eusebio Mujal, head of the Cuban Confederation of Workers, has publicly supported Batista as have representative business and commercial associations.

The Batista regime has formally requested our recognition and has made satisfactory public and private statements with regard to Cuban intention to fulfill its international obligations; its attitude towards private capital; and its intention to take steps to curtail international communist activities in Cuba. In connection with this latter point the Batista Government on March 21 refused to allow two Russian couriers with diplomatic pouches to enter Cuba from Mexico, and the new Cuban Foreign Minister has stated that he will not allow Russians to use diplomatic pouches in the future. While Batista when President of Cuba in the early '40's tolerated communist domination of the Cuban Confederation of Workers, the world situation with regard to international communism has changed radically since that time, and we have no reason to believe that Batista will not be strongly anti-communist. The new Cuban Foreign Minister, Miguel Angel de la Campa, signed the Stockholm Petition[2] two years ago, but the Embassy and the Department are satisfied that this need not be taken as indicating softness towards communism and in fact our reports are that Mr. de la Campa is anti-communist.

The Department of State naturally deplores the way in which the Batista coup was brought about and is apprehensive that this kind of thing may occur in other countries of Latin America where elections are being held this year. Consequently, the Department and Ambassador Beaulac in Habana have been proceeding with great caution in this matter despite our very special position in Cuba which includes heavy capital investment, enormous international trade, the Nicaro nickel plant operation, the Guantánamo Naval Base, three armed services missions and the recent signing of a bilateral military assistance agreement which requires implementation. At least ten countries of Latin America have already announced continuation of diplomatic relations with Batista. These include Mexico, Brazil, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, Colombia, Venezuela, the Dominican Republic and Haiti. France, Switzerland, Spain and China have also recognized Batista. We have been informed that Chile, Ecuador, Uruguay and possibly Costa Rica, which are among the leading democratic governments of the Hemisphere, will simultaneously act to recognize the Batista regime some time this week. We have been in consultation with those governments, and their view of the situation is roughly the same as ours. The United Kingdom, Canada and Austria have asked to be given advance notice of our action.

Under the circumstances I believe that it would be detrimental to the special relations that this country has with Cuba to hold up recognition any longer, and accordingly request your authorization to announce the continuation of diplomatic relations with Cuba on March 27 and to give suitable advance notice of this action to the interested governments.[3] [3] The Department of State received President Truman's approval of the Secretary's recommendation on Mar. 27, 1952 (737.02/3–2752); on that date, Ambassador Beaulac informed Cuban Minister of State Angel de la Campa that the United States recognized the new Government in Cuba.

The Ambassador in Cuba (Beaulac) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller)

SECRET HABANA, June 2, 1952.

DEAR NED: Thanks very much for your letter of May 21.[1]

I am dining tomorrow night with Laurence Crosby[2] and several other members of the Chamber of Commerce, including Messrs. Duys and Carter,[3] I believe, to give them an opportunity to express themselves on the question of the treaty,[4] etc.

With reference to Batista, I have had two or three brief, informal chats with him, but I have consciously refrained from rushing in to see him after the coup d'état.

Most chiefs of mission here expected that Batista would eventually give some sort of reception to meet the chiefs of mission or to give opportunity to the chiefs of mission to meet him. He never did this, however. Then the Cincuentenario came along and we all met Batista during that week. I had previously seen him at the home of Alfonso Fanjul.

Prior to the Cincuentenario I reminded Dr. Campa that President Batista had expressed the desire to have a chat with me sometime. The Minister asked me whether it was urgent that I see the President and I said it was not. I enclose a memorandum[5] of my conversation with Campa on that occasion.

Meanwhile, of course, I have spoken to Campa on the question of the debts, of the problem of the accountants, etc., and I will speak to Batista about them when I see him.

Within the next week or two I expect to see Carlos Saladrigas and have a talk with him about Cuban-American relations. I plan to tell him, as well as Batista, about Prío's promise to revive the battalion-for-Korea business. I do not intend, however, to suggest that the Batista Government revive the issue. I do not think it would be in our interest for it to do it at this time. It is not yet clear to me whether Batista is going to stay in or whether we are entering another very difficult political period here, with possible disturbances, etc. I don't think it is clear to anybody else, either, including Batista. It is obvious that the Government is worried. Military and naval officers are spending a large part of their time, including nights, in their barracks. Cars are being stopped and searched in Country Club Park and on roads entering Habana. The Government knows about Sánchez Arango's disappearance and probably suspects the worst. Batista has made very little progress in developing a popular following.

Under the circumstances, if the Batista Government tried to send troops to Korea it would probably badly damage its standing in Cuba. It might bring about the fall of the Batista regime. It would be too bad to have it appear that the Batista regime had fallen on the issue of Korea. That would indeed be a defeat for us.

One reason that I have not rushed in to see either Batista or Saladrigas, aside from preferring that they invite me to see them, is that I have not been too sure of what to say to them; and the truth is, I am still not too sure, principally because of the uncertainties I have tried to indicate above. I have of course been very courteous with officials of the regime, including Batista and Saladrigas, and I shall do what I think is best calculated to induce them to cooperate with us. I should think that the prospect of getting their cooperation in general is good. I do not include Korea in this estimate, for the reasons set forth.

In conclusion, the principal question here is the stability of the regime, and I think that it is that situation that we have to watch before we can determine what we can and should do down here.

I told Al Nufer, and he tells me that he told you, that I should probably want to go to Washington for consultation sometime this month. Here again, I have not wanted to hurry my trip because I was hopeful of having more to say as time went on, and more specific recommendations to make. On both counts I think I should still wait a while before going to Washington, unless you have something to say to me that you would prefer not to say in writing.

I know that if you have any suggestions you will give me the benefit of them. This is not a happy situation down here. In fact, I get sick at heart when I think of the unfortunate developments that may possibly occur here. So far, our ability to limit those possible unfortunate developments is practically nil, but I am trying to be alert to any possibility that we can be helpful in the future.

With kindest personal regards,

Sincerely yours, WILLARD

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller) to the Ambassador in Cuba (Beaulac)

SECRET OFFICIAL–INFORMAL [WASHINGTON,] June 10, 1952.

DEAR WILLARD: I have your excellent letter of June 2[1] about the general situation in Cuba and I thoroughly agree with you on every count. I see no point in your taking the initiative in going to see Batista. On the contrary, it seems to me that the present situation in Cuba is such that our attitude should be one of aloofness. The Cubans seem to be headed for a terrific mess both politically and economically and, as you say, our ability to limit these developments is almost non-existent. Consequently, if we become busybodies and take the initiative in approaching Batista to discuss our relations, we are liable to end up to some extent or another on the hook with an undischargeable responsibility for their problems. It seems to me that even Lopez Castro[2] and Mañas[3] when they came in to see me recently[4] on the sugar problem recognized that there was not very much we could do about it. Although their note[5] discussed a lot of possibilities, such as stockpiling, it seemed clear from their conversation that the only thing they seriously thought we could do about it was to press for an international sugar agreement. Even this could not be decisive. What the Cubans ought to do is to turn some of their cane land into grazing land for cattle thus reducing their sugar production to reasonable limits and take advantage of their enormous beef raising potential for which they have a ready outlet in this country. However, this would take three to five years, I suppose, and in the meantime all sorts of trouble can develop.

If you can come up we would be glad to see you whenever you decide that you want to come. I expect to be in Washington fairly steadily with the exception of (a) a couple of days in New York early next week, (b) the trip to Brazil[6] which will take me away about June 30–July 8 and (c) a trip to California late in July.

[6] Mr. Miller accompanied Secretary Acheson when he visited Brazil, July 2–8, 1952; for information on the Secretary's trip, see the editorial note, p. 586.

I had lunch with Luis Machado[7] yesterday and he is his old self once more. He has gotten what he said was the enthusiastic concurrence of his Government to vote for him as Executive Director of the International Bank and until the election is held in September, he will take a part-time job as a member of Gene Black's staff. He is quite pessimistic over the outlook in Cuba for the next three years and thinks that Batista got in at the worst possible time. He said that Batista was like the fellow who came in at the end of the party and was then handed the check. He said that Prio was sitting quietly in Miami enjoying life and almost relieved at being out from under in the nick of time.

Incidentally, on the question of the instability of the regime, Herbert Matthews of the New York Times tells me that they are getting rumors from Ruby Phillips[8] in Habana that there is friction between Batista and "the military junta". I said that I had heard these reports just after Batista took over but had not been hearing them recently.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

Editorial Note

By an exchange of notes, signed at Habana, June 26 and July 11, 1952, and entered into force on the latter date, the United States and Cuba agreed that for the present time United States armed forces missions in Cuba would perform the functions of a Military Assistance Advisory Group (MAAG), in accordance with provisions of the United States-Cuban Military Assistance Agreement. The notes were transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 76, from Habana, dated July 14, 1952 (737.5 MSP/7–1452).

In airgram A–273, to Habana, dated February 9, 1953, the Department informed the Embassy that the Department of Defense recommended the establishment in Cuba of a MAAG consisting of 3 officers and 4 enlisted personnel at a cost of $53,000 for an 18-month period, and instructed Ambassador Beaulac to initiate negotiations with the Cuban Government to determine the amount of local currency it would provide to cover United States administrative and operating costs in connection with the proposed MAAG (737.5 MSP/2–953).

In despatch 1309, from Habana, dated February 19, 1953, Ambassador Beaulac stated that he had "serious objection" to initiating negotiations for the establishment of a separate MAAG in Cuba for the following reasons: (1) the United States was committed not to establish a separate MAAG in Cuba, (2) there was no need for such a group, (3) there were already 38 military personnel in Cuba, in addition to those attached to the Embassy, and a separate MAAG would increase liaison problems and thus retard rather than expedite the MDAP program, and (4) because pressure on Cuba to accept a MAAG might jeopardize the chance of obtaining full military cooperation from Cuba (737.5 MSP/2–1953).

In airgram A–238, to Habana, dated March 20, 1953, the Department informed the Embassy that the Defense Department, after having recalculated its original estimate with respect to the size of a MAAG for Cuba, now recommended a complement of one officer and one enlisted man, and a local currency requirement of $11,700. The Department instructed Ambassador Beaulac to obtain the Cuban Government's consent to the assignment of a MAAG to Cuba, and to provide the necessary amount of local currency (737.5 MSP/2–1953).

In a note dated June 1, 1953, the Cuban Ministry of State indicated that the Cuban Government, at the present time, was unwilling to provide the local currency required to maintain a separate MAAG in Cuba, because MAAG functions were adequately being performed by the Chief of the United States Air Mission in Cuba, Colonel Fred G. Hook, Jr., who was acting as Chief of MAAG. A copy of the Cuban note was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 1918, from Habana, dated June 9, 1953, not printed (737.5 MSP/6–953).

The Department's airgram A–31, to Habana, dated July 27, 1953, contained a Defense Department message in which Defense stressed the necessity of establishing a separate MAAG in Cuba for the purpose of executing its statutory responsibilities with respect to the military assistance program, requested the Embassy to press for the local currency requirement, and recommended that if the Cuban Government continued to decline the United States should consider the indefinite suspension of the Cuban program (737.5 MSP/6–953).

Department of State records indicate that no separate MAAG was established in Cuba during 1953 or 1954.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 15, 1952.

A RECOMMENDED POSITION IN THE EVENT THAT CUBA SHOULD REQUEST THE DEPARTMENT'S VIEW ON THE SALE OF SUGAR BEHIND THE IRON-CURTAIN

BACKGROUND

As a result of increased plantings and favorable weather conditions, it is anticipated that Cuba's 1952 sugar crop will be the largest in that nation's history and that there will be a sugar surplus possibly approaching two million Spanish long tons. The Batista administration is extremely concerned about the effect that this surplus and subsequent possible surpluses can have on the price of sugar and about the repercussions that a fall in price could have on the Cuban economy. In accordance with a plan advanced by representatives of the Cuban sugar industry, the Cuban Government intends to take measures to restrict 1953 sugar production to five million Spanish long tons and to dispose of the surplus remaining from the 1952 crop over a period of five years. There is some dissatisfaction with this plan however, on the part of certain elements in the sugar industry and labor groups who would prefer unrestricted future production and the maintenance of the present level of employment.

Cuban Communists have seized this opportunity to initiate a press campaign in favor of Cuban trade with the Soviet bloc. Stressing the point that restriction of the sugar crop would mean "hunger, misery and ruin for labor and for the country," the Communists have suggested that Cuba open extensive commercial relations with China, the Soviet Union, and the "People's Democracies". Markets in these countries have been depicted in glowing terms by the Communist press.

It is believed that few responsible Cubans will entertain illusions about trade behind the "Iron Curtain". It appears probable, however, that every possible outlet for Cuban sugar will be explored. In this connection, Cuban representatives may be expected to request the views of the Department regarding the selling by Cuba of sugar behind the "Iron Curtain".

[1] Drafted by Cedric C. Phillip of the Office of Middle American Affairs; cleared with the Offices of Regional American Affairs, East European Affairs, and Chinese Affairs, the Economic Defense Staff, and the Agricultural Products Staff. Forwarded to Deputy Assistant Secretary Mann, Director of the Office of Regional American Affairs Cale, and Director of the Office of Middle American Affairs Rubottom under cover of a memorandum by Mr. Phillip, dated July 29, 1952. The covering memorandum indicates that Mr. Cale and Mr. Rubottom concurred; it also bears the following handwritten notation, initialed by Mr. Mann: "it is a commendable thing to anticipate problems of this kind and if the question is squarely put up to us this will make it possible to reach a conclusion very quickly. But, lawyer-like, I prefer to pass final judgement when the issue is drawn."

PROBLEM

What should be the position of the Department of State in the event that Cuban representatives request its views on selling by Cuba of sugar behind the "Iron Curtain".

FACTORS

Among the factors which should be brought into a consideration of the problem are the following:

(1) It is the policy, and in the best interest, of the United States to assist Cuba to maintain its economic and political stability and to develop its economy and political system.

(2) A failure by Cuba to dispose of its surplus sugar crop in an orderly manner and at normal prices could severely threaten both the economic and political stability of Cuba.

(3) Sugar is not considered a strategic commodity at the present time by the United States or by other nations of the free world. United States policy does not preclude its sale, or that of other items not included on strategic lists, to the U.S.S.R. and to the Eastern European nations comprising the Soviet bloc. Exports to Communist China and to North Korea, however, are not permitted by the United States and by many other members of the United Nations.

(4) The U.S.S.R. and the Eastern European countries of the Soviet bloc, according to available recent statistics, are in an export position as far as sugar is concerned. Communist China has a relatively small need for sugar imports, and its area has not furnished in the past a normal market for Cuban sugar. It would seem therefore, that the "Iron Curtain" countries do not constitute a market for Cuban sugar under normal circumstances.

(5) In the light of recent Communist divisive activity in Cuba and elsewhere, however, it would not be unlikely that a Communist country, for purely propagandistic reasons, would make an offer to purchase Cuban sugar. Such an offer probably would not be for a quantity of consequence, but it could have strong propaganda effect. To achieve this, the Communist countries might offer to make payment in dollars—something which the Cubans would probably require. Such payment from Communist China and/or North Korea would almost certainly involve United States banking facilities or Chinese credits in United States banks, either of which would be in contravention of United States Treasury regulations.

(6) The degree of opposition which the United States could express to Cuba's trade with Communist China is limited by the fact that United States policy does not call for special pressure against certain Western European countries such as Great Britain to desist in their "normal" trade in non-strategic commodities with Communist China.

(7) In both the UN and the OAS, Cuba has joined with the United States and the other free nations in measures which, in the former, recommend a strategic embargo against Communist China and North Korea and, in the latter, express agreement to cooperate fully in the adoption of measures of economic defense and security control. The United States would wish Cuba to observe these commitments and, also, to follow with the other nations of the free world as much as possible, the example of the United States in regard to trade behind the "Iron Curtain".

(8) The United States is not in a position to offer Cuba any substantial assistance in disposing of the sugar surplus. A Cuban delegation came recently to Washington to discuss with United States officials on an informal basis the situation in Cuba and to outline the measures being taken to relieve it. The delegation requested United States assistance in the intensification of efforts to reach a new International Sugar Agreement. It also asked that the United States Government consider certain additional measures collateral to the stabilization of the sugar market through an international agreement. It appears that the Cubans will have to be given a predominantly negative reply to the latter requests. The United States, however, already has taken a position in favor of a revised international agreement and will continue to support Cuba in international discussions toward this end.

In the light of the above factors and the present international situation, it is recommended that the Department adopt the following position:

(1) If Cuba should request the views of the Department of State in connection with consideration of a Cuban sale of sugar to the Soviet Union or to the Eastern European countries within the Soviet bloc, it is recommended that the Department point out to Cuba that the United States does not embargo the sale of non-strategic items such as sugar to these countries. The Department should then indicate that a decision to sell sugar to those countries is one for Cuba alone to make. It would be implicit in its reply that the Department has no overriding objection to such a sale.

(2) If views are asked in connection with a possible sale to Communist China or North Korea, it is recommended that the Department remind Cuba that the United States prohibits all exports to that area and that, accordingly, a Cuban sale of sugar to Communist China or to North Korea would not be viewed with favor. This reply should be accompanied by an expression of sympathy for the Cuban problem and of an appreciation for the Cuban inquiry and for past cooperation in denying the benefit of free world production to that area. If Cuba should refer to the United States attitudes regarding the trade in non-strategic commodities of certain Western European countries with Communist China, it can be pointed out that Cuba, unlike those European nations, has never developed a comparable pattern of trade with Communist China, and it is not in a position to plead the necessity of continuing an established trade. If Cuba, however, should indicate that the terms for the sale would involve an exchange of sugar for some strategic commodity which would add materially to the strength of the free world, it should be informed that this factor would be a consideration that might outweigh objections which would otherwise attach to the transaction.

Cuba's economic development in recent past has been retarded less by inadequate technical assistance than by official corruption and demagoguery and by nationalistic and restrictive laws and practices which have discouraged private investment. In circumstances our Point IV program is small and directed at objectives of immediate as well as long-range importance to United States and Cuba.

Most important is cooperative fiber project aimed at development Kenaf industry which in turn it is hoped will help make continent less dependent on bagging material from Far East.

Considerable success has attended program. Kenaf varieties developed adaptable Cuban conditions which have high percent good quality fiber and resistant disease. Decorticating methods and machinery developed and have demonstrated feasibility mechanizing extraction Kenaf fiber.

Although project still experimental, more than $1 million private capital invested in industry last year and all companies and private individuals now operating expected expand or continue plantings this year.

Cuban Government attaches great importance to Kenaf project and gives full credit American cooperation. Cuban requirements bagging fiber approximately 110 million pounds annually which would require 110,000 acres to grow and labor of 10,000 workers three months annually during sugar industry's dead season. Land for Kenaf industry immediately available without disturbing other crops or industries.

Minerals program and limited aid in specialized fields authorized but United States has failed implement program apparently for bureaucratic reasons. Program is of great importance to United States and should be implemented promptly.

Embassy recently instructed by Department State suggest to Cuban Government that present overall Point IV Agreement[2] which is working satisfactorily be replaced by more complicated and cumbersome agreement which probably would conflict with Cuban Constitution.

Embassy and competent Cuban officials opposed to adding to or replacing existing agreement at this time.

Cuban Air Force received grant aid during 1952 which is being used increase operational effectiveness aircraft. Additional such aid planned for 1953 and 1954. While grant aid given fairly promptly, great delays have occurred in connection reimbursable aid. Recommend reimbursable aid be given higher priority and encouraged and that red tape in connection therewith be reduced.

1953 program of grant aid is planned for Cuban Navy. Meanwhile, Cuban Government taking useful steps place vessels and naval aircraft in state of readiness.

Military coup 10 March 1952 raised delicate problems for United States in view close cooperation with Cuban Armed Forces which are more preoccupied with domestic political situation and maintaining own political position than with contributing continental defense. Essential our military assistance be quiet and discreet and that air and high-ranking military officers and public ceremonies in connection such visits be sharply limited.

Sudden decrease Cuban Government's revenues and fact majority Cuban people living under very difficult economic conditions makes it especially important we keep our requests for Cuban contributions in money to minimum.

Combination of (1) political tension following violent change in government which occurred 10 March 1952 when Batista assumed Presidency by force, and (2) sudden drop in income from sugar due to withholding large amount last year's crop from market and to limitation this year's crop naturally limits Cuba's ability cooperate in specific matters with United States. Nevertheless, present regime committed to policy cooperation and in some ways is giving more satisfactory cooperation than Constitutional regime which preceded it.

The Acting Secretary of State to the Embassy in Cuba

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, February 3, 1953.

Subject: Review of United States Interagency Discussions on Kenaf.

A–268. Reference Embassy's Telegram No. 342, January 16, 1953.[1] The following is a review of recent United States interagency discussions on kenaf:

(1) In late November 1952 the Munitions Board Interdepartmental Fibers Committee reviewed the kenaf fiber purchase program for 1952 and considered the question of whether the program should be continued in the future. The following recommendations were adopted unanimously and subsequently accepted by the Munitions Board:

(a) That the MB request the Department of Agriculture to continue, perhaps in modified form, a kenaf fiber production program. The Committee recognizes that in the present circumstances the fiber purchase goal need not be as large as the 1952 goal of 15 million pounds; perhaps a reduction of one fourth to one half may be feasible. Suitable modifications in the price schedule also appear desirable.

(b) That the Committee also recommends the establishment, under the Defense Production Act,[2] of a research and development project to study and develop kenaf fiber-preparation processes (mechanical decortication, chemical extraction, water-retting, or other means).

(2) However, the Defense Production Administration (the agency which has responsibility for certifying the essentiality of the kenaf fiber purchase program) concurred in recommendation (a) only on the condition that the Committee adopt a resolution along the lines of (b). The DPA representatives noted that CCC's 1951 and 1952 seed and fiber purchase programs offered proof of the fact that kenaf can be grown successfully in a number of western hemisphere countries. On the other hand, they believed that comparatively little progress had been made toward the successful mechanization of kenaf cultivation and fiber extraction. With jute again in a surplus position, and likely to continue to be in ample supply in the foreseeable future, the prospects of the western hemisphere's kenaf production becoming competitive with jute are greatly reduced. The DPA representatives questioned that continuation of a fiber purchase program for another year would contribute to the solution of the problem of achieving economical production and extraction methods. In their opinion much more could be accomplished by concentrating resources on a machinery research and development project. Other agencies, including State, agreed with the DPA officials as to the desirability of establishing such a project and welcomed their proposal to sponsor the undertaking. (In previous discussions the Committee had been given to understand that the legislative authority for DPA to finance such an undertaking was lacking.) On the other hand, they considered that one year's operation did not offer a fair test of the value of the fiber purchase program. They feared that by withdrawing at this time both the Government and the growers might lose the benefit of the substantial investment which has been made in kenaf and the knowledge which has been gained. Furthermore, they considered that an extension of the fiber purchase program could contribute to the solution of the problem by encouraging the utilization of existing facilities, which are comparatively untried. They believed that by reducing the scale of the program and by appropriate adjustments in prices, the cost of the fiber program would be modest in comparison with the benefits which might be derived. The DPA representatives then modified their position and assented to continuation of a fiber purchase program in 1953 on the condition mentioned above.

(3) Unfortunately when DPA began its plans for the implementation of recommendation (b) it was found their legal authority to finance this kind of a project was questionable. Consequently, they withdrew their previous offer, and requested the Munitions Board to reopen the subject. This development took place just before the time the Official Cuban Government Commission on Kenaf visited Washington. (A copy of a memorandum of conversation[3] on a meeting held with the Cuban Commission is being forwarded to the Embassy.)

(4) In the past week two lines of action have been started with a view to resolving this matter at the earliest possible date.

(i) Consultations are under way with the Technical Cooperation Administration to see whether that agency can help finance a long term project to develop improved bast fiber production processes. Since the purpose of TCA is to assist governments through providing technical rather than financial assistance, the major financing of such an undertaking would by necessity have to come principally from the interested foreign governments.

(ii) An interdepartmental working group is developing data on soft fiber supply and requirements based on full mobilization. Justification for the continuation of a fiber purchase program in 1953 will largely depend on the results of this study. In this connection, it should be noted that while kenaf may offer some promise as a bagging fiber for western hemisphere countries which have soft-fiber weaving facilities, this consideration does not apply in respect to the United States. There is practically no burlap-weaving machinery in this country, and little prospect that private interests will invest in such facilities. Government financing of burlap-weaving facilities is considered extremely unlikely. Therefore, so far as U.S. strategic considerations are concerned, the need for kenaf would depend in main on the position in soft fibers. There is some possibility that kenaf may be of strategic value as an extender for hard fibers but this is still conjectural.

(5) As matters now stand it seems very unlikely that final action with respect to a kenaf fiber purchase program will be taken before another 4 to 6 weeks.

The above is for the information of the Embassy only. It is suggested that in replying to any inquiries on the status of the United States Government kenaf development activities the Embassy may at its discretion make use of the following information:

[3] Not printed.

(i) Cuba's cooperation in fostering kenaf cultivation has been very gratifying. It is considered that great progress has been made from the agronomic standpoint. Although the disease problem has not been entirely overcome, prospects for developing disease resistant strains appear favorable.

(ii) Progress toward economical methods of mechanization has been disappointing particularly in view of the considerable sums of private capital which have been invested. Research and development in kenaf harvesting and fiber extraction and processing machinery is needed. The Technical Cooperation Administration has expressed the expectation of continuing the Cooperative Fiber Commission at about the present level. In addition it is exploring the possibility of establishing a long term project to develop improved bast fiber production processes.

(iii) The annual review of the strategic significance of kenaf is under way, and should be completed in another 4 to 6 weeks. There is as yet no basis for predicting whether this review will provide the necessary justification for the use of United States Government funds for subsidizing kenaf fiber purchases in 1953. Consequently, assurances of continuation of the fiber purchase program cannot be given at this time.

The Department will notify the Embassy as soon as action on the kenaf fiber purchase program is finalized.

Subject: Request by Representative of Freeport Sulphur Company for Appointment to discuss Nicaro

Several weeks ago Mr. Spruille Braden[2] asked me to arrange an appointment with you for himself and Mr. Langbourne Williams, President of Freeport Sulphur Company, to present the views of the company regarding the operation of the nickel plant wholly owned by the United States Government at Nicaro, Cuba, after you had had an opportunity to familiarize yourself with this situation.

This memorandum summarizes the principal developments with respect to Nicaro since late 1950, with particular emphasis upon the objections and interests of Freeport Sulphur. Officers of the Bureau familiar with the background will be glad to amplify this summary if you should wish.

Freeport interest in Nicaro

Freeport operated the plant under contract with the United States Government during World War II and until its closing in 1947 as an uneconomic enterprise. Freeport owns the nickel-ferrous ore deposits now used by the plant and receives a generous royalty from the present operator. Freeport itself did not compete in 1950 for the right to operate the rehabilitated plant, but American Smelting & Refining Company, an unsuccessful bidder, had made an arrangement with Freeport to give it a half non-controlling interest in the proposed operating company in lieu of royalties.

Freeport critical of General Services' Operation of Nicaro

Freeport has been critical of the award of the operating contract in January 1951 to the Nickel Processing Corporation organized and then controlled by the Dutch Billiton company, but having a minority Cuban participation. It has criticized both the principle of Cuban participation and the reputation of one of the Cubans having an interest in the participating Cuban company. It has expressed resentment over the criticism by the then Cuban Government (expressed in a letter[3] from then President Prio to ex-President Truman urging Cuban participation) of labor relations during its operation of Nicaro during World War II. Freeport has indicated it now is itself interested in operating Nicaro, and would like to bid for the privilege on an equal basis with other interested parties. It is undoubtedly influenced by the increase in the market price of nickel, the continuing demand for defense requirements, including stockpiling, and the development by the United States Government of additional ore reserves in connection with a projected expansion of Nicaro with consequent reduced dependence upon Freeport ore.

General Services the responsible Government Agency

The General Services Administration was given the responsibility in 1950 to rehabilitate and bring back into operation the Nicaro nickel plant in order to meet defense needs for this critical metal. In early 1951 it awarded the rehabilitation contract to the Frederick Snare Corporation and the operating contract to the Dutch Billiton company, which had in General Services' opinion submitted a better bid than the only other bidder, the American Smelting & Refining Company. The Munitions Board had certified these two companies and a third which did not bid to be competent to operate Nicaro. General Services approved the arrangement by which the Billiton Company organized the [3] Dated Oct. 7, 1950, not printed.

Nickel Processing Corporation to operate Nicaro and gave a minority participation in the ownership and direction of the company to both a Cuban group and the National Lead Company. It subsequently approved in May 1952 the sale by Billiton of its interest to National Lead and the Cuban group, leaving National Lead with 60 percent ownership and management control. Finally in February 1953 General Services confirmed a five-year management contract with the Nickel Processing Corporation to extend to mid-1957.

Department of State Activity in Nicaro Operation

The Department of State, while recognizing the legal responsibility of General Services for the operation of Nicaro, has had an active and continuing interest in this activity. The Department recommended that the letter of October 7, 1950, from President Prio of Cuba to President Truman, which stressed the advantages of Cuban participation in Nicaro, receive a non-committal reply and be referred to the agencies responsible for selection of an operator. The Department subsequently communicated to General Services in late 1950 the desire of the Cuban Government, repeatedly affirmed to our Ambassador in Habana and by the Cuban Ambassador in Washington, for Cuban capital and management participation in the reactivated Nicaro plant. In communicating the Cuban Government's views, the Department emphasized that it endorsed no particular Cuban group, but recommended serious consideration by General Services of Cuban participation in principle provided it was on a bona fide, business-like basis.

In July 1951 the Department informed General Services, which had consulted the Department, that the Department perceived no objection to General Services approval of the arrangement negotiated by the selected operator with the only Cuban group interested in participating in the ownership and management of the operating company. Since 1950 the Department and Embassy Habana have continually helped to facilitate the rehabilitation and operation by securing Cuban Government cooperation, such as granting customs exemptions and port privileges, admitting foreign technicians and resolving labor disputes. We have continued to assist in a projected program for plant expansion by securing Cuban Government approval of ore exploration on public lands and a Cuban Government commitment for comprehensive tax exemptions.[4]

Nicaro a Producing Defense Plant

Nicaro reached full production in July 1952 and is producing nickel oxide at the rate of 27.5 million pounds per annum. The operating company is committed to research in the further development of nickel production and the reclamation of cobalt. The United States Government invested 32 million dollars in the original plant and 12 million dollars in the rehabilitation, and for your confidential information, has in prospect an expansion program which would cost about 43 million dollars and would increase plant capacity by about 75 percent.

Attitude of New Cuban Government to Nicaro Operation

The Batista Government like the Prio Government wants Nicaro to continue as a permanent Cuban industry. It is willing to grant tax exemptions and other privileges because Nicaro is a non-profit United States Government-financed industry, contributing to hemisphere and free world defense and to the Cuban economy. The Cuban group which purchased participation in the operating company was sponsored by the Prio Government, and its initial spokesman, Inocente Alvarez, was close to Prio and does not have the confidence of the Batista Government. The Batista Government informed us in July 1952 that it viewed the Prio letter as irregular and as having no validity, and that the United States Government need not feel obligated by it. The Batista Government refused, however, to send another communication to the United States Government to overcome the effects of the Prio letter, as requested by a Freeport representative, and took the position that the operation of Nicaro is a United States responsibility. Furthermore, the Batista Government has indicated it does not wish to disturb the existing arrangement under which Nicaro is operated with Cuban participation. A prominent pro-Batista lawyer, Oscar García Montes, was secretary of the Cuban participating company when established and is now one of the two Cuban directors of the operating company. General Services Administration states the Cuban participants have been very helpful in the Nicaro operation, especially in labor relations and development of new ore reserves.

Recommendation

The Freeport representatives may attack the General Services Administration for decisions disliked by Freeport. In commenting upon their statement, it is recommended you emphasize General Services' statutory authority and responsibility for Nicaro and stress the Department's limited interest and contribution. It may be advisable to affirm that the Department recommended that General Services consider the desirability of Cuban participation, because the Cuban Government strongly urged it and because the Department approved participation by Cuban nationals in principle. In such case, you should emphasize that the Department recommended no particular Cuban group.

The Department made no objection to the approval by General Services of the arrangement negotiated by the selected operator under which a Cuban corporation composed of Cubans genuinely interested in Nicaro for several years and possessing knowledge and experience useful to the operating company, purchased a 20 percent participation. If the approval of this arrangement should be attacked because of the interest of Alberto Inocente Alvarez, ex-Cuban Minister of Commerce, Minister of State and UN representative, because of his alleged private immorality and venality in public office, you might comment that he was not a shareholder of the Cuban corporation when first organized and has not, so far as is known, been actively connected with the direction of the operating company, or had any contact with United States Government officials in connection with the operation of Nicaro. You may inform the Freeport representatives that a high official of the Batista Government assured the United States Ambassador in June 1952 that it has nothing against Freeport Sulphur.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 21, 1953.

Subject: Discontinuation of CCC Purchase Program for Kenaf Fiber.

At a meeting on April 14 of the Inter-Agency Committee on the Kenaf Fiber Purchase Program,[2] the representatives of ODM stated that they were recommending to Mr. Flemming of their agency that the Kenaf Fiber Purchase Program not be continued. Those representatives said that this recommendation would be accompanied by a draft of a letter from Mr. Flemming to Secretary of Agriculture Benson, advising him that ODM could not certify the Kenaf Fiber Purchase Program for subsidization under the Defense Production Act. It is understood that Mr. Flemming will accept the recommendation.

The CCC Fiber Purchase Program has existed only for the crop year 1952. For one year prior to that there was a Purchase Program for kenaf seeds only. I am informed that the decision to engage in a Fiber Purchase Program was motivated by a desire to develop a source of supply of a jute substitute in this hemisphere, because of security considerations. A secondary consideration was the hope that such a program would assist in the improvement of production processes, which have been both inefficient and costly.

[2] A memorandum by Willard O. Brown of the Agricultural Products Staff to Mr. Evans, dated Apr. 17, 1953, summarizing the referenced meeting, is contained in MID files, lot 56 D 569, "Kenaf Fiber Project."

This decision was taken, and the program operated, apart from the work of the Cooperative Fiber Commission, sponsored jointly by the Governments of the United States and Cuba, which had existed since 1942. That Commission had developed suitable strains of kenaf, and was and is engaged in efforts to develop more efficient processing methods. Our Government is interested in the work of the Commission for the security considerations stated above, and also on the grounds of technical assistance, since the development on a sound economic basis of a crop such as kenaf in Cuba is a step towards diversification of that country's agricultural economy as well as a means of freeing it from dependence on foreign sources of supply for bagging its principal commodity, sugar. The Cuban Government, of course, is interested primarily only in the latter considerations.

It has been the opinion of this office, and of those offices of the E area of the Department concerned with the Fiber Purchase Program, that the determination for the need for, and the justification of, any such program must be based on security considerations, which are principally the concern of other agencies of our Government. The previous programs were based on such considerations, and were financed by DPA, which has now been absorbed by ODM. At the meeting on April 14, Dr. Morgan of ODM, which now administers the Defense Production Act, stated that his agency has been charged with reviewing all expansion programs with two considerations in mind: (1) a reduced military urgency (based on consultations with the Joint Chiefs of Staff); and (2) a desire to save money under the new administration's economy program. He then stated that ODM had concluded that since neither kenaf nor jute, for which kenaf is a substitute, is a strategic or critical material, the proposed Kenaf Purchase Program for 1953 did not meet the revised criteria to warrant further developmental expenditures for subsidization under the DPA Act. None of the representatives of other agencies present produced evidence or arguments which offset that conclusion. Mr. Brown of the Agricultural Products Staff of the Department was present, and made a statement which had been prepared in consultation with this office. He said that the Department's position on this question has always been that the determination of need for, and the justification of, the Kenaf Fiber Purchase Program must be made strictly on the basis of security considerations. At a previous meeting of the interdepartmental working committee on fibers, the Department's representative recognized, along with other members of the fibers committee, that the documentation of the program was insufficient, and urged that steps be taken to correct this situation as quickly as possible. Some of this material had been presented today, he stated.

He said that the State Department representative had previously pointed out that delay in determining the fate of this program was already causing difficulties in our relations with Cuba, and that the longer the Government took to reach a decision the more serious would be the repercussions if the decision were against continuation of the program. He expressed the belief that there is no doubt that the prolonged consideration that has been given to this program has kept the hopes of its continuance alive in Cuba and other interested countries, and that a decision to drop the Kenaf Purchase Program at this late date could have very unfortunate repercussions on our foreign relations.

This office feels that the discontinuance of the Fiber Purchase Program will be a severe blow to the commerical producers of kenaf in Cuba, who do not apparently have any other market for their product, and may well cause the collapse of commerical production of kenaf in that country. It is our understanding that these producers have invested over one million dollars in the industry as it now stands. However, we are informed that there is at present no market for kenaf, so long as adequate supplies of jute are available, and that the trade considers kenaf a poor and inadequate substitute for jute. In order for the growing of kenaf to become an economically sound industry, it will be necessary for more efficient methods of production to be developed. For Cuban kenaf to be available in the form of bags for sugar or other crops in Cuba or the United States, it will be necessary for a bagging industry to be developed, since the material for jute bags used in the western hemisphere is either received from the far eastern sources as bags, or as cloth which is simply cut to size and sewn into bags, and neither country has a suitable weaving industry. It is our understanding that the present cost of production of kenaf would have to be greatly reduced, to less than half its present level. It does not therefore appear that the commercial production of kenaf is at present a sound venture, or that those persons who have been engaged in it should be encouraged to continue. It was fully explained to the foreign producers who produced kenaf under the previous Fiber Purchase Program that there could be no guarantee of continuance, and that there is no obligation on the part of the United States Government to do so.

For the various reasons given above, this office recommends that the decision reached by ODM be accepted, and that no further efforts be made by ARA to obtain an extension of the Fiber Purchase Program.

This decision will undoubtedly be disappointing to the Cuban Government. However, this office has been informed by Mr. Peterson[3] of IIAA and Mr. Horn[4] of the Department of Agriculture, who has been closely connected with the Cooperative Fiber Program since its inception, that the Cuban Government appears determined to continue with that Program, and that the decision not to continue a Fiber Purchase Program, may well strengthen the determination of that Government, and encourage it to place even greater emphasis on attempts to develop a sound kenaf industry. Mr. Horn adds that the Cooperative Commission is actively investigating various ways of improving the production processes of kenaf, by mechanical, chemical or retting methods, and there is good basis for hope that the investigations will lead to production methods of greatly increased efficiency in the near future. Another difficulty in connection with the kenaf industry has been the lack of mechanical harvesting methods, and Mr. Horn states that that problem is being tackled by our Department of Agriculture. In view of these opinions, this office further recommends that the Department of Agriculture and the IIAA be urged and assisted to proceed as rapidly as possible with the work now going forward in the Cooperative Fiber Commission, and that any tendency on the part of either of those agencies to reduce their support of that Commission be opposed as strongly as possible by ARA.

[3] Presumably Robert R. Peterson.

When the decision of ODM has become final, through the medium of a letter[5] from Mr. Flemming addressed to Secretary of Agriculture Benson, an airgram[6] will be sent to our Embassy at Habana setting forth that decision and the reasons given by ODM, and requesting the Embassy to inform the Cuban Government thereof and at the same time explain our continuing interest in the Cooperative Fiber Commission. It will be submitted to you for prior approval.[7]

[7] In a letter dated Aug. 20, 1953, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture John H. Davis informed Assistant Secretary Cabot that interested Government agencies had concluded that it was inadvisable to continue the kenaf fiber purchase program, because the program had accomplished much of its original purpose of demonstrating the feasibility of producing kenaf fiber in the Western Hemisphere for use in emergencies (837.232/8–2053).

The Ambassador in Cuba (Beaulac) to the Department of State[1]

CONFIDENTIAL HABANA, July 14, 1953.

No. 99

Subject: Quarterly Report on Operation and Status of Programs Under the Mutual Security Act of 1951.

---

[1] Drafted by Ambassador Beaulac.

Economic and Political Conditions.

The Cuban Government which took office through force on March 10, 1952 has maintained order but has failed to win substantial political support. Outside of President Batista's own party, which is not one of the most important political groups, and outside the armed services, the Government has little organized support. The opposition, moreover, has made some progress toward uniting its forces. A continuous war of nerves is being carried on against the Government and predictions of rebellion and disorders are freely made.

The political difficulties of the Batista regime have been increased by a sharp decline in Cuba's economy due to a world sugar surplus which developed shortly after the Government came into office. The Government has been obliged to discharge a large number of employees, to decree reductions in salaries of all remaining employees, and otherwise to effect budget economies. Despite these adjustments, it will probably be impossible for the Government to balance its budget during the present year.

The Batista Government is friendly and cooperative toward the United States and the military services are cooperative, with the limitation that in existing circumstances their principal interest and effort is to maintain and if possible improve the Government's domestic political position and their own political position.

Point Four.

Cuba's economic development has been retarded principally by corrupt and demagogic government and by nationalistic and restrictive laws and practices which discourage foreign and domestic private capital from making the contribution they otherwise might be willing to make.

In the circumstances, our Point IV program in Cuba has been small and has been directed at objectives of immediate as well as long-range importance to the United States as well as to Cuba.

The most important project is the Cooperative Fiber project, which is aimed at the development of the kenaf industry.

Spurred by war conditions which threatened the supply of bagging material from the Far East, a cooperative fiber program between the United States Department of Agriculture and the Cuban Ministry of Agriculture was launched in 1943. In 1951 it was made a cooperative Point IV project. Technical direction continued under the United States Department of Agriculture. During the period of the project's existence kenaf varieties have been developed, adaptable to Cuban conditions, which have a high per cent of good quality fiber. They are also comparatively resistant to disease. Decorticating methods and machinery have been developed and under test have demonstrated the feasibility of mechanizing the extraction of kenaf fiber.

On the basis of the above developments and encouraged by a fiber purchase program of the United States Government, private industry invested heavily in decorticating installations during 1952. The United States Government has now abruptly discontinued its fiber purchase program, and the prospect is that much of the private capital invested will be lost.

The cooperative kenaf program is given great importance by the Ministry of Agriculture. The Cuban Government recognizes the value of a local source of bagging fiber, as Cuba's needs alone approximate 110,000,000 pounds annually, which would require 110,000 acres to grow the fiber and the labor of 10,000 workers for a period of three months annually.

The three months during which workers would be employed in the kenaf industry occur during the sugar industry's "dead season", and the kenaf industry would therefore help very importantly to overcome the serious seasonal unemployment in the sugar industry.

Upon the request of the Cuban Government, the Cooperative Fiber Program (not the fiber purchase program), was recently extended under agreement for a period of two years (June 23, 1953 through June 30, 1955). This will provide for continuation of technical assistance.

On June 29, 1953, two additional agreements which incorporated extending technical aid to Cuba were implemented through the completion of an exchange of notes.[2] Under these agreements we will furnish mining engineers and geologists for the purpose of the location and development of minerals that are in short supply in the United States.

Military.

Modest grant aid continues to be given to the Cuban Air Force and Navy. The Air Force, which appears to be particularly favored by the Cuban Government in the way of funds, has made commendable utilization of the aid given. The amount of cooperation which the Navy is prepared to give is not so clear. The difficulty there appears to be a shortage of funds and the circumstance that under existing political conditions naval vessels tend to be retained in ports for domestic political reasons. Likewise, improvement in Navy organization is made difficult or impossible because of mutual suspicions within the Navy due to political and other circumstances.

[2] The referenced notes, dated Mar. 31, June 27 and 29, 1953, entered into force on the latter date, were transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch Totec 32, dated July 6, 1953, not printed (837.00 TA/7–653).

Because of the unsatisfactory political situation, our military aid continues to be modest and to be extended in the most discreet manner possible. Our armed services are enjoined to give the least possible publicity to the aid they are giving the Cuban armed services. Such things as the exchange of decorations among military officers of the two governments, and other public demonstrations of solidarity between the armed forces of the two countries which are capable of giving Cubans the impression that the armed forces of the United States sympathize with the existing intervention of the Cuban military in the politics of the country, should be enjoined.

Because of the sharp decline in Cuba's economy and because Cuba is faced with a budgetary deficit, it is especially important that the United States should not ask the Cuban Government to make any expenditures which are not absolutely necessary. In particular, no unnecessary expenditures for the administration of the Mutual Assistance Security Act[3] should be indulged in and no personnel not needed for the administration of the Act should be assigned here by MSA. The present system under which the Chief of the Air Force Mission is Acting Chief of MAAG, and the Chief of the Naval Mission is Chief of the Naval Section of MAAG, is entirely satisfactory and should be continued in the interest of economy and of efficiency.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 25, 1953.

Subject: Political Situation and Possible Political Settlement in Cuba

Participants: Ambassador Concheso
Mr. Wellman, MID

Ambassador Concheso argued that the proposition of Dr. Cosme de la Torriente for a restoration of the 1940 Constitution which he admitted had considerable popular support, would be impossible legally and constitutionally. He contended that a constitution can be imposed in one of two ways, namely (1) by a constitutional assembly elected by the sovereign people, and (2) by a coup d'état which imposes a constitution by the authority of force. He said that while the Batista Government had the authority to destroy the Constitution of 1940 and to impose a new constitution, neither it nor the Supreme Court had the authority (the poder constituente) to restore the 1940 Constitution.

Ambassador Concheso expressed the opinion that the Supreme Court would deny the appeal against the 1952 Constitutional Statutes after permitting Zaydin,[1] who is arguing the appeal, to talk as long as he wished against the Batista Government.

The Ambassador referred to President Batista's plan to have partial elections in June 1954 and thereafter to have a plebiscite on the 1940 Constitution. He said that it was possible that Batista might change this plan and have at the same time both general elections and a plebiscite on the Constitution.

The Ambassador expressed doubt that it would be feasible to establish a "neutral" provisional government to supervise the elections. He questioned whether any individual or group in Cuba is neutral. He observed that Batista has a very good record for fair supervision of elections and abiding by the result though it might be adverse to him or his party. Ambassador Concheso acknowledged that the present governmental situation is a temporary one and that Cuba must return to democratic government since the genius of the Cuban people requires it.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 25, 1953.

Subject: Communist Influence in Cuba

Participants: Ambassador Concheso, Cuban Ambassador
Mr. Wellman, MID

Mr. Wellman referred to the adverse publicity which the Batista Government had received in Newsweek as a result of the election of five communists to the directorate of the Tobacco Workers Federation. He told the Ambassador that the political opposition to President Batista had alleged that there are communists in the Cuban Government and that it is under communist influence. He told the Ambassador that this had provoked inquiries from members of the United States Congress, in reply to which the Department had pointed out the evidence of anti-communist attitude and activity of the Cuban Government.

The Ambassador expressed interest in the publicity in Newsweek. He commented that the sindical elections under Batista are free, whereas there was a totalitarian control of labor unions under the Auténticos.

The Ambassador said that he would explore while in Cuba the possibility of promulgation of the anti-communist law which has been under consideration. He recalled that he had obtained from the Department copies of United States legislation and expressed the opinion that it could not serve as a pattern for Cuba. He observed that it would be necessary under Cuban law to identify ("typify") the activity or affiliation and not be sufficient to stipulate that it is illegal to plot the overthrow of the government by force or violence. The Ambassador said that he had sent to the Cuban Government a draft project of law which he had prepared. He expressed the opinion that the law could provide that a communist could not be a member or officer of a labor union. He declared that there would be more difficulty in eliminating communists from education, particularly from teaching in the public schools. He said that while many communists in the field of education are well known, e.g. Marinello,[1] others are not known. He also observed that an attempt to have Marinello and other communist teachers dismissed because they are communists would provoke a mixed reaction. He said that some might criticize such action as another example of the "Batista tyranny".

The Ambassador acknowledged that reports of current activity by communists in positions in the Ministries of Labor and Education should be looked into. He pointed out, however, that many Cubans who were communists or affiliated with the communists when relations were good with Russia are among the strongest anti-communists now.

Subject: Revolutionary Activities of Cuban Exiles in the United States

Participants: Ambassador Concheso
Mr. Wellman, MID

Ambassador Concheso said that after he had made arrangements at the suggestion of President Batista to return to Cuba on July 27, he had received a cablegram[1] from the Minister of State, who did not know of his plans, also requesting that he return on that date. The Ambassador said that he thought the instructions from the Minister of State might be related to the seizure by the Cuban Navy in Habana during the past week of arms and munitions brought into Cuba from the United States. He said that his Naval Attaché had reported this seizure to him.

The Ambassador said that President Batista was surprised at the freedom which Prio and his associates have in the United States. He recalled that he had been unofficially in contact with the Department of State regarding the activities of the Cuban exiles subsequent to the Dallas and Forth Worth incidents and the Mamaroneck arms seizure. He was therefore aware of the action and investigations of United States law enforcement agencies.

Since the Ambassador had referred to United States obligations to enforce its neutrality laws, Mr. Wellman observed that the United States Government also must be careful not to bring legal action against a distinguished ex-President of a friendly country in the absence of clear proof of violation of United States laws. Ambassador Concheso said that he recognized this and observed that he had not been asked to make any official representations to the Department of State on this matter.

Ambassador Concheso expressed the conviction that Prio is supplying the funds for the purchase of arms and munitions and also for recruitment. Since the Ambassador referred to the Caribbean Legion[2] in this connection, Mr. Wellman observed that there appears to be no evidence that any considerable group of persons has been recruited either in Mexico or in adjoining countries for an expedition against Cuba.

Ambassador Concheso expressed the opinion that Prio was crazy (loco) in wanting to bring about a "Bogotazo" in Cuba.[3]

Ambassador Concheso stated that the recent visit of ex-President Arevalo to Cuba where he saw President Batista had caused concern to the Governments of Nicaragua, the Dominican Republic and Venezuela. He said that he had been with Ambassador Sevilla-Sacasa[4] when President Somoza had phoned the Ambassador expressing concern. He said that he would find out more about the meeting of Batista and Arevalo when he went to Cuba.

Mr. John L. Topping, MID

Ambassador Concheso stated that the attempted revolution at Santiago de Cuba on July 26, 1953[1] had strengthened the Government's position since it had shown that the armed forces are solidly behind the Government, which would handle promptly and efficiently any attempted revolution. He said that a portion of the opposition to the present Government was prepared to participate in elections, but that another portion, headed by deposed Carlos Prío and his adherents, had thus far preferred to undertake insurrectionary activities. He added that the attempt at Santiago de Cuba had not been directly connected with the Prío group, but that Prío had supplied money for the arms used in that effort.

In response to an inquiry from General Smith whether the Cuban Government now felt sufficiently secure to undertake a return to constitutional government, the Ambassador stated that constitutional guarantees would be restored in about four weeks and that the Government would proceed with its plans to hold elections for Congress in June 1954.

Subject: Cuban Government Plans to Control Communism

Participants: The Under Secretary
Dr. Aurelio F. Concheso, Ambassador of Cuba
Mr. John L. Topping, MID

Ambassador Concheso had just returned from a visit to Cuba, where he had discussed this matter with General Batista. He referred to a previous conversation[1] with the Under Secretary on the subject.

[1] Reference uncertain.

The Ambassador stated that Cuba's new Public Order Law established control of communist activities in Cuba. (The Ambassador mentioned the "third sentence" of this Law. Presumably, he referred to the Public Order Law contained in Decree 997, published on August 7, 1953, Articles 2 and 3 of Chapter I of which contain wording making overt or covert propaganda of various kinds, including communism, illegal.) The Ambassador added that the Cuban Government planned to introduce a resolution to control communist activities at the Tenth Inter-American Conference scheduled to be held at Caracas in 1954.[2] (The Ambassador first said that the resolution would be "against" communism, and later said it would be intended to "outlaw" communism.) He stated that he expected that Guatemala would oppose such a resolution. The Under Secretary concurred in this view, pointing out that it was uncertain whether Guatemala would attend the meeting, and adding that such a resolution would have a greater chance of success if support for it were obtained in advance of the Conference. The Ambassador said that he felt sure that there would be considerable support, mentioning specifically Brazil.

The Ambassador continued that the recent changes in the Electoral Code would effectively prevent the Communist Party from participating in the elections scheduled for June 1, 1954. (The Electoral Code as modified by the present administration in Law-Decree 723 of February 27, 1953, requires in Article 41 that a party registered to participate in the elections must obtain four percent or more of the total of registered voters in the country. This will make it difficult for the Communist Party to qualify.)

The Under Secretary expressed pleasure at the information supplied by Ambassador Concheso. He said he had long felt that Batista was a realistic and intelligent person, who was fully aware that it was impossible successfully to compromise with or to attempt to use communism.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am seriously concerned to learn that

[1] The source text, which is neither initialed nor signed, was drafted by Paul E. Callahan of the Agricultural Products Staff, with the assistance of Mr. Wellman; the file copy, presumably a copy of the signed original, dated June 4, 1954, was not found in the Department of State files (811.235/6–454).

United States sugar producers are advocating that the Sugar Act,[2] which has run less than two years of its four-year extension be reopened to increase mainland cane and beet sugar quotas by 225,000 tons and to give domestic areas a 55 percent share in future increases in United States consumption requirements. These modifications would increase the participation of domestic areas almost entirely at the expense of Cuba. As you will recall, beginning only last year domestic quotas were increased by 176,000 tons and the percentage participation of full-duty countries was trebled, with a corresponding reduction of the participation of Cuba in this market.

The proposal of domestic sugar interests seems inconsistent with the understanding when the Sugar Act was last extended that quotas would not be changed during the four-year period of its extension in order to give foreign producers assurance of a stable United States market for a definite term and Cuba in particular the benefit of increases in United States consumption.

This loss was an attempt to compensate Cuba for the loss of approximately 240,000 tons of our market, and even this benefit would be lost if the Act is now further amended as proposed.

The proposal of the domestic sugar producers if adopted would seriously injure the Cuban economy, which is already suffering from severe curtailment of sugar production, greatly reduced exports and lower prices. It would inevitably be followed by decreased United States agricultural and industrial exports to this sixth best United States market and possibly by exchange controls and import restrictions. It would be inconsistent with our cooperation with Cuba to obtain an international sugar agreement, and bitter repayment for Cuba's effective efforts, which United States producers have commended, to stabilize the sugar market. It would seem to ignore the fact that Cuba has been a reliable expansible source of sugar in both war and peace, a strategic concept which should not be jeopardized. Finally the proposed reduction of Cuban participation in our sugar market might easily tip the scales to cause revolution in Cuba, and would certainly increase instability and promote anti-American feeling and communist activity in an area of great strategic and economic importance to the United States.

The Department of State consequently opposes the proposed modification of the Sugar Act as prejudicial to our relations with the Republic of Cuba and inimical to the preservation of the important strategic and economic interest of the United States in Cuba and the entire Caribbean area.[3]

[3] In a reply dated June 18, 1954, Secretary Benson stated that Secretary Dulles' letter provided helpful guidance for the Department of Agriculture with respect to the conferences it was holding with representatives of the sugar industry. He further stated that it appeared that progress was being made toward achieving full consideration of the matter prior to any legislative action concerning sugar (811.235/6–1854).

Eisenhower Library, Eisenhower papers, Whitman file, Dulles–Herter series

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, June 7, 1954.

Subject: Proposed Modification of Sugar Act Unwise and Unfair.

The Ambassador of Cuba has requested, upon instruction from President Batista, an audience with you to bring to your attention the grave consequences which would result for Cuba if the Sugar Act should be modified as proposed by certain segments of the domestic sugar industry to increase United States quotas by 225,000 tons and to provide that domestic producers receive 55% of further increases in United States consumption.

The Sugar Act of 1951 provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall estimate total United States requirements annually. It establishes a tonnage to be supplied by domestic producers and provides that the excess shall go to foreign producers. The quotas established in the 1951 Act caused a reduction in Cuba's annual exports to the United States of approximately 240,000 tons. Cuba accepted this reduction because the Act allocates to foreign producers any increases in United States consumption. She interpreted this as giving her a chance to recoup the 240,000 tons by which the 1951 Act reduced her sales. She was led to this conclusion by the position assumed by the spokesman for the domestic sugar industry who stated to the House Committee on Agriculture that the 1951 bill would settle the question of quotas for the four-year period ending in 1956 which it contemplates. This position of the United States industry spokesman was accorded much weight by the Cuban Government.

Without objection from the Bureau of the Budget the Department informed the Senate Committee on Finance of its opposition to pending bills to increase domestic quotas a total of 300,000 tons. The new proposal if adopted might easily tip the scales to cause revolution in Cuba and would certainly increase instability and promote anti-American feeling and communist activity in the Caribbean area. It would be a blow to the Cuban economy already suffering from severe curtailment of sugar production and lower prices. It would result in corresponding reductions in the considerable United States exports to Cuba and would jeopardize the concept of Cuba as a strategic sugar reserve.

It is recommended that when you receive the Ambassador of Cuba you assure him that if such a proposal for modification of the Sugar Act should be presented to the United States Government, the Administration will, in determining its position, give very careful consideration to the situation of Cuba and the effect of the proposal upon United States-Cuban relations.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 8, 1954.

Subject: Call of Cuban Ambassador on the President concerning Sugar Quota

Participants: The President
Dr. Aurelio F. Concheso, Ambassador of Cuba
Mr. Henry F. Holland, Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs

The Cuban Ambassador handed the President a note[1] setting forth the basis for Cuba's plea that the Sugar Act not be amended to reduce Cuba's quota.[2]

The President said that he was keenly aware of the need for a strong trade with our friends, for the need of maintaining stable economies in friendly states. He assured the Ambassador that when he might be called upon to make any decision with respect to this matter he would not act precipitously, and that he would act with full realization of all of the implications for Cuba in any U.S. action.

[1] In the referenced note, dated June 8, 1954, the Cuban Government stated, inter alia, that any reduction in Cuba's sugar quota prior to the expiration of the current Sugar Act would not only constitute a departure from past U.S. practice, but would result in a decrease in production to a level seriously endangering Cuba's economic and social stability (811.235/6–854).

[2] Ambassador Concheso also discussed Cuba's sugar quota with Secretary Dulles on June 2, 1954. The memorandum of their conversation, by Assistant Secretary Holland, dated June 2, indicates that the Ambassador made a similar plea concerning the reduction of Cuba's quota, and that the Secretary expressed his interest in the problem and the determination of the United States to insure careful study of all of its aspects (Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation, lot 64 D 199, "May–June, 1954").

The Ambassador in Cuba (Gardner) to the Department of State

LIMITED OFFICIAL USE HABANA, June 16, 1954.
No. 1525

Ref: Department's A–488 of June 4, 1954.[1]

Subject: Proposed Subjects for Discussion With Economic Mission Which Cuba Plans to Send to Washington.[2]

The Embassy is undertaking immediate compliance with the instruction under reference as regards the contraventions of GATT.

In the meantime it respectfully suggests, for the Department's consideration, additional subjects appropriate to the anticipated discussions. These are as follows:

1. Cuban Treatment of Debts as Distinct From Claims.

The Embassy appreciates that, beyond limited employment of good offices, little can be done vis-à-vis assistance to American firms and entities holding obligations against the Cuban Government on a current account basis, even though some of those accounts date back several years. However, the Embassy feels that debts and overdue accounts with the government, as well as claims, should be discussed with a view to ascertaining the arrangements that are to be made for their settlement.

As of now, for example, a problem has arisen, technical in nature, but very discouraging for those holding past due government accounts. One example will suffice. To illustrate this point the Isle of Pines Steamship Company has overdue accounts with the Cuban Government of approximately 200,000 pesos. Of this approximately 26,000 pesos correspond to shipping services rendered to different departments of the Cuban Government during the present administration, by the Isle of Pines Company. The Cuban Government is now willing to issue "pagarés" for the two fiscal years 1952–1953 and 1953–1954 to

[1] The referenced instruction indicates that two of the subjects the U.S. Government would like to have discussed when the proposed Cuban special economic mission arrived in Washington were the status of private American claims against the Cuban Government, and taxes and duties on Cuban imports from the United States which allegedly contravened certain provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) (837.00/6–454).

For text of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, concluded at Geneva, Oct. 30, 1947, and entered into force for the United States, Jan. 1, 1948, see 61 Stat. (pts. 5 and 6), or TIAS No. 1700.

[2] The Cuban Government formally proposed to send a special economic mission to Washington to discuss economic matters of concern to the two countries on May 14, 1954. On May 28, 1954, the United States accepted the proposal (Instruction A–472, dated May 28, 1954, 837.00/5–2854).

a total amount of approximately 6,500 pesos. They state that the remainder of the approximately 26,000 pesos corresponds to obligations incurred by the respective government departments or entities in excess of funds budgeted to those entities for that purpose. This, of course, leaves the companies concerned in a serious situation with, as of now, apparently no recourse beyond requesting the government to make additional appropriations.

Another case is that of the General Motors Acceptance Corporation, for the buses in service in the city of Santiago. The courts of Havana authorized re-possession. The officials of the city of Santiago did not permit it. The court order was subsequently reversed. The buses are still running and deteriorating rapidly without the operators making payments due. Treatment of this particular case will, of course, depend upon final decision of the General Motors Acceptance Corporation as to whether they wish us to include it or not. Since the Cuban proposal to send an economic mission is not public knowledge the Embassy will not approach the Company until it has word from the Department as to whether or not the Department feels that discussions of this particular type of case would be appropriate.

2. Restrictions on Rice Imports.

The Embassy does not feel that there is any prospect of the elimination of the individual licenses for the importation of rice. The Cuban position is: a) that under limited quotas import licensing is essential in order to avoid possibility of certain strong importers cornering the market on a first come first served basis. There are other practices, not appropriate for discussion, which also makes elimination of licensing improbable. The Department has already been informed of those practices.

Nevertheless the Embassy feels that it would not be inappropriate to put on the record our emphasis upon the necessity for prompt and orderly issuance of licenses at all times and the elimination to a degree possible of restrictions, within, of course, the quota limitations effective under the procedure established by the exchange of notes of December, 1952.[3]

[3]The referenced notes, exchanged at Habana, Dec. 17, 1952, and entered into force on the same date, establishing a method for determining Cuba's annual rice import quota in connection with a GATT concession on rice, were transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 963, from Habana, dated Dec. 17, 1952, not printed (837.2317/12–1752). The provisions of the December agreement required Cuba to announce each July 1 the basic quota of 3,250,000 quintals and also an initial supplementary quota equal to 66 percent of Cuba's estimate of its remaining import requirements for the quota year; on the following Mar. 15 the Cuban Government was obligated to announce for importation after Apr. 1 any additional quota needed to satisfy annual import requirements. Documents pertaining to the operation of the rice quota system are contained in file 837.2317.

3. Hydrogenation Plant.

This particular case[4] is at a standstill. The local company has the authority to go ahead. The executive is delaying and the Treasury at least has given verbal assurances to the Embassy that the local company will not be allowed to enjoy duty exemptions without deposit in guarantee of the full amount of those duties. This is their position even though the decree only requires a total guarantee of 25,000 pesos. As long as the situation remains as it is only uncertainty can prevail. The matter is a subject of constant irritation which may at any time serve as an instrument which could be used to advantage in attempted retaliation by interested parties in the United States, through efforts to reduce the U.S. import quota of Cuban sugar. The Embassy feels that in the forthcoming discussions the Cuban Government should be asked to take action and to expedite the final decision on this hydrogenation plant.

4. Telephone Company.

As the Department is aware the IT&T has been trying for years to obtain approval by the Cuban Government of new rates essential to the expansion program planned by the Company and essential to good service. It would seem appropriate for the Department to urge even to the point of obtaining an agreement with the Cuban Government that this matter will be expedited. In this connection, however, again not wishing to disclose the plans of the proposed mission, the Embassy has not approached the local manager of the Telephone Company. It suggests, if the Department agrees that this question is one appropriate, that it ascertain from the IT&T in New York its viewpoint as to whether the company desires this type of assistance at this time, or instruct the Embassy to do so here.

5. Seatrain and Car Ferry Services.

The renewal of the seatrain services to Cuba between New Orleans and Havana will depend upon certain actions of the Cuban Government. These actions would require as a minimum a revision of two decrees and one law-decree. These are Nos. 1 and 5 of January 2, 1947 and Law Decree No. 1304 of February 26, 1954. The ferry services can continue although not to their satisfaction, under the present regulations. The seatrains cannot renew its [sic] service without appropriate modifications. The Embassy believes that this is a subject appropriate to the anticipated conversations.

[4] The case involved the application in early 1952 by the Compañía Empacadora de Productos Nacionales y Extranjeros, S. A., for certain tax exemptions and duty privileges under Cuban Decree 2144 of Aug. 7, 1945, in connection with the proposed establishment of a plant for the hydrogenation of edible fats. No final decision was made in the case by the Cuban Government in 1954. Pertinent documents are in file 411.3731.

6. Air Express Services at Rancho Boyeros.

This particular proposal is tentative and subject to further verification. On the basis of reports now at hand only two local trucking entities are allowed to accept air cargo at Rancho Boyeros. Individual importers are not allowed to send their own trucks or pick-ups. The charges for hauling air express from Rancho Boyeros to Havana, approximately fifteen miles, are reported to be substantially higher than those for shipment by truck or train from Havana to Santiago de Cuba, at the other end of the Island. The Embassy suggests that the Department may wish to consider whether or not, in view of its methods of operation, this type of monopoly in any way violates either our civil air agreement[5] or our trade agreement.[6]

7. Henequen.

The henequen industry is sick, and the cordage industry is in a condition almost as bad. Some years back, a persistent rise in world quotations on the fiber, all the way up to 28 cents per pound, c.i.f. New Orleans, at mid-1950 highpoint, prompted the Cuban henequen workers to press successfully for a 20 percent wage increase and subsequently for a second 20 percent increase, thereby creating a situation where they enjoyed wages, on a year-round basis, higher than those paid on a seasonal basis to the sugar workers. When the fiber quotation sagged back to below 11 cents during 1953, the workers fought strenuously for continued pegging of wages at that high level, but eventually the Government allowed the plant-operators to restore the wage scale which applied prior to those two increases and which had ruled when the fiber brought about 12 cents. In recognition of the fact that the fiber now nets New Orleans price of hardly 9 cents, the Government has decreed that the local cordage industry must pay a special fee of 3 cents on every pound of its domestic sales, to form a fund for the augmenting of wages to the henequen workers.

Actually, this "solution" of the henequen problem has not worked satisfactorily with the consequence that strikes and threats of strikes and labor troubles are very common to the industry. Subject, again, to a desire on the part of the International Harvester Company, the only American entity engaged in the henequen industry of Cuba, the Embassy proposes that in these discussions, Cuba be urged to find a quick solution on a sound economic basis to this problem.

8. Interpretation of Air Agreement.[7]

As the Department is aware the Cuban Government holds that lines certified to operate on route concessions granted in the air agreement are required to obtain prior permission before inaugurating changes in frequencies of services. In the case recently under consideration the Delta C&S were authorized, after hearings, to increase their service provisionally until February of next year, at which time the Cuban Government presumably reserves the right to force them to reduce their frequencies if study by the Cuban Government of traffic statistics covering the temporary period does not, again in the opinion of the Cuban Government, justify such extensive service. The points at issue are whether frequency is to be controlled: a) on an "a priori" or "ex post facto" basis and b) on a "unilateral" or "bilateral" basis. Possibly this will be decided before the mission goes to the United States. The Embassy feels, however, that if it is not decided by that time, it would be most appropriate for discussion then.

9. Accountants.

The problem regarding the right of foreign public accountants to practice their profession in Cuba is one of long standing.[8] It came to a crisis some time ago, temporarily solved when those operating here accused of violating the law were given a sort of amnesty. This did not solve the problem. The two Cuban organizations of accountants, one formed of those who are graduates of the University and the other of those who are not graduates, have both strenuously opposed any participation of foreign accountants. Nevertheless, particularly during the last year and one half, efforts have been made by this government to find a solution. A year ago it was believed that a fairly reasonable solution was found which would permit American accountants to operate here on a basis of reciprocity. For various reasons, principally political, this agreement in principle has never been translated into law. The Minister of Labor[9] has given assurances from time to time that this would be accomplished when the time is opportune. This constant delay will quite probably bring a crisis unless action is taken. In fact the recent death of the local manager of an American accounting company may force the issue when the company undertakes to send a replacement. The question is one that is aggravating and demanding of settlement and should in the Embassy's opinion be appropriate for discussions with the Cuban mission when it visits Washington.

10. Pharmaceuticals.

A) Prices—The Cuban Government, as is common in many places, fixes prices of pharmaceutical products. This Embassy has on numerous occasions urged action on requests for approval of increased prices in those cases where the cost in the United States has increased for just reasons. The Minister of Commerce has agreed on numerous occasions to take action on pending requests for these price adjustments. Not one has been adjusted. The Embassy feels that it is appropriate to insist that the Cuban Government take action in conformance with their own laws. Naturally the urgence is not going to be based on what price should be established but only that the pending and subsequent requests be acted upon with reasonable dispatch.

B) There are two other pending questions which may be appropriate to the discussions. One has to do with the insistence of the Ministry of Health that pharmaceutical importers employ a [sic] "responsible pharmacists", and the other has to do with a recent onerous modification in trade mark registration procedures. Depending upon developments the Embassy will inform the Department at greater length should it decide to submit these as appropriate for those discussions.

11. Consolidated Railways.

Consolidated railways, in which U.S. holdings are substantial have solicited without avail equal treatment with the Government-owned Ferrocarriles Occidentales de Cuba as regards labor laws. It would seem appropriate to the Embassy that insistence on equal treatment could and should be made during the proposed discussions.

12. Inequitable Practices in Railway Purchases.

It is now reported that the Ferrocarriles Occidentales, S.A., have accepted French bids on six diesel electric locomotives at a higher price for a lower powered engine than American offers. This, in the Embassy's opinion, represents not only unfair business practice, but probable violation of Article XVII of GATT. Regardless of the ultimate outcome of the present case, not yet certain, the Embassy believes that assurances should be obtained of fair competitive bidding on future contracts.

The Embassy will await word from the Department prior to formally informing the Foreign Office of the two subjects which the Department has already selected for discussion with the Economic Mission. It will do so informally upon the occasion of our discussion with them concerning contraventions of GATT.[10]

For the Ambassador:
HAROLD M. RANDALL
Counselor of Embassy for Economic Affairs

[10] In Embassy note no. 489, dated Aug. 23, 1954, presented to the Cuban Foreign Office on the same date, the United States suggested a tentative agenda for the proposed economic discussions comprised of items 1, 2, 3, 8, 9, and 11 described in this memorandum, and also alleged Cuban contraventions of GATT. A copy of the Embassy's note was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 210, from Habana, dated Aug. 25, 1954, not printed (837.00/8–2554).
In Foreign Office note no. 1185, dated Sept. 22, 1954, the Cuban Government proposed an agenda made up of the following topics: U.S. sugar imports; U.S. purchase of minerals for stockpiling purposes; reduction of import duties on Cuban cigars, fruit, and other products; possible measures to increase diversification of the Cuban economy; promotion of tourism; and the negotiation of a double taxation treaty. The Cuban note was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 302, from Habana, dated Sept. 22, 1954, not printed (837.00/9–2254).

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Acting Deputy Director of the Office of International Materials Policy (Linville)[1]

OFFICIAL USE ONLY [WASHINGTON,] June 29, 1954.

Subject: Discussion Regarding Revision of the Sugar Act.

Participants: Dr. Hauge, White House
Mr. L. Myers, Sugar Branch, Dept. Of Agriculture
E—Mr. Waugh
APS—Mr. Linville
MID—Mr. Wellman

Dr. Hauge described the meeting[2] which the President had with Mr. Kemp,[3] representing the sugar industry, Senator Ferguson[4] (Michigan) and Senator Barrett[5] (Wyoming). Mr. Kemp said that the sugar industry had wished to get the Sugar Act revised during the current session of Congress. It had found some opposition in the Administration and had decided not to try to get Congressional action until next year. The industry wishes to carry on conversations with representatives of the Administration a little later in the year in an effort to reach an agreement on a bill to be placed before the next Congress. He feared that the Department of State would be unwilling to participate in such discussions, however, since it took the position that the present four-year act should not be altered during its term. He hoped, however, that this would not be the position.

[1] Mr. Linville was also Chief of the Agricultural Products Staff.
[2] The referenced meeting took place at the White House on June 28.
[3] Frank A. Kemp, President and General Manager, The Great Western Sugar Company, Denver, Colorado.
[4] Homer Ferguson.
[5] Frank A. Barrett.

The President inquired as to whether there was a four-year "contract". Mr. Kemp said that there was not. The President asked Dr. Hauge to inquire regarding this issue.

The representatives of the Department of State and Agriculture told Dr. Hauge that there is no "contract" which would keep the legislation from being altered. The present Act, however, was worked out with the thought that its provisions would be in effect for four years. Mr. Linville said that one important reason why the State Department had been willing to go along with enactment of the present legislation was that, though the Act increased the quotas of some domestic areas, it would bring benefits to foreign suppliers as production expanded in the United States over a four-year period. He read from testimony given by Mr. Myers before the House Agriculture Committee when the present act was under consideration. Mr. Myers had said that the Committee would "find that the domestic areas all accept the proposed quotas for the period of the duration of this proposed extension" (1953–56). Mr. Myers gave a general confirmation of the importance which had been attached to the term of the legislation. Mr. Wellman observed that there had been a clear understanding in 1951 on which Cuba relied that the quotas would not be changed during the extension period.

Mr. Hauge indicated he would inform the President there is no legally binding agreement not to amend the Sugar Act for the four year period of its extension.

Mr. Waugh reviewed the conversations which he and Mr. Holland and other officials had had with representatives of the sugar industry on June 12,[6] and with Mr. Kemp and Mr. Shields[7] some days later.[8] He said that he and Mr. Holland had expressed objection to revision of the Sugar Act, which would seriously harm our relations with Cuba. He referred to the discussions regarding an exchange of letters between the Department of State and the sugar industry, and explained that the Department had been unwilling to make the commitment requested by the industry to consider proposals for new sugar legislation to be effective in 1955. He said that the Department would be prepared, however, to discuss the subject further with the sugar industry at any time.

Mr. Myers said that it should be recognized that there will be new legislation next year whether the Administration likes it or not. The only question is what kind of legislation will we have and can the Administration exercise a moderating influence on it. He said that we should face the facts and not get unnecessary blame for resisting the inevitable. He said he thought it would be possible to prevent any cutback in import quotas if we should agree that 50% of the expansion in United States consumption over 8.2 million tons should go to the domestic industry. He indicated Cuba could be prevailed upon to accept such a division.

Dr. Hauge said the main question at the moment seemed to be that of soothing the feelings of representatives of the sugar industry. He said the President had inquired as to whether it would be feasible to inform the industry that the Administration would make no statements prior to later discussions with the industry regarding its position as to modification of the existing Act. He asked if the domestic industry might be told the Government has determined neither that it is desirable nor that it is undesirable to amend the Sugar Act next year.

There was discussion of the possibility that the United States Government might be asked to make some future commitment with respect to sugar legislation. The proposed inter-American economic conference to be held at Rio de Janeiro in November[9] was mentioned in this connection. Mr. Waugh expressed the opinion that Department officers should guard against making any such commitments. Mr. Wellman expressed the opinion that such commitments as existed arise from the facts surrounding the amendment of the Sugar Act in 1951, and that it was more likely that assurances would be requested within the general context of the stability of United States foreign economic policy than with specific reference to United States sugar quotas.

It was agreed that Mr. Waugh would telephone Mr. Kemp, who is an old friend of his, and tell him that the Administration does not intend to make any public statement prior to discussions with the industry later in the year as to its position on revision of the Sugar Act next year. Mr. Waugh would also indicate the willingness of the Administration to discuss this problem with the industry later in the year in light of the conditions prevailing at that time. Mr. Waugh would ask Mr. Kemp whether he would like to have any further discussion at this time. Dr. Hauge would be willing to have a meeting with Mr. Kemp and representatives of interested Departments if Mr. Kemp thought this would be helpful. It was also suggested by Mr. Myers that relations with the industry could be improved at the meetings scheduled in Denver in July between industry and Department of Agriculture officials.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 26, 1954.

Subject: U.S.-Cuban Discussions on Economic Relationships.

In discussing this matter with Mr. Holland it is believed that you will want to examine the following considerations:

1. We have formally accepted the Cuban request for discussions in Washington. Copies of the Cuban note of April 26, of our reply and of the Cuban acknowledgement of our reply are attached.[1] Our acceptance of the Cuban proposal had the approval of the interested officers of the Departments of State, Agriculture and Commerce.

2. The Cubans are interested in "a joint and comprehensive study of all the economic problems that directly concern the relations of our two countries." This means, as Ambassador Concheso pointed out to me, that although the Cubans' principal concern will be sugar which comprises such a preponderant part of the Cuban economy, that will not be Cuba's exclusive concern. The Ambassador has emphasized that the Cuban Government is interested in the totality of economic relationships between Cuba and the United States.

3. It is recognized that discussions between Cuba and the United States which involve sugar will always be difficult for the Executive Branch because sugar legislation is a prerogative of the Congress. It is doubtful, however, that the timing for such discussions could ever be better than at present before definite decisions have been taken regarding long-term sugar legislation and while the extension of the Sugar Act still has two more years to run.

4. The domestic sugar industry has proposed revision of sugar legislation on a permanent basis. The Cubans are naturally interested in having their sugar participation in this market defined and assured by international agreement. Such an agreement would have to have the support of the domestic industry and the approval of the Congress. The proposal to place sugar legislation on a permanent basis opens up a better possibility for defining Cuba's sugar rights in this market by international agreement. If the agreement of Cuba, the domestic industry and the Congress could be obtained the only remaining difficulty would be the participation of other foreign countries.

5. The objective of the proposed discussions in the words of the Cuban note is "a joint and comprehensive study". This does not imply negotiations or the giving of commitments. Cuba knows, and if there is any doubt it could be made clear at the beginning of the discussions, that the Executive Branch cannot commit the Congress in the matter of sugar legislation.

6. The proposed discussions would enable the United States to determine what Cuban objectives are in their economic relations with the United States and possibly also what their minimum requests would be with respect to sugar participation. This information would be of assistance to us in our discussions later in the year with the U.S. sugar industry with respect to a legislative program for sugar.

7. These discussions would also provide us an opportunity to indicate to the Cubans at a high level in the context of a discussion of our total economic relations our dissatisfaction with their handling of many situations and their violations of international trade commitments which are the quid pro quo for Cuba's special position in this sugar market.

8. It is important that we be willing to discuss these problems with Cuba even though we may reach no settlements and may simply indicate what the problems are and their interconnections. It might be detrimental to U.S.-Cuban relations to inform them now that we do not wish to have the proposed Washington discussions because in view of the situation regarding sugar legislation we have no basis for negotiation. Such a reaction on our part might also damage the domestic political prestige of the Cuban Government which is an important consideration for President Batista at this time.

In reply to your inquiry, Ambassador Gardner arrived in Washington on July 23 and was planning to enter Georgetown Hospital for a complete check-up. Ambassador Concheso arrives in New York on August 16 but intends to go directly to Habana returning to Washington early in September.

Subject: Cuban Requests for Military Equipment

Under MDAP

Aircraft

Four T–33 Jet Trainers. Application to purchase these aircraft was made under the MDAP program by the Cuban Government on April 5. It was approved immediately by the Department of State and forwarded to Defense which in turn transmitted it to the Air Force. Some difficulty developed over payment because the Cubans wanted to purchase the aircraft on credit. It was finally agreed that a letter of credit woud be acceptable, and, on the understanding that such a letter would be issued, two of the planes were sent to Cuba on June 6 in care of our Air Mission there. The letter of credit has not yet been issued and the Cubans have indicated no plans for paying for the aircraft. As a result they have remained in the possession of the Mission which is using them for training flights. The other two have been ready for shipment since June 15 but the Air Force is unwilling to release them until it receives at least an explanation regarding payment from the Cuban Government.

Recently the Air Force informed the Chief of the Air Mission in Cuba that unless the Cubans made some arrangements for payment for the four aircraft they would all be delivered to Peru which has been promised delivery of four T–33's next January. This threat was made, half in seriousness, with the hope that it would jog the Cuban Government into action. The Chief of the Air Mission in Cuba, on learning of the Air Force's intention in this regard, asked for a little more time, pointing out the difficulties of getting anything done during the pre-electoral period and during the absence of Ambassador Gardner. He added that he would make immediate efforts to persuade the Cubans to get off the dime.

Arms and Ammunition:

1. One thousand carbines. These were requested by the Cuban Government in a note dated July 28, 1953[1] which was forwarded, approved, by the Department to Defense. We have no evidence that the equipment was delivered although our records are incomplete.

2. One thousand hand grenades. Application for this item was made on March 12, 1954[2] from the Cuban Government. It was referred to Defense with the Department's approval on March 24, 1954 and was forwarded by Defense to the Army on April 6, 1954. We have no evidence that the delivery was actually made.

3. Twenty thousand carbine cartridges. This application was made by note from the Cuban Government dated July 1, 1954.[3] It was sent to Defense, approved, by the State Department on July 15, 1954. We do not know whether the order was filled.

4. Fifty MA–1–A–1 Thompson submachine guns. This item was requested by the Cuban Government in a note dated September 30, 1954.[4] It has been forwarded to the Defense Department with our approval.

Under the Military Assistance Program

Our Military Assistance Agreement with Cuba provides for both a Navy and an Air Force role. The Navy unit specified is five patrol craft, already a part of the Cuban Navy at the time the agreement was signed. The units specified for the Air Force are one light bomber squadron and one transport squadron. The Cubans already had most of the planes for these two squadrons; the Air Force earmarked five additional ones to be made available as grant aid. Two of these were delivered last June; the other three have yet to be delivered.

During the last couple of months the Cubans have asked for additional military grant aid under this program, consisting of:

1. Air Force: Equipment of an airborne battalion to be used in connection with the transport squadron specified under the agreement.
2. Navy:

a. Complete repair at a U.S. base of two PBY–5A planes of the Naval Air Force.

b. Acquisition and installation of Sonar and ASW (anti-submarine warfare) equipment in the patrol-escort vessels Caribe and Siboney.

c. Acquisition of three mine sweepers, wooden hull, 136 feet in length, for training.

The above requests for additional military grant aid assistance have been transmitted to the Department of Defense where they are under consideration.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 26, 1954.

Subject: Cuban Problems

Participants: ARA—Mr. Holland
Ambassador Arthur Gardner
MID—Mr. Newbegin

In reviewing the political situation in Cuba, Ambassador Gardner stated that the future of Cuba depended upon whether Batista would be elected on November 1. He stated that Grau was "very bad medicine" and pointed out that there was an indictment against him for misappropriation of funds.

Mr. Holland asked the Ambassador his views with regard to the main economic problems of Cuba and any suggestions the Ambassador might have in connection with the forthcoming economic conversations, as well as arguments that might be used with Congress. Special reference was made to the manganese and sugar problem. Mr. Holland pointed out that there was little chance of our stockpiling Cuban manganese in exchange for agricultural products. The Ambassador concurred and dismissed this problem. With respect to sugar, the Ambassador said that perhaps one of the most effective arguments to be used in an effort to maintain Cuba's share of the U.S. market was that for every dollar of Cuban sugar which we do not buy Cuba would have that much less U.S. currency with which to purchase automobiles and other American products. He emphasized that the Cubans now had 2,000,000 tons of sugar which they could not sell and that this constituted a serious problem. Mr. Holland inquired about the $400,000 fund which the Cubans have set up for the purpose of conducting a campaign in the United States with a view to favorable action by the Congress. Ambassador Gardner indicated that the creation of this fund had originally been proposed by him. He added that it was his understanding the Cubans were contemplating employing two former U.S. Senators to conduct the campaign. Mr. Holland said that of course the Cubans should fight their own campaign but that they very definitely should not employ former Senators for that purpose, but should use experienced public relations agents. He then made the following comments:

1. With reference to the problem of restrictions on trade as regards Latin America, the problem is a simple one. The decision is going to be made by Congress and it will be based specifically on public opinion. The only thing that really matters is the views of the constituents of the individual Members of Congress. These were the people to be reached. The effectiveness of any approach would be far greater if the various interested groups representing sugar, other agricultural products, minerals, etc. would coordinate their efforts.
2. A big battle was in the making in connection with the Cuban sugar quota during the next Congress. He was willing to "sacrifice part of his hide", if necessary, but he very much wanted to know the Ambassador's ideas. (The Ambassador said that he would write him within a few days after his return to Habana on October 30.)
3. Senator Malone[1] was going to visit Cuba and there was every likelihood that he would encourage the Cubans in the belief that they could get an agreement with respect to the stockpiling of manganese. Ambassador Gardner should attempt to dissuade Senator Malone from making any statements which would give hope to the Cubans along this line.

Mr. Holland then said, while he intended no criticism on the political reporting from Cuba which had been of a high order, he felt that he should point out in his attempt to be helpful that the Department does not feel that it has sufficient information regarding the thinking of the top Cuban officials. He mentioned as an example the exceptional value of Ambassador White's detailed reports of his conversations which made him feel almost as though he had been present at the interview and that he knew intimately the reactions of the individual Mexican with whom White had been talking. He pointed out that it was time-consuming and bothersome to write such memoranda but that they were very helpful to the Department. In those cases where other members of the staff were present such memoranda could be prepared by them. Ambassador Gardner replied that he had not done reporting of this nature on his conversations with Batista because he was afraid that there might be a leak and he did not want to become involved in the Cuban political situation.

Mr. Holland inquired whether Ambassador Gardner felt that the Embassy had a sufficiently broad base of contacts including all the principal phases of Cuban political and economic activity. The Ambassador stated that it very definitely did. The Ambassador expressed his view that the State Department did not know enough about what the people of Cuba thought of the U.S. Ambassador and that in contrast to previous Ambassadors he had devoted much of his time to cultivating the people themselves.

The Ambassador expressed his concern over the Department's action in transferring Messrs. Topping and Wellman[2] since they both knew Cuba and were thoroughly familiar with its problems. He said that the Embassy now felt that it did not know anybody here and was "on the end of the line"—that the people directly concerned should have more knowledge of Cuba. It was pointed out that Mr. Hoyt [3] had previously served in Cuba and it was hoped that an opportunity might be found not only for him and Mr. Connett[4] but also for Mr. Holland to visit Cuba before too long. Mr. Holland indicated that he might be able to visit Cuba some time in January.

Reference was made to the functioning of the USOM in Cuba. The Ambassador expressed himself strongly that it was undesirable that the FOA program be extended, stating that the Cubans themselves were not interested in an expansion of FOA activities. He also referred to his opposition to the Chief of Mission previously proposed by FOA, Mr. Hackney, on the grounds that he was too wealthy and too important a figure to be in charge of the relatively small Cuban operation. He expressed the hope that the Acting Chief, Mr. Johnston, would be permitted to remain in Habana.

Arrangements were made for the Ambassador to receive Mr. Fitz-Gerald of FOA on Friday, October 29[5] with whom he could discuss the general FOA situation directly.

MID files, lot 56 D 569, "Technical Assistance"

The Ambassador in Cuba (Gardner) to Senator Bourke B. Hickenlooper

CONFIDENTIAL PERSONAL HABANA, November 22, 1954.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I refer to your letter of October 13 [1] in which you gave background on the study which, pursuant to Senate Resolution 214 of the 83d Congress,[2] is being made by a special subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations committee under your chairmanship, regarding the effectiveness of our technical assistance and related programs. You request an expression of my views on the worth and accomplishments of these programs in Cuba, with particular reference to the seven specific points set forth in Section 2 of Senate Resolution 214.

Since your subcommittee is not going to find it possible to include Cuba among the countries to be given on-the-spot study, I am aware, of course, of the special responsibility which your letter places on me and hence I have arranged for Embassy appraisal of these programs to be thorough and objective. I trust that my findings, presented below, on your seven points, will be helpful.

1. Budget funds have been adequate in the past and appear to remain adequate for the future. The only phase of the program that shows any indication for a necessary increase in funds is that for training, due to a tremendous increase in enthusiasm on the part of Cuba for leadership training in the fields of labor and agriculture.

2. There has never been any duplication or confusion between the technical assistance programs in Cuba because all requests for technical assistance must be cleared through the National Economy Board of Cuba (Junta Nacional de Economía de Cuba), therefore, each program retains its separate identity. There is no active United Nations Program and the success of the program of the Organization of American States has been greatly assisted by the activities of the Point IV Program (IIAA).

3. United States agencies such as the Bureau of Mines, Geological Survey, and U.S. Department of Agriculture, have been exceptionally cooperative in making the present technical assistance program to Cuba a success. These agencies have done everything in their power to assist the present program. See also under item 6.

4. As the activities of Point IV have been principally in the field of agriculture, the cooperation of private agencies must be measured by the hundreds of farmers who are receiving advice from Cuban technicians trained in the United States. Local agencies, the activities of which are related to agriculture, such as fertilizer, insecticide and machinery companies, have been most cooperative in all phases of the training and demonstrating programs.

5. Cuba, in its limited capacity, has been 100% cooperative in the technical assistance program, mainly in the form of mutual assistance. They have always been willing to budget whatever money is necessary, but the actual money has not always been available immediately after the budget has been approved. However, the money is eventually available and Cuba continues to do its best under existing conditions to make the program a success.

6. In accordance with separate bilateral agreements which antedated the Mutual Defense Assistance Program (MDAP), the U.S. Army, Navy and Air Force Missions to Cuba furnish technical advice and assistance in the training of the corresponding branches of the Cuban Armed Forces.

Under MDAP, operations in Cuba of the Military Assistance Advisory Group (MAAG) are confined to the furnishing of certain military equipment to the Cuban Navy and Air Force. There is no separate MAAG staff in Cuba at the present time, and the Chiefs of the U.S. Air Force and Navy Missions are responsible for MAAG operations.

In addition, the Inter-American Geodetic Survey Group (IAGS), of the U.S. Army Engineers, furnishes technical assistance and equipment to the Cuban National Cartographic Institute in the latter's program for the mapping of Cuba.

Under the Mutual Security Program, there has been no extension of joint military-economic aid to Cuba.

Apart from conferences with the Ambassador and the Embassy Counselor on matters of policy, there is little direct liaison at working level between our three Service Missions and our FOA Mission because, except for the relatively minor activities cited in the next paragraph, their spheres of operation are parallel with no overlap.

At the request of the Cuban National Cartographic Institute, FOA has arranged for a number of technicians of the Institute to receive 2-month training courses at the IAGS school in the Canal Zone. Similarly, at the request of the Cuban Navy, FOA has arranged for three Cuban Naval Officers to pursue courses, mainly in Washington, devoted to meteorology, tides and currents, and tropical storms.

7. The administration of the program has been very effective in advancing the foreign policy of the United States in assisting Cuba to develop the Kenaf fiber industry. Disease resistant varieties have been established and a process developed to effectively extract the fiber from the plant. The Kenaf industry has reached the stage where it is ready to be taken up by private enterprise and has also achieved its aim in establishing this fiber in the Western Hemisphere for national defense in the event of emergency. The program is now utilizing the same technicians that worked in the Kenaf program, to carry out further research work on other agricultural crops that Cuba is trying to establish in order to diversify.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR GARDNER

WASHINGTON, November 23, 1954.

US and Cuba Conclude Economic Discussions

A delegation from Cuba was in Washington November 8 to 17 to discuss with US officials[2] various matters concerning economic and commercial relations between the two countries. The talks, which were held at the request of Cuba, were designed to study the problems rather than to find definitive solutions at this time. Both delegations felt that this objective was accomplished and that the mutual understanding that was gained of the conditions facing each country will materially aid in eventual progress in arriving at solutions.

Issues Raised by Cuba

The Cubans were primarily interested in a more liberal share of the US sugar market. They claimed that the progressive reduction of Cuban participation in the US sugar market as provided in Sugar Act legislation has impaired the reciprocal feature of the 1934 US-Cuban treaty.[3] They said that the US has captured 80% of the Cuban import market by virtue of special preference accorded US products and claimed that now they have been denied a fair participation in the US sugar market. They stated that this loss of income, coupled with the growth in population, has made it increasingly difficult to maintain minimum economic conditions required for social and political stability. The delegation asked that Cuba be granted the right to supply 50% of the sugar consumption requirements of the US and that 22% of Cuba's sugar exports to the US be in direct consumption sugar as originally established in the sugar legislation of 1934. It further requested that the Cuban share in the US sugar market be regulated by an agreement which would give stability to the industry and complement the American domestic sugar market. The US delegation was impressed by the desirability of offering a more stable market in the United States for sugar from Cuba and other producers. It assured the Cubans that this problem would be given detailed study and that Cuba's vital interest in the American sugar market would be taken into account in future recommendations to Congress. However, it was pointed out that the Executive Branch cannot provide the necessary relief through administrative action and that it cannot commit the US Congress to any course of action.

The Cuban delegation, pointing to the full cooperation Cuba gave the US during the war and to its strategic geographic position, requested appropriate measures by the US to make possible continued operation of Cuban mines, thus preventing unemployment. Minimum needs were stated as inclusion of Cuban manganese in the US stockpiling program, lowered duties on imports of iron barites, and expanded US purchases of Cuban copper. With respect to manganese, the US delegation explained that the emergency stockpile objectives have been filled; that long-term stockpile goals can be approximated by stocks already on hand; and, while the supplemental stockpile program has not yet been established, it will be based on an exchange of surplus US agricultural products for foreign minerals. It was explained that further duty reductions on imports of barites would be contingent on negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The US believes the Cuban copper industry will best develop through the initiative of private industry and pointed out that Cuba now participates in the US market on essentially equal terms with domestic producers. It was stated however, that there is a possibility some copper might be acquired for long-term stockpile purposes in exchange for surplus US agricultural products.

Requests were also made by Cuba to facilitate tobacco exports to the US and to seek ways and means of facilitating import into the US of Cuban fruits and vegetables, rum and other products.

In connection with the need to develop and diversify Cuba's economy, the Cuban delegation said that Cuba intends to modernize its customs tariff and that this will result in some increases which will be carried out within the framework of Cuba's international commitments and bilateral commitments to the US.

Under GATT Cuba continued for the United States the exemption from the Cuban 20% customs surtax on most imported products. In order to facilitate tariff negotiations with third countries the Cuban Government wants the US to relinquish this preferential exemption in order that it may place into effect a reduced surtax of 4% which would apply to imports of all products from all countries. The US is unwilling to agree to this surtax increase but our delegation replied that the US would be willing to consult with Cuba at any time with regard to tariff preferences enjoyed by the US in the Cuban market should the Cubans wish to eliminate such preferences on specific products in order to offer to third countries in trade agreements the same rates of duty as those enjoyed by the US.

Cuba stressed its need for tourism and asked for redress from discriminatory US federal tax applying to passenger fares between the Caribbean and the US and liberalization of present US legislation limiting the amount of duty-free import by tourists of cigars and alcoholic beverages. Our delegation explained that bills which would remedy the passenger fare situation had been presented to the last session of Congress but were not acted upon and it is expected that similar legislation will be introduced into the next Congress. It also stated that the US would consider the Cuban request for modification of the legislation so as to double the amount of cigars and alcoholic beverages that tourists are presently permitted to bring back to this country from Cuba.

The delegation asked that Cuba be included in the US offshore procurement program as a means of helping their depressed economy. The US delegation pointed out that the program is now limited principally to military goods and to purchases of a few non-surplus products such as fertilizers, and insecticides. Purchases of sugar are made by the CCC from time to time and the Cuban Stabilization Institute and Cuban Foreign Trade Bank receive notices of intention to purchase.

The Cubans mentioned the importance of promoting investment of American capital in their country and to this end inquired as to the possibility of negotiating a double taxation treaty. During the talks the US Treasury indicated that it was in favor of such negotiations which might take place as early as next January.

Matters Raised by the US

The discussions covered various Cuban import taxes and fees which are considered by the US to represent contravention of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The Cuban delegation reported that remedial action had already been taken on one of these items, that they considered that three of them were not in contravention of GATT and that they would investigate and try to take remedial action on the remaining matters.

The US pointed out that Cuba has made no effective settlement of various US private claims and debts totaling about $10 million. Of that amount some $1 million represents adjudicated items, part of which have been assigned by the claimant to the US Government on account of taxes. The Cuban delegation expressed the intent of the Cuban Government to arrange for prompt settlement of those claims which have been adjudicated by Cuban courts and explained the procedures established by Cuban laws leading to systematic liquidation of other categories of debts of the Cuban Government.

Another problem raised by the US related to the difficulties in operation of the rice agreement between the two countries which contains a procedure for fixing of the Cuban low-import quotas on rice, including announcement of such quotas by July 1 of each year. The Cuban Government announced its basic quota on July 1 but has not yet announced the preliminary supplemental quota, and this has caused substantial discontent in the US. The Cubans explained the domestic reasons which confront them in this regard and the US Interdepartmental Trade Agreements Committee agreed to discuss the Cuban request for modification of the procedure. The Cubans in turn, reiterated that their country would continue to develop its production of rice within the framework of its international obligations and give preference to imports of rice from the US at low rates of duty to the extent necessary to satisfy Cuba's import requirements. It expressed belief that Cuba's supplemental quota can be announced by February 1.

Other questions discussed with the Cubans included overtime pay of government officials in Cuban airports; discounts on payments to pensioners residing outside of Cuba; possible discrimination against Consolidated Railways of Cuba, in which substantial US capital is invested; and discrimination against established American industries in the case of a new hydrogenation plant which is seeking benefits which Cuban law provides for new industries.

Memorandum by Henry A. Hoyt of the Office of Middle American Affairs to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Sparks)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 6, 1954.

Subject: Overall Effects of Cuban Economic Talks—ARA's Position Re Requests for Increased Quotas.

Despite the fact that we were not able to give the Cubans anything concrete during the recent economic talks, and despite the fears of many of us that the talks should not have been held, I believe that the overall effect, in so far as the Cubans were concerned, was a good one. I believe the Cubans felt it had been worth their while to come to Washington, that they were able to make their case known to a good number of government officials, and that they left reassured that their position would be given consideration by the Executive Branch when the Sugar Act comes up in Congress. From conversations I had with several of the Cuban delegates, including Ing. Lopez Castro and Ambassador Joaquin Meyer,[1] on the eve of their departure, I believe the Cubans who formed the delegation left with the feeling that everything possible had been done for them and that their mission, given its limited scope, was a success.

In spite of the foregoing we should not be lulled into a feeling that the matter will rest there. We know that the domestic sugar producers as well as the other foreign producers are going to make a strong bid for increased quotas at the expense of Cuba when the Sugar Act comes up for consideration. If Cuba's quota is cut then I believe we are likely to have such a severe reaction from the Cubans that our relations with that country could drop to the lowest point in years. This will be true particularly should Cuba's quota be reduced because of increased allotments to the full duty countries.

Should the Cuban quota be cut, I fear that the overall effect of the recent economic discussions will prove to have been detrimental rather than helpful. Despite the Cubans' realization that we could not give them any concrete assurances, they went away from the recent talks believing they had a friend at court (the State Department). If their quota is cut the Cubans will point to these talks as an illustration of how the presentation of their problems was ignored or at least not given much weight.

Without going into details of the merits of the case, I believe we can agree that a reduction in Cuba's sugar quota will add greatly to the country's serious economic problems. The Batista Government would have a hard time explaining any further sugar cuts. The communists and the opposition political groups are already strong and are just waiting for an opportunity to further criticize the Batista Government. There is no more vulnerable spot than sugar and Batista might find it necessary to make a change in his cooperative attitude toward the U.S. in order to quiet domestic criticism.

Given the above, I do not think it is too early to start considering what ARA's position will be when the Sugar Act comes up for discussion. Since Peru, Panama, Dominican Republic, Haiti and Mexico are among the full duty countries which will be requesting increases, at Cuba's expense, we have a problem right in our own area. We can expect strong demands from these countries for increases. The Dominican Republic and Haiti have already indicated they feel entitled to increases and that Cuba's privileged position should be abolished.

While the Cubans are of course hopeful that the Department will take a strong stand in their favor against the requests of the domestic producers, I believe the Cubans realize that it is largely up to them to wage the battle against the domestic producers and gain Congressional support for Cuba's position. On the other hand, I believe the Cubans are counting almost entirely on the Department to support their case against the demands of the full duty countries.

Recommendation

After consultation with officers in MID and realizing that there are a lot of factors and arguments which cannot be brought out in a memorandum like this, MID makes the following recommendations

1. ARA take a strong stand against any change in the Sugar Act until its expiration on December 31, 1956.
2. Oppose increases in domestic quotas at Cuba's expense.
3. If there is any reduction in Cuba's quota because of increases granted to domestic producers, oppose any further reduction of Cuba's basic quota to satisfy the demands of full duty countries.
4. Support the thesis that any increase granted to full duty countries (if Cuba's quota is cut because of increases to domestic producers) be sought through adjustments in "increased consumption" quotas, rather than a reduction in Cuba's basic quota.
5. That ARA officers meet at an early date with officers from E and from Agriculture to discuss these problems.

The foregoing is controversial but it is felt that it is necessary to "get the ball rolling", and perhaps these recommendations can serve as a basis for the first discussions.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

POLITICAL, ECONOMIC, AND MILITARY RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC[1]

739.5 MSP/1–2552

The Deputy Secretary of Defense (Foster) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, January 25, 1952.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to Mr. Matthews' letter of 21 December 1951[2] suggesting that the Department of Defense give consideration to the possibility of approaching the Dominican Republic on a general basis regarding military cooperation for hemisphere defense, and that the United States Ambassador to that country be authorized to discuss the matter, with appropriate Dominican officials, so as to facilitate any future negotiations.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have reached the following conclusions with which I concur:

a. At the present time the Department of Defense is formulating the Mutual Security Program for FY 1953. Consideration is being given to the assignment to the Dominican Republic of hemisphere defense tasks. However, because of the many factors which may preclude the granting of military aid to the Dominican Republic, it would be undesirable at this time to give rise to expectations that we would be unable to fufill at some future time.

b. The desirability is recognized of making a general approach regarding military cooperation with the Dominican Republic at this time. However, it is believed that the discussion of this matter should be along the lines contained in your airgram as dispatched to certain American diplomatic officers, dated 18 December 1951,[3] rather than along the lines suggested by Mr. Matthews. Specifically the following comments reflect the Department of Defense position with regard to Mr. Matthews' letter:

(1) While it is recognized that the Dominican Republic is important to the defense of the Antilles area, conversations should not be held which could be construed to indicate that the United States is considering the extension of grant military aid to the Dominican Republic.

(2) The United States should not offer to make a survey of the Dominican armed forces and facilities unless and until the United States is prepared to furnish grant aid to that country. Sufficient information can be obtained to make such preliminary surveys as are necessary without a formal survey. At the present time, the United States is not prepared to broaden its already extended grant aid commitments.

(3) All possible consideration is now being granted to Dominican requests for reimbursable assistance. No intimation should be made to raise false hopes for assistance beyond that now being granted.

(4) Although consideration is being given to possible ways in which Dominican arms production facilities might be used in a collective defense effort, the Dominicans should appreciate that they must compete with other countries for material and contracts.

CIUDAD TRUJILLO, February 1, 1952.

Ref: Department's Top Secret Instruction No. 39 of January 28, 1952.[2]

Subject: Dominican Position in Hemisphere Defense Plans.

In view of the information received from the Department to the effect that the Cuban Government might be approached on January 29 concerning its participation in hemispheric defense under the authority conferred in the Mutual Security Act of 1951,[3] I discussed with Mr. Mann, during his short visit here, the desirability of my approaching President Trujillo to inform him of the noninclusion of the Dominican Republic at this time in these negotiations prior to announcement of the commencement of discussions with Cuba. Mr. Mann agreed with me on the importance of timing our approach. As he had a copy of a draft reply[4] by the Defense Department to Deputy Secretary of State Matthews' letter of December 21, I had sufficient information concerning the decisions of the two departments to permit me to make such an approach without awaiting the Department's top secret instruction of January 28.

[1] Drafted by Ambassador Ackerman.

[2] The referenced instruction authorized Ambassador Ackerman to discuss informally with Dominican authorities hemisphere defense plans with respect to the Dominican Republic, and to express the hope that the Dominican role in these plans could be enlarged (739.5 MSP/1–2552).

[3] Public Law 165, approved Oct. 10, 1951; for text, see 65 Stat. 373.

President Trujillo granted me an interview on January 29 at which time I informed him that the purpose of my call was to keep him posted regarding developments in our planning for hemisphere defense. I mentioned that during my recent visit to Washington a group from the Department of State including Messrs. Mann, Hauch[5] and other advisers had accompanied me on a visit to the Pentagon to discuss with representatives of the three branches of the Armed Forces who were acting as advisers to the Joint Chiefs of Staff on hemisphere defense the position of the Dominican Republic in those plans. I pointed out that in the Mutual Defense Act of 1951 Congress had approved the allocation of 38 millions of dollars for expenditure in Latin America for military defense and that groups of Defense Department representatives had recently begun negotiations in several countries of Latin America for programs designed to improve their defense forces and prepare the way for integration into the general scheme of coordination with the efforts being made by the United States in this connection.

At that meeting the officials of the Armed Forces maintained that the funds appropriated by Congress for these purposes were extremely limited for the task in hand and that the Joint Chiefs of Staff were faced with the problem of determining where they might best be employed in order to insure strongest possible hemispheric defense. As many of these countries were large suppliers of important strategic materials and some of them had long coast-lines to defend, emphasis had to be given to the importance of these considerations in reaching an overall conclusion. It had therefore been decided that in the allocation of grant aid from the small sums available for the present fiscal year, Brazil would be allotted the largest sums, and that Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Mexico, Peru, Uruguay and Cuba would also participate. Although the Defense Department group were sympathetic to the State Department's recommendation that the Dominican Republic also participate in this program, they could not give us affirmative assurances until after further consideration of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

I told the President that the Secretary of Defense[6] had now informed the State Department of its inability to include the Dominican Republic in the grant aid program because of the limited funds available and the uncertainty as to the funds which may be available during the next fiscal year, despite the fact that the Defense Department recognizes that the Dominican Republic is important to the defense of the Antilles area. Although I did not wish to hold out false hopes for the future, it is not unlikely that as plans for hemisphere defense develop the United States might make available grant aid to the Dominican Republic in furtherance of the hemispheric defense program. Grant aid, however, involves certain definite commitments on the part of recipients which undoubtedly would require them to make substantial additional expenditures in effecting the desired coordination. I also remarked that the Defense Department has informed the State Department that all possible consideration is now being granted to Dominican requests for reimbursable assistance and that this would continue to the extent compatible with the United States' defense requirements and the existing critical supply situation.

In view of the relations now existing between this country and Cuba I emphasized the strategic importance of Cuba by reason of its proximity to the United States which led to the inclusion of that country in the program. The President remarked that he could appreciate that military considerations made it necessary to include Cuba. As a matter of fact, he stated, if the Cuban Government and the American Government enter into an agreement for hemispheric defense certain advantages might accrue to the Dominican Republic as it might have the effect of discouraging Cuba from being in sympathy with the various movements which develop from time to time on its territory against the peace and welfare of neighboring nations and it might also alienate some officials of the Cuban Government from their attitude of tolerance and support of the Communistic groups now directing the destinies of Guatemala.

The President thanked me for informing him of these developments in the program of hemispheric defense and especially for the sympathetic attitude of the State Department towards the Dominican Republic. He asked me to assure the Department of State that to the extent of his ability it would have his full cooperation in the task now being undertaken. I informed him that, anticipating those assurances, I had informed the Department and the officers of the defense forces, with whom I had consulted, that in my opinion such cooperation would be forthcoming from him and that I had cited the agreement for the Guided Missile bases[7] as one of the several indications of his attitude in this connection. Nevertheless, I assured him that I would again transmit his assurances to the Department.

I am convinced that it was highly desirable for me to discuss this matter with President Trujillo prior to the announcement of the negotiations with the Cuban Government for it prevented him from forming an opinion that by our strengthening the Cuban armed forces that country might be encouraged to again permit the organization of expeditionary forces for attacks on this country. I also believe that if it becomes desirable later to include this country within the hemisphere defense program the way has been paved for sympathetic consideration of any future approach.

I should like for the Department to endeavor to seek from the Defense Department more positive assurances for consideration of Dominican requests for reimbursable assistance. In paragraph three of the letter from the Secretary of Defense,[8] the Department has been admonished to avoid intimations which may raise false hopes for assistance beyond that now being granted. I believe the Department will agree with me that little consideration thus far has been given to the requests of the Dominican Republic by the Department of Defense for reimbursable aid. Over a year ago the Dominican Embassy was refused permission to acquire tanks for the Dominican Air Force on the grounds that those which it desired to export had been scrapped and regulations prevented them from being granted permission to ship them from the United States, and no suggestion as to how the Dominicans might satisfy their needs was made. Almost a year has transpired since the Dominican Embassy sought to acquire from the Defense Department a number of F–47 planes; they were at first denied on the grounds that the Air Department did not have a supply of repair parts adequate for the maintenance of their operation. Although it now appears that the Defense Department is more sympathetic to this request, negotiations have not been concluded. So far as I know, within the last year the only cooperation afforded by the Defense Department to the requests of the Dominican Government, despite the fact that during that period the Dominican Government agreed to permit the establishment of AFMTC site on its territory and accorded extraordinary facilities and cooperation to the various exploration groups, was in approving priorities for a few small items for the airport and Navy Department and by not interposing objections to the export of four PBY planes purchased from private sources. Although the Department may have additional indications of reimbursable cooperation, in my opinion the Defense Department has not been very sympathetic to Dominican requests.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller) to the Director of the Office of Military Assistance in the Department of Defense (Olmsted)[1]

MY DEAR GENERAL OLMSTED: In view of certain recent developments, I should like to request that the concurrence of the Department of State in the proposal made to you by General Walsh[2] that the Dominican Republic be included in the military grant aid program for fiscal year 1952, under certain conditions, be withdrawn, at least for the time being, and that an approach to the Dominican Republic regarding negotiations for the necessary agreements be postponed. General Walsh has been informed of this request.

The essential reason for making the request is our view that the initiation of such negotiations following so closely upon recent developments in Cuba[3] and the publicity attendant thereon, might have repercussions in other Latin American countries, and perhaps within the United States, which would adversely affect the continuance of the military assistance program and the achievement of our mutual objective of strengthening the defense of the hemisphere. In spite of the declared intention of the Batista regime to cooperate with the United States, its apparently successful seizure of power in Cuba may encourage groups in other Latin American countries, such as Panama, Ecuador and Chile, to take similar action in those countries which might bring into power elements opposed to the best interests of the United States. Under these circumstances the announcement at this time of the initiation by this Government of military assistance negotiations with the Dominican Government might be interpreted as an encouragement to anti-democratic forces in other Latin American countries. It is also considered likely that such announcement would not be favorably received by public and Congressional opinion in the United States.

[3] Reference is to the successful coup d'etat by Gen. Fulgencio Batista on Mar. 10, 1952; for information on the coup, see the second editorial note, p. 867.

I should like to emphasize that our request is for the postponement until a more opportune time of an approach to the Dominican Government. As you know, this Department has concurred in principle with the initiation of negotiations with the Dominican Government for a military assistance agreement on the basis of the Department of Defense's view that it is militarily desirable for that Government to be invited to participate in the grant military assistance program.[4]

Sincerely yours, EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

[4] In a letter to Major General Olmsted, dated Apr. 17, 1952, Assistant Secretary Miller stated the following additional reasons for postponing an approach to the Dominican Government regarding its participation in the military grant aid program: (1) it was too late in the fiscal year to open negotiations without attaching conditions, and (2) the United States would not be able to give assurance that our equipment assistance would actually be forthcoming under the current authorization (739.5 MSP/4–1752).

In a letter to Assistant Secretary Miller, dated Apr. 28, 1952, Major General Olmsted replied in part as follows: "In view of the circumstances, no practical disadvantages are foreseen to the further postponement of an approach to the Dominican Republic . . . until the completion of legislative action on the Fiscal Year 1953 Mutual Security Program" (739.5 MSP/4–2852).

Memorandum by the Chairman of the United States Delegation to the Inter-American Defense Board (Walsh) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller)

SECRET WASHINGTON, 22 October 1952.

Subject: Aircraft for the Dominican Republic

Having been advised that the Dominican Republic has informally requested advice from the Department of State concerning that Department's attitude toward issuance of an export license which would permit the export to the Dominican Republic of 40 F–51 aircraft, it is suggested that the Dominican Republic be informed substantially as follows:

"1. The United States Government is anxious to assist the Dominican Republic in its efforts to establish and maintain a military organization capable of maintaining the internal security of that government and assisting the other American States in their common effort of preparing for defense of the Western Hemisphere against any possible aggression. This general policy is subject, of course, as in the case of all countries, to military priorities which take into account relative urgency of needs for military equipment.

2. The Dominican Republic has purchased 25 F–47s from the United States and, as you know, plans now call for delivery of 6 of these aircraft in November and 8 in December with the balance to follow as soon as practicable. Furthermore, your Government's request, dated 23 June 1952,[1] for 7 additional F–47–B/30 aircraft is now under consideration by the Department of Defense and, as of this time, the request is being given favorable consideration and details are being worked out between U.S. Air Force representatives and the Dominican Embassy.

3. It is suggested that the Dominican Republic make every effort to confine its procurement of fighter aircraft to a single type thereby minimizing maintenance and spare parts procurement difficulties that are inherent with the operation of several types. The United States advises that the Dominican Republic, prior to purchase of F–51s, explore the possibility with the Defense Department of additional procurement of F–47 aircraft. It is possible, if not probable, that delivery of F–47 aircraft cannot be accomplished with the same speed as F–51s; however, we feel that the advantages to be gained in concentrating on a single type of fighter aircraft outweigh the disadvantages of a delay. Furthermore, in the light of present circumstances, the United States will, in all likelihood, be better able to support the spare parts requirements of F–47 aircraft than F–51 aircraft.

4. Under conditions existing at the present time, if the Dominican Republic after seeking from the United States procurement of F–47 aircraft should find that the probable delivery dates are such as to preclude adequate defense and preparation for common defense of the Western Hemisphere and that, concurrently, F–51 aircraft are available in sufficient numbers to meet the defense requirements of that country, the United States would favorably consider an application for license to export these aircraft to the Dominican Republic."

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 23, 1952.

On December 19[2] you mentioned that attempts were being made to arrange for you to see Generalissimo Rafael Trujillo of the Dominican Republic and perhaps to give him a luncheon.

[2] A memorandum of Secretary Acheson's conversation with President Truman on Dec. 19, 1952, by the Secretary, with respect to an appointment for Generalissimo Trujillo, reads in part as follows: "The President does not want to see him, but, on the other hand, does not want to snub him. If the State Department says he should see Trujillo, he will do it, but will not give a luncheon for him." (739.11/12–2352)

At present Generalissimo Trujillo is Commander-in-Chief of the Dominican Armed Forces and to all intents and purposes the sovereign power in his country. As you know, we have some important projects underway and pending in the Dominican Republic such as the Air Forces' guided missiles test range and a bilateral military agreement which is currently being negotiated.

I believe that it would be desirable for you to see Generalissimo Trujillo briefly if it is at all possible to do so. I do not think, however, that the character of his current visit warrants a luncheon. Generalissimo Trujillo has come to the United States on his own initiative and the State Department has no responsibility for his being here. He has, however, been designated by his Government Special Ambassador-at-Large and Ambassador to the United Nations. It is anticipated that he will be in the United States for several months.[3]

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Chief of Protocol in the Department of State (Simmons)

RESTRICTED [WASHINGTON,] March 6, 1953.

Subject: Call on the President by Generalissimo Rafael L. Trujillo

Participants: The President
Generalissimo Trujillo
The Ambassador of the Dominican Republic
John F. Simmons, Chief of Protocol

Generalissimo Trujillo called on the President, by previous appointment, at 3:15 p.m. today. Present for the meeting were His Excellency Señor Dr. Luis Francisco Thomen, Ambassador of the Dominican Republic, and myself.

The conversation opened with an exchange of the usual amenities concerning, on Trujillo's part, pleasure at being received and, on the President's part, expressions of welcome. During this part of the conversation, Trujillo touched upon the need for further inter-American solidarity in the great struggle against Communism. He mentioned the high prestige of the President throughout Latin America, saying that all these countries had confidence in him as a great leader.

Trujillo then expressed his conviction that the President could do nothing finer than to convoke a meeting, in Washington, of all Latin American Foreign Ministers with a view to study, and to find practical means of combatting, the Communist danger.

The President expressed agreement with the fact that this danger exists. He pointed out, however, that the action of the United States in summoning such a conference would have to be given careful thought from the angle that we are all partners and that our arbitrarily arranging such a conference might possibly be misconstrued as an attitude of undue supervision over the actions of our friends in the Americas. He also indicated that any such action would naturally be subject to the careful study and recommendations of the Secretary of State.[1]

Trujillo seemed to understand these important points, but then proceeded to make the further suggestion that a meeting might later be called of all the American Presidents, in order to place these anti-communist discussions on the highest possible level. The President, while not agreeing to this proposal, intimated that it "could be" of value. He asked Trujillo where he had in mind to suggest that such a high level meeting take place. He said at Washington or possibly at some other American capital. The President suggested the Organization of American States as a possible additional medium for such discussions.

Nothing definite was said in the way of a commitment.

The conversation ended on the basis of a friendly interchange of general observations about inter-American solidarity, although the President said that, for example, great differences of opinion on important points were always apt to crop up internally in the various countries, and even more so across international boundaries. Illustrating this, he mentioned the desire of our Western farmers to have high wheat prices, whereas the Eastern cattle raisers and flour consumers wanted them low.

Before departing, both Generalissimo Trujillo and the Ambassador expressed great satisfaction that the President had received them.

Editorial Note

On September 22, 1952, representatives of the United States and the Dominican Republic initiated negotiations at Ciudad Trujillo for a bilateral military assistance agreement. Documents pertaining to the negotiations are in Department of State file 739.5 MSP for 1952 and 1953. For text of the Military Assistance Agreement, signed at Washington, by Generalissimo Trujillo for the Dominican Republic and Secretary Dulles for the United States, March 6, 1953, and entered into force, June 10, 1953, see Department of State Treaties and Other International Acts Series (TIAS) No. 2777, or United States Treaties and Other International Agreements (UST), volume 4, page 184.

Concurrent with the negotiations for the Military Assistance Agreement, representatives of the United States and the Dominican Republic conducted negotiations for a related bilateral military plan. The "Plan of the Governments of the United States and the Dominican Republic for Their Common Defense," signed at the Pentagon in Washington, March 6, 1953, was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of a memorandum to Mr. Spencer, by Lieutenant Colonel James M. Hall, Secretary to the United States Delegation to the Inter-American Defense Board, dated March 23, 1953, not printed (739.5 MSP/3–2353).

Editorial Note

In airgram A–123, to Ciudad Trujillo, dated May 20, 1953, the Department informed the Embassy that the Department of Defense recommended, in accordance with the provisions of the Military Assistance Agreement, the establishment of a Military Assistance Advisory Group (MAAG) in the Dominican Republic, consisting of four officers and five enlisted men at a total cost of $108,000 for an 18-month period. The Department requested the Embassy to initiate negotiations with the Dominican Government as soon as the Military Assistance Agreement was ratified and to obtain its consent to provide the local currency requirement to cover the administrative and operating costs of the MAAG (739.5 MSP/5–2053).

In despatch 135, from Ciudad Trujillo, dated August 7, 1953, the Embassy reported that it received payment amounting to $54,200 in pesos from the Dominican Government to defray the first 6-months expenses of the MAAG (739.5 MSP/8–753).

portions of despatch 578 of January 27,[4] related to the United States technical assistance program.

In despatches 503 and 578 (page 37), the Embassy suggests that careful consideration should be given to the propriety of curtailing or even terminating the United States technical assistance program in the Dominican Republic unless Generalissimo Trujillo adopts a more satisfactory attitude and takes steps to improve the climate for foreign investment. This suggestion is made in view of the recent failure of the Dominican Government to respect its contractual obligations to United States companies and in view of unofficial threats to expropriate companies in which United States investors have substantial interests.

The Department is fully aware of this situation and can understand sympathetically the position which the Embassy is inclined to assume because of it. The Department has concluded, however, that it would be unwise to attempt at this time to withhold or withdraw technical assistance either as a measure of disapproval of the present unfavorable treatment of United States business interests or as a means of influencing the Dominican Government to change its practices in this regard. One of the factors influencing the Department in reaching this conclusion is the belief that the program offers only limited leverage.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 8, 1953.

Subject: Proposal for a meeting of Foreign Ministers of the American Republics to consider anti-Communist policy and actions [2]

Participants: The Secretary
Ambassador Thomen of the Dominican Republic
Mr. Charles R. Burrows, Director, Office of Middle American Affairs

After an exchange of amenities, the Secretary opened the way for a discussion of Ambassador Thomen's business by referring to the copy of the Dominican memorandum [3] which had been furnished the Department in advance and which the Secretary had in his hand at the time.

[2] Ambassador Thomen discussed this subject with Assistant Secretary Cabot on Mar. 11, 1953; a memorandum of their conversation, dated Mar. 11, is in file 720.001/3–1153.

[3] The referenced memorandum, dated July 8, 1953, delivered to the Department of State on the same date by Ambassador Thomen, requested the Department's views with respect to the Dominican proposal that a meeting of Foreign Ministers be called to consider what action the American States could undertake against the threat to their collective interests presented by international Communism (720.001/7–853).

Ambassador Thomen expounded upon the concern which his Government feels as a result of Communist activities and dangers throughout the Americas and in the Caribbean and Panamanian areas in particular. He referred to the 1951 Meeting of Foreign Ministers in Washington,[4] to the general resolutions adopted at that Meeting and to the limited action which followed and then stressed the need now for follow-up and more specific measures against the ever-increasing dangers of international Communism. He said his Government felt that another meeting of Foreign Ministers would be the only proper means of achieving this purpose.

The Secretary asked if the Dominican Republic did not feel that the Caracas Conference[5] would provide a more suitable and adequate opportunity for consideration of this problem. Ambassador Thomen said that his Government does not believe that such a controversial subject as this should be introduced into the Inter-American Conference, which should always be a symbol to the world of Pan American unity. He said he felt that a meeting of Foreign Ministers called specifically for the purpose of considering international Communism would leave the Inter-American Conference agenda free of this difficult subject. He said also that his Government feels the dangers presented by Communism in the Americas require more urgent attention then consideration at the Caracas Conference.

The Secretary pointed out that unless very general resolutions only are considered there is bound to be a certain amount of active discussion and controversy and said that he did not believe the danger of controversy was sufficient reason not to have the Caracas Conference consider the subject. He said that if the action taken is of a kind that will have real meaning there will be a certain amount of controversy but there is not necessarily any need to fear this. Mr. Burrows suggested that the kind of controversy which the Ambassador seemed to fear would be just as unfortunate at a meeting of Foreign Ministers as in the Inter-American Conference.

The Secretary asked if the Dominican Republic had received any indications of reaction from any other countries as yet. The Ambassador replied affirmatively and said that the reaction had been favorable from "several" Central American nations. The Secretary said he thought it would be a good idea to await the return to Washington of Dr. Eisenhower and his group in order to obtain the benefit of their opinion following their trip around South America. The Ambassador said that his Government had "expected" (he probably meant hoped) a prompt reply because it was felt that the matter was very urgent and that a meeting of Foreign Ministers should be held promptly. In reply to the Secretary's query as to when the Dominican Republic would hope that such a meeting could be held, the Ambassador said "next month".

The Secretary said that next month seems far too soon for a meeting of this kind. He said there would have to be very careful preparation and certainly the United States Government could not complete preparations so quickly for such an important meeting. He said that if a meeting of this nature were to mean anything at all it would have to consider some very difficult problems—such as intervention by an international organization in the internal affairs of individual countries. As far as the United States was concerned, this would raise very complicated questions. On the other hand, the Secretary questioned the usefulness of only general resolutions. He asked the Ambassador to report to his Government that the Secretary did not wish to reply more definitely until he had had a chance to consult with Dr. Eisenhower and to obtain his reaction.

Ambassador Thomen asked the Secretary if he had any suggestions as to what the Ambassador might say to the representatives of the press who were waiting outside. The Secretary said that the Ambassador of course could say what he liked concerning his own part of the conversation but he asked he not quote the Secretary. The Secretary said that he supposed he might tell the press that he had given the Secretary a memorandum from his Government concerning the possibility of a meeting of Foreign Ministers to discuss the problem of Communism in the Americas and that there had been some general exchange of opinions on the subject. Mr. Burrows suggested that so far as he knew there had not been any previous publicity with reference to similar conversations in any of the other countries and the Ambassador said that he would evade any press questions on the subject. When he left the Secretary's office the Ambassador told correspondents that he had delivered a note to the Secretary and had discussed it with him but that he was not free to disclose the subject of the note to the press. In reply to a question he said that the subject of the memorandum was of interest to all the American nations.[6]

[6]On Aug. 18, 1953, Acting Secretary Smith handed Ambassador Thomen a memorandum of the same date, which stated that the Department of State doubted the practicality of holding a special consultative meeting of Foreign Ministers prior to the Tenth Inter-American Conference, particularly in view of the possibility that the Conference might provide a suitable opportunity for consideration of the Communist problem (720.001/7–853).

No special meeting of Foreign Ministers along the lines proposed by the Dominican Government was held in 1953 or 1954.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 30, 1953.

Subject: Point IV Program in the Dominican Republic for FY 1955

In the attached memorandum dated June 22[2] you suggested that we should examine carefully our technical assistance program in the Dominican Republic in order to decide whether the money and effort expended are justified. MID has been presented with the tentative budget for fiscal 1955 for the Dominican Republic, a copy of which is attached for your information.[3] After consideration by the Bureau of the Budget, the proposed program will again be submitted to us for more extended comment.

While the fiscal 1955 program is $125,000 more than the one for 1954 ($481,000 compared to $356,000) it is about the same in terms of activities and training grants, and smaller in terms of the number of technicians. The lower budget figure for 1954 is due primarily to the lag in assigning technicians and getting programmed activities going.

I do not believe it would be desirable to suggest that the program be curtailed to a level below that proposed for FY 1955. Official treatment of American business has been more favorable over the past year and our relations with the Dominican Republic seem to be on a more cordial basis than at any time since World War II.

On the other hand, I do not think we would be justified in increasing the program appreciably. The Dominican Government has the money and the inclination to contract for technical assistance from private sources. Moreover, it has poured considerable funds into non-productive enterprises, notably armaments, which could have been used for the public welfare.

If you agree, we will inform FOA that ARA approves the tentative budget for the Dominican Republic for FY 1955.[4]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 13, 1954.

Subject: Dominican Harassment of American Business

A–65. The Embassy's despatch No. 602 of December 31[2] refers to increased harassment of American business interests in the Dominican Republic, as reported in previous correspondence and summarized in the Embassy's despatch No. 601 of the same date.[3] The Embassy expresses the opinion that these measures represent a well-planned campaign to terrorize the companies or to ruin them financially. It suggests that some action should be taken by the Department or the Embassy to protect American capital and that this might best be done through exploratory conversations with high Dominican officials, followed, if appropriate, by formal representations.

The Department shares the concern of the Embassy at these developments. The measures referred to may merely represent temporary harassments to gain specific and immediate ends, such as the extention of the colono system by the sugar companies. On the other hand, they may represent a calculated campaign to force the companies out of business. Whatever the motive, the situation in the Department's opinion has become sufficiently acute to justify serious consideration of the desirability of making representations to the Dominican Government.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Wellman and Mr. Connett; cleared by Deputy Assistant Secretary Woodward and in substance with the Department of Commerce.

[2] In despatch 602, Chargé Johnson stated that the Embassy strongly believed that some action should be taken to protect American capital against the intensification of discriminatory measures and press attacks occurring in the Dominican Republic, but not before an informal exploratory conversation was held with Generalissimo Trujillo. He further stated the following: "In the meantime, it is our considered opinion that our attitude toward the Dominicans should be characterized by uneffusive politeness, and that we should continue to avoid any action or statements which might give American investors the impression that we are showing too much friendliness to Trujillo at a time when he is attacking their interests." (811.05139/12–3153)

As the Embassy is aware, this general question was brought to the attention of the Dominican Government in December 1952 when, as at the present time, the harassment of American business had become acute. At that time, representations were made in Washington to the Dominican Ambassador rather than in Ciudad Trujillo because Generalissimo Trujillo was then in Washington, along with his chief economic adviser, Dr. Manuel Pena Batlle.

The Embassy has suggested the desirability of an informal approach, at least in the first instance, by the Ambassador to Generalissimo Trujillo or one of his close advisers. The Department authorizes the Ambassador to make such an approach if, after reviewing the developments which have taken place during his recent absence, he concludes the time is propitious and such informal representations would provide the best assurance of success. The Department recognizes that important considerations in the Embassy's suggested approach are that the Ambassador could exploit in informal, friendly conversations the very good relations which he has with the Dominican Government and with Generalissimo Trujillo personally, and that there would be less risk in such an approach of giving offense to those whose cooperation is important.

In any conversations he might have with Dominican officials, the Ambassador might find it useful to refer to the Aide-Mémoire delivered to the Dominican Ambassador in Washington on December 22, 1952[4] in which the Department expressed its concern at the treatment being accorded American firms by the Dominican Government and its hope that the Government of the Dominican Republic might see fit to create a climate more favorable to private investment. He might wish to mention a) that the Department had been encouraged by the oral assurances given at the time by Ambassadors Thomen and Pena Batlle that American investments were not being mistreated, and had hoped that subsequent events would confirm this; b) that the pronouncements of the Dominican Government, such as those appearing in recent supplements of the New York Herald Tribune and the New York Times, have welcomed foreign investment and have pointed with pride to the favorable treatment accorded it in the Dominican Republic; and c) that recent public measures and attacks in the controlled press against American companies seem inconsistent with these protestations of good will towards foreign business interests.

It might also be appropriate for the Ambassador to suggest, in a friendly way, that the present policy of the Dominican Government vis-à-vis American business, seems short-sighted; that, if continued, it might be expected to result in unfortunate publicity in the international press; and, more important, that it might discourage the foreign investments which the Dominican Government itself acknowledges as desirable in furthering the country's economic development.

Before making any approach to Dominican officials the Ambassador may wish to consult further with the representatives of some of the American firms concerned. However, the Department does not believe that the reluctance of some of them to have the Embassy take the question up, in a general way, with the Dominican Government should necessarily deter the Ambassador from doing so. The Executive Branch of this Government has a congressional mandate to take measures to encourage private investment abroad and it has an obligation to protect not only existing but also prospective American investors.

The Department will appreciate being informed of the Ambassador's views and of any informal conversations which the Ambassador may have with Dominican officials with respect to this matter, as well as receiving any further recommendations the Embassy may have.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] February 5, 1954.

DEAR SAM: I have received your letter of January 28[2] expressing your concern at recent developments affecting United States investments in the Dominican Republic. I share your concern and we shall have to consider what additional action should be taken by our Government if matters fail to improve following Ambassador Pheiffer's recent exploratory talk with Generalissimo Trujillo.

You will by now have received a copy of despatch No. 673 dated January 20, 1954[3] from Ciudad Trujillo in which Ambassador Pheiffer describes his conversation with Generalissimo Trujillo on this subject. You will note from this despatch that Trujillo gave assurances that he would accord favorable treatment to existing and future American investments in the Dominican Republic and that American companies would not be required to sell or cede their lands to farmers. He also expressed the opinion that the companies should be able to work out their problems in direct negotiations with the Dominican Government, and he appointed an ad hoc Commission to carry on such negotiations with representatives of the companies. You will also note that our Ambassador was encouraged to believe that his representations would result in some short run improvement for the American companies but was not optimistic about the long run outlook.

Insufficient time has elapsed to judge whether any improvement has taken place. The strike threat indicated in Ciudad Trujillo's telegram No. 82 of January 26[4] and the continuing, though somewhat abated, attacks against the companies in the controlled press, as described in recent despatches, do not augur well. On the other hand, these developments antedate the commencement of negotiations (if indeed they have commenced) between the companies and the ad hoc Commission. After these discussions have progressed a while, we should have a better idea of what the sugar companies may expect, at least for the immediate future.

I agree with Ambassador Pheiffer's recommendation in the second paragraph under "Conclusions" of despatch 673 that unless direct negotiations between the companies and the Dominican Government prove fruitless we should not take any further action. If and when further action is indicated, we will consult with you.

Sincerely yours, JOHN M. CABOT

Subject: Foreign Relations of the Dominican Republic during 1953.

RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

The graph of Dominican-American political and economic relations for 1953 fluctuated wildly, but military cooperation continued on a high plane. At the year's end, violent attacks on American capital forced us to view the future darkly and to recommend reconsideration of our policy toward the regime.

[1] Not printed; it reported on Trujillo's personality and policies (739.11/1–2753).

A. NARRATIVE OF DEVELOPMENTS

During Trujillo's visit to the United States (December, 1952–March, 1953) Dominican press comment favored the United States, and the Jefe himself made several friendly statements to our press and public officials. He also approved the long-pending Military Assistance Agreement, and, following our December 1952 protest against his mistreatment of American companies, ordered a cessation of press and psychological warfare and a negotiated settlement with the Grenada Company.

But Trujillo clearly was not satisfied with his achievements in the United States. Two Presidents and two Secretaries of State received him; he was entertained at Blair House and by many prominent persons; and he was permitted to sign the Military Assistance Agreement in Washington. Nevertheless, the relative neglect of his activities by our press, his inability to make a big splash in the United Nations, our lack of enthusiasm for his proposal to convene the OAS foreign ministers to consider the menace of communism, our December protest, and perhaps other unknown affronts to vanity, seem to have given him a rankling, if unjustified, feeling that we had treated him shabbily. He may also have taken Mr. Cabot's appointment as Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs as a personal affront, because Mr. Cabot had spoken frankly to him in 1930[2] about his commitment to keep out of politics. A deterioration in the Dominican economic situation probably exacerbated his discontent over the U.S. sugar quota, and he may have felt disappointment that the advent of a more conservative administration, headed by a military man, had failed to improve his position vis-à-vis the United States.

In any event, our political and economic relations cooled rapidly soon after his return to the Dominican Republic. The Dominicans dallied over ratification of the Military Assistance Agreement and their press began attacking American diplomats formerly charged with conducting our relations with the Republic. Trujillo left the country immediately prior to Assistant Secretary Cabot's visit,[3] and his henchmen extended him only grudging hospitality. The Dominican Embassy protested the publication of the Boletin of the Dominican Revolutionary Party in the United States and its circulation through our mails; and, late in April, Trujillo rudely and abruptly terminated a Point IV rubber project on which we had cooperated since 1942.

[2] When Assistant Secretary Cabot served as Third Secretary in the Legation at Santo Domingo.

[3] Assistant Secretary Cabot visited a number of Latin American countries during the period Apr. 6–May 3, 1953; documents pertaining to his trip are in file 110.15 CA.

In the meantime we had become concerned about the Dominicans' discriminatory tactics in behalf of their new merchant fleet, their refusal to permit exports of pineapple slips to Puerto Rico, evidence pointing to the implication of Dominican Consul General Bernardino[4] in the Requena[5] murder, and our responsibility as Unified Command of the United Nations to ascertain whether or not the publicity-loving Benefactor would back up his press offer to send troops to Korea.

May saw a rapid deterioration in all save our military relations. The Acting Foreign Minister received our polite request of May 4 for confirmation that the Republic would send troops to Korea with agitation indicating that he anticipated an unpleasant meeting with his Chief; and the Generalissimo told a group of visiting INS reporters on that date that the State Department had opened great breaches in American unity by following strange policies—although he added that he expected great things from the new Administration. El Caribe of May 6 revealed an unexpected depth of animosity toward the foreign sugar companies, when it attacked them bitterly merely because a company financial statement had contained an innocuous reference to higher Dominican taxation. At about this time Trujillo also terminated a contract under which the South Porto Rico Sugar Company had managed his Rio Haina estates.

Ambassador Thomen requested an interview with the Secretary early in May to protest remarks derogatory to Trujillo, which Assistant Secretary Cabot allegedly had made while in the Dominican Republic. He withdrew his request almost immediately; but, on May 19 General Hermida, the Chief of Dominican Army Intelligence told foreign news services that Mr. Cabot had discussed and concerted plans with communist enemies of the Dominican Republic during his Caribbean trip. On May 20 Mr. Cabot's name was linked with those of former Assistant Secretaries Braden and Miller in an El Caribe editorial highly critical of their activities. The local press published the Hermida charges on May 23, and it repeated them with various embellishments, and with the added support of a statement of the Under Secretary of the Dominican Foreign Office, on May 25 and 29.[6]

We originally viewed the attack on Mr. Cabot as an explosive manifestation of the Jefe's disgruntlement caused by the factors previously outlined and triggered by our query about troops for Korea. The fact that Hermida's statement attacking Mr. Cabot expressed doubt about the Dominicans' ability to send troops to Korea while their own security was in jeopardy led us to view this matter as the precipitating incident. Trujillo's later backings and fillings proved that he was indeed loath to send troops; but an interview of June 8 which the Chargé d'Affaires a.i. had with him revealed clearly that remarks attributed to Mr. Cabot while he was here and in Managua had set off the fireworks. But the attack cannot be classified merely as a passionate outburst followed by unconsidered action, because Trujillo quickly dropped his first impulse to act through diplomatic channels and carefully planned his campaign of character assassination. His efforts to isolate Mr. Cabot by displaying good will for the Administration and for Ambassador Phelps deeply underscored this deliberateness.

Reference has already been made to his May 4 press statement friendly to the Administration but critical of the Department. On May 14 Ambassador Phelps received word that the University of Santo Domingo wished to give him an honorary degree. The investiture on May 19 coincided with the release of the Hermida statement to the foreign press, and Ambassador Phelps' friendly remarks at the convocation, in the presence of the entire Diplomatic Corps, were of course fully reported by the local press. Moreover, El Caribe's editorial commending Ambassador Phelps also fired the first gun at Mr. Cabot. The Generalissmo later invited the Ambassador to an informal luncheon at the National Palace—extending to him an honor which had then been enjoyed by few diplomats; and, after the Hermida communiqué appeared locally, the Foreign Minister arranged a farewell luncheon in the Ambassador's honor!

But the smear campaign failed so completely that Trujillo was ready and anxious to make peace by the end of May. It failed because of the actions and inaction of the Department and the Embassy, and because the obvious falsity of the charges made the world press wary of accepting them.

The Department's disdainfully brief initial press statement dismissed them as too ridiculous to merit comment. It then ignored them until June 1, when it instructed the Embassy to request the recall of Bernardino, affirm that this request had nothing to do with the libels against Mr. Cabot, and assert that our Government was confident "that there is no truth whatsoever to those charges but that it now plans to take no action regarding them since it considers that the supreme issue confronting all of the American Republics is that of the menace of communism". This instruction, received on June 5, was acted upon the same day.

Meanwhile, the Embassy had taken several steps to counter Trujillo's obvious efforts to exploit Ambassador Phelps while maligning his superior. The Ambassador had planned to leave on June 4, and he had accepted invitations to farewell parties from the Acting Foreign Minister, the Panamanian Ambassador, and the Diplomatic Corps for May 30, June 1 and June 3 respectively. He had also made tentative arrangements to lay a wreath at the Alter de la Patria on June 3. When the Department informed him on May 27 that the wreath laying should not take place, he decided to leave on the morning of May 30, and he communicated this decision to the Acting Foreign Minister on May 28. The Embassy also recommended to Washington the cancellation of a proposed informal naval visit and requested permission to delay the transmittal of Senate and House Pan American Day resolutions to the Dominican Congress. The Dominicans may have noted that the resolutions had been delivered to the legislatures of other states, and may even have gotten wind of the cancellation of the naval visit. On May 30 the President and Mrs. Eisenhower attended a party honoring Dr. Milton Eisenhower at the Cabots' home. Since many prominent Latin Americans were also present, the Dominicans undoubtedly received word immediately of this indication of the President's confidence in Mr. Cabot.

These activities and calculated delays brought Trujillo back into line with surprising speed, as the following circumstances demonstrate: 1. El Caribe's last article attacking Mr. Cabot appeared on May 29, the day following Ambassador Phelps' announcement of his decision to expedite his departure. Its tone was defensive, stressing the right of the Dominicans to defend their own system of government. 2. The substance of the Department's instruction of June 1 was presented to the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs on June 5. The Acting Foreign Minister informed the Chargé d'Affaires a.i. on the following morning that we would soon receive a note stating that the Military Assistance Agreement was in effect. 3. On the morning of June 8 we received the promised note, and the Generalissimo called in the Chargé d'Affaires a.i. for a personal interview, followed by an intimate luncheon. 4. During the course of this meeting, Trujillo said that he would send a thousand men to Korea if we wanted them, agreed to remove Bernardino from New York, made arrangements for the initiation of technical negotiations on Dominican financial support for MAAG, ordered that efforts be made to expedite the presentation of Ambassador Pheiffer's credentials, and made fervent protestations of his friendship for the United States. 5. After the luncheon the Acting Foreign Minister promised to look into the matter of the long-stalled draft treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation.

These concessions initiated another of our many honeymoons with the Dominicans. The local press of June 9 gave favorable news and editorial coverage to the United States and lauded the press statement which Ambassador Designate Pheiffer released after paying a farewell call on President Eisenhower. An El Caribe editorial of June 10 told the Dominicans, in effect, that their relations with the United States were on a friendly basis once more.

No political or economic problems troubled Dominican-American relations from June 8 until the end of August. Ambassador Pheiffer arrived in Ciudad Trujillo on June 26 and presented his credentials on June 29. Trujillo made unusual efforts to win his friendship during July and August by showing him personal attentions and by ordering the Foreign Office to act favorably on several matters of interest to us, including a resumption of pineapple slip exports and requests for Dominican support for our UN positions. We were also encouraged to believe that we would soon receive favorable reactions to the Draft Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation, and the Dominicans sent us their check for the first semester peso expenses of MAAG with minimal delay.

In any event, the Jefe renewed full-scale press attacks on American interests in November with a vituperativeness and volume never before observed. The sugar companies were the principal victims but the Cía. Electrica and the Grenada Company also received hard knocks. The language in which American interests were attacked might well have been Pravda's, and the lavish use of terms such as "foreigners", "whites", and "foreign exploiters" extended their potential effects to all foreign enterprises.

Punitive laws and administrative pressures aimed at terrifying the companies and weakening them financially accompanied the press attacks. New decrees raised existing taxes on the sugar companies and imposed additional taxation. Government inspectors launched rigid and discriminatory drives to enforce labor and sanitary legislation. The press flayed the companies for not obtaining more of their cane from colonos, giving the definite impression, as did officials of the Development Commission, that they would be required to sell half of their lands to Dominicans for Banco Agricola mortgage bonds. To cap cruelty with incongruity, pressures were put on foreign as well as Dominican businessmen to place a legend on the envelopes of letters going to the United States complaining of our discrimination against Dominican sugar!

Negotiations to purchase the Cía. Electrica were accompanied throughout 1953 by various measures of psychological warfare; and, in December, the Government forbade the company to suspend service for non-payment, except with the permission of the authorities. It also hinted that the Company's dollar remittances might be curtailed.

The Grenada Company, under attack for holding too much uncultivated acreage, began negotiating voluntarily to sell part of these lands to the Agricultural Bank in the hope of forestalling a more general expropriation.

The foreign oil companies, which had been living for two years under a threat that they might have to move their tank farms to a site outside the city, received a final removal notice in October. They were later forced to buy new sites at highly inflated values and a compensating increase in their sales prices was denied.

During this vicious campaign, our political and military relationships preserved an air of friendship and collaboration which soon became highly strained, at least on the political side. The Jefe continued to try to forestall a protest by making friendly personal gestures to the Ambassador, by acceding to several requests for support for our positions in international organizations, by agreeing, early in December, to remove Mr. Braden's name from the monuments commemorating the cancellation of the internal debt, and by accepting administrative modifications in the Guided Missiles Agreement requested by our military authorities.

Despite these concessions we took a dim view of the future because of our growing conviction that Trujillo intends to possess, sooner or later, the properties of the American agricultural and electric companies. His recent efforts to strengthen his lobby and public relations in the United States, as summarized in the following section, argue, moreover, that he may be preparing a position from which to attack the Department or its officials in any future controversy over the protection of American interests.

C. THE DIPLOMATIC BALANCE OF PAYMENTS FOR 1953

The preceding narrative of erratic political relations, excellent military cooperation and attacks on private American business enterprises, suggests that it may be useful to try to allocate the events of 1953 in a rough diplomatic balance sheet, in order to permit a comparison between Dominican assistance to us and our aid to them.

1. Dominican Cooperation with the U.S.

a. In International Agencies.

Dominican cooperation in the United Nations and its agencies continued on the highly satisfactory level of 1952. The Embassy received favorable replies to requests for support for our positions on ten occasions, and the Dominicans voted for Dr. Luther Evans as Director General of UNESCO although we did not campaign for him.

Dominican cooperation in the Third Part of the VII Session of UNGA was "outstanding". Our consultations on various items of the agenda for the VIII Session also produced satisfactory reactions, except on proposals for financing assistance to underdeveloped nations.

None of our requests for Dominican support on specific issues before the UN or specialized agencies was refused outright, but we received evasive replies when we tried to pin them down about troops for Korea and when we asked for their vote for the proposed merger of the administrative functions of the International Bureau of Arbitration with those of the Registry of the International Court of Justice.

With respect to Inter-American matters, the Foreign Office agreed readily in February not to allow any official Dominican representation in the Santiago CTAL Conference; and in October it endorsed our position that the X Inter-American Conference should be held as scheduled in Caracas.

b. Bi-Lateral Programs and Negotiations.

The Dominicans cooperated fully with our IAGS group throughout 1953. They acceded readily to requests for administrative modifications of the Guided Missiles Agreement and they gave full cooperation to our liaison officer.

The Military Assistance Agreement of March 6, 1953 was promulgated without publicity on April 16, and it was not until June 8 that we were told that ratification had been completed. But negotiation of the financial supplement required only a month, and the first Dominican installment for the local expenses of MAAG reached us on August 7.

Cooperation with our Point IV Mission was good, but less effective than in 1952. The Dominicans met their financial commitments promptly, but were slow in providing counterparts, transportation and other facilities for the agricultural and nursing programs, apparently because of budgetary difficulties. They terminated the rubber program peremptorily in April because the Generalissimo desired to use the Piedra Blanca lands for his cattle empire, but, when reminded of their obligation to give notice of termination, they complied readily.

Despite favorable indications, the Dominicans failed to give us their reactions to the 1951 draft treaty of friendship, commerce and navigation.[7] We surmise that Trujillo's decision to renew his attacks on American business interests led him to alter a tentative decision to negotiate.

[7] The referenced draft treaty is not printed; documents pertaining to negotiations between the United States and the Dominican Republic with respect to the draft treaty are in file 611.3942.

c. In response to our representations.

Most of our representations to the Dominicans got quick and satisfactory results but we encountered delay in one case and sharp dealing in another.

Our request for the withdrawal of Dominican Consul General Bernardino from New york was acted upon to our complete satisfaction, as was an informal request about the presentation of Ambassador Pheiffer's credentials.

We failed initially to obtain export permits for pineapple slips needed in Puerto Rico, apparently because the Dominicans were planning to install a plant for canning pineapple juice and were anxious to increase local pineapple production. But plans for the canning factory were dropped after its economics proved to be unfavorable and when Ambassador Pheiffer raised the subject early in July he was told that the matter would be reviewed. An open end permit was granted a few weeks later.

When it was learned, early in September, that the Generalissimo had included a reference to a secret military pact with the U.S. in an article prepared for a special supplement of the Herald Tribune, a chat with General Anselmo Paulino[8] elicited a promise that the reference would be removed and a statement that the Jefe had not been aware of its inclusion.

The incident of the plaques,[9] although ultimately resolved favorably, showed the Jefe to be unpleasantly sharp in his dealings.

Our request of December that permission be granted the Dominican Embassy in Panama to issue multiple entry visas valid for one year to our diplomatic couriers based there was granted with minimal delay.

d. Other Friendly Gestures.

[8] Anselmo A. Paulino Alvarez, Dominican Secretary of State Without Portfolio.

[9] Reference is to the proposed plan of the Dominican Government to erect bronze tablets in Ciudad Trujillo and Luperón commemorating Generalissimo Trujillo's retirement of the Dominican internal debt. The tablets were to bear legends attributing the debt to defense requirements arising from conspiratorial activities of the Dominican Republic's enemies in neighboring countries, and the names of certain individuals, including former U.S. Ambassadors Spruille Braden and Ellis O. Briggs, as having been chiefly responsible for these activities. Documents pertaining to the efforts of the United States to have the derogatory references to Messrs. Braden and Briggs removed from the proposed tablets are in file 739.00 for 1952 and 1953.

All distinguished American visitors received friendly press treatment and, with the exception of Assistant Secretary Cabot, generous official hospitality. The crews of our Naval vessels, which resumed informal calls at Ciudad Trujillo in the first quarter of 1953, got warm receptions from the press and public.

Ambassador Pheiffer had an excellent press upon his arrival and special arrangements were made for a rapid presentation of his credentials. After the presentation he was entertained at a private luncheon by the Generalissimo and President Trujillo. The Generalissimo later made exceptional efforts to facilitate the Ambassador's trips to the northwestern and southwestern regions of the Republic.

On at least three occasions the Generalissimo released press statements friendly to the U.S. On July 1, he was quoted as having said that all nations of the Hemisphere should rally around the United States. On August 1 he told a group of Chiefs of Mission that no one disputes the greatness of the American people and that we now have our eyes open, although we are still necessarily a "little ingenuous because we have not suffered adversity". On November 14 the press quoted the Generalissimo apocryphally as having told Ambassador Pheiffer that the Dominican Armed Forces would always be ready "to fight communism at the side of the Forces of the United States which your President, General Eisenhower, has commanded". This statement took on added significance from the fact that it appeared in an article describing ceremonies at which Trujillo was presented with the Croix de Guerre with Palms by a French general.

When Senator Taft[10] and Chief Justice Vinson[11] died, the Dominican Government declared three days of official mourning to show solidarity with the people of the United States.

e. Press and Radio Coverage.

The controlled Dominican press and radio gave extensive coverage during 1952 to events in the United States, our international activities, and our policy statements. Comment on President Eisenhower was uniformly favorable and the Administration's announced policy of devoting more attention to Latin America was applauded, as was Dr. Milton Eisenhower's visit and report.[12] AP and INS provided most of the foreign coverage for local press and radio, but many articles attributed to El Caribe special correspondents also appeared. News coverage was full but editorial comment infrequent, even on policy declarations of greatest importance.

[12] Between June 23 and July 29, 1953, Dr. Eisenhower visited the countries of South America, as the Personal Representative of President Eisenhower, to conduct a factfinding mission; see the editorial note, p. 196.

This picture of favorable coverage was sadly blotched by the attack on Assistant Secretary Cabot, the campaign against former Assistant Secretary of State Spruille Braden and Ambassador Ellis Briggs, the occasional vilification of other American officials, and the outrageous assault on the American companies.

2. United States' Assistance to the Dominican Republic

a. In the International Field.

The United States continued to carry a preponderant share of the political, financial and military burdens of defending the free world against communism. Trujillo occasionally acknowledged this, but his media of propaganda gave so much space to apotheosizing him as the original anti-communist that our efforts seldom received adequate recognition. While the Jefe controls all local media we cannot hope to present our case more fully, but we should not ourselves lose sight of the overwhelming magnitude of our contribution merely because Trujillo screams his anti-communism from the housetops, successfully represses the opposition to his own regime, and casts inexpensive votes in the United Nations in favor of measures and candidates supported by other anti-communists. We should never hesitate to present these facts in our diplomatic conversations as forcefully as the disparity between Trujillo's actions and the exuberance of his declaration warrants. Indeed it is insolent of Trujillo to claim any assistance or gratitude when the modesty of his contribution is assessed in the light of our tremendous sacrifices and impressive achievements. The cumulative benefits reaped by the Dominicans from our efforts to contain international communism clearly outweigh their limited contribution and should put them in a posture of offering rather than expecting favors.

b. Bilateral Programs.

We continued, during 1953, to give the Dominicans valuable assistance through IIAA and IAGS, and we committed ourselves to additional aid under the Military Assistance Agreement.

Our expenditures for technical assistance totalled about $300,000. We built up our agricultural program by sending an additional technician; activated a nurses' training program; sent technicians to survey prospects for electric development, deep well drilling, fishing, and nurses' training; granted ten exchange of persons scholarships; and agreed to the expenditure of Servicio funds for the construction of an additional dormitory at the jointly-supported industrial art school. The only Dominican requests for assistance which were not approved by the Embassy were for a social worker and a health servicio. The request for a health servicio is still under consideration pending the receipt of additional information from the Dominicans.

IAGS, with a staff of six American employees, continued its useful cartographic work. Some of its first results were turned over to the Dominicans in 1953.

Late in March we sent a survey team to estimate support requirements for the Dominican units pledged under the Military Assistance Agreement. These may run to a million dollars in the first year. However, no MAAG personnel arrived until December, and no deliveries of matériel were effected in 1953.

c. General Cooperation.

During Trujillo's visit to the United States, from December 1952 to March 1953, every effort was made to make him feel that he was a welcome guest, although his official status did not entitle him to the treatment of a Head of State or even a Foreign Minister. We supported Dr. Jesus Maria Troncoso for a Vice Presidency at the London Sugar Conference;[13] and we expressed our appreciation to the Dominican Government in October for its cooperation in the Third Part of the VII UNGA Session.

In June and July we aided representatives of the Dominican national arms factory, who had attempted to export certain armaments from Germany illegally. We later helped the Dominicans to obtain export permits for German machinery for their arms factory, despite strong French opposition. We were generous in awarding military scholarships to Dominicans throughout 1953, and we offered to sell them jet aircraft as soon as they became available. We were not prompt in replying to a request for information for quotations on the prices of trainer aircraft, and we were very slow in delivering F–47 fighter planes which the Dominicans paid for in 1952. However, we sent seven technicians in January to help the Dominicans learn to service these aircraft, and the team remained until the end of February at the request of the Chief of Staff of the Dominican Air Force.

We returned friendly but temporizing replies to Dominican requests for support for their candidacies for an ECOSOC seat and to serve as host to the XI Inter-American Conference.

Our relations with Trujillo in 1953 illustrate with sad clarity the appalling difficulties of dealing with a brillant but egocentric dictator. His unpredictability, vengefullness, pride, greed for praise and worldly goods, complete identification of his opponents with the communists, wily maneuverings, propensity for intrigue, and lack of a sense of proportion created an unrelieved atmosphere of uncertainty, while periods of limited optimism alternated with weeks of pessimism and conflict.

Trujillo gave us a weird mixture of abuse and praise. He cooperated well on anti-communist measures in the United Natons and in bilateral military programs, but he avoided sending troops to Korea. His violent attacks and encroachments on American capital contrasted fantastically with his efforts to attract new investments. The collaboration cost Trujillo virtually nothing in terms of men or money. Indeed, it could scarcely have been withheld by any anti-communist, genuine or feigned. His abuse of our present and former public officials and his attacks on American capital weakened our prestige here and elsewhere far more than his cooperation bolstered it. Even his support was not an unmixed blessing at times because of his unsavory reputation among the more democratic states.

It is our considered opinion that only an overriding need for Trujillo's military cooperation can justify a continuance of our relations with him on any level other than that of polite but ineffusive diplomatic intercourse. Our cooperation can no longer be justified on the ground that the regime is beneficial to the continued political and social evolution of the Republic because its activities, since Trujillo went into the sugar business about four years ago, have been, on balance, damaging to the economic stability of the country and to the further expansion of property holding classes. Indeed the incipient Dominican bourgeoisie is now being squeezed brutally between the heavy millstones of Trujillo's rapacity and the urgent needs of the working classes. It has been argued that our technical cooperation program is designed to help the Dominican people, and that they should not be deprived of it because of the errors of their leader. But it is unfortunately true that Dominican propaganda media hail all bilateral and international assistance programs as fruits of Trujillo's diplomacy. Since they contribute appreciably to his prestige, it is naive to argue that we can avoid an undesirable linkage to his regime because they are designed to benefit his people. We will lay ourselves open to far more serious recriminations to the extent that our military cooperation strengthens Trujillo's armed forces. These are maintained and utilized solely to prevent any subversion of his regime, as he himself made abundantly clear when he evaded the troops for Korea issue.

The Guided Missiles and IAGS programs which clearly are of primary interest to us rather than the Dominicans, are the only programs which do not produce an unsatisfactory identification of the United States with Trujillismo. The Guided Missiles Agreement probably is the only one the loss of which would be embarrassing to us.

Since this is the case, the long and unhappy record of our relations with Trujillo, the accumulation of evidence that his megalomania is becoming increasingly dangerous, his encroachments on the middle class and private enterprise, his apparent abandonment of sound economic policies with a resultant deterioration in the economic situation of the Republic, and the current assault on American investment, all suggest that a thorough reconsideration and reevaluation of our policy toward Trujillo is essential and perhaps overdue.

Should we decide to let our non-essential programs taper off gradually, there is no reason to assume that we could not, with the application of proper pressures, retain the concessions we require under the Guided Missiles and the IAGS Agreements. Continued if grudging collaboration with us on most anti-communist issues could scarcely be withheld because Trujillo is irrevocably and psychopathically wedded to an anti-communist policy. But we probably should assume his collaboration in future rather than ask for it. We should certainly emphasize the importance of our contribution more vigorously and persistently.

If we are to protect our influence in favor of representative government among other nations of the free world, regain the respect of the Dominican people, and protect American investors here and elsewhere, we must soon make it clear that Trujillo's recent conduct and present policies are quite unacceptable, and that we are not trying to saddle the Dominican people with his regime indefinitely.

The leftist reactions which followed the death of Gomez[14] in Venezuela and the collapse of the Ubico[15] regime in Guatemala emphasize the possibility that a similarly violent swing may occur in the Dominican Republic. If we can subtly persuade the Dominicans that we are using but not supporting Trujillo, our chances of reaching a satisfactory accommodation with any successor regime will improve considerably. What we must avoid at all costs is the identification of the United States with Trujillismo to an extent which would make it impossible for even a conservative successor to cooperate fruitfully with us.

Subject: Summary and Conclusions of the Embassy's Review of Political and Economic Developments in the Dominican Republic during 1953.

The four sections of the Embassy's review of Political and Economic Developments in the Dominican Republic during 1953 have now been submitted as the despatches cited above. This despatch summarizes information contained therein and attempts to draw some broad conclusions. It also covers submittals of a combined Table of Contents and a Secret Supplement to Despatch No. 957 of April 27, 1954.

Summary

Much additional evidence accumulated during 1953 in support of our earlier hypothesis that Generalissimo Trujillo's megalomania is both dangerous and progressive. Since he is still the only source of policy and the omniscient administrator of the Dominican Republic, his mental condition demands careful and constant study. His insatiable craving for adulation now leads him to demand incredibly servile, fantastic, and frequent adulatory demonstrations and panegyrics. His self-absorption renders him dangerously insensitive to the reactions of others and offends important individuals and governments. His distorted sense of proportion countenances wild extravagances, including steps toward self-deification. Nevertheless, he still performs brillantly in many spheres and remains "the indispensable and indisputable leader of the Dominican people".

Last year's rapid fluctuations in the Dominican-American political and economic relations clearly illustrated the difficulties of doing business with an unreliable and egocentric dictator. Although Trujillo cooperated fully with us in the military field and in international organizations, his attacks on American capital reached hitherto unprecedented intensity and his unwarranted blackguarding of present and former Departmental officers injured our prestige here and elsewhere. His relations with other American States were dominated by attempts to throw a cordon sanitaire around Guatemala, Costa Rica and possibly Haiti, and by efforts to strengthen his relations with rightist governments of Middle America.

He continued to woo Spain; but his prospects for closer collaboration with the United Kingdom dwindled because its demand for Dominican sugar declined and because he offended the British with a singular manifestation of his vanity. Commercial relations with Germany, Italy, Japan and Spain were intensified, and some evidence accumulated that he may be veering toward bilateral clearing agreements. The Dominicans continued to participate vigorously in international organizations but won few triumphs, except for a substantial quota under the international sugar agreement. They were consistently helpful in the anti-communist struggle.

Trujillo's political machine showed a few signs of wear and maladjustment in the face of a modest deterioration in the economic situation. He curtailed beneficial expenditures heavily but clever propaganda concealed this while magnifying his past and current achievements. Although some evidences of inefficiency in the Armed Forces, deterioration in the positions of the middle and laboring classes and signs of scattered discontent could be discerned, the regime's stability seemed unimpaired.

Dominican exports declined approximately 10% during 1953, but a corresponding adjustment in imports avoided serious balance of payment difficulties. The conclusion of the International Sugar Agreement mitigated fears about the disposal of the 1953–4 sugar crop, and high coffee and cacao prices induced moderate optimism. Nevertheless, the country experienced a minor depression during the second and third quarters although business conditions and employment were somewhat better at the year's end.

In a series of complicated financial transactions, Trujillo cancelled the internal public debt and bailed himself out of the sugar industry. His propaganda lauded these moves, but they actually doubled the Republic's financial liabilities, inflated the credit structure, and undermined the stability of the banking system and the currency. Considerable uncoordinated expenditures on economic development increased national productivity somewhat; but the measure of diversification achieved failed to counter a further expansion in sugar cultivation, and the climate for foreign investment deteriorated badly. Trujillo extended totalitarian controls to new areas of the economy and his greed for personal aggrandizement showed no signs of abating. His personal fortune and income and the scope of his private economic interests expanded impressively.

Conclusions

1. Trujillo's psychosis has already driven him into several unstatesmanlike actions and it now threatens some of the solid achievements of his earlier years. It is so far advanced that we must take full account of it, both positively and negatively, in our day to day dealings with him. Nevertheless, he still dominates his people and probably will continue to do so in his remaining years unless his malady takes a rapid change for the worse or external circumstances intervene. However, it seems unlikely that he will reach an exceptionally old age.

2. His political machine is still strong and its agencies of repression are more than adequate for all likely contingencies. But the disparity between Trujillo's propaganda claims and his performance is now fantastically great, and the public's reaction, when his dishonesty is finally revealed, will be correspondingly violent. Present evidences of discontent are unimportant but dissent could increase rapidly if a major depression should occur. In this case the Jefe probably will exploit xenophobia and class and racial prejudice to turn popular discontent away from himself. The situation after Trujillo's death is unpredictable, but we doubt that any of his relatives or intimates could hold things together very long.

3. We should make greater efforts to prevent identification of the United States with Trujillo in the minds of the Dominican people in light of his growing excesses and the likelihood that he has only a few more years. Our cooperation can no longer be justified on the ground that his regime is beneficial to the continued political and social development of the Dominican Republic and only an overweening need for his military assistance should sanction a continuance of our relations with him on any level other than that of polite but uneffusive diplomatic intercourse.

Trujillo may honestly desire to maintain the closest possible relations with the United States, as he frequently alleges—but only on his own terms, including our acquiescence in his eventual absorption of most of the American capital invested here. We can never hope for stability in our relations with him and we must continue to expect a weird mixture of abuse and praise. His recent efforts to improve his public relations in the United States must be received with grave suspicion, in light of his possible goal of mobilizing opinion against the Department. We must discount very heavily the value of his collaboration in the anti-communist campaign because of his frequent abuse of our officials and of American capital, and because collaboration with him injures our reputation with more respectable governments of the international community.

4. The basic imbalance in the Dominican economy has not been remedied and prospects for early improvement are poor. Consequently a major depression can be expected if prices of sugar, coffee and cacao decline simultaneously, if sugar prices drop substantially below present levels, of if the present sellers' markets for coffee and cacao disappear.

Trujillo's greed for wealth and power and his tremendous energy are driving him irresistibly toward broader and deeper intervention in the Dominican economy. His personal fortune and income is already enormous and his insatiable thirst for power is rapidly bringing the other areas of the economy under totalitarian control. A reversal of previously sound fiscal, banking and monetary policies occurred with startling suddenness during 1953, in consequence of his efforts to liquidate and profit on his investment in the Dominican sugar industry. His greed for wealth and power also compelled him to intensify his attacks on foreign enterprises. Unless these trends are reversed, the Dominican Republic will soon have a completely managed economy, including a fiat currency and exchange controls, and it will cease to offer any attractions for foreign capital. Since Trujillo's social philosophy now seems to resemble Peron's, few observers take a sanguine view of the prospects of the Dominican middle class.

These gloomy observations on economic trends do not warrant the conclusion that a major deterioration in the economic and social situation would seriously embarrass the regime, although it would greatly complicate the problems of any successor government. On the contrary, we are constrained to feel that propaganda and force will enable Trujillo to go on milking the Dominican cow with increasing thoroughness until his death. The precedents offered by Hitlerite Germany, the USSR, Franco's Spain and Peron's Argentina incline us towards this view.

5. In light of the developments summarized above we recommend most strongly that a basic review of our Policy Statement on the Dominican Republic be undertaken. We also recommend that the Department consider making much more information about the Dominican Republic available to our people, either directly or by encouraging respectable journalists to come here, with a view to counteracting Trujillo's misleading and inaccurate propaganda especially about investment conditions.

OFFICIAL USE ONLY [WASHINGTON,] June 11, 1954.

Subject: Dominican Views on U.S. Sugar Legislation

Participants: Manuel de Moya, Dominican Ambassador
Dr. Jesús María Troncoso S., Dominican Minister without Portfolio
ARA—Mr. Holland
MID—Mr. Warner

Ambassador de Moya and Dr. Troncoso called on Assistant Secretary Holland by appointment to present a note[2] setting forth in general terms Dominican aspirations with respect to the United States sugar market. These aspirations are, briefly, to secure a larger share in that market through an increase in the comparatively small sugar quota now assigned to the Dominican Republic.

Dr. Troncoso explained that this is a long-range goal and that the Dominican Republic realizes that hearings on the present bill to amend the Sugar Act[3] are not likely to produce such a change in favor of the Dominican Republic. Dr. Troncoso expressed the hope, in fact, that the Dominican Republic's present quota would not be adversely affected by any amendments to the Act. The Dominican position is that they hope to hold their present quota unchanged for now but with the hope of increasing it eventually. They feel that an increase in their quota would be only just and fair since the Dominican Republic continues to purchase the greatest share of its imports from the U.S. while the U.S. takes only a very small percentage of Dominican exports of its principal product, sugar.

Mr. Holland pointed out that the Department of State is very interested in the Dominican views on sugar problems and suggested that it would be useful to discuss them in greater detail with the Department's sugar experts. It was suggested accordingly that Dr. Troncoso meet with Mr. Cale, ARA: AR, next week[4] for that purpose. Dr. Troncoso thanked Mr. Holland for the suggestion, indicating he would be happy to follow it. He and Ambassador de Moya departed shortly thereafter after exchanging the customary amenities with Mr. Holland.

BALANCE SHEET, DECEMBER 1, 1954

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

The United States would like the Dominican Republic to take action on:

1. FCN Treaty

We presented a draft of such a treaty to the Dominican Government about three years ago. The Dominicans have been sitting on it ever since, despite our periodic prodding.

2. Creation of more favorable investment climate

While Dominican harassment of American business has subsided of late, investors are generally not reassured and fear that a new campaign may be reopened at any time. The investment picture is clouded also by recent Dominican moves to establish increasing state control over industrial and commercial enterprises in the Dominican Republic.

The Dominican Republic would like the United States to take action on:

1. A request for 10 M–24 tanks, 75 75mm recoilless weapons and 25 F–86–F Sabrejet fighters. There has been no unusual delay with respect to these requests.

2. Increased participation for Dominican sugar in the U.S. market.

3. Participation in the International Fair of Peace and Brotherhood in the Free World, scheduled to open in December 1955 in Ciudad Trujillo to celebrate 25 years of the Era of Trujillo.

POLITICAL, ECONOMIC, AND MILITARY RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND ECUADOR[1]

Editorial Note

On January 15, 1952, representatives of the United States and Ecuador initiated negotiations at Quito for a bilateral military assistance agreement. Documents pertaining to the negotiations are in Department of State file 722.5 MSP for 1952. For text of the Agreement, signed at Quito, February 20, 1952, and entered into force on the same date, see Department of State Treaties and Other International Acts Series (TIAS) No. 2560, or United States Treaties and Other International Agreements (UST), volume 3 (part 3), page 4162.

Concurrent with the negotiations for the military assistance agreement, representatives of the United States and Ecuador conducted negotiations for a related bilateral military plan. The "Plan of the Governments of Ecuador and the United States of America for Their Common Defense," signed at Quito, February 20, 1952, and effective the same date, was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 666, from Quito, dated February 20, 1952, not printed (722.5 MSP/–2052).

Arthur Schoenfeld of the Office of the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs; cleared with the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, the Offices of Regional American Affairs and South American Affairs, the Office of the Assistant Legal Adviser for Economic Affairs, and the Department of Defense; approved and signed for the Secretary by Deputy Assistant Secretary Mann.

[2] L. Neftalí Ponce.

[3] In the referenced telegram, Ambassador Daniels informed the Department of State that Foreign Minister Ponce had raised the question whether equipment supplied to Ecuador under provisions of the military assistance agreement could be used for purposes of self-defense, and that he had replied as follows: "primary purpose bilateral agreement related to continental defense against extra-continental aggression and that other inter-Amer agreements relating to intra-continental aggression remained unaffected and in full force." (722.5 MSP/1–1552)

Contemplated US aid will be provided in context US–Ecuador concern with danger aggression from outside hemisphere. US MSA was presented to Congress and written on such basis. US position on use of equipment for def against other forms of aggression depends on situation then existing and on action taken by appropriate organ under existing inter-American arrangements. US cannot, until that time, state what its view will be on request which might then be made by Ecuador under para 2 Art 1 draft bilateral.

We do not wish either to modify existing text of bilateral in this respect or to enter into any form of understanding on this question and hope FonMin will not further pursue matter. In event he presses matter you should avoid replying to FonMin query in terms which might be interpreted as applying specifically to intra-continental aggression for reason that Sec 401 of MSA of 1951[4] makes no such specific ref.

SECRET PRIORITY QUITO, January 22, 1952—8 p. m.

254. This afternoon I explained fully to FonMin Dept's views re bilateral military assistance agreement pursuant Deptel 193 Jan 18, 1 p.m.[1] Ponce expressed full understanding our position, but said problem was very delicate one for Govt Ecuador, because of political considerations. He said highly desirable that agreement not be subject political attack either in public or in Ecuadoran Congress, even on hypothetical basis. Having in mind our own need to stay within letter and spirit of MSA and internatl commitments, Ponce suggests fol amendment to Art 1 of proposed text:

Para 1, third sentence "Such assistance shld be so designed as to promote the defense and maintain the peace of the western hemisphere and be in accordance with the defense plans under which both govts will participate in missions important to the defense and the maintenance of the peace of the western hemisphere".

Para 2, lines 5 and 6 "under which the two govts will participate in missions important to the defense and the maintenance of the peace of the western hemisphere".

In suggesting these additions to those two sentences, Ponce called attn to the phraseology of first para preamble, where same words appear.

[1] Supra.

While appreciating reluctance Dept make any change in present text, I am afraid an unyielding or rigid attitude our part may not be in our best interest. Obviously our interest avoid political attacks on Ecuadoran Govt based on proposed bilateral. Equally our interest support concept that "maintenance of peace" desirable. Ponce indicated that with this point settled he anticipated no difficulty rapid conclusion bilateral agreement. This afternoon military team informed me that prospect good for early conclusion supplementary military plan, subject further review by govt. Accordingly if proposed amendment can be accepted by Dept it appears probable entire negotiation can be wound up promptly.

If Dept can accept proposed amendment in Ecuadoran bilateral agreement, it may wish consider including identical phraseology in proposed Peruvian bilateral and possibly others.

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, January 26, 1952.

A–191. Reference Embassy's confidential despatch No. 514, January 8, 1952[2] regarding the possible purchase from Czechoslovakia by the Ecuadoran Government of Czechoslovak armaments for the Ecuadoran Army, and requesting the Department's views in the premises.

Any views which the U.S. might have on this proposed transaction would be based on (1) the form of payment which would be used by Ecuador in concluding this transaction in East-West trade; (2) the effect this transaction would have on the long-range U.S. policy of standardization, and on the continued usefulness of the U.S. military mission in Ecuador; and (3) whether the equipment included in this transaction is actually of the type which might be furnished by the U.S. as grant aid under the Mutual Security Program for the preparation of units of the Ecuadoran armed forces to perform defense missions mutually agreed upon, or as reimbursable aid for the general purposes of Ecuadoran defense.

1. East–West Trade—While the US. Government would not be in a position at present to object to a transaction of this sort if it were based purely on currency payments, it must consider, both as a matter of law and as a matter of policy, the eligibility of foreign governments which engage in certain types of East–West trade to receive military, economic or financial aid from the United States. If, for instance, in partial payment for these armaments, Ecuador were to export to Czechoslovakia a strategic material included in List B issued under Title I of the Battle Act,[3] the U.S. would, under the terms of this legislation, have to consider terminating military, economic or financial assistance to Ecuador. Or if, for example, Ecuador were to return to Czechoslovakia certain of the arms it received under the original transaction, as part of a trade-in in order to receive additional arms, or to ship to Czechoslovakia as payment any of the items included in List A, issued under Title I of the Battle Act, termination of military, economic or financial assistance to Ecuador would be mandatory.

2. Standardization—It has been determined by the Department of the Army that the arms which Ecuador now wishes to buy from Czechoslovakia are types which the U.S. is in a position to supply. Pricing and availability data on comparable U.S. arms were furnished the U.S. military negotiating team prior to their departure for Quito. It is still part of the long-range military policy of the United States to bring about, as far as may be possible, standardization of the arms and armament of the Western Hemisphere, in order to simplify logistic support in the event of global conflict. Following World War II, Ecuador received from the U.S., as a nucleus of U.S. equipment, a substantial amount of surplus U.S. arms as an "interim program", and a U.S. military mission (as well as a naval and air force mission) was established in Ecuador to train the Ecuadoran Army in their use. Since then, the Department has no record that the Ecuadoran Government has ever submitted a request to purchase from the United States under section 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act,[4] any additional small arms, or maintenance equipment to service this type of equipment which the U.S. had previously furnished them. In view of this, any additional purchase by Ecuador of Czechoslovak arms would appear not only to complicate further their logistical support, but also to reduce the value of the U.S. military mission.

[4] For text of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 (Public Law 329), approved Oct. 6, 1949, see 63 Stat. 715.

3. Mutual Security Program—The Department understands from the Department of Defense that few of the arms listed in Colonel Vaquero's list are included in the equipment which might be furnished Ecuador as grant aid under the Mutual Security Program. If this question is raised by the Ecuadorans in the current bilateral discussions, it should be made clear that every reasonable effort will be made to supply Ecuador, on a reimbursable basis under section 408(e) of the MDAA, as amended, with her normal equipment requirements for internal security and national defense if she should submit such a request. Military equipment furnished under the Mutual Security Program, however, will be available only for the preparation of units of the Ecuadoran armed forces to perform hemisphere defense missions which are mutually agreed upon.

Editorial Note

On June 1, 1952, José María Velasco Ibarra was elected President of Ecuador to succeed President Galo Plaza Lasso. In a memorandum to Assistant Secretary Miller, dated June 3, 1952, commenting on the election, Edgar L. McGinnis, Jr. of the Office of South American Affairs stated in part that "Because of his inconsistent and unpredictable nature, it is believed that Velasco's election is less desirable from the standpoint of US policy than [Conservative Party candidate Ruperto] Alarcón's election would have been." He further stated the following: "From the standpoint of governmental stability, it appears that a Velasco administration would be weak due to the political animosities dating back to his overthrow in 1935 and again in 1947. From the viewpoint of the communist question, it is believed that Velasco is definitely anti-communist." (722.00/6–352)

In an exchange of letters, dated June 12 and June 20, 1952, Ambassador Daniels and Assistant Secretary Miller discussed the possibility of an unofficial visit by President-elect Velasco Ibarra to the United States which would provide an opportunity for him to clarify his political views to the press (Miller files, lot 53 D 26, "Ecuador"). In telegram 398, from Quito, marked eyes only for Assistant Secretary Miller, Ambassador Daniels stated that he had requested outgoing President Plaza to take the initiative in seeking the President-elect's reaction to this idea (722.11/6–2652). No such visit materialized.

Memorandum by the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs (Martin) to the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Olmsted)[1]

Subject: Request by the Government of Ecuador for Two Destroyer Escorts.

Reference is made to your memorandum dated March 18, 1952,[2] stating that while there is no change in the availability for sale of destroyer escorts desired by the Ecuadoran Government (Ecuador Case No. 1), the Department of Defense is prepared to offer for sale to the Government of Ecuador an operational frigate from among those recently returned by the Soviet Government and now employed in patrol duty in Korean waters, on the condition that the Ecuadoran Government would agree to maintain and operate such a frigate in Korean waters as long as the United Nations military operations continue in that theater.

This Department was requested to transmit the foregoing offer to the Government of Ecuador, provided that the Department of State approved the proposed transaction from a political and economic viewpoint.

The Department, after consulting with Ambassador Paul C. Daniels on this proposal, recommends that, in view of the political implications contained in the principal condition attached to it, the offer in its present form should not be made to the Ecuadoran Government. The Department of State believes that the Government of Ecuador would be more likely to regard this offer as an effort on the part of the United States to force a decision by Ecuador on assistance to the United Nations in Korea, rather than as a response to its request for the assistance of this government in the procurement of an addition to its naval forces, and that an effort to impose such a condition would complicate our relations with the Government of Ecuador. While it is recognized that identical offers were accepted by the Governments of Colombia and Thailand, each of these governments had already decided to commit a naval unit in Korea, and requested the additional frigate in order to permit its naval forces to continue in that theater of operations.

If at some future date, it should become possible for the Department of Defense to offer a frigate, or some other suitable patrol type vessel, to Ecuador for use in hemisphere defense, without requiring, as part of the transfer, a political decision on the part of Ecuador involving the commitment of armed forces outside the hemisphere, the Department of State would be prepared to recommend that such an offer be made.

Memorandum of Conversation, by George O. Spencer of the Office of Regional American Affairs

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 4, 1952.

Subject: Military Problems Raised by the Ecuadoran Ambassador

Participants: José Ricardo Chiriboga Villagómez—Ecuadoran Ambassador
Paul C. Daniels—American Ambassador, Quito
Mr. Atwood—OSA
Mr. McGinnis—OSA
Mr. Spencer—AR

The major part of this meeting was devoted to a discussion of the following military problems raised by the Ecuadoran Ambassador:

First. The Ambassador indicated that his Government was concerned over the possibility that the U.S. Government, under Article V of the Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement between Ecuador and the U.S., would send large numbers of military personnel to Ecuador to implement the grant-aid military assistance program and that these personnel might be sent without the prior consent of the Ecuadoran Government. He believed that U.S. military training missions now in Ecuador should be used to implement the program. The Ambassador was informed that the question of how many U.S. personnel would be required for assignment to Ecuador and the question of whether they should be assigned to training missions or maintained apart from the missions were questions now being considered by the interested agencies of the U.S. Government. However, he was assured that no U.S. personnel would be sent without the prior approval of the U.S. Ambassador, who obviously would obtain the consent of the Ecuadoran Government before indicating his approval to the State Department. The Ambassador was reminded that the U.S. has an important interest in assuring that Ecuadoran armed forces are properly trained in the use of programmed equipment, so that they may effectively discharge the hemisphere defense missions Ecuador has agreed to assume under the Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement and the Bilateral Military Plan. He was informed that in the event Ecuador should refuse to receive personnel which competent U.S. authorities believe are required to provide necessary training, the question might arise as to whether Ecuador had acted in violation of the Agreement.

Second. The Ambassador stated that the Ecuadoran armed forces did not have adequate facilities to house much of the anti-aircraft equipment being provided Ecuador under the program and he asked whether it would be possible for the U.S. to furnish necessary housing as grant-aid. He was informed that it was unlikely that housing facilities could be provided under the program. He was told that aside from any possible legal prohibition against providing housing assistance, there was a question of precedence which would require consideration, in short, if such type of assistance should be provided Ecuador, it might be necessary to provide similar assistance to other countries, upon request. It was explained that this problem might create difficulty in approving the Ecuadoran request. The Ambassador was advised to raise the question of housing with military training missions in Ecuador.

Third. The Ambassador referred to Ecuador's need for receiving certain assistance for Ecuadoran naval and infantry units. He was advised that requests for additional assistance under the program should be submitted to U.S. military training missions in Ecuador, and that the Ecuadoran Service Attachés in Washington might profitably raise these matters, simultaneously, with the U.S. Defense Department.

Fourth. The Ambassador referred to the provision in the U.S. military mission agreement which prohibits the Ecuadoran Government from accepting any other foreign military mission. He stated that Brazil had offered to send a military mission to Ecuador without cost to the Ecuadoran Government, and inquired whether the prohibition in the present agreement would prevent Ecuador from accepting the Brazilian offer. He said that the Brazilian mission would be at the general staff level and would not duplicate U.S. mission activities. The Ambassador wished also to know whether the U.S. would be willing to remove the prohibition when the U.S. mission agreement comes up for renewal next year. The Ambassador understood that both Brazilian and U.S. military missions were maintained in Paraguay. He was informed that this was a question which would have to be discussed with the Defense Department and that in reaching a decision as to whether the sending of a Brazilian mission would be a breach of the mission contract the U.S. would no doubt wish to know what precise activities the Brazilian mission would be engaged in. It was mentioned to the Ambassador that the Brazilian mission to Paraguay is believed to provide training in horse cavalry, whereas the U.S. mission is engaged in other types of training. It was agreed that the Department would obtain from the Defense Department full information regarding the types of training provided by the present U.S. military mission and that Ambassador Daniels upon his return to Ecuador would obtain from the Ecuadoran Government more detailed information regarding the proposed functions of the Brazilian Mission, so that the problem could be objectively analyzed by the U.S.

Subject: Export-Import Bank Loans for Quevedo–Manta Highway and Airports at Quito and Guayaquil.

Participants: The Ecuadoran Ambassador
Mr. Thomas C. Mann, Acting Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs
Mr. McGinnis, OSA

After discussing other subjects with Mr. Mann, Ambassador Chiriboga said that he wished to urge the Department to impress upon the Export-Import Bank the need for prompt action on the Quevedo–Manta highway loan[1] and the airports credit.[2] The Ambassador said that his Government had reviewed the various outstanding credits with the Export Bank and had decided to place first priority upon these two loans. He asserted that the previous administration had supported a number of unrelated loan applications at the Bank which had resulted in some confusion as to which were the most important and that wishing to avoid a similar situation the Velasco administration had decided to concentrate upon the two loans mentioned. Ambassador Chiriboga went on to say that it was vital for his Government to show early progress upon its promises to the people for economic development and added that in the long run no Ecuadoran administration could remain in office without making concrete progress in the Between 1947 and 1951, the Bank made no disbursements under this $2.72 million credit, because of Ecuador's failure to enter a contract with a suitable U.S. engineering firm. Early in 1952, the Bank disbursed a total of about $400,000 to cover expenditures under a contract signed by Ecuador with the Moore Construction Company, but this contract proved unsatisfactory and was terminated. [2] Reference is to an Export-Import Bank loan of $1 million, in favor of the Republic of Ecuador, approved July 19, 1951, to assist in financing the costs of improving and expanding commercial airport facilities at Quito and Guayaquil. Up to the date of this memorandum, the Bank made no disbursements under this credit, because of the failure of the Ecuardoran Government to supply it with requisite information concerning cost breakdowns. economic condition of the country. Ecuador, he said, was firmly wedded to the policy of improving the living standards of the people through the development of the country's economic resources and that highways and air communications were of first importance in this program.

With respect to the highway credit, the Ambassador said that he could see no obstacle to early action by the Export-Import Bank. He related that specifically, Ecuador awaited the Bank's approval of terms under which his Government could call for bids from construction firms. He added that once this approval were obtained, Ecuador could go forward with the long pending highway. The Ambassador indicated that the Bank had assured him that the existing $2.7 million highway credit would be substantially increased to provide for increased costs of the Quevedo–Manta highway under present conditions. Mr. Mann assured the Ambassador that the Department would discuss this matter with the Bank and take whatever action it appropriately could to expedite action by the Bank.

Ambassador Chiriboga then said that next week he would present to the Export-Import Bank a request for the increase of the airport loan from $1 million to $4 million.[3] He said that the $1 million previously granted would not even be sufficient for paving of the runways and that Ecuador, in order to do a useful job, desired to erect administration buildings and install a modern communications system. He said that the loan request would be supported by a study of airport needs at Quito and Quayaquil prepared by the CAA Mission. In conclusion, the Ambassador said that his Government had determined to decline a Panagra loan of $500,000 to assist in the airport construction because the terms required by Panagra were unacceptable. Mr. Mann said that the Department would take appropriate action in this matter also.

[1] Drafted by George O. Spencer of the Office of Regional American Affairs; cleared with the Office of the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs, the Office of South American Affairs, and the Departments of Defense and the Army; signed by Mr. Jamison.

[2] In despatch 660, Ambassador Daniels informed the Department of State that he had received a note from Ecuadoran Foreign Minister Ponce, dated Feb. 14, 1952, expressing agreement with the Ambassador's proposals that U.S. armed service missions in Ecuador temporarily perform the functions of a Military Assistance Advisory Group (MAAG), and that additional personnel be assigned to these missions to perform necessary technical operations (722.5 MSP/2–1952).

[3] In despatch 939, Ambassador Daniels requested information about equipment scheduled for shipment to Ecuador in accordance with the Military Assistance Agreement, and he also suggested ways to reduce the costs to Ecuador of implementing the military assistance program (722.5 MSP/6–1652).

[4] In despatch 126, Ambassador Daniels recommended that only a minimum amount of the total administrative costs of the military assistance program for Ecuador be charged to the Ecuadoran Government for payment in local currency (722.5 MSP/8–2052).

[5] In despatch 266, the Embassy in Ecuador transmitted a memorandum by Col. Herbert B. Enderton, U.S. Army Attaché, dated Oct. 8, 1952, reporting the views of Ecuadoran armed forces concerning the arrival on Aug. 3, 1952, of the initial shipment of equipment under the Military Assistance Agreement (720.5 MSP/10–852).

[6] In despatch 511, the Embassy requested information with respect to whether or not the Department of Defense contemplated revision of the United States–Ecuador bilateral military plan of Feb. 20, 1952 (722.5 MSP/1–2353).

[7] In the referenced telegram, Ambassador Daniels recommended that a qualified military officer be sent to Ecuador by the Department of Defense to survey the operation of the military assistance program and to suggest solutions to the problems which had arisen in connection with the program (722.5 MSP/1–2353).

[8] In despatch 521, Ambassador Daniels reported a conversation which took place on Jan. 27, 1953, between him and Ecuadoran Minister of Defense Carlos Julio Arosemena Monroy, concerning the implementation of the military assistance program in Ecuador (722.5 MSP/1–2853).

[9] In telegram 188, the Department informed Ambassador Daniels that he would soon be instructed to initiate negotiations with the Ecuadoran Government to obtain its agreement to provide local currency to cover the costs of MAAG functions in Ecuador, and that Defense preferred to deal with the problems connected with the Ecuadoran program on the basis of the results of the negotiations, rather than by sending an officer to Ecuador to evaluate the situation (722.5 MSP/1–2353).

[10] In telegram 208, Ambassador Daniels emphasized the need for a military officer to survey the operation of the military assistance program in Ecuador (722.5 MSP/2–353).

[11] In despatch 536, Ambassador Daniels discussed the limited funds available in Ecuador for financing MAAG operations, and he reiterated his earlier recommendation for a special military mission to study the military assistance program for the purpose of adjusting it to Ecuadoran realities (722.5 MSP/2–353).

Before complying with the Embassy's request that a competent officer be sent to Ecuador to examine problems which have arisen in connection with the grant-aid military assistance program, the Department of Defense plans to review the basic problems which have been reported by the Embassy, the Acting MAAG Chief[12] and the U.S. Military Attaché,[13] with a view to determining alternative solutions. A preliminary review of those basic problems indicates that it may be possible to apply remedial measures of the type indicated below.

Local Currency and MAAG. Prior to the receipt of the Embassy's telegram 208, of Feb. 3, 1953, the Department of Defense reduced its original estimate of currency required for the program by about 40 percent. To accomplish this reduction, the Defense Department reduced the number of training teams planned for Ecuador over an eighteen-month period from three teams to one Army training team of five men, planned to remain in Ecuador for about 90 days. The Defense Department, however, made no change in its original recommendation for the establishment of a MAAG of four officers and four enlisted men. After currency requirements of the Defense Department had been revised, those of the State Department were recalculated and the following total U.S. requirement for Ecuadoran currency established. Amounts shown are in U.S. dollars. An equivalent amount of Ecuadoran currency, in each case, represents the U.S. requirement.

First Six-Month Period

		Training		State Admin. Support	For Contingencies	Total
MAAG	Army	Navy	AF
8,517	7,385	—	—	4,213	1,885	22,000

Ensuing Twelve-Month Period

17,034	7,385	—	—	12,639	3,942	41,000

In view of the Embassy's report, in despatch no. 536, of February 3, 1953, that the Ecuadoran Ministry of Defense, because of its meager budget, would find it impracticable to assume any further financial burden of any importance beyond the current requirements of the Ecuadoran Armed Forces, the Defense Department has further reduced its requirements in accordance with the formula outlined below.

[13] Col. Herbert B. Enderton.

(1) The MAAG would consist of four officers and four enlisted men, as indicated: Chief of MAAG, with the rank of Army Colonel, and one clerical assistant; an Army Section of one Lt. Colonel and one enlisted man; a Navy Section of one Lt. Commander; an Air Force Section of one Lt. Colonel and two enlisted men. Personnel would be carefully selected so as to assure that they would be qualified to implement the Army, Navy and Air Force programs effectively.

(2) Ecuador would be asked to pay the following expenses of MAAG personnel: station allowance while in Ecuador; necessary travel within Ecuador; return travel to the U.S., including return of dependents and household effects, but not travel to Ecuador of personnel, their dependents or household effects.

(3) Although personnel required for the program, as specified above, would not be assigned to training missions, they might share office space and be given access to administrative facilities and services which Ecuador already provides the training missions, thus reducing the amount of currency required by the State Department for administrative support to the MAAG.

(4) In order to establish a MAAG without increasing U.S. military population in Ecuador greatly, and in order to reduce the net cost to Ecuador of maintaining both a MAAG and U.S. training missions, the Army is prepared, subject to Ecuador's consent, to reduce its present training mission complement by two spaces, and the Air Force is prepared to reduce its present training mission complement by three spaces. The Navy is uncertain whether it would be practicable to reduce its present training mission complement and is requesting recommendations from the Chief of the Naval Training Mission in Ecuador before making a final determination.

(5) Ecuador would not be requested to supply currency for training teams, which would be sent to Ecuador, as needed, at U.S. expense.

(6) It might be possible to reduce, or eliminate, currency required for contingencies, i.e., return of MAAG personnel to Ecuador for consultation, in the event the need should arise.

Under this formula, Defense requirements in the above tabulation could be reduced to a total of $8,517 in currency required for the first six-month period and to a total of $17,034 in currency required for an ensuing twelve-month period. Depending on the ability and willingness of Ecuador to provide administrative facilities and services to the MAAG, it might be possible to reduce the amounts tabulated for State Department administrative support and for contingencies by perhaps one-half or more. In addition to these reductions, Ecuador would realize a reduction in cost brought about by a reduction of existing training mission complements, which are now being maintained at Ecuador's expense. Any unused-balance of currency existing at the end of either of the two specified periods would, of course, have the effect of reducing the amount of currency required for an ensuing period.

Consideration is not being given in Washington, at the present time, to the Embassy's suggestion that the program for Ecuador be wholly subsidized by the U.S. Legal difficulties prohibit funds programmed for end-items to be used for meeting U.S. administrative costs in Ecuador, and there are no other dollars available for meeting those costs. While it is recognized that the failure of Ecuador to agree to provide any currency would present the U.S. with a difficult choice, either of discontinuing the program or assuming its full cost, it is believed that the alternative proposed by the Embassy should be considered only as a last resort, after Ecuador has indicated officially an intention not to provide any currency for the program.

It would be beneficial to have at least a preliminary and informal Ecuadoran reaction to the above formula at an early date. In the event Ecuador should object to negotiations prior to settlement of the Army problems discussed below, it is suggested that negotiations might be limited to currency required by the State and Defense Departments to maintain all of the eight MAAG personnel proposed above, with the exception of one officer and one enlisted man proposed for the Army Section. This suggestion is based on the belief that rectifying the Army program may be time-consuming and that negotiations for currency required for an Army Section could be undertaken at a later date. In the event Ecuador is prepared to commence negotiations in accordance with the above formula, the Department is prepared to provide any additional information the Embassy may require for the negotiations.

Army Program. The Department of the Army is requesting the Chief of the U.S. Army Mission in Ecuador to submit additional information regarding problems which have arisen so that remedial measures may be developed. On the assumption that Ecuador is unwilling or unable to prepare an anti-aircraft battalion for hemisphere defense (see Colonel Enderton's report of December 22, 1952[14] to the Department of the Army) one of the following alternatives would appear to be indicated.

a. Reduce the battalion to a single battery, thus utilizing equipment shipped to date and thus reducing Ecuadoran effort and expense. Offer remainder of battalion to another country without delay.

b. Delete entire AA battalion from the program, retaining Air Force and Navy programs on present scale. Remove Army equipment shipped to date. Offer AA battalion to another country.

c. Same as b, and in addition, indicate to Ecuador that a contribution of some other unspecified unit might be considered at some indefinite later date, subject to acceptability at that time to both countries and subject to availability of U.S. and Ecuadoran funds, at that time.

If Ecuador cannot contribute an AA battalion, present U.S. military planning requires that the Department of the Army seek the contribution of an AA battalion from some other Latin American country. The Department of the Army is therefore not in a position to release Army funds programmed for Ecuador to the Navy or Air Force, in order to permit an increase in Navy and Air Force programs.

There appears to be virtually no possibility of the U.S. providing warehousing assistance to Ecuador.

Navy and Air Force Programs. It may be possible for the Navy Department to increase slightly the Navy program planned for Ecuador. The substitution of AT–6–g for AT–6 aircraft is unlikely to present a problem. The Acting MAAG Chief should submit this request to the Department of Defense if he has not already done so.

With regard to questions raised by the Embassy in its despatch No. 511 of January 23, 1953, the Embassy will be informed, and provided an opportunity to comment, regarding any contemplated revision of the Secret Military Plan with Ecuador or the basic program contemplated under the Plan. After the Embassy has consulted with the Chiefs of the Army, Naval and Air Force Missions, the Department would very much appreciate receiving any proposals the Embassy may desire to submit regarding the Plan.

As soon as the Defense Department is prepared to send an officer, or officers, to Ecuador to review the problems which have arisen, the Embassy will be informed. In the interim, the Department would appreciate receiving the Embassy's reaction to the local currency and MAAG proposals set forth herein.

In airgram A–173, to Quito, dated March 20, 1953, the Department of State informed the Embassy that the Department of Defense, on the basis of information supplied by the Embassy, had revised its proposals with respect to the establishment of a Military Assistance Advisory Group (MAAG) in Ecuador, and now recommended a MAAG consisting of one officer and one enlisted man at a total cost of $10,800 for an 18-month period (722.5 MSP/3–1053).

In despatch 848, from Quito, dated May 25, 1953, Ambassador Daniels reported that the Embassy received payment amounting to $10,800 from the Government of Ecuador to cover local costs of the MAAG (722.5 MSP/5–2553).

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 16, 1953.

Subject: Abaca Agreement[1]

Participants: The Ecuadoran Ambassador
Thomas C. Mann, Acting Assistant Secretary—ARA
Edgar L. McGinnis, Jr.—OSA

The Ecuadoran Ambassador told Mr. Mann that he had just been informed by the RFC that a recent White House directive prohibited it from signing the pending abaca contract with Ecuador.[2] Ambassador Chiriboga said that the reaction in Ecuador to this development would be one of considerable disappointment. He referred to the lengthy negotiations between the RFC and his Government regarding this contract and said that Ecuador had finally determined about a month ago to sign the agreement on RFC's terms.

Mr. Mann said that he regretted very much that recent developments had made it necessary for the RFC to discontinue negotiations for a contract with the Ecuadoran Government. He stated that the entire abaca program of the U.S. Government had been reviewed recently from the standpoint of our security needs of the fiber. He said that the review disclosed that no expansion of the abaca program would be necessary or desirable. Mr. Mann pointed out that the abaca program was authorized by law solely to provide abaca to meet the security needs of the U.S. and that the program was in no sense designed for the purpose of rendering economic aid to other countries. Mr. Mann observed that he had expressed misgivings to the Ambassador last fall, when the latter had been asked to call at the Department to expedite Ecuadoran action upon the pending contract, that if further delays were encountered the U.S. might not be able to conduct the program at all.

The Ambassador agreed to this and indicated that it was indeed unfortunate that the Ecuadoran Government had not given its approval to the contract in a form satisfactory to the RFC until it was too late.

[1] Between May and November 1952, representatives of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (RFC) and Ecuador conducted negotiations for a contract with respect to the development of abaca production in Ecuador. The negotiators agreed on a contract, but the Ecuadoran Government took no action to approve it. In November, the Ecuadorans were notified that the White House had the entire abaca program under review to determine whether any expansion was required in light of U.S. security needs. Memorandum of Conversation, by Edgar L. McGinnis, Jr., of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 11, 1953.

Subject: Visit of Minister National Economy; Economic Matters.

Participants: Ambassador Chiriboga of Ecuador
Ecuadoran Minister of Economy, Jaime Nebot Velasco
Ecuadoran Minister of Defense, Carlos Julio Arosemena
OSA—Mr. Atwood
OSA—Mr. Bernbaum
AR—Mr. Jamison
AR—Mr. Spencer
OSA—Edgar L. McGinnis, Jr.

After the discussion of other questions Ambassador Chiriboga stated that the Minister of National Economy, Nebot, wished to say a few words respecting economic matters. Sr. Nebot thereupon launched upon a highly generalized review of the Ecuadoran economy. He spoke of efforts of the Velasco administration to promote economic development of the country. He said that this could not be accomplished by Ecuadoran resources alone and the economic aid of the U.S. was, therefore, required. The Minister observed that Ecuador had done everything possible to improve its credit abroad referring to increased exports, rising foreign exchange reserves and effective and beneficient economic controls exercised by the Banco Central. The most recent development along these lines was the successful negotiation with the British Bondholders Protective Council of a settlement providing resumption of service upon the defaulted Guayaquil and Quito Railway bonds.[1] Despite all this, the Minister said, the Export-Import Bank had not seen fit to aid Ecuador except to an extremely minor degree. On the contrary, while virtually ignoring Ecuador, the Bank had made substantial loans recently to Peru, Colombia, Brazil and other countries. He indicated with some feeling that Ecuador was beginning to believe that U.S. promises of economic aid were not to be fulfilled and that it would have to reduce the tempo of its economic development to a level which could be supported by its own meager financial resources.

Mr. Bernbaum asserted that the Department was sympathetic with Ecuadoran aspirations for fuller economic development and referred to past loans including the earthquake rehabilitation loan[2] and highway loans. He remarked that Ecuador had not yet fully utilized the earthquake credit. In reference to highways loans he said that it appeared now that the Quevedo–Manta highway was on the right track. Mr. Bernbaum then stated that the Department had been disappointed over the slow progress of the airports credit application at the Export-Import Bank, but related that the Bank's desire to go very slowly in this matter arose from the Bank's past experiences with Ecuadoran loans. He said that he would not specify difficulties arising under the highway maintenance credit, as well as certain other credits, but the fact remained that the Bank wished to have these difficulties ironed out before proceeding with the airports credit. He added that the Bank also required further data on the airports project before making a final decision. Summing up, Mr. Bernbaum observed that in all frankness, these past experiences had perhaps made the Bank more careful and exacting in its dealings with Ecuador, than with some other countries. In conclusion he asserted that difficulties arising from past credit operations had confronted Ambassador Chiriboga upon his arrival in Washington and that the Ambassador was to be congratulated upon the excellent progress he had made in clearing up many of these matters.

Mr. Atwood spoke of the Department's willingness to cooperate with Ecuador in working out any outstanding problems and of our sincere desire to aid Ecuador in any appropriate manner to bring to a successful conclusion its plans for the economic development of the country.

Sr. Nebot indicated that he understood this, but felt that early and favorable consideration should be given to Ecuadoran loan applications by the Export-Import Bank. In the light of the recent bond settlement, the Minister related that Ecuador intended to apply to the IBRD for a number of development loans, including highways and port development. The Minister indicated that in view of Ecuador's strong credit position currently, it would wish to borrow money in this country from the IBRD and from the Export-Import Bank without the necessity of detailed project justification. He said that the receipt of a lump sum loan from the Bank which could be applied to such development projects as Ecuador selected, would permit of more flexible operations and eliminate time-consuming negotiations regarding details.

Ambassador Chiriboga stated that he would escort the Minister of National Economy to the Export-Import Bank and to the IBRD on Thursday, June 11 for talks[3] with officials of those institutions.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 24, 1953.

Subject: Ecuador—Contingent Lend-Lease Debt

Participants: Mr. William F. Gray, ARA:OSA, State
Mr. Charles W. Kempter, OFD:LL, State

At my suggestion Mr. Gray, who will soon leave for Quito to assume the post of Economic Attaché at our Embassy in Ecuador, called this afternoon in order that he might become acquainted with the status of Ecuador's lend-lease and surplus property accounts.[1]

I told him that a quick disposition could be made of the surplus property subject for, by coincidence, only yesterday LL had received notification from the Embassy of the final payment on principal account together with interest through March 31, leaving to be paid only a very small amount (about $551) representing interest which had accrued from April 1 to date of payment, June 16.[2]

In order to make clear the current lend-lease situation I reviewed Ecuador's lend-lease history from the signing of the Agreement on April 6, 1942,[3] to the eventual full payment on February 12, 1951 for aid furnished on "treaty" account.

The circumstances of the origin of the so-called "contingent" lend-lease account were outlined to point out that, under Presidential authority, this Government provided on a cash reimbursable basis to lend-lease countries maintenance and repair equipment to keep in operation matériel previously supplied as lend-lease aid, also, the manner in which the Ecuadoran Military Attaché in Washington exceeded his purchasing authority and, how later, the Government of Ecuador finally admitted its responsibility for the obligation incurred for goods delivered, but not as yet paid for, and valued at about $545,000. Due to a variety of reasons, including political and economic crisis and a devastating earthquake, the efforts of the Department to work out settlement terms with the Ecuadoran authorities were, in each and every instance, nullified by recurring situations. Finally, due largely to the successful cooperation of our Embassy, payments on the surplus property debt were undertaken and it was tacitly agreed that, until its liquidation, no new approaches would be made for settlement of the lend-lease debt. Now that this, to all technical effect, has been accomplished the Department is prepared to renew negotiations as soon as expedient.[4]

[1] As of June 1, 1952, Ecuador's obligation to the United States under terms of the Surplus Property Agreement of June 27, 1947, as amended, amounted to $527,048.94 ($484,275.90 in principal; $42,773.04 in interest). The Ecuadoran Government liquidated most of this indebtedness, including additional interest accrued after June 1, 1952, in four installments of unequal amounts paid on July 8 and Sept. 12, 1952, and Mar. 10 and June 16, 1953. Pertinent documents are in file 722.56 for 1952 and 1953.

[2] In despatch 184, from Quito, dated Sept. 24, 1953, the Embassy informed the Department of State that it had received payment in sucres to cover the balance of $551.76 on Ecuador's surplus property account (722.56/9–2453).

[3] For text of the Lend-Lease Agreement, signed by the United States and Ecuador at Washington, Apr. 6, 1942, and entered into force on the same date, see Foreign Relations, 1942, vol. VI, p. 379.

[4] Department of State files indicate that no formal negotiations with Ecuador concerning its contingent lend-lease obligations were undertaken in 1954.

722.5 MSP/6–2953: Airgram

SECRET WASHINGTON, June 29, 1953.

A–249. The Department has received from the Defense Department a memorandum of June 5, 1953,[2] which sets forth certain recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff respecting future implementation by the Defense Department of the grant-aid military assistance program being conducted under the Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement between Ecuador and the U.S. The Embassy's comments regarding the recommendations of the Joint Chiefs are requested.

"1. The approved MDAP force bases for Ecuador are as follows:

"a. Army	1 AAA (AW) Battalion
"b. Navy	1 Patrol Craft
"c. Air Force	1 Fighter Squadron

"2. The inclusion of 1 AAA (AW) Battalion in the approved forces for programming mutual defense assistance for Ecuador resulted from a recommendation by the Secretary of State in November 1951 that, unless there were overriding military considerations to the contrary, negotiations with Ecuador should include the opportunity for that country to prepare units of two services rather than the one service then contemplated (Air Force). The Joint Chiefs of Staff reported to the Secretary of Defense[3] that there were no military objections which would override the political considerations involved and designated 1

[3] Charles Erwin Wilson.

AAA (AW) Battalion to be furnished by Ecuador. The Navy patrol craft was also included in the negotiations as a result of a later modification by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"3. Several reports have been received by the Departments of State and Defense from U.S. representatives in Ecuador (the U.S. Ambassador, the U.S. Army Attaché, and the Acting Chief of the MAAG) to the effect that the Army equipment thus far delivered to Ecuador under the MDAP is unwanted and inappropriate. The Acting Chief of the Army Section of the MAAG (Ecuador) recommended to the Department of the Army that the Army portion of the MDAP for Ecuador be terminated. The U.S. Ambassador to Ecuador suggested that consideration should be given to increasing the Navy portion of the program.

"4. The reports, suggestions, and recommendations referred to above have been carefully studied by the Department of Defense.

"5. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have considered the advisability of revising the presently approved force bases for programming mutual defense assistance for Ecuador and have concluded that no revision should be made at this time. However, since Ecuador is not at this time prepared to absorb the undelivered portion of the equipment for an AAA (AW) Battalion and thereby of qualifying to receive this portion of its MDAP the Joint Chiefs of Staff have recommended that the United States should:

> "a. Suspend shipments of Army equipment to Ecuador until such time as the Department of the Army determines that resumption of shipments is warranted.
> "b. Continue efforts to obtain Ecuador's cooperation in the raising of its AAA Battalion.
> "c. In the event these efforts are still unsuccessful after a reasonable time or the Government of Ecuador so requests, re-examine the force bases for the Ecuadorian MDAP.

"6. The Department of the Army is being requested to take appropriate action to implement the recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"7. It is suggested that the U.S. Ambassador to Ecuador be informed and that he be requested to continue his efforts to obtain Ecuador's cooperation in the raising of its AAA Battalion."

With regard to the Navy program planned for Ecuador, the Embassy is advised that the Ecuadoran Minister of Defense informed Defense Department representatives during his recent trip to Washington that he desired to obtain under the program a U.S. naval vessel in trade for a naval vessel now in the possession of Ecuador. He indicated that he desired a ship in better condition and of a more modern type than one of those now in the Ecuadoran Navy. Defense Department representatives requested the Minister to submit his request to the Acting Chief of MAAG, upon his return to Ecuador. He was informed that requests for alterations in the program should be submitted to the MAAG, which would then refer the request to the Defense Department in Washington for consideration.

The Defense Department is in process of selecting an officer for assignment as Chief of MAAG to Ecuador. As soon as the Department has been notified of the officer selected, the Department will communicate his name and qualifications to the Embassy for approval and diplomatic clearance.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 6, 1953.

Subject: Ecuadoran Relations with IBRD.

Participants: Ambassador Chiriboga of Ecuador.
OSA—Mr. Bernbaum
OSA—Edgar L. McGinnis, Jr.
OSA—Mr. Atwood

Ambassador Chiriboga told Mr. Atwood that he sought this interview to inform the Department regarding his recent conversation with President Black of the IBRD. The Ambassador said that he visited Mr. Black on Friday at the latter's request and was told that the IBRD wished to be Ecuador's banker and that the IBRD would fulfill its announced intention to send a Mission to Ecuador in the middle of August. Mr. Black, according to the Ambassador, stated that the Mission would examine Ecuadoran loan projects and recommend such of those which appeared to be sound and that the Bank would then exercise its judgment as to which projects it could approve for the purpose of assisting in the economic development of Ecuador.

The Ambassador was also requested by Mr. Black to withdraw the airports loan now pending before the Export-Import Bank since, in the latter's view this project was relatively unimportant. In this connection Mr. Black said that he had discussed the airports loan with Sr. Nebot, Ecuadoran Minister of Economy who had told him that Ecuador would be willing to withdraw the airports loan from the consideration by the Export-Import Bank and include it with those projects to be examined by the IBRD mission.

Ambassador Chiriboga stated that he told Mr. Black emphatically that while his Government was perfectly agreeable to having an IBRD mission visit Ecuador and appreciated the Bank's interest in the country, it would not withdraw the airports loan from the Export-Import Bank. The Ambassador informed Mr. Black that the airports loan was not only of considerable economic importance to Ecuador but that it had political implications as well. He said the airports loan would be of strategic significance since it would improve transportation facilities at both Guayaquil and Quito which could be of advantage to hemisphere defense. He also told Mr. Black that because of the lengthy period during which the Export-Import Bank had this loan under consideration and the urgency of prompt action, his Government could not consent to having the application transferred to the IBRD. The Ambassador added that the Minister of Economy did not have authority to promise Mr. Black to withdraw the airports loan and said that this authority rested only with President Velasco. The President had very recently urged the Ambassador to press the ariports loan with all vigor with officials of the Export-Import Bank. Ambassador Chiriboga also said that he informed Mr. Black that Ecuador regarded the airports loan as a commitment of the U.S. Government since General Edgerton had promised in a recent letter[1] to the Ambassador that the loan would be acted upon after the return of the Export-Import Bank mission from Ecuador which was recently sent there to study the project. The Ambassador mentioned also that the Export-Import Bank had approved this loan in principle in 1951. The Ambassador stated that it would be greatly resented in Ecuador if the IBRD were to force the withdrawal of the airports loan from the Export-Import Bank. Ambassador Chiriboga said that Mr. Black closed the conversation by expressing considerable doubt that the Export-Import Bank would ever approve the Ecuadoran application for the airports loan.

Ambassador Chiriboga then said that he regarded the possible assumption of a monopoly on foreign loans by the IBRD as a very unfavorable development. He said that the IBRD would be placed in a position where it could dictate economic policies without reference to the Department of State or the American Government. He asserted that, in any case, Ecuador was still a sovereign nation and that, while it would accept the advice and counsel of the IBRD it would not and could not permit the IBRD to dictate the economic development policies of the country. He asserted that, since Ecuador was a sovereign nation, this power could only be exercised by its President. He warned against the consequences in Latin America of the establishment of a single "monopolistic" loan authority.

Mr. Atwood thanked Ambassador Chiriboga for his views and said that it was his understanding that Export-Import Bank still had the airports loan under active consideration and would make a decision upon the loan in due course. He observed that he could see some advantage in centralizing development loans in the IBRD, but that he did not believe that the IBRD would assume complete authority for making loans to the total exclusion of the Export-Import Bank. He observed that the Department was naturally interested in this matter from the standpoint of foreign policy and would continue to watch developments with interest.[2]

[2] In a memorandum to Mr. Waugh, dated Aug. 14, 1953, Mr. Corbett stated that the Department supported the Ecuadoran Government's refusal to withdraw the airport credit application from the Export-Import Bank for the following reasons: (1) the original credit of $1 million had been granted by the Export-Import Bank, (2) the present credit request was intended to supplement the original credit, and (3) the airports were of strategic interest to the United States (103 XMB/8–1453).

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 14, 1953.

Deputy Assistant Secretary Woodward—ARA
OSA—Edgar L. McGinnis, Jr.

Ambassador Chiriboga stated that he wished to inform Mr. Woodward of his conversation on August 13 with General Edgerton regarding the Quevedo–Manta highway project. The Ambassador stated that after informing him of the Bank's approval of the draft contract between Ecuador and the J. A. Jones Construction Company, General Edgerton informed him that the Export-Import Bank would be unable to approve any credits for local expenditures for the project.

Ambassador Chiriboga said that he was extremely surprised and disappointed at the General's attitude, since the Bank had previously committed itself to provide for local expenditures for the construction of the highway and that the Bank's refusal to fulfill this commitment would "kill" the project.[1]

The Ambassador related that the loan was granted in 1942 under terms that committed the U.S. to loan a sum sufficient to complete the highway. He said that the highway and waterworks loans were offered

[1] In a memorandum to Assistant Secretary Waugh, dated Aug. 14, 1953, reviewing the background of the Quevedo–Manta Highway project, Director of the Office of Financial and Development Policy Corbett stated in part that "there is a definite commitment between the U.S. Government and the Ecuadoran Government that this project will be completed." to Ecuador at that time as a consolation for the concessions it made in signing the Rio Boundary Protocol.[2] In any case, he said, the Bank's refusal to make good on this long-standing commitment would not be understood by his Government and that he would refuse to transmit such a decision to his foreign office preferring that an adverse decision of this gravity should be transmitted to Ecuadoran Government through the U.S. Embassy in Quito. The Ambassador indicated that after he had made these remarks General Edgerton appeared to be more sympathetic and indicated that he would look into the matter further before making a decision.

Mr. Woodward stated that the Department realized the importance of this project to Ecuador and would be pleased to discuss the matter with appropriate officials.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Stewart) to the Acting Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs (Nolting)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 10, 1953.

Subject: Additional United States Assistance Proposed for Ecuadoran Navy

1. Reference is made to memorandum from your office, 23 July 1953, subject as above, which inclosed a copy of despatch No. 4 of 3 July 1953 from the U.S. Embassy in Quito, Ecuador.[2]

[1] Mr. Nolting was appointed Acting Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs on Aug. 4, 1953; he became Special Assistant on Jan. 4, 1954.

[2] Under cover of the referenced despatch, Ambassador Daniels transmitted to the Department of State a memorandum from the Chief of the United States Naval Mission in Ecuador, Cmdr. R. J. Toner, dated July 2, 1953, recommending the following assistance to the Ecuadoran navy: (1) replacement of certain antiquated Ecuadoran merchant ships converted to naval use by permitting Ecuador to purchase newer patrol craft or frigates from the United States, (2) authorization to allow Ecuador to purchase a net tender, (3) assistance to conduct a hydrographic survey to determine the feasibility of constructing a channel in the Estero Salero at the entrance of Guayaquil harbor, and (4) support of training for Ecuadoran naval officers in the United States in net tender operations (722.5 MSP/7–353).

In the referenced memorandum, dated July 23, 1953, Acting Special Assistant Newman transmitted a copy of Commander Toner's memorandum to the Department of Defense, and also requested information concerning what action Defense was prepared to take with respect to the recommendations for naval assistance to Ecuador (725.5 MSP/7–353).

2. The Department of Defense has reviewed the recommendations submitted by the United States Naval Mission in the aforementioned despatch. The following information is furnished.

a. None of the types of ships recommended for additional assistance to the Ecuadoran Navy are available in excess of U.S. needs.

b. As regards the Patrol Craft (PCE) and frigates (PF), provision of additional combat vessels under the Mutual Defense Assistance Program (MDAP—grant aid) would require a revision of the presently established naval force bases for Ecuador. As you were informed in a memorandum of 5 June 1953,[3] subject: Force Bases for Ecuador, Mutual Defense Assistance Programs, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have concluded that no revision thereof should be made at this time.

c. Assistance by a team of experienced personnel to conduct the hydrographic survey recommended can be furnished under the Naval MDA Training Program at no cost to the Ecuadoran Government.

d. The training of Ecuadoran personnel recommended can be furnished under existing legislation at no cost to the Ecuadoran Government except for transportation and maintenance of those personnel to, from and within the Continental United States.

e. The approximate procurement cost of the ships recommended, including equipment and spare parts, are shown on the attached list (Inclosure 1).

3. In view of the limited funds available for Title IV grant aid, it is not considered desirable to program for Ecuador any of the recommended ships. These vessels, however, could be procured and sold to Ecuador under the reimbursable military assistance provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended.

4. The Department of Defense is prepared to consider requests received through prescribed channels of communication from the MAAG Ecuador for approval of the projects outlined in paragraph 2c and d. Any requests for vessels should be the subject of a diplomatic note to the State Department.

On September 16, 1953, the Export-Import Bank authorized an increase of $2,280,000 in a previous credit of $2,720,000 extended to the Republic of Ecuador in 1947 to assist in financing the cost of completing the Quevedo–Manta Highway. For additional information, see Export-Import Bank of Washington, Seventeenth Semiannual Report to Congress for the Period July–December 1953 (Washington, 1954), pages 11–12.

In December 1953, out of a commitment of $7 million made to the Republic of Ecuador in 1949 to finance earthquake reconstruction, the Export-Import Bank allocated $1,500,000 to assist in financing improvements in airport facilities at Quito and Guayaquil. This allocation, together with a previous credit of $1 million for airport development extended to Ecuador in 1951, made available the sum of $2,500,000 for airport expansion in Ecuador. For additional information, see ibid., page 14.

On February 10, 1954, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development approved an $8,500,000 loan to the Comite Ejecutivo de Vialidad de la Provincia del Guayas to meet the foreign exchange costs of a highway construction program in the Province of Guayas. For further information, see International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, Ninth Annual Report to the Board of Governors 1953–1954 (Washington, 1954).

On June 24, 1954, the Export-Import Bank authorized an increase of $3,650,000 in a $4 million line of credit originally approved in 1942 to assist in financing the construction of a water supply project for the municipality of Quito. Memorandum by the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs (Nolting) to the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Stewart)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 15, 1954.

Subject: Ecuadoran Request for Naval Assistance.

Reference is made to despatch No. 341 of January 4, 1954[2] from Embassy Quito stating that two top Ecuadoran naval officers are proceeding to the United States and later, if necessary, to Europe for the purpose of purchasing naval vessels for the Ecuadoran Navy. The despatch indicates that the Ecuadoran naval officers were to arrive in New Orleans about January 8 to inspect a 3,000 ton vessel which could serve for inshore and river patrol purposes. Thereafter they plan to proceed to Washington and then to Europe. Both have visas for the UK, France, Germany, Italy and Spain.

The earnest desire of the Ecuadorans to procure certain naval vessels from the United States at less than replacement costs is, of course, well known to the Department of Defense. It appears obvious to this Department that if the Ecuadorans are not able to secure assurances while in Washington that they can procure the equipment on acceptable terms from the United States they will proceed to Europe and attempt to purchase equipment which presumably would be of non-standardized character. The reference despatch indicates that the Chief of the U.S. Naval Mission to Ecuador, Commander Toner, in view of this and other important considerations, has sent a message to the Department of Defense asking that the utmost consideration be given to Ecuador's naval needs. This Department concurs in Commander Toner's recommendation.

With regard to Colonel James G. Anding's memorandum of December 14, 1953,[3] also pertaining to the Ecuadoran request, the Department of State believes it would be unwise to inform the Ecuadorans that a negative decision, at least for the present time, has been reached on their request for naval equipment, in view of the importance which the Ecuadorans attach to their request and the possibility that the Department of Defense may wish to include Ecuador (Estero Salado) in the United States plan for control of shipping in event of war. To do so might make it difficult or even impossible to secure Ecuadoran permission to include Estero Salado in the control plan if later desired by the Department of Defense.

In view of the fact that the control plan is currently being developed, we believe that the Department of State, the Department of Defense and the American Embassy in Quito should respond, when queried by the Ecuadorans with regard to their request, that consideration of the request is being given on a continuing basis and that no final conclusion has been reached. We do not think that this precaution would necessarily dissuade the Ecuadorans from proceeding to Europe to seek out equipment, but we do believe it is necessary if we are not to run the risk of foreclosing Ecuadoran cooperation which may be needed in connection with the control plan.

I would appreciate receiving your reaction to this proposal.

d. Meeting between representatives of the Ecuadoran Government and MAAG, Ecuador, 24 February 1954.[5]

2. The proposal was made in reference 1b. above, that if United States representatives are queried by the Ecuadorans with regard to their request for additional naval assistance, the response should be that consideration of the request is being given on a continuing basis and that no final conclusion has been reached. This proposal is considered sound and has been the basis of additional talks between interested agencies concerning Ecuador's request for vessels.

3. It is reiterated, however, that the United States Navy does not have available any vessels of the types requested by Ecuador, but could make available to the Government of Ecuador certain other naval vessels. These are Landing Ship Flotilla Flagships (LSFF). The cost to the Government of Ecuador for this type naval vessel would be approximately $390,000 each. They are available for inspection by Ecuadoran naval representatives, and can be delivered in approximately three to four months after completion of the customary negotiations. The training of crews for these vessels can be accomplished in the United States.

4. It is believed that the purchase of the LSFF type vessel will provide the Ecuadoran Navy with a craft that can be used for patrol purposes, for training, and for transportation of small landing parties, supplies, and equipment to remote coastal points. Further, it is believed that it is a type ship which the Ecuadoran Navy is economically capable of operating and maintaining.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 3, 1954.

Subject: Ecuadoran Protest About Treatment Accorded it by Bilateral Mutual Security Program

Participants: Ambassador Chiriboga, Embassy of Ecuador
Mr. Woodward, ARA
Mr. Blankinship, OSA

Ambassador Chiriboga referred to the complaint which he had already lodged with the Department regarding the selection of Peru as an example of the effectiveness of the military grant aid program in South America (see memorandum of conversation of August 24, 1954[1]). The Ambassador emphasized that his Government was deeply concerned that the United States was arming Peru under the mutual assistance program. He said that Ecuadorans could see no justification for providing Peru with arms at precisely a time in the first six months of this year when Peru was engaged in aggressive acts against Ecuador. The Ambassador said that he had been instructed to hand a memorandum[2] to the Department regarding this matter. At this point he presented the memorandum which contained two principal points, namely, (1) what guarantees were there that Peru would not use the arms provided her by the United States for aggressive purposes, particularly against Ecuador and (2) a request that Ecuador be granted equal grant aid assistance with Peru.

Mr. Woodward stated that Ecuador had at least three explicit guarantees that military aid furnished Peru would be used for the purpose for which it was provided, the collective defense of the western hemisphere. In the first place, the multilateral treaty of Rio contained stipulations which would make an attack of Peru upon Ecuador the concern of all the countries of the hemisphere. Secondly, standard clauses of the bilateral mutual assistance agreements with each country, including that with Peru, provided that equipment granted a recipient under the program could be used only for the common defense of the hemisphere and that specific approval of the United States Government must be obtained for any other use. Thirdly, Mr. Woodward said, Ecuador had a special undertaking by the guarantors of the Protocol of 1942 against attacks by Peru. Mr. Woodward concluded on this point that it appeared to him that Ecuador had ample guarantees against a misuse of the equipment being provided to Peru under the assistance program.

Mr. Woodward recapitulated the present status of the military grant aid program with Ecuador. He pointed out that more than 90% of the equipment for the anti-aircraft battalion had already been delivered and that 11 of 17 fighter planes promised under the terms of the program had already been delivered and that the refitting of the Ecuadoran patrol vessel provided for in the secret plan was going forward as promised. The Ambassador conceded on all of this but stated that Ecuador was very unhappy because it had been given no substantial naval assistance under the program, whereas Peru had obviously obtained substantial aid for its navy. The Ambassador stated that if a naval vessel or two could be made available to Ecuador he believed that the Ecuadorans would consider the program far more successful than they did as of now.

OFFICIAL USE ONLY [WASHINGTON,] December 16, 1954.

Subject: Review of Pending Ecuadoran-U.S. Problems
1. Peru-Ecuadoran Relations
2. Eximbank Loan Applications
3. Shipping Discrimination
4. Maritime Zone Claims
5. Guatemalan Refugees

Participants: Ambassador Chiriboga, Embassy of Ecuador
Ambassador Edward J. Sparks, ARA
Mr. Byron E. Blankinship, OSA

1. Peru-Ecuadoran Relations

Ambassador Chiriboga bitterly complained about Peru's aggressiveness toward Ecuador. He alleged that huge Peruvian arms purchases had forced Ecuador into an arms race which was interfering with needed economic developments, unsettling Ecuadoran finances and lowering the standard of living. He said that no incidents had occurred for about three months but that a dangerous situation existed.

2. Eximbank Loan Applications

The Ecuadoran Ambassador said that a year ago after much frustration Ecuador had finally succeeded in obtaining two loans from the Export Import Bank for airport and road construction but that neither was adequate. He said that Ecuador would apply to the Eximbank for three additional loans as follows: one for about $800,000 to construct terminal buildings for the airports at Quito and Guayaquil and a second for construction of a hotel at Quito for the 11th Inter-American Conference[1] and tourists. He said that three or four months ago General Edgerton told him the Bank would not back hotel construction but that this position may have changed since the Rio Conference. Chiriboga said that Ecuador could not understand this attitude since the Bank had advanced money for the construction of hotels at Panama, Bogota and Caracas. He said that his Government hoped to obtain collaboration of the Hilton Hotels for this $4 million project. Ambassador Sparks replied that this was an Eximbank matter but Ecuador doubtlessly would at least have to prove the economic soundness of the hotel. Finally, Ambassador Chiriboga said that Ecuador needed $2 million to complete the Quevedo–Manta Highway. He concluded that he hoped that the Department would support these applications since his Government had little hope of obtaining them without such support.

3. Shipping Discrimination[2]

Chiriboga declared that the shipping discrimination question was the most serious existing between the U.S. and Ecuador. He explained that he hoped to eliminate discrimination if American ships agreed to go up the Guayas River to Guayaquil. He acknowledged that his Government had not accepted his recommendation to abolish discriminatory consular fees upon agreement of the Grace Line ships to go to Guayaquil but he thought it could be persuaded to do so.[3] Ambassador Sparks commented that he knew American ships had suffered severe damage to their hulls from dragging over the Guayas sand bars. Ambassador Chiriboga protested that Ambassador Mills' recent note had worsened matters as his Government objected to its strong terms, particularly the use of the word "gross" discrimination and to "the threat of retaliation". Ambassador Sparks inquired as to the nature of the note. Mr. Blankinship explained that Mr. Mills dispatched the note to the Foreign Office upon carefully cleared instructions from the Department. He further stated that the Foreign Minister's allegation that the problem should have been discussed before dispatching the note, seemed tenuous since the discrimination had been a matter of years of fruitless discussion. Therefore, the time seemed to have come for somewhat more forcefully showing the Ecuadoran Government the seriousness with which the U.S. Government regarded the discrimination.

[3] In a briefing memorandum prepared for Deputy Assistant Secretary Sparks, dated Dec. 15, 1954, Mr. Blankinship stated that the Department was currently attempting to obtain agreement from Grace Lines to cooperate in a joint United States–Ecuador committee to determine whether or not the company's ships could navigate up the Guayas River to Guayaquil without damage to their hulls (611.22/12–1554).

4. Maritime Zone Claims

Ambassador Sparks stressed the gravity with which the U.S. regarded the Ecuadoran claim to 200 miles seaward. Ambassador Chiriboga explained that his Government had great hopes for the 1955 Inter-American Conference on Maritime Claims. He said that Ecuador enjoyed much company. He referred to claims of Peru, Chile and to the item in this morning's New York Times outlining extensive territorial claims of Iceland. He claimed that he had strongly recommended to his Government that it grant fishing licenses by radio and abide by the agreement reached at Quito with the U.S. on fisheries problems. He said that he strongly disagrees with Minister of Economy Nebot that implementation of the Quito agreement should await the arrival of patrol boats from Germany.

5. Guatemalan Refugees

The Ambassador arose to leave, but before departing he confided that he wished unofficially to mention a report from a friend who had received it from the American Embassy in Quito to the effect that Guatemalan refugees were plotting in Ecuador. He said that as a strong anti-communist he wished to be informed of any such activities so that he could help counteract them. He said that he was speaking personally without instructions. He mentioned that some weeks ago Mr. Woodward raised the question of Ecuadoran recognition of the Castillo-Armas regime. He said that Ecuador was consulting Uruguay with a view to arranging joint recognition of the Guatemalan Government. Ambassador Sparks instructed Mr. Blankinship to obtain any information possible about subversive activities of Guatemalan refugees in Ecuador.

POLITICAL AND MILITARY RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND EL SALVADOR[1]

Representatives of El Salvador and the United States signed a General Agreement for Technical Cooperation at San Salvador on April 4, 1952, which entered into force on the same date. Memorandum by Gordon S. Reid of the Office of Middle American Affairs to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Woodward)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 18, 1953.

PART I

El Salvador is the smallest country in Latin America and, thereby, the smallest in this hemisphere. In the small area is crowded the largest population per square mile of any country in the hemisphere. It seems to me that Salvadorans are among the most literate and intelligent of all the Central Americans. It is a conservative country which has suffered under the brutal dictatorship of General Martinez,[2] a theosophist, and considered by some a psychopath. At the same time it has had the experience of having been a primary object of the affections of the Communist Party back in 1931. With its very large population, its problems are in many ways more complex than any other country of Central America. They are primarily economic. Salvador's friendship with the United States has been one of long standing and Salvador's admiration for the United States reached its peak in the late 1830's and early 1840's when Salvador earnestly attempted to have itself included as a territory and an aspirant for statehood in our Union. It is interesting to note that Los Angeles, California, is the second largest city of Salvadoran population.

[1] Addressed also the Deputy Director of the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs Neal and Officer in Charge of Central American and Panama Affairs Leddy.

[2] Reference is to Maximiliano Hernández Martínez, who ruled El Salvador from 1930 to 1944.

PART II

Party politics are unknown in Salvador although there are parties and labels. Salvador is a country of political personalism and, of course, a country with a long history of internal revolts by one faction against another. At the present time there are two parties. PRUD is the Government Party and PAR is made up of all the outs except the Communists. The PRUD, however, is really a party made up of those persons supporting President Osorio. It is very likely that the PRUD will be out of the picture when Osorio leaves office. It is a coalition party of some conservatives, some so-called "new dealers", the Army, and some intellectual socialists. The PAR is made up of the strange combination of persons extremely wealthy associating with persons of socialistic and communistic background in a party for the sole purpose of ousting the present government. It has failed in all recent elections to produce a vote of any size and until a leader comes along it probably is only a nominal opposition party. The Communist Party, outlawed as a legal party in Salvador, is now operating underground and its history is vigorous enough and long enough to make one view it with utmost suspicion at any particular time. There is no doubt but what the communist elements devote an enormous amount of their time to infiltrating both political parties but under the very firm hand of President Osorio their influence has been almost entirely mitigated up to the present time.

The Osorio Government came into office as the result of the revolution of March 14, 1948, when it overthrew in a bloodless coup the corrupt and vacillating government of President Castaneda.[3] A junta governed until elections were held and the Osorio Government finally took office. The junta was made up of five men; Osorio, the present Minister of Defense Colonel Bolanos,[4] the present Minister of Education Galindo Pohl,[5] Colonel Cordova,[6] now Military Attaché in Washington, and another civilian of no particular importance. Animosity and jealousy arising between Osorio, Cordova, and Bolanos resulted in Cordova's exile to Washington. The Osorio Government is a government which came into office with a social progress program of a non-communist type and has so far received much of the support of the wealthy landowners both because of the beliefs it expresses and because of the fear of Guatemala which is ever present in Salvadoran minds. To these minds the social progress envisaged and promised by Osorio seemed a much less fearsome thing than the Guatemalan variety. Should there be a lessening of the Guatemalan tension, it would almost seem axiomatic that Salvador's present government would be endangered.

PART III

So long as the coffee prices hold up it is to be expected that Salvador will have a favorable balance of payments and will have a continuation of the present prosperity. The government has imposed higher income taxes, higher coffee taxes, has developed plans for low cost housing, improvements in agriculture, social security, public health, and social welfare, and while insisting that the unions do not join in one national union, has encouraged individual unions to become stronger. At the same time it has called upon the World Bank, the United Nations, and the United States to aid with money and technical assistance. If it may be assumed that the government will remain in power for another six years, vast changes are to be expected in the life of Salvadorans.

The most important enterprise undertaken has been the development of the Lempa River as a source of hydroelectric power, eventually, for use by the whole country. This is the first such project in Central America and is one which has such far reaching possibilities for both Salvador and Honduras that it must be watched in its development with great care. Power is expected to flow from its generators in February or March, 1954, and by 1957 it is expected that its major potentialities for Salvador life will have been initiated, although its final possibilities will have only been touched.

Salvador has two railways, the Salvador Railway Company and the IRCA. Both are bankrupt. Each uses a different gauge of track. The Salvador Railway is primarily a coffee freight line and the IRCA is the Salvador life-line to the Caribbean through Guatemala. If the present trend of highway construction increases in Salvador it is very unlikely that either of these railways will continue to exist separately. It is my personal opinion that a merger of the two would be an economic benefit to the country.

PART IV

Pending with El Salvador at the present time are the following items:

1. The purchase of military equipment by the Salvadoran Government during the next several years. We are now awaiting a priority list from the Government by which our Defense Department may be informed of which items the Salvadorans wish to purchase first. Salvador has set aside $2,500,000 for this program.

2. The Military Mission. The problem on this is simply that Colonel Bolanos, as is normal with him, is once again procrastinating and finding himself unable to agree to a pay scale for any enlisted men accredited to the Mission. The head of the Mission is to be Colonel E. J. Macherey who has impressed all of us with his intelligence and ability. It is my belief that he should be allowed to proceed alone to Salvador and through him eventual agreement may be reached.

3. . . .

4. We have reiterated to the Salvadoran Government many times our belief that improved police methods would be of benefit to their country and we have recommended the International Police Corporation as an appropriate organization to handle such problems. Again, it is my personal belief that this should be pressed by the Ambassador and the officers of the Department, including Mr. Cabot.

5. The Government of the United States has for a year and a half been protesting informally the Immigration Law of Salvador which governs the deportation from Salvador of American citizens engaged in business in that country or who are in El Salvador for any other reason. Our fault-finding has been entirely based on the fact that the Minister of Interior under the present law may make an administrative decision to expel a United States citizen without that citizen having the right of appeal. It is our belief that it is necessary to change that law before American citizens may operate in Salvador with a sense of security.[7]

6. Although Salvador wishes to attract private capital for investment purposes it has failed in the following ways to make Salvador attractive to such capital:

(a) No guarantee of indemnity in case of confiscation or nationalization.

(b) No corporation law and corporation supervision of any modern variety which would give adequate security.

(c) The commercial code is in need of considerable revision and a commission charged to undertake this job was dissolved at the end of 1952 without making any progress.

(d) Salvadoran courts in all recent judgements appear to be completely prejudiced against any foreigner bringing a case before them.

(e) There is a lack of criminal law and police administration and criminal courts sufficiently up-to-date in their concepts of habeas corpus and similar principles of law to give security to American businessmen.

[7] Documentation relating to this subject is in Department of State file 816.18.

(f) The recently enacted business license law authorizes the Minister of Finance to cancel a business license to anyone who appears to have defrauded the government of taxes and by another law such persons may be deported without trial.

(g) Present export controls give the government the power to prevent export of practically anything.

(h) The immigration law cited above together with the requirements for residence permits and the bureaucratic procedures for obtaining residence permits discourage foreign businessmen.

(i) The government's record of services to business and industry under the office established for that purpose has been very poor and the officer in charge is known to spend no more than two hours a day in his office.

(j) The present Minister of Labor[8] has shown himself to be prejudiced against foreign business in his labor-management relations.

In summary, an American citizen attempting to do business in Salvador (if he can get a residence permit) will find it extremely difficult to be successful unless he is married to a Salvadoran citizen (preferably wealthy and influential). Americans under the Point Four Program frequently forget that an American businessman is treated rather poorly by the present government since he carries no diplomatic passport or rights.

PART V

President Osorio is a military man who, although limited in his mental and educational background, has proven to be a strong opponent of communism and politically more able than was originally anticipated. He is extremely reserved and cold, taciturn and distrusting. He is of Indian background and is somewhat sensitive on this score. He has played off his cabinet members in such a way that his decision is always final in any issue carried to him, but he is very slow in making final decisions.

[Here follows comment on members of President Osorio's Cabinet and the Salvadoran Embassy in the United States.]

PART VI

Our Embassy in San Salvador is well manned at the present time and the only problem for me to report there is its relationship with TCA. It is still the opinion of George Butler, the head of the TCA Program, that to be connected with an Embassy is almost a fate worse than death and he has attempted in all possible ways to separate his people and his functions from any connection with the Embassy. This has brought about unhappy relations and forced Ambassador Duke to insist that the two groups stay away from each other. It is to be hoped that Ambassador McDermott can use his good offices to solve this during his tenure there. The Embassy buildings are in good condition and no immediate needs are known to me.

PART VII

It is my judgement that during the next several years the primary job in El Salvador will be to encourage the Salvadorans to defend themselves against the Guatemalan onslaught. To accomplish this will mean that we must give every consideration to the Salvadoran request for arms and other security and intelligence measures; we must maintain our TCA program in that country and where justified we should encourage the EXIM Bank and World Bank to extend further loans. A second job for the United States Government in Salvador is to take those actions which will be considered appropriate to encourage greater trade and closer economic relations with Honduras, particularly in the opening of international highways. Encouragement of ODECA should also be considered. Lastly, by all reasonable methods we should endeavor to bolster the part of the Cabinet most friendly to the United States, but never by advocating economic measures which amount to more than the economy can absorb.

Subject: Report to Director of Mutual Security on United States Aid Program in El Salvador, January–June 1953.

Summary:

Substantial and increasingly rapid progress was made during this period in attainment of major United States foreign policy objectives in El Salvador through technical assistance supplied under the Mutual Security Program. Objectives were clarified and extended during this period, under pressure of local political developments, to include an extensive program of rural rehabilitation and betterment. Action programs now in preparation to carry out this program will require substantial increases in United States technical assistance in a number of fields.

The outstanding current local need is for increased efficiency of organizations of all kinds, public and private, together with sound development of local industry. Local recognition of this need was reflected in the signing of a Productivity Center Agreement on May 14.[2] Personnel was requested by the Salvadoran Government to work in cooperation with private commercial, industrial and service enterprises to increase their efficiency from the technical and administrative as well as the organizational standpoints. This Agreement is also of key importance to United States program development since it constitutes a precedent for reorganization on a joint fund basis of the agricultural mission and should lead to establishment of a joint fund Education Mission in the near future.

Submission of the Productivity Center Agreement to the National Legislative Assembly brought to light the tendency toward economic nationalism among certain deputies. This development has caused delay in ratification of the Agreement.

Vigorous cooperation and warm appreciation continued to characterize the attitude of Salvadorans towards the United States technical assistance program. Of particular significance was the fact that awareness among local leaders of the DTC form of organization and its effectiveness for broad and balanced program planning and operation is beginning to bring about a corresponding closer integration among local Ministries, and others concerned with planning and carrying out programs for economic and social development.

At the request of the Salvadoran Government extensions were negotiated of agreements for Fisheries, Health, and Agriculture. Requests were fulfilled for technicians in public administration, labor standards, industrial safety, industrial hygiene, administration of orphanages, and agricultural courses in public schools. The range of these requests reflects the broad scale of needs of the local government for assistance and the decisive current importance of industrial development. At the same time, it may also reflect an increasing pressure on U.S. technical assistance resources due to failure of U.N. to supply promised technical assistance.

A) All agreements under the Mutual Security Program continued to be fully honored by the local government.

[2] For text of the referenced agreement, signed at San Salvador, May 14, 1953, and entered into force on the same date, see TIAS No. 3122, or 5 UST (pt. 3) 2568.

C) A record coffee harvest and consequent prosperity has stimulated political, economic and social development of the country. There is a general optimistic outlook for stable economic conditions which will strengthen local interest in foreign investment.

D) El Salvador is generally adjudged the leader of ODECA (Organizacion de Estados Centro Americanos) following the withdrawal of Guatemala from the organization.[3] Internal conditions continue to be very stable.

E) United States technical assistance contributes materially to internal political stability, particularly in its role of improving rural living standards.

J) Major economic projects for the reporting period included the projected coastal highway which will open up a rich agricultural area, heretofore unexploited; completion of the country's first cement plant; continued research leading to improved port facilities, and progress toward completion of the Lempa River Hydroelectric project.

K) Favorable social effects of the Technical Assistance Program have become increasingly evident as the action programs have reached the point where achievement can be measured. Outstanding in this respect is the effect of the training program. The economic effects can be expected to increase rapidly with the change of emphasis by the government from general welfare projects to industrialization, as indicated by the signing of the Productivity Center Agreement.

L) The attitude of the government and general population toward the United States and its assistance program has been extremely favorable during this reporting period. Increased interest on the part of private organizations is evident as a result of increased emphasis on the economic development aspects of the program. The traditionally close political, social and economic ties with the United States have been strengthened by U.S. interest as manifested through technical assistance. A marked increase in appreciation of the technical assistance program has become evident as the work of the various operating missions yield tangible results and can be evaluated.

Cabot files, lot 56 D 13, "El Salvador"

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot) to the Ambassador in El Salvador (McDermott)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 18, 1953.

DEAR MIKE: You will recall I mentioned to you before your departure for El Salvador that we have been trying since my visit to San Salvador in April to obtain from the Salvadoran authorities some concrete evidence of Guatemalan Communist efforts to infiltrate El Salvador. We have understood, for example, that Spanish Communists with Guatemalan official passports have been caught in subversive activities in El Salvador, that several Guatemalan deputies have been similarly caught in subversive activities, and that a Guatemalan was caught in the tentative coup d'état in the late summer of 1952. The Salvadorans have as yet given us nothing to document these episodes, presuming that they happened.

In the course of our trip through South America,[1] we took advantage of the opportunity to discuss the Guatemalan situation with several other governments, notably the Brazilian. The upshot of it was that other governments indicated a receptivity toward action against Guatemala in the OAS if proof of Guatemalan infiltration was forthcoming.

Perhaps the Salvadoran authorities do not have adequate documentary proof as yet of Guatemalan Communist efforts to infiltrate El Salvador with the connivance of the Guatemalan Government. Even in this case, I think it would be exceedingly helpful if the Salvadoran authorities would from now on be alert of the possibilities of building up a case. I do not think that the Guatemalans have stopped their efforts in that sense and I hope that the Salvadoran authorities may some time catch them in flagrante.

Could you let me know at your earliest convenience.[2]

Very sincerely yours, JOHN M. CABOT

[2] In a letter to Assistant Secretary Cabot, dated Aug. 26, 1953, Ambassador McDermott stated in part that he had suggested to Foreign Minister Canessa that he ask President Osorio to appoint a competent person to compile a list of cases showing "where Communists from Guatemala with Guatemalan passports, non-Guatemalans with Guatemalan passports or Guatemalan officials had been apprehended or temporarily arrested for subversive activities in El Salvador." Foreign Minister Canessa was reported to have replied that he would promptly take up the matter with President Osorio, but that he wished the United States would consider his suggestion of imposing an embargo against Guatemalan coffee as a means of changing the situation in that country. SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 12, 1953.

DEAR MIKE: Many thanks for your letter of August 26, 1953[1] with regard to the possibility of securing from the Salvadoran authorities evidence of officially-fostered Guatemalan infiltration into El Salvador. I am glad that you seem at last to have made some progress in this matter.

I think that you might point out to Canessa very informally that an embargo on Guatemalan coffee would simply result in all probability in its diversion to European destinations. It might hurt the present regime in Guatemala a little economically, but it would give that regime a good weapon to attack our economic imperialism throughout the hemisphere. If we are to embark on any course not clearly within the norms of inter-American action, I most emphatically want to be sure that it will end in extirpating Communism from Guatemala.

OAS action would undoubtedly be a lenghty procedure and it may prove to be impossible or ineffective. It is, however, a mode of procedure at which no other republic could justifiably take offense. I want, therefore, to be very satisfied in my own mind whether it is a practical procedure or not. If we are satisfied that this undeniably legal procedure will not work, then, of course we must further canvass the situation, but I trust that Canessa will understand we do not wish to do anything brash which would make a bad matter worse.

I am very happy to hear that you are enjoying San Salvador and finding the work there interesting. It has always seemed to me a charming spot. With every good wish,

Very sincerely yours, JOHN M. CABOT

Memorandum by Robert M. Sayre of the Office of Regional American Affairs to John W. Fisher of the Office of Middle American Affairs

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 1, 1953.

Subject: Salvador Arms Request.

You will recall that a special delegation[1] from El Salvador came to the United States to discuss with the Departments of State and Defense the procurement of arms. The first discussion was held on February 24, at which time the Salvadorans were informed that arms could be obtained in the United States (1) from commercial sources, (2) from the Department of Defense or (3) under the terms of a military assistance agreement with the United States. As to (3), it was made very clear that we could make no commitment on a military assistance agreement under which Salvador could obtain arms on a grant basis. The Salvadoran delegation promised to supply us immediately with a list of the arms desired.

[1]The delegation consisted of Minister of Labor Salazar, Minister of Economy Jorge Arturo Sol Castellanos, and Chief of Staff Marco Antonio Molina.

We received such a list on February 25 and transmitted it the same day to the Department of Defense. The Department of Defense provided us with estimated prices on February 27, but on such short notice was unable to provide us with any availability data. on March 10 the Department of Defense furnished us with a "refined" price list after they had had an opportunity to study the request further, and this list was furnished the Salvadorans on March 11. They were advised that we could take no further action until we received a firm request from them for arms.

The Army Attaché[2] to El Salvador reported on March 2 that the Minister of Defense had requested his assistance in obtaining arms for approximately 10,000 men without going through the Department of State. On March 11, the Army Attaché reported that a delegation was being sent from El Salvador to attempt to obtain arms in the commercial market in addition to those which the United States was being requested to supply.

When on March 26, the Department had received no information from El Salvador as to the action Salvador planned to take on the list of equipment furnished by the Department of the Army on March 11, Mr. Cabot, in a discussion[3] with Ambassador Castro on Mr. Cabot's forthcoming trip to El Salvador, took the occasion to remind Ambassador Castro that we had received no reply on the military equipment list we had furnished and although we did not want to press the matter, we did want to make it clear that we were prepared to help in every way possible.

When Mr. Cabot was in El Salvador, President Osorio gave Mr. Cabot the list of equipment desired and it was transmitted on the same day by Embassy D–679 of April 24, 1953.[4] After clarification of some problems which the list presented, the request was approved and transmitted to the Department of Defense on May 12. The request stated that Salvador desired to buy the equipment over a period of four years, but gave no indication as to what part of the equipment was desired each year. When it appeared that the Salvadoran Embassy would be unable to furnish us, in any reasonable time, with information on the equipment from the list that was desired immediately, we advised the Department of Defense in a memorandum of May 25[5] to make a pricing and availability study and an offer on the entire list and leave it to the Salvadorans to select those items which they desired immediately. Any other items they desired would then have to be the basis of a further request because prices and availability would change.

The Department of the Army submitted on June 24 to the Salvadoran Ambassador a firm offer to sell the equipment desired at a cost of about $2.3 million.[6] At the same time the Department sent a copy of this offer to Embassy San Salvador so that it could be brought to the attention of the Salvadoran Government if the Embassy considered this appropriate. The Army's offer had a thirty day limit on it, but it was understood that this was a flexible limit and acceptance of the offer within a reasonable time would be satisfactory. Although both the Department and the Embassy have urged the Salvadorans to take action on this arms request, no acceptance of this offer has ever been made.

The Department of the Air Force made an offer on that part of Salvador's request involving Air Force equipment on July 31, but to date has not received any information from the Salvadoran Embassy regarding acceptance of the offer. We have received information, however, that the Salvadorans are not very happy about the Air Force offer both with respect to the non-availability of F–51's and the price of T–34's.

By a note of July 8,[7] the Salvador Embassy submitted an entirely separate request[8] for a small quantity of machine guns and rockets which would cost approximately $50,000. This request was approved and transmitted to the Department of Defense by a memorandum of July 14.[9] This request was modified by a note of July 24[10] to drop the machine guns from the list and add steel helmets. This modification was sent to the Department of Defense by memorandum of July 27.[11] The Department informally advised Ambassador Castro on August 24 of the total cost of the equipment covered by this request and the Army presented its formal offer to him on August 24.

I am informed by the Army that Ambassador Castro sent the money to cover the cost of this equipment on September 1. Before the Army could proceed with shipping instructions to the depots, etc., it required

Memorandum by the Acting Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs (Nolting) to the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Stewart)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 9, 1953.

Subject: El Salvador Case No. 7

I refer to a memorandum of July 14, 1953 which transmitted a request from the Salvadoran Government for certain military equipment (El Salvador Case No. 7) and to a subsequent memorandum of July 27, 1953 which modified this request.[2]

The Salvadoran Government desires to have the equipment covered by this request for a celebration which is to take place in El Salvador on December 14, 1953. While this is the stated reason for desiring the equipment, there is reason to believe that El Salvador desires to have the equipment on this particular occasion because it will provide an opportunity to make a display of strength both for domestic reasons and to give pause to neighboring communist-influenced Guatemala which has been exerting somewhat continuous pressure against El Salvador. It is apparently for this reason that the Department of State has been approached several times in the last few months by the Salvadoran Ambassador inquiring as to the status of the request and stressing the importance which his Government attaches to it. For this same reason, I understand that this matter has been discussed informally between officers of the Departments of State and Defense on several occasions.

This Department considers it highly desirable to comply with the request of the Salvadoran Government for prompt delivery which will assist that Government to maintain its anti-Communist position, which is a factor of considerable weight in the stability of Central America.

Editorial Note

On December 9, 1953, President Eisenhower authorized the initiation of negotiations with El Salvador for the purpose of concluding a bilateral military assistance agreement. On January 7, 1954, Ambassador McDermott asked Foreign Minister Canessa whether the Government of El Salvador was interested in negotiating a military assistance agreement (despatch 274, from San Salvador, dated January 8, 1954, 716.5 MSP/1–854). In telegram 61, from San Salvador, dated February 12, 1954, Ambassador McDermott informed the Department of State that President Osorio was interested in a military assistance agreement (716.5 MSP/2–1254), and in telegram 63, from San Salvador, dated February 16, 1954, the Ambassador further reported that President Osorio had promised to send him a memorandum containing a schedule of dates for conversations and negotiations concerning an agreement (716.5 MSP/2–1654).

Memorandum by the Deputy Director of the Office of Regional American Affairs (Jamison) to the Director of Operations, Department of the Air Force (Ramey)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 8, 1954.

Subject: Extension of Military Aviation Mission Agreement with El Salvador.

Reference is made to your memorandum of December 15, 1953[2] to Mr. George O. Spencer, subject as above, in which the Department of the Air Force concurred in the extension of the Military Aviation Mission Agreement with El Salvador, which expired on December 31, 1953, but suggested an amendment which would give the United States Government exclusive criminal jurisdiction over members of the Air Force Mission in El Salvador.

Our Embassy at San Salvador was instructed to enter into negotiations with the Salvadoran Government to obtain the amendment to the Agreement desired by the Department of the Air Force, as well as certain other amendments so that the Agreement would reflect current United States Department of Defense organization. (See Department of State Instruction No. 46 of January 19, 1954 to Embassy San Salvador.[3]) This instruction was subsequently suspended, however, in view of the development of a press campaign in El Salvador and elsewhere in Central America in which allegations are being made that the United States is trying to extend its military influence in the area in an unwarranted manner and has obtained privileges for its military personnel in the case of Nicaragua which jeopardize that country's sovereignty. In view of these propaganda moves, as well as the fact that delicate negotiations with El Salvador for a military assistance agreement under the Mutual Security Program may soon begin, it is our judgment that efforts at this time to obtain El Salvador's agreement to the amendment mentioned above would not be successful and might even endanger the success of the negotiations for a military assistance agreement with El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua which are deemed to be of great importance in relation to the entire Central American situation. Approval by the Salvadoran legislature of the recently concluded Army Mission Agreement might also be affected adversely.

This Department believes, in view of the foregoing, and considering the general political situation in Cental America that it would not be desirable at this time to press for the proposed amendment to Article 11 of the Military Aviation Mission Agreement with El Salvador but recommends instead that the Agreement be extended in its present form and the amendment be sought at a later and more opportune time. Ambassador McDermott, who has been in Washington on consultation, concurs in this view.

I would appreciate being informed whether the Department of the Air Force would concur in extending the Agreement on this basis.[4]

SECRET SAN SALVADOR, May 24, 1954.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Since my discussion with you during Holy Week, the situation as affects us has very definitely changed in El Salvador. To refresh your recollection, a year ago last March El Salvador asked for a considerable quantity of arms from the United States through diplomatic and military channels. It sent a mission to the United States to obtain arms. According to accounts of members of the mission, they were treated well, wined and dined, but came back with nothing. The sad word spread through the Armed Forces and to other groups that the United States had not backed President Osorio whose supporters then became lukewarm, if not cool, towards us. Through the months they have gradually griped less and friendliness slowly increased to where one could say they were friendly. With the landing of the Alfhem cargo of arms at Puerto Barrios, these people became frightened and it was natural for some of them to feel that the United States, while stronger than Russia, could not be depended upon to deliver in a pinch.

True, for one reason or another, President Osorio has dragged his feet on the Military Assistance Agreement. He had promised to give me a favorable answer in June. Early in May he promised to give it to me on May 15. He did accept, with conditions, orally on May 20 and he gave me the text of his draft[1] on Friday, the 21st. It is based on the similar U.S. treaty with the Dominican Republic.[2] It is being forwarded in the first pouch which is the same pouch which carries this letter. He wishes to limit its scope to the Central American and Caribbean area but has not mentioned this fact in the draft which will be made public some day. He thinks it better that the limitation should be dealt with in secret military negotiations; nevertheless, he wishes to have the entire fact that there are any negotiations going on kept secret until such time as the agreements are implemented.

Please see Despatch No. 432 of May 20, 1954.[3] Please note the President's hope that now we will be able to assist him in establishing credit whereby he might acquire arms in addition to those which might be furnished under the Agreement to the value of about $2,000,000. This I am also sure he would want kept secret as he believes secrecy prevents the taking of any measures to counteract the results of the negotiations. He believes the element of surprise, "as in all military matters," desirable. Today President Osorio said he had learned the United States is air-lifting arms to Nicaragua and Honduras. He expressed the hope that El Salvador would not have to wait for arms until the conclusion of the pact which is pending.

I understand there has been a revival, since the Alfhem shipment, of criticism of the United States among Salvadorans. At the moment they are inclined to overlook the millions of dollars we have put into FOA assistance. According to their information the Russians made a gift to Guatemala. They don't want a gift but do want credit and an opportunity to buy the big stuff—planes and anti-aircraft artillery to defend the Lempa Dam and bridges. If the Guatemalans have tanks, the Salvadorans will also need tanks or anti-tank guns. As I see it tonight, El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua will stand together. We are helping two of them immediately but El Salvador is right on the border. If ever we made a gesture, now is the time to make it. If we create a good enough impression now, we may be able to get on with the things that concerned you last Holy Week.

SECRET [SAN SALVADOR,] May 31, 1954.

Counselor of Embassy Andrew E. Donovan II.

Subject: Purchase of Arms by Salvadoran Government.

During a conversation with the President on the afternoon of May 31, his previous request for assistance in the immediate purchase of arms in the United States was discussed. A copy in Spanish was delivered to him of a list[1] which had been drawn up by the Army Attaché and the Chief of the United States Army Mission[2] after consultation with the Chief of Staff, Col. Escamilla. It was explained that in such purchases, the transportation costs were paid by the receiving government; that normally they would be sent by ship as the expense of air lifting was excessive, but that perhaps certain items might be available in the Canal Zone. It was also pointed out that since his first priority list presumably largely concerned small arms and munitions, they might be available from existing Army stocks and would not necessitate new procurement. Under these circumstances, if agreement of other interested government agencies in Washington was obtained, it might be possible to supply them with payment to be made 60 days after the date of their receipt.

The President said he understood it might not be legally possible to establish a credit, such as he had envisaged, of $2,000,000 for these purchases, adding that the 60-day term for payment was of course only an extension of time but not credit. He said that in view of these circumstances, he would have to select from the lists submitted to Washington those items which were particularly urgent, considering at the same time, delivery dates and prices. He said certain items on the list might have to be omitted at this time and other items again dependent upon prices, such as munitions, increased in size. Consequently, he said he would appreciate receiving information on prices and delivery dates in order that he could make further revision of the list. He said certain items might be purchased now from existing funds and others when provision is made in the budget of next year.

He said that in making his selections in accordance with the funds which might be available 60 days after the date of delivery, he would be guided by the obtention of sufficient military support to back up the political position of the government. He said that El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua have no intention of engaging in any actual armed conflict but that he must have the military support which will make his political position respected and which will not allow it to be jeopardized by greater military support on the other side.

Referring to the Military Assistance Agreement, he said that in his concept, it involved the training of Salvadoran forces for continental defense which was quite distinct from the necessity of reinforcing his forces for support of the political position of the government. He said he felt that over a period, perhaps 75,000 Salvadorans might be trained for continental defense and that the matériel supplied by the United States would be used in this general training rather than for the immediate necessities of his troops to confront any unusual situation which may develop in Guatemala.

The President was told that while we could not anticipate the military plan which might be worked out in conjunction with the negotiation of the agreement, it appeared likely that some agreed-upon group, a company or regiment or any other size unit that might be mutually agreed upon, would be supplied and trained to be ready for continental defense. He said that these matters would naturally be the subject of military discussions but that aside from the question of continental defense, he must provide for the military necessities of any given international situation.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Ambassador in El Salvador (McDermott)[1]

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: Thank you very much for your report (your letter of May 24[2]) on the Salvadoran reaction to the efforts we have made, to date, to comply with Salvador's requests for military assistance.

I frankly find it difficult to understand why the Salvadorans believe we should have accorded more favorable treatment to their requests for arms assistance than to those of Honduras and Nicaragua. I am sure you have done your best to explain our position, which is that: (1) military equipment can be offered to Salvador for purchase on the same payment terms as equipment offered to Salvador's friendly neighbors; (2) that it should be possible to deliver at least some of the purchased items expeditiously, particularly those which are available from U.S. military depots and do not require new procurement; and (3) that we are prepared to deliver military equipment expeditiously to Salvador under a bilateral military assistance agreement.

With regard to the equipment Salvador desires to purchase, we are unable to offer better payment terms than payment 60 days after delivery, because existing legislation prohibits us from going further than that.[3] We were able to provide some equipment, without cost, to Nicaragua and Honduras, and to make prompt delivery, without cost, to those countries, solely because they have concluded bilateral military assistance agreements with the U.S.

[3] On June 14, 1954, in accordance with provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, Director of the Foreign Operations Administration Stassen informed Secretary Dulles that El Salvador was authorized to purchase from the Department of Defense military equipment and materials available from stock up to the value of $1 million on a 60-day deferred payment basis (letter, dated June 14, 1954; 716.5 MSP/6–1454).

For text of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 (Public Law 329), approved Oct. 6, 1949, see 63 Stat. 716.

I am sorry to learn that the Salvadorans believe we were unresponsive to their request for military assistance last year. I am informed that both the Department of the Army and the Department of the Air Force submitted to the Salvadoran representatives in Washington, last June, written offers which specified prices and dates of delivery for virtually every item requested by Salvador for purchase. The delivery times on the items ranged from ninety days to one year. If Salvador had chosen to buy the equipment offered, a considerable amount of it would have arrived in Salvador long before now. In view of the critical situation in Central America at the present time, I am sure that the Pentagon will be prepared to deliver purchased equipment much more expeditiously than would have been possible last year. The Pentagon has received the list of equipment desired by Salvador for purchase, and we expect to have in the hands of the Salvadorans by early this week an estimate of prices and delivery times on individual items requested.

We are sending early this week by air pouch the comments of the Departments of State and Defense on the draft military assistance agreement submitted by El Salvador. You will note from those comments that the Salvadorans have failed to include in their draft several important provisions which the Congress requires be included in any bilateral military assistance agreement concluded by the U.S. If the Salvadoran reaction to our comments indicates an unwillingness to meet the U.S. statutory requirements, then we believe it would be unproductive for a military team to proceed to San Salvador for negotiations. If the Salvadoran reaction demonstrates otherwise, we are prepared to send a military team on very short notice.

CONFIDENTIAL SAN SALVADOR, July 9, 1954.

DEAR HENRY: I suggest that recognition be taken by our Government of the splendid cooperation given us by President Osorio in bringing about the recent cease-fire in Guatemala,[1] his invitation to Col. Monzón and Col. Castillo Armas to meet here in San Salvador, his strenuous efforts to bring them together and his fast cooperation on the morning of Thursday, July 1st, in helping me pin down Colonels Monzón and Castillo Armas until Ambassador Peurifoy got here.

The conversations beginning June 30 and continuing until 3:45 a.m. July 1st were conducted by President Osorio (who modestly says he chaired the meeting) with the President of the Asamblea, Peralta Salazar, who advanced the arguments for El Salvador, Col. Monzón and Col. Castillo Armas. Upon being informed of the breakdown by President Osorio, I telegraphed the Department (niact no. 2[2] repeated to Guatemala) and for several hours tried to reach you on the telephone which I succeeded doing shortly before 8:00 a.m. I immediately got word through to the President by telephone requesting that both planes be kept on the ground here and that we should do our utmost to persuade the two Colonels not to take off. I kept an appointment with President Osorio at 8:30. The two Colonels called on President Osorio, separately of course, to make their farewell calls. In the name of both our Governments, President Osorio and I requested the two Colonels to postpone their departure until at least 10 o'clock and later, until 11 o'clock. I informed them that Ambassador Peurifoy was flying over from Guatemala and that he would have a concrete proposal to make. Ambassador Peurifoy was delayed; I told them of reports I had through the airport radio that it was difficult to take off from Guatemala because of weather. Later I received a message through our radio communications that the plane was waiting for Ambassador Peurifoy to come from the National Palace where he had called on the other two members of the Junta. I passed this information on to both Colonels. Col. Castillo Armas gave me no further promises to stay after 11:00; he insisted that he must return to his troops, some of whom were so placed that they did not have access to drinking water. Col. [President] Osorio persuaded him to send one of his men to order in his name a rearrangement of the lines. Shortly after that officer's departure from the Presidential Palace, Col. Castillo Armas and all his guards left in a body. Asked whether they would be back, they said yes; they were merely going to get shaved and would return shortly, which they did. When Ambassador Peurifoy's plane was landing at the airport, Col. Castillo Armas' plane took off with only the crew and his emissary. I did not meet Ambassador Peurifoy because I dared not leave the Casa Presidencial.

I did not sit in on the private meetings that Ambassador Peurifoy had with Col. Castillo Armas and again with Col. Monzón, or the meetings he and Sr. Peralta Salazar had with both Colonels during the late afternoon and night of July 1st. The truce agreement was signed at 5:00 a.m. July 2. It was agreed that both Colonels would accompany Ambassador Peurifoy to Guatemala City at 10:00 a.m. July 2. It was clear, however, that Col. Castillo Armas would return to his troops and consult with his officers and advisors at Chiquimula but he said he would be back by 10:00 a.m. for the trip to Guatemala. We were at the airport awaiting him when we received word that he would not be able to get back before 4:00 p.m. or the following day. Col. Monzón decided to wait for him. On the morning of July 3, Col. Castillo Armas arrived at the airport and as he had not made a farewell call on President Osorio, he went directly to the Casa Presidencial where he had a long talk with the President. I am sure President Osorio put in some more good licks for cooperation and the future peace of Central America.

Today relations between the United States and President Osorio are, to say the least, excellent. We have sought to give him full credit for the truce. His hand has been greatly strengthened with the Army and all sections of public opinion. Some of the newspapers are nominating him for the Nobel Peace Prize. I think this would be an auspicious time for the President to send him a letter of appreciation and an autographed photograph. I am sure he would appreciate such a gesture.[3]

I extend to you my heartiest congratulations for your able handling of this most difficult Guatemalan problem.

With kindest wishes,

Sincerely, MIKE

(Holland files, lot 57 D 295, "El Salvador") A draft of a proposed letter to President Osorio was attached to the Secretary's memorandum.

Minutes of a Meeting, Held in the Department of State, August 13, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

Subject: El Salvador

Participants: Assistant Secretary Holland
Ambassador Michael J. McDermott[1]
Mr. Raymond G. Leddy
Mr. John W. Fisher

President Osorio

Ambassador McDermott said one of the principal problems in San Salvador was handling the President and other government officials. Osorio was to be treated as an Indian, but a very sagacious one who had acquired considerable political knowledge during the past year. Osorio will do nothing which will make him appear as a satellite of the United States. This attitude is traditional in Salvador, which is only too conscious of the fact that it is the smallest country in the hemisphere. Ambassador McDermott recalled how the Salvadoran delegate, Guerrero, launched a strong anti-U.S.-intervention movement at the Sixth Inter-American Conference in 1928.[2] The seeds planted there have flourished throughout Latin America.

Osorio not only will sign nothing which would suggest making any Salvadoran act conditioned on U.S. approval, but is chary of receiving grants or gratuitous favors. An example of the kind of thing he wants from the U.S. is his request to Ambassador McDermott that the United States give its moral support to Salvador's efforts to get Honduras to join with Salvador in constructing a through toll road from La Union in Salvador to Puerto Cortes on the Caribbean coast of Honduras. This would give Salvador an alternative outlet to the Atlantic, freeing it from dependence on the IRCA. The uncompleted portions of the road are all in Honduras and would require about $12 million to finish.

Osorio proposes an IBRD loan to be guaranteed by the two Central American Governments. President Black of the Bank is supposed to be favorable, but Galvez is reluctant. Osorio wants the United States to help get Galvez in line. Mr. Holland thought offhand that the highway was a meritorious project.

Ambassador McDermott described Osorio's careful neutrality during the Castillo Armas rebellion. In conversations Osorio said Salvador

"would incline" toward Honduras in the event Arbenz won and invaded that country. Lower ranking Salvadorans were much more affirmative in expressing support of Honduras.

Communist Problem

The Ambassador stated it isn't presently of consequence but it could easily become so. While the rich are becoming richer, the poor are getting poorer, even despite high coffee prices.

Osorio is trying to expand the middle class, and has not directly clashed with the rich. He has no organized opposition either from right or left, and appears to be drifting toward the conservative side. Osorio has no visible successor. Colonel Bolaños, a presidential aspirant, would be an unfortunate choice. He is indecisive and ignorant of government.

Osorio showed Ambassador McDermott letters from students, women and certain union groups praising his neutral position. Osorio told Ambassador McDermott the signers were "Communistic".

Labor

Salvador's labor movement is Government sponsored and controlled. No confederation is allowed to exist and the Government restricts the right to strike. Ambassador McDermott pointed out that Salvadoran railroad workers have never forgotten that the Guatemalan railroad union failed to support them a number of years ago, and the Salvadorans have ever since withheld their support from the Guatemalan organization.

Somoza[3]

The Ambassador characterized Somoza as a man bent on establishing a family dynasty in a country which he virtually owns. Somoza is a rich man and has not avoided rough stuff to become so.

Osorio is neither intimate nor distant from Somoza. Osorio's interest in obtaining anti-aircraft guns to protect his new Lempa hydroelectric dam was perhaps prompted as much by the existence of the Nicaraguan air force as the Guatemalan.

Figueres[4]

Osorio tried to be friendly with Figueres, but feels that Pepe went back on his word, given during a visit to Salvador as President-elect, to refrain from stirring up trouble with Somoza. As a result, Osorio would mediate the present squabble only on written request.

---

[3] Anastasio Somoza García, President of Nicaragua.
[4] José Figueres Ferrer, President of Costa Rica.

Ambassador McDermott thought Figueres . . . caused his country to go broke in his . . . war in 1948. He thought he would do so again. Figueres voices support of the United States, but that is as far as it goes.

Army Mission Agreement

Ambassador McDermott had not seen the latest instruction on this topic, which arrived in Salvador after his departure for Washington. He will attempt again to conclude the agreement, held up by certain Salvadoran nationalistic feelings relating to our article on exclusive functioning in the military advisor field. The Salvadorans like the present Army Mission Chief, Col. Machery, and would probably keep him on in the country indefinitely despite the continuing lack of an agreement.[5]

MDAP

There has been no progress toward agreement since Osorio took up the question to "study". It was recalled that the Salvadorans originally insisted on maintaining secrecy at least until after desired military equipment arrived in the country.

Ambassador McDermott felt we should not push it but let the Salvadorans know, at least for the present, that a military defense assistance pact with us is available if they want it.

It appeared that Salvador was principally interested in a military agreement as a means of acquiring a loan for the purchase of arms. This is, of course, unfeasible.[6]

Commercial Treaty

The United States proposed a revised Friendship, Commerce and Navigation treaty with Salvador months ago,[7] but has had no response. Ambassador McDermott recommended that, if Salvador desired such a treaty, it should be negotiated in Washington with Ambassador Castro.

Technical Assistance

The agricultural program has been concluded and the industrial productivity agreement is progressing toward conclusion.

[6] No military assistance agreement was signed with El Salvador in 1954.

[7] No treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation was signed with El Salvador in 1954.

Inter-American Highway

Salvador was slow to take up and match the proffer of $500,000 to continue work on the Inter-American Highway. Salvador's share was $200,000. Work was started and scheduled for completion in December 1954, but it has gone so slowly that it will be at least a year late. Salvadorans have worked up very little interest in our desire to pave the 50 miles at the eastern end of the highway.

Rio Conference[8]

Ambassador McDermott said Salvador's basic position was that there should be a floor price on coffee. Proponents of this thesis argue it would give the necessary assurance to permit growers to pay higher wages. Mr. Holland said the United States could obviously accept no such proposition.

RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND GUATEMALA, WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO THE CONCERN OF THE UNITED STATES OVER COMMUNIST ACTIVITY IN GUATEMALA[1]

Editorial Note

By an exchange of notes signed at Guatemala City, January 7 and 8, 1952, and entered into force on the latter date, Guatemala agreed to the application of sections 511 (b) and 515 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951 to the technical cooperation programs operated in Guatemala by the United States. The notes were transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 820, dated February 13, 1952, not printed (814.00 TA/2–1352). Mr. Clark (MID) began the discussion by stating that information had been received from our Embassy in Guatemala that the Guatemalan Government desired to purchase a large quantity of road-building equipment in the United States and was expected to send a special agent or mission to Washington to assist the Guatemalan Embassy in arranging for the purchase of this equipment. In view of the special situation in Guatemala and our policy with regard to providing assistance to that country, it had been deemed advisable to call a meeting of those with whom the Guatemalans would probably come into contact in their efforts to obtain the desired equipment in order to formulate a common policy as to how they should be handled.

As all those present were aware, our policy toward Guatemala, stated briefly, was to refrain from extending priority assistance for materials and equipment in short supply; also to cut back on quotas and allocations as much as possible without, however, exposing ourselves to charges that we were violating any of our Inter-American commitments. It was necessary, therefore, to be selective and relatively cautious in the application of this policy in order to avoid the possibility that Guatemala could document a case in the Organization of American States or elsewhere that we were engaging in economic warfare in violation of our commitments.

The reason for this meeting, then, was to prepare for the arrival of the Guatemalan mission. Obviously, it was highly important that we all had the same understanding with regard to strategy and tactics and that we all pursued the same line when talking to the Guatemalans.

It was our view, Mr. Clark said, that our objective should be to see to it that Guatemala obtained as little of this equipment as possible. We should be careful, however, not to reveal this fact to the Guatemalans. We should receive them with the utmost courtesy and conduct ourselves in such a way as to give the impression that we were trying to be as helpful as possible. We should stress and restress the tight supply situation as the basis for inability to issue licenses or provide priority assistance. At no time during conversations should reference be made to the political situation in Guatemala or to United States–Guatemala relations. If the Guatemalans suspect or conclude among themselves that we are not being fully cooperative, we will have succeeded entirely in our purpose. However, we should never by our actions give them proof that we are not being cooperative.

Some of the equipment which the Guatemalans would be seeking would not, of course, be in short supply. We would no doubt have to license this equipment and this fact could be pointed to as evidence that there was no embargo on shipments to Guatamala.

Mr. Wythe stated that Mr. Chocano[13] had been in yesterday to talk to Mr. Rafferty and Mr. Strassman about licensing procedures. He stated that they had discussed the situation in general terms with Chocano and had made an appointment for him to see Mr. Merrell of the Project Licensing Division on the following day. Mr. Rafferty and Mr. Strassman had been careful, he said, to restrict the conversation to the technicalities of licensing procedures and the general supply situation. Mr. Wythe said the problem now was whether Mr. Merrell should advise Chocano to apply for a project license or suggest that it would be better to apply for licenses on an individual order basis.

A general discussion ensued and it was ultimately decided that Mr. Merrell should follow normal procedure and explain fully to Chocano the advantages and disadvantages of obtaining a project license. He would, during the conversation, express grave doubts that the National Production Authority would give the project as a whole priority status and would refer to the two cases of roadbuilding projects in Peru and Turkey which had been turned down by the NPA. He would mention that in all probability the project would need the strong support of the State Department to obtain consideration from the NPA and inquire whether Chocano had discussed the matter with the State Department.

[13] Alfredo Chocano Becerra, Counselor, Guatemalan Embassy.

He would suggest that perhaps it would be best to put the project on an individual licensing basis and offer to make arrangements for Chocano to see Mr. Dunning, Chief of the Licensing Branch of the Office of International Trade. In his turn, Mr. Dunning would explain licensing procedures and stress the fact that much of the equipment which Guatemala needed was in extremely short supply.

It was emphasized several times during the discussion that the Guatemalans should be treated on the surface in the same way as the representatives of any other country trying to obtain materials and equipment in this country.

Mr. Dunning mentioned that his section has been holding up licenses for several months on a number of orders and that the pressure by U.S. suppliers for his section to issue the licenses was increasingly sharp. He mentioned in particular an order of jeeps by the H. J. Nichol Company and a number of road scrapers. Mr. Dunning said that these items were not in short supply, were on the docks waiting for shipment and there was no proper basis for continuing to hold them up unless we were to classify Guatemala as a security risk. It was agreed that under these circumstances licenses would have to be issued for at least a part of these orders.

It was the consensus of opinion that the key to the success of the Guatemalan mission was whether or not it was able to obtain heavy tread tractors. Without them much of the other equipment the mission might succeed in getting would be useless. There was general agreement that tractors of this kind could not be obtained without priority assistance.

When the meeting adjourned, general agreement had been reached that all parties would follow the course outlined above when approached by Guatemalan officials.

National Intelligence Estimate[1]

NIE–62

WASHINGTON, March 11, 1952.

PRESENT POLITICAL SITUATION IN GUATEMALA AND POSSIBLE DEVELOPMENTS DURING 1952[2]

THE PROBLEM

To analyze the present political situation in Guatemala and possible developments during 1952.

CONCLUSIONS

1. The Communists already exercise in Guatemala a political influence far out of proportion to their small numerical strength. This influence will probably continue to grow during 1952. The political situation in Guatemala adversely affects US interests and constitutes a potential threat to US security.

2. Communist political success derives in general from the ability of individual Communists and fellow travelers to identify themselves with the nationalist and social aspirations of the Revolution of 1944.[3] In this manner, they have been successful in infiltrating the Administration and the pro-Administration political parties and have gained control of organized labor upon which the Administration has become increasingly dependent.

3. The political alliance between the Administration and the Communists is likely to continue. The opposition to Communism in Guatemala is potentially powerful, but at present it lacks leadership and organization. So far Communist-inspired Administration propaganda has succeeded in stigmatizing all criticism of Communism as opposition to the Administration and to the principles of the still popular Revolution of 1944.

[1] A cover sheet, dissemination notice, and title sheet are not printed. National Intelligence Estimates (NIE's) were high-level interdepartmental reports presenting authoritative appraisals of vital foreign policy problems. NIE's were drafted by officers from those agencies represented on the Intelligence Advisory Committee (IAC), discussed and revised by interdepartmental working groups coordinated by the Office of National Intelligence Estimates of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), approved by the IAC, and circulated under the aegis of the CIA to the President, appropriate officers of cabinet level, and the National Security Council. The Department of State provided all political and some economic sections of NIE's.

[2] A note on the title sheet reads as follows: "The intelligence organizations of the Department of State, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Joint Staff participated with the Central Intelligence Agency in the preparation of this estimate. All members of the Intelligence Advisory Committee concurred in this estimate on 6 March 1952. See, however, footnotes to paragraphs 7 and 27."

4. Future political developments will depend in large measure on the outcome of the conflict between Guatemala and the United Fruit Company. This conflict is a natural consequence of the Revolution of 1944, but has been exacerbated by the Communists for their own purposes.

5. If the Company should submit to Guatemalan demands the political position of the Arbenz[4] Administration would be greatly strengthened. It is probable that in this case the Government and the unions, under Communist influence and supported by national sentiment, would exert increasing pressure on other US interests, notably the Railway.[5]

6. If the Company should withdraw from Guatemala a worsening economic situation would probably result. It is unlikely, however, that the economic consequences during 1952 would be such as to threaten political stability unless there were a coincident and unrelated decline in coffee production, prices, or markets.

7. Any deterioration in the economic and political situations would tend to increase the Administration's dependence on and favor toward organized labor, with a consequent increase in Communist influence. However, it is unlikely that the Communists could come directly to power during 1952, even though, in case of the incapacitation of President Arbenz, his present legal successor would be a pro-Communist.*

8. In present circumstances the Army is loyal to President Arbenz, although increasingly disturbed by the growth of Communist influence. If it appeared that the Communists were about to come to power in Guatemala, the Army would probably prevent that development.

9. In the longer view, continued Communist influence and action in Guatemala will gradually reduce the capabilities of the potentially powerful anti-Communist forces to produce a change. The Communists will also attempt to subvert or neutralize the Army in order to reduce its capability to prevent them from eventually taking full control of the Government.

* The Special Assistant, Intelligence, Department of State, would substitute the following paragraph: "Any deterioration in the economic and political situation would probably at first tend to increase the Administration's dependence on and favor toward organized labor, with a consequent increase in Communist influence. However, an economic crisis might force the Government to turn against the Communists in order to save its political position. On the other hand, it is unlikely that the Communists could come directly to power during 1952, even though the incapacitation of President Arbenz would bring a pro-Communist as his legal successor." DISCUSSION

The Arbenz Administration

10. The present political situation in Guatemala is the outgrowth of the Revolution of 1944. That Revolution was something more than a routine military coup. From it there has developed a strong national movement to free Guatemala from the military dictatorship, social backwardness, and "economic colonialism" which had been the pattern of the past. These aspirations command the emotional loyalty of most politically conscious Guatemalans and the administration of President Arbenz derives corresponding strength from its claim to leadership of the continuing national Revolution.

11. President Arbenz himself is essentially an opportunist whose politics are largely a matter of historical accident. Francisco Arana,[6] the principal military leader of the Revolution of 1944, became Chief of the Armed Forces under President Arévalo[7] and Arbenz, a lesser member of the military junta, became Minister of Defense. As the Arévalo Administration turned increasingly leftward in its policies Arana opposed that trend. His possible election to the Presidency in 1951 became the one hope of moderate and conservative elements in Guatemala. In view of Arana's political position, Arbenz, his personal rival for military leadership, became the more closely associated with Arévalo and the leftist position in Guatemalan politics. The assassination of Arana in 1949[8] cleared the way for Arbenz' succession to the Presidency in 1951.

12. By 1951 the toleration of Communist activity which had characterized the early years of the Arévalo Administration had developed into an effective working alliance between Arévalo and the Communists. Arbenz, to attain the Presidency, made with the Communists commitments of mutual support which importantly affect the present situation. He did not, however, surrender himself completely to Communist control.

Communist Strength and Influence

13. The Communist Party of Guatemala has no more than 500 members, of whom perhaps one-third are militants. The Party, however, has recently reorganized and is actively recruiting, especially in Guatemala City, on the government-owned coffee plantations, and among United Fruit Company workers. It is in open communication with international Communism, chiefly through the Communist-controlled international labor organizations, the Latin American CTAL and the worldwide WFTU.

[6] Col. Francisco Javier Arana.
[8] Colonel Arana was assassinated in Guatemala on July 18, 1949.

14. The Communists have achieved their present influence in Guatemala, not as a political party, but through the coordinated activity of individual Communists in the leftist political parties and labor unions which emerged from the Revolution of 1944. The extension of their influence has been facilitated by the applicability of Marxist clichés to the "anti-colonial" and social aims of the Guatemalan Revolution.

15. With the assistance of the Government, Communist and Communist-influenced labor leaders have been the most successful organizers of Guatemalan labor, especially among the United Fruit Company and government plantation workers. Their formation of the General Confederation of Guatemalan Workers in 1951 and Government pressure for labor unity have facilitated the extension of their control over all organized labor. They have been less successful in converting to political Communism the mass of labor, which is illiterate and politically inert. In the important railway workers' and teachers' unions there is opposition to association with Communism.

16. Through their control of organized labor and their influence within the pro-Administration political parties the Communists have been successful in gaining influential positions within the Government: in Congress, the National Electoral Board, the Institute of Social Security, the labor courts, the propaganda office, and the official press and radio. Their influence is extended by the presence of an indefinite number of Communist sympathizers in similar positions. The Communists do not fully control the Administration, however. Over their protests President Arbenz has recently dismissed a pro-Communist Minister of Education and appointed a non-Communist Minister of Communications.

17. If President Arbenz should become incapacitated his legal successor would be Julio Estrada de la Hoz, the President of Congress, an ardent nationalist. . . . In this event, however, the Army would probably seize power itself in order to prevent the Communists from gaining direct control of the Government.

The Anti-Communist Potential in Guatemala

18. Various elements in Guatemala, including many loyal adherents of the Revolution of 1944, view with misgiving the rapid growth of Communist influence in that country. The principal elements of this latent anti-Communist potential are:

a. The Catholic hierarchy, implacably opposed to Communism. While its influence has been considerable, the Church has been handicapped by the small number of priests and by a lack of a constructive social program.

b. Guatemalan landholding and business interests. These interests, which are now enjoying prosperity, resent increasing taxes and labor costs, but so far have not been subjected to direct attack, as have corresponding foreign interests. They may shortsightedly hope for advantage at the expense of these foreign interests.

c. The strong railway workers' union, which has repudiated its adherence to the Communist-controlled Confederation and has ousted its former leaders.

d. A large proportion of university students and an important segment of leadership in the teachers' union.

e. The Army, which has shown some concern over the growth of Communist influence. The Army command is loyal to President Arbenz and to the Revolution of 1944, but is probably prepared to prevent a Communist accession to power.

19. So far, Communist-inspired Administration propaganda has been successful in stigmatizing all criticism of the Administration as opposition to the principles of the Revolution of 1944. So long as it remains possible to discredit opposition to Communism by identifying it with opposition to the Revolution of 1944 and with support of foreign "colonialism," it is unlikely that a coherent, sustained, and effective opposition to Communism will develop. Moreover, political dissatisfaction in Guatemala has been strong enough to unify the pro-Administration parties, and to prevent members of these parties from openly opposing the Communists. For the period of this estimate, therefore, it is likely that the alliance between the Administration and the Communists will continue, and that the potentially powerful opposition to Communism will remain ineffective.

The United Fruit Company Crisis

20. The United Fruit Company, which conducts extensive operations in nine Latin American countries, dominates Guatemalan banana production. The Company controls the only effective system of internal transportation, the International Railways of Central America. Through its merchant fleet the Company has a virtual monopoly of Guatemalan overseas shipping. It owns or leases large tracts of land in Guatemala and is second only to the Government as an employer of Guatemalan labor.

21. The important position of the United Fruit Company in their economy has long been resented by Guatemalan nationalists, regardless of the fact that the wages and workers' benefits provided by the Company were superior to any others in the country. When the Revolutionists of 1944 undertook to "liberate" Guatemala from "economic colonialism" they had the Company specifically in mind. The Government can therefore count on the support of Guatemalan national sentiment in its conflict with the Company.

22. The present crisis had its origin in the virtual destruction of the Company's principal Guatemalan plantation by wind storms in September 1951. In view of previous Communist-inspired labor troubles, the Company unsuccessfully demanded Government assurances against future increased labor costs before it would undertake to rehabilitate the plantation. Meanwhile the Company suspended some 4,000 out of the 7,000 workers at that plantation. With Government support, the Communist-led union demanded that these workers be reinstated with pay for the period of suspension and the labor court ruled in favor of the union. The Company refused to comply with the court's decision and in consequence certain of its properties have been attached to satisfy the workers' claim for back pay. The scheduled sale of these properties has been postponed, however, in circumstances which suggest the possibility of a compromise settlement of the dispute.

23. The Communists have an obvious ulterior purpose in forcing the issue with the Company. The Government, however, probably does not desire to drive the Company from Guatemala at this time, preferring that it remain in the country on the Government's terms. The Company's employees also have an interest in the continuation of its operations. For its part, the Company has an interest in preserving its investment in Guatemala.

Possible Future Developments

24. Future developments will depend in large measure on the outcome of the struggle between the United Fruit Company and the Guatemalan Government.

25. If the Company should submit to Guatemalan demands the political position of the Arbenz Administration would be greatly strengthened. The result, even if it were a compromise agreement, would be presented as a national triumph over "colonialism" and would arouse popular enthusiasm. At the same time the Company would continue its operations, paying taxes and wages. The Government and the unions, under Communist influence and supported by national sentiment, would probably proceed to exert increasing pressure against other US interests in Guatemala, notably the Railway.

26. If the Company were to abandon its investment in Guatemala there would also be a moment of national triumph, but it would soon be tempered by realization of the economic consequences of a cessation of the Company's operations. It is unlikely, however, that these consequences during 1952 would be severe enough to threaten the stability of the regime unless there were a coincident and unrelated decline in coffee production, prices, or markets.

27. Any deterioration in the economic and political situations would tend to increase the Administration's dependence on and favor toward organized labor, with a consequent increase in Communist influence. However, it is unlikely that the Communists could come directly to power during 1952, even though, in case of the incapacitation of President Arbenz, his present legal successor would be a pro-Communist.†

28. If during 1952 it did appear that the Communists were about to come to power by any means, the anti-Communist forces in Guatemala would probably move to prevent that development. In particular, the Army command would probably withdraw its support from the Administration and seize power itself.

29. In the longer view, continued Communist influence and action in Guatemala will gradually reduce the capabilities of the potentially powerful anti-Communist forces to produce a change. The Communists will also attempt to subvert or neutralize the Army in order to reduce its capability to prevent them from eventually taking full control of the Government.

DEAR BILL: Reference is made to your letter of August 29, 1952,[1] to Ernie Siracusa with which you forwarded a memorandum prepared by Colonel Martin,[2] the new Air Attaché, in which the latter set forth his views regarding the export of F–51 fighter planes to Guatemala. I am glad to see that Colonel Martin's views correspond closely with those the Department has held over the past several years. As you are aware, the Guatemalans have been endeavoring to obtain fighter planes for a number of years and upon each occasion we were able successfully to block their efforts on technical grounds without having to do so on grounds of political considerations. The technical grounds were, as I recall them, that the United States Government could not sell military equipment to Guatemala under the terms of the MDA[3] as the Rio Treaty[4] was not in effect between the United States and Guatemala and secondly that F–51 planes were being used in Korea and were simply not available for sale to other governments.

In the present case it is again our intention to block the Guatemalan effort, but we desire to do so again on technical grounds. From Ernie Siracusa's conversation with Mr. Martin[5] in the Munitions Division (see memorandum of conversation dated August 19, 1952,[6] copy of which was sent to the Embassy), it would appear that the Munitions Division can find a number of legitimate technical ways to stall along on its consideration of the application for an export license and eventually to find technical grounds to turn it down. Thus we will not be faced, I hope, with the problem of having to decide this question on general political grounds.

With regard to the last paragraph of Colonel Martin's memorandum, I might say that in conversations which we had in the Pentagon two years ago with Colonel Giron,[7] then head of the Guatemalan Air Force, when he was here in Washington endeavoring to obtain fighter planes, the angle about prohibitive cost and upkeep of the aircraft was stressed and restressed by the Air Force people to Colonel Giron. It was obvious at the time that their arguments made no impression on Colonel Giron whatever and his attitude was that money was no object. He was bound and determined to purchase as many F–51's as he could get without regard to cost.

In connection with this whole problem of Guatemala's efforts to obtain fighter craft it has been pleasing here to note from recent telegrams[8] exchanged between the Department and our Embassy in London that the British Government is not inclined to sell planes to Guatemala. These telegrams have been repeated to Guatemala for your information so you are aware of this aspect of the matter.

We will keep you further posted on this subject and should it be necessary formally to ask the Embassy's opinion we shall do so. As I have said previously, however, we hope that MID will be able to handle the whole thing on technical grounds.[9]

Sincerely yours, EDWARD W. CLARK

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador in Guatemala (Schoenfeld)

CONFIDENTIAL GUATEMALA CITY, September 25, 1952.

Participants: His Excellency Señor Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán, Constitutional President of the Republic of Guatemala, and Mr. Rudolf E. Schoenfeld, American Ambassador.

After discussing the OFAR and Rubber Agreements[1] with President Arbenz, I inquired whether he had any messages he wished me to convey to Washington.[2]

President Arbenz said he was eager to complete the construction of the Guatemalan Section of the Pan American Highway. He hoped that when I was in Washington I would do what I could to further that project. He expressed the opinion that the road was not only desirable for Guatemala but also for the unity of the hemisphere.

I told him I had no doubt that the American authorities desire to complete the Highway as early as practicable. As regarded the Guatemalan Section, three practical considerations were involved: (1) a covering agreement; (2) a Congressional appropriation; and (3) priorities in relation to available funds.

As he knew, there had been difficulty about a US-Guatemalan Agreement. Guatemala had had reservations about accepting certain of the standard specifications. President Arbenz said he was confident an agreement could be arrived at.

[1] Reference is to the agreements relating to the establishment in Guatemala of agricultural and rubber research programs by the Department of Agriculture. Through the Department of Agriculture's Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations (OFAR), the United States maintained the Guatemalan Instituto Agropecuario Nacional which engaged in agricultural research and experimentation. The program was established pursuant to a memorandum of understanding and an exchange of notes signed at Guatemala City, July 15, 1944, supplemented and amended by a memorandum of understanding signed at Guatemala City, Mar. 10, 1945; for text of the agreement, see 58 Stat. (pt. 2) 1429 and 59 Stat. (pt. 2) 1471. The Guatemalan Government terminated the agreement on Aug. 4, 1950. The rubber research program was established in June 1941 through an informal letter of agreement which expired on June 30, 1951. Although both programs continued to operate without agreements, the negotiation of new agreements for existing cooperative programs was required under the provisions of the Mutual Security Act of 1951. In despatch 601, from Guatemala City, dated Jan. 12, 1953, not printed, Ambassador Schoenfeld reported on the status of negotiations for new agreements (714.5 MSP/1–1253). Additional pertinent documentation is in files 814.00 TA and 814.20 for the years 1953 and 1954.

[2] Ambassador Schoenfeld was in Washington for consultations at the Department of State from late September until early December; he returned to Guatemala on Dec. 4.

As regarded (2), the U.S. Congress was not in session at this time. It would not convene until 1953. After it met it was still difficult to forecast when it would get round to making such an appropriation.

I went on to say that I thought in frankness I ought to add that public opinion also had an influence on the matter. As he knew, American public opinion with regard to Guatemala left much to be desired. The U.S. Congress was very sensitive to public opinion. It was a real factor.

President Arbenz said he thought the American press had painted a false picture of Guatemala. It gave the impression that the Guatemalan Government was Communist. As I knew, it was not Communist.

I said I doubted whether people in the United States regarded the Guatemalan Government as a Communist Government. But they did feel that the Communists were unduly influential. They saw Communists holding key positions in various agencies and institutions and many evidences of Communist activity. They concluded that this denoted a serious degree of Communist infiltration in the country and a tolerance for it.

I thought it a mistake to think this was merely an idea of the press. For example, Mr. Serafino Romualdi, an official of the American Federation of Labor, had publicly stated a few days ago that Communism had been losing ground throughout Latin America except in Guatemala. This came from an independent labor leader.

President Arbenz said that the Guatemalan people had had only a short experience with democracy. They had emerged only a few years ago from a long series of dictatorships. They were finding their way. As a practical matter, it had been the local experience that when attempts were made to suppress any political movement, it tended to grow. I said I recognized the risks of mere suppression. The art of governing, it seemed to me, consisted in finding means of coping with disruptive elements.

I knew it was claimed that there were few Communists in Guatemala. As a matter of fact, Communists were usually a minority everywhere. But the Communists had made a study of the key positions and always directed their efforts toward getting control of them. Their influence was consequently often far out of proportion to their numbers. Moreover, from my own experience, I knew how dangerous it was to underestimate them.

I went on to say that I was aware of the natural sensitivity to any interference in any country's internal affairs. The problem of Communism in Guatemala was of course an internal problem. It was his problem. But it also had an international aspect.

Today at luncheon Dr. Noriega Morales[3] (President of the Bank of Guatemala) and I were discussing the problem. He had mentioned the great sensitivity here about outside interference. I told him the United States was a strong partisan of every country's running its own affairs. It strongly favored the principle of "self-determination". Its quarrel with the Communist movement was precisely that it sought to use local Communists in the interests of an alien power. The U.S. however also had an equally pronounced sensitivity, a sensitivity to international Communism. As he knew, it was making great expenditures of blood and treasure so that other countries could be free to live their own lives.

President Arbenz smilingly assented but expressed doubts as to the accuracy of the estimate of Communism in Guatemala. I went on to say that there was a feeling in the United States that the Guatemalan authorities, perhaps as a result of less direct experience with Communism, tended to underestimate the danger. I also thought it was desirable not to overlook the factor which public opinion abroad represented, even if he doubted its accuracy. Sometimes it was necessary to bear in mind La Rochefoucald's maxim that the appearance of truth sometimes did more harm than truth itself.

President Arbenz was patently interested and attentive but gave no hint that he planned to take any action.

When I took my leave, he wished me a happy trip and said he would look forward to seeing me on my return.

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann) to the Secretary of State[1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 3, 1952.

Subject: Possible Military Action Against Guatemala

ARA attaches importance to the information which it has received through official foreign government channels concerning a military plan directed against Guatemala in which several of its neighboring states would be involved. In order that you might be apprised of this plan in the event the subject is raised while you are attending the UN General Assembly,[2] your attention is invited to the following:

[1] Concurred in by Special Assistant to the Deputy Under Secretary of State Nolting, Deputy Director of the Office of Regional American Affairs Jamison, Director of the Office of Middle American Affairs Rubottom, and Director of the Office of South American Affairs Atwood; the memorandum was initialed by Secretary Acheson.

[2] Reference is to the Seventh Session of the General Assembly, which opened on Oct. 4, 1952.

1. President Somoza of Nicaragua apparently has gained the impression, however mistakenly, that a military venture directed at the overthrow of the present Guatemalan Government would have the blessing of the United States. Tab A is a memorandum[3] referring to several conversations with Brigadier General Mara,[4] Assistant Military Aide to President Truman, indicating that he may have led President Somoza to that conclusion.

2. In August Ambassador Thomen of the Dominican Republic told Assistant Secretary Miller that President Somoza, during his stay in Ciudad Trujillo for the Presidential inauguration,[5] stated to Generalissimo Trujillo that "understandings" had been arrived at between himself and President Truman in Washington with regard to anti-communist activities in the Caribbean and particularly in Guatemala. Tab B is a memorandum[6] of Mr. Miller's conversation with Ambassador Thomen.

3. Ambassador Sevilla Sacasa of Nicaragua last week called on Messrs. Miller and Mann to relate in some detail a plan whereby Nicaragua, with the support of several of its neighbors, as well as the Dominican Republic, Colombia and Venezuela, would take indirect military action against Guatemala which they considered to be a threat because of communist influence in that Government. Tabs C and D are memoranda[7] of Ambassador Sevilla Sacasa's conversations with Messrs. Miller and Mann, respectively.

4. Concomitant with the Nicaraguan approach to the Department, Ambassador Zuleta Angel of Colombia told Ambassadors Warren and Beaulac in Caracas and Habana, respectively, what he learned during a quick trip made by him through Central America and the Caribbean area, ostensibly for trade promotion, but actually to discuss the communist threat in Guatemala and Costa Rica. Tab E is a copy of Ambassador Warren's telegram[8] relating what he learned from Ambassador Zuleta, and Tab F is Ambassador Beaulac's report[9] of his conversation with Ambassador Zuleta.

5. From these official sources, it has been adduced that: (1) A military plan against Guatemala has already been formulated; (2) only a leader is required to put the plan in action; (3) it is hoped to carry out the plan this year, and (4) all elements concerned would like to have a "green light" from the U.S. and tangible support in arms.

6. Both Colombia and Venezuela fear Betancourt[10] (former Accion Democratica leader in Venezuela) who presently lives in exile in San Jose, Costa Rica, more than they do Guatemala. President Somoza of Nicaragua is also fearful of developments in neighboring Costa Rica where its leftist liberal leader, Figueres, is now the leading Presidential candidate for the elections scheduled next year.

Messrs. Miller and Mann, on separate occasions, stated as clearly as possible to Ambassador Sevilla Sacasa that the United States could never condone military intervention on the part of an American State against one of its neighbors, pointing out that non-intervention was one of the very keystones of the Inter-American system and that there are treaty commitments against such action.[11] The Ambassador was reminded that the United States is fighting with its UN allies in Korea for the non-aggression principle. The Ambassador was told, however, that the United States has been concerned with the communist influence in the Guatemalan Government and that it might be more appropriate to approach that problem through ODECA (Organization of Central American States) or, if that were not possible, through the regularly established procedures of the OAS, if practicable.

Mr. Miller was expected to make the same points clear to Ambassador Zuleta whom he expected to see in Panama this week during the inauguration ceremonies for President Remon.[12] Mr. Miller also was expected to see President Somoza's son[13] in Panama.

[11] In a memorandum of a conversation at the Department of State between Mr. Siracusa, Mr. Clark, and Col. Roberto Barrios Peña, a retired Guatemalan army officer and opponent of President Arbenz, dated May 27, 1952, Colonel Peña is reported in part to have forecast an upheaval in Guatemala against the Arbenz government and to have inquired what the United States would do when it occurred. The memorandum, by Mr. Siracusa, reads in part as follows: "he was informed that the United States could only view possible internal struggles in Guatemala as purely domestic issues involving Guatemala alone and that it, therefore, would maintain, in such events, its traditional policy of non-interference and non-intervention." RESTRICTED [WASHINGTON,] October 6, 1952.

Subject: Courtesy Call of New Guatemalan Ambassador

Participants: The Ambassador of Guatemala to the United States, Señor Don Guillermo Toriello Garrido
ARA—Mr. Miller
MID—Mr. Clark

Ambassador Toriello paid his first courtesy call on Mr. Miller this afternoon. He expressed his great pleasure at having the honor to represent his Government in Washington and said that he looked forward to his mission with great anticipation in the sincere hope that his efforts would strengthen further the close bonds of friendship which already existed between the United States and Guatemala. Mr. Miller responded by welcoming the Ambassador to Washington and assuring him that he and other officials of the Department were here to assist him in every possible way during his stay here as Ambassador.

Ambassador Toriello then brought up the matter of cooperation between Guatemala and the United States in the construction of the Inter-American Highway. He reviewed briefly his conversations[1] on this subject with Mr. Siracusa and with Mr. Clark and stated, as he had to the latter two officials, that his Government desired to conclude a new agreement which would permit work to go forward on the Highway. President Arbenz was especially interested and desirous of resuming the cooperative effort on this project. He said that there was one small change, however, that he would like to propose in the wording of one of the provisions in the draft of a proposed note from the Guatemalan Embassy to the Department of State and he had taken the liberty of bringing with him a draft[2] of the new language which he desired to propose. The Ambassador said that he hoped he could leave the draft on a strictly informal basis and that the Department would give consideration to it. He explained that the new wording would not change the substance of the provision in question (relating to free transit of U.S. Government vehicles) but would facilitate things considerably for the Guatemalan Government in that the new wording would obviate the necessity of the exchange of notes to be submitted to the Guatemalan Congress for ratification. In concluding his overture on the Inter-American Highway, Ambassador Toriello mentioned that he had broached the subject of the Highway in his conversation with President Truman at the time of presenting his credentials.[3] The President had stated, he said, that the United States Government would cooperate with Guatemala in every way on this meritorious project.

Mr. Miller responded by saying that the Department would be glad to give consideration to Guatemala's desire to negotiate a Highway agreement[4] and to any changes in the note that the Guatemalans would like to propose. He went on to emphasize to the Ambassador that the completion of an agreement did not necessarily mean that funds would be available for work since at the present time all available funds were allocated for work elsewhere than Guatemala and it depended on Congress whether new funds would be appropriated. He explained that we had requested and received enabling legislation from the last Congress but it was now necessary to request Congress to appropriate funds under the enabling legislation. Congress would probably not meet again until after the first of next year. In addition, assuming that Congress would appropriate new funds, there would then be the question of deciding where the money should best be spent, taking into consideration the entire length of the Highway. This was a matter of joint decision by the Department and the Bureau of Public Roads. Ambassador Toriello said that he understood this situation clearly.

Ambassador Toriello then brought up the matter of the difficulties encountered by the Guatemalan Government in endeavoring to obtain roadbuilding equipment for the Atlantic Highway. He said that some machinery was available, but especially in the category of heavy tractors they had only been able to obtain second-hand reconstructed tractors at exorbitant prices. He said that these heavy tractors and certain other heavy equipment were the key to getting ahead with the work. He concluded by expressing the hope that the Department of State could lend its good offices to assisting the Guatemalan Government in obtaining the needed equipment.

Mr. Miller responded by explaining the system of defense priorities made necessary by the defense effort. He said that the OIT had primary jurisdiction in this field and that it was at all times hard pressed to [4] In a memorandum to Assistant Secretary Miller, dated Oct. 3, 1952, Mr. Clark stated that MID recommended that an effort be made to conclude a basic highway agreement with Guatemala, because this would provide an opportunity for the United States to obtain certain commitments from Guatemala required by the Inter-American Highway Act (Public Law 375), approved Dec. 26, 1941; for text, see 55 Stat. 860. However, continued Mr. Clark, "our policy of withholding funds for actual work in Guatemala should remain unchanged until such time as there are fundamental changes in the internal situation in Guatemala." meet the heavy demands of the military and priority civilian needs related to the defense effort. Mr. Miller pointed out that just at the time the general supply situation seemed to be improving the steel strike occurred with resultant setback to the industrial output of the country. Mr. Miller said, however, that the Department would be glad to look into the matter further with the OIT and see what might be done.

Before he departed, Ambassador Toriello left with Mr. Miller for study and consideration by the Department a draft of the proposed change in wording to which he had previously referred.

Subject: Export Control Policy Toward Guatemala

AR —Mr. David Clark		Mr. George Wythe
MID—Mr. Neal [1]		Mr. Bernard Cahill [2]
Mr. Edward Clark		Mr. William Rafferty
		Mr. Brooks Ryno
		Mr. John Shepard [3]

Mr. Edward Clark said that the meeting had been called to review the situation as respects our current export control policy toward Guatemala. He noted that the Department of Commerce had recently raised the question of whether it was advisable to continue the present policy in view of changing circumstances in the supply situation and recalled that in informal discussions between officials of the Department of State and the Department of Commerce it had been agreed to postpone any final decision pending the opportunity to discuss the matter with Ambassador Schoenfeld. Ambassador Schoenfeld had been advised informally before he had left Guatemala for Washington of the views of the Department of Commerce in this regard in order to enable him to have the opportunity of reviewing the matter with his staff prior to discussion in the Department.

Speaking for the Department of Commerce, Mr. Wythe outlined Commerce's position substantially as follows. The supply situation in general was rapidly improving as a result of which there were less and less items over which the Department of Commerce could appropriately exercise licensing control. In view of this easing supply situation it was becoming more and more difficult to turn down or even delay the issuance of export licenses. The pressure from U.S. exporters was mounting and, since they were fully informed as to the supply situation, it was impossible to deny or delay licensing without openly admitting that we were engaging in a restrictive policy as regards exports to Guatemala. Finally, U.S. exporters were complaining that competition from Europe was increasing rapidly, thus threatening U.S. markets in Guatemala and elsewhere in Latin America.

In view of the supply situation and pressure from U.S. exporters there were now few items over which any effective control could be exercised by OIT. The policy of refraining from granting priority assistance could, of course, be continued and some pressure could be brought in the case of materials under quantitative quota restriction. In this category were such commodities as steel, copper and copper sulphate and sulphur. However, in view of the limited control that OIT could now exercise over exports to Guatemala, the Department of Commerce wondered whether it was worthwhile to continue the present policy.

Ambassador Schoenfeld stated that in his judgment the present policy should be continued for the time being. He said that the policy had been effective thus far. The objective had been to bring the Guatemalans to a realization that they were dependent upon the United States and that if they expected assistance or consideration from the United States it behooved them to adjust their actions vis-à-vis the United States accordingly. The Guatemalans were now aware of this, he thought, and to illustrate this he pointed to the fact that President Arbenz had specifically requested him to use his good offices to assist the Guatemalans in obtaining road building equipment for the Atlantic Highway and that Ambassador Toriello in his call on President Truman[4] and later on Mr. Miller[5] had made a similar request of these two officials. There were now, he said, certain beginning signs that the Guatemalan Government might be preparing to make some adjustments in its policies as they affected the U.S. Our export policy had played an important part in bringing this situation about and could continue, he thought, to influence it in the right direction.

[4] Apparent reference to the occasion when Ambassador Toriello presented his credentials; no other memorandum of a conversation between President Truman and the Ambassador during late September or early October was found in Department of State files.

[5] Apparent reference to Ambassador Toriello's courtesy call on Assistant Secretary Miller on Oct. 6; the memorandum of their conversation is printed supra.

The Ambassador said that he understood the difficult position Commerce found itself in, especially from the point of view of pressure from U.S. exporters, and said that of course careful attention should be paid to the trade situation to make sure that our policies did not result in a loss of the Guatemalan market for U.S. business through competition from Europe or elsewhere. However, he thought it would be advisable and desirable for certain political reasons, as well as for the effect it is producing on the thinking of Guatemalan officials, for this Government to continue our present policy even though our area of effectiveness was being sharply reduced by the supply situation.

The question was raised as to whether exceptions should be made in our policy in the case of materials over which there were still quantitative quota restrictions to accommodate U.S. companies such as the United Fruit Company. Specifically, it was stated that the United Fruit Company had requested an increased amount over and above the present quota level of copper sulphate used for spraying banana trees. Ambassador Schoenfeld expressed the view that our policy should not be implemented in such a way as to penalize the operations of U.S. companies. This view met with general concurrence.

After some further discussion it was agreed that the present policy of controls over exports to Guatemala, in so far as the supply situation permitted, should be continued. Specifically, it was agreed that 1) no priority assistance would be granted to Guatemala under prevailing circumstances; 2) quotas on materials under quantitative quota restrictions would continue to be cut back; and 3) as regards the export of materials not under quantitative restrictions the Department of Commerce would continue to consult the Department of State and the Embassy whenever there were any unusual items which might provide leverage. In particular, all applications for export to the Guatemalan Government or agencies thereof would be subjected to special scrutiny and brought to the attention of the Department and the Embassy.

Subject: U.S. Policy Toward Guatemala, Especially as it Relates to a Decision Affecting the Negotiation of an Inter-American Highway Agreement

Participants: ARA—Mr. Miller
Mr. Mann
MID—Mr. Rubottom
Mr. Clark
Ambassador Rudolf Schoenfeld

Reference is made to the memorandum of November 12, 1952[1] from Mr. Rubottom to Mr. Miller and Mr. Mann which reviewed recent developments in U.S. relations with Guatemala and pointed up the need to give serious consideration to whether or not we should make adjustments at this time in our policy toward that country. Various alternatives were suggested and the relative advantages and disadvantages of each were set forth. It was pointed out that the immediate problem facing us which made a policy decision imperative was that of the Guatemalan desire to conclude an Inter-American Highway Agreement.

The memorandum referred to was read by those present. After some discussion it was agreed that the time was inappropriate to make a final decision on general policy because of the impending changeover in Administration. Such a decision should more properly be left for the incoming Administration.

With regard to the immediate problem of the Guatemalan desire to conclude an Inter-American Highway Agreement, it was decided that the Department should take the position that since there were no funds immediately available for work and since the attitude of the new Congress toward the appropriation of new funds for the Inter-American Highway could not be predicted, the Department considered that it was unwise to sign an Agreement until it was clear what attitude the new Administration would assume toward the Highway project.[2] It was agreed that the Guatemalan Ambassador should be so informed at an appropriate opportunity. In the meantime negotiations on a technical level involving a Guatemalan proposal to change the wording of one of the provisions of the agreement could continue. It was agreed that the Department should continue to take the position in this regard that it preferred not to change the original language of the provision in question.

[2] In a memorandum to Mr. Rubottom and Mr. Clark, dated Nov. 17, 1952, Assistant Secretary Miller stated that the best course to follow in connection with a highway agreement with Guatemala was to defer any major decision until after the new administration took office in order not to prejudice the situation, and that our general policy should be "to avoid taking decisions that constitute a deviation from previous lines of approach." Memorandum of Conversation, by the Secretary of State [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [NEW YORK,] November 17, 1952.[2]

Subject: U.S.-Guatemalan Relations

Participants: Ambassador Guillermo Toriello, Guatemalan Delegation
The Secretary

Ambassador Toriello of Guatemala called on me at his request. He said that he wished to speak with me alone and accordingly Mr. Wells withdrew.

The Ambassador then said that he had undertaken his present mission because of his great admiration for the US and his distress that relations between his country and ours were not good. He had been authorized by the President to do all within his power to change the existing situation and restore friendly and cordial relations. He also felt that I was a person who understood the necessity for good relations in the hemisphere and that he could count upon my personal good will. He therefore wished to mention to me a series of things which led him to believe that something was wrong between our countries and to ask what he could do to put it right. He mentioned the Highway Agreement which he was most anxious to conclude before the new Congress met so that everything would be in readiness for the appropriation procedure. However, although they had accepted almost all the suggestions made by the Department, there was one matter on which they had been turned down, though it seemed to be a very trival one. He attributed significance to this rejection. The point at issue was whether American Government vehicles should be exempted from tax, or whether the agreement would be sufficient if they would be treated exactly the same as Guatemalan vehicles, which he said were not at present subject to tax and undoubtedly never would be. The reason for their desire to use this language was that our language would have to go to the Congress, whereas their language would not. He thought therefore that we were turning this down for broader reasons than the language concerned.

He also stated that when the members of the UN Delegation from Guatemala landed in New Orleans, although they were bearers of diplomatic passports, they were put at the end of the line and were not dealt with until all Americans had been put through. He had explained to his delegation that this was merely the ignorance of the local official and that he did not attribute any studied attitude on the part of this Government to be responsible for it. However, it worried him as it might, in his mind, be an indication of our disapproval.

He also mentioned what he called the violent propaganda against his country which he saw in all American magazines and newspapers and which he thought was activated by a special interest in our country.

In short, he wanted to know what was wrong and what he could do to put it right.

I told him that I knew nothing about the incident in New Orleans and was quite sure that his interpretation was the correct one, but that I would look into it because clearly bearers of diplomatic passports were entitled to all courtesies in our country. Insofar as the Highway Agreement was concerned, I pointed out the disadvantage of treating different governments differently in agreements on this point, and the trouble which would arise. However, I said I would inquire into the matter and discuss it with the Departmental officers concerned.

In regard to the last matter he mentioned, I told him that I thought we should discuss the matter frankly and that there was a clear difference of view. He thought that the articles about Guatemala were maliciously inspired and were untrue. I thought that these articles were a reflection of a situation which existed in Guatemala; whether they were factual or not was beyond my knowledge, but I was quite sure that they were not inspired for propaganda or malicious purposes. The question therefore was what was the situation in Guatemala and what was the Government doing about it. There was trouble of some sort. I should like to hear from him whether he thought that was correct and if so, what the Government was doing about it. He told me that Mr. Wells could tell me about his own background and his family's background, that he was inalterably opposed to Communism in any form whatever; and that he would leave the Government the moment the Government did not believe that it shared the American view. He added that he did share the same view. He spoke about the experience of his youth growing up under a dictatorship and said that we who were accustomed to liberty did not know how fragile it was in Central America and that while his Government could easily become a dictatorship, it was determined not to do so. Therefore, it was not approaching the communist question from the point of view of suppression because that would easily lead to dictatorship. The Government, by a reform policy, was attempting to remove the evils which gave communism a base and, by careful work in the trade unions and in agricultural groups, it was attempting to discredit the communists so that they would be removed from positions by those who had put them where they were. He believed that the dangerous communists were the imported ones, who were spreading propaganda to many of what he called the "local boys". He said that they were very young, uninformed and often misled, but he did not believe that they were indoctrinated communists. However, they were being carefully watched and he said that the circle was being drawn closer and closer around them and that they would not be permitted to exercise any dangerous influence. After some further talk along this line, I said that I wished to discuss the matter with Ambassador Schoenfeld whom I hoped was still in this country and that possibly next week Ambassador Toriello, Ambassador Schoenfeld and I might go into this whole matter and compare notes in the frankest possible way as to what the Government in Guatemala could do or what it was now doing.

He grasped this suggestion with enthusiasm and I told him Mr. Wells would be in touch with him on all the questions he had raised with me.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Milton K. Wells, Adviser to the United States Delegation to the United Nations

CONFIDENTIAL [NEW YORK,] December 1, 1952.[1]

Subject: Talk with Guatemalan Ambassador Guillermo Toriello Regarding Matters Affecting United States-Guatemalan Relations

Participants: The Secretary
Amb. Guillermo Toriello—Guatemalan Delegation
Amb. Rudolph E. Schoenfeld—United States Ambassador to Guatemala
Milton K. Wells—United States Delegation

Taking advantage of Amb. Schoenfeld's presence in the United States, the meeting was arranged at the Secretary's suggestion for the purpose of following up his talk of November 17, with Amb. Toriello[2] in regard to the situation in Guatemala adversely affecting United States relations with that country. Amb. Toriello was received in the Secretary's suite at the Waldorf Astoria. The conversation lasted about one and one quarter hours.

Amb. Toriello devoted most of his part of the conversation toward a general justification of Guatemala's attitude toward Communist influences in that country. Despite frequent efforts of the Secretary and Amb. Schoenfeld to steer the conversation into more specific and more constructive channels, Toriello kept adverting to generalities. With considerable repetition, he described his Government's basic policy as one conditioned by a sincere desire to maintain democratic procedures and to avoid dictatorship. His Government believes that the best way to combat Communism is to improve the maladjusted social and economic conditions which produce unrest among the under-privileged classes. This approach, he argued, is fraught with less danger than a repressive policy which would drive Communism underground. He belittled the power and influence of the Communist leaders. He said their activities are known to the Government and that they would be placed under immediate restraint should war occur. He personally shared the belief that they can be controlled best in the open and that in any case they are discrediting themselves with the rank and file. Regarding the labor unions, he did not believe the workers shared the ideological views of their leaders and were interested only in better pay and better living standards.

During the course of the conversation, however, Amb. Toriello did make a number of interesting comments on several specific situations as recorded in the following paragraphs.

Toriello praised the personality and qualifications of the new Foreign Minister, Dr. Raul Osegueda, whose friendly attitude and sincere desire to work for the best possible relations with the United States would facilitate his own mission. This gave him much satisfaction since he could now confidently count upon the support of his Foreign Office as well as President Arbenz to this end. Osegueda had asked the Ambassador to convey his respects and greetings to the Secretary, and to Ambassador Schoenfeld whom he looked forward to seeing in Guatemala. The Foreign Minister had expressed a desire to attend the forthcoming inaugural ceremonies if invitations are to be extended to other governments to be represented by special delegations. The Secretary stated he would inquire into our policy in this regard and advise the Ambassador as to whether we plan to invite special delegations. Both the Secretary and Ambassador Schoenfeld reciprocated the Foreign Minister's greetings.

The conversation turned to the pro-Communist slant of the official newspaper Diario de Centro America, which, as Amb. Schoenfeld commented, had an unfortunate effect upon public opinion in the United States. Toriello stated he could assure us of a future change in that journal's policy. He explained that the Diario de Centro America includes two sections, the gazette portion which prints official decrees and announcements, and the news or informative section. The problem may be solved, he said, by eliminating the informative section, converting the Diario into a truly official gazette.

Amb. Schoenfeld inquired whether any steps were contemplated to remedy a similar situation with respect to the Government broadcasting station TGW. Toriello assured him that the policy of TGW would also be changed. One explanation of the frequent attacks on the United States heard in the past over this Government station, he apologized, was that unfriendly elements abused the radio time which they had rented from TGW for unofficial programs. He described how he himself once had taken up the telephone to stop a TGW program . . . slandering the Government of neighboring Honduras.

Another factor which influenced the United States press and public opinion was the activity of pro-Communists in the Guatemalan Congress, Amb. Schoenfeld commented, noting in this connection that several known Communists are likely to be elected on the coalition ticket supporting the Government in the forthcoming Congressional elections. Amb. Schoenfeld also remarked that some of these individuals had recently visited behind the Iron Curtain. Toriello brushed aside as not really important the visits behind the Iron Curtain of such Guatemalans as Robert Alvarado Fuentes (former President of Congress), José Manuel Fortuny,[3] and Victor Manuel Gutierrez.[4] He professed not to believe that these and other Guatemalans were seriously indoctrinated by such visits, and by implication seemed to argue that their Marxian ideas were geared simply to Guatemalan social and economic considerations. In any case, he did not discuss the obvious international implication of their activities or their presence at Soviet-sponsored "peace" conferences.

. . . He predicted that Fortuny might be defeated; not because the Government opposed him, but for the same reasons that Humberto Gonzalez Suarez failed to become Mayor of Guatemala City—that is, because the relatively intelligent electorate in the city and the influence of the Church brought about his defeat at the polls.

Once or twice during the conversation, Toriello urged us not to be taken in by the denunciations of the Government by the opposition. By innuendo, he seemed to allege that our estimate of the situation had been unduly influenced by wild stories and rumors circulated by the subversive opposition, disguised and cloaked by anti-communism. The anti-communist movement in Guatemala is dangerous, he argued, since it does conveniently serve as a cloak for the irreconcilable opposition. Alluding again to the alleged "grand conspiracy against Guatemala" with which Guatemalan spokesmen so frequently charge the United States press and "foreign interests" Toriello said the situation was aggravated by the fact that Guatemala does not have diplomatic relations with Franco Spain, Peru, Venezuela and others. These countries, he said, add their bit to the campaign against Guatemala. In this connection, he commented that he hoped that Guatemala would establish normal relations with Venezuela before the Tenth Conference of Inter-American States meets in Caracas.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, 12 December 1952.

Subject: Central America—Guatemala

1. The following recent reports concerning the Central American situation are submitted for your information and consideration. The sources of these reports have proved reliable before and they conform to the pattern established by other sources. However some of the information cannot, for obvious reasons, be checked satisfactorily.

a. The Guatemalan Government has recently stepped-up substantially its support of Communist and anti-American activities in other Central American countries as follows:

Honduras

It is reliably reported that in northern Honduras there are more than 40 Communist cells in existence, organized under Guatemalan sponsorship.

. . . . . .

Costa Rica

In September 1952 the Guatemalan Government gave Presidential Candidate Figueres of Costa Rica $300,000 cash, according to the same informant.

b. The Guatemalan Government has been purchasing arms which are not going to the Guatemalan army but which it is believed are being distributed to the secret forces described below.

c. Deputies to the Guatemalan National Congress are to be elected 16–18 January. Indications are that communists will dominate the Congress after the elections because of their infiltration of all legal political parties. The new Deputies who take office in March will make appointments to all judgeships in the Supreme and lower courts of the country.

d. The principal revolutionary group has been building its organization since March 1952. We are informed that this group has decided to strike not later than 1 February 1953 with whatever means they have at their disposal. They are convinced that if the government of Guatemala succeeds in its present plan to control both Congress and the courts the chances of eventually overthrowing that government will be very considerably reduced.

e. The government of Guatemala is reacting defensively to the threat of revolution. It expects any invasion to start from across the Salvadoran frontier, and believes its best chances for defense are to fall back on Quetzaltenango. Because the government no longer fully trusts the Army, it has begun the development of a secret force of 1500 non-military personnel, broken down into three separate organizations: (1) the Caribbean Legion (200) . . . ; (2) a secret Communist organization (500); (3) a group composed of Cubans and Spanish Republicans.

f. The Costa Rican elections are scheduled for July 1953. Figueres, supported by the Guatemalan Government, is reported to control 105 of the 106 employees in the Registro Civil where all voters must register. A continuance of financial support from Guatemala reinforces his already strong position. According to recent reports, Betancourt (the exiled leader of the Venezuelan Accion Democratica leftist party) was still being given shelter and support by Figueres. (OCI notes that Figueres appears to be so strong politically at this time that there is no reason to believe that withdrawal of financial support by Guatemala, or the overthrow of the Guatemalan Government, would seriously affect Figueres candidacy one way or the other.)

g. A reliable source . . . indicates that his country is so concerned with the increasing domination of communists in Guatemala and the extension of their activities to other Central American countries, that El Salvador is considering a move against Guatemala in late December or early January. We have not ascertained whether an overt move or covert support of Guatemalan anti-Communists is planned. Our source indicates that the principal restraint upon such action is doubt as to whether the US would view it with favor.

2. We have heretofore advised you of the existence of a substantial revolutionary group planning to overthrow a presently Communist infiltrated Guatemalan Government. In accordance with State Department instructions, we have given no overt or covert assistance to this group.

WALTER B. SMITH

Editorial Note

On February 26, 1953, President Arbenz signed an order issued by the Guatemalan National Agrarian Council calling for the expropriation, under provisions of the Agrarian Reform Law of June 17, 1952, of approximately 234,000 acres of United Fruit Company property near Tiquisate on the Pacific side of Guatemala, and offering the company government bonds as compensation. The company appealed the expropriation order to the Guatemalan Supreme Court, requesting an injunction against its implementation; the court denied the appeal on March 18, 1953. A translation of the text of the Agrarian Reform Law was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 1299, from Guatemala, dated June 19, 1952, not printed. (814.20/6–1952)

On March 25, 1953, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs Cabot handed an aide-mémoire concerning the expropriation, drafted by Mr. Mann and Mr. Leddy and dated March 25, to Guatemalan Ambassador Toriello at the Department of State. The aide-mémoire indicated that the United States Government did not consider deferred payment in the form of agrarian bonds as constituting prompt and effective compensation to the company, that the amount of compensation offered was inadequate under well-established principles of international law, and that the views of the Guatemalan Government were invited concerning the continued operation of the company in Guatemala. (814.20/3–2553)

In Guatemalan Embassy note no. 596, dated June 26, 1953 and delivered to the Department of State on that date, not printed, the Guatemalan Government set forth its position concerning the expropriation of UFCO lands. The note stated in part that the expropriated lands were unproductive and vacant and of no benefit to the company, the expropriation was an exercise of Guatemalan national sovereignty and therefore not subject to international discussion, and that full protection was afforded all foreign-owned property in Guatemala. (814.20/6–2653)

In an aide-mémoire, dated August 27, 1953 and handed to Ambassador Toriello on August 28, the Department of State set forth the legal basis for the UFCO's claim for compensation from the Guatemalan Government, and requested that direct negotiations concerning the issue be undertaken either between representatives of the Guatemalan Government and the company or between the two Governments. (814.20/8–2753) For text of the aide-mémoire and additional information, see the Department of State Bulletin, September 14, 1953, pages 357–360.

In an aide-mémoire, dated February 5, 1954 and handed to Guatemalan Chargé Alfredo Chocano at the Department of State on the same date, not printed, the Department renewed its request for direct negotiations, and suggested international arbitration as an alternate means of settlement. (814.20/2–554) Department of State files indicate that the Guatemalan Government acknowledged the Department's communications of August 27, 1953 and February 5, 1954.

On February 24, 1954, the Guatemalan Government announced final expropriation of an additional 172,532 acres of UFCO property located near Bananera on the Caribbean slope of Guatemala, again stating its intention to pay compensation in the form of long-term agrarian bonds.

On April 20, 1954, in a memorandum of the same date handed to Chargé Chocano at the Department of State, not printed, the United States presented a formal claim against the Guatemalan Government, on behalf of UFCO, for the seizure of the company's lands at Tiquisate. (814.20/4–2054) For additional information, see the Department's press release 206, dated April 20, 1954, in the Department of State Bulletin, May 3, 1954, pages 678–679.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 25, 1953.

Subject: Relations with Guatemala

Participants: Ambassador Guillermo Toriello Garrido of Guatemala
ARA—Mr. Cabot
MID—Mr. Fisher

Dr. Toriello said he planned to leave on Monday, March 30 for a week in Guatemala and wished to call on Mr. Cabot before departing. He referred to what he called the press campaign in the U.S. against Guatemala, and exhibited a newspaper distributed to school children called "Our Times" containing a reference to Guatemala which he said would give the children the impression that his country is Communist. Mr. Cabot said he was sure the paper was not an official government publication. Dr. Toriello referred to an article by a Mr. Toledano in a recent issue of the American Mercury which he said was so mendacious that he even thought about bringing suit on it. He then displayed a copy of Mr. Braden's[2] recent speech at Dartmouth, pointing out the reference to Mr. Chocano, his Counselor of Embassy, which charges him with having been ejected from Nicaragua for carrying Communist propaganda. Dr. Toriello said the charge was utterly false, and described the conditions under which Mr. Chocano left Nicaragua. Mr. Cabot said that Mr. Braden was not in the Government and his views were his own. He added that he was glad to hear that the charge was false.

Dr. Toriello brought up the matter of the Aviateca application for a permit to fly to the U.S., which he said had been delayed by the Department for a very long time. Mr. Fisher said the application was under study and that it would probably go forward to the Civil Aeronautics Board soon.

Dr. Toriello mentioned the matter of pending license applications for arms, specifically tank parts. Mr. Fisher said the application is under study, and that certain findings had to be made regarding availability, etc. Mr. Cabot said that, nevertheless, we had to be sure about the orientation of the people who were going to get the arms. He emphasized that the U.S. Government is very seriously concerned over the infiltration of Communists in the Guatemalan Government, and said that he felt all the other problems pertaining to our relations with Guatemala were subsidiary to this central issue and could be settled without undue difficulty once the matter of Communism was cleared up.

Dr. Toriello thought we overestimated the importance of Communism and restated at length, and in various ways, his theme that the charges of Communism in Guatemala were false and were made by people opposed to the social-economic reforms being made by the present Administration.

Mr. Cabot again emphasized that this Government was not desirous of impeding social-economic reform in any country, nor in giving credence to false statements about Guatemala, but that the U.S. was definitely concerned over the evident infiltration of a dangerous foreign influence into the Guatemalan Government.

Dr. Toriello replied that of his own knowledge he could state that there were no foreign Communists of importance in his country and said that his country had no diplomatic relations with any Communist state. He brought up the names of the Guatemalans, Solórzano[3] and Gutiérrez, dismissing the first as not being in the Administration, but merely the elected head of the autonomous social security institution. As for Gutiérrez, he acknowledged that he was a local Marxist and that he was an important labor leader, but said his rise was only due to the youth and inexperience of the Guatemalan labor movement, and that he would disappear in time. He mentioned his suggestion to Ambassador Schoenfeld that Guatemalan labor leaders visit the U.S. He said there was no foreign Communist influence of consequence in the Guatemalan Government, and added that if we had information of secret Communists in it, his Government would be grateful for it in order to defend itself. Mr. Cabot replied that such matters were, of course, the responsibility of the Guatemalan Government. Dr. Toriello said Guatemala's neighbors were professing alarm over Guatemalan Communism, but in reality their alarm was only that of the wealthy landowners over agrarian reform. Dr. Toriello said that he was sure that the anti-Communist campaign against Guatemala would go on as long as she maintained her reform program, even if every Communist in the country were somehow eliminated. Mr. Cabot said that he felt that it might take some time for complete confidence to be re-established between the peoples of Guatemala and the United States, but that no progress could be made in that direction at all while the key problem of Communist infiltration there remained unsolved.

Mr. Cabot said that among the subsidiary problems was that of the United Fruit Company expropriation,[4] and proceeded to give Dr. Toriello the substance of the Aide-Mémoire[5] relating to the subject.

Dr. Toriello said he would bring a prompt reply but added that the Government's intention was not to drive the company out of the country but to subject the company to the provisions of its laws. He gave the story of his own expropriation, concluding that payment of the declared tax valuation was just payment. He said the Agrarian Law included provisions for the rental of nationalized lands, which could be used to meet the company's needs for lands. He went on to discuss what he called the bad behavior of the company in the past, and mentioned the recent imposition by the railroad of a 15 cent per quintal tax on cargo moved from its pier at San Jose to the immediately adjacent highway terminal facilities, just as the Government finished paving the road paralleling the railroad to the capital. He said the tax was withdrawn shortly afterwards. He said the Fruit Company paid $75 per car to ship its bananas on the railroad, while Guatemalans were charged $575 per car, and that the Government therefore had to build the Atlantic Highway to provide fair competition.

Dr. Toriello asked about his note on the Inter-American Highway of last December,[6] in which his Government accepted all the conditions set down by the U.S. Government. Mr. Cabot replied that the highway was another subsidiary matter which could be settled more or less quickly once the basic question of Communist infiltration in the Government of Guatemala was resolved.

Dr. Toriello said that he might return to Guatemala again in order to be there during Mr. Cabot's visit between April 25 and 28.[7]

The conversation between Mr. Cabot and Dr. Toriello, which was friendly and frank, lasted a little over one hour.

Mr. Cabot handed Dr. Toriello an Aide-Mémoire on the subject of the expropriation of United Fruit Company properties.

NIE–84

WASHINGTON, May 19, 1953.

PROBABLE DEVELOPMENTS IN GUATEMALA [2]

THE PROBLEM

To estimate the current political situation in Guatemala and probable future developments.

CONCLUSIONS

1. The current political situation in Guatemala is adverse to US interests. The Guatemalan Communists exercise a political influence far out of proportion to their small numerical strength. Their influence will probably continue to grow as long as President Arbenz remains in power.

2. Communist influence in Guatemala is based on militant advocacy of social reforms and nationalistic policies identified with the Guatemalan Revolution of 1944. It is exercised through the personal influence of individual Communists with the President and within the pro-Administration political parties, through infiltration of the bureaucracy, through control of labor organizations, and through leadership of the agrarian reform movement. The Communists' present objective is not open and direct control of Guatemala. Rather, they seek to neutralize Guatemala as an ally of the United States and to convert its Government into an effective, though indirectly controlled, instrument of Communism.

[2] A note on the cover sheet reads as follows:

"The following member organizations of the Intelligence Advisory Committee participated with the Central Intelligence Agency in the preparation of this estimate: The intelligence organizations of the Departments of State, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Joint Staff.

"The Intelligence Advisory Committee concurred in this estimate on 12 May 1953. The AEC and FBI abstained, the subject being outside of their jurisdiction."

3. President Arbenz still exercises personal control of the Administration and of the Army and the Police. It is still possible for him to break his ties with the Communists and to moderate the policies of his Administration, but it is highly unlikely that he will do so.

4. Implementation of the Agrarian Reform Law of 1952 will be the principal objective of the Arbenz Administration during 1953. It is to be expected that the large Guatemalan landholders and the United Fruit Company will be victimized in the process.

5. The implementation of Agrarian Reform has intensified a sense of insecurity which has had a depressing effect on business activity in Guatemala. However, its direct effect on agricultural production is likely to be negligible, at least for several years. As long as coffee prices hold up the general economy of Guatemala will not be vitally affected.

6. The net internal political effect of the implementation of the Agrarian Reform Law will probably be to strengthen the Arbenz Administration and to increase Communist influence and capabilities. Neither the landholders nor the Fruit Company can expect any sympathy in Guatemalan public opinion. Redistribution of their land will be used to mobilize the hitherto inert peasantry in support of the Administration.

7. The most effective opposition to the Arbenz Administration is found in Guatemala City. The urban elements which constitute this opposition are strongly anti-Communist, but they are also strongly nationalistic. In general they could not be expected to make common cause with the landholders and the Fruit Company or to welcome foreign intervention in Guatemalan internal affairs, although some of them might be disposed to accept foreign assistance in overthrowing Arbenz. There is no likelihood that this urban opposition could alter the course of the Government by political action. It could not succeed in a revolutionary attempt opposed by the Army.

8. The Army is the only organized element in Guatemala capable of rapidly and decisively altering the political situation. Although a quick change of attitude is always possible, there is no present reason to doubt the continued loyalty of the Army high command and of most of the Army to Arbenz. The Army under its present leaders could not be expected to take revolutionary action unless they became convinced that their personal security and well-being were threatened by Communist infiltration and domination of the Government, or unless the policies of the Government were to result in extreme social disorder and economic collapse.

9. So long as it remains united, the Guatemalan Army can defeat any force which the Governments of El Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua could deploy against it. These Governments are fearful that the trend in Guatemala will lead to Communist subversion and social upheaval in their territories. They are probably giving serious consideration to the possibility of effecting a political change in Guatemala through clandestine support of revolutionary action there. It is highly unlikely, however, that they would or could mount an open military intervention in Guatemala.

10. Guatemala will probably continue to assist Communist subversive activities in the Caribbean area, but will probably avoid involvement in filibustering operations like those of the Caribbean Legion in 1948–1951. To counterbalance its isolation in Central America it will seek political support elsewhere, particularly in the United Nations. If actually invaded it would seek to invoke the Rio Treaty as well as the UN Charter.

11. Guatemala has frequently taken occasion to demonstrate its independence of US leadership and in general has been less cooperative than could be desired, particularly in Hemispheric affairs. Moreover, the regime has systematically been hostile toward US private economic interests in Guatemala. Detriment to Hemisphere solidarity would not deter Guatemala from any course of action suggested by its own interests.

DISCUSSION

The Arbenz Administration

12. The present political situation in Guatemala is the outgrowth of the Revolution of 1944. That Revolution was something more than a routine military coup. From it there developed a strong national movement to free Guatemala from the military dictatorship, social backwardness, and "economic colonialism" which had been the pattern of the past. These aspirations have inspired the loyalty and conformed with the self-interest of most politically conscious Guatemalans. The Arbenz Administration still derives some strength from its claim to leadership of the continuing national revolution.

13. In the name of the Revolution of 1944 the successive administrations of Arévalo (1945–1951) and Arbenz have pursued increasingly radical and nationalistic policies. Their persecution of foreign economic interests in Guatemala, especially the United Fruit Company, and their demands for the "restitution" of Belize (British Honduras) have had the support or acquiescence of almost all Guatemalans. Their promotion of labor organizations and agrarian reform has tended to neutralize political opposition by creating mass support for the present regime. Any objection to the trend of developments in Guatemala has been stigmatized as resistance to the Revolution of 1944 by "feudal" and "imperialistic" interests.

14. The toleration of Communist activity which characterized the early years of the Arévalo Administration has developed into an effective working alliance between Arbenz and the Communists. The pursuit of leftist and nationalistic policies has been greatly accelerated under the Arbenz Administration. His first year in office was highlighted by active Government support for the formation of a national labor confederation and by a joint Labor–Government attack on the United Fruit Company. That attack failed, but the alliance of the Government with Communist-led organized labor was firmly established in the course of the struggle.

15. The point of reference for consideration of the present political tensions in Guatemala is the Agrarian Reform Law enacted in mid-1952. This Law provides for the expropriation of large tracts of unused land and their distribution to farm workers. Although presented as a long-overdue measure of social and economic reform, the Law has strong political motivation and significance. Communists and fellow-travelers played a leading part in its enactment; they honeycomb the National Agrarian Department established to administer it. The Communists have incited disorderly peasant seizures of privately owned lands. The Law is being administered in such a way as to destroy the political effectiveness of the large landholders and to mobilize the hitherto politically inert peasantry in support of the regime.

16. The recent congressional electoral campaign has further emphasized Arbenz' political alliance with the Communists. Pressure from the President's office forced some reluctant Administration supporters to accept the newly reorganized and legalized Communist Party (called the Guatemalan Labor Party, or PGT) into the Electoral Front, the pro-Administration coalition. The Electoral Front swept the country, except Guatemala City, where its ticket was decisively defeated by a strong anti-Communist vote. The over-all result of the election was a reduction of Opposition strength in Congress from eleven to five of the 56 seats. Although Communist Party representation remained at four, the Congressional membership includes several additional crypto-Communists and a majority may be considered sympathetic toward the Communist Party line so long as Arbenz favors it.

17. A further increase in political tension has resulted from a Supreme Court decision favorable to a Guatemalan landholder who had appealed for protection from arbitrary execution of the Agrarian Reform Law. At the instigation of Arbenz, the Guatemalan Congress immediately unseated the justices who favored this decision and replaced them with others more reliable from its point of view. This action provoked an intense but transitory reaction on the part of professional and other elements in Guatemala City already anti-Administration in sentiment.

18. President Arbenz has a middle-class background, as have most of his political associates. At least initially, his involvement with Revolutionary forces was probably as much a matter of simple political expediency and opportunism as of personal inclination. By now, however, he has become emotionally committed to the social and nationalistic objectives of the Revolution of 1944, especially to Agrarian Reform. Although probably not himself a Communist, he has found Communist leaders among his most ardent and useful supporters and values accordingly his political alliance with them. Inasmuch as Arbenz has thus far kept personal control of the considerable powers of the Guatemalan Presidency, it is still possible for him to break with the Communists and to moderate the policies of his Administration. He has shown no inclination to do so, however. As the situation in Guatemala develops the political alternatives open to him are steadily reduced.

Communist Strength and Influence

19. The Guatemala Labor (Communist) Party is estimated to have no more than 1,000 members, of whom perhaps less than one-half are militants. The Party is in open communication with international Communism through the Communist-controlled international labor organizations (the Latin American CTAL and the world-wide WFTU) and through visits made to the Soviet Bloc by individual Communists and front group delegations.

20. The Communists have achieved their present political influence in Guatemala, not as a political party competing with others, but through personal influence with the President and through the coordinated activity with individual communists within the leftist political parties and labor unions which emerged from the Revolution of 1944. This Communist infiltration of other parties and organization has been facilitated by the coincidence of avowed Communist social and "anti-imperialist" objectives with those of the Revolution. The recent legalization of the Party and its acceptance into the pro-Administration Electoral Front has not altered its basic strategy of seeking power through infiltration rather than through open political competition. Its immediate objective is not a "People's Democracy" under open and direct Communist control, but rather to neutralize Guatemala as an ally of the United States and to convert the Government into an effective, though indirectly controlled, instrument of Communism.

21. With the assistance of the Government, Communist, and Communist-influenced labor leaders have been the most successful organizers of Guatemalan labor. Their formation of the General Confederation of Guatemalan Workers (CGTG) and Government pressure for labor unity have facilitated the extension of their control over all organized labor. In the important railway workers' and teachers' unions, however, there has been some rank-and-file opposition to association with Communism. In 1952, moreover, rank-and-file defection from Communist leadership was an important factor in breaking a major strike against the United Fruit Company. The basic weakness of Guatemalan Communist labor leadership is that it is imposed from above through top control of the machinery of labor organization and cannot be sure of rank-and-file support in all circumstances.

22. Implementation of the Agrarian Reform Law has opened a new field of Communist organizational activity. The Communists are seeking to mobilize the hitherto inert mass of rural workers through the CGTG and the National Confederation of Guatemalan Peasants (CNCG), in which they exercise a strong influence.

23. Through their leadership in organized labor and their influence with the President and within the pro-Administration political parties, the Communists have gained many positions of influence within the Government: in Congress (where they dominate the Special Committees on Agrarian Reform and Labor Code Revision), in the National Electoral Board, the National Agrarian Department, the Institute of Social Security, the Labor Courts, the Ministry of Education, and the Presidential Secretariat of Propaganda, and in the official and pro-Administration press and radio. Their influence is extended by an indefinite number of Communist sympathizers in similar positions. At the same time, no Communist holds any position of Cabinet rank and the Communists appear to have made little or no effort as yet to gain control over the Police or the Army.

Anti-Communist Elements in Guatemala

24. Various elements in Guatemala, including many loyal adherents of the Revolution of 1944, view with increasing concern the rapid growth of Communist influence in that country. These elements, however, have shown little capacity to organize for effective counteraction. In general, each has tended to react only as its own peculiar interests were directly affected and all have been deterred by the success of Administration propaganda in stigmatizing any criticism as opposition to the principles of the Revolution of 1944 and support of "feudalism" and "foreign economic imperialism."

25. Aside from US private interests in Guatemala,* the large Guatemalan landholders have been the chief target of the Revolutionary program. During the Arévalo Administration the landholders failed in their attempts to alter the course of the Revolution. They now appear to be politically isolated and incapable of effective self-defense.

26. The Catholic hierarchy in Guatemala is implacably opposed to Communism, but the Church has been excluded from an active role in national affairs since the late Nineteenth Century. Moreover, the Church is handicapped by the meagerness of its resources, the small number of priests in proportion to population, the fact that most priests are aliens subject to deportation, and the lack of a program capable of competing with the Communist-led labor movement or with Agrarian Reform.

*The United Fruit Company, the International Railways of Central America, and Empresas Electricas (the principal electric light and power company). [Footnote in the source text.]

27. Urban opposition to Communism (largely confined to Guatemala City) is composed of: (a) commercial and manufacturing interests; (b) certain professional groups; (c) university students; (d) moderate labor elements; and (e) the market women of Guatemala City. This urban opposition is strongly anti-Communist, but it is also strongly nationalistic. In particular, it resents the predominance of US private economic interests in Guatemalan life. So far the Arbenz Administration has treated Guatemalan urban economic interests with consideration, has supported them against foreign competition, and has made no sustained effort to break their strong political position in Guatemala City.

28. The political effectiveness of the urban opposition has been hindered by the multiplicity of its elements and by conflicts of interest among them, as well as by their continuing loyalty to the stated objectives of the Revolution of 1944. Nevertheless, the opposition won the mayoral election in Guatemala City in December 1951 and even more decisively defeated the Electoral Front there in the January 1953 congressional election. The unwillingness of urban opposition groups to be identified with the landholders will remain an obstacle to the unification of all anti-Communist elements in Guatemala.

The Position of the Army and the Police (the Guardia Civil)

29. The Army (6,000 men) is the only organized element in Guatemala capable of rapidly and decisively altering the political situation. The two regiments (1,600 men) stationed in the capital city are an elite force trained under the supervision of the US Army Mission and better equipped than other units of the Guatemalan Army. The Guardia Civil (3,500 men) neither is dispersed in small detachments—it could neither defeat an Army coup nor itself overthrow the Government without Army support. All officers in the Guardia Civil are Army officers.

30. Since the Revolution of 1944 the Army and the Police have refrained from active participation in politics while supporting the constitutionally established administrations of Arévalo and Arbenz. The present Army leaders owe their personal advancement to the Revolution, and particularly to Colonel Arbenz, who was a military leader in the Revolution and Minister of Defense under Arévalo before himself becoming President. There is no reason to question their personal loyalty to Arbenz. Any possible disaffection in the Army would be likely to occur at the junior officer level. Arbenz has sought to enhance morale through pay increases, additional allowances, quarters for many field grade officers, promotions every three years, duty-free commissary privileges, and appointments to desirable government positions. Especially generous treatment has been provided for the officers of the two regiments stationed at Guatemala City, while less reliable officers have been assigned to isolated posts in the hinterland. The military units outside of Guatemala City have little potential for effective revolutionary action because of their dispersion and isolation, the inferiority of their equipment and training, and the watchful supervision of trusted area commanders. The rank-and-file of the Army is conscripted and is susceptible to the same political appeals which the regime addresses to the mass of the population. There is little or no Communist penetration or influence in the Army.

International Relations

31. Guatemalan foreign policies reflect the nationalistic and "democratic" attitudes associated with the Revolution of 1944. Although they have not been systematically antagonistic toward the United States, Guatemala has frequently taken occasion to demonstrate its independence of US leadership and in general has been less cooperative than could be desired, particularly in Hemispheric affairs. Moreover, the regime has systematically been hostile toward US private economic interests in Guatemala (the United Fruit Company, the International Railways of Central America, and Empresas Electrica). In keeping with its attitude toward "colonialism," it has given tacit support to Puerto Rican nationalism. It has complicated its adherence to the Rio Treaty with reservations relating to its claim to Belize (British Honduras). It has subscribed to the principle of inter-American military cooperation, but narrowly interprets that commitment. It voted for the UN "Uniting for Peace" resolution, but has declared that it would not implement it. These attitudes are not unique in Latin America, but Guatemalan propaganda in relation to them has a strong anti-US slant. Detriment to Hemisphere solidarity has not deterred and would not deter Guatemala from any course of action suggested by its own interests.

32. Since 1944 Guatemala has supported the "democratic" elements of other Caribbean countries in their struggles against "dictatorship" and has provided material assistance to "democratic" exiles from such countries. During 1948–1950 Guatemala supported the filibustering operations of the "Caribbean Legion" against the Dominican Republic and Costa Rica. Since 1950 the Legion has ceased to be operational, largely because of the withdrawal of Guatemalan support for such operations. However, Guatemalan official progaganda, with its heavy emphasis on conflict between democracy and dictatorship and between national independence and "economic imperialism," is a disturbing factor in the Caribbean area. Moreover, the Guatemalan Government, at the least, tolerates and indirectly assists clandestine Communist subversive activities in other countries. The Guatemalan Communist Party absorbs Caribbean exiles into its local organization, particularly into its labor and front groups, and through them it maintains contact with disaffected elements in other countries, thus enhancing its capabilities as a focal point for subversive activity throughout the Caribbean area.

33. Ever since the breakup of the Central American federation in 1939 there have been periodic attempts to restore some degree of union among the five states. Guatemala, as the principal state, has usually been the leader in such efforts. In 1951 El Salvador proposed the formation of an Organization of Central American States (ODECA) with a view toward gradual economic union and eventual political union. Guatemala attempted to assume to the leadership of this movement, but El Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua, alarmed by the manifestations of Communist influence in Guatemala, showed themselves resolved to use ODECA as a means of combatting Communism. In consequence Guatemala has withdrawn from ODECA, alleging the existence of an international conspiracy to interfere in Guatemala's internal affairs. This withdrawal confirms Guatemala's isolation in Central America.[3]

34. Simultaneously with its withdrawal from ODECA Guatemala complained to the United Nations regarding this alleged foreign interference. It is notable that Guatemala bypassed the Organization of American States in addressing this complaint to the UN. It probably calculated that its charge that US private interests (i.e., the United Fruit Company and its affiliates) were responsible for a "vast conspiracy" to subvert the existing regime would enlist the support of the Soviet and Arab-Asian Blocs in addition to that of such Latin American countries as Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, and Mexico.

35. El Salvador has shown extreme sensitivity regarding the danger of an extension of Communist influence from Guatemala into El Salvador and other neighboring states; there are persistent reports that El Salvador is giving serious consideration to joint military action with Honduras and Nicaragua against Guatemala. Other Caribbean countries, particularly the Dominican Republic, Colombia, and Venezuela, have also shown concern regarding the development of Guatemala as a center of subversive influence and even of subversive operations.

Probable Future Developments

36. Implementation of the Agrarian Reform Law of 1952 will be the principal objective of the Arbenz Administration during 1953. In the process the large Guatemalan landholders and the United Fruit Company will certainly be victimized. The net internal political effect of Agrarian Reform will probably be to strengthen the Arbenz Administration. Neither the landholders nor the Fruit Company can expect sympathy from Guatemalan public opinion. Redistribution of their land will be used to mobilize the hitherto inert mass of rural workers in support of the Administration. Agrarian Reform will also afford the Communists an opportunity to extend their influence by organizing the peasants as they have organized other workers.

[3] On Apr. 4, 1953, Guatemala formally withdrew from ODECA. Foreign Ministers representing the remaining member countries (Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua), met at San José, Costa Rica, on Apr. 16, and resolved to invite Guatemala to reconsider its decision. They met again in an extraordinary session at Managua, Nicaragua, July 11–12, where they adopted resolutions condemning Communist infiltration into the countries of Central America ("Resolution of Managua"), and declaring that no action would be taken to block Guatemala's reentry into ODECA, if Guatemala expressed a desire to rejoin the organization. A translation of the text of the Resolution of Managua was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 29, dated July 21, 1953 (713.00/7–2153). Additional documentation relating to ODECA is in file 713.00.

37. Agrarian Reform has already intensified a sense of insecurity which has had a depressing effect on business activity in Guatemala. As regards agricultural production its immediate effects are likely to be negligible: as presently implemented it will do little more than increase the number of subsistence farms. In the longer run it may seriously curtail the production of the Fruit Company plantations. As long as coffee prices hold up, however, the general economy of Guatemala is not likely to be vitally effected.

38. The dissatisfaction of important urban elements will probably increase, but effective political unity among these elements is not likely to be achieved. The political union of rural and urban interests in opposition to the Arbenz Administration is even less likely. No group or foreseeable combination of groups is likely to be able to bring about any significant moderation of the Administration's policy by political action. No revolutionary attempt opposed by the Army can be expected to succeed.

39. The Army could effect a rapid and decisive change in the Guatemalan political situation if it were to take concerted action. Although a quick change of attitude is always possible, there is no present reason to doubt the continued loyalty of the Army high command and of most of the Army to President Arbenz. The Army could not be expected to take revolutionary action unless its leaders became convinced that their personal security and well-being were threatened by Communist infiltration and domination of the Government, or unless the policies of the Government were to result in extreme social disorder and economic collapse.

40. As long as President Arbenz remains in power† the Arbenz-Communist alliance will probably continue to dominate Guatemalan politics. Any increase in political tension in Guatemala would tend to increase Arbenz' political dependence on this alliance.

41. The Governments of El Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua will continue to seek means to oppose the Communistic tendencies of Guatemala, and will give serious consideration to the possibility of effecting a political change in Guatemala through clandestine support of revolutionary activities. It is highly unlikely, however, that they would undertake an open military intervention in Guatemala or actually could organize an effective operation of that character in view of the limited strength of their armed forces, the proportion of that strength required for the maintenance of their own internal security, the fact that their forces are ill-equipped and untrained for field operations, the (for them) probably insuperable logistical obstacles to an open invasion of Guatemala, and the internal and international political difficulties which would ensue. Moreover, foreign military intervention would tend to cause all factions in Guatemala to unite to repel the invasion. So long as it remains united, the Guatemalan Army could defeat any force which El Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua were capable of deploying against it. In the event of such an invasion Guatemala could present a clear case of foreign intervention to the Organization of American States.

42. The Guatemalan Government will probably continue to assist Communist subversive activities in the Caribbean area, but will probably avoid involvement in military operations like those of the Caribbean Legion in 1948–1951. To counterbalance its isolation in Central America it will continue to seek political support elsewhere, particularly in the United Nations. If Latin American attitudes, as revealed at the UN, justify such a course, it will probably raise the same issue of foreign interference in the Organization of American States. It would certainly seek to invoke the Rio Treaty as well as the UN Charter if it were to be invaded by its neighbors.

43. Guatemala's tolerance of Communism and hospitality toward exiles makes it available as a convenient haven for Communist fugitives from the United States.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 21, 1953.

Subject: Relations with Guatemala

I. Communist Infiltration

1. The trend toward increased communist strength is uninterrupted. A gigantic May Day celebration was used as a Commie display of strength, and the Communist labor leader Gutierrez made a rabid speech threatening the opposition with destruction. President Arbenz attended this rally, also made a speech (denying that Guatemala is Communistic) and warmly embraced Gutierrez. The Administration seized upon the ill-planned and abortive uprising at Salamá on March 29 to make a prolonged tirade on the "vast international conspiracy against Guatemala" and to intimidate the anti-communist opposition, jailing most of the active leaders it could lay hands on.

2. Nothing is yet known to verify the alleged asylum in Guatemala of the two bail-jumping U.S. Communists, Winston and Green, who were convicted with eleven other top Communists of Smith Act violation. When the charge was made by the INS correspondent, Stanley Ross, last March (on information given him by Trujillo), Foreign Minister Osegueda announced an investigation would be made, but nothing further has been reported, either on the investigation or verifying that Winston and Green are in Guatemala. (The Subcommittee inquired about this report in March.)

3. The Guatemalan Congress stood in silence in memory of Joseph Stalin, the only government body in the Western Hemisphere to do so. The Guatemalan labor federation is angling to affiliate with WFTU and CTAL. The official and semi-official press continues pro-communist.

II. International Relations

1. Guatemala on April 1 withdrew from the ODECA charging threat to its sovereignty from the attitude of the four other members, and also complained to the United Nations. Among its charges is a re-hash of old stuff about former Ambassador Patterson and Spruille Braden. Salvador and Nicaragua replied to the Guatemalan charges directly and sent copies to the UN. We decided to ignore the charges, as Guatemala, at least in the UN, was engaged solely in a propaganda maneuver.

2. ODECA continued on at San Jose in a special meeting on April 16, without Guatemala, but the door was left open for Guatemala to come in at any time. The next formal meeting of ODECA is scheduled to be held in Nicaragua but the date is not yet fixed. There is no sign that Guatemala will reconsider its decision to leave ODECA.

III. American Interests Under Attack

1. The United Fruit Company remains a prime target of the leftist Government coalition. The seizure of three-fourths of the Fruit Company's land on the Pacific side, under the Agrarian Law, has been finalized. We have notified the Guatemalan Ambassador that we will wish to discuss this in the normal representation of American interests, in order that prompt, adequate and effective compensation may be made. No reply has been received. The Fruit Company will ask the Department to present a claim for the value of its seized holdings but it has not yet referred this claim to the Department for action.

2. International Railways of Central America is also under recurring attack. An embargo was placed on its property about two months ago on a tax claim of $3.5 million but was later withdrawn, since the tax case is before the courts.

3. The Electric Light and Power Company, a wholly owned American and Foreign Power subsidiary, is under threat from two sources:

first, hydroelectric power development by the Guatemalan Government which would take water from the river supplying two of the company's plants; and second, revision of its concession contracts as a result of action by a Congressional committee dominated by Communists. This American company has notified the Department that in spite of all its efforts to come to an agreement with the Guatemalan Government it regards its future outlook as very pessimistic.

IV. Our Policy

1. For three years we have steadfastly maintained a policy of withholding favors from the Guatemalan Government and we will continue to do so as long as its toleration and encouragement of Communism continue. At the same time, we have not given in to various pressures for direct intervention, which would be in violation of our fundamental Latin American policy and solemn treaty commitments. At present, we encourage Central American nations to stand up to Guatemalan infiltration, with the ultimate purpose of bringing the Guatemalan situation before the OAS.

2. As an important prop to anti-communist Central American nations, we are presently seeking authorization from the Pentagon to include El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua in hemispheric defense plans, so that military assistance pacts may be negotiated with them, which would give them arms and material support and at the same time might bring home to the Guatemalan military the further disadvantages of non-cooperation with the U.S. Both Nicaragua and El Salvador are definitely interested, and Honduras might possibly be interested if the other two signed first.

We are also negotiating military mission agreements with Nicaragua and El Salvador, and facilitating the latter to purchase arms in the U.S.

3. We believe that the Guatemalan situation requires most delicate and patient handling and that the dangers to our interests from inadvisable action should be fully weighed against any immediate lure to dispose of the problem abruptly.

Draft Policy Paper Prepared in the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs[1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON, August 19, 1953.][2]

NSC GUATEMALA

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

1. In Guatemala Communism has achieved its strongest position in Latin America, and is now well advanced on a program which threatens important American commercial enterprises in that country and may affect the stability of neighboring governments. Continuation of the present trend in Guatemala would ultimately endanger the unity of the Western Hemisphere against Soviet aggression, and the security of our strategic position in the Caribbean, including the Panama Canal.

2. Communist strength is derived from control of positions of influence and power in the labor movement, in the pro-Government political parties, and in the Government itself which, though not Communist, tolerates and encourages Communist support as useful to its own social reform program. The Communists have succeeded in identifying themselves with a nationalistic, leftist revolutionary movement that began with the overthrowing of a military dictatorship in 1944, and they have crippled their opponents by ranging the full strength of the Government's coalition against them. The Guatemalan Army, in which ultimate power resides, has displayed indifference toward growth of Communist influence.

3. The immediate Communist objective is the elimination of American economic interests, represented in Guatemala by the United Fruit Company, the International Railways of Central America, and the Guatemalan Electric Company. The loss of these enterprises would be damaging to American interests and prestige throughout Central America, and a severe setback to programs for economic development in the hemisphere through private capital investment.

4. The underlying Communist objectives in Guatemala are to prevent collaboration of that country with the United States in event of future international crisis, and to disrupt hemisphere solidarity and weaken the United States position. The Communists are not seeking open and direct control of the Guatemalan Government, at the present time, but are working to convert it into an indirectly controlled instrument of Communism.

5. Communist success in Guatemala thus far does not constitute a direct military or economic threat to the United States; but the uninterrupted trend in its favor is of serious concern to our interests and future security and requires determined study of means to reverse it.

OBJECTIVES

6. The objectives of the United States with respect to Guatemala are:

a. Prompt and effective collaboration of Guatemala with the United States in event of war or major international emergency.

b. Reversal by the Guatemalan Government of its tolerant policy toward Communist influence in the country and its present uncooperative attitude toward the United States.

c. Prevention of the spread of Communist influence from Guatemala to other countries in the hemisphere.

d. Establishment in Guatemala of favorable conditions for the conduct of business by United States interests on mutually advantageous terms.

e. Creation of conditions favorable to Guatemalan participation in hemisphere defense plans.[3]

COURSES OF ACTION

Political

7. The United States should seek to increase to the maximum the likelihood of prompt and effective collaboration by Guatemala in event of war or major international emergency by:

a. Conserving the underlying good will built up in Guatemala (as elsewhere) by our policies of non-intervention, respect for juridical equality and abnegation of a position of privilege.

We should therefore reject any action which by having the appearance of unilateral intervention in Guatemala would cause the Guatemalan people to turn against the U.S. and decline to offer their cooperation in time of emergency.

b. Pursuing the further objectives and courses of action outlined in paragraphs 8, 9, 10, and 11 below.

8. The United States should bring pressure on the Guatemalan Government to take effective action against Communist influence in the country and abandon its unfriendly attitude toward the United States by:

a. Impressing upon the Guatemalan Government at every opportunity the serious concern with which the United States views Communist influence in Guatemala, making it clear that this is the only important obstacle to cordial relations with this country. Correct diplomatic relations should be maintained with Guatemala to afford means of getting our views directly to the Government.

b. Withholding all further loans, grants and other favors from the Guatemalan Government, including U.S. cooperation in completion of the Inter-American Highway section in Guatemala.

Alternative course: Withholding of further loans, grants and other favors from the Guatemalan Government, with the possible exception of U.S. cooperation in completion of the Inter-American Highway section in Guatemala.

c. Limiting United States technical assistance in Guatemala to the present minimum operation, maintaining it only on an interim basis pending improvement in conditions in order to keep contact with influential non-Communist elements in and out of the Government.

d. Increasing isolation of the Guatemalan Government from its Central American neighbors and demonstrating more strikingly to the Guatemalan Army the advantage to be gained if the Guatemalan Government were to disengage itself from the Communists in the country by (1) seeking to conclude a military assistance agreement with Nicaragua[4] under the Latin American grant aid program; (2) giving special attention to requests from other Central American countries for the purchase of military equipment from either U.S. Government or commercial sources. The question of whether other Central American countries should be approached for the negotiation of grant aid agreements should be kept under review in the event that circumstances should prove that such agreements would contribute effectively to this course of action.

e. Refusing to sell arms and military materials to the Guatemalan Government under Sec. 408(e) of the Military Defense Assistance Act,[5] and refusing to license the export of any other arms or military materials for the Guatemalan Army and Police, so long as they are responsive to the instructions of Communist-influenced elements in the Government. Certain materials, such as blasting powder, airplane parts, etc. should be excepted from the foregoing in specific cases where denial of licenses would have unwarranted adverse effect on our interests.

f. Encouraging the ODECA to implement its resolutions[6] against Communist infiltration, but without affording the Communist-influenced Government an opportunity to unify the Guatemalan people behind it to combat a real or supposed threat to that nation's sovereignty.

g. Developing and keeping under constant review the factual record of specific evidence of Communist influence in the Government and official toleration or encouragement of international Communist activities, including attempts to subvert other American governments, in order to ensure the best possible presentation of the case for collective action through the OAS against Communists in Guatemala should it appear likely that such a move will obtain sufficient support from the other American Republics or should the Guatemalan situation be brought up in the OAS by some other government.

h. Arousing Latin American public opinion against Communist progress in Guatemala through a covert information program.

i. Intensifying United States information programs, both overt and covert, aimed at isolating Communist elements in Guatemala from the Guatemalan people and government. Maximum use should be made of Bogotá Conference Resolution XXXII, Resolution VII[7] of the Washington Foreign Ministers Meeting, and any other OAS or ODECA actions aimed at international Communist influence.

j. Lending assistance wherever prudent to the Catholic Church in its fight against Communism in Guatemala.

k. Assisting United States labor organizations to develop relations with Guatemalan non-Communist labor leaders and encouraging the growth of a non-Communist labor movement.

9. The United States should seek to prevent the spread of Communist influence from Guatemala to other countries in the hemisphere by:

a. Consulting with other Latin American governments, pursuant to existing agreements, on measures to control international movement of Communist agents.

b. Implementing any collective action undertaken through the OAS. (See paragraph 8(g) above.)

c. Strengthening Guatemala's militarily weak Central American neighbors by entering into grant aid agreements with Nicaragua and other Central American governments whose eligibility may be established, and by making arms and materials available to them under Section 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act.

10. The United States should seek establishment in Guatemala of favorable conditions for the conduct of business by United States interests on mutually advantageous terms by:

a. Continuing correct diplomatic relations with Guatemala insofar as possible, so that matters concerning protection of United States interests in Guatemala may be dealt with directly between the two Governments as occasion demands.

b. Impressing upon the Guatemalan Government the need for reasonable treatment of foreign capital in order to further the orderly economic development of the country.

c. Encouraging the three principal United States firms in Guatemala to make modifications, at the appropriate time, in their contracts with the Guatemalan Government which would be acceptable to both sides and which would eliminate some of the grounds for misunderstanding and resultant popular resentment against the companies.

d. Encouragng the principal United States companies in Guatemala to continue development of improved labor relations and public relations policies.

e. Making clear and reasonable diplomatic representations whenever United States interests in Guatemala are deprived of substantial rights to which they are entitled under international law.

[7] For text of the referenced resolution, see Proceedings of the Fourth Meeting of Consultation of Ministers of Foreign Affairs, pp. 243–244.

11. The United States should seek establishment of conditions favorable to Guatemalan participation in hemisphere defense plans by:

a. Maintaining our Military and Air Force Missions in Guatemala as long as local conditions permit, in order to maintain friendly contact with non-Communist elements in the officer corps, pre-empt the function of military adviser to the Guatemalan armed forces, and maintain the present degree of standardization of arms and training insofar as possible; also by the presence of these missions to keep the door open to a more complete standardization if and when conditions are such that authorizations for arms exports from the U.S. can be renewed.

b. Seeking to retain the good will of the officer corps, particularly through the present period when arms exports from the U.S. are not authorized, by conveying to them an understanding of the reason for such action on our part and by every other means reasonable under the special circumstances of present relations between our two countries.

Annex

STAFF STUDY

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

1. Guatemala is the northernmost and third largest of the five small republics between Mexico and Panama. It is roughly 1,000 miles south of New Orleans and 750 miles northwest of the Panama Canal. Over half of its 2,900,000 people are Indians who participate only to a limited extent in the money economy and political life of the nation. Guatemala is predominantly an agricultural country, and although well endowed by nature for producing a variety of crops, its economy is still heavily dependent on coffee.

2. In terms of its own resources and manpower, the contribution that Guatemala can make toward United States security is slight. Although useful sources of a few strategic materials might eventually be developed, present production of such products is of negligible importance to this country. In the event of war, Guatemala, as in the last conflict, could provide the United States with the site for an air base at Guatemala City, but the greater range of modern aircraft may have considerably diminished its present or future usefulness to us. The International Railways of Central America, though of possible value as a trans-isthmian route in event of destruction of the Panama Canal, is a narrow gauge (36″) line of limited capacity, easily sabotaged, and has only open roadsteads at the Pacific termini.

3. Guatemala could endanger United States security, however, were it to give refuge or aid to enemy saboteurs and propagandists, or were it to allow use of its airfields, ports and other facilities and resources by an enemy power. Sabotage to airfields and military installations would be of importance only in relation to the degree to which these are built up and used by United States forces in event of war. Sabotage against the railroads and other United States-owned commercial interests would injure the Guatemalan economy far out of proportion to the adverse effect on the United States war potential. Since Guatemala would be incapable of resisting a strong attacker, denial of Guatemalan facilities and resources to an aggressive enemy power would necessarily fall to the United States. Should the Guatemalan Government assume a hostile attitude in an emergency, the United States could secure the airport and other strategic points against its forces with a battalion or two of well-trained troops.

4. Guatemala is of special importance to the United States primarily for having provided the leading example of Communist penetration in the American Republics. This situation tests our ability to combat the eruption and spread of Communist influence in Latin America without causing serious harm to our hemisphere relations. It may be assumed that fundamental Communist objectives in Guatemala include the following: (a) to prevent collaboration between that country and the United States in time of future emergency, (b) to encourage the growth of Communism elsewhere in Latin America, and (c) to provoke the United States into action which would be contrary to our Inter-American commitments and which would injure hemispheric solidarity.

5. The principal subsidiary problem facing the United States in Guatemala concerns treatment of private United States interests. Influenced by extreme nationalists and Communists, the Guatemalan Government has begun expropriation of substantial United States-owned assets in the country, having for several years followed a policy of increasing hostility and harassment toward the principal American companies operating there. These are the United Fruit Company; the International Railways of Central America, (partially owned by the former); the Empresa Electrica de Guatemala, (owned by a subsidiary of the Electric Bond and Share Company); and Pan American Airways. All but the last named have large capital investments in Guatemala. The crippling or expulsion of these American enterprises would adversely affect the position of United States commercial interests elsewhere in the hemisphere, and would produce a number of subsidiary but troublesome local problems, such as securing just compensation for property seized.

6. Communist influence in Guatemala grew up in the aftermath of the Revolution of 1944, which brought an end to the latest of the country's many military dictatorships and replaced it with a liberal-minded administration which promised quick change. Initial popular enthusiasm for the 1944 revolutionary movement attested to the depth of discontent with the political repression, social backwardness and "economic colonialism" which had been the pattern of the past.

7. The Administrations of President Arevalo (1945–51) and President Arbenz (1951–), in frustration at the frictions caused by their own ignorant tampering with the national social and economic structure, have attempted to shift responsibility for Guatemala's difficulties to forces outside its borders. Exploiting nationalist sentiment to the utmost, they have insisted that Guatemala is the victim of a conspiracy directed by the United Fruit Company which is determined to prevent the betterment of the Guatemalan people.

8. Communists ably supported Arevalo and Arbenz in their attacks on "economic imperialists" and in their efforts to legislate sudden reform. The Communists identified themselves with every aspiration of the revolutionary administrations. Toleration of Communist activity which characterized the early years of the Arevalo administration developed into an effective working alliance between the Communists and Arbenz.

9. Key to present political tensions in Guatemala is the Agrarian Reform Law, enacted in mid-1952 and described by President Arbenz as the most important measure of the Revolution. This law provides for the expropriation of large tracts of unused land and their distribution to the peasants. Although presented as a long-overdue measure of social and economic reform, the law has strong political motivation and significance. Its drastic provisions are designed to produce social upheaval rather than to execute any economic plan. Communists and fellow travelers instantly seized the opportunity afforded them by the Administration's proposal to institute agarian reform. They played a leading part in the preparation and enactment of the agrarian law. They have infiltrated the National Agrarian Department established to administer it, and have incited disorderly peasant seizures of privately owned lands. The Agrarian Reform Law is being used to attack the United Fruit Company, to destroy the political effectiveness of the large landholders, and to mobilize the hitherto politically inert peasantry in support of the regime.

10. Militant Communists in Guatemala are estimated at a few hundred. Of these perhaps two or three dozen are dangerous leaders or agitators. Almost without exception they are indigenous to the area and are Mexico-trained rather than Moscow-trained, although some have visited the Soviet orbit and may have received brief instruction there.

dinated activity of individual Communists within the leftist political parties and labor unions which emerged from the Revolution of 1944.

12. With the assistance of the Government, Communist and Communist-influenced labor leaders have been the most successful organizers of Guatemalan labor. Their formation of the General Confederation of Guatemalan Workers (CGTG) and Government pressure for labor unity have facilitated the extension of their control over all organized labor. The Communists are seeking to mobilize the mass of rural workers through the CGTG and the National Confederation of Guatemalan Peasants (CNCG), in which they exercise a strong influence. The basic weakness of Guatemalan Communist labor leadership is that it is imposed from above through top control of the machinery or labor organization and cannot be sure of rank and file support.

13. Through their leadership in organized labor and their influence with the President and within the pro-Administration political parties, the Communists have gained many positions of influence within the Government: In Congress (where they dominate the Special Committees on Agrarian Reform and Labor Code Revision), in the National Electoral Board, the National Agrarian Department, the Institute of Social Security, the Labor Courts, the Ministry of Education, and the Presidential Secretariat of Propaganda, and in the official and pro-Administration press and radio. Their influence is extended by an indefinite number of Communist sympathizers in similar positions. At the same time, no Communist holds any position of Cabinet rank and the Communists appear to have made little or no effort as yet to infiltrate the Police or Army.

14. Opposition to the Arbenz regime is disorganized and ineffective. There is no likelihood it could alter the course of the Government by political action. It could not succeed in a revolutionary attempt opposed by the Army.

15. The Governments of El Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua are fearful that the trend in Guatemala will lead to Communist subversion and social upheaval in their territories. They are probably giving serious consideration to clandestine support of revolutionary action in Guatemala. It is highly unlikely, however, that they would or could mount an open military intervention against Guatemala. The Guatemalan Army could probably defeat any force which they could deploy against it.

16. The Army is the only organized element in Guatemala capable of rapidly and decisively altering the political situation. There is no reason to doubt that President Arbenz still has the loyalty of the Army, which has taken its lead from him and thus far refused to concern itself over the growth of Communist influence in political life.

17. It is possible that President Arbenz thinks of the Communists in Guatemala only as reformers and useful allies rather than as Soviet agents. Since he has no support of consequence from any propertied interests other than those created by the Revolution, he is probably unwilling to repudiate the Communists and risk the loss of much of his organized political backing. Therefore, even though Arbenz still exercises personal control of the Administration, the Army and the Police, and could break his ties with the Communists and moderate the policies of the Government, it is not likely that he will voluntarily do so under present conditions.

18. In addition, Arbenz and other Government leaders, as officials of a small country near the United States who feel some resentment against it for one reason or another, may tend to find satisfaction in deliberately affronting the United States by showing friendliness to Communist leaders and in observing the attention aroused by their attitude. In any event, Guatemala's protestations of friendship with the United States have thus far been given against a background of official Guatemalan encouragement to Communist activity.

19. On the other hand, there are certain factors which would impel most Guatemalans, possibly including President Arbenz and other non-Communist Government officials, to identify Guatemala's ultimate interests with those of the United States rather than the USSR and to desire to cooperate with the United States in controlling enemy saboteurs and propagandists in event of war or major international crisis. These factors are: (1) Guatemala's western cultural and political orientation; (2) Guatemala's proximity to and economic dependence on the United States; and (3) the fact that the United States has built up in the American Republics, especially in the Caribbean area, a great reservoir of fundamental good will through our policies of non-intervention, respect for juridical equality and abnegation of a position of privilege.

20. Notwithstanding the disturbing amount of Communist influence in Guatemala, its Government still votes with the free world on most of the substantive issues between it and the Soviet bloc. There are certain other small signs of its continued willingness to remain in our camp, such as the fact that our Military and Air Missions are still operating in Guatemala.

21. Nevertheless, any likelihood of voluntary cooperation by the Arbenz Government with the United States in a future crisis would vanish (a) if the Communists in the Administration should overpower it completely, or (b) if President Arbenz should meanwhile conclude that all means of reaching an understanding with the United States were closed, and commit himself to a policy of frank hostility toward this country.

22. Our present position in Guatemala is progressively deteriorating. Politically, Communist strength grows, while opposition forces are disintegrating; economically, American enterprises suffer continuous whittling away of their properties and contractual rights, while our remonstrances are rejected. Ultimate Communist control of the country and elimination of American economic interests is the logical outcome, and unless the trend is reversed, is merely a question of time. In seeking means to reverse this trend, we must consider:

a. A policy of non-action would be suicidal, since the Communist movement, under Moscow tutelage, will not falter nor abandon its goals.

b. Ineffective defense of American enterprises will be followed by similar attacks on these same companies in neighboring countries, and subsequently on other U.S.-owned industries in other Latin American countries.

c. A solution of the Guatemalan problem by means repugnant to the rest of Latin America might cost more than it would be worth, as it could create a larger problem with the hemisphere than we would have ended with one country.

d. Any solution will depend on our action, since other American republics have neither the capacity nor decision to act.

ALTERNATE LINES OF POLICY

23. The United States could follow one of four general lines of policy with respect to Guatemala:

a. Policy of direct intervention. Militarily, Guatemala would be defenseless against direct United States action. Imposition of unilateral economic sanctions, if mechanism to enforce them were made available, would at least cause a drastic and no doubt painful shift in the flow of Guatemala's trade, since the United States takes 85 percent of Guatemala's exports and supplies 60 percent of its imports. However, the use of direct military or economic sanctions on Guatemala would violate solemn United States commitments and under present circumstances would endanger the entire fund of good will the United States has built up in the other American Republics through its policies of non-intervention, respect for juridical equality, and abnegation of a position of privilege. Loss of this good will would be a disaster to the United States far outweighing the advantage of any success gained in Guatemala.

b. Policy of covert intervention. Our secret stimulation and material support of the overthrow of the Arbenz Government would subject us to serious hazards. Experience has shown that no such operation could be carried on secretly without great risk of its leadership and backers being fully known. Were it to become evident that the United States has tried a Czechoslovakia in reverse in Guatemala, the effects on our relations in this hemisphere, and probably in the world at large, could be as disastrous as those produced by open intervention.

c. A policy of inaction. The United States could allow events to take their course in Guatemala in the hope that the problem will solve itself, possibly along the lines of the Mexican Revolution, which also had Communist backing for land "reform" and foreign expropriation. This is obviously a false hope in the existing context of world affairs, and disregards both the importance of Communist penetration and the certainty that the United States must aggressively lead the fight against it wherever it appears in the hemisphere.

d. Policy of firm persuasion. As long as the Government of Guatemala cooperates with the Communists we should decline to cooperate with it. The United States should adopt courses of action which will oblige the Guatemalan Government to see for itself that its persistence in favoring the Communists will lead the country to ruin; and which will induce it to recognize the advantages of cooperating with the United States. In exploiting all the possibilities of this policy we should endeavor in all appropriate ways to bring the pressure of Latin American public opinion to bear upon the Guatemalan Government and people; we should encourage ODECA in its moves aimed at the Communists in Guatemala; and, if and when it occurs that a case has been developed which will command support from a majority of the OAS, we should initiate or support OAS action against Guatemala. If direct unilateral action should become necessary in a future emergency, the Arbenz regime could easily and quickly be overthrown possibly with less Latin American opposition than we would encounter under present conditions, and very possibly with Latin American support. Meanwhile, we must recognize realistically that our present policy of firm persuasion, though avoiding an outright break with the Guatemalan Government, has not deterred it from its stated course.

24. Although Arbenz is sensitive to pressure exerted by the United States, he will resist it without regard to practical consequences wherever he believes he can gain political advantage by so doing. This makes execution of our policies a delicate and dangerous matter.

25. We have frankly discussed the Communist problem with high Guatemalan officials in Washington and in Guatemala. They have brushed aside our views on Communist influence in the country as exaggerated. They have described the Communist issue as a false one fabricated by the United Fruit Company. We must continue, however, in the effort to dispel the illusions of anyone in the Guatemalan Government who believes the Government's official version.

26. We have for some time withheld virtually all cooperative assistance from Guatemala. The exceptions have been a reduced Technical Assistance Mission (engaged in three small projects begun during World War II) which we have desired to maintain at a minimum level as a toe-hold pending improvement in political conditions; and our military and Air Force Training Missions, which we have desired to keep friendly United States contact with the politically important officer corps.

27. The withholding of other favors has proven effective in demonstrating to the Guatemalan Government the seriousness with which we view its cooperation with Communism, and the policy should be continued. However, consideration should be given the alternatives of withholding or granting our cooperative assistance in completion of the Guatemalan sector of the Inter-American Highway.

28. Guatemala has formally offered to enter into an agreement with the United States for the continued cooperative construction of its sector of the Inter-American Highway, making all of the assurances required by law for the expenditure of United States funds. We have already made such agreements with El Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Panama. On the one hand, our refusal to resume cooperation with Guatemala on the Highway will constitute the most forceful measure available to us under the policy of withholding favors, as it is the one most urgently desired by Guatemala. On the other hand, it would be in our interests to conclude a cooperative agreement with Guatemala for construction of the Highway, for the following reasons:

(1) It is the only means of insuring that the as-yet-unconstructed 25-mile gap immediately adjacent to Mexico will not become a serious bottleneck for the entire Central American portion of the Highway. Guatemala will sooner or later attempt to build this section itself if we fail to enter into the agreement, and will probably exercise its consequent freedom to place on it the special tolls or other restrictions which would be expressly forbidden under the terms of the agreement.

(2) It would open Guatemala and the rest of Central America to Inter-American Highway traffic which is now unable to pass beyond the Mexico–Guatemala border because of the gap on the Guatemalan side. This would stimulate extensive tourist travel and commercial movement on the Highway between the United States and Guatemala and would to that extent increase beneficial United States influence in Guatemala.

29. Careful study should be given the concluding of Military Defense Assistance Pacts with El Salvador, Nicaragua, and Honduras.[8] Exclusion of Guatemala would have the practical effect of emphasizing to the Guatemalan Army the disadvantage to it caused by the Government's friendliness toward Communism. To be weighed against this is the risk that conclusion of the pacts might stir nationalist feeling in Guatemala and strengthen rather than diminish Army support of the Arbenz regime. An additional difficulty is the apparent disinclination of El Salvador and Honduras to conclude such agreements. A pact with Nicaragua should be pushed as a first step toward bracing Guatemala's neighbors with our military support.

[8]On May 20, 1954, the United States and Honduras signed at Tegucigalpa a Military Assistance Agreement, which entered into force on the same date; for text, see 5 UST 843, or TIAS No. 2975. See Mr. Murphy's letter to Assistant Secretary of Defense Hensel, Aug. 10, 1954, p. 1311.

30. Pending the conclusion of Military Defense Assistance Pacts which would enable the United States to give military grant-aid to El Salvador, Nicaragua, and Honduras, we should make arms and materials available to them by direct purchase under Sec. 408(e) of the Military Defense Assistance Act, in order to help strengthen those militarily weak governments against Communist subversion and pressure from Guatemala.

31. The United States should continue to refuse to sell arms and materials to Guatemala under Sec. 408(e) of the Military Defense Assistance Act, and to continue to deny export licenses for other arms and materials sought in this country for the Guatemalan Armed Forces. This policy should be enforced so long as they are loyal to the Communist-influenced central authority and hence likely to employ their weapons against anti-Communists. It is recognized that the withholding of arms will necessarily impede the functions of the United States Military and Air Force Missions in Guatemala. We should consider occasional approval of export licenses for materials other than military arms and ammunition should it appear in specific cases to be in our interest to do so.

32. An arraignment of Communist penetration in Guatemala and from Guatemala to other American Republics should be prepared for use in the event that OAS action appears feasible and practicable. The United States should assist by developing a factual case record of specific evidence of (1) Communist influence in the Government; (2) encouragement or toleration by the Government of Communist elements who are acting or appear to be acting under Kremlin directives, and (3) encouragement or toleration by the Government of attempts at subversion of any other American Government. This case record should be kept under constant review in order to determine whether or when its nature is such that its presentation in the OAS would gain sufficient support from the other American Republics to assure that collective inter-American action will be taken to achieve the elimination or marked diminution of Communist influence in Guatemala.

33. Many of the difficulties encountered by United States commercial interests in Guatemala are the direct work of Communists, but certain problems would remain even after elimination of their influence. Deep-rooted nationalist feeling will remain an obstacle to the solution of some of the principal ones. We should encourage the United Fruit Company, the IRCA, and the Empresa Electrica to negotiate with the Guatemalan Government, whenever that Government is disposed to enter such negotiations in good faith, with a view to revising their concession contracts in such a way as to diminish nationalist prejudices against the companies and at the same time obtain from the Government satisfactory assurances of reasonable treatment of the companies.

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, October 29, 1953.

Subject: Debriefing of Ambassador Rudolf E. Schoenfeld, October 28, 1953

Of the various comments made by Ambassador Schoenfeld on the communist situation in Guatemala, the following are most relevant to OCB interests:

1. The communist power-drive in Guatemala has reached an advanced state of infiltration, they hold key positions in (a) the agrarian movement, (b) the labor movement, (c) government administration short of cabinet level.

2. President Arbenz, who is half Swiss, has a granite streak of stubbornness in addition to his volatility and firmly convinced that he can deal with the communists whenever he has to. This optimism is not shared by Ambassador Schoenfeld, who feels that Arbenz has not even begun to appreciate the real purposes and techniques of communism as a power-seeking movement, not a social reform.

3. On the anti-communist side, there are very few positions of strength. The church is extremely weak, all of its property having been confiscated, and a strong anti-clerical attitude exists. The intellectuals are either bemused by the appeals of communism, or are hypersensitive to the U.S. The land-owners are strictly apolitical and will not permit themselves, or their sons, to engage in political activity. They feel that Guatemalan politics has three unattractive destinations: the palace, the jail, or the cemetery. The independent press, however, is very alert to the communist danger.

4. Guatemala represents in miniature all of the social cleavages, tensions, and dilemmas of modern Western society under attack by the communist virus. Conditions will worsen considerably before we can improve them, and we should regard Guatemala as a prototype area for testing means and methods of combatting communism.

5. It will be of primary importance for U.S. labor organizations to encourage the growth of free trade unions in Guatemala, for U.S. corporations to adopt enlightened labor policy in the area, and for the U.S. Government to develop information activities along non-attributable lines.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 25, 1953.

Subject: Guatemalan Coffee

Participants: Mr. Jim O'Connor, President, National Coffee Association
Mr. R. A. Medina, R. A. Medina Co.
Mr. Phil Nelson, Ruffner, McDonnell & Burch, Inc.
Mr. Harry H. Allen, Vice President, Otis McAllister Coffee Corp.
Mr. John F. McKiernan, Executive Vice President, National Coffee Association
Mr. Cabot, ARA
Mr. Cale, AR

Mr. Cabot pointed out that the Department is faced with a very difficult problem as a result of communist influence within Guatemala. He said that in considering possible courses of action to meet the situation the question of economic sanctions has to be considered. In this connection, coffee, which supplies some 80 per cent of the Guatemalan foreign exchange, is obviously the most important single individual commodity on which action might be taken.

Mr. Cabot stated that he wished members of the group to understand that they had been invited to Washington not because any immediate action involving coffee is now contemplated but because he wishes to have the benefit of the advice of the representatives of the coffee trade in connection with our consideration of possible action.[1]

Mr. O'Connor pointed out that the companies of Messrs. Medina, Nelson and Allen do the major part of the import business in Guatemalan coffee and that they are accordingly in an excellent position to advise the Department on the matter.

Mr. Cabot stated that the Department would like to have the group's views as to the feasibility and mechanics of a Government embargo against or an industry boycott of Guatemalan coffee.

At Mr. O'Connor's suggestion, Mr. Medina spoke first for the coffee representatives. He said that the group had had an opportunity to discuss the question in a preliminary fashion but that they had not considered the possibility of an industry boycott in the absence of action by the Government. Mr. Medina then called attention to the following considerations:

[1] A previous conversation relating to possible action against Guatemala involving coffee took place at the Department of State on Feb. 27, 1952, between Mr. Mann, Mr. Cale, Mr. Siracusa, and a representative of the National Coffee Association; a memorandum of that conversation, by Mr. Siracusa, dated Feb. 27, 1952, not printed, is in file 814.2333/2–2752.

1. That it is often impossible to distinguish between Guatemalan coffee and coffee grown in nearby countries such as Mexico and El Salvador. Under these conditions, even if the United States Government should embargo Guatemalan coffee, it would be likely to find its way into this country through Mexico, El Salvador and other Latin American countries.

2. That American coffee importers, at any time, have large investments in coffee in Guatemala. Accordingly, an embargo on Guatemalan coffee would subject such importers to considerable financial loss.

To Mr. Cale's inquiry whether it would be possible for the importers to avoid this loss, if they were informed several months in advance of the contemplated action, Mr. Medina stated that prior notice would be helpful. He pointed out, however, that the helpfulness of the notice would depend not only on the period of the notice but on the time of the embargo. Mr. Allen called attention to the fact that his company and certain other coffee importers advance rather large sums of money early during a crop year to finance the production and harvesting of the crop. The crop year in Guatemala, he said, begins around October 1st. If the Government were contemplating action, he said that June 1, with several months of advance notice, would probably be as good from the point of view of timing as any other date.

Mr. O'Connor pointed out, however, that, in view of the present tight market situation, such a date would be about as unfavorable as any that could be chosen from the viewpoint of its effect on price, since there is very little coffee available for sale and shipment during this period. It was Mr. O'Connor's estimate that excluding the 800,000 bags of Guatemalan coffee which we normally import, if such exclusion were possible, would probably raise the price of all coffee to the United States consumer by as much as 10 cents per pound.

Mr. Allen called attention to another adverse effect of embargoing Guatemalan coffee, namely, the fact that it would force the Guatemalan Government to become much more involved in the coffee trade than it is at present. This, he said, he regarded as contrary to the long-run interests of the United States coffee industry.

Mr. Cale then inquired whether it would be possible for this Government to take action only against coffee now grown on the Government's lands, which amounts to some 15 per cent of the total Guatemalan production. The group was of the opinion that even if United States importers did not buy coffee produced on these lands at the auctions at which it is now sold, such coffee would nevertheless find its way into the United States. They pointed out that this coffee is sold before it is fully processed and that there is no way of maintaining its identity.

Mr. Nelson referred to the fact that Mr. Cabot had spoken of a possible boycott on the part of the coffee trade. He expressed the view that this would simply not work, since the coffee business is highly competitive and since, in the unlikely event that all the present members of the coffee trade would cooperate, fly-by-night operators would appear to handle this part of the business. Mr. Nelson also called attention to the fact that even if Guatemalan coffee were excluded from this market, it would very probably be sold in Europe. Mr. O'Connor added that in this event it might very well end up in the United States. He pointed out in this connection that a considerable volume of Brazilian coffee is now being imported into the United States via Europe.

Mr. Nelson also expressed the belief that embargoing Guatemalan coffee would have a very adverse effect on our relations with the Latin American countries generally, since they are very sensitive to economic pressure of any kind by the United States.

Mr. Allen supported Mr. Nelson's views in this regard, pointing out that there are very close family relationships throughout the Cental American area and that these would tend to heighten the reaction against the United States.

Mr. Cabot inquired as to the feasibility of levying an import tax on Guatemalan coffee. Representatives of the group said that this would be very dangerous since it might set a precedent for an import tax on coffee from other countries as well. They pointed out that there have been numerous proposals in the past for taxing the importation of coffee, all of which have so far been successfully resisted. They indicated, however, that the coffee trade, to a man, was fearful that an import tax on coffee might some day become a reality. They stated that this would, of course, be harmful to the coffee importers and roasters in this country as well as to the coffee producers in Latin America.

Mr. Cale inquired what the group's views would be as to the feasibility of requiring that the consumer be informed whenever he buys Guatemalan coffee. Mr. O'Connor said that coffee purchased by the consumer is generally a mixture of several types and that all coffee would have to be labelled in order to show the consumer the proportion of Guatemalan coffee. He stated that this would greatly hamper the operations of the coffee roasters who change their blends often in accordance with availabilities of various types of coffee.

Mr. McKiernan pointed out, in addition, that the net effect of such a requirement might be to reduce coffee consumption generally. He feared, he said, that any action to get the American public to consume less Guatemalan coffee would result in a decline of consumption of all coffee.

Mr. Cabot thanked the representatives of the coffee industry for giving the Department the benefit of their views. They expressed their pleasure in being able to do so and stated that they regretted that they were not able to make any suggestion which they considered feasible whereby coffee might be used as a means of improving the situation in Guatemala, which they recognize as very serious.[2]

[2] On Feb. 8, 1954, Senator Margaret Chase Smith (R.–Maine) introduced Senate Resolution 211, calling upon the President, inter alia, to take the necessary steps to institute an embargo against the importation of Guatemalan coffee into the United States; for text, see Congressional Record, 83d Cong., 2d sess., vol. 100 (pt. 2), p. 1475. Department of State files indicate that representatives of the Department advised Congress against taking such action.

SECRET GUATEMALA CITY, December 17, 1953—7 p.m.

154. President and Mrs. Arbenz[2] entertained my wife and me privately at dinner last night and we had a frank six hour discussion of the Communist problem here lasting until two this morning. President showed depth of his feeling against United Fruit Company and his admiration for Guatemala's Communist leaders, leaving no doubt he intended to continue to collaborate with them.

I opened conversation by telling President I was interested in seeing what I could do to improve relations and asked if he had any suggestions. He began by saying problem here is one between United Fruit Company and his government. He spoke at length and bitterly on Fruit Company's history since 1904, complaining especially that now his Government has a $70 million budget to meet and collects only $150,000 in taxes.

I interrupted here to say I thought we should put first things first, that as long as Communists exerted their present influence in Guatemalan Government I did not see real hope of better relations.

President then answered that there were some Communists in his Government and that [they] had certain amount of influence, but they were "local." He described his friendship with Victor Manuel Gutierrez, Communist secretary general of country's only national labor federation, and Jose Manuel Fortuny, head of Guatemala Communist Party.

[1] John E. Peurifoy was appointed Ambassador to Guatemala on Oct. 5, 1953; he arrived in Guatemala City on Oct. 29, and presented his credentials on Nov. 4.
[2] María Cristina Vilanova de Arbenz Guzmán.

They were both "honest" and followed Guatemalan not Soviet interests. They went to Moscow (Fortuny is on trip there now) merely to study Marxism, not necessarily to get instructions.

I asked by name about several Communists and Communist suspects in National Agrarian Department, directorate general of Radio Broadcasting and Guatemala Institute of Social Security. Before translating, Mrs. Arbenz started in each case to deny twenty were Communists, but three times President contradicted her saying he was sure they were. I asked whether Government adverting [advertising?] helped support Communist Tribuna Popular and after Mrs. Arbenz again started to deny, President admitted that it did. Also asked about Guatemalan Congressional memorial observances for Stalin's death and Mrs. Arbenz explanation was Guatemalan people regarded Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin as saviors of world. Communists presented no threat and his government was in full control.

Touching on the Caracas conference,[3] I told President that since he has said Communists were of no consequence in Guatemala, I found it strange Guatemala had cast its vote against inclusion of the item on Communist infiltration on agenda. He said that this was interference in internal affairs, that they did not want outsiders coming in to investigate their country. I told him this was not a question of investigating, but discussing means and methods of combatting a godless ideology, but he reiterated views that Communism was not a threat. President took up agrarian reform, saying there had been much opposition from American circles and others in the country. I told him we had worked and were working with countries who had introduced land reform, citing my experience in Greece[4] and present situation in Bolivia. I said the difference seemed to lie in the administration, not in principle of assisting poor people to obtain land. I pointed out the explanation was perhaps in fact that National Agrarian Department was dominated by Communists. I said I was sorry he had had no concrete proposals to make to improve our relations. He then reverted to Fruit Company and said this was the stumbling block: It was a large American organization which dominated press in US. I explained Fruit Company was relatively small by US standards and no corporation as far as I knew dominated any of US press whose Guatemalan reports were based by on-the-spot investigation. At one point President stated if there were a choice, it would be for Guatemala to live under Communist domination than live for fifty years with Fruit Company.

Foregoing took place in atmosphere of frank and polite exchange of views, and on leaving I told President I was disappointed because we had not accomplished anything. He said after I had become familiar with country, I would probably come around to his way of thinking. I told him I did not believe anything would make me convert to Communism and feared situation would get worse because Americans had given blood and paid high taxes and would continue to do so as long as Communism threatened free nations. President ended by giving me private phone numbers, saying I should get in touch with him whenever I wanted without going through Foreign Office.

I came away definitely convinced that if President is not a Communist he will certainly do until one comes along, and that normal approaches will not work in Guatemala. I am now assessing situation in this light and expect to submit recommendations in a few days.

163. As a result my interview with President Arbenz (mytel 154 December 17),[1] I am convinced Communists will continue gain strength here as long as he remains in office. My staff agrees fully on this. Therefore, in view of inadequacy of normal diplomatic procedures in dealing with situation, there appears no alternative to our taking steps which would tend to make more difficult continuation of his regime in Guatemala. In present telegram, I shall deal with measures which, while they may not in themselves prove sufficient to produce political change here, are designed to contribute to creating climate favorable to such change.

Before Caracas conference, we should concentrate on preparing other well-disposed governments in Latin America for supporting our anti-Communist resolution[2] and on publicizing abroad through press channels Communist developments in this country. At same time we should carefully avoid any overt acts to which Guatemalan delegates at conference could point as evidence of persecution of Guatemala or intervention in its affairs. We should also avoid emphasis on fruit company problems since these might cause confusion among Latin American delegates as to true nature of our differences with Guatemala. We should at same time step up locally . . . anti-Communist propaganda. . . . Krieg referred to this matter in letter of December 3[3] to John Fisher.

I propose that between now and time of conference we carefully work out program designed to create situation in which non-Communists whether now supporting or opposing government would feel forced to coordinate their organizations and take action against government and I suggest Department and Embassy give special attention to determination feasibility and manner and time of application of following steps as part of an overall program:

1. Withdrawal of US Army[4] and air missions from Guatemala. Effect of this announcement would be greatly heightened if made more or less simultaneously with announcements of military assistance pacts between US and neighboring Central American countries.
2. Announcement of withdrawal, effective June 30 of FOA personnel from construction of Roosevelt Hospital and from agricultural mission, not including those on Entrerios Rubber Experiment Project which is important to us.
3. Announcement of cancellation within six months of RFC's contract with UFCO for growing abaca in Guatemala.
4. Denunciation of reciprocal trade treaty[5] with Guatemala.
5. Campaign through columnists and radio commentators for voluntary refusal by American coffee importers to buy Guatemalan coffee. Even though purchases did not decrease, campaign would give local growers increased sense of urgency and stimulate their willingness to aid anti-government movement.

[4] A memorandum of conversation at the Secretary's staff meeting, held in the Secretary's office, Nov. 20, 1953, 9:15 a. m., by Director of the Executive Secretariat Scott, reads in part as follows:

"8. Guatemala

"The Under Secretary stated that he is getting a paper from Mr. Wisner today concerning CIA's recommendation as to whether or not we should remove our military mission from Guatemala. It was his own personal belief at the present time that it served no useful purpose in keeping a military mission to a government that was Communist-dominated and in which the Army was evidently loyal to that government." (Secretary's Staff Meetings, lot 63 D 75)

The Secretary of State's staff meetings were attended usually by the Under Secretary of State, the Deputy Under Secretary of State, Assistant Secretaries of State, and certain office directors. The Secretary of State presided at these meetings.

[5] Reference is to the Reciprocal Trade Agreement, signed at Guatemala City, Apr. 24, 1936, and entered into force, June 15, 1936; for text, see Department of State Executive Agreement Series (EAS) No. 92, or 49 Stat. (pt. 2) 3989.

6. Placing of impediments in way of issuance of export licenses on shipments of goods from US to Guatemala. Form of these impediments must be determined in light of attitudes shown at Caracas conference, and could range from general refusal of licenses to consistent delays in their issuance, particularly for road and port building equipment on which Guatemalan Government is especially interested.

7. Final or partial suspension gasoline shipments to Guatemala.

With these proposals as starting point for study, and without necessarily approving all of them or excluding others, Department and Embassy should be able to work out program which while flexible enough to allow for adjustments to developments at Caracas, should be concrete enough to permit its implementation promptly upon closing of conference. Program should be applied in progressive steps which would build up increasing sense of urgency among non-Communist Guatemala.

Program should be undertaken with full realization it could provoke Guatemalan Government to swing sharply to left, to assume dictatorial power, to seek to win mass support through strongly nationalistic stand, and to expropriate or take other extreme reprisals against American companies in Guatemala. Guatemalan Government could be expected to make international issue of intervention, might ask my recall or even break off diplomatic relations with United States. It is quite conceivable it would lead to considerable bloodshed.

Nevertheless, implementation some such plan should not be deterred by these possible unpleasant consequences since continuance of present regime would also lead to most of them though at a slower pace and at the convenience of the Communists.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 16, 1954.

Subject: Farewell Call on President by Guatemalan Ambassador [1]

---

[1] In a briefing memorandum for the President concerning Ambassador Toriello's visit, dated Jan. 15, 1954, Under Secretary of State Smith stated in part the following:

"Last month President Arbenz told Ambassador Peurifoy Guatemalan Communists are 'honest', follow Guatemalan not Soviet interests, and visit Moscow to study Marxism, not to get instructions. Guatemalan Communists are in fact disciplined agents of international Communism, preaching authentic Soviet-dictated doctrine and openly affiliated with numerous international Communist labor and front groups.

"We have repeatedly expressed deep concern to the Guatemalan Government because it plays the Communist game. Our relations are further disturbed because of the merciless hounding of American companies there by tax and labor demands, strikes, and, in the case of the United Fruit Company, inadequately compensated seizures of land under a Communist-administered Agrarian Reform Law." (Eisenhower Library, Eisenhower papers, Whitman file, International Series, "Guatemala")

Participants: The President
Señor Dr. Don Guillermo Toriello, Ambassador of Guatemala
Mr. John M. Cabot, Assistant Secretary

The Guatemalan Ambassador called on the President to say farewell before returning to Guatemala to become Foreign Minister.

Following an exchange of courtesies, the President made a reference to relations between the United States and Guatemala. The Ambassador seized on this to peddle to the President his oft-told tale of how Guatemala is a victim of "calumny". He said there were communists in Guatemala but they occupied only a few insignificant positions in the Government. Guatemala had always suffered from dictators but since 1944 it had had a democratic government which was undertaking much needed reforms, notably the agrarian reform.

The President said we had no wish to dominate any country. We regarded our Latin neighbors as sovereign equals, and did not try to interfere in their affairs. In consequence they had always been independent. We hated communism. The President contrasted the status of our neighbors with that of Poland and Czechoslovakia and the Baltic states. Soviet communism was the worst dictatorship the world had ever known, and we were determined to block the international communist conspiracy. We certainly had the impression that the Guatemalan Government was infiltrated with communists, and we couldn't cooperate with a Government which openly favored communists.

The Guatemalan Ambassador pleaded for greater cooperation. The armed forces had not been infiltrated, yet they couldn't get ammunition. The Guatemalan airline couldn't get a permanent contract. The effect of all this was to help the communists. If we helped the Guatemalans more, they would soon get rid of the communists.

The President said that we really couldn't help a government which was openly playing ball with communists. The people of the United States hated communism and if we helped them there would be a coup against him (this laughingly).

The Ambassador said that the real question was not that of communists in the Guatemalan Government, but of the monopolistic position of the United Fruit in the country. The Ambassador brought out a little map of Guatemala to show the United Fruit's stranglehold on ports, railways, etc. He went into his usual discreetly distorted indictment of the United Fruit and insisted that this, and not communism in the Government, was the source of the difficulties in relations between the United States and Guatemala. He also brought out two scrapbooks of anti-Guatemalan articles published in the U.S. press.

The President said that we certainly wanted no more than justice for any American companies operating in Guatemala. We would be agreeable to having an international tribunal decide what the rights of the controversy were. Moreover, we realized that contracts made many years ago were subject to revision under changing circumstances.

The Ambassador continued to harp on the line that the United Fruit, and not the the few Guatemalan communists, were the source of our difficulties in relations. Mr. Cabot interjected that avowed communists occupied key positions in the National Agrarian Department, the official press and radio, and other government agencies, and that the highest officials of the Guatemalan Government were openly supporting them and listening to their advice.

The Ambassador continued to press his argument with skill. He particularly mentioned that Sullivan & Cromwell, the Secretary of State's former firm, represented the United Fruit. The President by this point had risen to indicate the interview was ended. Mr. Cabot, thinking the Ambassador had charged that he had stock in the United Fruit, pointed out that this was untrue.

The President asked about the charges against the United Fruit. Mr. Cabot said there were certainly two sides to that question. The Ambassador said that they paid no taxes, just one cent per stem on bananas. He also mentioned that no immediate compensation had been given for the United Fruit lands seized. The President suggested that perhaps this could be settled by an international judgment, perhaps headed by a Latin American. Mr. Cabot pointed out that we had proposed action along these lines, but Guatemala considered this a matter of sovereignty.

The entire conversation, which lasted half an hour, was in personally friendly terms. The Ambassador presented his case very persuasively—with skillful emphasis and suppression. The President made a very able and convincing exposition of our thesis that the issue is communism in the Guatemalan Government, not the United Fruit question, and that the latter can be decided by international decision.

Memorandum by John W. Fisher of the Office of Middle American Affairs to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 19, 1954.

Subject: Briefing on Guatemala

The attached National Intelligence Estimate on Probable Developments in Guatemala[1] was approved eleven months ago. Events occurring in the interim have tended to confirm the validity of the conclusions presented in the paper as they relate to future developments in that country.

During the past year, Communist strength and influence in Guatemala has continued to grow without effective opposition. Party membership is now estimated at between 2,000 and 3,000. Communist leaders have strengthened their control over organized labor, causing destruction of a fledgling anti-Communist labor group and drawing the large Communist-influenced peasant federation closer to the Communist-run labor federation. They continue to be ascendant in the Administration political coalition, supplying four of the ten party delegates who regularly advise Arbenz on national policy. The other six delegates either support or tolerate the Communists. (The Cabinet, which Government propagandists frequently claim contains no Communists, has an insignificant role in policy making.) Arbenz defended the Guatemalan Communists so strongly in his March 1 speech to the Congress that his alliance with them appears irrevocable, so far as he is concerned. The predominant influence of the Communists in Agrarian Reform, the central program of the Administration, has further increased their political strength and laid the basis for development of a Communist-led peasant faction, inured to violence, which could give persistent trouble to any future government disliked by the Communists.

The Guatemalan political opposition, both at home and in exile, is numerous but hopelessly disorganized and demoralized. In itself it does not constitute a significant threat to the Arbenz regime, but will continue to be persecuted by the Government as long as it retains any potential for action.

Although Arbenz is only halfway through his six-year term of office, maneuvering has already begun among Administration figures who hope to succeed him, with some potentially unsettling effect.

Despite numerous expressions of irritation by Guatemalan Army officers over U.S. refusal to supply them arms because of the Communist situation, there is no evidence that this discontent is being focused on Arbenz, who retains the loyalty of the most influential elements of the Army as well as the power to purge any officers found to be disloyal.

The adoption of the anti-Communist resolution did not weaken Arbenz' position with respect to the Army or to any other politically important group.

Also attached are two telegrams[2] from Ambassador Peurifoy, one containing his appraisal of Arbenz and the other outlining some suggested policy recommendations.

Subject: Possible Congressional Inquiry into Communism in Guatemala

Discussion:

Representative Charles J. Kersten (R., Wisconsin) has suggested to General Cutler of the NSC the possibility of a Congressional inquiry by his House Select Committee on Communist Aggression, into Communism in Guatemala. Mr. Kersten states that his Committee cannot undertake this inquiry until after they visit Europe in June, but a newspaper man, Mr. Pat McMahon, has prepared for him a proposed press release which Mr. Kersten implies he might wish to issue in the near future. The text of the proposed press release is attached to his letter of April 15 to General Cutler (Tab A).[2]

Recommendation:

That you request General Cutler to inform Representative Kersten that a Congressional inquiry of the nature he suggests might prove to be a very useful "sounding board" for public dissemination of information concerning Communism in Guatemala. Since however, the Committee cannot undertake the inquiry until after June, and since there are possibilities of new developments in the Guatemalan situation between now and the end of June, we would appreciate it if Mr. Kersten would defer any announcement with respect to a possible inquiry until we can review the situation with him just before his Committee departs for Europe.[3]

"This morning I have had a very good talk with Congressman Kersten, who was, as always, most understanding and cooperative.

"We discussed the Caracas Conference, the position taken by the Secretary, and the general situation in Central America, and related matters. He accepted my suggestion that his Sub-Committee defer any announcement relative to Guatemala until the Members of the Sub-Committee return from a proposed trip through Europe. At the present time, their expectation is to return from this trip in July. I suggested that when Congressman Kersten had returned, he might get in touch with me again, and we would take a fresh reading with you, Allen Dulles, and the OCB, on this situation." Minutes of a Meeting, Held in the Office of the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland), May 10, 1954[1]

OAS Action Against Communism in Guatemala

1. Mr. Holland called a meeting in his office at 5:30 p.m. at which the following were present with him:

E. G. Cale, Director, AR
R. S. Atwood, Director OSA
C. R. Burrows, Director MID
Ambassador John Dreier, OAS
E. A. Jamison, Deputy Director, AR
R. G. Leddy, Officer in Charge MID/P

2. Mr. Holland stated that he had been authorized by the Secretary to move to obtain OAS action against the Communist problem in Guatemala. Any step taken would have its disagreeable and disadvantageous aspects but to do nothing would be to admit that we are powerless to solve the problem; in the present world situation this would be intolerable. We should move toward application of the Caracas Resolution[2] to Guatemala, along the following lines:

---

[2] Apparent reference to Resolution XCIII; see footnote 2, p. 1093.

I. Take straw vote on resolution condemning Guatemala and applying sanctions.

(a) Handle this approach so that if we abandon the project there will be no loss of prestige.

(b) Beginning with Brazil and the more important countries approach each one informally, submitting summary of evidence.

(c) Try to conclude this stronghold within ten days.

II. If straw vote indicates we might succeed at OAS meeting, call in Walter Donnelly to take charge of preparations and of meeting.

(a) First guarantee any doubtful votes that are necessary to complete requisite two-thirds majority.

(b) Then try to get as many additional votes as possible.

(c) By June 15 determine, if possible, whether we are strong enough to call an OAS meeting.

III. During next ten days I should make strong speech on Guatemalan communism. We should get other speeches on the Hill and in other areas of the Government to demonstrate that United States determination to remedy problem extends throughout the Government.

Point Three above is undecided.

3. A breakdown of the list of American Republics, according to positive, doubtful and negative votes, was reviewed; it is hereto attached.[3] It was decided to make the first approach with Brazil, which was separately listed as "probable with persuasion". Ambassador Muniz would be asked to call on the Secretary on the following afternoon, when he would be presented with our viewpoint and asked to go to Rio to get the concurrence of the Brazilian Government. Mr. Leddy was directed to prepare the brief[4] for the Secretary.

4. Mr. Atwood said that Venezuela would be classified doubtful because of the attitude of Foreign Minister Otañez. Brazil will have to be "sold".

5. It seems agreed that former Ambassador Walter Donnelly would be the ideal choice to undertake leadership of this mission for the Department. A cable[5] was thereupon drafted and sent to Chargé Bernbaum at Caracas to discuss the proposition with Mr. Donnelly at once.

6. The organization of the evidence for the case to be presented against Guatemala was then discussed. It was decided that Second Secretary John C. Hill should be called from Guatemala City to undertake the preparation of this material, and a cable[6] was sent to Ambassador Peurifoy directing the detail of Mr. Hill to the Department, to depart from Guatemala City on the following day. Mr. Czayo, telephoned at his home, advised that travel orders could be issued after the cable is sent.

7. Mr. Holland discussed the situation in Honduras, pointing out that present developments are a key to the case against Guatemala, citing the expulsion of the three Guatemalan Consuls. A complaint against Guatemala in the OAS would best come from Honduras. We need more information from Honduras.

8. In addition to the action with Brazil, it was decided that inquiries should go to our Ambassadors in Bogotá, Lima, Santiago de Chile, and Buenos Aires, asking their advice on how the Department should best proceed with these Governments. While Mr. Holland was temporarily called from the room, it was decided that this cable should await the outcome of the visit of Ambassador Muniz on the following afternoon.

8 [9]. Mr. Holland read from a letter[7] he had prepared to send to Ambassador White in Mexico, also soliciting his advice on how to proceed. It was agreed the letter should be sent. Letters to other Ambassadors were considered impractical due to the time required for courier delivery, too long a delay before the June 15 deadline. Mr. Holland said that he would discuss again whether or not it would be feasible for him personally to make a trip to Mexico City to talk with President Ruiz Cortines.

10. Mr. Holland said that it would be necessary to keep minutes of these meetings,[8] in order to record what was being accomplished and to be accomplished. Mr. Leddy was directed to prepare the minutes of this meeting.

11. In reply to several points of difficulty to be encountered in obtaining the votes and in making the action of the OAS effective, Mr. Holland said that the Department would not, of course, proceed until [8] The meetings, of which this was the first, were held frequently during May, June, and early July for the purpose of discussing and implementing on a daily basis strategy relating to possible OAS action against Guatemala. The group, known in the Department as the "Guatemalan Group," was gradually enlarged to include additional officers from within the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, former Ambassadors Donnelly and Pawley, and a representative from the CIA. Mr. Holland presided at the meetings.

it was sure of a two-thirds vote and would handle the matter in such a way that it could withdraw should it prove impossible to obtain such two-thirds vote.

12. Ambassador Dreier pointed out that Article 53 of the UN Charter[9] requires that enforcement of any regional agreements shall only be taken with the concurrence of the UN Security Council; the USSR could therefore veto the OAS action. Mr. Holland replied that this would clearly stamp Guatemala as a Soviet Satellite and would make clear that the will of the OAS had been thwarted by the USSR. Mr. Atwood suggested that the reference to the UN Charter be incorporated in the brief for the Secretary's meeting with Ambassador Muniz as the latter is an expert on the UN.

13. Mr. Leddy mentioned once the United States takes Guatemala before the OAS it is quite likely that the Guatemalan Government will move to nationalize all American property in Guatemala; this is chiefly owned by three companies, United Fruit, American and Foreign Power and the IRCA. After pointing out that their property stands to be nationalized in any case, Mr. Holland said that it would be good to inform these companies in advance of our action.

The next meeting was called for the following afternoon at 5 p.m.[10]

Ambassador João Carlos Muniz of Brazil
Mr. Holland, ARA

Mr. Dulles told the Ambassador that he had come to the conclusion that the time had arrived when we must consider joint action regarding the Guatemalan problem. He said that it appeared to us that the penetration of communism in that Government was steadily extending and that it appeared to be spreading to surrounding countries. He pointed out that there were aspects of the Honduran strike which seemed to link it with Guatemala. He said that he did not want to invoke the consultative procedure without first consulting fully with the Government of Brazil and asked the Ambassador whether he would be willing to go to Rio to submit the problem to his Foreign Minister[2] and his President.[3]

The Secretary said that we must realize that it will be impossible to produce evidence clearly tying the Guatemalan Government to Moscow; that the decision must be a political one and based on our deep conviction that such a tie must exist.

The Ambassador said that he would be glad to go, and asked that we prepare for him a statement of evidence[4] which he might submit to his Government.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 14, 1954.

Subject: Recommendation that the U.S. Invoke Consultative Procedure under Rio Treaty to Consider Problem of International Communism in Guatemala.[2]

It is recommended that promptly the United States invoke the Organ of Consultation specified in Article VI of the Rio Treaty to consider the problem of the penetration of Guatemala by International Communism.

The Problem

From time to time around the world frontal tests of strength between the force of the free nations and that of the Communist organization arise. One occurred in Korea. Another is in progress in Indochina. A less publicized collision is now reaching its crisis in Guatemala.

In this last situation the test is whether the world Communist organization has the strength to establish a satellite nation in this hemisphere and, conversely, whether the free nations have the power to resist that attempt.

Importance of Problem

This contest is of crucial importance in the global struggle between free nations and the Communist forces. The reason is twofold.

1. It has been asserted that Moscow cannot establish a satellite state save where the weight of the Red Army can be brought to bear directly or indirectly. Obviously, Russia recognizes, therefore, that establishment of a satellite state in this hemisphere would mark a victory which would strengthen the power of Communist forces in every free nation of the world. Establishment of a satellite state in this hemisphere, and particularly so close to the United States, would enable Russia to claim throughout the world that the power of Communism lies in its appeal to men's minds and not in fear or force.

2. The greatest significance of the Guatemalan test lies in its effect on all regional organizations similar to the Organization of American States.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Holland.

[2] On May 12, 1954, Edward A. Jamison, Deputy Director of the Office of Regional American Affairs, forwarded to Assistant Secretary Holland a memorandum prepared by Marjorie Whiteman of the Office of the Legal Adviser, commenting in detail on the authority of the Executive Branch to take action against Guatemala under the Rio Treaty, and a covering memorandum discussing enforcement action under the treaty's provisions. (362/5–1154) Additional documentation on the legal aspects of implementing the Rio Treaty with respect to Guatemala is in file 362.

Because of the Soviet veto in the United Nations free states have had to rely upon such regional organizations as the vehicles for their fight against Communism.

Free states throughout the world are relying in their fight against International Communism upon the collective security afforded by these regional organizations. This grand strategy gives small nations exposed to invasion the courage to resist. By combining the individual strength of separate states into a massive aggregate it becomes possible to match and surpass the force which Russia can bring to bear at any time and at any point in the world. Obviously, a major policy of this Government is to bring all of the free states of the world into strong and determined regional organizations, contributing to them the maximum force and purpose of which we are capable.

Russian leaders see clearly the effectiveness of collective effort through regional organizations. For years, therefore, a major purpose of Moscow has been to weaken and destroy the Organization of American States, the oldest and one of the most effective of the regional organizations.

A reiterated and fundamental purpose of the Organization of American States is to defend this hemisphere, and particularly at this time to defend it against International Communism. Soviet leaders know that establishment here of a satellite state will demonstrate that the world's oldest regional organization is helpless to stop Communist expansion. If it can be demonstrated that the Organization of American States cannot achieve its most basic purpose then the Organization will become progressively discredited and useless.

For this reason the world Communist organization has expended fantastic effort and wealth in its attempts to establish a satellite state in the Western Hemisphere.

Their efforts to achieve this goal have been strengthened by the fact that this is the only area in the world in which the United States has formally renounced the right to take unilateral measures to resist Communism. While the Red Army cannot support Russia's effort to convert Guatemala into a Communist state, the United States Army cannot oppose it. Russia can bring to bear the force and the violence of its trained agents, but the United States in resisting that effort must respect its treaty obligations against intervention. This creates a serious test of the efficacy of the Organization of American States.

Why Moscow Chose Guatemala as a Testing Ground

The selection of Guatemala as the place for Moscow's major effort to establish a satellite state was partly fortuitous. For years Russia has, as you know, been carefully probing in the American states. For a time these efforts were concentrated on larger states such as Brazil and Chile. There, they achieved considerable initial success but were finally defeated because, as here, the governments and economies they sought to dominate were strong. Russia's efforts then became concentrated on the Central American and Caribbean states. The reasons are obvious. Their size and comparative weakness made them particularly susceptible. Because of their proximity to the Panama Canal domination of any one would give Russia an important military gain.

Guatemala afforded peculiar advantages because there the Communists could disguise their efforts as a genuinely national effort directed against the United Fruit Company and other large United States interests in the country. Actually, the United States would go no further in defending the interests of United States enterprises in Guatemala than it has gone and will always go anywhere in the world. This Government's efforts on behalf of United States interests in Guatemala have been limited to conventional representations to the governments asking that United States interests be granted due process of law and adequate compensation for expropriated properties. Nevertheless, the Communist organization has done a rather effective job of persuading public opinion that the real purpose of our efforts to prevent their penetration is the defense of United States enterprises there.

The Present Situation in Guatemala

In any analysis of the situation in Guatemala it must be recognized at the outset that evidence that the Communist program in Guatemala has been organized and directed in the world capitals of Communism, and that Communism in Guatemala is a part of the world apparatus, must be largely circumstantial. I doubt very much that there is in this hemisphere any writing which would demonstate these conclusions. On the other hand, to our students of the international Communist organization it is abundantly clear that what has happened in Guatemala is a part of Moscow's global strategy.

All of the signs which have identified similar occurrences elsewhere in the world are apparent in Guatemala. The methods of achieving initial penetration and of enlarging and strengthening those first footholds are the same. The training of leaders and the development of programs through exchanges of persons in strategic positions is identical. The extensive use of popular front organizations effectively controlled by a handful of experts is the same. We also have the reliable evidence of a blind unwavering adherence to the Communist Party line as enunciated in Moscow. As elsewhere in the world the agents of Communism in Guatemala have immediately adopted every public attitude announced from Moscow, regardless of the inconsistencies and local embarrassments which have resulted. As always in these stages of the program the Communist organization has been careful to preserve the appearance of minority representation in the Congress and other comparable organizations. At the same time, they have here, as elsewhere, succeeded in substituting small informal Communist controlled councils for the lawful policy-making bodies.

Attached hereto is a brief,[3] summarizing the evidence described above.

The people of Guatemala are overwhelmingly Catholic and anti-Communist. However, they are unorganized and entirely helpless to resist the well-planned and executed campaign directed against them from Moscow. It was precisely for the protection of a small nation in such a situation that the policy of collective security through regional organizations was devised.

Alternative Courses of Action

The three most obvious courses of action for this Government are the following:

1. We can continue to express our concern about the rapid expansion of international Communism in Guatemala. This course has been entirely ineffective thus far, and it seems certain that it will continue to be.
2. We can notify the other American States of our intention to move unilaterally in Guatemala to defeat Moscow's purpose there. Such a course of action would be inconsistent with our treaty obligations and the firm policy which we have followed in this hemisphere for more than 20 years.
3. We can attack the problem through the Organization of American States, utilizing the mechanisms specifically designed for problems of this nature. In my judgment the latter course is clearly that which we must follow.

It is my conclusion and that of the experts who are following this problem that, while there are some anti-Communist elements left in Guatemalan political institutions, they have lost their independence of action. These anti-Communist elements can be eliminated by the Communists whenever they consider it desirable. Therefore, we must recognize that the political institutions of that American State are now dominated and controlled by the international Communist organization.

Therefore, I recommend to you that this Government request that the Organ of Consultation of the Organization of American States be requested to meet and consider this problem. Because of the great rapidity with which anti-Communist elements are being eliminated from all political institutions, I feel that this move should be taken with the greatest urgency.[4] [4] Secretary Dulles apparently took no action on Assistant Secretary Holland's recommendation at this time; however, see the notes of the meeting of the Guatemalan Group held at the Department of State, June 25, 1954, p. 1186.

Editorial Note

On May 17, 1954, Assistant Secretary Holland forwarded a memorandum to Secretary Dulles recommending that the Secretary request "Congressional authorization enabling the President to put into effect any or all of the measures specified in Article 8 [of the Rio Treaty] which are approved by the Organ of Consultation and with respect to which he may not now have authorization." A handwritten notation on this memorandum, evidently by the Secretary, reads as follows: "Approve of drafting the bill—Then decide". (362/5–1154)

On June 8, however, in another memorandum to the Secretary, Assistant Secretary Holland stated the following: "Even though such authorization apparently is no longer necessitated by the Guatemala problem, it seems highly desirable that legislation under which the U.S. could act promptly to comply with OAS action under the Rio Treaty be obtained, in order that there will be no doubt of our ability to carry out decisions important to the maintenance of peace and security of the Hemisphere under the regional security system." He recommended that the Secretary approve submission to the National Security Council of a draft Congressional joint resolution containing an authorization similar to that in the earlier draft bill, for review prior to its presentation in Congress. (362/5–1154)

In a memorandum responding to the Assistant Secretary, dated June 11, Secretary Dulles stated that he did "not feel that a case can be made out for the necessity of Article 2 authorizing the United States" to employ its armed forces pursuant to Article 3 of the Rio Treaty, he doubted whether NSC action was required, and believed the question of timing was important, especially if the proposed joint resolution was presented in Congress before the OAS meeting. "If so," Dulles commented, "may it not be construed as taking for granted the results of this meeting? If we wait until the meeting is over, the time for Congressional action is pretty short. This is a certain dilemma we face." (362/5–1154) Assistant Secretary Holland pursued the question of Congressional authorization for action under the Rio Treaty through June and July, but Department of State files contain no record indicating that the Secretary ever approved submission of a bill or joint resolution requesting such authorization.

Subject: Action to Prevent Delivery of Czech Arms to Guatemala

Discussion:

The S.S. Alfhem, a Swedish-owned and Swedish flag vessel, arrived at Puerto Barrios, Guatemala on May 15, 1954 from Stettin with 2,000 tons of Czechoslovak arms for delivery to the Guatemalan Government. Unloading (estimated at five to ten days) was commenced on Saturday and renewed on Monday, the 17th; 1800 tons being still aboard last night. The dock area was heavily guarded by Guatemalan soldiers, and high military officers, including the Minister of War,[2] were present. The first train load from the cargo reached Guatemala on seven flat cars and three box cars last night. The kind and quantity of arms is yet unknown. Crew members report two more ships will come from Stettin for Guatemala.

Because predominant military power in the hands of the Guatemalan pro-Communist Government would threaten the peace of Central America, we moved at once to prevent delivery. I telephoned Ambassador Cabot[3] in Stockholm on the 16th, but the Swedish Government then stated the ship was chartered to E. E. Dean of London. Mr. Butterworth[4] asked the Foreign Office yesterday to have the ship ordered to leave port at once without further unloading, and Sir Roger Makins[5] was informed yesterday afternoon. In London we offered to indemnify the charterer against loss. Dean is now disclosed as a dummy in the transaction, holding a "straw charter" in order to justify transfer of Czech sterling funds to Sweden. One Christensen of Stockholm, agent for Czekofracht, the state transport monopoly, holds control over the charter, and Dean has no control, according to the British and our Embassy in London.

I have again asked our Embassy in Stockholm to get the Swedish Government to get the captain to stop unloading, and meanwhile to have the insurance cancelled as a means of getting the ship out of port. Christensen has stated his bill of lading was for "laboratory equipment and optical supplies" and that he did not know of any arms cargo. I have also asked Acting Defense Secretary Anderson to institute action to identify the two additional ships.

I have considered the question of recommending that Congress be asked immediately to enact legislation providing that when there is reason to believe that a vessel within the area defined in Article 4 of the Rio Treaty of 1947, is carrying elements of atomic or hydrogen bombs or other implements of war, which may be used in such a way as to endanger the peace of America [or in the alternative, in such a way as to endanger the security of the United States or its possessions or the Canal Zone],[1] the President be authorized to take measures to stop, divert and detain such vessel.

I am inclined to think that the matter of procuring legislation with respect to vessels carrying elements of atomic or hydrogen bombs should be most carefully considered before recommending its enactment. While legally, it might be justified on grounds of the national security, it is to be borne in mind that such legislation would create a precedent for similar action by other Powers with respect to shipments which might be made by the United States at least to some of the NATO or other countries.

If the present shipments of implements of war bound for a Central American country, constitute an imminent threat to the security of the United States, the United States could seize or detain the vessels, taking the consequences of charges of violation of the freedom of the seas, violation of the sovereignty of the country in whose port they might be found, and even of a risk of war.

If the present shipments of implements of war constitute merely a threat to the peace of the Hemisphere, affecting the sovereignty or political independence of an American State, the pertinent provisions (Arts. 6 and 8) of the Rio Treaty of 1947 should be invoked.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 19, 1954.

Subject: Controls Over Foreign Ships Carrying Munitions to Guatemala

You have asked whether there is existing legal authority pursuant to which the Executive could take action respecting foreign ships which carry munitions to Guatemala. Particularly you have asked if there is any legal authority pursuant to which the Executive could deny United States port privileges to such foreign vessels, and prevent the use of the Panama Canal to such vessels.

Section 5(b) of the Trading With the Enemy Act, as amended (Title 50, app. U.S.C.) provides as follows:

"(b) (1) During the time of war or during any other period of national emergency declared by the President, the President may, through any agency that he may designate, or otherwise, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of instruction, licenses, or otherwise—

(A) investigate, regulate, or prohibit, any transactions in foreign exchange, transfers of credit or payments between, by, through, or to any banking institution, and the importing, exporting, hoarding, melting, or earmarking of gold or silver coin or bullion, currency or securities, and

(B) investigate, regulate, direct and compel, nullify, void, prevent or prohibit, any acquisition holding, withholding, use, transfer, withdrawal, transportation, importation or exportation of, or dealing in, or exercising any right, power, or privilege with respect to, or transactions involving, any property in which any foreign country or a national thereof has any interest, by any person, or with respect to any property, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States . . ."

The United States is presently in a "period of national emergency declared by the President"; the President declared such an emergency on December 16, 1950. Consequently, at the present time the President possesses the authority set forth in the section. Since under this section the President through any agency designated may prohibit . . . transactions involving any property in which any foreign country or national thereof has any interest by any person, or with respect to any property subject to the jurisdiction of the United States", he is authorized to prohibit any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States from leasing docking space, bunkering, or dealing in any other manner with a foreign national or any property of such foreign national within United States jurisdiction. Hence, an order issued pursuant to the authority of this section could prohibit persons subject to the jurisdiction of the United States from having any transactions with a foreign ship which comes within United States territorial waters; this could effectively prevent the use of United States port facilities. Criminal penalties for violation of the section or orders issued pursuant thereto are provided for in the Act. Such action would not be effective to prevent foreign vessels from plying munitions to Guatemala since it is not necessary to touch United States ports or the Canal in order to do so.

Apart from the technical legal situation summarized above, there are important policy problems involved in such a use of Section 5(b) of the Trading With the Enemy Act. It is my understanding that the Treasury Department, which currently exercises the President's authority under Section 5(b), has exercised it in the international field only in situations involving actual hostilities with the exception of the blocking of the Czech Steel Mill in 1952; and that Treasury Department has been reluctant to utilize the section in other than a most serious type of situation, particularly because the authority granted by the section is extremely broad and use of it otherwise might result in curtailment of the authority itself. In the instant situation, a finding by the President that the shipment of arms to Guatemala is injurious to the security of the United States, and a directive to the Secretary of the Treasury to take action such as that set forth above, would in all likelihood be deemed necessary before the action could be taken.

In addition to the authority available to the Executive under Section 5(b) of the Trading With the Enemy Act, Section 191 of Title 50, U.S.C., provides broad authority to regulate anchorage and movement of vessels in the territorial waters of the United States and within the territory and waters of the Canal Zone during a declared national emergency. That section reads as follows:

"Whenever the President by proclamation or Executive order declares a national emergency to exist by reason of actual or threatened war, insurrection, or invasion, or disturbance or threatened disturbance of the international relations of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury may make, subject to the approval of the President, rules and regulations governing the anchorage and movement of any vessel, foreign or domestic, in the territorial waters of the United States, may inspect such vessel at any time, place guards thereon, and, if necessary in his opinion in order to secure such vessels from damage or injury, or to prevent damage or injury to any harbor or waters of the United States, or to secure the observance of the rights and obligations of the United States, may take, by and with the consent of the President, for such purposes, full possession and control of such vessel and remove therefrom the officers and crew thereof and all other persons not specially authorized by him to go or remain on board thereof.

"Within the territory and waters of the Canal Zone the Governor of the Canal Zone, with the approval of the President, shall exercise all the powers conferred by this section on the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Whenever the President finds that the security of the United States is endangered by reason of actual or threatened war, or invasion, or insurrection, or subversive activity, or of disturbances or threatened disturbances of the international relations of the United States, the President is authorized to institute such measures and issue such rules and regulations—

(a) to govern the anchorage and movement of any foreign-flag vessels in the territorial waters of the United States, to inspect such vessels at any time, to place guards thereon, and, if necessary in his opinion in order to secure such vessels from damage or injury, or to prevent damage or injury to any harbor or waters of the United States, or to secure the observance of rights and obligations of the United States, may take for such purposes full possession and control of such vessels and remove therefrom the officers and crew thereof, and all other persons not especially authorized by him to go or remain on board thereof;

(b) to safeguard against destruction, loss, or injury from sabotage or other subversive acts, accidents, or other causes of similar nature, vessels, harbors, ports, and waterfront facilities in the United States, the Canal Zone, and all territory and water, continental or insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. Any appropriation available to any of the Executive Departments shall be available to carry out the provisions of this chapter."

TOP SECRET PERSONAL AND PRIVATE WASHINGTON, May 19, 1954.

Guatemala

I said that we took a very serious view of the arms shipments from Soviet-controlled territory to Guatemala. I said that it might require a revision of U.S. planning. In view of the gravity of the situation, the State Department had already contemplated setting up a special committee to advise with it informally with respect to procedures, particularly as to invoking the Caracas Resolution at a meeting of the Organization of American States. I suggested that this committee should consist of Dr. Milton Eisenhower, Walter Donnelly and Bill Pawley. The President agreed to the last two names. He said he doubted very much whether Dr. Eisenhower would be able to give any appreciable amount of time and he did not want us to ask him to do this. I said perhaps an hour or so a month would enable him to give the necessary counsel, and the President said that under these circumstances, he might be asked to serve. He had no question at all as to the propriety of his serving but merely as to the time involved.

At this point Mr. Hagerty came in and there was some discussion as to what the President might say in his press conference about Guatemala, Indochina, and economic aid to India.[2]

[2] In a diary entry for May 19, Press Secretary Hagerty noted that the President, Secretary Dulles, and he discussed foreign policy questions anticipated to arise at the 10:30 press conference. "On Guatemala," he stated, "Dulles suggested and President agreed that the President say the shipment of Communist arms was disturbing and that that was one of the reasons the Resolution was passed at Caracas." strengthening international communist link with Guatemalan regime and since current unrest in Honduras does not appear to be entirely a domestic matter. We are impressed with coincidence that strikes have occurred in an area where three Guatemalan consuls, two of whom were only recently assigned there, have been declared personae non gratae by the Government of Honduras. Substance of Discussion of Department of State–Joint Chiefs of Staff Meeting, Held at the Pentagon, 11:30 a.m., May 21, 1954 [1]

[Here follow a list of those present (25) and discussion of matters unrelated to Guatemala.]

Mr. Murphy then said the next question for discussion was the situation in Guatemala. He asked Mr. Woodward to outline the Department's views.

Mr. Woodward stated that there was a general strike of the labor force on the banana plantations in northern Honduras and that while the Standard Fruit Company had apparently reached a settlement, United Fruit had not. We suspected that Guatemalan agitators were involved in the strikes and in view of the recent arrival in Guatemala of 2,000 tons of armaments the situation might become serious. The State

[1] Attendees at this meeting included 14 representatives from the Department of Defense (all of the Joint Chiefs were present), 8 from the Department of State, 2 from the Central Intelligence Agency, and Mr. Gleason from the National Security Council. Deputy Under Secretary Murphy headed the State group, which also included Messrs. MacArthur, Bowie, Woodward, Landon, Hoey, Anschuetz, and Linebaugh.

Department is, therefore, most interested in the reevaluation of the military strength and significance of each of the Central American republics[2] which it understood would be initiated in the NSC Planning Board on May 24. In addition, the Department was requesting an NSC decision regarding the powers of the President to use American troops to assist Honduras in repelling an attack from Guatemala and particularly whether the President could use force without specific Congressional approval. Article 3 of the Rio Pact provides the authority for any country to come to the aid of another immediately and also provides for consultation among all the members of the Pact.[3]

General Ridgway inquired if the State Department had considered the desirability of Nicaraguan troops being sent to Honduras to augment the latter's strength as an alternative to the use of U.S. troops. He felt that if any U.S. force landed in Honduras there was bound to be trouble and we would end up killing a few Hondurans.

Mr. Murphy replied that the Department was considering this possibility but that it was felt if we tried to use straw men no one would believe we were not the instigators.

General Ridgway said that Nicaragua under the Rio Pact was as qualified as we were to come to the aid of Honduras and he seemed to feel this would be preferable.

Mr. Murphy raised the question of President Somoza's attitude. Mr. Woodward said Somoza would probably be willing to aid Honduras if he felt his troops could handle the situation. However, he has told us in confidence that he feels his military force is incompetent and one of the purposes of the military evaluation of the Central American republics referred to earlier would be to gain an accurate assessment of Nicaragua's strength.

Mr. Murphy said President Somoza would doubtless expect us to participate in any action if we called upon him to contribute force.

[2] In a memorandum to Assistant Secretary Holland, dated May 21, 1954, summarizing the meeting with the Joint Chiefs, Deputy Assistant Secretary Woodward stated in part the following: "I did not mention to the Joint Chiefs on this occasion the advisability of our increasing the amount of military assistance that we are giving to other Central American countries, because when I mentioned this to Mr. Murphy he suggested that we take it up with Mr. Nolting. In any event, Mr. Murphy did not believe there would be any difficulty on this score if there should be a sudden need for assistance to the Central American countries." (714.00/5–2154) Frederick E. Nolting, Jr. was Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs.

[3] At its 197th meeting on May 13, 1954, the NSC had noted a statement by the Secretary of State that "if Guatemala makes an armed attack upon Honduras, the United States should be prepared to respond, under the Rio Pact, to a possible request by Honduras for U.S. armed assistance." (NSC Action No. 1122–b) The Council had also noted President Eisenhower's statement that Congressional leaders should be briefed on the Honduras situation on a bipartisan basis. (NSC Action No. 1122–c) The memorandum of discussion at the NSC's 197th meeting, including Action No. 1122, is in the Eisenhower Library, Whitman file, NSC records.

Admiral Radford stated that regardless of how the situation might develop the Joint Chiefs were going ahead with plans so that they would be in a position to carry out any orders they might get.

Mr. Murphy then referred to a New York Times article this morning which reported statements emanating from the U.S. were uniting Guatemala opinion against us.

General Cabell of CIA said his information was not consistent with the New York Times report and CIA understood the army particularly was becoming uneasy about the situation.[4]

Admiral Carney stated that they were carrying out air surveillance in the general area and watching shipping operations.

General Cabell said in response to Admiral Radford's question that it is not yet known what the recent 2,000 ton equipment consisted of although it did include mortars, artillery and small arms. CIA is not certain whether ammunition was in the shipment. This may be on the way.

[Here follows additional discussion of matters unrelated to Guatemala.]

[4] A telegram from Guatemala, dated May 20, 1954, reported that information from available sources indicated that many Guatemalan army officers were pleased to have the newly delivered arms, but they also had misgivings about the shipment for the following reasons: 1) it demonstrated the closeness of the Arbenz government to the Soviet Union, 2) it raised the possibility of the replacement of the U.S. Military Mission by Soviet or satellite military instructors, 3) it provided evidence that the Communists intended to take over Guatemala completely, and, 4) it would motivate the United States to take drastic action resulting in "terrible consequences" for Guatemala.

414.608/5–2154

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 21, 1954.

Subject: Detention of Foreign Flagships Transporting Arms to Guatemala.

Discussion:

The Second Mate of the Alfhem, Swedish ship now discharging arms in Puerto Barrios, stated to the U.S. Naval Attaché that two Finnish ships had loaded arms at Stettin for Guatemala at about the same time that the Alfhem was loaded. He stated that one of these ships left Stettin three weeks before the Alfhem and that he saw it off Puerto Barrios on the night of May 14. Our Naval Attaché conjectures that it may be waiting until the Alfhem is unloaded before coming into port itself.

We are advised that the Navy is now carrying out an aerial reconnaissance of the sealanes leading to Puerto Barrios and that it will report any vessels which might be suspected of carrying further arms. The policy which this Government will pursue in the event that such vessels are sighted should be determined now.

We feel that the following steps should be taken in the order stated with respect to any suspicious vessel on the high seas[1] sighted by the Navy:

1. If time permits we should attempt without detaining the ship to persuade its Flag state to order it to divert to Panama for inspection.
2. If time does not permit the preceding step our naval vessels should detain the ship, using force as a last resort, while we attempt to persuade its Flag state to divert it to Panama for inspection.
3. If neither of the two preceding steps is successful then our Navy should, using force as a last resort, escort the vessel to Panama for inspection.

Our action[2] should be based upon Article III of the Rio Treaty which preserves the inherent right of individual self-defense in case of an armed attack and Article LI of the Charter of the United Nations which provides that nothing therein "shall impair the inherent right of individual . . . self-defense . . .".[3]

This legal justification rests upon the conclusion that repeated and clandestine shipments of arms from Iron Curtain origin to a destination in this hemisphere amounts to armed aggression at least against the state of destination if not against every American state including ourselves.

While the steps outlined above should suffice to prevent the arrival of another arms-laden ship in Puerto Barrios, we should resolve that additional steps will be taken, if essential, to prevent such an occurrence.

[1] The handwritten words "on the high seas" were inserted in the source text, apparently by Mr. Holland.

[2] Assistant Secretary Holland had outlined the policy recommended in this memorandum at the Secretary of State's staff meeting held at the Department of State at 9:15 a.m. on the previous morning. The notes of the meeting, dated May 20 and designated SM N–230, read in part as follows: "Mr. MacArthur asked whether it would be feasible to secure the action of some other western hemisphere government in making the moves against the shipment of arms. Mr. Holland said that his inclination was to assert the responsibility of the accepted position the US holds in this hemisphere. Any other procedure he felt would fool no one and cause the US to look weak and ridiculous. He agreed that his feelings in the matter would not preclude the possibility of joint action." (Secretary's Staff Meetings, lot 63 D 75)

[3] Ellipses in the quotation appear in the source text of the memorandum.

Recommendation:

If you approve the foregoing suggested policy it is recommended that you discuss it with the President and representatives of the Department of Defense in your conference on Saturday, May 22.[4]

If this recommendation is there accepted, we shall undertake to furnish all necessary information to the proper naval authorities so that the operation may be put into effect at once.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Special Assistant to the President (Cutler)[1]

TOP SECRET PERSONAL AND PRIVATE WASHINGTON, May 22, 1954.

[Here follows discussion relating to the defense of Formosa and other islands bordering the China Coast between Formosa and the mainland.]

The Secretary of State raised the question of what should be done to prevent further shipments of war munitions from the Soviets to Guatemala. He pointed out that a Swedish ship had already landed two thousand tons of munitions in Guatemala. (The US erroneously took to Puerto Rico and unloaded a decoy ship, and missed the munitions carrier.) The Secretary thought that we should act promptly, in order to avoid the importation of such a great amount of arms that a major military effort would be required by the US to handle the developing situation. The basic request made by State was that the Navy be authorized to halt suspicious vessels on the high seas off the Guatemalan coast, voluntarily if possible, but by force, if necessary, and if such vessels refused permission to inspect their cargoes, to take them to Panama for inspection; the US being prepared to pay any damage or demurrage.

In answer to the President's inquiry as to the effect of this action on our friends, and on the other American Republics, the Secretary made these points:

[1] The source text indicates that this conversation took place in the White House at 9:15 a.m. The President's daily appointment book, however, records that it occurred at 9:55 a.m., and as requested by the Secretary of State. A copy of this memorandum was forwarded to Secretary Dulles under cover of a memorandum from Mr. Cutler, dated May 24, not printed.

(1) Honduras and Nicaragua have already asked the US for help. El Salvador probably will so ask. Costa Rica is beginning to worry a little about being so close to the Communists.

(2) Article 51 of the UN Charter provides the right to members of collective and individual defense. What is going on in Guatemala, since the Russians never furnish arms to a country without a bad motive, is a direct threat to the security of the US (via Panama Canal).

(3) Machinery has been set in action to call a meeting of the Organization of American States, but this will take a couple of weeks.

(4) The Caracas Resolution recognizes that the control of an American State by Communists was a threat to the security of the US (17 votes for, 1 vote against, 2 abstentions).

(5) Assistant Secretary Holland would go to Mexico City to keep the Mexican Government advised.

Under these circumstances, the President agreed to the proposed action, suggesting only that we should give notification to friendly countries of what we are proposing to do.

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 22, 1954.

We discussed the annexed statement[1] of proposed action with reference to efforts to intercept arms to Guatemala. The President agreed with the program. However, he suggested that we should, if possible, obtain a request for our action by some of Guatemala's neighbors who were threatened by Guatemalan aggression, and that we should internationalize our action to the maximum. He suggested possible notification to shipping countries so as to prevent inconvenience to them. I also said that Mr. Holland, or another of our group, would probably be shortly going to Mexico, due to the importance of keeping Mexico promptly and fully informed of our plans.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Deputy Secretary of Defense (Anderson)[1]

DEAR MR. ANDERSON: As the Department of Defense is aware, a large quantity of arms originating behind the Iron Curtain has arrived at Guatemala on May 15, 1954 aboard the S.S. Alfhem, a Swedish flag vessel. Cables to the Department of State, all of which have been distributed to the Department of Defense, have given details concerning this shipment of arms and efforts made to prevent their final delivery, inasmuch as predominant military power in the hands of the pro-Communist Guatemalan Government would create a situation dangerous to the peace and security of this hemisphere.

Information has also been received by this Department, and promptly furnished to the Department of Defense, that two other ships bearing arms are believed coming from the same port, Stettin, to Guatemala, and that their arrival is anticipated in the very near future; these ships may fly the Finnish flag, and one of them was reported to have been seen outside Puerto Barrios on the night of May 14, 1954. In addition to these two ships, the American Consulate at Kingston, Jamaica reported on May 19, 1954 that a German vessel, S.S. Sajma, was sighted off the coast of Cuba on the morning of May 18, 1954, bound for Belize, British Honduras, and carrying twelve crates of arms or explosives, according to a . . . source; this latter information was sent to the Department of Defense on the same night, and the request made that immediate steps be instituted to locate and identify this vessel. On May 20, 1954, the office of the United States High Commissioner for Germany reported that this ship is probably the Finnish M/S Sajmaa, and this information was sent to the Department of the Navy.

In order that effective steps may be taken to prevent delivery of arms of Soviet or Iron Curtain origin to Guatemala, it is necessary that the Department of State have information as far as possible in advance of the arrival of any such shipments. Confirming our telephone conversation and the previous data furnished to the Department of Defense, it is therefore requested that action be instituted to make available to the Department of State the following information:

a) The identity and location of the two ships reported to be bound for Guatemala from Stettin, carrying arms and ammunition for Guatemala;

[1] Drafted by Mr. Leddy.

b) The identity and location of the vessel reported to have left Stettin and to have been sighted outside of Puerto Barrios on May 14, 1954;

c) The identity and location of the M/S Sajmaa:

d) The identity and location of all ships leaving European ports bound for Puerto Barrios, Guatemala;

e) Intelligence information which would serve to identify and locate any ships entering the Caribbean area from European ports of departure, which might be destined for Puerto Barrios, whether or not this destination is listed.[2]

Sincerely yours, HENRY F. HOLLAND

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 24, 1954.

Subject: Arms for Guatemala from Europe

[1] Drafted by Mr. Leddy.

Discussion:

It was decided early in 1953 that we should take steps to prevent export of arms from Europe to Guatemala, as a necessary corollary to our policy of not licensing arms exports for Guatemala from the United States. In each individual case where information reached the Department on Guatemalan attempts to purchase arms in Europe, we requested the Government of the exporting country to prevent shipment; in all cases our efforts were successful. In April 1954 we circularized [2] ten European missions to request these Governments to institute general measures of control against such shipments to Guatemala, whether originating in the country or in transit. In the individual and general approaches the basis for our request was the danger to the peace of the free world from the expansion of Communist power in Guatemala. On April 28, 1954 our request was presented to the NATO Council in Paris on the basis of commitments of NATO members not to export war materials. Finally, on May 21, 1954,[3] we again called attention of the same nations to the problem of large shipments such as in the Alfhem case, which would be going through as a matter of international trade from behind the Iron Curtain.

Individual Western European countries have thus far taken effective action on specific request of arms export brought to their attention. We do not yet have clear evidence of what general measures they have adopted to catch individual exports that we do not bring to their attention, although several have cordially agreed to cooperate. On our broad request to prevent large shipments moving in international trade, there is yet no answer, but the Dutch have already indicated their disagreements.

Recommendation:

We should now bring home directly to each maritime nation that we request their effective cooperation on both small and large shipments. We should seriously consider whether, in the absence of effective cooperation, we will notify them of our intention to take measures of our own.[4]

The Ambassador in Guatemala (Peurifoy) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL GUATEMALA CITY, May 24, 1954—8 p. m.
PRIORITY

776. Pursuant to his request (Embtel 760, May 22),[1] I called this morning on Foreign Minister Toriello. He looked ill and said he had had to defer visit to Presbyterian Hospital in New York because of circumstances. Talk lasted hour and half and touched on relations with US, United Fruit Company problems, arms shipment and Communism. It gave no hint of any basic change in Guatemalan policy.

Relations with US: Toriello expressed concern over Guatemala's relations with US which he said were getting worse; he knew consultations were now taking place regarding calling an OAS meeting and if one were called, Guatemala would attend and defend itself; Guatemala had strong case and would command respect of other American Republics for not tolerating intervention; he doubted meeting would do either Guatemala US much good.

Fruit Company problems: Toriello said he would hand me note [2] rejecting Department's claim for UFCO and did so at end of interview. Note summarized in Embtel 772, May 24.[3] He then said Fruit Company had been exploiting Guatemala for years and paid very little taxes and he wondered whether we could not sit down with our advisers and work out solution. I asked whether government had ever informed UFCO exactly what it desired and he said, he felt company should approach government first. He then said he had no confidence in impartiality of Secretary Dulles, because of connection with Sullivan and Cromwell, and certain employees of State Department on UFCO question and suggested I discuss this matter personally with President Eisenhower. I replied that his suspicions of Secretary and of Department's fairness were entirely groundless and that dealing in personalities only confused the issue. Toriello then said he might call me towards end of week at which time he might have some concrete proposals to make re UFCO. I said I would be available whenever he

[1] In the referenced telegram, Ambassador Peurifoy reported that in an effort to secure foreign support for Guatemala in the arms shipment controversy, Foreign Minister Toriello on the previous day had explained to all Chiefs of Mission, except Ambassador Peurifoy, Guatemala's views on the issue, and that the Foreign Minister had allegedly stated that Guatemala would attend and defend its position if a meeting of the OAS were called, but that he would appeal to the United Nations Security Council if attacks against Guatemala did not cease (414.608/5–2254).

[3] In telegram 772, Ambassador Peurifoy reported that in the Guatemalan Government's memorandum, dated May 24, 1954, Foreign Minister Toriello rejected UFCO's claim for damages, refused to consider the subject an appropriate one for international discussion, and described the action of the U.S. Government in presenting the claim as intervention in the internal affairs of Guatemala (214.1141 UFCO/5–2454).

wished to talk to me but reminded him other American interests were also involved, mentioning specifically Grace Line's current difficulties (Embtel 743, May 21).[4] He stated clearly that American interests would eventually have to give up control of all ports, communications and transportation since Guatemala was sovereign nation.

Arms shipment: Toriello confirmed that Guatemala had received arms shipment but denied categorically that arms were manufactured in any country which US regarded as Soviet satellite. When I asked if he could state arms were not purchased in satellite country, he replied negatively. He emphasized refusal of US to sell arms left Guatemala no alternative and assured me arms were for protection, since UFCO was financially backing Castillo Armas plot against Guatemalan Government. He said arms were not for aggression.

Communism: I told Toriello that for US problem of Communism was of greatest concern and that until that was solved I feared we would continue to have difficulties, he replied with standard line that Commies few and of no importance. I said I could not agree with him on this.

After his talk with me Toriello held press conference at which he announced that he and I would hold conversations looking toward solution of outstanding problems and expressed optimism that tension could be diminished.

My feeling is that Guatemalans are seriously worried over possibility of OAS meeting and are making desperate effort to induce us to defer or drop plans for international action. They either believe or wish to make Latin America believe that our real concern over Guatemala stems from UFCO's problems and hope that discussions on this issue can be drawn out until moment for action has passed. There is no indication that they have any intention of modifying their attitude towards Commies. I therefore suggest Department play down fruit company problem for present and concentrate on Commie issue.

Draft Statement of Policy by the National Security Council[1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 24, 1954.
NSC 5419

U.S. POLICY IN THE EVENT OF GUATEMALAN AGGRESSION IN LATIN AMERICA

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

1. The Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, to which the United States is a party, provides as follows:

"Article 3

"1. The High Contracting Parties agree that an armed attack by any State against an American State shall be considered as an attack against all the American States and, consequently, each one of the said Contracting Parties undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations.

"2. On the request of the State or States directy attacked and until the decision of the Organ of Consultation of the Inter-American System, each one of the Contracting Parties may determine the immediate measures which it may individually take in fulfillment of the obligation contained in the preceding paragraph and in accordance with the principle of continental solidarity. The Organ of Consultation shall meet without delay for the purpose of examining those measures and agreeing upon the measures of a collective character that should be taken.

"If the inviolability or the integrity of the territory or the sovereignty or political independence of any American State should be affected by an aggression which is not an armed attack or by an extra-continental or intra-continental conflict, or by any other fact or situation that might endanger the peace of America, the Organ of Consultation shall meet immediately in order to agree on the measures which must be taken in case of aggression to assist the victim of the aggression or, in any case, the measures which should be taken for the common defense and for the maintenance of the peace and security of the Continent."

[1] This paper was based on a memorandum drafted in the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs (ARA) by Mr. Jamison and Mr. Leddy on May 12, 1954, not printed, and submitted to Director of the Policy Planning Staff Bowie by Assistant Secretary Holland on May 13. That draft was subsequently returned to ARA and revised after consultation between officers in ARA and Louis J. Halle of the Policy Planning Staff. The revised draft was resubmitted to Mr. Bowie on May 19, and forwarded to the NSC Planning Board on the following day. In a memorandum to Mr. Bowie, dated May 20, not printed, Mr. Halle commented that he had doubts about the reliability of some of the factual statements contained in ARA's draft memorandum (PPS files, lot 65 D 101, "Guatemala"). The NSC Planning Board amended the revised draft at its meeting on May 24, and also approved submission of the amended draft as NSC 5419 to the NSC for consideration (record of the meeting of the NSC Planning Board, S/P–NSC files, lot 62 D 1).

Under a covering note dated May 24, not printed, NSC Executive Secretary Lay transmitted the draft statement of policy to the NSC for consideration at its meeting on May 27, 1954; see infra.

2. Since May 1, a strike situation has developed in Honduras in which the entire north coast area has been paralyzed. There is reason to believe that the strike may have had inspiration and support from the Guatemalan side of the Honduran boundary. The situation has prompted the Honduran government to send much of the weakly organized and poorly equipped Honduran army to the strike area and to stand guard on the Guatemalan border, thus stripping the capital at Tegucigalpa of military forces.

3. In these circumstances an armed attack by Guatemala could, perhaps, in a matter of hours, bring about the fall of the Honduran government.[2] (If Guatemalan aggression took some form other than an "armed attack", Article 3 would not apply and other provisions of the Rio Treaty would have to be invoked.)

4. Any successor government which arose in Honduras as the result of a successful Guatemalan attack might well have the same leaning toward Communism that distinguishes the present government of Guatemala. This would pose a most serious threat to the ability of the other governments of Central America to withstand Communist penetration or control. It would thus constitute a serious threat to the security of the area and, correspondingly, to United States security interests there.

5. If the government of any member of the Organization of American States should, under Article 3, paragraph 2 of the Rio Treaty, request the assistance of the United States to meet an armed attack by Guatemala, and if the President should be satisfied that such an attack has occurred, it is recommended that the President:

a. Determine that such Guatemalan armed attack is considered by the United States as an armed attack against all American states under Article 3, paragraph 1 of the Rio Treaty, and constitutes an imminent threat to the security of the United States.

b. Direct that under Article 3, paragraph 2 of the Rio Treaty and to protect the security of the United States, the armed forces of the United States, in collaboration with the armed forces of other members of the Organization of American States to the extent feasible, take military action to the extent necessary to counteract the attack and eliminate the danger to the state attacked.

6. The United States should encourage any member of the Organization of American States which requests the United States to come to its assistance, also to request such action by other members of the Organization of American States pending a decision by the Organ of Consultation.

[2] In his memorandum to Mr. Bowie, dated May 20, Mr. Halle stated that he believed a Guatemalan attack on Honduras was unlikely.

7. The United States should take all practicable steps to ensure that the other members of Organization of American States are prepared for collective action under the Rio Treaty to assist any member of Organization of American States threatened by aggression or internal subversion inspired by Guatemala.

8. The Chairmen of appropriate congressional committees should be immediately informed of the above policy.

9. The timing of public disclosure of the above policy should be determined by the Secretary of State.

3. U.S. Policy in the Event of Guatemalan Aggression in Latin America (NSC 5419;[2] NSC 144/1[3])

Mr. Cutler pointed out that the short Planning Board paper had been drawn up in the light of Articles 3 and 6 of the Rio Treaty. It has also taken into consideration the U.S. right of self-defense and the great desirability of collective action in dealing with the problem of Guatemala. He then turned to the Recommendations in the Planning Board paper, which he proceeded to read, together with the recommendation for revision submitted by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.[4] The proposals for revision of paragraph 5–b and paragraph 7 offered by the Joint Chiefs of Staff were agreed to by the Council, as was a suggestion for the revision of paragraph 8 offered by Mr. Cutler.

Thereafter, Mr. Cutler informed the Council of the decision made by the President on the previous Saturday,[5] on means to prevent further shipment of arms to Guatemala. After reading a brief statement of the content of the President's decision, Mr. Cutler asked Secretary Dulles for his comments.

[3] NSC 144/1, "United States Objectives and Courses of Action With Respect to Latin America," dated Mar. 18, 1953, p. 6.

[4] The Joint Chiefs of Staff, in a memorandum to the Secretary of Defense dated May 26, 1954, stated that they assumed early action would be taken to convene the Organ of Consultation of the Organization of American States as one of the steps to be taken under the provisions of paragraph 7 of NSC 5419. They recommended that paragraph 5 of the draft statement be revised to indicate that "unilateral military action should be taken only as a last resort", and suggested that, for accuracy, "direct attack" be substituted for "aggression" in the title of NSC 5419. A copy of the May 26 memorandum is in JCS files.

[5] May 22. See the Secretary's memorandum of conversation with the President, p. 1123.

Secretary Dulles suggested one slight amendment in the Presidential statement, and said that he had little else to say except that the State Department has commenced its informal conversations with those countries which were likely to have vessels in the area near Guatemala. He predicted that these various countries would not accord formal recognition of our right to detain and search their vessels on the high seas, but that they would be willing to look the other way while we did this. Secretary Dulles also expressed the opinion that action taken thus far by the United States had probably scared away other vessels carrying arms to Guatemala. Accordingly, the immediate danger of shipments of arms to Guatemala had been allayed. The point that had been hard to get other people to appreciate was the relative magnitude of the first shipment of arms to Guatemala. While not in itself large, the shipment really had produced a serious shift in the balance of military power in Central America in favor of Guatemala.

Mr. Cutler then asked whether the arms which had arrived in the first shipment to Guatemala were being handed out to the strikers in Honduras. Secretary Dulles replied that part, at least, of these arms was apparently being set aside for subversive activity both in Honduras and Nicaragua.

Secretary Anderson[6] referred briefly to the preparations by the Defense Department to evacuate American civilians from Honduras if this proved necessary.

Secretary Dulles then expressed very great concern about the Communist line being followed by Sydney Gruson in his dispatches to the New York Times. Gruson, thought Secretary Dulles, was a very dangerous character, and his reporting had done a great deal of harm. The President said that he often felt that the New York Times was the most untrustworthy newspaper in the United States, at least as far as the areas of the news with which he was personally familiar were concerned. Mr. Allen Dulles pointed out some very disturbing features of Sidney Gruson's career to date.

The Attorney General[7] asked if it would not be a good idea for someone to talk informally to the management of the New York Times. Admiral Strauss[8] them suggested that he would be glad to talk to Arthur Sulzberger[9] if the President thought it a good idea. The President said he had no objection to Admiral Strauss' proposal, but he doubted if anything useful would come of the conversations.

[8] Lewis L. Strauss, Special Assistant to the President.
[9] Publisher of The New York Times.

Mr. Allen Dulles then pointed out that the forthcoming arms shipments to Guatemala might well come from other countries than those behind the Iron Curtain, and wondered whether the phrasing of the President's statement should be changed to recognize this fact and to take account of the importance of the use to which the arms were put rather than the place of origin of the shipment.

Secretary Dulles commented that of course the essence of the matter was not the place of origin but the fact of a hostile government in Guatemala. If this government succeeds in procuring arms next time from elsewhere than the Soviet bloc, we should, of course, do all we can to prevent the shipment from reaching its destination. The President's statement was amended to meet the point raised by Mr. Allen Dulles.

The Attorney General then made a brief comment as to the legality of the U.S. action proposed by the President, of stopping suspected vessels on the high seas. Such action was in general outside the limits of international law. There was, however, a well-established exception which permitted interference with vessels of another nation on the high seas if self-defense or self-preservation was clearly involved. It seemed to the Department of Justice, continued the Attorney General, that the facts of the case, as presented by Secretary Dulles in his recent press conference, fully supported an invocation of self-defense and self-preservation.

Secretary Dulles pointed out that Guatemala's military establishment was three times as large as the military establishments of all its neighbors put together. This completely denied Guatemala's allegation that the arms it had imported were for its own self-defense. The Attorney General agreed, but warned the Council to be prepared to see a division among the international lawyers on this question. He also expressed the opinion that no internal constitutional issue was raised by the Presidential action, and that there was no need to seek Congressional approval.

Governor Stassen[10] said that the problem of Guatemala seemed to him to raise the question of revising the Monroe Doctrine to prevent shipment of arms to a government in this hemisphere which was dominated by a foreign ideology. Secretary Dulles replied that he thought something like this had been accomplished at the Caracas Conference. The present action against Guatemala was simply a detailed application of the general rule of preventing the extension of the Communist conspiracy to the Western Hemisphere. He added that the United States was preparing to take the Guatemalan problem into a meeting of the Organization of American States as a situation which called for action even beyond the terms of the Caracas anti-Communist resolution.[11] He said that he had had conversations with the Brazilian Ambassador, who had said that his country would not only go along with us, but would take the lead. This Secretary Dulles found very heartening, since we needed support from others than the Somozas in the Hemisphere.

The President expressed the hope that we could secure the support of Uruguay as the outstanding democracy in South America. Secretary Dulles replied that the Brazilian Ambassador had suggested that one of the best ways of getting Uruguay to go along would be to propose holding the OAS meeting in Montevideo. He predicted it would be hard to gain the support of Uruguay, but thought that this suggestion might help. Mexico also would prove difficult.

With regard to the problem of military assistance to the Latin American republics, the President said he hoped that we would not forget that we could not strengthen the military position of tiny countries like Honduras by merely dumping modern arms into them. We should supplement this action by seeing to it that the armies of these countries were taught the effective use of the armament we provided. He thought this problem ought to be surveyed as a long-range affair.

Governor Stassen inquired as to whether thought should be given to cancelling the very small amount of Technical Aid which the United States was still providing Guatemala. . . .

The National Security Council:[12]

a. Discussed the reference report on the subject (NSC 5419) in the light of the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff presented orally at the meeting.

b. Adopted the Recommendations contained in paragraphs 5–9 of NSC 5419, subject to the following changes:

(1) Paragraph 5–a, 3rd line: Change "paragraph 2" to read "paragraph 1".

(2) Paragraph 5–b, 5th line: Add, after "to the extent feasible", the words "and unilaterally only as a last resort,".

(3) Paragraph 7, 1st line: Insert "political" between "practicable" and "steps".

(4) Paragraph 8: Revise to read as follows: "8. Appropriate Congressional leaders should be immediately informed of the above policy."

[11] Reference is to Resolution XCIII; see footnote 2, p. 1093.

[12] Subparagraphs a–d constitute NSC Action No. 1135.

c. Noted that the President, in order to protect the security of the United States and specifically to defend the Panama Canal, had authorized the Navy to halt on the high seas off the Guatemalan coast vessels, including foreign-flag vessels, suspected of carrying munitions of war destined for Guatemala, in order to inspect their cargoes, and if such inspection is refused, to escort such vessels by force, if necessary, to Panama for inspection; such action to be taken, where time permits: (1) after notice to the country of registry of any such vessel in order to obtain, if possible, such country's consent to such inspection and (2) after notice to the Organization of American States and, if possible, with the approval of such Organization.

d. Noted the President's reference to United States policy as to training the military establishments of Latin American nations, provided in NSC 144/1, paragraph 18–b.

Note: The Recommendations referred to in b above, as approved by the President,[13] and the actions in c and d above subsequently referred to the Operations Coordinating Board as the coordinating agency designated by the President, and circulated as NSC 5419/1.

1. If the government of any member of the Organization of American States should, under Article 3, paragraph 2 of the Rio Treaty, request the assistance of the United States to meet an armed attack by Guatemala, and if the President should be satisfied that such an attack has occurred, it is recommended that the President:

[1] NSC Executive Secretary Lay, under a covering note dated May 28, 1954, not printed, transmitted the recommendations of NSC 5419 (paragraphs 5 to 9), adopted by the NSC subject to the changes set forth in NSC Action No. 1135–b, to the NSC as NSC 5419/1. Mr. Lay informed the NSC of the President's authorization to the Navy to halt Guatemalan coastal vessels, including foreign-flag vessels suspected of carrying munitions of war, for cargo inspection, and also the President's reference to NSC 144/1, paragraph 18–b (see p. 10) regarding U.S. policy on training the military establishments of Latin American nations. President Eisenhower approved the recommendations in NSC 5419/1 on May 28, 1954, directed their implementation by all appropriate executive departments and agencies, and designated the OCB as the coordinating agency.

a. Determine that such Guatemalan armed attack is considered by the United States as an armed attack against all American states under Article 3, paragraph 1 of the Rio Treaty,* and constitutes an imminent threat to the security of the United States.

b. Direct that under Article 3, paragraph 2 of the Rio Treaty and to protect the security of the United States, the armed forces of the United States, in collaboration with the armed forces of other members of the Organization of American States to the extent feasible, and unilaterally only as a last resort, take military action to the extent necessary to counter-act the attack and eliminate the danger to the state attacked.

2. The United States should encourage any member of the Organization of American States which requests the United States to come to its assistance, also to request such action by other members of the Organization of American States pending a decision by the Organ of Consultation.[2]

3. The United States should take all practicable political steps to ensure that the other members of Organization of American States are prepared for collective action under the Rio Treaty to assist any member of Organization of American States threatened by aggression or internal subversion inspired by Guatemala.

4. Appropriate congressional leaders should be immediately informed of the above policy.

5. The timing of public disclosure of the above policy should be determined by the Secretary of State.

[2] On Sept. 3, 1954, NSC Acting Executive Secretary Gleason, in a memorandum to the NSC, not printed, stated that the Council at its 212th meeting on Sept. 2, 1954, in connection with action on NSC 5432, agreed that the statement of policy in NSC 5419/1 "should be terminated as no longer applicable." (NSC Action No. 1209) President Eisenhower approved the action of the Council on Sept. 3, thereby terminating NSC 5419/1. Mr. Gleason informed the Council that "policy relating to action against anti-U.S. subversion or intervention in Latin America and to the application of sanctions, including military action, in the event of threatened or actual domination of a Latin American state by Communism" was contained in paragraph 6 of NSC 5432/1 (see p. 83).

414.608/5–2854:Circular telegram

SECRET WASHINGTON, May 28, 1954—9:04 p. m.

440. Department requests you inform government to which accredited at high level of serious concern this Government with regard to use of ships of friendly powers to transport arms to Guatemala, whose Communist-oriented government poses increasing threat in vital Central American area.

For your information only this Government is determined prevent further substantial arms shipments from reaching Guatemala, but first seeking cooperation of other governments which it urgently desires you obtain.

You may exercise your judgment how this matter is taken up. Following argument presented for your guidance:

1. A Soviet thrust into Western Hemisphere by establishing and maintaining Communist-controlled state between U.S. and Canal Zone would represent serious set-back to free world. It would represent challenge to Hemisphere security and peace as Guatemala has become increasingly instrument of Soviet aggression in this hemisphere. Its President (Arbenz) has publicly expressed his backing of Communists saying that to isolate them would be equivalent to suicide of revolutionary movement he heads. Communists have infiltrated government and now control its agrarian reform, labor, social security, informational and educational policies. Police and Army are either subservient or passive toward Government's pro-Communist policies. Sole national labor federation, affiliated with WFTU, is Communist controlled. All political parties supporting Administration, controlling 51 of 56 seats in Congress, are bound together in Communist controlled "National Democratic Front". In its foreign relations, Guatemala has become spokesman for Soviet policy for Western Hemisphere and menace to stability of strategic Central American and Caribbean area.

2. U.S. Government has for some time pursued policies designed to reduce this threat. It obtained at Caracas OAS Conference anti-international Communist resolution under which action can be taken against the domination or control of an American state by international Communism. Guatemala was only American country to vote against it. U.S. has for several years progressively denied export licen-

Sent to the Embassies in Stockholm, Paris, Brussels, Lisbon, Rome, The Hague, Oslo, Copenhagen, Helsinki, Athens, London, and Madrid; sent also to HICOG in Bonn; repeated for information to the Embassies in Bern and Guatemala City, USUN in New York, and USPOLAD in Trieste.

In circular telegram 443, dated May 29, 1954, sent to all diplomatic posts in the American Republics, except Guatemala, and repeated for information to the Embassies in Guatemala City, London, Paris, Rome, Bonn, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Oslo, Bern, Vienna, Madrid, and Athens, and to USUN in New York, the Department augmented this telegram with additional details concerning arms shipments to Guatemala, particularly the so-called "Alfhem case." (414.608/5–2954) ses for arms to Guatemala to prevent build up of its military potential which is already predominant in area. This predominance now greatly increased by recent arrival 2,000 ton shipment of armaments from behind iron curtain. Leading Western European Governments last month agreed to refuse export of arms shipments from their territories to Guatemala. You should cite any specific assurance you have on this point.

3. It has now been established that these controls are insufficient and it will be necessary to supplement control program by preventing use of ships of free world to transport arms to Guatemala. Arrival Swedish ship Alfhem in Guatemala on May 15 with some 2,000 tons arms loaded at Stettin April 18 illustrates capacity international Communist movement to vitiate cooperative efforts of free world by simply loading up entire ship at Communist-controlled port for clandestine delivery. Market value these arms, if only light weapons and munitions are involved, has been estimated at $10 million by our military authorities and considerably higher if tanks and planes are involved. This is large sum for nation whose annual military budget is less than $7 million and suggests Soviet's long term purposes in arming Communist power in Central America. Department now has information two more ships, which may carry flags of one or more of countries to which you accredited, are on their way to Guatemala with arms from Soviet orbit.

4. Arrival these ships or others carrying more arms for Guatemala would further augment Guatemala's preponderant military position in area. Guatemalan military and police forces, totalling 9,000 already overshadow combined forces of Honduras, El Salvador, and Nicaragua, numbering about 7,000.

5. This Government is anxious for cooperation of free governments in all possible measures to prevent use their flag ships in future arms traffic to Guatemala; for controls to be instituted to identify and report possible arms shipments for Guatemala on national ships; and for measures to be taken by governments themselves to divert or otherwise prevent delivery such shipments.

6. Guatemalan Government has forced strong measures by its flagrant abuse of system of international trade under which ships move freely and without hindrance because of presumed reliability of ships' documents. In connivance with Soviet orbit suppliers of the arms, it resorted to false documents misrepresenting nature and destination of cargo, false statements as to ships destination and a Swedish charterer who made public statement misrepresenting nature cargo. These tactics make it impossible rely on conventional means for determining contents ship destined to Guatemala and, in cases where suspicious circumstances exist, force actual inspection. Moreover tactics used by Guatemala in this case prejudice best interests all nations engaged in maritime commerce and would justify their filing vigorous protest with Guatemala against such abuses.

7. This Government would welcome cooperation Western maritime nations to end that if U.S. Naval patrols in Caribbean or Pacific approaches to Guatemala have reason suspect that ship approaching Guatemala carries arms and U.S. does not have time notify flag government, they detain it while U.S. Government clarifies its status and cargo with flag government.

You should attempt to obtain explicit consent of government to which you accredited to measures outlined preceding paragraph; otherwise indication of its tacit approval and willingness not to make formal protest if we do take such measures.[2]

Embassy London: This matter is being taken up with British Ambassador here and therefore you should not initiate discussions there.

Memorandum by Louis J. Halle, Jr. of the Policy Planning Staff to the Director of the Policy Planning Staff (Bowie)[1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 28, 1954.

OUR GUATEMALAN POLICY

Major decisions affecting our Latin American policy are being made in an atmosphere of urgency generated by (a) the outbreak of a strike among United Fruit Company and Standard Fruit Company workers in Honduras, and (b) the delivery at a Guatemalan port of a cargo of arms from behind the Iron Curtain. The consequent haste in decision involves certain dangers which are already being realized and may be realized further in the absence of precaution:

(a) There is no time for preliminary staff-work to provide an adequate basis of information and thought;

(b) The concentration on what appears to be a local emergency may result in inadequate attention to larger considerations that are not local or short-range;

(c) The atmosphere of emergency breeds a disposition to exaggerate dangers, and this disposition is strengthened by the necessity of "making a case" in order to get effective action.

The purpose of this memorandum is to put into your hands (a) such intelligence with respect to the Guatemalan situation as can be assembled at short notice, (b) a brief account of the historic inter-American context in which the situation arises, including the complex of international commitments within the terms of which it has been our policy and pledge to act; and (c) opinion on the consequences of alternative policies.

[1] In a brief covering memorandum, Mr. Halle noted that the drafting of this memorandum began on the afternoon of May 27.

I. The Guatemalan Situation

[Here follows a description of the Guatemalan economy.]

This typical underdeveloped country is now undergoing the social revolution that typifies underdeveloped countries generally in our time. That revolution is an expression of the impulse to achieve equality of status (a) for individuals and groups within the national society, and (b) for the nation-state within the international community. Social reform and nationalism are its two principal manifestations.

We see the same revolution at various stages of development in Asia and Africa. On our own side of the globe it has taken various acute forms in Argentina, Bolivia, and Mexico—less acute forms elsewhere. It has hardly manifested itself at all, as yet, in Honduras (before May 1), Paraguay, or Haiti.

In Guatemala historic conditions provide substantial fuel to fire the revolution. Foreign ownership of the elements of Guatemala's economic life, together with the pattern of its international trade, gives the Guatemalans a vivid and unwelcome sense of dependence on foreigners. This is not too galling with respect to foreign ownership of coffee plantations, for the owners are scattered individuals of various nationalities who lack collective means of exercising control over the country's economic and social life. The case is different with the utilities, the vital transportation and communication facilities, and the banana empire of the United Fruit Company (which is a monopoly). U.S. ownership is overwhelmingly predominant here.

Up to twenty years ago the United Fruit Company and the International Railways of Central America (now controlled by United Fruit) still practiced marked discrimination against native employees in favor of U.S. employees. Today the Fruit Company is, as it was becoming then, an agent of social betterment; but its past is not forgotten and what really counts is that, whether beneficent or maleficent in its practices, it remains the expression of Guatemala's economic colonialism.

The international Communist movement is certainly not the cause of the social revolution in Guatemala, but it has made the same effort there that it has made everywhere else to harness the revolutionary impulses—nationalism and social reform alike—and exploit them for its own purposes. In Guatemala this effort has been less successful than in Vietnam and perhaps no more successful than it was in Mexico twenty years ago under the regime of Lázaro Cárdenas. It has, however, been impressive in its success, all the circumstances considered. It has achieved a high degree of covert control over the reformist regime of President Arbenz and is dominant in the national labor movement.

The revolution in Guatemala is nationalist and anti-Yanqui in its own right. It is, in its own right, a movement for "social justice" and reform. If the international Communist movement had gained no foothold at all in Guatemala one might expect that the United Fruit Company, the Railways, and the Electric Power Company of Guatemala City would still be the victims of persecution in Guatemala, and that the U.S. would thereby be presented with diplomatic problems of a serious nature. All this is merely aggravated by the participation of Communism, which supplies a leadership and a body of tactical doctrine beyond the capacity of native resources alone.

More serious in its implications is the use that the international Communist movement might make (or be making) of Guatemala as a base from which to operate against the political and social structures of other Latin American states, and from which to organize sabotage of physical installations that contribute to the defense of the Hemisphere. It is the projection of the Communist will from Guatemala across its borders that properly gives us the chief cause for concern.

I attach Intelligence Report No. 6185 of April 30, 1953, on "Guatemalan Support of Subversion and Communist Objectives (1950–1953)".[2] The intelligence that it contains is of activities that do not appear to differ substantially from the normal operations of the Balkan-type intrigue that goes on all the time, and has for decades past, among the Central American states. It is quite normal for Central American political parties and governments to conspire covertly against one another across the international borders. To a Central American politician the obstruction of an international boundary is merely like the net in tennis: it makes the game more sporting. This kind of conspiracy is the expression, in fact of what appears to us sober Norteamericanos to be a frivolous temperamental necessity. One expects it, and the Intelligence Report confirms it. The participation of Communism, however, gives it a sinister character that it would not otherwise have.

It is against this background that one must view the two events which, in this month of May, have aroused our alarm.

1. The first was the initial conspicuous manifestation of social revolution in the hitherto stagnant Republic of Honduras, bordering on Guatemala, in the form of a strike that paralyzed the operations of the United Fruit Company and the Standard Fruit Company. That conditions in Guatemala influenced this development is virtually to be assumed. The plantations owned or serviced by the United Fruit Company on the Gulf of Honduras are scattered on both sides of the boundary between the two republics, which boundary would not be apparent to an airplane flying overhead. Until a few years ago, in fact, the location of the boundary was a matter of opinion, since it had not been demarcated and was in controversy. The local farmers were unsure of their own nationality, gratified the tax-collectors of both countries, and had resigned themselves to being policed alternately by patrols of the two respective armed forces (which had the salutary habit of fleeing from each other at sight).

With social warfare, marked by repeated strikes, being waged in the banana plantations on one side of the border, one might expect and even assume that the fever would sooner or later communicate itself to the plantations on the other side of the border. There are no automobile roads or railways that traverse this border, but mules and men go back and forth without hardship. It would be surprising, moreover, if the Communist-controlled labor-union harassing the United Fruit Company on the Guatemalan side denied itself any reasonable opportunity to promote the harassment of the United Fruit Company on the Honduran side. Finally—if only because intrigue is the Staff of Life for Central American politicians—one would expect individual Guatemalan officials or even the Guatemalan Government itself to become involved here or there, in greater degree or less.

The reasonable suspicion of some Guatemalan complicity in the Honduran strike, however, has not been supported as yet by any evidence in the form of hard facts. Our efforts to discover such facts have led us floundering through rumours and reports for which we could get no substantiation. Our main sources of information have been . . . which has proved itself neither reliable nor altogether disinterested, and . . . which is not disinterested and has been confused or confusing on some points.

Our Embassy in Tegucigalpa (Honduras) manifested alarm, almost from the beginning of the strike, at the prospect it conceived of an armed attack by Guatemala on Honduras. Specifically, the Embassy saw in the dispatch of Honduran troops from the garrisons of Tegucigalpa to the strike-bound area, where they were needed to keep order, an invitation to the Guatemalan Army to march on Tegucigalpa. Our Ambassador[3] had just arrived in Honduras and presumably relied largely on his experience in strife-torn China, which was I believe the only foreign experience he had had. His able deputy[4] was also just off the 'plane, having come from Djakarta. (Old Vice Admiral Johnson used to criticize the Department for this sort of thing, pointing out that the Navy never changed both the Captain and the Executive Officer of a battleship at the same time.)

[4] Wymberley DeR. Coerr.

It was at this point that the intelligence services and experienced officers in the Department could have made a useful contribution in "staffing" the situation. Events moved with such speed and drive, however, that subordinate officers who were caught up in them felt that it was "theirs not to reason why. . . ." Otherwise they might have pointed out that the deterrent to armed attack within Latin America is not in any balance of military powers but in Article 3 of the Rio Treaty, which obligates the U.S. to stop any such attack. This, and not the local garrison, was the shield that defended Tegucigalpa; it virtually insured that no armed attack would be launched.

The unfounded alarm, however, created an atmosphere of emergency in our Government and, communicated to the President and the NSC, led to immediate preparations for meeting a Guatemalan armed attack with U.S. military force.

2. It was in the exhilarating atmosphere thus created that news of the second event was received in the Department. This was the arrival at a Guatemalan port of a Swedish steamer with 1900 or 2000 tons of arms from behind the Iron Curtain for delivery to the Guatemalan Government. What the nature of these arms were we did not know then, nor do we now; although it is evident that any elaborate armed equipment would be useless to the Guatemalans in the absence of special training in its use.

At this point we needed, as we still need, an assessment by military intelligence and OIR of the nature and magnitude of the danger to our security interests that this represented. I have asked OIR/DRA to gather some material on this jointly with G–2. Meanwhile, we should bear in mind that the Guatemalan Army has all along had the capability, in our opinion, of whipping the Honduran Army or even the Honduran, Salvadoran, and Nicaraguan Armies together in any trial of relative strength. This estimate has mere academic significance, for the most part, because of the Rio Treaty.

At a moment, however, when we were preparing for a Guatemalan armed attack on Honduras the news that these arms had been delivered naturally took on added significance. The Department issued a statement[5] "that this is a development of gravity". The President announced that it was "disturbing". The Secretary at his press conference[6] said that it made Guatemala dominant in Central America. The newspapers carried headlines such as: "Dulles Sees Peril to Panama Canal" (N.Y. Times).

At the same time, unconfirmed reports of rumors reached us of two other shiploads of arms from behind the Iron Curtain, perhaps already on the way. We were told that one such shipload might be waiting offshore to move into the dock when the Swedish ship left.

We moved swiftly to prevent the unloading of the Swedish ship, but were unsuccessful. We also took a decision to prevent any further such shipments, even if this should necessitate our use of force on the high seas against friendly foreign flag vessels in violation of international law. In a memorandum of May 20 to Assistant Secretary Holland (copy attached)[7] the Acting Legal Adviser[8] stated: ". . . if the United States were to intercept and escort by force any ships in Guatemalan territorial waters or on the high seas to an American port, there would be no legal justification for such action either under the Rio Treaty or under the United Nations Charter. Such action would constitute a violation of international law, and could be considered an act of war by the countries whose ships were intercepted, and by Guatemala (at least if the interception occurred in that country's territorial waters)." Nevertheless, on May 22, the following decision was made (quoted from S/S–R's Top Secret Summary of Decisions[9] of May 25):

"Foreign Ships Transporting Arms to Guatemala—The Secretary recommended to the President, and obtained Presidential approval, of the following policy with respect to any vessel on the high seas sighted by the US Navy and suspected of transporting arms to Guatemala; 1) if time permits, we shall attempt to persuade the ship's Flag State to divert it to Panama for inspection; 2) if time does not permit the preceding step, our Navy shall detain the ship while we attempt to persuade its Flag State to divert it to Panama for inspection; 3) if neither of the preceding steps is successful, our Navy should, using force as a last resort, escort the ship to Panama for inspection."

Even in the absence of relevant intelligence materials one may offer certain conclusions regarding the effect of this shipment on our national security interests:

(a) We have been withholding military equipment from Guatemala and have been concluding military agreements with Guatemala's neighbors that would call for supplying them with such equipment. This policy was calculated to create dissatisfaction in the Guatemalan Army with the pro-Communist orientation of the Guatemalan Government. The acquisition of arms from behind the Iron Curtain is calculated to neutralize our policy in this respect if those arms are put into the hands of the Guatemalan Army.

(b) If some of the arms are, alternatively, smuggled to dissident groups in neighboring countries they might play a decisive role in any attempt to overthrow the governments of those countries or disrupt civil order. (I have asked OIR/DRA to get together with G–2 for an estimate of (i) the possibilities of successful smuggling, (ii) the precautions against it that may be feasible, and (iii) the amount of smuggling that might have how much effect, etc.)

(c) The fact that Guatemala can and does buy arms from behind the Iron Curtain in defiance or contempt of the U.S. may hurt our prestige in the Hemisphere and elsewhere. It also sets a bad example inside the Hemisphere, suggesting alternatives to dependence on the U.S.

(d) The shipment has a favorable effect on U.S. security interests to the extent that it arouses other Latin American states to the danger posed by Communist influence in Guatemala.

Since the above was written I have received a one-page memorandum prepared in OIR/DRA, which I attach[10] and from which I draw the following. In reply to the question, "What is potential of shipment with respect to subversion outside Guatemala? Possibilities of smuggling, etc.," G–2 has replied:

At present G–2 feels that the effect would be largely psychological. G–2 doubts that the Guatemalan Government will dispose of any of the arms now. They may do so later when they feel more secure.

In reply to other questions it has offered the following:

G–2 and air force intelligence are of the opinion that there is no immediate military threat to the safetv of US. Guatemala's air force is at present qualitatively inferior to that of Honduras and Nicaragua.

Later, May 28, REW, G–2, called me and informally stated that because of training and technical factors matériel received would not substantially increase Guatemala's military capabilities.

At the same time that we have (a) prepared to meet an armed attack by Guatemala on Honduras, and (b) issued orders to our naval forces to prevent the arrival in Guatemala of any further shipments of arms, we have taken other steps designed to elicit the concurrence of other American states in the actions we are taking, may take, or may wish to take. Our embassies have discreetly inquired of the governments of the other Central American states, Mexico, and Panama whether they would request action by us to prevent further shipments. Favorable replies have been received from Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua. We have also been sounding out other American governments to determine the degree of support which might be forthcoming for a proposal that collective action on the arms-shipment be taken under Article 6 of the Rio Treaty, which would require an immediate Meeting of Foreign Ministers of the American Republics (the "Organ of Consultation"). The Chronology of Events attached to this memorandum lists these actions.[11]

II. The Context of Inter-American Agreements

[Here follows extensive discussion of the historical background of the inter-American policy and commitments of the United States.]

III. Policy Alternatives.

Our main policy alternatives with respect to the Guatemalan situation, in the light of the above, are:

(1) To invoke Article 6 of the Rio Treaty now and seek to carry the matter through by obtaining at least 14 Latin American votes (out of 19) for effective action by the U.S. and others to (a) do away with the covert Soviet political aggression in Guatemala, or (b) remedy whatever the situation is that constitutes a threat to the peace of America;

(2) Determining that collective action won't work and that the national safety requires us to take decisive measures now, to conclude that the corollary to a failure of collective responsibility is a return to unilateral intervention and to act accordingly;

(3) Determining that an attempt to get collective action now is too risky and that there is no imminent danger to our national safety, to adopt a policy of watchful waiting in the expectation that if the situation gets worse the chances of getting effective collective action will thereby be increased.

The key to a wise choice among these broad alternatives lies in the answer to two questions: (1) What is the magnitude and imminence of any danger that the present situation holds for us? and (2) How much support for collective action can we expect from the rest of the inter-American community?

(1) As to the first question, the evidence indicates no present military danger to us at all. Although we read public references to the facts that Guatemala is three hours' flying time from the oil-fields of Texas and two hours' flying time from the Panama Canal, we may console ourselves that Guatemala's capability for bombing either is nil. The recent shipment of arms makes no difference to this conclusion, nor would repeated shipments.

Guatemala, moreover, may confidently be expected not to launch an armed attack in the direction of the Panama Canal or in any other direction, since under Article 3 that would at one stroke remove the legal and political impediments which now prevent us from dealing decisively with the situation. If Guatemalan military units on the Honduran border should go berserk and make a dash for Tegucigalpa our policy problem would be solved without military danger to ourselves, and the consequence would be the elimination of any military threat that Guatemala may now offer her neighbors.

The real and direct threat that Guatemala poses for her neighbors is that of political subversion through the kind of across-the-borders intrigue that is a normal feature of the Central American scene. The danger is of Communist contagion and is most immediate with respect to Guatemala's immediate neighbors. The Communist infection is not going to spread to the U.S. but if it should in the fullness of time spread over much of Latin America it would impair the military security of the Hemisphere and thus of the U.S.

The infection could spread by intrigue supplemented by the smuggling of arms—although I note from the attached memorandum that G–2 expects the newly acquired arms to remain in Guatemala for the present. It could also spread through the example of independence of the U.S. that Guatemala might offer to nationalists throughout Latin America. It might spread through the example of nationalism and social reform. Finally and above all, it might spread through the disposition the Latin Americans would have to identify themselves with little Guatemala if the issue should be drawn for them (as it is being drawn for them), not as that of their own security but as a contest between David Guatemala and Uncle Sam Goliath. This latter, I think, is the danger we have most to fear and to guard against.

(2) How much support for collective action can we expect from the rest of the inter-American community? I have asked OIR for an estimate and it is being prepared. Meanwhile, I call your attention to the attached OIR/DRA memorandum of this date entitled "The Caracas Resolution on Communist Intervention in the Hemisphere".[12]

The nationalistic and reformist elements in the Guatemalan situation have hitherto loomed larger for the Latin Americans than the element of international Communism. They believe that we exaggerate the latter for our own purposes, and this belief is not weakened when we meet it with redoubled protestations. The United Fruit Company is a symbol of colonialism in their eyes which they equate with other like enterprises within their own respective jurisdictions. Under the circumstances, the more we have viewed the Guatemalan situation with alarm the more they have tended to view it with complacency. (There is a parallel, here, in the respective attitudes of the U.S. and India towards Indochina.) The same thing happened in the case of the U.S. vs. Argentina. The disposition develops among the Latin Americans to look upon the whole business as a David–Goliath contest in which they identify themselves naturally with David. (See attached OIR memorandum of this date[13] on the growth of Societies of the Friends of Guatemala.)

These inclinations of the Latin Americans are in part masked when it comes to a conference like that of Caracas, since we are able to put considerable indirect pressure upon them to get their votes. But the 17 votes for our anti-Communist resolution at Caracas were granted only after the resolution had been watered down to the point of saying virtually nothing, and then grudgingly. The speeches indicated that there was more fear of U.S. interventionism than of Guatemalan communism. The pressures we brought to bear were resented and the scars remain. We should not, therefore, be deceived by the fact that 17 out of 19 were officially "for us".

Without having an OIR estimate on this I can only guess. My guess is that under present circumstances we could hardly win more than a Pyrrhic victory in a meeting of the Organ of Consultation, obtaining fourteen votes for relatively innocuous measures only by putting the thumbscrews on our neighbors. I doubt that it would be worth it in terms of the consequent further deterioration of our relations with Latin America in general. However, we ought to have, and promptly, a very thorough OIR estimate on this.

If the above analyses are sound the conclusion must be that the time is not ripe for collective inter-American action under the Rio treaty. This conclusion is reinforced by the indications that the situation poses no immediate danger for us. The conclusion raises the question, however, of what policy we should follow to expedite the ripening of time.

In this connection it seems to me that the two events which have so aroused us are as if calculated for our advantage. In the absence of undue excitement on our part they are bound to arouse alarm among Guatemala's neighbors, which alarm would tend to communicate itself throughout Latin America. If other like events ensued, the alarm would increase—but we would not ourselves be directly endangered. The Latin Americans would begin to ask whether the U.S. could be counted on to defend them against this growing menace. At that point they would be in the suppliant position vis-à-vis us rather than ourselves being suppliants to them. And this would be proper, for their danger is the greater. We could at this point act the part of the big brother who was not scared for himself but would stand by his small neighbors and live up to his commitments.

But if we present, instead, the spectacle of the elephant shaking with alarm before the mouse, if Guatemala disturbs us by gaining military dominance in Central America and imperilling our Canal in Panama, then the prestige of underdog Guatemala will be greatly enhanced throughout Latin America and Asia, and Latin American bosoms will (secretly or otherwise) swell with pride at the spectacle of one of the least among them actually arousing us to alarm for our own safety. Our own prestige and influence will be correspondingly diminished and the time will not ripen as we would wish it to.

We could be quite complacent about the Indochinese situation if only we could afford to let it get worse until the corresponding alarm in India and Indonesia made it possible to deal with that situation by really effective united action. Unfortunately, our danger there is extreme and we cannot be complacent about allowing it to get worse. The Guatemalan situation, however, can safely get worse and, if one leaves historical caprice out of account, cannot get better until it does get worse.

If we should adopt, instead, the second alternative of intervening unilaterally with whatever force was necessary we would, in effect, be making a colony of Guatemala that we could maintain only by continued force, and by so doing we would turn all of Latin America against us to the advantage of the international Communist movement. If our intervention was less than decisive the Argentine experience would be repeated and we would have strengthened Communism in Guatemala while antagonizing Latin America generally.

It would seem to me wise for us to countermand the present orders to our naval forces in the Caribbean and, for the rest, to take a more relaxed attitude generally. In this connection we ought also avoid needlessly alarming and arousing our own public, for that would end by making the pursuit of a considered policy impossible.

The Acting Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic Offices in the American Republics[1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, May 29, 1954—6 p.m.

442. Inform Govt at highest level that US believes immediate consideration should be given to holding consultative meeting under Rio Treaty, Article 6, to consider situation created by extensive penetration Guatemalan Govt by international communist organization and recent clandestine deliveries arms from Soviet orbit to Guatemala. US

[1] Drafted by Assistant Secretary Holland, Ambassador Dreier, Director of the Office of South American Affairs Atwood, and Director of the Office of Middle American Affairs Burrows; signed for the Acting Secretary by Mr. Holland. Sent to diplomatic offices in the American Republics, except Guatemala City and Rio de Janeiro; repeated for information to the Embassies in Guatemala City and Rio de Janeiro, and also to USUN in New York.

feels consultative meeting should be called only if required ⅔ majority (14) agrees to support action under the Rio Treaty as outlined below. We feel this majority assured. FYI however your approach must not be such as will commit US to calling meeting. End FYI.

Our idea is that meeting, if held, should be called by US for about July 1, be brief, and confined to single topic and adoption of one main resolution. Although Uruguayan Govt has not been consulted, US prefers Montevideo as site.

US would propose that meeting adopt resolution covering following points:

1. Finding that international communist organization has achieved extensive penetration of Guatemalan institutions; that in this context, recent covert movement of arms from iron curtain countries to Guatemala has created present threat to sovereignty and political independence of other American States, endangering peace of America; and that any further substantial shipments of arms to Guatemala would further endanger peace.

2. Recommendation that American Republics immediately take measures necessary to prevent further shipments of arms to Guatemala and travel of communist agents to and from that country, and inform SC of UN of such measures. (Under this recommendation US visualizes concrete action such as detention and inspection of ships and other means of transport.)

3. Recommendation for continued exchange of views and info re present danger and means of maintaining peace, security of continent.

4. Call to Guatemala to eliminate agents international communist organization and resume rightful place as member American nations dedicated defense America against all forms foreign intervention.

Request early expression views of Govt on holding meeting and proposed resolution outlined above.

Main points to stress to Govts are:

1. Guatemala is one of several points of current conflict between Soviet communism and free nations throughout the world. Situation constitutes test as to whether international communist organization can achieve establishment communist controlled state this hemisphere. Communist success Guatemala would therefore have worldwide significance as demonstration ineffectiveness regional organizations of free nations and power of communist forces establish subservient regimes even beyond immediate sphere of communist military power. Communist world hopes demonstrate inability of American nations to resist subversive penetration by joint action and thereby discredit OAS, the oldest and most effective regional organization.

2. Delivery on Alfhem of arms known to have come from communist controlled territory offers further evidence Moscow has chosen Guatemala for special effort, having in mind its small size, proximity to Panama Canal, fluid internal political situation, and opportunity for communist agents to seize leadership and disguise their work as genuine Guatemalan nationalistic campaign against United Fruit Company.

3. While every important US interest in Guatemala including UFCO is under attack, our concern about communist penetration would be just as great if this were not true. In defending US enterprises in Guatemala we have followed clear and consistent policy established in other similar cases, namely, representations requesting due process of law and prompt, adequate and effective compensation for expropriated properties. Prior to presentation UFCO claim, US formally and publicly proposed it be settled by arbitration or adjudication by international tribunal. This proposal still stands. Guatemala has ignored this proposal and on contrary attempted to obscure issue of Communist penetration by constantly dragging in Fruit Company dispute.

4. Brief of evidence[2] re extent and nature communist penetration Guatemala being air mailed. Analysis reveals in Guatemala all signs which have identified similar occurrences elsewhere under direction Kremlin including methods of achieving initial penetration, training of leaders, extensive use of popular front organizations, blind adherence Moscow party line. While preserving appearance of small minority party, communists have here as elsewhere succeeded in substituting small informal communist controlled councils for lawful policy making bodies.

In addition to foregoing emphasize to Govt we have no quarrel with Guatemalan people, have no desire adopt measures more severe than those required combat problem posed by communist penetration in Guatemala. US is determined make every effort to achieve demonstration that collective procedures of OAS are adequate and effective in dealing with the major threat to continental peace and security implicit in the Guatemalan situation.

Embassy should note that our case rests upon the conclusion that in the present context of extensive communist penetration of Guatemala the delivery of substantial amounts of arms has created a threat to the peace. FYI This decision reached in order to secure support of those nations not now prepared to support more exacting finding contemplated by Res 93 of Caracas which would call for a collective determination that the international communist movement dominates and controls the political institutions of Guatemala.

FYI Guatemala undertaking intensive campaign among foreign offices oppose consultative meeting.

FYI Brazil has endorsed our position and will take lead in approaching Bolivia, Chile, Paraguay and Uruguay. Embassies those countries and Cuba, Venezuela should await special instructions. End FYI.

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 30, 1954.

OFFICIAL–INFORMAL

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: As I write this on Sunday morning, you will have the telegram [1] we sent out yesterday afternoon instructing our missions in the other Latin American Republics to sound out the opinion of the governments to which they are accredited on holding an OAS meeting on Guatemala about July 1.

This represents an important modification of the tactics here as respects the Conference. You should know, however, that basic thinking is that if we obtain a resolution requiring the prevention of movements of arms and Communist agents to Guatemala, this will enable us to stop ships including our own to such an extent that it will disrupt Guatemala's economy. The idea is that this will accelerate one of two developments: either it will encourage the Army or some other non-Communist elements to seize power or the Communists will exploit the situation to extend their control. If the latter occurs, it is thought, it will justify the American community, or if they won't go along, the U.S. to take strong measures.

With this in the back of the policy making minds, a decision crystallized gradually over the past week to retreat from the former intent to call an OAS meeting to haul Guatemala up under the Caracas Resolution which in effect would have called for a finding by two-thirds of the States that Guatemala's political institutions were under the "domination and control of international Communism". With the Alfhem case fresh, it was thought more Latin Americans would go along under Article 6 of the Rio Treaty on a case of threat to the peace, based on "extensive penetration" of Guatemala by international Communism plus the arrival of arms from the Soviet orbit. It was also thought that a resolution calling only for prevention of movement of arms and agents would get more votes than one calling for economic sanctions or other tough action.

The opinion here seems to be that we have the necessary fourteen votes. Brazil is enthusiastic to the extent of undertaking to sound out and line up Uruguay, Paraguay, Bolivia and Chile. Our soundings there are being delayed until the Brazilians have had their say. Ambassador Zuleta Angel of Colombia was called in to see Mr. Holland last night [2] and said he was sure there would be at least sixteen or seventeen affirmative votes for our resolution as described in the circular. Ambassador Facio of Costa Rica was in later and said to be willing to urge his government to go along[3] and the Panamanian Ambassador[4] was called in this morning with results yet unknown to me.[5] Mexico, under Ambassador White's manipulation is more tractable than I would have thought; our cause has been helped by the Guatemalan Ambassador in Panama's boner in telling President Remón that the Alfhem arms even loaded at Veracruz, and allegation that seems to have made Padilla Nervo, the Mexican Foreign Minister, hopping mad.

In the discussions in the Department which I have attended, I have pointed out what I consider some of the shortcomings of the present tactics: I have heavily stressed that external pressures, whether economic sanctions or more informal interruption of trade, should be supplemented by a more definite plan of action in the country or the Communists may well be the chief beneficiaries of the dislocations caused. Our problem of dislodging them then would perhaps have more serious proportions than is realized. I have also taken the line that if an OAS meeting is held a strong rather [than a?] wild resolution should be forced, if at all possible, because the resolution as now drawn[6] will not appear to represent a determined effort to eradicate Communism since it will not be apparent from it that commerce is to be disrupted. I fear that if we do interrupt commerce under the resolution we will be charged with unilateral intervention not only by Guatemala but also by other nations who will have voted for the resolution without specifically endorsing what is tantamount to economic sanctions. I have also argued that we are going to be in an odd position ourselves in stopping our own ships which carry the bulk of the commerce to Guatemala ostensibly to inspect them for arms and Communist agents after they have loaded at U.S. ports.

The telegram[7] which went to you yesterday asking for me to remain here was based on the week's developments. The OAS case, the current shipping cases, and the Honduran situation have added enormously to the workload and I have had to pitch in on all of them. Ambassador Dreier has now been assigned physically to assemble the "case" on Guatemala and Mr. Holland wants me to help him. I am also continuing to lend a hand to Ambassadors Donnelly and Pawley on their many projects, the most active of which to date has been the organization of our Naval surveillance of the Caribbean and the inspection of ships. The Department thus has a real need for someone with a speaking acquaintance with the problems of the area. On the other hand, I have pointed out that I am the only full time political officer on your staff and that in these critical times in Guatemalan affairs that is rather essential. It is a question of choosing between evils.

Editorial Note

On June 2, 1954, at 9:22 a.m., the President's Press Secretary, James C. Hagerty, called Secretary Dulles to inquire about the status of several foreign policy issues in preparation for the President's press conference scheduled for 10:30 a.m. that morning. Secretary Dulles recorded their conversation concerning Guatemala as follows:

"4. Guatemala. If asked about our intention of getting the Caracas resolution injected, the Sec. said he is not up to date on that. We are checking up on ships. Doubt was thrown on the ships involved in the Guatemala incident because of the manifest. If asked re the President of Guatemala saying he would meet with the President if the President so invited him, the Sec. suggested ducking anything further on this. The issue is not between governments, but whether it is subject to control of international communism, which the Caracas Resolution said is a threat to security." (Eisenhower Library, Dulles papers, "White House Telephone Conversations")

The record of President Eisenhower's press conference is in Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Dwight D. Eisenhower, 1954, pages 526–533.

The Ambassador in Guatemala (Peurifoy) to the Department of State

SECRET PRIORITY GUATEMALA CITY, June 2, 1954—midnight.
[Received June 2—5:58 p. m.]

866. Re Embtel 816, June 1.[1] Toriello's proposal for appointment non-government commission by Presidents Eisenhower and Arbenz to discuss problems affecting relations between two countries obviously designed to gain time to permit lowering of recent local tensions which have caused grave concern in Guatemalan Government circles and have greatly heartened opposition. Let-down in tensions following crisis caused by arrival arms already noticeable and they can be expected to decline further when government press seizes upon omission of economic sanctions from agenda of proposed Montevideo conference[2] as evidence of strong Latin American support for Guatemala. Government's recent moves against opposition elements may also depress opposition morale. (Embtel 848, May 31.)[3]

Under circumstances, it is desirable steps be taken to maintain tensions. Two such steps which occur to me are:

1. President Eisenhower might care to reply to pre-arranged questions in his next press conference that he has made no proposal of any kind for discussion of differences between US and Guatemala but state Department proposal for direct negotiation or arbitration of UFCO claims was rejected by Guatemalan Government.[4] President might wish to add that he doubted visit by President Arbenz to Washington would be conducive to solution of problems in US-Guatemala relations as long as Communists retain their influence in Guatemalan political circles. These statements would scotch rumors of possible direct conversations between President Eisenhower and Ar-

[1] Telegram 816 is not dated June 1; presumably the reference is to telegram 860, in which Ambassador Peurifoy reported that at a meeting with Foreign Minister Toriello that day to continue discussion of mutual problems begun May 24, 1954, the Foreign Minister stated that after consultation with President Arbenz he had decided that the best way to improve relations between Guatemala and the United States would be the adoption of the proposal made by President Eisenhower, on the occasion of Toriello's farewell call in January 1954, for the appointment of a non-governmental, neutral commission authorized to discuss all outstanding problems (714.00/6–154). For the memorandum of conversation between President Eisenhower and then Ambassador Toriello, dated Jan. 16, see p. 1095.

[3] In the referenced telegram Ambassador Peurifoy reported renewed searches by Guatemalan authorities of the residences of opposition elements (714.00/5–3154).

benz and would make it difficult for Toriello to persist in his claim that President Eisenhower had proposed discussion of Guatemalan differences by an impartial board.[5]

2. US Government might within next few days give notice intention denounce reciprocal trade treaty with Guatemala. This would cause great uncertainty in Guatemalan Government, business and other circles as it would be interpreted as preliminary to application of economic sanctions by US Government. Denunciation would not only have immediate impact on political circles but would cause increasing concern during six-month period between denunciation of treaty and its expiration, particularly since new coffee crop will begin to move in December. Denunciation could be made on grounds that Guatemalan Government has repeatedly contravened terms of agreement and has not given us courtesy of substantive reply to its protests of these contraventions except in one instance in which its arguments were unsubstantial.[6] See Embassy Despatches 877, April 26, 1954; 773, March 10, 1954; 750 March 2, 1954.[7]

PEURIFOY

[5] In telegram 870, from Guatemala City, dated June 2, 1954, Ambassador Peurifoy reported that Foreign Minister Toriello stated that he had changed his mind about requesting a presidential commission because he had received information that the United States "was holding consultations which had progressed very far toward a meeting of OAS." (714.00/6–254)

[6] The Department's telegram 1194, to Guatemala City, dated June 8, 1954, reads in part as follows: "Department desires avoid action suggestive of unilateral economic sanctions against Guatemala which would prejudice quick adoption our [anti-Communist] resolution at proposed consultative meeting; therefore does not favor denunciation trade agreement this moment." (714.00/6–254)

OFFICIAL–INFORMAL

DEAR JACK: Your puzzlement over the Department's circular telegram 442 of May 29[1] as outlined in your letter of June 1[2] is readily understood. You should have received an individual message to clarify it, and I am only sorry that in the rush of things here (which, believe me, surpasses all understanding) we did not think to give this proper consideration.

[1] Ante, p. 1149.

[2] Not found in Department of State files.

The policy outlined has a very definite purpose. First, by asking for advance OAS concurrence on a specific resolution, it is hoped that we may be assured of the votes in advance of a meeting and limit the meeting to the merest formality of approval, thereby avoiding a long drawn out debate and resulting bitterness and disunity. Second, by limiting the resolution to one authorization, believed to be the minimum step in the present circumstances, and one on which general concurrence is most likely to be obtained, it is hoped that success will be certain. Third, since the resolution is so drawn as to permit examination of traffic in both directions, it will be possible to halt effectively the normal flow of commerce. Fourth, this halting or interruption will be as effective as the most specific economic sanctions, which if proposed on their own would fall into certain opposition. Thus, in total, it is expected that we will achieve the ends desired by an easier and quicker route.

The matter was given pretty thorough consideration at the highest levels here and the decision is pretty solid. Further, it is one which has so far been easily sold to our colleagues in Washington missions, and replies from the field are so far entirely encouraging.

There is one thing which I think you can be assured of and that is that we are on the road of settling this problem, either by the means now devised or by some other means should these not succeed. There is 100 percent determination here, from the top down, to get rid of this stinker and not to stop until that is done. For this reason, our morale is rather high and I am sure the Embassy's will correspond as the methods utilized become more understandable.

With all our good wishes and regards,

Sincerely yours, RAYMOND G. LEDDY

Whereas

The nations of America have long recognized a historic mission to create on this Continent a society in which man shall enjoy a greater degree of political liberty, economic well being, and social and cultural advancement, than has heretofore been achieved in the world.

The American republics, recognizing that the need for progress toward that high objective is still great, are determined to press forward toward more perfect political and social institutions guaranteeing to their citizens an increasing measure of personal freedom and happiness.

The measure of freedom already achieved by the peoples of this Continent should be continually improved and not impaired by extracontinental intervention.

The objectives of the International Communist movement, as demonstrated by the coercion and repression instituted in nations and areas subjected to its domination, are directly contrary to the aforementioned purposes of the American nations.

The American republics recognize that the ultimate goal of International Communism is the domination of the whole world by the unlawful processes of violence, subversion and conspiracy.

There is increasing evidence that the International Communist movement is attempting with special vigor at this time to establish a center of strength in the Americas from which to extend its influence throughout the Continent.

The danger inherent in the establishment of such a center of the International Communist movement in this Continent is to be measured not by the dimensions of the state which might fall victim to such an attempt but by the vast power and resources available to the world Communist organization.

On a number of occasions the American States have enunciated their determination to discover, condemn and eliminate from this Hemisphere every attempt by the International Communist movement to effect a penetration of the political institutions of any American State and to intervene in American affairs.

From the moment in which the American republics gained their independence, their statesmen and their peoples have proclaimed the necessity for eternal vigilance to maintain that independence in the face of any form of imperialistic intervention or encroachment from outside the Continent.

The Organization of American States is the appropriate collective instrument through which the nations of this Continent can coordinate their will and arrive at collective decisions, in accordance with existing treaties, to protect their independence, their sovereignty and their way of life.

The Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance in Article 6 states that the Organ of Consultation shall meet in case of any fact or situation affecting the integrity of the territory or the sovereignty or political independence of an American State that might endanger the peace of America.

The Tenth Inter-American Conference recognized the present danger posed in this Hemisphere by the International Communist Movement, expressing the determination of the American States to take necessary measures against the intervention of International Communism and calling for consultation and the adoption of appropriate action in the event of the domination or control of an American State by the International Communist movement.

And Considering:

That a large, clandestine shipment of arms and munitions of war, despatched from European territory dominated by the International Communist movement, reached Guatemalan territory on board the S.S. Alfhem on May 15, 1954; and

That the quantity of arms so delivered has substantially increased the pre-existing preponderant military power of Guatemala in the Central American area; and

That evidence has been presented from various authoritative sources regarding the penetration of the political institutions of the Republic of Guatemala by the International Communist movement.

The Fifth Meeting of Consultation of Ministers of Foreign Affairs, as Organ of Consultation, Finds:

That the International Communist organization has achieved extensive penetration of the political institutions of the Republic of Guatemala; a penetration so extensive as to create the danger that the Guatemalan state, like others which have been subjected by International Communism, will be deprived of its independence and become subordinated to the International Communist conspiracy to achieve world domination through violence and subversion.

That in this context the recent covert movement to Guatemala of arms and munitions of war from European territory dominated by the International Communist movement has created a threat to the sovereignty and political independence of other American States, endangering the peace of America; and

That so long as the penetration by International Communism of the Guatemalan political institutions remains unchanged and the preponderance of Guatemalan military force in the area persists, any further substantial movement to Guatemala of arms or munitions of war would seriously increase the danger to the peace of America;

Recommends:

That so long as the danger above referred to subsists the American republics undertake as preventive measures the detention and inspection of vessels, aircraft and other means of conveyance moving to and from the Republic of Guatemala, in order to insure against the further introduction of arms and implements of war into that country, as well as travel by agents of International Communism between that country and territory dominated by the International Communist movement.

That a commission comprised of representatives of (name 5 countries) shall assist the Member States in the application and coordination of the preventative measures specified above and shall recommend to the American Governments through the Council of the OAS the termination of such measures when the commission finds that the circumstances justifying them no longer exist.

That the American Governments continue an exchange of views and information regarding the presently existing danger and means of maintaining the peace and security of the Continent; and

Calls upon:

Guatemala, as a sister republic in the American family, to eliminate agents and collaborators of the International Communist movement, resuming her rightful place among the nations dedicated to the defense of the American hemisphere against all forms of foreign intervention.

Notes of a Meeting of the Guatemalan Group, Held in the Department of State, June 9, 1954[1]

Present: Holland, Pawley, Dreier, Leddy . . ., Woodward, Burrows, Atwood, Sanders, Wieland, Herron, Pearson

1. Consultation on Draft Resolution

(a) Holland reported a number of conversations with the Ambassadors here on the text of the draft resolution. However, it is too early to determine how many of the LA countries would accept it as it stands.

(b) It was agreed that AR under Dreier's direction should draft all outgoing cables on this subject that were not drafted by Holland himself. Also, AR will be responsible for all messages relating to the OAS meeting with appropriate checking with other officers of the Bureau.

(c) It was decided not to give the draft resolution general distribution to the LA or OAS Ambassadors in Washington until it breaks publicly.

(d) Wieland is to prepare guidance for USIA for use when the draft resolution appears publicly.

[1] Prepared by Mr. Pearson.

(e) It was decided not to suggest to the LA countries that they have their Ambassadors negotiate the text here.

(f) Burrows was to cable Hill to tell the Costa Rican Government that if Figueres will agree to the text of the draft resolution, Hill will be in a position to put pressure on the Department to hasten the delivery of arms.

(g) Holland wanted to be sure that an answer was going out to Beaulac's query as to how many approvals we had for the meeting and the draft resolution.

2. Consultation with LA Ambassadors to UN

(a) Dreier reported a message was being sent to Wadsworth to instruct USUN to (1) give necessary background materials to the LA Ambassadors, and (2) stress the importance of the Guatemalan problem to us.

(b) Dreier was to talk with Key concerning the desirability of Holland's having a dinner for the LA Ambassadors to the UN in order to meet them and explain our position on the Guatemalan problem.

3. Consultation with West European Maritime (WEM) Countries

(a) Holland asked that three documents—Communism in Guatemala, the Communist Party in Guatemala, and Communist Penetration of Czechoslovakia and Guatemala—be sent to our Embassies in the WEM countries for their use in getting across the necessary background to the respective governments.

(b) Woodward was asked to talk with Merchant in an effort to get advice and help from EUR on this phase of our problem.

(c) It was decided that in our reply to Bonn concerning claims arising from our stopping ships we should hedge since . . . the source of any indemnification is not clear.

[Here follow paragraphs 4 through 7 dealing with procedural aspects of the proposed OAS conference.]

8. Withdrawing Technical Assistance from Guatemala

It was decided that we would not withdraw the nine technical assistance people and their families from Guatemala any time before the OAS meeting. Stassen and the Defense people had recommended immediate withdrawal. Holland pointed out that immediate withdrawal would be contrary to the main line he had followed with the LA Ambassadors that we would not take any unilateral economic or other steps before the meeting.[2]

9. Preparation of the Case

(a) It was decided that not only would the details of our case be made available to the LA countries in advance, but we would ask any Ambassador who might be useful to help in the actual preparation of the case. Zuleta was particularly anxious to help. If several participated, the parallel approach in the calling of the meeting would be strengthened.

(b) Dreier was to send a message to Peurifoy to get his views on what he thought the Guatemalans would present at the meeting, but the actual coordination and preparation would be done here in Washington.

(c) Sanders reported that some chapters of the case would be completed by the end of this week and ready for Holland's examination Monday, June 14. Holland said the case would not be completed until the eve of the meeting because of the constant adjustments which would have to be made.

(d) Holland put considerable stress on the need for us to develop the Guatemalan case in actual written outline so that we would be sure that our own case took account of all the points.

10. Anticipating Guatemalan Maneuvers Before the Meeting

At this point Holland read a memorandum. . . .

(a) Holland indicated we must be in a position to counter a move by Arbenz in which he may fire a few Communists and superficially reorganize his government.[3]

. . . . . .

11. Economic Measures

(a) Holland reported that the proposed statement by the President on lead and zinc, sugar, and Venezuelan oil would not be made. Instead, it has been decided that the President will make the decision on lead and zinc, followed presumably by a public statement on this subject. Hol-

[2] In a memorandum to Governor Stassen concerning the subject of withdrawing FOA aid from Guatemala, dated June 14, 1954, William M. Rand, Deputy Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, stated in part that "at the June 2 OCB luncheon I took the position that, by leaving our men in Guatemala, we had a line of communication, we had the friendship of the people, and we were doing a job of mercy with our hospital work and could possibly be valuable." (ICA Director's Files, FRC 56 A 632, "Latin America")

[3] A telegram from Guatemala dated June 9, 1954, stated that information had been received indicating that representatives of the Guatemalan Council of National Defense had called on President Arbenz ostensibly to thank him for procuring arms, but actually to declare the army's anti-Communist solidarity and to request that he rid the government of Communists. Another telegram from Guatemala reads as follows: "Officer corps torn between conflicting loyalties . . . and forthright declaration U.S. intentions may sparkplug opposition."

land would try to get some Congressmen and Senators to make statements opposing restrictive trade measures by this Government.

(b) Atwood called attention to an Eximbank announcement to be made tomorrow on subjects included in the economic memorandum.

(c) Atwood noted the Bolivian reference to their need of an economic program appearing with their reply on the OAS meeting.

(d) Atwood was to prepare a memorandum for Holland indicating whether or not we should get RFC to change its decision on the terms of the recent tin purchase from Bolivia which resulted in $350,000 less for Bolivia.

(e) Holland expressed the view that there would be no other economic price for the OAS than the Bolivian aid program.

12. Congressional Consultation

(a) Pearson was to arrange consultative meetings with the LA Subcommittees of the House Foreign Affairs and the Senate Foreign Relations Committees at which Holland was to (1) bring the Subcommittees up to date on developments, and (2) endeavor to get some of them to issue statements or make speeches opposing restrictive trade measures by the U.S.

(b) Burrows and Atwood were to brief Holland for these meetings.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Jamison; signed by Assistant Secretary Holland.

[2] Reference is to the effort of the United States to document a case against Guatemala for presentation to the OAS proving Guatemalan encouragement of Communist infiltration into Honduras and El Salvador.

[3] The Department's telegram 518, to Tegucigalpa, sent also to Guatemala City, dated June 4, 1954, reads in part as follows: "Department considers proof of connection between Guatemala and strikes in Honduras is of utmost importance in presentation case at proposed OAS meeting, as means of proving threat to peace and security exists from Guatemala affecting sovereignty and political independence of other Central American Governments. Embassy should therefore continue to press Honduran Government to prepare convincing case against Guatemala." (363/5–3054)

[4] In telegram 437, from Tegucigalpa, dated June 9, 1954, Ambassador Willauer stated in part the following: "Doing our best meet requirements evidence proposed OAS meeting but very gloomy as to evidentiary value as distinguished from circumstantial value material available from Honduras. that which shows any kind of Guatemalan connection (preferably official but communist unofficial will be valuable), with events which have had the purpose or effect of undermining the stability of the Honduran government. Finding of proposed resolution (Depcirtel 459)[5] is that in context of communist penetration Guatemala, receipt Alfhem arms by that country has created threat to other American States. Therefore any data which demonstrates that Guatemala has overtly or covertly sponsored, supported or tolerated interventionist activities in other countries is needed. What is important at this stage is to show to extent possible any Guatemalan connection with items such as seven listed urtel 437. On basis Embassy reports Department has publicly referred to "interesting coincidence" in fact strikes occurred in area in which Guatemalan government sent three consuls subsequently declared personae non gratae. Reasons for action re consuls and lack authorization landing Guatemalan plane, as well as charge that map spotting UFCO properties found in plane must therefore be documented if at all possible. Other evidence, such as identification by name Guatemalans arrested or known to have been in strike zone instigating communist or strike activities, source and nature broadcasts clandestine radio stations agitating strikes, and press clippings speeches strike leaders reflecting party line highly useful. Hondurans should also develop facts re charge Guatemalan group sent to kidnap and murder exiled Guatemalan leader Castillo Armas. . . .

While it preferable Honduras present any hard facts this kind on its own, and you should encourage them do so, we should be in position use them if Honduras does not.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 12, 1954.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to the request of the Department of State dated May 22, 1954,[1] to the Deputy Secretary of Defense, for assistance in preventing the delivery of contraband arms cargoes from Europe to Guatemala. It is my understanding that the Chief of Naval Operations is attempting to determine the identity of ships suspected of carrying such cargoes to Guatemala, and to divert them to Panama or to a United States port for inspection. I now wish to confirm conversations between officers of both Departments concerning orders by the Chief of Naval Operations to effect this purpose.

It is understood by the Department of State that suspected ships are of three categories, each of which lists specific ships after consultation and agreement between the Department of State and Department of the Navy. Category A are those ships which, in most cases, have been reported as carrying arms to Guatemala or are known illicit traders; Category B are ships of Soviet or Soviet Bloc registry encountered in the Caribbean, on a course for or in the Gulf of Honduras. Category C are those ships which have sailed from Iron Curtain ports within the past sixty days and which enter the Gulf of Honduras.

With respect to the above-stated categories, it is the desire of the Department of State that the task units of the Department of the Navy will provide surveillance of designated areas and of the suspected vessels in accordance with the following instructions: If time permits, upon sighting of a vessel on the suspect list worked out jointly by the Department of State and the Navy, the Navy units should without detaining the ship inform the Chief of Naval Operations so that the Department of State may attempt to obtain authorization from the flag state or from the Organization of American States to order it to Panama or to a United States port for inspection. The Department realizes, however, that it will be very difficult, if not impossible, for a ship to be trailed from the limits of surveillance areas to the limits of the territorial waters of Guatemala pending the receipt of instructions from the Chief of Naval Operations. Therefore, if time does not permit the surveillance, it is recommended that the ships in the suspect category lists A, B, or C, be detained as they enter the Gulf of Honduras surveillance area on a course for Puerto Barrios, and that the Chief of Naval Operations be informed in order to obtain further instruction. The Department of State would then desire to be consulted at once, so that steps can be taken to persuade the flag state, or the Organization of American States if the Department of State is unable to obtain the approval of the flag state, to approve the detention of the ship and to divert the detained ship to Panama or a United States port for inspection. In the case of ships which refuse to identify themselves while on a course for Puerto Barrios in the surveillance area, they should be detained until the identity is established. The procedures for the three categories (or for non-suspect ships) can then be followed.

It should be pointed out that in case of suspected vessels the Department of State will seek prior permission to divert the suspected vessel to Panama. Only if the Department of State cannot secure approval for the detention of the ship from its own state, and if it cannot obtain a decision from the Organization of American States authorizing the detention of the ship, will the Department of the Navy forcibly divert the ship to Panama or to a United States port for inspection of its cargo, and in every case the Department of the Navy will act only with the concurrence of the Department of State.

It will be appreciated if the Navy will take the precaution to assure that the ships in the area will be properly instructed with respect to its duties in this surveillance action.

Sincerely yours,

For the Secretary of State
HENRY F. HOLLAND
Assistant Secretary

SECRET NIACT WASHINGTON, June 13, 1954—10:50 p.m.

(1) For three paragraph section beginning "That a large, clandestine" and ending "international communist movement" substitute the following:

"1. That a large clandestine shipment of arms and munitions of war reached Guatemalan territory on board the M/S Alfhem on May 15, 1954; and

2. That said arms and munitions of war were despatched from European territory dominated by the international communist movement and have created a state of tension in Central America; and

3. That evidence has been presented from various authoritative sources regarding the penetration of the political institutions of the Republic of Guatemala by the international communist movement; and

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Secretary of State[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 15, 1954.

Subject: Draft Press Statement by President on Guatemala

Attached as Tab A is a draft of press conference statement[2] submitted by the CIA to Mr. Hagerty for use at the President's press conference on Wednesday, June 16.

I most vigorously oppose the use of this statement.

Our whole plan for an OAS meeting on Guatemala is based upon the principle that the United States is undertaking to solve this problem without unilateral intervention, whether political or economic, in Guatemalan affairs. I have reiterated this again and again to every Latin American Ambassador and so have our Ambassadors in those capitals.

The CIA very understandably wants to bring both political and economic pressure to bear in Guatemala at this time. From their point of view I can see that this is logical. I object strenuously, however, because by following this course we will demonstrate that our assertions regarding the OAS meeting are not true. On the one hand, we would be avowing a laudable determination to forebear from all uni-

[2] The draft statement reads as follows:

"The current crisis in Guatemala grows out of the attempt to convert its communist infiltrated government into an out-and-out communist dictatorship. A few days ago the regime officially announced the suspension of civil liberties and rounded up many prominent non-communists. Now we hear of an order directing that part of the recent shipment of arms from behind the Iron Curtain is to be distributed to communist cadres. Clearly these moves, all too familiar as steps in a communist takeover, are not being made in response to any external threat. The truth is that they are prompted by the increasing awareness of the communist threat and growing anti-communism of the enormous majority of the Guatemalan people and above all of the Guatemalan army. These same circumstances give us reason to hope and expect that the loyal anti-communists in the country will themselves clean their own house."

lateral action and, on the other hand, through the President of the United States we would be indulging in the most direct unilateral political intervention.

The results, in my judgment, would be disastrous to our proposed OAS meeting.

Attached as Tab B is a recommended substitute.[3]

4. Guatemala—Allen Dulles and the CIA yesterday had prepared a brief memorandum[1] for the President which was sent first to the State Department and which I actually did not see. Their memorandum, however, had the President backing "their form of activity in Guatemala". Dulles rejected this memorandum because he was afraid if the President supported the CIA, it would lead to charges that the President and this country were supporting revolutionary activities within Guatemala and would place the President in the dangerous position of appealing to citizens of a foreign country to revolt against their leaders. Instead the State Department recommended (which was later approved by the President) that the President merely say that the current crisis in Guatemala shows a "disturbing tenor to change its Communist-infiltrated government into an out and out Communist dictatorship. A few days ago the regime officially announced the suspension of constitutional liberties. This was immediately followed by a wave of arrests of anti-Communists. Others are fleeing the country. A strict censorship has been imposed. There have been a number of killings. All of this is part of a similar pattern of a typical Communist take-over and is not in response to any external threat." The State Department also urged the President to emphasize that any attempt by internal Communism to penetrate into the western hemisphere was a serious matter and one which was being studied by the Foreign Ministers of the American states.[2]

[2] On June 16, at 9:37 a.m., Secretary Dulles spoke with Hagerty concerning foreign policy issues in connection with the President's press conference later that morning. With respect to Guatemala, the conversation was recorded as follows: "The Sec. did not see the final [press] statement, but what he saw was o.k. . . . It is all right to say we are having talks with Latin American countries." Notes of a Meeting of the Guatemalan Group, Held at the Department of State, June 16, 1954 [1]

Present: Holland, Atwood, Colonel Clark, Jamison, Sanders, Wieland, Herron, Sparks, Warren, Pearson, Leddy, Pawley, . . .

1. Draft Resolution [2]

(a) It was noted that the following countries have approved the resolution in its entirety: Honduras, Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Colombia, Venezuela, Peru, Bolivia and the U.S.

(b) Atwood was to check regarding a Uruguayan note [3] outlining proposed changes in the resolution.

(c) After talking with Andrade, Sparks was to get in touch with Rowell immediately to get Bolivian agreement to the considerandos.

(d) With respect to Brazil, Donnelly had called Holland to give Rao's views as follows:

(1) Rao proposed two changes in the operative parts of the resolution. If we agreed to these changes, Brazil would be a co-sponsor, would send telegrams to Bolivia and Chile urging them to become co-sponsors, inform Paraguay that she would be happy if Paraguay would go along, and inform Uruguay that she will be a co-sponsor.

(2) Rao urged July 6 as the date for starting the conference (Venezuela wants any time after July 7).

(3) Rao suggests the considerandos could be reduced in number but not in substance and have the same effect. This is not a condition for agreement to the resolution.

(4) He reported that the Brazilian Ambassador to Argentina says Perón had told him that he will attend the meeting only if it is a general case against Communism rather than a specific case against Guatemala.

(5) Rao believes that Ecuador's position reflects Argentine pressure (stemming from its support of Ecuador in the latest boundary dispute with Peru).

[1] Drafted by Mr. Pearson.

[2] Reference is to draft resolution transmitted in circular telegram 459, June 5, 1954, p. 1157.

[3] No such note was found in Department of State files. However, a summary of the Uruguayan Government's suggestions concerning the draft resolution and the proposed OAS meeting is contained in telegram 188, from Montevideo, dated June 10, 1954, not printed (363/6–1054).

In a memorandum of conversation between Assistant Secretary Holland and Uruguayan Ambassador Mora, by Mr. Havemeyer, dated June 23, 1954, Ambassador Mora was reported to have confirmed the position of his government that it could not accept the draft resolution so long as it contained the present wording with respect to the detention and inspection of ships (714.00/6–2354).

(6) Rao suggested that we get out a statement of our views on the UFCO case. On this point, Holland asked that Leddy prepare a report on the history of the UFCO problem in Guatemala for transmission to all of the LA Foreign Ministers. He was to cable a summary of this report and state that the report itself would be sent by pouch.

Action With Respect to Brazilian Draft Changes

After Holland talked with the Secretary, it was agreed he would tell Donnelly (a) that the substitute language proposed for the "Calls Upon" clause is acceptable. The Brazilian language requests Guatemala to implement Resolution VIII, Section 1, of the Fourth Meeting of Consultation of Ministers of Foreign Affairs held in Washington 1951. (b) that with respect to the proposed change in the Recommendation section, we can accept the Brazilian language except for the phrase "any American state which is in present danger of becoming a center of the international Communist movement in the hemisphere" in place of which Donnelly should seek Brazilian agreement for the word "Guatemala".

(c) Holland stressed to the group the need to close off further changes in the draft resolution. Each time we accept a change it means that we must clear it with all the other countries.

2. Plans in the Event Arbenz is Overthrown

(a) Holland indicated that if Arbenz were overthrown, we would still go ahead with the Montevideo meeting but extend the date.

(b) Pawley reported that his ad hoc committee, made up of representatives of CIA and Defense, would meet today to work up a paper[4] outlining the steps we will take in the event the Arbenz government is overthrown. This paper would include the evacuation planning, recognition, possible economic aid to a successor government, etc. He asked that all members of the group give him any ideas they might have. Because of the similarity of this project with Woodward's assignment on "treatment of successor government",[5] it was agreed that Woodward should work with the Pawley group.

3. Implementation of Preventive Measures

It was agreed that Woodward would consider the two points raised by the Venezuelans in connection with their acceptance of the draft resolution and report at the next meeting.[6] These were (a) what would

[5] Mr. Woodward drafted a memorandum on the following subject: "Plan of action in the event that the Arbenz government is overthrown," dated June 23, 1954, which was circulated within the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs for comment; no copy of the memorandum was found in Department of State files.

[6] The notes of a meeting of the Guatemalan Group held at the Department of State on June 18, 1954, drafted by Mr. Pearson, read in part as follows: "Venezuela would not be asked to co-sponsor the [draft] resolution but would be asked to agree not to change the resolution without the unanimous agreement of the co-sponsoring group." (714.001/6–1854)

we do if the vessel we planned to stop had a naval escort of its flag country, and (b) would the area of search be as large as the Rio Treaty area (Holland thought the area should be considerably smaller).

4. Date of Meeting

Holland noted that the Secretary could be available for the Montevideo meeting beginning July 6.

5. Calling the Meeting Under the OAS Charter or the Rio Treaty

(a) After considerable discussion, the group decided unanimously to fight for the use of the Rio Treaty and Holland (who had been absent during the discussion) heartily concurred.

(b) Since at the Sunday, June 13 meeting[7] with the Ambassadors Holland had indicated that he would convoke the meeting under either the Charter or the Rio Treaty if our legal position were equally strong under both, it was decided that L should render an opinion on the legality of our actions under each.

6. Spanish Translation of "Guatemalan Labor Party" [8]

Leddy reported that the Department's Translation Division had done a very inadequate job on translating this document. CIA was being requested to go over it in order to translate properly the Communist jargon. The decision against wide dissemination of the document at this time was maintained.

7. Fisher's Daily Reports

It was decided that the daily reports being prepared by John Fisher should be discontinued and that instead he should maintain a control on all of the same actions in the form most convenient to himself.

On June 18, 1954, the forces of Lieutenant Colonel Carlos Castillo Armas, a Guatemalan army officer in exile, crossed the Guatemalan border from Honduras at three points in a movement aimed at overthrowing the government of President Arbenz. Allen Dulles called me—and later Pete Carroll dropped in—to tell me that the situation in Guatemala as reported by the American press is greatly exaggerated. Press reports "bombing". As Pete Carroll, said, "There are no such planes in that part of the world. There have been a few homemade bombs dropped by Piper Cubs but that is about all." Expect that the Wire Services have very poor men in Guatemala and that they are overplaying the story. However, the State Department and Foreign Ministers of the other American countries are watching the situation very closely.

I think the State Department made a very bad mistake, particularly with the British, in attempting to search ships going to Guatemala. This was done obviously in an attempt to stop arms shipment to the country, but somebody in the State Department (maybe Dulles) forgot that the right of search of neutral vessels on the high seas is one which we ourselves oppose. As a matter of fact, we were at war with the British in 1812 over the same principle. I don't see how with our traditional opposition to such search and seizure we could possibly have proposed it, and I don't blame the British for one minute for getting pretty rough in their answers. I don't see why we did not ask the British and other nations to cooperate and to clear cargo lists in their own ports rather than to have them suffer the indignity of a search of their own ships by a foreign power.

On June 19, 1954, the Guatemalan Government requested both the United Nations Security Council and the Inter-American Peace Committee (IAPC), an organ of the Organization of American States, to convene emergency meetings in order to take the necessary measures to stop alleged aggression against its territory by Honduras and Nicaragua, and to restore peace in the Central American area. THE SITUATION IN GUATEMALA AS OF 20 JUNE

1. As of 20 June the outcome of the efforts to overthrow the regime of President Arbenz of Guatemala remains very much in doubt. The controlling factor in the situation is still considered to be the position of the Guatemalan armed forces, and thus far this group has not given any clear indication of whether it will move, and if so, in which way. If the Guatemalan army should move within the next few days against the Arbenz regime, it is considered to have the capacity to overthrow it. On the other hand if it remains loyal and if most of the military elements commit themselves to vigorous action against the forces of Castillo Armas the latter will be defeated and a probability of uprisings from among other elements of the population is considered highly unlikely.

2. The position of the top-ranking military officers is constantly shifting with daily rises and falls in their attitudes. This group has long proclaimed its strong anti-Communist feelings and its ultimate intention of doing something to rid the government of Communist influences. Various officers have declared themselves as willing to take action against the regime given just a little more time or just a little more justification. It is probable that the rising pressure of events will compel this group to declare its position, one way or the other, at any time from now on—although the possible result could be a split in the ranks. [There are unconfirmed rumors as of Saturday night to the effect that Colonel Diaz, the Chief of the Armed Forces, and some 40 officers had applied for asylum in various foreign embassies in Guatemala City, but these embassies have not yet confirmed this report.] [1]

3. There were new defections on Saturday from the Guatemalan Airforce, one pilot flying out with his plane and several others obtaining asylum in the Salvadorian Embassy. The Guatemalan Airforce has thus far failed to produce any interception effort against the overflights by the Castillo Armas planes. However very heavy anti-aircraft fire is reported.

4. There is thus far no evidence to confirm the charges and propaganda of the Guatemalan regime of bombing attacks upon Guatemala. On the contrary there are eyewitness accounts of clumsy efforts to fabricate evidence of aerial bombardment (the home of Colonel Mendoza—one of the defecting airforce officers, was set on fire by the police). It is probable that some of the damage to oil storage facilities and other installations, attributed by the Guatemalan Government as well as by Castillo Armas, to bombing attacks is in fact the result of sabotage efforts on the part of Castillo Armas agents or other resistance elements.

5. There is considerable evidence of a determination on the part of the Guatemalan Government to mobilize and arm Communist-controlled student youth and labor (agriculture) organizations. At the same time there is evidence of a hasty attempt to mobilize additional strength for the army.

6. There are strong indications of mounting tension between the army and the Guardia Civil—the Communist influenced police organization.

[1] Brackets in the source text.

7. We cannot confirm that either Puerto Barrios or San Jose has fallen to the Castillo Armas forces, but its is clear that there have been uprisings in these and other cities. A bridge on the key railroad line between Guatemala City and Puerto Barrios is reliably reported to have been damaged near Gualan.

Description of the Castillo Armas Movement

8. The action of Colonel Castillo Armas is not in any sense a conventional military operation. He is dependent for his success not upon the size and strength of the military forces at his disposal but rather upon the possibility that his entry into action will touch off a general uprising against the Guatemalan regime. The forces of Castillo Armas entering Guatemala from Honduras are estimated to number about 300 men. These have now been joined by others from inside the country to make a total in excess of 600 armed men. (The majority of this number is equipped with rifles, sub-machine guns and 50 mm mortars. These weapons are non-U.S. manufacture.) Castillo Armas himself is expected to leave his command post in Honduras today and join one element of his forces near Jutiapa by plane, but thus far there is no word that an airfield has become available. From the command post which he proposes to establish at this location, he will endeavor to coordinate the activities of his other scattered groups throughout the country.

9. The entire effort is thus more dependent upon psychological impact rather than actual military strength, although it is upon the ability of the Castillo Armas effort to create and maintain for a short time the impression of very substantial military strength that the success of this particular effort primarily depends. The use of a small number of airplanes and the massive use of radio broadcasting are designed to build up and give main support to the impression of Castillo Armas' strength as well as to spread the impression of the regime's weakness.

10. From the foregoing description of the effort it will be seen how important are the aspects of deception and timing. If the effort does not succeed in arousing the other latent forces of resistance within the next period of approximately twenty-four hours, it will probably begin to lose strength.

Editorial Note

In a memorandum to the Director of the Policy Planning Staff, Robert R. Bowie, dated June 21, 1954, Jacob D. Beam of that Staff, stated the following with respect to a meeting held in the Office of the Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, Samuel C. Waugh:

"4. The Shipping Officers in E complained bitterly that they had not been previously informed regarding the U.S. decisions about the handling of foreign ships suspected of transporting Soviet Bloc military equipment to Guatemala. They said they are having to deal with complaints from all over the world. It was explained that these decisions were taken on the highest U.S. Governmental level." (PPS files, lot 65 D 101, "Chronological")

Editorial Note

On June 22, 1954, at 2:30 p.m., Secretary Dulles, Allen Dulles, and Assistant Secretary Holland met with President Eisenhower at the White House to discuss possible United States cooperation in replacing aircraft lost by Castillo Armas' forces. The President's daily appointment book for that date indicates that the meeting was off the record. According to the account presented in the President's memoirs, Assistant Secretary Holland opposed resupplying Castillo Armas with aircraft on the ground that if the action became known, Latin American countries would interpret it as intervention in Guatemala's internal affairs, and this would have an adverse impact on United States relations with those countries. The President stated further that he made the decision at the meeting to replace the aircraft through the country which had originally supplied this equipment to Castillo Armas' forces. For the President's account, see Dwight D. Eisenhower, The White House Years: Mandate for Change, 1953–1956, pages 425–426.

Editorial Note

In a memorandum of conversation summarizing the Secretary's staff meeting, held on June 23, 1954, at 9:15 a.m. in the Secretary's office, the Director of the Executive Secretariat, Walter K. Scott, recorded the following statement on Guatemala:

"Mr. Holland reported that the revolution in Guatemala was having serious anti-American consequences in a number of Latin American states. He was certain that it would affect our ability to secure a suitable resolution at the Montevideo Conference, if held. He stated further that it was our desire to maintain any consideration of this item before the Inter-American Peace Committee. He felt that this was pro forma; that its inability to act was so obvious that our support for using it would engender unfavorable opinion in the other States. He saw no action from this body adequate to arrest anti-U.S. feelings and thus help us at Montevideo. The tenor of his report was pessimistic. He felt that some strong statement or action on our part would be required to recoup the goodwill we had built up for our resolution. He had no specific recommendations to make at this time but his staff was devoting their continued attention to the matter." (Secretary's Staff Meetings, lot 63 D 75)

The Under Secretary of State for Administration presided at the meeting, which was attended by 15 other participants.

Notes of a Meeting of the Guatemalan Group, Held at the Department of State, June 23, 1954[1]

SECRET

Present: Holland, Atwood, Burrows, Jamison, Sanders, Weiland, Herron, Sparks, Woodward, Warren, . . . Leddy, Pearson, Col. Clark, Dreier

1. Security Council Action

(a) Lodge informed Holland that the British and French representatives[2] to the Security Council are prepared to go along with a Soviet proposal that the Council send peace observers to Central America. Lodge believed that he would have to go along unless an OAS organization announced that it was planning to send observers.

(b) Holland later during the meeting called Lodge and told him the following: 1) our plans for action in the IAPC, which, if successful, would mean that that body would propose to send peace observers; 2) in his statement[3] opposing the Guatemalan request for further Security Council action he could say that this is a dispute involving charges of Guatemala on the one hand and denials by Nicaragua and Honduras on the other hand, that this dispute was being handled by an inter-American organization just as it should be, that Nicaragua and Honduras would accept observers from an inter-American organization but not from the Security Council where the Soviet veto was used to prevent reference of the Guatemalan charges to the OAS; 3) as a second part of his statement before the Council, he should emphasize that there is another far more fundamental problem, namely, the attempts by international communism to penetrate the Western Hemisphere. This problem also is under study in the OAS.

2. Preparation for IAPC Meeting

Since the IAPC was meeting this afternoon and since Lodge had made his call concerning the British and French attitude toward the peace observer proposal, it was necessary to plan the best course of action. The following actions were decided:

---

[1] Drafted by Mr. Pearson.

[2] Sir Pierson Dixon and Henri Hoppenot, respectively.

[3] Apparent reference to Ambassador Lodge's statement made before the Security Council on June 25, 1954; for text, see USUN press release 1927, dated June 25, in Department of State Bulletin, July 5, 1954, pp. 29–31.

(a) Since Valle had, without instruction, sent a note[4] to the IAPC requesting that the Guatemalan charges be taken up, Holland called Willauer to tell him to persuade the Honduran Foreign Minister[5] 1) to give Valle the instructions[6] backing up the note which he had left with the IAPC and 2) to call Quintanilla direct concerning the Honduran position. Holland placed a call later to have Willauer ask the Foreign Minister to instruct Valle to ask that peace observers be sent by the IAPC.

(b) Holland called Sevilla-Sacasa and got him to agree to a plan whereby, after making the statement[7] which he had already prepared, he would request that peace observers be sent to all three countries; indicate that his country was always prepared to receive observers from an OAS organization but that he would oppose observers from the Security Council because of the Soviet veto; suggest that the Committee invite the three countries to send delegates to discuss the arrangements for the peace observation mission.

(c) Dreier was to talk with the Argentine, Mexican, Brazilian and Cuban representatives to the IAPC to persuade them to respond favorably to the request by Nicaragua and Honduras for peace observers and to say that they would recommend that their governments approve this proposal.

(d) Dreier was to persuade the Cuban representative to propose that the investigation begin with Guatemala.

(e) Burrows was to help Valle draft a note[8] to the Committee complaining of the bombing of Honduran territory by Guatemala and also to see that he got in touch with Sevilla-Sacasa.

3. Draft Resolution

Secretary Dulles would not approve sending notes to the Foreign Ministers in an effort to get their agreement in advance that no changes would be made in the draft resolution without the unanimous approval of the sponsoring group. He indicated that it would damage his prestige if some of these countries did not accept. Consequently, it was decided to send a message to each of our Ambassadors instructing them to obtain the oral agreement of the Foreign Minister to our proposal to be confirmed at a later date in writing. When a total of fourteen countries, including ourselves, have approved this proposal the meeting will be called.

[6] In a memorandum to Mr. Holland, dated June 23, 1954, summarizing a telephone conversation with Ambassador Willauer which took place at 11 a.m. on that date, Mr. Leddy stated in part that the Ambassador was asked "to see whether the Government there could be encouraged to send Ambassador Valle some instructions for the presentation of the Honduran case before the I–A Peace Committee." (714.00/6–2354)

[7] Reference is to the statement made by Ambassador Sevilla Sacasa before the IAPC on June 23, 1954, in which, inter alia, he denied the truth of Guatemalan charges against Nicaragua, explained that the rupture of diplomatic relations between the two countries resulted from Communist infiltration into Guatemala, and suggested that the IAPC's subcommittee on information should visit Nicaragua, Honduras, and Guatemala; a translation of the text of the Ambassador's statement is attached to 363.1/7–654.

[8] No such note was found in Department of State files.

4. U.S. Plans if Armas Fails

(a) Holland observed that the messages coming in from all over Latin America bear out Warren's observation at the previous meeting[9] that the revolution and particularly its failure would result in greatly lowered prestige for the U.S. in Latin America. Guatemala is more than ever the underdog and hence has very great appeal to all Latin Americans.

(b) As a general course of action we should take all steps possible to minimize the Guatemalan underdog position and we should also do everything possible to take the stigma surrounding the revolution off the U.S.

(c) The primary immediate actions discussed at this meeting were a) preparation for the IAPC meeting and b) advice to Lodge on the Security Council meeting, both of which were discussed above.

The Ambassador in Guatemala (Peurifoy) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL
PRIORITY

GUATEMALA CITY, June 23, 1954—4 p. m.
[Received June 23—11:33 p. m.]

1088. I called on Foreign Minister Toriello yesterday afternoon to discuss protection of American citizens during present emergency.

He endeavored assume offensive by again bringing up Department's press release of June 19,[1] and suggesting that I issue clarification. I said I was informing Department to best of my knowledge and would not consider clarifying earlier statements.

He also complained because yesterday Krieg had indicated to Chief of Protocol Garcia Galvez (on my instructions) that I was pained at President Arbenz's statement in his radio address June 19 (Embtel 1056, June 20)[2] that "President Eisenhower had scant regard for his high office . . ." and that I was sure President Eisenhower had never made any personal allusions to President Arbenz. Toriello said that in Washington he would not have sent Chocano to Department with such a message.

[1] For text of a statement issued by the Department of State on June 19, see Department of State Bulletin, June 28, 1954, p. 981.

[2] Not printed (714.00/6–2054).

I replied that I was happy to have occasion to reiterate and emphasize personally what Krieg had said. I then repeated it. He asserted President Eisenhower had made certain observations on Guatemalan situation; I said this was quite different from making personal allusions.

Taking the initiative, I said I wished discuss protection of American citizens. I pointed out five Americans had been picked up by police today and detained for periods of from few minutes to several hours; one was still in jail. He said police had to exercise extraordinary precautions in times like these. I said I understood this but felt there should be some reason for arrests other than fact of being American. In view this situation, I continued, I was seriously considering ordering all Americans evacuated.[3] Toreillo looked startled and, as previously urged me not to take such a step which, he said, "would do us great harm." He agreed furnish all possible protection if Americans obeyed laws and emergency regulations.

I then pointed out regulations were extremely vague: no regulation prohibited use of candles during blackouts, but there were reports of shooting at any light however dim; a little known regulation prohibited taking photos but several Americans had been hauled off to police station for photographing innocuous objects. I said I especially resented fact that two CGTG men had taken initiative in having Henry Wallace, Time correspondent, detained.

Toriello said that no lights at all should be shown during blackout and journalists should know better than to take photos in existing circumstances. I urged that clear and precise regulation be issued to clarify situation.

Turning to Guatemala's present situation, Toriello said he hoped US would act to stop fighting, saying government forces were completely successful on ground but could not cope with air attacks. I said I did not see how US could stop Castillo Armas without landing Marines, a solution which he quickly said would be unsatisfactory. He next inquired whether it was not against US Government policy to sell arms to private individuals. I answered that many arms had found their way to private persons and that Colonel Julian had attempted to purchase arms for Guatemalan Government in USA.

[3]The record of the 204th meeting of the NSC, held in Washington, June 24, 1954, dated June 24, notes in part that Secretary Dulles and Mr. Allen Dulles pointed out that the "chief reason" for announcing evacuation measures would be for "psychological effect". At the meeting the NSC adopted Action No. 1163-b noting that the "President authorized the Departments of State and Defense, with appropriate assistance of other agencies, to arrange evacuation of U.S. civilians from Guatemala if deemed desirable." (Eisenhower Library, Eisenhower papers, Whitman file) In telegram 1361, to Guatemala City, dated June 26, 1954, not printed, Secretary Dulles authorized the Ambassador to activate evacuation immediately (214.1122/6–2654). Additional pertinent documentation on this subject is in file 214.1122.

I then asked why Guatemala had appealed to Security Council[4] rather than OAS, the proper organization for handling inter-American disputes. Toriello replied that Guatemala preferred Security Council because members of OAS were under great economic pressure from USA and pointed out proudly that Guatemala had never asked for US loans. I asked if decision to appeal to SC was not because USSR was represented there and said Russian veto of Colombian-Brazilian resolution[5] stuck out like sore thumb all over free world.

On parting, he again urged USA use its influence stop bloodshed.

After returning to Embassy I learned the one American remaining in jail had been released.

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in France[1]

SECRET PRIORITY WASHINGTON, June 23, 1954—7 p. m.

4775. From Secretary. See Foreign Minister[2] immediately and express our grave concern at Hoppenot's tactics in UN Security Council meeting on Guatemalan complaint[3] Sunday, June 20.[4] During course of meeting French Delegation drafted amendment to Brazilian-Colombian resolution[5] referring Guatemalan case to Organization of American States; amendment stated: "Without prejudice to such measures as the Organization of American States may take, the Council calls for the immediate termination of any action likely to cause further bloodshed and requests all Members of the United Nations to abstain, in the spirit of the Charter, from giving assistance to any such action."

[1] Drafted by Acting Director of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs David H. Popper; signed by Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs David McK. Key. Repeated for information to USUN in New York.

[2] Pierre Mendès-France, French Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs.

[3] See the editorial note, p. 1174.

[4] Reference is to the 675th meeting of the Security Council, which convened on June 20, 1954.

[5] Regarding this resolution, see footnote 5, supra.

US Del tried unsuccessfully dissuade French from introducing amendment, but Hoppenot insisted on tabling it, arguing it would be useful in connection with Indochina situation.[6] Amendment died when resolution as a whole was vetoed by Russians but was then, without consultation with US Del, re-introduced as separate proposal[7] by French without any reference to OAS.

US Del felt it had no recourse but to vote for resolution.

US forebodings were fully justifed. Guatemalans have made effective use of resolution to maintain that SC continues to be seized of matter and even that OAS cannot take it up. Guatemalans are maintaining resolution binds Honduras and Nicaragua to halt alleged "aid to Aggressors". Result has been to complicate task of OAS in attempting to deal with matter, and to put two factions in Guatemalan conflict on same plane regardless of fact that Guatemalan government is functioning as agent of Communist imperialism in America and as such, under resolution adopted at recent Caracas conference, represents clear threat to peace and security American continent. In short, resolution has served in effect to lend Guatemalan government an air of respectability it should not enjoy.

We stress fact French pushed their resolution through despite our objection, even though matter was of no direct interest to them and of vital concern to us. Parallel with Indochina situation not at all convincing; quite apart from other differences, there is no regional organization such as OAS available to deal with Indochina situation, and OAS is properly the agency to deal with Guatemalan complaint in first instance under Chapter 8 of UN Charter. We cannot help contrast Hoppenot's conduct most strongly with our own attitude with regard to Thai request for UN observation. We consulted with the French about this from the outset and delayed any moves in the UN for almost a year, despite the deteriorating situation on the spot and despite the strong desires of Thai and later Cambodia. When we finally did obtain British and French acquiescence to moving in the GA, we induced the Thai to water down their resolution to a point acceptable to the British and French. We did these things in the interest of harmony with and support for our allies, just as we had done on the Tunisian and Moroccan problem[8] in the last two GA sessions. We hardly consider Hoppenot's reckless and hasty action as an adequate response to our tactics in the UN.

[8] For documentation on this subject, see volume XI, Part 1.

Please stress importance we attach to Hoppenot's abandoning such tactics and exhibiting more cooperative attitude in future. We hope he will be promptly instructed not to take any further action with regard to Guatemalan matter without prior consultation with Lodge.

Please convey to Foreign Minister how deeply concerned I am personally about this matter. I have asked Ambassador Bonnet to call tomorrow afternoon and will take it up with him in detail.[9]

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Secretary of State

[WASHINGTON,] June 24, 1954.

Secretary Dulles' telephone call to Ambassador Lodge (in New York), 9:55 a.m. today:

Dulles: The President said he thinks you should let the British and French know that if they take independent line backing Guatemalan move in this matter, it would mean we would feel entirely free without regard to their position in relation to any such matters as any of their colonial problems in Egypt, Cyprus, etc.

If they feel they can take independent line, the counterpart will be that they must consider that we will be free equally to be independent when any of the matters such as North Africa, Middle East, etc., come up before the UN.

Lodge: I will do that.

Dulles: He (the President) wanted to avoid making it in the form of a threat. But make it a clear understanding that if they don't take into account our needs and considerations in this matter, it will be a two-way street, and they must accept it.

Lodge: Yes, I see. It's a terrible thing. I will get this to them. Will determine just when and how to do it.

Dulles: Use your own judgment as to time.

Lodge: If there is open split between British and French, Russians will be very much pleased. But we cannot put off meeting much longer.

Dulles: Guatemala itself, as I understand it, is violating the terms of the Charter—Article 53(2), I think. The whole status of regional organizations is at stake in this particular matter. That was the thing we fought for (Vandenberg and I) at San Francisco. The whole concept is being destroyed.

Lodge: No question about it. At the same time, I will have to have a meeting, probably tomorrow. If the British and French persist, we will have an open split. I will try to keep agenda from being adopted. Don't have to invite Guatemala to the table. I put it to the Frenchman this morning, and he didn't like it at all. Thank you very much—I will be guided accordingly.

The United States Representative at the United Nations (Lodge) to the Department of State

TOP SECRET NEW YORK, June 24, 1954—6 p. m.

876. For the Secretary. Re Guatemala. I told Dixon and Hoppenot this morning that we had worked hard all yesterday to get OAS to take some action in line their position[1] yesterday. OAS did take action last night[2] which met their position. Dixon had informed me this morning his government's policy had changed and they now insisted on UN observation. I had immediately reported[3] this to Washington. I now had an important statement to make to them and I had asked them to come to my office so that I could do so in person. I said that this statement was not in any sense of the word a threat because of course they represented strong independent governments that would do whatever they wanted but that I was instructed by the President to say to them that if Great Britain and France felt that they must take an independent line backing the present government of Guatemala, we would feel free to take an equally independent line concerning such matters as Egypt and North Africa in which we had hitherto tried to exercise the greatest forbearance so as not to embarrass Great Britain and France.

My announcement was received with great solemnity.

LODGE

[1] In telegram 867, from New York, dated June 23, 1954, Ambassador Lodge stated in part the following: "Hoppenot and Dixon called on me in private and told me that if the Soviet Union moved to send a peace observation commission to the region of Guatemala they would have to vote in favor of it unless the OAS had taken action to send observation of its own." (714.00/6–2354)

[2] On June 23, 1954, the Inter-American Peace Committee decided to authorize the formation of a subcommittee of information, composed of members of the IAPC, which might visit Guatemala, Nicaragua, and Honduras, and with consent of those governments, conduct an investigation of the complaints they had laid before the committee.

Notes of a Meeting of the Guatemalan Group, Held at the Department of State, June 25, 1954[1]

SECRET

Present: Holland, Burrows, Pearson, Wieland, . . . Warren, Sparks, Jamison, Herron, Sanders, Atwood, Col. Clark, Woodward, Pawley

1. Calling the OAS Meeting

Holland reported that the Secretary had not yet approved his recommendation that the OAS meeting be called. The Secretary believed that on the assumption that Armas failed, Arbenz and Toriello would become heroes and we may not succeed in obtaining our resolution. Such a major diplomatic defeat would be a great blow to the US prestige. In analyzing the alternatives with the group, Holland believed that if we called off the meeting the results would be catastrophic; if we postponed the meeting, each day of postponement would make our position worse. In view of these alternatives he was planning to see the Secretary again to recommend that though there was a great risk in the calling of the meeting, we should do it.

During the meeting Holland and Pawley left to talk with General Smith and later reported that General Smith favored the calling of the meeting.

2. Place of Meeting

Holland reported that Kemper called[2] him this morning from Rio to say that Rao agreed to having the meeting at Rio.[3] Later in the meeting while Holland was absent the question arose as to whether we would be able to inform any of the participating countries of this change, especially Venezuela and Argentina, but it was decided to check with Holland.

---

[1] Drafted by Mr. Pearson.

[2] A memorandum of the referenced telephone conversation, dated June 25, 1954, is not printed (714.00/6–2554).

[3] In the Department's telegram 182, to Montevideo, dated June 25, 1954, Secretary Dulles stated that because of the Uruguayan Government's reluctance to have the OAS meeting in Montevideo "Department has agreed with Brazilian Government to request that [proposed OAS] meeting be held in Rio. Because growing concern regarding Communist plots [and] demonstrations in Montevideo Department feels most governments will be pleased at change." (363/6–2554)

3. Security Council Action

Holland reported that the British have agreed to abstain with respect to the Guatemalan request for a meeting; thus it is apparent that there will be no action on the Guatemalan request.[4] The group believed that in the absence of Security Council action the Guatemalans might accept the Peace Committee offer.[5]

4. Preparations for OAS Meeting on the Assumption that it will be called

Holland left the meeting and asked that the group go over the preparations for the meeting. Dreier outlined the following steps:

(a) He was planning to check with all of the members of the COAS to be sure they have their instructions so that there need be only one meeting of the Council. Depending on when we receive the go ahead decision, the Council meeting time would be set, possibly as early as Saturday afternoon.

(b) He reported that the following countries had agreed to cosponsor the request for the Council meeting—Brazil, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Salvador, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru and the United States. These eleven would also constitute the majority needed to call the meeting of Foreign Ministers.

(c) The resolution for action of the Council[6] was in draft form. It would be very brief and the group agreed that it should include a clause to the effect that though Guatemala had not deposited the ratification of the Rio Treaty, she should be invited to the meeting.

(d) Dreier did not believe the meeting would be very long and would not involve many speeches. He was working on his own speech.

(e) A complete draft[7] of the Secretary's speech for the OAS meeting will be ready on Tuesday, June 29 according to McJennett.

(f) Jamison, Herron and Wieland were to develop a press release[8] for issuance by the Secretary at the time the OAS Council calls the meeting of Foreign Ministers.

[4] On June 25, 1954, the Security Council rejected adoption of the provisional agenda containing Guatemala's complaint by a vote of 5 in favor, 4 against, and 2 abstentions; 7 affirmative votes were required for adoption. For additional documentation, see Official Records of the Security Council, 9th year, 676th Meeting (June 25, 1954).

[5] In Guatemala Embassy note no. 867, dated June 26, 1954, not printed, Guatemalan Chargé Chocano informed the IAPC of Guatemala's desire to cooperate and to accept a visit by the IAPC's subcommittee of information; a translation of the note is attached to 363.1/6–2954.

[6] For text of the referenced resolution, as adopted by the OAS at a special meeting on June 28, 1954, see Annals of the Organization of American States, 1954, pp. 159–160.

[7] Not printed.

[8] Apparent reference to the Department's press release 351, dated June 26, 1954, printed in the Department of State Bulletin, July 5, 1954, pp. 31–32.

(g) A Spanish text[9] of the draft resolution has been prepared. Woodward suggested that this draft be distributed to the Latin Americans so that there would not be so many texts floating around.

5. Publicity

There was considerable discussion of the developments in connection with a television program this Sunday, "The American Forum of the Air" by Granik. It was decided that Herron should call Granik's office and suggest that four newsmen appear on the program to query Chocano on the Guatemalan situation.

Editorial Note

On June 26, 1954, representatives of ten of the member states on the Council of the Organization of American States (Brazil, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, and the United States) requested a meeting of Consultation of the American Foreign Ministers under Articles 6 and 11 of the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance; for text of the letter of request, see the Department of State Bulletin, July 5, 1954, pages 131–132, or Annals of the Organization of American States, 1954, page 159. The Ambassador in Guatemala (Peurifoy) to the Department of State

SECRET NIACT GUATEMALA CITY, June 27, 1954—2 p. m.

1121. Situation appears breaking rapidly. Toriello called me to Foreign Office this morning where he said he knew I could stop fighting in 15 minutes if I wished. He asked if I would do so if military Junta took over the government. He asked specifically whether Arbenz would have to leave office and whether Toriello's own resignation would do any good. He said he was willing to do anything in power to prevent bloodshed and further bombing by planes which he said had damaged vessel Springsfjord at San Jose this morning. He said that he personally and his brother Jorge had always been very anti-Communist and that as far as he was concerned the Junta could take all the Communists in Guatemala and send them to Moscow. Toriello stated that if the government were turned over to a Junta, Castillo Armas must not come to power as this would cause great bloodshed in the country. He stated that I could cause end of fighting through pressure, if not on Castillo Armas, then on Honduras.

I replied that I had no control over situation but would do anything I could to bring about peace. Re Arbenz remaining in office, I said I could not speak for insurgent forces but would think that the situation would demand a clean sweep.

Toriello asked whether I would be available to see him again this afternoon or tonight. I replied that I would be willing to see him at any time.

Since returning to the office from Foreign Office, I received telephone call from Colonel Diaz, chief of armed forces, who invited me to meet with him and other officers in his home at earliest possible moment. I am now leaving for this meeting and will telegraph results upon my return.

In view of developments I am taking action on evacuation at this time.

1124. Pass Defense. A few minutes after I returned to Embassy after interviewing Foreign Minister Toriello (Embtel 1121, June 27),[1] I received personal telephone call from Colonel Carlos Enrique Diaz, Chief of Guatemala Armed Forces, who said he was with several army officers and asked if I could meet him at his residence at once. I went there about half hour later accompanied by Colonels McCormick[2] and Martin and Mr. Krieg.

After my arrival Colonel Diaz entered room accompanied by Colonel Sanchez, Minister of Defense; Colonel Parrinello,[3] Chief of Staff; Colonel Giron, Chief of Air Force; and Colonel Sarti,[4] President of Superior Defense Council. Diaz began by describing horrible situation created by aerial bombardment of Chiquimula and Zacapa. He said towns were virtually wiped out; that in Zapaca dead lay unburied in streets and buzzards were having feast on them; civil population had fled. Army could cope with Castillo Armas' ground forces, but not his aviation. He said Castillo could not have obtained these arms without US acquiescense. I replied sharply that if he had brought me to his house to make accusations against my government, I would leave immediately. He hastily said he was not accusing US. He therefore asked what US would wish in return if it used its good offices to put end to fighting. Constantly emphasizing I could speak only as individual and not for US Government, I said there was only one important problem between our governments: That of communism. Colonel Diaz said he knew that and was prepared guarantee in name of army that Communist Party would be outlawed and its leaders exiled.

I said this was fine, but that government had long known this and neither government nor army had ever acted; how could I be sure army would be able to carry out its decision? After some hesitation Diaz said this was crucial question. Solution desired by all army officers was that he should assume presidency. He emphasized that this had been difficult decision and would be difficult execute; he said Communists could be expected try uprising to oppose coup, and that he would need in Guatemala City forces which were now at battle front. Thus it would be necessary for US to use influence stop fighting and especially to have Honduras and Nicaragua stop allowing Castillo use airfields. I asked whether he had attempted any direct arrangement with Castillo Armas. He replied in stongest terms (and was strongly seconded by others) that direct negotiations with Castillo were out of question; they would rather die than talk with him. Diaz said Castillo Armas could never govern Guatemala after massacres his air forces caused; he might have had some supporters in army before, but no longer.

I stressed again that I could neither speak for Castillo nor commit my government, but that if Diaz assumed power and ousted Communists, I would strongly recommend that US attempt to bring about cease-fire until arrangement could be made. Once again Diaz and colleagues insisted that truce, at least cessation of airraids, would be essential before they could act against Arbenz. They said there were only 500 regular troops in city, plus 2,500 reservists with two years previous service who had just been called up. Latter were armed and equipped. Unfortunately, there were also about 2,000 peasants who had just been brought in for training. They would be disarmed. I simply repeated that when I knew Diaz was in control I would recommend cease-fire

After further discussion and several private conferences with colleagues, Diaz said they had decided act at once, relying on my promise to urge a cease-fire. He then said, "Now comes the tough problem. Who is going to bell the cat? Who will talk to Jacobo?" With but moment's hesitation, he made decision: "Col. Sanchez will visit all garrisons and announce I have assumed presidency. Colonel Giron will inform air force. I will go to Palace with Parrinello and Sarti and we will tell Jacobo." After some other talk, Diaz said, "Arbenz may answer two ways. He will either say, 'yes,' or he will say, 'this is insubordination,' and call the guard. In latter case, we will not emerge from Palace. If we are not out in reasonable period, Sanchez will bring up artillery."

Throughout discussion, I emphasized necessity of acting quickly to round up leading Communists before they they could mobilize forces. All agreed this was essential and Sanchez was designated to give necessary orders. I pointed out that Major Rosenberg,[5] chief of detectives, undoubtedly had report of Diaz telephone call to Embassy since all our telephones were tapped and might well be making his own plans. Strangely enough, this idea apparently had not occurred to Diaz. He said he would act as soon as possible to replace Rosenberg and Cruz Wer,[6] chief of police.

I then told Diaz I felt very deeply necessity of implanting democracy as far as local conditions permitted and that all sectors of population, including those who have followed Castillo Armas anti-Communist movement, be allowed participate in political life of country. Diaz and associates gave most categorical assurances that they would issue general amnesty, release all political prisoners and allow persons in asylum in diplomatic missions to come out. They said Castillo Armas could return if he wished but added feeling against him was high because of bombings and they could not guarantee his safety.

At one point Diaz asked whether any members of present Cabinet were unacceptable to US. I said I could not attempt to dictate his Cabinet and that if he appointed reasonable men I was sure all our secondary problems could be worked out, such as difficulties of American Companies. I emphasized strongly I represented US Government and people, not individual companies.

At conclusion, it was agreed Diaz would telephone me after seeing Arbenz and inform me of outcome.[7]

[7] In telegram 1123, from Guatemala City, dated June 27, 1954, and sent at 7 p. m., Ambassador Peurifoy, apparently referring to the subsequent meeting between Colonel Diaz and President Arbenz, stated in part the following: Colonel Diaz "told me that he had just talked with Arbenz who he described as very tired, said he could not continue without army support; that he wished to leave office gracefully and that he would go on national radio hookup at 9 p. m. tonight to announce that he was turning over presidency to Diaz and requesting all people support him." The Ambassador in Guatemala (Peurifoy) to the Department of State

SECRET PRIORITY GUATEMALA CITY, June 28, 1954—noon.

1131. Between 4 and 6 a. m. today, I met with Colonel Diaz, Colonel Sanchez, Colonel Parrinello, and Colonel Monzon.[1] Diaz announced yesterday he had arrested Fortuny, Gutierrez and Pellecer. He said he had replaced Colonel Cruz Wer, head of Guardia Civil, with Colonel Jose Luis Morales Melgar, and Major Jaime Rosenberg, head of Guardia Judicial, with Lt. Colonel J. Antonio G. Saravia.

I told Colonel Diaz that I was amazed and astounded at fact that he had permitted Arbenz in delivering his valedictory to charge that US was responsible for supplying aviators to forces attacking Guatemala, and for his general line to say we had used "pretext of Communism" to unleash aggression on this country. I told him that, this being his first act, I did not see how we could work together toward bringing about a peace. I suggested that perhaps he might wish to designate Colonel Monzon, well-known for his anti-Communist feelings, as President. He said that he agreed with me in principle and would give me his answer today at noon when I am to meet with him again.[2]

SECRET NIACT GUATEMALA CITY, June 28, 1954—5 p. m.
[Received June 29—4:08 a. m.]

1136. As I left Embassy this morning to meet with Colonels Diaz, Sanchez and Monzón, I received word they had just announced they had formed military junta contrary to agreement which we had reached last night Embtel 1130, June 28.[1]

When we met in office of Chief of Armed Forces I expressed surprise at this development and Colonel Diaz asked Colonel Monzon to explain. Monzon said he did not feel himself strong enough assume presidency alone; that resignation or dismissal of Chief of Armed Forces would cause dissension within army at time when unity was essential maintain internal order; that he had therefore requested Colonel Diaz set up junta and retain position of Chief of Armed Forces.

Colonel Diaz then emphasized his willingness to turn over presidency to Monzon but said he had yielded to latter's insistence in formation of junta. Monzon would be in charge of Ministry of Interior, thus having police under his control, and he would be in full charge of internal affairs. Diaz and Sanchez promised take no action without his approval.

Colonel Diaz went on to review Monzon's record as anti-Communist. He said that as member of (Arevalos) Cabinet, Colonel Monzon had not only spoken out against communism but had acted against it. He guaranteed support of Army to Colonel Monzon in carrying out vigorous program clean out Communists.

Colonel Diaz, who took lead in most of discussions, said junta's immediate problem was restore internal peace. He therefore renewed his request I use my influence cause Castillo Armas lay down his arms. He argued that Castillo had been fighting under banner of anti-communism; new junta was thoroughly anti-Communist; if Castillo Armas were sincere anti-Communist he would stop fighting at once. They would offer him and followers every guarantee. He could come back to Guatemala and contest presidential elections if he wished. In response to my question, Diaz said it was junta's intention proclaim general amnesty, release all political prisoners and allow those who had taken asylum in Embassies come out. Sanchez interrupted at this point to say he wished be entirely frank: At this exact moment it was not possible free all prisoners but that as soon as Castillo Armas matter was settled this would be done. Meanwhile, presence of Colonel Monzon in Ministry of Government was a guarantee of their safety. Monzon added, "They are all my friends." I pointed out it was necessary be realistic in this situation: Castillo Armas was in Guatemala at head of forces which had inflicted severe punishment on government troops. Hence most practical and effective way obtain peace was deal with Castillo Armas.

Talk then centered on this subject for considerable period developing no new points of view. Junta tried every argument at their command avoid a direct meeting with Castillo, although at one point they seemed be wavering on possibility of meeting with representatives of Castillo. I explained thought [throughout?], however, that it was better deal with head man so that hard and fast agreements could be made.

Colonel Diaz then brought up question of recognition. I pointed out that I and my colleagues did not question good faith of junta members but that we anticipated Washington would wish consider situation for a reasonable period to see what action they would take. It was further pointed out that one of criteria for recognition is that new government be in control of territory of the country; such was not case here, where Castillo Armas controlled a portion of territory.

After considerable fruitless discussion, it was agreed that junta would consider matter alone and give me a concrete answer at 5 this afternoon.

1137. Pass Defense. In accordance with prior arrangements (Embassy's telegram 1136, June 28),[1] I met 5 p. m. with Colonels Diaz, Sanchez and Monzon to receive their answer as to whether they would be prepared to initiate conversations with Colonel Carlos Castillo Armas, leader of rebel forces.

Diaz first inquired whether if they agreed to conversations I thought a cease-fire could be arranged while negotiations were in progress. I replied that while I could not speak for Castillo Armas, I would be pleased to suggest that a cease-fire be worked out. Diaz then stated that he and his colleagues felt it desirable to have a neutral person present during conversations so that what was agreed upon could be witnessed. He said he had already spoken to the Papal Nuncio who had expressed his willingness to collaborate. I said I would convey this message with my favorable recommendation.

In those circumstances, said Colonel Diaz, Junta would be prepared open talks with Castillo Armas. I promised to convey this message immediately to Department and request that it be speedily conveyed, if possible, to Castillo Armas. Junta thought talks should be held in Nunciature in Guatemala City. It was suggested that Colonel Martin talk with Chief of Staff Parrinello about the landing pattern to be followed by plane bearing Castillo Armas should talks be agreed upon, and that Colonel McCormick also confer with Parrinello to work out details of cease-fire. In this connection, Colonel Diaz estimated that it would take twelve hours from the time he received messages confirming possible agreement until word regarding cease-fire could be circulated to troops in field. Junta members made several efforts obtain advance agreement to an end to air attacks, but I insisted cease-fire must be effective on all branches at once.

Papal Nuncio[2] informed Embassy today over 90 percent of people favored Castillo Armas. I intend to see Nuncio tomorrow and confirm his role in conversations as well as have generally frank talk concerning situation.

I request Department convey through appropriate channels to Castillo Armas the offer of Junta to confer with him. In interest of stopping bloodshed, I strongly recommend he be urged to accept.

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)[1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 29, 1954.

Participants: Ambassador Peurifoy, Guatemala
Mr. Holland

Ambassador Peurifoy called from Guatemala to say that the bombing continued, and wanted to know if there wasn't some way to get word to Armas to stop it. The Ambassador stated that the new people were being greatly embarrassed and were in a "flap". He didn't know what was going to happen.

Mr. Holland said this development was what he needed. He asked the Ambassador to get the new people to authorize us to call the Council of American States together and advise them that the new Junta has requested the United States and El Salvador to lend their good offices to accomplish two ends:

1. First, an immediate cessation of hostilities.
2. A meeting of the heads of the two groups in El Salvador to try to work out a settlement.

Mr. Holland said that if they will authorize us to do that, then we can openly send people to this fellow to tell him they have got to stop this. Ambassador Peurifoy stated at this point that "they will authorize that".

Mr. Holland said that he was going to call the OAS and say that through the Ambassador the Junta had called upon El Salvador and the United States to lend their good offices to bring about an immediate cessation of hostilities and that we are proposing to send a mission from Tegucigalpa and urge that this be done. The Ambassador agreed.

Mr. Holland asked the Ambassador if he had sent out the cables[2] he had requested a while ago. The Ambassador said yes, that they had agreed to send three cables. Mr. Peurifoy urged Mr. Holland to act with great rapidity, and the latter promised he would.

Mr. Holland asked that they immediately cable[3] the Department, advising that they are requesting that we and El Salvador use their good offices to try to achieve this and the stoppage of hostilities immediately. Ambassador Peruifoy said he would do this.

Mr. Holland said he had talked with McDermott.[4] McDermott had spoken with President Osorio,[5] and the President said he would be glad to have the meeting in El Salvador.

Mr. Holland said that he would call the Council immediately stating that this had come from the Junta through Peurifoy and is being confirmed in writing, and that we will move also right away.[6]

Mr. Holland said, in response to a question of the Ambassador, that he had spoken with Willauer at Tegucigalpa about this matter.

Mr. Holland concluded with the request to the Ambassador that he get out the three cables (which he enumerated).

1146. Following Assistant Secretary Holland's telephone call last night suggesting possibility of holding negotiations in San Salvador between Guatemalan Government Junta and Castillo Armas, I immediately tried to get in touch with Colonel Diaz but was unable to until about 2 a.m., today when I met him at office of Chief of Armed Forces.

Diaz immediately agreed to meeting in Salvador but desired consult his colleagues. Sanchez finally arrived and consented but Monzon could not be located. During interval, I visited Colonel Funes,[1] Salvadoran Ambassador, and secured his agreement.

Returning to Diaz' office at 4 a.m., I found Monzon had not yet appeared. Just as I was about to leave, Diaz received telephone call from Palace and he and Sanchez left to confer with several officers. While they were out, Colonel Martin, our Air Attaché, arrived and informed me plot was afoot to assassinate Diaz and Sanchez and urged me to leave building at once. I spent a difficult moment wondering if I would be caught in crossfire, but finally decided remain.

Shortly thereafter Diaz returned and wearily informed me that things had changed: He and Sanchez had decided resign from Junta since it appeared they were unacceptable to Castillo Armas; they would however, collaborate with new government.

It was then arranged for Colonel Monzon to meet me in Diaz' office and he appeared shortly with new Junta members, Jose Luis Cruz[2] and Mauricio Dubois.[3] He was drained by fatigue and seemed at first unable comprehend points of Holland's plan, but after Diaz and Sanchez had helped explain it to him, he agreed eagerly and asked that meeting be held on Wednesday, which was as soon as he could get away. He courteously detailed officer to accompany me to wireless telephone office, where I called Holland,[4] and then to my home.

Hagerty, had a telephone conversation with Secretary Dulles concerning the status of several foreign policy issues in preparation for the President's press conference at 10:30 a.m. Hagerty recorded the conversations with respect to Guatemala as follows:

"Dulles said that the President could take great satisfaction from the trend of events in Guatemala where Red agents and fellow travellers were fleeing the country. He suggested that the President say that the Guatemalans were resuming to take charge of their own affairs, that the United States welcomed this and that the Secretary of State was going to make a more complete statement on this subject on nationwide radio that night." On the night of June 30, 1954, Lieutenant Colonel Castillo Armas and Colonel Monzón initiated talks at San Salvador, aimed at establishing a permanent cease-fire and reaching a political settlement. President Osorio acted as intermediary. The Ambassador in El Salvador (McDermott) to the Department of State[1]

CONFIDENTIAL NIACT SAN SALVADOR, July 1, 1954—8 a. m.
[Received July 1—6:53 p. m.]

2. Discussions behind closed doors between Castillo Armas, Monzon, President Osorio and Peralta Salazar,[2] President Legislative Assembly continued from 8:10 p. m. until approximately 3:45 a. m.

President Osorio subsequently explained he had taken for basis discussion existence two de facto governments in Guatemala. Three basic proposals were made by Salvador, one by Monzon and one by Castillo Armas. Other proposals of lesser importance were discussed but left without final decision.

Salvadoran proposal was that a plebiscite be held within shortest possible period thus not allowing Communists now disordered or fleeing from country to take advantage of situation. Date of plebiscite was to be fixed by Castillo Armas. Plebiscite was to be supervised by mixed commissions composed equal number members both parties. Guatemalan people would be asked vote for Castillo Armas or junta. If vote favorable Castillo Armas, he would be given all powers and rights of chief of state and would not be obligated to convoke elections until country had returned to normal and on date he alone would determine. If vote favorable to junta it would convoke elections for a Constituent Assembly or to elect a President. In latter case Monzon would not be a candidate.

Second proposal was advanced by Monzon. It provided for increasing junta to five members with assurances that at a later prudent date to be selected by Castillo Armas latter could appoint additional member replacing one member who would retire. Monzon stated he would leave with President Osorio written resignation to take place when Castillo Armas determined [garbled group] Castillo Armas would eventually have majority.

Third proposal presented by Castillo Armas provided for unification of two governments on basis of a lengthy list of conditions and provided this arrangement accepted by Army in which case Castillo Armas would be named Chief of the Armed Forces and political chief of the republic. The unification would be based on joint declaration that the two governments seek the same basic purposes.

Salvadoran proposal for a plebiscite was unconditionally accepted without delay by Monzon. After discussion it was accepted in principle by Castillo Armas. Subsequently, however, Juan Cordova Cerna, adviser to Armas, was called in and expressed grave doubts regarding feasibility or desirability hold plebiscite at this time. Maintained Communists had only temporarily gone to ground and their influence in plebiscite could jeopardize all Castillo Armas accomplishments.

Second proposal which was made by Monzon was not accepted by Castillo Armas as apparently not giving him sufficient immediate leadership.

The third proposal presented by Castillo Armas was not accepted by Monzon.

President said he regarded Castillo Armas as definitely the more recalcitrant of the two. He said Monzon had accepted the Salvadoran proposal and had advanced one of his own. Castillo Armas had only conditionally accepted Salvadoran proposal and had not followed through in subsequent discussions, consequently, Castillo Armas had been agreeable to only one which was his own.

President said no further conversations would be held in San Salvador as both protagonists are returning to the respective headquarters. Existing truce or cease-fire had been extended to expire 9:00 a. m. July 2, after which hour Castillo Armas could presumably take whatever military action he desired. Osorio said he was exceedingly sorry personal ambitions had prevented solution of problem of gravest importance to Guatemala and Central America. He said, however, there was nothing further he could do and matter of any other possible solution could now only rest with United States as one of the two mediators. The President was informed we are not of view mediation was involved but rather an extension of good offices to assist both parties to reach a solution through personal discussions. President conceded that our view was correct interpretation of previous conversations.

Monzon returning Guatemala air attaché plane departing here 8:00 a. m. and Castillo Armas by his own plane to Chiquimula at approximately same hour.

General feeling intense disappointment among numerous diplomats and others including all high officers Salvadoran army who were present at Presidential Palace throughout night.

Entire foregoing explanation conveyed to me by President in strictest confidence as details at close of meeting known only to four participants and in part to one or two advisors.

President has just telephoned asking me to see him at 8:30 a. m. Will report immediately thereafter.

SECRET GUATEMALA CITY, July 7, 1954.

Subject: Memorandum of Negotiations Leading to Signing of Pact of San Salvador, July 2, 1954[1]

In accordance with telephonic instructions from Assistant Secretary Holland, I left Guatemala for El Salvador with Col. Batten,[2] Chief of the U.S. Air Force Mission in Guatemala, and Harold E. Urist, Public Affairs Officer, in the Air Mission plane at 11:30 a.m. July 1. We took along a number of U.S. news correspondents and representatives of each of the five Guatemalan independent newspapers. Upon our arrival in San Salvador at 12:15 p.m. I was met by the Chief of Protocol, Ambassador Antonio Alvarez Vidaurre, representing the Salvadoran Government.

Ambassador Alvarez drove me to the Palace, where Ambassador Michael McDermott and Counselor of Embassy Andrew E. Donovan were waiting. I was presented at 1:30 p. m. to President Osorio. Also present during the interview were Sr. Peralta, President of the Salvadoran Assembly, who was to be President Osorio's personal representative during the negotiations, Ambassador McDermott, Mr. Donovan, and Mr. Urist who served as interpreter. We had barely exchanged greetings when I received a telephone call[3] in the President's private office from Secretary of State Dulles, who emphasized the importance of bringing the negotiations to a satisfactory conclusion and that, if it were necessary, I was authorized to "crack some heads together".

President Osorio told me that the negotiations between Colonels Elfego Monzón and Carlos Castillo Armas had been carried on until 4 a.m. that morning (they had begun the evening of June 30), but that the two men were as far apart as when they met. He said Col. Monzón would not give an inch and that in his opinion Col. Castillo Armas should be the President of the Military Junta which was ruling Guatemala, and that if I could bring them together, I was a better man than he. I mentioned to him my conversation with Secretary Dulles and emphasized the deep concern of my Government with regard to the situation in Guatemala and how important it was that the two sides be brought to a satisfactory understanding and agreement. I said I was going to do everything in my power to resolve the basic differences and take the two colonels back to Guatemala with me and the other diplomatic advisers who had lent their good offices. I then told President Osorio that I desired to meet privately first with Colonel Castillo Armas and then with Colonel Monzón. This was immediately arranged, and at 2 p.m. I met with Colonel Castillo Armas in one of the reception rooms, with only Mr. Urist present.

I told Col. Castillo Armas that I was sorry to hear that there had been some difficulties between him and Col. Monzón in reaching an understanding, that I believed this was the time for true patriots to put aside personal ambitions and interests and work together for the good of Guatemala. The basic and common aims of both sides, I said, should be the total eradication of Communism from the country and the restoration of peace and tranquility. The colonel was in absolute agreement. I said I could see no reason for a divergence of opinion between him and Col. Monzón, since I believed Col. Monzón also to be a sincere Guatemalan whose only interest was the welfare of his country. I pleaded with Col. Castillo Armas to leave the details of the future government and the question of who would be president of Guatemala to a time when representatives of both groups could sit down over a conference table in Guatemala and thrash out their differences. I repeated that this was not the moment to preoccupy themselves with details and programs, but that the important thing was to agree immediately on common aspirations for the good of their country and return together, arm in arm, to Guatemala, where the people were waiting to receive them. I suggested that both armies be joined together and march into the capital as one, as brother Guatemalans. Col. Castillo Armas said again he was in complete agreement. However, he believed Col. Monzón wanted to be president of the Junta, and that his military colleagues, after their long battle and sacrifices, would not accept it. I then told him I was going to speak with absolute frankness. "You know, and I know," I told him, "how the American people feel about you. Many American people think you should be the president of Guatemala, and some time in the not-too-distant future, say six months from now, you should hold free and democratic elections, and I personally will do all in my power to help you. For the present, I think you should be taken into the Junta. And, confidentially, I'll tell you something else. Col. Cruz Salazar (one of the three members of the Junta) told me that he was on your side, so you should have no problem at all." He seemed to be pleased and reassured by these last statements.

We completed our conversation at 2:30. I told him I was now going to see Col. Monzón and that I thought the two colonels and the diplomatic advisers should meet as a group at about 4:30 to clarify any remaining details which might need discussion.

I then met with Col. Monzón. He reiterated previous statements made to me, declaring that he was interested only in restoring peace and tranquility to Guatemala, that he had no personal ambition with regard to the presidency of Guatemala, and that, if necessary, he would be happy to sign a statement to that effect. The only point on which he was adamant was that he wanted to save the honor of the Guatemalan army. He said, quite logically, in my opinion, that since he had been appointed chief of the Military Junta by the army staff, he would have to return to Guatemala in the same capacity. He was in complete agreement with the idea of an immediate accord with Col. Castillo Armas on general objectives. He said he would be happy to accept Col. Castillo Armas in the Junta, and that after they had returned with me to Guatemala the Junta could elect Castillo Armas president.

I asked Col. Monzón if there were any immediate problems he felt needed discussion. He said the only serious problem was getting food to the Government troops in the field, and he hoped Castillo Armas would give immediate permission for supplies to be dropped. We terminated our discussion at 3 o'clock.

I then informed President Osorio of our discussions without going into detail, and told him I would return at 4:30 p.m. to meet with the two colonels and the other three advisers.

After luncheon at Ambassador McDermott's residence, I returned shortly before 5 p. m. to the Palace and met with the group participating in the negotiations.

I led off the discussions with a résumé of the principal objectives both parties should take into consideration before they went into detailed negotiations. This was a re-statement of my introductions to the talks held with the two colonels. The entire group agreed. Col. Castillo Armas, however, who had meanwhile been talking with his legal advisers (Lic. Juan Cordova Cerna, Lic. Luis Alberto Coronado Lira, Lic. Carlos Salazar, hijo), brought up the question of the number of members in the Junta. He pointed out that if only he joined the Junta there would be a preponderance of members representing the other side. He said that he would like, therefore, to include another person representing his forces and proposed the name of Major Enrique Oliva,[4] who, in his opinion, was one of the most capable and hard-working professional military men in Guatemala. He said Major [4] Enrique Trinidad Oliva Quintana.

Oliva had no political ambitions and would be a valuable asset to the Junta. Col. Monzón accepted this proposal without reservation. One of the advisers then pointed out that there would still be three against two. The Papal Nuncio offered as a solution the possibility of having a Junta of six members, three for each side. This point was discussed for some time, but was finally dropped when it was agreed that 1) three members on each side could easily lead to a stalemate when voting takes place, and 2) a Junta with six members was really too large and unwieldy.

The advisers all agreed with me that on the details of the future administration of the country all should be left until the two colonels had returned to Guatemala and were able to sit down with the other members of the Junta to work out their problems together. The entire arrangement seemed satisfactory to both parties and to the diplomatic advisers, and the meeting was terminated at 6 p.m. so that the two colonels and their legal advisers could meet alone to draw up a statement of their common decision. Meanwhile, the diplomatic advisers retired to a nearby room to be available at any time for consultation.

From that moment until midnight we held individual and group meetings. Castillo Armas' advisers were apparently in disagreement with the colonel and felt that any document signed by him should be ad referendum. He could then return to his headquarters in Chiquimula to obtain the approval of his staff officers. I fought strongly against this, reviewing once again the importance of arriving at a general agreement then and there, because I felt that if Castillo Armas needed the approval of his staff, it would be only just that Col. Monzón would also have to obtain the acquiescence of the two other Junta members in Guatemala, thereby losing the opportunity to create the maximum psychological impact which could be expected from their immediate return together. I was finally forced to talk with Castillo Armas alone and ask him point blank whether he was the chief of his "outfit", since every time he agreed on a point he subsequently changed his decision after conferring with his advisers. I told him that if he was not the top man in his organization, I would appreciate his telling me who was, so that I could deal with that person.

I believe this question was the turning point of the negotiations, and Castillo Armas and his advisers accepted Monzón's concession that within fifteen days after the signing of the pact he would agree to the election of a new Junta president. Without actually stating it, the implication was that Castillo Armas would be elected.

From midnight when the two sides finally arrived at an agreement on the basic points, the legal advisers spent their time conferring and arguing on the format and wording of the pact, and at 4 a. m. the document was finally completed.

About 3 a. m., while I was awaiting the completion of the first draft of the pact, I was visited by the Nicaraguan Ambassador to El Salvador, Sr. Carlos Duque Estrada, who said he brought an urgent message from President Somoza. He said that President Somoza wished to advise me that in view of the "breakdown" in negotiations between Castillo Armas and Monzón, he urged the entire negotiation party to come to Managua as his guests to continue their discussions there. If this were not feasible, he said, then he strongly advised that Col. Castillo Armas be made president of Guatemala, and that Col. Monzón be made Minister of Defense. He mentioned several other Cabinet appointments, which I do not recall. I thanked Ambassador Duque in the name of my Government and asked him to convey my expressions of gratitude to President Somoza. I told him, however, that it now appeared that the two sides were arriving at a satisfactory agreement and that I did not believe it would be necessary to trouble President Somoza with any of the negotiations.

Meanwhile, preparations had been made for a formal ceremony in the large banquet room of the Palace, and for the proceedings to be broadcast by radio. The entire press, both national and international, who had also been up all night awaiting the historic moment, were allowed to witness the event and take photographs. The pact was signed by the two colonels; Sr. Carlos Azucar Chávez, acting Foreign Minister in the absence of Sr. Peralta . . .; the Papal Nuncio, and Col. Funes. I suggested to the members of the negotiating group that the name of the representative of the United States of America be omitted from the document, thus giving the Salvadoran Government recognition as the principal mediator. Actually, Sr. Peralta had disappeared shortly after the general negotiations meeting had ended at 6 p.m., and I did not see either him or President Osorio again until the following day.

I went immediately to the United States Embassy with Ambassador McDermott in order to send the following wire [5] to the Department:

"Holland from Peurifoy. Pact between Armas and Monzón signed five a.m. today. Both return with me to Guatemala 11:30 a.m. (Friday, July 2). Junta increased to five members. Monzón remains President for two weeks at which time members vote for new president. Election promised soon as practicable after peace and tranquility restored."

I then returned to Ambassador McDermott's residence at 6:45 a. m., intending to make preparations for departure at 11 a. m. with the two colonels and their advisers, since this had been the agreement made with them. Col. Castillo Armas, when he agreed to return with me to Guatemala, had explained that he was going to leave at 6 a. m., shortly after signing the pact, for Chiquimula in order to give orders to his troops and, I assume, to report to his staff on what had taken place in San Salvador. He had assured me that he would return to San Salvador in time to take off at 11 a. m. However, when I called him to verify the hour of departure, I was informed that he and members of his staff had left for Chiquimula and Honduras but had not stated when they would return. I was finally able to locate Col. Castillo Armas' principal legal adviser, Lic. Juan Cordóva Cerna, who told me that he regretted that Col. Castillo Armas could not return by 11 a. m. as planned, that he had to visit both Chiquimula and Tegucigalpa for "very personal reasons", and that he would either return that afternoon or the following morning.

After conferring once more by telephone with Mr. Holland, who believed as I did that it was important for the two colonels to return to Guatemala together, I alerted Col. Monzón and his party and ordered Col. Vernon P. Martin, Embassy Air Attaché, to have his crew stand by. When Col. Castillo Armas did not return that day, I made plans to take off the following morning, July 3, at 11 a. m.

The following morning, before going to the airport, I called on President Osorio to thank him in the name of my Government for his magnificent hospitality and for the significant role he had played in bringing to a satisfactory conclusion the important negotiations which would bring peace and order to the sister republic of Guatemala. He in turn expressed his satisfaction at the results of the negotiations and asked me to convey to the Government of the United States his appreciation of the part played by my country in this important Central American event. He then presented me with a medallion commemorating the Lempa River hydro-electric plant at Chorrera del Guayabo, and a special set of commemorative postage stamps as a token of his personal esteem and appreciation.

Col. Castillo Armas arrived in San Salvador about 10 a. m. and also visited the Palace to confer with President Osorio. He and his party finally arrived at the airport about 12:20 p. m. and we took off in the Air Attaché's plane at 12:43. Accompanying me on the return trip were Colonels Castillo Armas and Monzón; Col. Miguel Angel Mendoza, officer of the Castillo Armas air force; Major Arriaga, as personal aide to Col. Monzón; Major Enrique Oliva, one of the two new members of the Junta; Licenciados Juan Ibarra and Eduardo Cáceres Lehnhoff, legal advisers to Col. Monzon; Lic. Luis Alberto Coronado Lira, legal adviser to Col. Castillo Armas; the Papal Nuncio; Ambassador Funes, and Mr. Urist. Arrangements had meanwhile been made for nine planes of various types, representing both the regular army and the Castillo Armas forces, to accompany our plane in a formation flight over Guatemala City before landing at Aurora Airport. We landed at 1:30 p. m.

Editorial Note

In a memorandum of conversation summarizing the Secretary's staff meeting, held on July 7, 1954, at 9:15 a.m. in the Secretary's office, Walter K. Scott recorded, inter alia, the following exchanges:

"3. Guatemala.

"Mr. Murphy questioned whether or not Ambassador Peurifoy should now be transferred from Guatemala inasmuch as the situation had improved so. Another Ambassador not so involved might be better now.

"Mr. Holland stated that he would question the timing now—that Ambassador Peurifoy could be moved at a later time; he suggested the first of the year, but that transfer at an earlier date would bring about unnecessary criticism that the United States had placed him there only to foment revolution.

"The Under Secretary stated that Ambassador Peurifoy had mentioned to him that if the Guatemalan situation were cleared up he would like a more important post. The Under Secretary stated that he felt he deserved something better but that Mr. Holland was right—that any transfer should be delayed until later in the year.

"Mr. Holland mentioned that he was trying to work out possible courses of U.S. action to prevent Guatemala from reverting to a dictatorship. He felt that if this happened we would suffer serious propaganda loss throughout the Americas. He hoped to have recommendations to the Secretary by tomorrow.

"Replying to the Secretary's inquiry, Mr. Holland covered the various documents under preparation for release on the Guatemalan incident. They included a chronology of events in Guatemala since 1944 presently being drawn up from Guatemalan Government documents made available to us by the military Junta. He also mentioned that a propaganda booklet was under preparation on the Guatemalan incident for release to the Other Americas.

"4. British White Paper.

"Mr. Holland reported that the British are preparing a 'White Paper' on our actions in the United Nations on the Guatemalan incident. It was pointed out that this probably developed from debate in Parliament which required a government report. The Secretary stated that Eden had mentioned to him the possibility of the Government coming under serious attack over the incident. The Secretary stated that the matter was of serious moment to the United Nations, particularly as it was a precedent for requests in the future from other regional organizations to handle similar matters. He felt that we would not like an incident in the Arab world to be handled by the irresponsible Arab League rather than the United Nations.

"The Secretary approved Mr. Merchant's office handling the contact with the British over this matter, working with L, UNA and ARA.

"Mr. Phleger stated that we should point out to the British that at Caracas we opposed consideration of the item on European colonies in the Americas on the basis that such a matter should be considered in the United Nations rather than in the Association [Organization] of American States, inasmuch as it involved countries outside the Association. He felt that our action in the United Nations vis-à-vis Guatemala was the other side of this coin and that the British could not have our support both ways." (Secretary's Staff Meetings, lot 63 D 75)

Secretary Dulles presided at the meeting, which was attended by 18 other participants.

45. As arranged yesterday with Colonel Castillo Armas (Embtel July 6)[1] Juan Cordova Cerna called on me this afternoon to explain Castillo's views on future organization of government.

Cordova Cerna said Guatemala was currently distracted with politics, fears of army plots against Castillo and possibility of Communist uprising; what was needed was strong established government to insure internal order and put end to politicking. I asked whether he thought a Junta composed of Castillo Armas, Monzon and Oliva would be sufficiently strong, and he replied affirmatively without hesitation. Having in mind current whispering campaign against Monzon, I then asked whether Castillo's friends would accept Monzon as member of Junta and cooperate loyally with him, and Cordova said he thought they would.

We then discussed whether Castillo could run for constitutional presidency if he assumed presidency of Junta. Cordova Cerna said under existing constitution he was disqualified because he had led revolt against previous government; hence it would not matter whether he was president of Junta, a plain member or held no government office. While constitution could be revised, Cordova said he and Castillo thought it preferable Castillo should complete Arbenz term of office (to March 1957), and meanwhile have new constitution drawn up and hold presidential elections in which he would not be candidate. In interim country would be governed by basic status [statutes?] which would provide definite limitations on governments powers and guarantees of people.

He then launched into lengthy discussion of his plan for constituting government: Under Junta, there would be 5-man political council to formulate policy on political matters and 15-man planning council to formulate and coordinate economic policy. Policies drawn up by councils, when approved by Junta would be executed by ministries, which would be stripped of policy making functions. Economic policy would be based on free enterprise system, foreign investment would be encouraged on mutually advantageous terms, and social gains of workers would be retained and carried further.

Cordova Cerna impressed me as highly idealistic and he had obviously studied question thoroughly, but his ideas might be difficult to carry out here.

I have reason to believe Monzon will accept reduction of Junta to three members,[2] will suggest holding elections in next few days and will himself propose Castillo for presidency of Junta. At moment this seems best way to solve dilemma of army–Castillo relationship.

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President

SECRET WASHINGTON, July 9, 1954.

Subject: Recognition of New Guatemalan Government

We have received telegrams [1] from Ambassador Peurifoy in Guatemala reporting that the new Government is constituted in Guatemala and that it has sent our Embassy a formal note [2] stating that it is prepared to fulfill the international obligations of Guatemala. The new Government, which was formally established on July 2, appears to control the entire territory of Guatemala.

We are ready to send a circular telegram [3] to all the other Governments of the American Republics (and to London, Paris and Ottawa which have indicated from time to time that they wish to coordinate recognition actions with us) asking for the views of the Governments, of the other American Republics and indicating that we are considering recognition of the new Guatemalan Government on July 13. This will allow time for some other countries to recognize sooner (El Salvador and Costa Rica have already done so), and for other countries to coordinate with us, so we will not be conspicuously in the lead or behind.

I would appreciate your informing me whether you approve of this action.[4]

Report Prepared in the United States Information Agency [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, July 27, 1954.

REPORT ON ACTIONS TAKEN BY THE UNITED STATES INFORMATION AGENCY IN THE GUATEMALAN SITUATION

In concert with other departments and agencies and for the purpose of supporting specified foreign policy objectives, the Agency began last November–December 1953 to regroup its limited resources in an effort to meet the growing crisis conditions in Guatemala and neighboring countries. Unfortunately, the sharp cutback in Agency funds and personnel during the summer and fall of 1953 had forced reduction of the already small operations in the area, especially in various smaller countries where the programs amounted to one-man holding operations. Actions taken by the Agency to remedy these deficiencies and to carry out an effective operation may be grouped under three time-periods: the six months prior to the communist arms shipment; the crisis period of May–June; and the current post-crisis period.

I. Pre-Crisis Period

A. Policy—Up to the 10th Inter-American Conference at Caracas in March much Latin American opinion refused to concern itself with the communist issue in Guatemala, either regarding the Arbenz regime as a "homegrown" revolutionary movement dedicated to improving the lot of the exploited Guatemalans, or preferring to dwell on the United Fruit issue and speculate as to United States motives of economic imperialism.

In this context our principal information effort was directed toward creating greater awareness throughout the Hemisphere of the real threat to peace and security posed by the verifiable communist penetration of the Guatemalan government. In accordance with established policy at that time, this effort stopped short of accusations, directly attributed to the Agency, against the Arbenz regime as communist-dominated but did include the preparation and placement of unattributed articles labelling certain

[1] This report was submitted to the Operations Coordinating Board at the request of the Acting Director of the U.S. Information Agency. It was circulated to Board members under cover of a memorandum from Elmer B. Staats, dated Aug. 2, 1954, which reads in part as follows: "It is believed that this report is pertinent in connection with recent discussions by the Board of the desirability of having a common approach to information activities in connection with the Guatemalan revolt."

Guatemalan officials as communists, and also labelling certain actions of the Guatemalan government as communist-inspired.

Even though Guatemala alone voted against the anti-communist resolution at Caracas, public attention in Latin America did not begin to focus on the issue of communist penetration and resultant threat to peace and security. With this in mind, the Agency intensified its efforts to get irrefutable evidence publicized throughout the Hemisphere, again short of directly labelling the Arbenz regime as communist but using its actions as self-evident proof.

B. Operations—In November and December, 1953, the information program in Guatemala was reviewed with Ambassador Peurifoy, the Department of State, and the Central Intelligence Agency. A new Public Affairs Officer was appointed and provisions were made for such internal strengthening of personnel and funds as events might require. In order to give direct support to the Guatemalan program, long seriously handicapped in operations through Guatemalan government restrictions, and to help meet the problem of communist penetration in the Central American area, a regional servicing operation was developed whereby USIS Mexico could give program support to Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Panama. This servicing concentrates on anti-communist materials produced by USIS Mexico in direct collaboration with the other posts and tailored to meet specific needs in individual countries. A third phase of organizational build-up was a considerably expanded 1955 budget projection, parts of which were to be initiated with 1954 funds, especially the strengthening of the one-man holding operations in the smaller countries.

Elsewhere in the Caribbean, and related to the Central American plan, a new office was established in Port-of-Spain for the Trinidad–British Guiana–Barbados area. The existing small operation for the French West Indies, based in Martinique, was re-examined and provision made for selected expansion.

Media and field operations were directed to intensify their efforts in the collection, preparation, and placement of materials demonstrating communist design on, and penetration of, the Hemisphere. A successful project in January, for example, was the preparation here of a series of articles exposing Guatemalan communists Fortuny and Gutierrez; these were planted in a Chilean newspaper and later reprinted in selected other countries with Chilean attribution.

Throughout this period and on through the crisis itself emphasis was placed on cross-reporting Latin American opinion which opposed the Arbenz regime and supported the U.S. stand as taken at Caracas.

The Agency's special coverage team at the Caracas Conference fed out a continuous flow of news, backgrounders, photos, and tape recordings, concentrating on the anti-communist resolution and Guatemala's lone opposition. Through direct Wireless File to all missions and fast pouch these materials were disseminated by all field offices throughout the conference with good placement, backed up by frequent background briefings and conversations with editors, commentators, and public opinion leaders. Film coverage was arranged for newsreel and TV outlets and, for future continuing use, full film documentation was developed on the anti-communist resolution, including speeches by Secretary Dulles and Assistant Secretary Holland.

II. Crisis Period

A. Policy—The communist arms shipment to Guatemala in mid-May marked a definite turning point: first, among the small neighboring countries fearing intervention or aggression; second, elsewhere in the Hemisphere a mixture of surprise, concern and even alarm at this unexpected development; third, elsewhere in the world as the issue became headline news and the communist propaganda network openly took up Guatemala's cause. Especially significant was the attention given to the problem in Moscow radio broadcasts which from the beginning had been high and became a continuous clamor, so that by June 23 one Pravda article was broadcast thirty separate times.

As part of the basic U.S. decision to see the issue through to an emergency OAS meeting of consultation, the Agency immediately embarked upon an aggressive information effort, utilizing all available resources, to expose and discredit the Arbenz regime as communist-dominated, to dramatize the threat to the peace and security of the Hemisphere, and to encourage positive action by other American Republics. This effort included use of direct attribution but continued to emphasize cross-reporting of desirable Latin American opinion. Strong advantage was taken of key developments which helped swing Latin American opinion to our side, such as the Soviet arms delivery and the Guatemalan-Soviet maneuver in the U.N.

Output was directed not only to the Hemisphere but also to other parts of the world where, because of public unfamiliarity with the Latin American scene, communist propaganda found ready acceptance. Content was aimed at such attitudes as: skepticism or outright disbelief regarding the U.S. position, ranging to public acceptance of allegations that the U.S. engineered the revolution and that U.S. officials had strong financial interests in the United Fruit Company; public rejection of the premise that international communism had in fact subverted the Guatemalan government; reaction in principle to the U.S. stand on searching vessels in American waters and to the U.S. opposition to U.N. Security Council consideration of the Guatemalan request.

Information treatment was complicated by censorship within Guatemala which, for a period, gave the communist side a distinct advantage in getting out its story first; also by the marked tendency of certain foreign news agencies to cross-report reactions adverse to the U.S. and to select comment out of context.

B. Operations—Benefitting from the previous organizational build-up, an emergency working party under the leadership of the Assistant Director for American Republics was established in the Agency, with special liaison officer assigned to Assistant Secretary Holland in the Department of State. Specialists were reassigned within the Agency to the Policy and Programs Staff for Latin America, the intelligence-research staff, and the press, radio, and films media. A series of directives was issued formulating the various tasks to be undertaken by media and field operations.

Despite the lack of lead time in the policy decision to change from a largely unattributed effort to an aggressive labelling campaign, more than 200 articles, backgrounders, and scripts were prepared and transmitted by Wireless File, cable, and fast pouch during four weeks beginning the end of May for press and radio placement abroad. These were developed partly from public sources and partly from declassified intelligence from State and CIA. Content ranged from coverage of daily developments in Guatemala, Washington, the U.N., and elsewhere in the area, to original verified exposés of communist penetration. Illustrative of numerous pamphlets prepared, a "Chronology of Communism in Guatemala", written here and printed in Habana in 100,000 copies, was distributed to all posts in Latin America. In addition some 27,000 pieces of anti-communist cartoons and posters were expedited to the field for selective placement. Based on Agency materials WRUL broadcasts were stepped up throughout the crisis period. Newsreel coverage of Guatemala's action in the U.N. and the emergency OAS meeting were released worldwide. Three special film subjects, including the film "Caracas: Resolution and Reality," were sent to all posts in the area.

Not only posts in this area but selected posts around the world regularly filed back useful stories for cross-reporting together with analyses of local opinion trends. When it became clear from these reports and other sources that censorship inside Guatemala was preventing foreign correspondents from reporting the story, while at the same time Guatamalan and allied sources were pushing their own version of the revolt, the Agency detailed an experienced press officer to Tegucigalpa in Operation Berry. This consisted of assembling daily, from intelligence sources, a succinct account of events within Guatemala and forwarding by cable to Embassy Tegucigalpa. The press liaison officer informally passed this information along to selected correspondents. Coverage immediately began to improve, helping also to offset cross-reporting by foreign news agencies of anti-U.S. comment.

Field reports now coming in show effective use of materials produced here and by the field posts themselves. Wireless File materials were well received by both metropolitan and provincial papers as timely and effective and were widely printed, frequently without attribution to USIS. This was also true of the anti-communist cartoon prints and plastic plates. Through well-organized mailing lists the various pamphlets and posters were put into the hands of selected individuals and groups. Local radio outlets likewise were successfully brought into play. For example, the important CMQ network in Cuba early in June agreed to use all hard-hitting commentaries on Guatemala at peak listening hours, without USIS attribution. Selected films were redirected to key groups throughout the area, including films exposing communist activities in other countries clearly paralleling the Guatemalan situation.

III. Post-Crisis Period

At the present time, the information treatment of the Guatemalan problem has entered the phase of disseminating the documentation only now becoming available from within Guatemala, which confirms the communist nature of the Arbenz government and demonstrates the truth of the representations previously made by the United States. In this task, the Castillo Armas government can be expected to help by exposing the atrocities and the tactics of the previous administration. Since this is the first time a communist government has been overthrown, a full case history of "rise and fall" is available, pointedly useful on a sustained basis in arousing Latin America to the methods and dangers of communist penetration. This line is also being carried worldwide to offset the large measure of skepticism which characterizes public reaction to the Guatemalan situation.

As part of the basic job of getting verified facts on communist penetration in Guatemala, the Agency detailed two cameramen to Guatemala as soon as it was possible to enter the country. A considerable quantity of sound film documenting communist atrocities is already on hand. Together with other film materials this footage will be developed into two permanent film records on communism in Guatemala, one short subject for immediate theatrical release worldwide and one longer subject for continuing use. A similar effort is being made with regard to still photos and recorded interviews. These and other efforts are in addition to publicizing official statements or reports as they become available for public use.

The Agency will continue to give high priority to Guatemala during what undoubtedly will be a long period of rehabilitation. A long-range effort of re-orientation seems indicated, at government levels and particularly in the interior areas where land has been distributed and doubts about the future persist. The Agency desires to play its part in a coordinated multi-Agency effort and has informally exchanged views with the Department of State on the type and size of resources that might be employed.

In addition to efforts within Guatemala, there is urgent need for a marked step-up in the information program for the Hemisphere, for the two-fold purpose of aggressively exposing communist penetration and bolstering democratic forces. As in efforts directed toward Guatemala, this should be part of a multi-Agency plan of action, bringing to bear on the Hemisphere greater attention and larger resources than the U.S. government has given it in the years since the war.

Political Situation

Ambassador Peurifoy reported that the political situation was encouraging since the August 2 rebellion of Army elements [3] had been put down. Castillo Armas had tremendous popular support, and gave signs that he intended to use his power to consolidate his control firmly.

Castillo Armas proposed soon to call elections for delegates to draft a Constitution and elect a president for a specified period. This would terminate the Junta, and would be preferable to Cordoba Cerna's idea of submitting a "statute" to referendum, which would provide for continuation of Castillo Armas in power. Castillo's popularity right now was so great that no opposition candidate would have a chance, if one could be found. Mr. Leddy expressed concern over risking elections, pointed out the danger of adverse results, citing the case of Venezuela.[4] Mr. Holland felt the situations were dissimilar in that view of Castillo Armas enjoyed great popularity at this moment, and his potential opposition had not had three years to prepare, as had been the case in Venezuela.

Cordoba Cerna appeared to be the best man in sight as advisor to Castillo Armas, and perhaps eventually president. He would return to Guatemala next week, after Ambassador Peurifoy had had an opportunity to confer with him. Ambassador Peurifoy would return shortly afterwards.

Labor

Principal problem is lack of leaders. Solutions suggested: creation of a labor leader training institute in Guatemala, which has been proposed by ORIT leaders. Guatemalan leaders may also be trained in the United States, where they can observe highly developed trade union practices, and in Puerto Rico, where they can be seen adapted to more primitive conditions.

A further problem is that of employers attitudes. The IRCA is reported to have begun to institute a retaliatory policy against employees who have been strong union men, as distinguished from Communists or sympathizers. This must be stopped, as it will put United States concerns in the van in a turn-back-the-clock operation. Montgomery[5] and others should be approached on this problem.

The Guatemalan labor code will have to be overhauled or replaced. Vallon[6] will be able to make recommendations on a United States or other technician who can help with this.

A fourth problem is that of the affiliations of such Guatemalan labor organizations as develop there. Our position is that we support free labor organization at the local level, as well as free association with international groups except Communist controlled or anti-United States ones. We, therefore, look with approval on affiliation with ORIT, but that is Guatemala's business.

Asylees

There were a total of 770 persons who took asylum after Arbenz' downfall. The Castillo Armas government considers them to be in four categories: (1) women and children in asylum only because of family relationships; (2) Communists; (3) criminals; and (4) relatively harmless members of the Arbenz political regime. The Guatemalans are examining each case to determine whether the individual is guilty of crimes or Communist activities. The Guatemalan Foreign Office has no plan for disposing of the asylee problem.

There are four alternative courses: (1) turn all the asylees loose in the hemisphere with safe conducts; (2) keep all or many of them holed up in Embassies indefinitely—the Haya de la Torre[7] solution; (3) submit to the OAS;[8] (4) try to persuade the host governments to withdraw asylum from criminals and Communists, i.e., evict them from the Embassies. The host governments would have to be assured that the evictees would get humane treatment, i.e., Guatemala would have to guarantee prosecution in good faith of the criminals, to send to the Iron Curtain any Communists choosing to go there and accepted by a Soviet country, to free the harmless asylees, and to try to rehabilitate the dangerous ones. Alternative courses 1 and 2 constitute no solution for obvious reasons, and No. 3 would probably result in interminable debate and no solution.

Therefore, Ambassador Peurifoy should urge the Government to release the women and children, and to guarantee the humane treatment mentioned in No. 4 above so that arrangements could be made

[7] Víctor Raúl Haya de la Torre was a Peruvian political leader who had sought asylum in the Colombian Embassy at Lima in January 1949, and was unable to obtain safe conduct to leave the Embassy until March 1954, when the Peruvian Government allowed him to proceed to Mexico.

[8] In a memorandum to Deputy Assistant Secretary Woodward, Director of the Office of South American Affairs Atwood, and Mr. Burrows, dated July 5, 1954, Assistant Secretary Holland stated that "a novel, but perhaps practical solution" to the problem of the disposition of Communist leaders who took asylum in different Embassies in Guatemala "might be the establishment of two or three large prison camps, operated by the OAS itself and in which Communist agents would have a chance to demonstrate their eschewal of Communism as the price of liberty." (714.001/7–554) In a memorandum to Mr. Holland, dated July 7, 1954, Mr. Burrows commented that he believed that the Assistant Secretary's suggestion was "not a feasible or practicable one" (714.001/7–754), and in a memorandum to Mr. Holland, dated July 13, 1954, Mr. Woodward stated in part that the "establishment of an OAS detention center would be likely to create so much bad publicity that it should not be suggested unless we are certain that the dimensions of the problem are so great that they cannot be handled by Guatemala alone." (714.001/7–1354) There is no indication in Department of State files that Mr. Holland pursued the idea of a detention center.

with host governments that the latter withhold or withdraw asylum from people active on behalf of international Communism, and from criminals, both upon presentation of charges supported by prima facie evidence. If the Guatemalans accept, Mr. Holland should go to Mexico City to try to sell it to President Ruiz Cortines. Mr. Holland said Generalissimo Trujillo liked the plan but thought it wouldn't work. An alternative would be to issue safe conducts conditioned on going to an Iron Curtain country. Mr. Fisher should draft a memorandum[9] to the Secretary recommending this course.

Economic

The Embassy had submitted some recommendations on FOA programs in agriculture, health and sanitation, and education. Our agricultural experiment station staff should be reinforced, and the corn breeding program examined for possible inclusion. The Roosevelt Hospital should be finished off as quickly as possible.

Ambassador Peurifoy recommended that strong assistance be given the American School in Guatemala. It badly needs a new building. If the FOA cannot do it, thought should be given an EXIM or other type of loan.

The Guatemalan school system, formerly riddled with Communists, should be restored as fast as possible. A suggestion is the importation of teachers from other countries, after an expert survey, possibly by FOA, reveals the requirements and recommends remedies.

The FOA labor exchange program should be implemented. An instruction[10] on this has already gone down to the Embassy.

Ambassador Peurifoy should try to get the Government to invite Muñoz Marin[11] to visit Guatemala. Further discussion and planning of ways in which the many good examples set by Puerto Rico can be made useful to Guatemala can then go forward.

Financial

Guatemala has a public internal debt of about $30,000,000. The Government would like to get a 30 million dollar 6-year loan or series of loans, without any publicity. It would be used to pay off the 4 to 6 million immediately and urgently due in back salaries to government employees, to start immediately a public works program, including low cost housing, and hospitals in seven zones, to complete the Roosevelt Hospital, to complete the Inter-American and possibly the Atlantic Highways, to install a $7 million hydro-electric plant at Lake Amatitlan and other projects.

A secret loan is impractical. Guatemala may be able to get loans from several different private banks, possibly with EXIM guarantees.

[11] Luis Muñoz Marin, Governor of Puerto Rico, 1949–1957.

The Guatemalans need first of all a fiscal expert to help them find out their true financial condition. The IBRD should send a team down to examine the economy and outline what it can do in the way of loans. Sound projects not financed by IBRD should be supported by EXIM Bank loans.

Minister of Communications Prado Velez,[12] or whoever is going to be directly responsible, should be urged to draw up plans and come to the United States to discuss them in concrete terms.

Mr. Neal should look into ways and means of furnishing Guatemala with a short term loan to meet its immediate operating needs.[13]

[13] During the latter part of August and early September, officials in the Department of State discussed the possibility of a short-term loan for Guatemala against Guatemalan gold reserves. In telegram 247, from Guatemala City, dated Sept. 7, 1954, Ambassador Peurifoy stated in part the following: "Federal Reserve loan does not appear necessary since further review here indicates probability Guatemalan Government can for the present meet its obligations." Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 10, 1954.

Subject: Asylee Problem in Guatemala

Discussion:

There has been no progress toward satisfactory disposition of the Communist and other dangerous asylees in Guatemala. Of the 770 persons who took refuge in nine Latin American missions in Guatemala after the fall of the Arbenz Government, only a few women and children have been granted safe conducts out of the country. The Guatemalan Government while investigating the cases of asylees for evidence of Communist or criminal activities, has developed no policy other than to resist the growing pressure for safe conducts for all asylees, recognizing the danger of releasing into the hemisphere many Communists and sympathizers among the asylees. The OAS can probably contribute little toward a settlement besides extended debate, either inconclusive or adverse to Guatemala. However, a continued impasse will lead to serious difficulties between Guatemala and other Latin American countries, especially the host governments. Of these, Mexico is the most important with over 300 asylees in its Embassy.

The most desirable solution would be one clearly establishing the principle that the traditional benefits of asylum should be denied international Communists. It would probably best be embodied in bilateral arrangements between Guatemala and the respective host governments along the following lines: (1) host to withdraw benefits of asylum from Communists and criminals against whom charges supported by prima facie evidence are presented, i.e., evict them from diplomatic premises into Guatemalan jurisdiction; (2) Guatemala would immediately give safe conducts out of Guatemala to the relatively harmless asylees and guarantee humane treatment to persons evicted from the embassies. In this respect Guatemala would specifically undertake to prosecute in good faith those accused of crimes, to offer transportation to Iron Curtain countries to Communists who elect to go there and are admitted, and to attempt to rehabilitate the remainder, releasing those found to be harmless.

In the event this kind of solution cannot be achieved, consideration should be given the alternative of Guatemala's granting safe conducts for dangerous asylees conditioned on their being transported to and accepted by an Iron Curtain country. These alternatives have been worked out in our conferences with Amb. Peurifoy.

Recommendation:

That Embassy Guatemala seek the Guatemalan Government's concurrence on the proposals suggested, and that if given, I personally visit President Ruiz Cortines of Mexico to try to persuade him to accept a solution along the lines outlined.[1]

SECRET PRIORITY WASHINGTON, August 31, 1954—7:25 p. m.

178. Department concerned lest threatened break between Castillo, Cordova Cerna and Monzon (urtel 225)[2] lead renewed violence and jeopardize anti-Communist victory achieved by June revolution. Cable your estimate current intentions Monzon and Castillo and military support on which all three men can count.

[1] Drafted, with the assistance of Mr. Leddy, and signed by Assistant Secretary Holland.
[2] The referenced telegram, dated Aug. 27, 1954, is not printed (714.00/8–2754).

On basis evidence available to Department it appears we have following alternatives:

(1) Support Cordova proposal to purge Monzon and subordinate Castillo to new group dominated by Cordova. If successful program would ensure effective elimination Communists from political life country. Disadvantages are Cordova's lack significant popular support except among conservative and business groups and uncertainty his ability control regular army and liberation military forces.

(2) Unlimited support of Castillo against Cordova and Monzon on basis his popularity with people, his control airforce and presumed control liberation forces and at least significant portion regular army. Disadvantage is his demonstrated lack of ability govern and risk defections and revolution now or later.

(3) Attempt persuade Castillo, Monzon and Cordova to collaborate until revolutionary changes better consolidated by taking following steps:

(a) Assure Monzon and regular Army we are not opposed to Army as an institution and recognize great majority officer corps loyal present Government. As long as regular Army loyal Government we will urge protection its legitimate interests. FYI only we would interpret this to include gradual and selective purge unreliable officers in such way as would minimize risk regular army officers will consider counter-revolution necessary to protect their jobs. End FYI. In this connection please comment probable reaction Castillo and Cordova to such an assurance to Monzon.

(b) Friendly but firm statement to Castillo and Cordova that we expect them collaborate for good Guatemala until revolutionary gains consolidated. In this connection not clear Department whether Monzon's resignation from Government at this time would provoke reaction from regular Army and whether Castillo or others pressing for his immediate resignation. Please clarify.

Department inclined believe third alternative preferable but recognizes decision must be governed by local situation. Submit Embassy analysis stating whether situation deteriorating so rapidly that immediate action necessary.[3]

[3] In telegram 234, from Guatemala City, dated Aug. 31, 1954, Ambassador Peurifoy reported that he had discussed the Guatemalan political situation with the three members of the Junta of Government, and that during the discussion Colonel Monzón remarked that in spite of the fact that the members of the Junta had collaborated loyally with each other, confidence had not returned to Guatemala, and "he had concluded that only by placing full powers in hands of one man in accordance with Guatemalan tradition could stability be assured. Hence, two days ago he had voluntarily suggested he and Oliva resign; Oliva had subsequently agreed." (714.00/8–3154) On Sept. 1, 1954, Colonel Monzón and Major Oliva resigned, the Junta was dissolved, and Castillo Armas assumed the provisional Presidency of Guatemala. On Oct. 10, 1954, the results of a popular election held in Guatemala confirmed Castillo Armas as President of the country.

CONFIDENTIAL
PRIORITY

GUATEMALA CITY, September 2, 1954—4 p. m.
[Received September 3—2:24 a. m.]

241. First night, following assumption of presidency by Colonel Castillo Armas, passed without incident. While government officials expressed confidence there would be no trouble they said suitable precautions against possible military uprising had been taken and press this morning reports Castillo together with former Junta members Monzon and Oliva visited principal military centers yesterday where Castillo received assurances support and Monzon and Oliva emphasized their resignations had been voluntary and not as result of pressure. However, some army officers are known to feel that Monzon's resignation violated pact of San Salvador and that they are under no obligation whatever to Castillo. Hence while Castillo has survived first critical moments possibility of disturbances later cannot be entirely discounted.

I talked with President Castillo for an hour last night at home of Minister of Communications Prado Velez and endeavored to impress on him need for decisive action if he was to hold confidence of country. I urged advantage be taken of resignation of Cabinet to replace incompetents with capable men. I then asked his views on proposal to hold Constituent Assembly, suggesting such action in near future desirable to enhance domestic and foreign prestige of his government and reassure Guatemalans who feared long period of dictatorship. Castillo said he planned to announce intention call Constituent Assembly in speech today but that he did not think it should be held until problem of unemployment had been substantially overcome since he feared jobless would be easy prey to Communist propaganda. I asked when he thought elections would be held and he said as soon as highway construction program could be gotten under way, especially construction of inter-American highway. I then told him all formalities had been complied with and that representative of BPR would arrive in Guatemala soon to assist in starting work. Castillo was pleased and said he would probably refer to this development in his address to nation.

President then said he had two matters he wished discuss with me: Labor and relations with American companies. On labor, he said he had had to take harsh measures to break Communist control of unions but that he wished to attract labor support for his government and avoid reputation abroad of being anti-labor. He thought time had come to reorganize unions and regretted that American companies were opposing his efforts. He hoped they could be induced to cooperate with government in eliminating Communists and setting up free unions, thus avoiding vacuum in labor movement, which Communists would take advantage of to organize labor clandestinely. I expressed full agreement with his views and said I knew Department also agreed.

It will be noted President's spontaneously expressed views on labor differ sharply from alleged government position as stated by IRCA Railway official who called on me yesterday (Embassy telegram 238).[1]

Continuing this conversation Castillo said that relations with American companies were generally excellent. Both UFCO and IRCA had expressed willingness revise their contracts to give greater benefits to government and he hoped detailed negotiations might be undertaken soon. Only Electric Power Company had not made any offer. I replied I hoped mutually satisfactory arrangements could be worked out with all companies especially in view of government's urgent need for additional revenue.

In conclusion President said his advisers were working on provisional law to permit exploration for petroleum to get underway at once and that later complete new petroleum law would be drawn up possibly with aid of US expert not connected with oil companies. I encouraged him to proceed along this line and mentioned Max Ball as outstanding authority on petroleum legislation.

256. In talk with Foreign Minister Salazar[2] today I inquired about Guatemalan Government's policy on asylees explaining I had been confused by circumstance that President Castillo Armas in Salazar's presence had agreed to Department's proposal for making renewed effort to prevent dispersion of Communists and other undesirables throughout hemisphere and that I had subsequently learned through newspapers that safe conducts were being issued to all asylees.

Salazar, obviously embarrassed, said that until recently he had issued safe conducts only to persons of minor importance until about five days ago Mexican Ambassador had visited Castillo and asked that asylees be cleared out of Embassy before September 16, Mexico's national holiday. Subsequently, Castillo had instructed that safe conducts be issued to all asylees without distinction. Salazar said he had reminded Castillo of his agreement with me but Castillo had replied that nothing had been done and plan must have failed.

I replied it was extremely embarrassing for me and my government to have policy changed in this manner without our being informed and that our Ambassador in Mexico[3] had been conducting negotiations with Mexican authorities and planned to see President tomorrow. In conclusion I said with reference to Mexican Ambassador it was interesting to know whose advice Castillo accepted. Salazar repeatedly said he was sorry but feared nothing more could be done on this matter now.[4]

The Acting Secretary of State to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration (Stassen)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 30, 1954.

DEAR MR. STASSEN: Since the overthrow of the pro-Communist Arbenz Government in Guatemala approximately three months ago, the Department of State and the Foreign Operations Administration have both given urgent and careful study to the problem of the economic rebuilding of that country, and the specific part which can be played by aid from our Government. A marked decline in economic activity consequent upon the disturbances of May and June of this year has been reflected in increasing unemployment, reduced levels of income particularly among the lower classes of the population, and a retarding or total cessation, in some cases, in normal expansion and growth. The Government of Guatemala, suffering extraordinary expenses at a time when the national treasury was found to be looted by the departing regime, has not been able to count fully on even normal sources of revenue to cope with the new burdens of reconstruction. Emergency loans to the Government may be obtained, on a limited basis, from internal banking sources; but as the Government is unwilling (for domestic political reasons of considerable importance) to look for private foreign loans through usual banking channels, it has become apparent that some form of foreign aid is indispensable to meet the pressing need for renewed economic activity and restoration of confidence.

The interest of our Government in a favorable solution of this problem has been expressed publicly by the Secretary of State on June 30, 1954,[2] and reiterated by President Eisenhower on August 16, 1954. The rebuilding of the Guatemalan economy, as a bulwark against the return of Communist domination of that country, is a very important objective of our foreign policy.

Within the last two weeks, a representative[3] of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development visited Guatemala for the purpose of estimating present needs on which that institution can assist. On his return earlier this week, we were informed by President

Black[4] that this representative recommended against any loans to Guatemala at this time.[5] Likewise, during the present week, it has been indicated to this Department that the policy of the Export Import Bank is not in favor of the kind of loan which is now needed by Guatemala. Accordingly, it would appear that neither the International Bank nor the Export Import Bank can now be looked to as sources for emergency economic or financial assistance to Guatemala at this time.

Meanwhile, our Embassy at Guatemala City has reported that the Guatemalan economy stands in urgent need of strengthening through the initiation of public works programs which will absorb a large portion of the many thousands now unemployed, and restore confidence by demonstrating the willingness of the United States to support the regime. The Embassy has pointed out that time is a precious commodity in the present urgent need, and has specifically recommended that a loan of ten million dollars be obtained from the Export Import Bank for purposes of road construction and other public works. Your attention is drawn to Embassy cable No. 247, dated September 7, 1954,[6] copy of which was distributed to the Foreign Operations Administration. In Washington, the Embassy of Guatemala has on September 20, 1954, submitted a formal note [7] to this Department requesting that the sum of ten million dollars be made available to the Government of Guatemala, in order to pull the country's economy out of the state of partial paralysis which has developed as a result of Communist depredations and mismanagement.

In the present circumstances, it is the considered judgment of the Department of State that our policy objectives in Guatemala require a rapid injection of new funds into the Guatemalan economy, and that this could best be accomplished by a specific grant for public works in the fields of housing, road construction and sanitation and other development purposes. These projects will, in the main, fall within the purview of the Foreign Operations Administration, and could properly receive its supervision and guidance. The amount deemed necessary, during the present fiscal year, is estimated at five million dollars. The allocation and distribution of such funds should remain under control of representatives of the United States Government by requiring that release be made solely on the joint signature of the Country Director of FOA and the American Ambassador.

Such aid to the Government of Guatemala should not encourage other Latin American Governments to feel they should receive similar assistance. The special needs of Guatemala are generally recognized by other Governments as well as our own, and the public assurance of aid to Guatemala, given by the President and the Secretary of State, has been generally accepted by other governments in Latin America as a recognition on our part of the peculiar and dangerous conditions which followed upon the overthrow of the pro-Communist regime. It is not anticipated that the action recommended will cause ill feeling among other Latin American Governments or precipitate requests by them for equal treatment.

May I therefore request that you give urgent consideration to the feasibility of making available to Guatemala the sum of five million dollars for public works in the fields of housing, road construction, and sanitation and other development purposes and that designated officers of your Agency confer with officers of the Department at the earliest possible moment to achieve this purpose.[8]

Sincerely,

WALTER B. SMITH

[8] On Oct. 5, 1954, Mr. Stassen, Ambassador Armour, who was in Washington for consultations at the Department of State, and Mr. Fisher discussed the subject of emergency FOA aid for Guatemala at the Department of State. In a memorandum of that conversation, by Mr. Fisher, dated Oct. 6, Mr. Stassen is reported to have stated his agreement that in general Latin America had been "sadly neglected" by the United States, that in the specific case of Guatemala "he would do what he could to resolve the problem", and that "one of the factors involved was that the President's emergency fund, contrary to what many believed, was not a separate unallocated sum, but merely an authority to transfer funds among existing allocations." The Acting Director of the Foreign Operations Administration (FitzGerald) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL

WASHINGTON, October 16, 1954.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This is in response to the letter of September 30, from Honorable Walter B. Smith, then Acting Secretary of State, proposing a $5,000,000 grant for Guatemala.[1]

The Foreign Operations Administration is fully aware of the United States policy of supporting the new non-communist government in Guatemala by improving the economic conditions in that country. Already we have (1) greatly increased the Guatemalan technical assistance budget from $190,000 to $1,300,000, to be used primarily in the basic fields of agricultural extension and research, public health and sanitation, and education, and to provide industrial, economic and financial advisors on a short-term basis upon request by the Guatemalan Government, (2) made an economic development grant of $500,000, to be matched by the Government of Guatemala, for the Roosevelt Hospital, which will put into operation two units (pediatrics, obstetrics and general services) of that hospital.

Finally, we are prepared to make available modest additional funds on a grant basis for projects designed to help shore up the more vulnerable areas of the economy and to provide some immediate relief to the unemployment problem. We are not, however, in a position to provide Guatemala with a grant in the magnitude of $5,000,000 because of other high priority requirements for our limited funds and since it is not clear that sound projects have been or can be developed for the prompt use of this amount. While we will, in any event, have to use the authority granted the President in the Mutual Security Act of 1954[2] to transfer funds into the Latin American area, such transfer must be kept to the irreducible minimum. We believe, therefore, that we can carry out the foreign policy objectives of the United States in Guatemala by providing at this time for a grant of $1,000,000 and thereafter keeping the situation under continuous review.

While we realize that the Department of State has the primary responsibility for deciding whether a grant of $5,000,000 to Guatemala would have had any adverse effect on our relations with other Central American Republics, we should like to express our view, for such value as it may be to you, that the adverse effects would have been very considerable.[3]

As for the uses to which a grant of $1,000,000 would be put, we will request the United States Operations Mission Director in Guatemala[4] to develop a proposed operating plan with representatives of the Guatemalan Government which would emphasize (1) immediate "impact" projects having the primary purpose of putting unemployed to work on sound, though probably small, public works projects, and other developmental activities, and (2) the preparation of detailed plans for sound bankable economic development projects for submission to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development or the Export-Import Bank. We would use our good offices in assisting Guatemala in presenting such projects to the banks for their consideration.

We understand that the Guatemalan Government has recently appointed a Coordinator of Technical Cooperation, which should facilitate the development of the most constructive proposals for the use of the proposed grant.

We are prepared promptly to advise the Guatemalan Government of an allotment of $1,000,000 on a grant basis, and will time such advice so as to permit the Department to obtain the maximum political advantage therefrom.

We also will have available shortly a suggested draft of a broad agreement covering the general terms and conditions of such a grant, which if you find it satisfactory, we would hope you could negotiate as soon as possible with the Guatemalan Government so that the United States Operations Mission can develop operating agreements promptly.

It is our understanding that the Operations Coordinating Board, at its meeting on October 6, approved a grant to Guatemala at this time of $1,000,000 and the use thereof for the operating programs indicated above.

Sincerely yours, D. A. FITZGERALD

ceeded in reducing requests from 280 to 10. We believe we can cut 10 to 5 without bad effect. But we cannot go all the way to 1 without serious risk disillusionment and addition another element instability in already difficult and complex situation.

(2) Grant need not be regarded as precedent. Roosevelt Hospital and Inter-American Highway are continuation old programs and are not peculiar Guatemala. Aid on basis Guatemala matching funds can be said be extension same program designed maintain equality treatment by making up for years when Guatemala received no aid because Communists.

(3) There is real need. Money could be used kill several birds one stone—help restore confidence economy, alleviate unemployment and help build roads now virtually impassable on Pacific Coast agricultural region over which between 60 to 80 percent of wealth produced in country must move.

(4) Guatemala is doing its part. New one-time tax imposed October 19 designed supply $6.2 million is stiff medicine especially at time of falling coffee prices. Furthermore, Castillo sincerely desires put economic house in order as witness request for financial advisor and disposition discuss with us in advance petroleum and other major economic policies.

(5) Policy of little or no aid may well diminish Embassy's influence on negotiations for new petroleum law, new contract United Fruit and adjustment differences re electric company, Grace Lines and Pan Air. Success in obtaining satisfactory oil law might alone yield tax revenues to US far in excess of 5 millions in issue.

(6) Failure supply adequate grant may result in no aid in view Guatemala's long tradition no foreign loans. It will certainly postpone aid for estimated minimum one year required make detailed justifications and conclude negotiations with lending institutions. Next 12 months are critical ones.

(7) We disagree sound projects cannot be developed quickly. World Bank assigns high priority south coastal highway, page 203, its detailed report.[3] Johnson Drake Piper, 86 Trinity Place, New York, did considerable work south coastal roads 1949–50 and estimates cost resurfacing 52 kilometers Guatemala City to Escuintla at half million. This central artery very bad condition and cost-saving it will be higher if not repaired soon. Same company estimates cost repair completion 113 kilometers Popaya to Retalhuleu to Talisman and 32 kilometers Retalhuleu to Champerico at 8.5 millions with estimated dollar costs including 1 million asphalt and fuel, 1.2 million steel bridge work, 1.1

million culvert pipe, reinforcing steel, tracts, spare and replacement parts for Guatemalan road building equipment. Estimates Guatemalan Highway Department higher with neither figure including cost connection highway with Salvador also desired by President. This American company offers commence work within 30 days on basis cost plus 5½ percent with appropriate incentive clauses. Regardless whether this or other agency or company used it should not be difficult with competent FOA or Bureau Public Roads supervision assure efficient use. Completion detailed justification serve basis bids might take month. Furthermore, in unlikely event unable wisely spend entire sum this year carry over small excess into next year as in case other countries should present no serious problem.

(8) Time of essence. We have too large a stake in this government to delay meaningful aid.[4]

ARMOUR

[4] In a memorandum of telephone conversation between Ambassador Armour, Counselor of Embassy Mann, and Assistant Secretary Holland, dated Oct. 25, 1954, Mr. Holland is reported as having stated that the FOA had agreed to increase the total amount of aid to Guatemala from $2.8 million to $5 million, that the increase "had been obtained just on muscle", and that "the disposition to do what was necessary was deep and reliable here and, if we pushed it the right way, whatever had to be done could be done." (814.00 TA/10–2554) Information in Department of State files indicates that the additional $2,200,000 was to be made up of $1,700,000 transferred to Guatemala from the general technical cooperation account for Latin America and $500,000 from the development aid account for Bolivia (Memorandum to Under Secretary Murphy, by Special Assistant to the Secretary Nolting, Oct. 25, 1954, not printed, 814.00/10–2554).

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 27, 1954.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Arrangements were made in July of this year between the United States and the new Government of Guatemala under which that government became eligible to purchase military equipment from this government.[2] The Guatemalan Government has taken action which has removed the objection that the United States had to Guatemala's reservation to the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance and it now appears that Guatemala will become a party to that Treaty in the near future.[3] It is also expected that Guatemala will soon approve the defense plans of the Inter-American Defense Board. As a further means of strengthening Guatemala's military relations with the United States and the other American Republics, I recommend that early consideration be given to developing a hemisphere defense role for Guatemala as a first step in the direction of establishing the eligibility of Guatemala for grant military assistance under the provisions of Section 105 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954.

The present Government of Guatemala, which came to power by ousting a communist controlled government, is cooperating fully with the United States and it is in the interest of the United States that this government be supported. Action has already been taken to provide economic assistance to Guatemala and further measures of economic cooperation are under consideration. These measures should assist in maintaining popular support of the present government and help to stabilize the economic situation in that country, but they make no direct contribution to winning and maintaining the support of the Guatemalan military establishment, which probably will assert the determining influence in any political crisis in Guatemala. Although a military assistance agreement with Guatemala would have the purpose of assisting that country to develop a unit, or units, of its armed forces for hemisphere defense missions, provision of assistance under such an agreement would have the additional result of helping to modernize the Guatemalan military establishment. It is believed that a bilateral agreement with the Guatemalan Government would therefore have considerable appeal to the Guatemalan military and the conclusion of an agreement would be a major step in the direction of assuring continued Guatemalan military support of the present Government. The ability of the present Government to obtain assistance would be the more important because of the failure of the previous regime to obtain military equipment from us and would serve to strengthen the Government's prestige with the Guatemalan Army and thus enhance its ability to maintain internal order.

In view of the unsettled situation in Guatemala it is, quite apart from support of the present Government, important to maintain the friendship and cooperation of the Guatemalan Army because it is, in the final analysis, in the best position to determine the successor government and its orientation. I think it would be a grave error on our part not to recognize that fact and to do everything possible to orient the Guatemalan military toward the United States and secure its firm support for our policy of assuring that communism does not again acquire any influence in the Guatemalan Government.

Because of the special nature of Guatemala's case, I consider it of great importance that we be in a position to offer the Guatemalan Government a bilateral military assistance agreement as soon as that Government completes ratification of the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance. That should occur within the next sixty days. I therefore urge that prompt consideration be given to developing a defense role for Guatemala and to making available the necessary funds during this fiscal year and fiscal year 1956 to initiate and carry out a suitable military assistance program in Guatemala.

Sincerely yours, JOHN FOSTER DULLES

714.5 MSP/11–2454

The Secretary of Defense (Wilson) to the Secretary of State

SECRET WASHINGTON, November 24, 1954.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to your letter of 27 October 1954,[1] with regard to a possible military assistance program to Guatemala. You urge prompt consideration be given to developing a defense role for Guatemala and to making funds available to initiate and carry out a suitable military assistance program for that country.

You are aware, of course, that because of the limited MDA funds available for Latin America, a military assistance program for Guatemala can be carried out only at the expense of other programs world-wide. You will appreciate that the cumulative effect of supporting numerous new programs in Latin America, by diversion of the limited MDA Program funds, is of much greater significance than would be indicated by the relatively small amount of funds required for individual country programs in the area. In the case of Guatemala, such diversion of funds at this time can be justified primarily by political considerations only.

Before the Department of Defense can develop a proper defense role and force bases for Guatemala, it will be necessary to make a military survey of that country in order to examine defense requirements, status of equipment and troops, and ability of the country to support military forces. Such a military survey is necessary to prevent recurrence of the hastily implemented program for Honduras, in which there was considerable duplication of equipment and in which there has been criticism from the U.S. Ambassador as to the type of unit supported. It is realized that conduct of the survey might make it difficult to meet your timetable for presentation of a bilateral military assistance agreement to the government of Guatemala. However, dispatch of a survey team before presentation of a bilateral agreement might provide some psychological advantage and, in any event, will provide a basis for development of a sounder program for Guatemala than would otherwise be possible.

It is requested that the Department of State obtain political clearance for the conduct of a military survey of Guatemala. Concurrently, the Department of Defense will make preparation for prompt dispatch of a military survey team, as well as subsidiary actions required before negotiation of the necessary bilateral agreements with Guatemala can take place.

It is further requested that your Department be prepared to initiate action to obtain the required Presidential determination as to the eligibility of Guatemala for grant military assistance. In the meantime, direct contact may be established with the Chairman, US Delegation, Inter-American Defense Board,[2] who will be responsible for the military survey of Guatemala, and for carrying out the necessary bilateral negotiations for the Department of Defense.[3]

Sincerely yours,

C. E. WILSON

[2] Lt. Gen. Howard A. Craig, USAF.

[3] In a letter to Secretary of Defense Wilson, dated Dec. 2, 1954, not printed, Deputy Under Secretary Murphy stated that the military survey requested by Secretary Wilson had already been completed, and that upon receipt of a letter from the Department of Defense indicating that defense plans required the participation of Guatemala, the Department of State would seek the necessary Presidential determination as to Guatemala's eligibility for grant military assistance (714.5 MSP/11–2454).

The Secretary of State to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration (Stassen)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 26, 1954.

DEAR MR. STASSEN: Our Ambassador to Guatemala has urgently recommended, for important political reasons, that certain military equipment be made available to the Government of Guatemala and delivered before December 22, 1954. The equipment is desired for use in connection with a military demonstration to be held in Guatemala City on December 22, 1954, for the purpose of encouraging anti-communist elements and deterring communist conspiracy in Guatemala by a public show of Guatemalan military strength. As indicated in the enclosed memorandum of November 23, 1954,[2] from the Department of the Army, General Matthew B. Ridgway has informed the Guatemalan Ambassador, in Washington, that the Department of the Army will prepare the desired equipment for shipment without delay on a vessel scheduled to depart from New Orleans on December 10 and to arrive in Puerto Barrios on December 16. The Guatemalan Ambassador, however, has informed General Ridgway and representatives of the State Department that his Government cannot at the present time make full payment for the equipment in cash but would be prepared to pay for it on deferred payment terms under the provisions of Section 106, Public Law 665, approved August 26, 1954.

The Department of State believes that a public demonstration by Guatemalan military forces in possession of adequate equipment recently delivered by the United States would emphasize to communist elements in the Central American area the firm intention and the capability of the present Guatemalan Government to resist communist subversion and conspiracy with armed force and the determination of the United States to support Guatemala in resisting communism. This would conform with our national policy objective of eliminating the threat of communism from Guatemala and the Central American area. The Department of State therefore strongly recommends that Guatemala be permitted to procure the desired equipment on deferred payment terms and that the transaction be authorized in sufficient time to assure delivery of the equipment in Guatemala before December 22.[3]

Sincerely yours,

For the Secretary of State
FREDERICK E. NOLTING, JR.
Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs

[3] In a letter to Mr. Stassen, dated Nov. 29, 1954, supplementing this letter, Mr. Nolting, for the Secretary of State, stated in part that in spite of the current shortage of cash resources in Guatemala the Department of State believed that the country's economy was "basically sound and that the long term fiscal outlook of the Government may be considered as reasonably optimistic." (714.5 MSP/11–2954)

Information in Department of State files indicates that by Dec. 3, 1954, the Department approved for sale to Guatemala on deferred credit terms military equipment, including vehicles, parts, and small arms ammunition, valued at approximately $400,000 (714.5 MSP/12–354), and that most of this equipment arrived in Guatemala prior to Dec. 22. Additional pertinent documentation is in files 714.5 MSP and 714.56.

ECONOMIC AND MILITARY RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND HAITI[1]

838.20/6–3052

Memorandum by William B. Connett, Jr., of the Office of Middle American Affairs to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann)[2]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 30, 1952.

Subject: SHADA

Reference: Embassy Port-au-Prince cable of June 28, 1952[3]

Organization

The Société Haitiane-Américaine de Développement Agricole (SHADA) is a bilateral agricultural development corporation, chartered under the laws of Haiti in 1941. Three of the six directors are required to be American citizens. At the time of organization the Eximbank extended a $5,000,000 line of credit[4] repayable over a ten year period. The Eximbank has control of a majority [of] Shada's stock and hence has the right to elect the officers of the corporation. The full amount of the loan is guaranteed by the Haitian Government. The Bank's approval is required for all projects. Mr. John MacQueen is now the General Manager, and the Eximbank is represented on Shada's board by Mr. Horace Darton.

Activities

Shada has been active principally in sisal, lumber, and rubber. During the war years primary attention was given to the development of cryptostegia rubber for war purposes.[5] This program was a failure. Since the war emphasis has been placed on sisal production. Lumber

[3] Apparent reference to telegram 215, in which the Embassy reported that President Magloire was "gravely concerned" over SHADA's inability to meet a loan payment due to the Export-Import Bank on June 15, 1952, and that he had authorized a full investigation of the matter (838.20/6–2852).

has also been important and a small hevea rubber production has continued.

Financial Difficulties

Shada has not proved to be a self-liquidating project. Its failure consistently to show a profit has been variously ascribed to over-capitalization, the cryptostegia program, poor management, and waste. In 1951 the unpaid balance of the Eximbank loan, amounting to about $4,000,000, was funded under terms calling for amortization in 40 quarterly payments.

The repayment on the principal for fiscal 1951–52 was to be $100,000. Interest charges for the same year on the unpaid balance amounted to $189,726. The Shada budget for fiscal 1951–1952 estimated expenditures, including interest and payments on the note, at $2,068,173 and receipts at $2,117,550, as follows:

Sisal fiber	$1,430,000
Waste tow	284,200
Lumber	352,750
Hevea rubber	50,600
Total receipts	$2,117,550

The receipts from the sale of sisal, which is by far the greatest revenue producer, was estimated on the basis of a price of 22¢ per pound. However, our Embassy reports that the world price has now fallen to 15¢ which apparently accounts chiefly for Shada's inability to meet the June 15 payment of $25,000 on the note. In accordance with the loan agreement, the Haitian Government becomes liable as co-signer on default of the corporation.

Conclusions

The Shada project has stimulated a considerable amount of ill feeling among the Haitians. The cryptostegia program, in particular, irritated them because they believed it had been forced upon them and was not designed to further the general aims of Shada, namely, the furtherance of Haiti's general economic development. They have objected also to the manner in which the program has been administered, to its waste, to its cost, to the large number of Americans it has employed. They have tried to escape responsibility themselves by claiming the whole idea was thought up by Americans, and that Americans maintained control of the organization's policy thru the general manager and thru their control of the common stock. They say also that if the Haitian Government guarantees the loan, it should also determine policy. While there is some truth in all this, the fact remains that the Haitian Government entered into the agreement freely.

There can be no doubt that if the Haitian Government has to make good the loan it will generate further ill will. Perhaps more important, Shada's predicament may dampen enthusiasm for the Artibonite project which is similarly an agricultural development project financed by Eximbank credit.[6] It may also affect the Haitian Government's ability to pay for the Artibonite project whose estimated cost has just increased another 2.5 million.

[6]On Dec. 29, 1948, the Export-Import Bank authorized a credit of $4 million to assist in financing the agricultural development of the Artibonite Valley in Haiti; in April 1951, the Bank increased this credit to $14 million.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Chargé in Haiti (Folsom)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL PORT-AU-PRINCE, June 30, 1952.

Participants: Foreign Minister Etheart and Mr. Folsom

Subject: The SHADA Situation.

Minister for Foreign Affairs Etheart called me about 9:00 a. m., June 30, to request that I call on him at 10:00 a. m. I said I had an appointment at 10:00 a. m. with the President[2] but that I could see him at 11:30 a. m., which hour was agreed upon.

Upon my arrival, the Foreign Minister formally presented me with a copy of the report[3] on SHADA (I had returned the President's personal copy during my call on him). The Foreign Minister enlarged upon the situation, speaking of its serious consequences for Haiti, with which I stated my general agreement.

Taking up the conclusions of the report (Section VI), I said that I had received no instructions on the matter and could only give him my personal views. I said I doubted whether SHADA could pass to Haitian administration in view of the Agreements and Contracts, etc. of 1941, though I said it might be acceptable. I said I agreed with the second point on the need for economy and that the third and fourth points[4]

[1]Transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 2, from Port-au-Prince, dated July 2, 1952, not printed (838.20/7–252).

[2]A memorandum of conversation between Chargé Folsom and President Magloire, dated June 30, 1952, was enclosed with despatch 2 of July 2.

[3]A copy of the referenced report, in French, containing the results of the investigation previously authorized by President Magloire, dated June 1952, was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 820, from Port-au-Prince, dated June 29, 1952, not printed (838.20/6–2952). No translation of the report was found in Department of State files.

[4]These were essentially as follows: (3) Assistance would be provided to Haiti under Point Four for the purpose of achieving a complete inventory of SHADA's operations and also for establishing a new development plan together with a new financial arrangement; (4) the Haitian Government would establish a new institution to succeed SHADA which would be under Haitian control and have the assistance of technical personnel provided in part by Point Four.

hinged on the decision on the first point. I said that I doubted the wisdom of presenting the fifth point (i.e. cancellation of the $5,000,000 loan), as I believed it highly unlikely to be acceptable and as I believed further it would prejudice future Exim Bank loans.

I then said that Haiti's history of actual payment of its foreign debt had been good since 1922, that interest and amortization had been paid according to schedule on the 1922 loan until 1938, when, by mutual agreement,[5] a reduced amortization schedule had been adopted and prolonged from year to year until final funding and extinguishment of the debt by the Internal Loan of 1947.[6] I noted also that payments of interest and amortization on the J. G. White Loan of 1938[7] had been met regularly and that the loan had now been paid off and, finally, that the SHADA loan had been serviced, the agreement of May 24, 1951, signed and payments under it met.

I said, however, that I wished to be frank—that the attitude of Haiti had not been as good as the record of performance. I pointed out that there had been grumbling and criticism of the repayment of the 1922 loan; that the J. G. White expenditures had been severely criticized when the time came to pay the loan back, and that now the same sort of criticism of SHADA was taking place. I said I did not recall the exact facts but that my impression was that on occasions in the past other requests had been made for cancellation or reduction of outstanding debts. I said any new request for cancellation, this time of the SHADA loan, would be viewed in this context and that it could not but react badly on future loan applications.

The Foreign Minister thanked me for my frankness and said he would bring this idea to the ears of the President.

I stated also that usually two tactics were open to a Government making demands: (1) to present a very large request and to recede from this, and (2) to make a reasonable approach allowing the facts to speak for themselves. I said in the present case I believed the SHADA situation should be examined carefully and fully without demands and the results of the investigation would suggest the proper solution. I emphasized, however, that I was in no way forcing my views which were completely informal and personal and that the Haitian Government should choose its own course of action and tactics. The Foreign Minister again thanked me for my frankness.

The Foreign Minister then reviewed briefly the four SHADA administrations along the same lines as the President had done on Saturday. He pointed out that the Export-Import Bank had the largest bloc of stock hence the larger vote, that while the Board of Directors was composed of three Haitians and three Americans, actually the Americans controlled SHADA since the American manager could vote to break any tie.

At this point I interrupted and asked if I might again be very frank and perhaps blunt. The Minister answered me he wished to have my views. I said that I wished to warn him against any emphasis on American domination. I admitted the facts as he outlined them, but said any linking of American domination charges with the present sad state of SHADA appeared to me to imply (1) that the American members of the Board had voted along national lines—an assertion I could not believe or accept as I believed them to be men of character and honesty who would vote on the basis of convictions as to what was best for Haiti, SHADA and the Export-Import Bank (2) that the American members were either incompetent or intellectually dishonest—both of these implications I rejected categorically. I said that I believed that the facts would demonstrate that Mr. MacQueen as manager had never been forced to cast his vote to break a tie vote (whether the division was mixed or along national lines). I added that if there had been any American domination or collusion between American Board members and the American management—a suggestion, which I rejected—the Haitian members had clearly been derelict in not forcing a tie vote on each issue of importance, thus forcing the manager to cast his vote and thus demonstrate such collusion, which then could have been brought to the attention of the proper authorities. I said I was confident the minutes of the meetings of the Board of Directors would show no such list of the votes along national lines. Thus, I said, I believed any discussion or emphasis on alleged American domination of SHADA could only arouse extreme resentment, could be interpreted as an allegation of American sabotage of SHADA, could be refuted as I had done and that in the refutation it would appear that the Haitian Board members had been derelict in their duty.

The Foreign Minister said he deeply appreciated my frank statement and admitted the correctness of my position. He said he would caution against any such approach and would recommend that the much safer approach would be that the first administration had been bad, the second two excellent or good and that the fourth is poor and discuss the subject on the merits of the case, basing any request for Haitian management on a record of 50 percent unsatisfactory performance (from the point of view of the Haitian Government) by American management and a desire to try Haitian management, who presumably would know the country and its problems better.

In closing the interview on the subject of SHADA, I said that I regretted the need to have been so frank and blunt, but that I felt the circumstances required it. The Foreign Minister stated that, on the contrary, he was very pleased at my frankness, denying that I had been blunt. He said he greatly appreciated my views, that he knew I am not only interested in protecting the interests of my Government but also that I am a friend of Haiti, and his friend and that I should speak frankly. He said he believed we could accomplish much more by complete honesty and frankness.

The Chargé in Haiti (Folsom) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL PORT-AU-PRINCE, September 2, 1952.
No. 139

Subject: SHADA: Overall Comments on the Situation

[Here follows a list of despatches concerning the SHADA situation transmitted to the Department of State by Chargé Folsom between June 29 and August 29, 1952.]

Taken together, these despatches reveal the existence of an incredibly sad state of affairs. At present, I see no solution which will be satisfactory to all concerned. The Haitian Government seeks control of SHADA and to avoid financial loss. The Exim Bank seeks to safeguard its interests and to obtain repayment of some $4,000,000 outstanding on the loan to SHADA. The Department of State and the Embassy desire an equitable settlement, which will minimize Haitian bitterness and which will place the least strain on Haitian-American relations consistent with protection of American interests.

It appears to me that either the Exim Bank must face the loss of most of the $4,000,000 outstanding, or the Haitian Government will have to accept this loss. A moratorium on the debt appears to me as a possible means of easing over the situation, but I fear that in the long run the issue of loss will have to be faced. With this in mind, I should like to set forth my views on certain aspects of the situation, especially with regard to American responsibility and the possibilities of salvaging something from the ruins.

It will be recalled that the original concept of SHADA did not envisage plantation operations. Instead, as denoted by the corporation's name, it was designed to aid agricultural development in Haiti. While the record, at least here in the Embassy, is not clear as to why SHADA entered the field of sisal, it appears likely that it was done at American suggestion or insistence to relieve the fiber shortage existing during the war. If it was at American insistence that SHADA was diverted into plantation scale operations, this fact should be considered at this time and it should be recalled that this was not even entirely "development" since SHADA purchased the Liles plantation near St. Marc, an existing mature plantation.

Secondly, it should be recalled that the Cryptostegia program, while not a part of the regular SHADA program, absorbed much of the attention and energy of the SHADA management, which might better have been occupied with purely SHADA affairs. This costly failure also left SHADA with certain overhead which later became a drain on its resources. This program clearly was of American origin.

Thirdly, it cannot be denied that it was the American management which bought sisal plantations, which planted all the sisal at once and which in subsequent years (for various reasons) failed to cut out fields, replant, etc., in order to put the plantations in proper cycle. Mistakes were also made in other divisions: citronella was tried and abandoned and later Senator Dejoie carried out a sizable development in essential oils; a costly and completely useless cement logslide was built in the Pine Forest, etc., etc. In arguing with the Haitians, it can be said that the Haitian Government and its representatives on the Board of Directors should have controlled the management more carefully and that they bear a share of the blame for the failure of SHADA. While I have been successful in convincing the Haitians of the desirability of dropping almost completely the argument on allocation of responsibility; while I have been successful to a large degree in having this argumentative section deleted from the Haitian Commission's memorandum[1] to President Magloire; and while I have been almost blunt in refusing to accept any and all charges of American responsibility in discussions during the past three months, I would be delinquent in my duty to the Department, if I did not point out the very large share of responsibility resting on American shoulders. In addition, if one places blame upon the Haitians for the failures of their representatives on the Board of Directors, one must admit that an approximately equal amount of blame accrues to the representative of the Exim Bank. Furthermore, the Haitian argument that these representatives held and voted the largest block of stock, though shelved at present, does have validity.

The present situation of SHADA is so disastrous that it is inconceivable that it was not foreseen at least five years ago. In this respect I should like to draw to the Department's attention the statements made in 1945 in my Ph.D. thesis, at the bottom of page 407 and the top of page 408, as well as on page 457. In fact, it should have been obvious from the beginning that if all sisal fields were planted at once, they would all go out of production at approximately the same time. Just how the revised schedule of debt repayment could have been drawn up and signed in May, 1951, barely a year before the SHADA collapse is also inconceivable.

I should like to point out incidentally that the Embassy had not been kept informed of SHADA activities in recent years. The SHADA files from 1947 to 1952 are singularly bare. The Embassy received no prior notice of the present crisis from either SHADA itself or from the Exim Bank representative who was here in May. Now, of course, the Embassy is receiving full information on all phases of SHADA operations.

As I see it, SHADA operations may be conveniently divided into three parts. Foremost are the sisal operations followed by the forestry and rubber operations.

[Here follows discussion of SHADA's sisal, forestry, and rubber operations.]

The value of the lumber and rubber operations is small. The value of the sisal operations, at present at least, is theoretical and they probably would bring little or nothing if sold. If the entire SHADA were liquidated and sold, it probably would not bring more than $500,000 to $1,000,000. Debt outstanding totals about $4,000,000. It thus appears that there will be a loss of $3,000,000 to $3,500,000, if liquidation is the solution. On the other hand, the very poor outlook of the sisal operation renders any plan to continue operations dangerous, and service on the $4,000,000 outstanding of the loan constitutes one of the major obstacles. Legally, it appears that the Exim Bank can hold the Haitian Government to its guarantee of the loan.

In view of the high degree of responsibility accruing to the Bank through the management, its voting power, and its participation on the Board of Directors, it appears to me that to place the entire burden on the Haitian Government would be inequitable. Furthermore, Haitian-American relations will be embittered for some time if the Haitians are saddled with the entire loss.

It will be seen that I am not offering a solution. In part, that might be attained by a long moratorium or cancellation of the debt, though many problems would still exist. Rather, I am suggesting what should not be done. I might add that it is my impression[2] that, barring unforeseen developments, Haitian economy is due for a recession based on falling agricultural prices, restricted markets and decreasing revenues and that the budget cannot stand heavy additional charges at this time.

Ambassador Leger spoke of an impasse which has occurred between the Haitian negotiating committee on Shada, headed up by Finance Minister Dominique, and the Export-Import Bank.[1] Specifically, he said the Bank had proposed reducing the interest rate from 4 to 2 percent, extending the period of repayment of the indebtedness, and liquidating Shada. The Ambassador said this proposal was unacceptable to the Haitian Mission which wished to have the debt cancelled or substantially reduced. Consequently, Ambassador Leger said, the Mission was preparing to return to Haiti within a week or so.

Mr. Miller and Mr. Mann informed Ambassador Leger that the latter would pay Mr. Gaston a visit the following day to see if the State Department's good offices might have some effect in resolving the impasse.

Mr. Gaston commenced the discussion by saying that the Bank would insist that the Shada indebtedness stand. He pointed out that this indebtedness was voluntarily contracted, that the loan agreement had been negotiated with the Bank by the Haitian Government and that the latter understood and took full responsibility at the time.

Furthermore, he added, Shada has contributed much to the Haitian economy in the form of salaries paid the laborers and the Haitian (as distinct from American) members of the Board, as well as in taxes paid into the Haitian treasury. He estimated that some $18,000,000 had been poured into the Haitian economy as a result of Shada's operations. Finally, he said the Haitians could not completely avoid responsibility for Shada's mismanagement since it was evident they could have exercised more supervision over its operations had they really wanted to.

Mr. Gaston outlined a possible solution along the following lines:

1. Reduction of the interest rate on the outstanding balance from 4 to 2 percent, the amount the Bank paid for money from the U.S. Treasury.
2. The conclusion of a contract with DPA for the purchase of Shada's sisal production (Mr. Gaston said DPA had indicated it would be willing to sign a contract for about 13¾¢ CIF New York, though he did not know for what duration).
3. A new Eximbank loan to provide working capital.
4. Transfer of control of Shada to the Haitian Government.
5. The assignment of an expert or experts to make a survey of the Shada properties, and to reconstitute them along more economical lines.

Mr. Gaston suggested, for an example, that it might be advisable (a) to liquidate the Cape Haitian division, processing all the growing sisal leaves regardless of age; (b) to eliminate the unsuitable land from the St. Marc division so that the remainder, which he estimated at about 5,000 acres, could be consolidated into an economical unit; and (c) to continue the forestry and rubber operations, if the survey indicated it was feasible, under a revised policy.

Mr. Mann explained the heavy financial burdens and prospects of reduced revenues faced by the Haitian economy and pointed out the traditional Haitian dependence on U.S. advice and assistance. He said these factors, together with past errors in the management of Shada and the political repercussions the Shada problem might have in Haiti, should make it advisable for the Bank to make every reasonable concession to accommodate the Haitian point of view. He asked Mr. Gaston if there was not some way in which the Bank could do a little better on the indebtedness. Mr. Gaston agreed the Bank might be able to improve on the 2 percent interst rate, and said the important thing, from the Bank's point of view, was that the Haitians recognize the indebtedness and continue to make some sort of payments on principal. In this connection, he suggested that the Bank might be willing to accept something in the neighborhood of $25,000 a quarter for principal repayment, with a nominal interest rate, or perhaps a moratorium on interest payments for a few years. Mr. Mann then suggested the possibility of TCA assistance in surveying the Shada properties and in helping the Haitians manage it, pointing out that the use of IIAA technicians would save the Haitians some money in salaries. In conclusion, Mr. Mann agreed to discuss the matter further with TCA and Ambassador Léger.

Memorandum of Conversation, by William B. Connett, Jr., of the Office of Middle American Affairs [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 13, 1952.

Subject: SHADA

Participants: Ambassador Jacques Léger, Haitian Embassy
Mr. Rene Colimon, Minister-Counselor, Haitian Embassy
Mr. Alexandre Dominique, Haitian Finance Minister
Mr. Georges Cadet, Shada Director
Mr. Arthur Herres, Shada Director
Mr. Thomas C. Mann, ARA
Mr. Jack Neal, MID
Mr. Harvey R. Wellman, MID
Mr. W. B. Connett, Jr., MID

In the course of an informal cocktail party in honor of SHADA, Mr. Mann referred to Ambassador Léger's oral request for advice on how to proceed in replying to Mr. Gaston's offer to reduce the interest on the Shada loan to 2 per cent. Ambassador Léger at that time indicated that Mr. Dominique and the other members of the Shada Mission were disappointed with the offer and that he, the Ambassador, considered that an effort should be made to obtain a better offer from the Bank if this were possible, in view of what he described as the precarious political and economic situation in his country.

Mr. Mann said that he had spoken with Mr. Gaston who had indicated that he woud be willing to discuss the matter further with the Haitians to see whether something could be done. Mr. Mann suggested that Ambassador Léger and Mr. Dominique request an appointment with Mr. Gaston to discuss the terms under which a loan could be amortized. He suggested that in this conversation the Haitians address themselves to the question of finding a constructive solution to the problem rather than to a reiteration of their opinions concerning responsibility for past events.

Mr. Mann stated that the Bank and the Department were in agreement that a cancellation of the principal indebtedness should not be considered and that the problem was to find a formula consistent with this determination.

Mr. Mann further stated that the problem of how Haiti would repay this loan was of course a problem for the Haitians themselves to decide, and that both the Bank and the Department hesitated even to offer any suggestions in view of the possibility that the Haitian Government might at some later date contend that the suggestions were tantamount to duress. He said, however, that if the Haitians wished to discuss this question with the Department it was his personal and unofficial opinion that something along the following lines might be worked out:

1. A formula agreeable to the Bank and to the Haitian Government concerning the amortization of the principal debt.
2. A reorganization of Shada under which the Export-Import Bank would be relieved of any responsibility for future operations and where the control would be in the hands of the Haitian Government.
3. Abandonment of that part of the sisal operations which would be determined by competent experts to be uneconomic and concentration on that part of Shada's operations which might be found by disinterested experts to have good possibilities.
4. Seek TCA assistance in employing top managerial and technical personnel so as to reduce overhead expenses of Shada.[2]

Mr. Mann said that if the Haitian Government should proceed along these lines and see to it that Shada is well-managed it might be possible to pay the debt to the Export-Import Bank without further drains on the Haitian treasury. Mr. Mann emphasized again that these were personal thoughts and very tentative, and that the Department was not prepared to make any commitments at this time.

[2] In a memorandum of conversation between Messrs. Dominique, Léger, Cadet, and Deputy Assistant Secretary Mann, by Mr. Connett, dated Oct. 30, 1952, Finance Minister Dominique was reported to have stated that IIAA seemed favorably disposed to consider requests for technical personnel to assist SHADA (838.20/10–3052).

Editorial Note

In late November 1952, the Haitian Government and the Export-Import Bank reached a settlement with respect to SHADA. The terms of the settlement included, inter alia, provisions easing Haiti's repayment obligations on the SHADA loan, the transfer of SHADA stock held by the Bank to the Haitian Government, and Haitian control and management of SHADA (despatch 374, from Port-au-Prince, dated November 28, 1952, 838.20/11–2852). The terms were incorporated into a letter from Mr. Gaston to Ambassador Léger, dated November 26, 1952, no copy of which was found in Department of State files.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 1, 1952.

Subject: Request for U.S. Government Assistance by Ex-President Estimé of Haiti

Participants: Dumarsais Estimé, Ex-President of Haiti*
MID—Mr. Wellman
—Mr. Connett

Mr. Estimé dwelt at some length on what he considered the abuses of the present administration in Haiti. He contrasted this with his own administration which he said rested on popular support while the present military regime was imposed on the Haitian people against its will. He said he had often been unjustly accused of advocating black supremacy when in fact he had appointed many mulattoes to political office, including the present Ambassador to Washington, Jacques Léger, whom he had assigned as Ambassador to Buenos Aires.

Estimé claimed that he still had the support of the Haitian people and that it would be to the interest of the United States to have him return to power to re-establish a healthy democracy in place of an oppressive dictatorship. He said he had discussed the matter with Ambassador Dunn[1] in Paris and had come to the United States in the hope that he could gain the support of the U.S. Government. He remarked that he had been studying the current foreign policy of the United States and had observed that we had seen fit to intervene from time to time in the affairs of other states, such as Egypt and Greece. "With the support of the United States", he said, "I could be back in Haiti in a matter of hours."

Mr. Wellman and Mr. Connett pointed out that it was not the policy of the United States to intervene in the affairs of other states, that we were very definitely committed to a policy of non-intervention in Latin America, and that we could therefore not offer him political support. It was pointed out that our unwillingness to do so did not imply any judgment of him as an individual or of the Administration he formerly headed up. M. Estimé accepted this explanation though he was obviously disappointed.

M. Estimé then asked for our assistance in certain personal problems. He said that it was untrue that he had absconded with millions of dollars from the Haitian Treasury and that, on the contrary, he had very little means. He had recently been refused a loan, he said, by the Chase National Bank because the only collateral he could post consisted of property located in Haiti which had been impounded by the Haitian Government. His wife, he said, had been unable to induce the Haitian Government to permit her mother and brother-in-law to leave Haiti. His two sons, who are in France, have been unable to obtain passports from the Haitian Ambassador in Paris. He himself has been unable to obtain an apartment in New York. Finally, he said, the Haitian Government has had him under surveillance in the U.S.

Mr. Wellman and Mr. Connett told M. Estimé that most of the matters in which he sought our assistance would involve representations to the Haitian Government on his behalf by the U.S. Government in areas in which the former had exclusive jurisdiction. M. Estimé was told that while we sympathized with his difficulties, we could not properly make official representations on his behalf. It was pointed out, however, that we would be happy to extend him every courtesy possible in matters within our jurisdiction, such as U.S. visas, etc. M. Estimé again seemed disappointed, but accepted the explanation with amicable resignation.

838.00 TA/10–752: Airgram

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in Haiti[1]

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, December 24, 1952.

A–86. Reference Embassy Despatch Totec 17 October 7,[2] concerning proposal of Raoul Aglion, UN Resident Representative, for US–UN participation in preparing a plan for economic development of Haiti.[3] Department concurs with view of Embassy as to difficulties which such a proposal would present. In particular, the Department believes it inadvisable for this Government to prepare, or participate with a third party in the preparation of, an over-all economic development plan for a foreign government.

If a Latin American Government wishes to receive from the U.S. advice with respect to economic development plans, IIAA would prefer to make such advice available through the special assignment of a general economic consultant rather than through the TCA Mission generally. In the case of Haiti, consideration might be given to the furnishing of an economic consultant if the Haitian Government wished such an expert. However, since the furnishing of such advice is within the terms of reference of Aglion, the Department would wish to be sure that both the Haitian Government and Aglion were perfectly clear as to the whole situation, in order that there might be no possibility of having Aglion's role unwittingly superseded by a TCA expert. It will also be recalled that the report made in 1949[4] by the UN Mission of Technical Assistance to Haiti has already provided a basis for Haitian economic development planning. Department is, moreover, by no means certain that Haiti is ready for a more comprehensive blueprint for economic and social evolution along lines suggested by Aglion. Also not sure that Haitians are presently in a position to put such a plan into effect if it were adopted, since it might represent too large a project for the government to handle; or political changes in the government might later invalidate the work. Furthermore, the present 5-year $40 million development plan of the Haitian Government seems to be designed to accomplish many of the economic objectives set forth in the Aglion outline. On balance, it would appear preferable to recognize the limitations of the situation in Haiti, and to focus attention for the time being on individual integrated projects like the Artibonite.

On the other hand, the fact that the UN is thinking of forward planning of technical assistance is much to be commended, since they have all too often been criticized for acting on the basis of ad hoc requests as received by individual UN agencies from various governments, including Haiti. The U.S. would also be much interested in the preparation of any plan for technical assistance which might eventually be adopted, since such a plan would necessarily affect the content of TCA operations in Haiti for a good many years, and would also have a considerable effect upon the coordination of UN and U.S. activities. As a matter of general policy, we have consistently urged that coordination in the field should rise above the mere mechanics of avoiding duplication to a cooperative and intelligent integration of efforts and resources for the purpose of providing maximum benefit to the country concerned.

In the light of these considerations, you may wish to discuss this matter further with Aglion, indicating to him fairly candidly the consideration and interests which we have in this matter. It is suggested that you might wish to make two main points with Aglion, somewhat along the following lines:

1. If the UN after further consideration, believes it desirable to pursue its interest in Haitian economic development, also already evidenced by its report and recommendations of 1949, through the preparation of a comprehensive development plan along the lines proposed by Aglion, U.S. would think it probably desirable not to become associated as a co-sponsor with such a plan at the present time, for the reasons stated above. However, the U.S. would naturally be much interested in the outcome, and would also be glad to assist in specific ways as appropriate, such as furnishing data, etc., so long as this did not involve any "sponsor" relationship.

[4] The report was published as Mission to Haiti, Report of the United Nations Mission of Technical Assistance to the Republic of Haiti (New York, 1949).

2. U.S. representatives in Haiti, however, would be definitely willing to discuss with UN representatives and the Haitian Government the establishment of a list of priority technical assistance activities for immediate consideration and implementation—this representing something less comprehensive, yet more specific, than an over-all economic development plan. In the preparation of such priority activities, the U.S. would think it useful to have consideration given at the same time to the question of which activities might be undertaken respectively by the U.S. and UN.

A joint understanding along the lines indicated in point 2 above, between U.S. and UN representatives in Haiti and the Haitian Government, would be warmly welcomed in Washington and very likely in New York as well, as a real contribution in considering the planning of further technical assistance activities in Haiti.

We are sending a copy of this reply and the reference despatch to USUN (New York) in order that they may convey the substance of this matter confidentially and informally to the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration.

Subject: Status of Programs Under the Mutual Security Act of 1951[3]—Haiti—Quarter Ended December 31, 1952.

Summary

The present report, as the first in this series, is much more lengthy than will be the case with succeeding reports since this report is considered as basic and will serve as a point of reference in the future.

---

[1] Drafted by Chargé Folsom.

[2] The referenced airgram requests Embassies to submit quarterly reports concerning the status of programs under the Mutual Security Act of 1951 (700.5 MSP/11–2452).

[3] Public Law 165, approved Oct. 10, 1951; for text, see 65 Stat. 373.

Implementation of the basic foreign policy objectives of the United States in Haiti is carried out through the Embassy. The IIAA–TCA with its agricultural and health missions, its training program, and its supervision of a rubber experimental station, the naval and air force training missions, a mapping mission and miscellaneous other special assistance missions provide the instruments by which U.S. aid is brought to Haiti. Of these, only the IIAA–TCA operations come under the Mutual Security Program, though all of them contribute to raising living standards, improved production or health, better administration or the imparting of technical knowledge. Indirectly, all contribute to internal stability and hemispheric cooperation and solidarity. The very backwardness of the country, the vast field offered for economic, social and technical development, imposes the major obstacle to attainment of spectacular results. Other complications inherent in the social structure and the form of government also provide inhibiting factors to development of private investment. Certain foreign influences are not conducive to improvement of relations with the United States, but at present it should be noted that there is no communist influence. There are no obstacles placed in the way of administration of the aid programs, and, on the contrary, the Haitian Government seeks and does all possible to facilitate aid. Compliance with commitments appears to be complete and Haitian contribution to the aid programs appears to be consonant with the nation's resources.

I. U.S. Foreign Policy Objectives

The objectives of United States foreign policy as applied to the Republic of Haiti seek to obtain Haitian support of efforts to promote world-wide and inter-American peace and prosperity, to encourage developments in Haitian national life and internal affairs which will make Haiti a more stable and effective democracy, to raise living standards and to improve economic conditions in Haiti, to encourage maintenance of internal order and the ability of Haiti to contribute to western hemispheric defense and to improve relations and promote mutual understanding between Haiti and its neighbors.

II. Instruments of Application of the Foreign Policy Objectives

The instruments for application of the foregoing foreign policy objectives of the United States in Haiti are as follows:

1. The Embassy of the United States
2. The IIAA–TCA operating through

(a) The Agricultural and Food Production Mission (ratio of contributions: Haiti–3, USA–1)
(b) The Health and Sanitation Mission (ratio of contributions: Haiti–3, USA–1)

(c) The Training Program (scholarships, fellowships, etc.)
(d) The Marfranc Rubber Experimental Station (under IIAA–TCA supervision but run by the United States Department of Agriculture which provides almost all of its financing with the Haitian Government providing land and certain support)
(e) The proposed Artibonite Valley irrigation and agricultural development program (will be carried out with IIAA–TCA assistance and financed jointly by the Haitian Government and the Export-Import Bank.).

3. Other

(a) The U.S. Naval Mission—a training mission
(b) The U.S. Air Force Mission—a training mission
(c) The Inter-American Geodetic Survey Project—a mapping program.
(d) Miscellaneous American assistance through the IIAA–TCA, United Nations, Organization of American States, and United States Departments and Agencies for special advice on special subjects.

III. Progress in Achieving Foreign Policy Objectives

The agricultural and food productions programs of the IIAA–TCA have already achieved progress in increasing food production and the proposed Artibonite irrigation, drainage and agricultural program can be counted on to do even more in the future. The health and sanitation program has improved health and living conditions. Both programs have aided in the development of an underdeveloped nation and indirectly have promoted internal stability.

The rubber experimental station is an excellent combination of economic development, production of an essential material for collective defense and inter-American cooperation.

The Naval and Air missions provide excellent examples of constructive technical aid, the former in the field of coast guard training with special emphasis on aids to navigation and the latter in development and training of a small but very competent military air force which also acts as a domestic commercial line. The IAGS project, while designed to provide the United States with mapping data, also makes these available to Haiti and provides a training service for Haitians in this field.

The various specialists working to improve Haitian economy, administration, education, health, etc., whether acting under the IIAA–TCA or other U.S. agencies or whether working for some international organization are, in fact, directly or indirectly furthering United States aims in aiding the development of Haiti.

Indirectly all these programs serve to make for internal order and to promote development of a more stable and effective democracy. Some of them promote inter-American understanding and the Naval and Air Missions contribute in a small way to strengthening of the Caribbean defense system.

IV. Major Obstacles and Difficulties

The attainment of United States foreign policy objectives is hampered by various factors.

The very backwardness of the country, its lack of natural resources, its growing population, its illiteracy, extremely bad health conditions and the like, all make the task of economic and social development an intricate and difficult task.

The existence of repressive measures, graft, corruption and past efforts of presidents to extend their terms of office beyond the legal limits, as well as a relatively rigid social system, the existence of an underlying conflict between the mulatto elite and the black masses, complicated by the recent emergence of a new power elite, including both blacks and mulattoes, all have served to hamper development of a stable and effective democracy.

A history of government interference with and insistence upon participation in profitable business enterprise has not been encouraging to foreign investment and this year, for example, it resulted in withdrawal of the Standard Fruit and Steamship Company from Haiti. Despite this fact, foreign (with U.S. dominant) investment in manufacturing, business and commerce exceeds that of Haitians.

Relations with the Dominican Republic, never good, though somewhat better at present, constitute a factor of distrust in hemispheric cooperation and cause Haiti to be very jealous of all military and financial assistance provided its neighbor.

Historic and cultural ties with France also hamper at times the full attainment of U.S. objectives in Haiti.

The efforts of Argentine representatives, especially in the fields of propaganda and labor, while in most part ineffective and insignificant, are worthy of note as an anti-American influence.

Finally, it should be noted, negatively, that there is no communist influence in Haiti at present.

V. Specific Obstacles and Difficulties Affecting U.S. Aid

Strictly speaking, there are no obstacles or difficulties affecting the administration of U.S. aid to Haiti.

On the contrary, the nearness of the United States, the Marine Occupation, and years of financial and economic tutelage by the United States have predisposed the Haitians not only to accept, but to seek and expect U.S. assistance. Each Government has sought to obtain its full share of aid. Succeeding regimes have criticized not only the previous administrations but also the U.S. aid in some cases, but this has in no way deterred them from seeking more.

VI. Replies to Specific Questions

a. Haiti's Adherence to Commitments Made in the Course of MSP Aid Negotiations

There is no evidence of any failure to provide complete compliance with and adherence to commitments. Each Haitian contribution has been forthcoming on schedule. This is not to say that the Government would not like to reduce the 3–1 ratio of financial contributions, but it adheres to the schedule.

b. Political Developments Affecting Prospects of Adherence to a Progress towards JCS Force Targets, Including Action on Defense Budgets

The total military force of Haiti numbers about 5,000 men and officers. It is an internal security or police force in concept. The air force and coast guard units are small and the most effective unit is the Palace Guard of some 500 men. With this small force, Haiti cannot be expected to play any significant role in JCS force targets. Maintenance of internal security and assistance of minor importance in protection of the Windward Passage in time of emergency is all that can be expected. Financial resources do not permit maintenance of an important military establishment. In this respect, it may be noted that the national budget in 1952–53 is about $28,000,000 (US) of which the armed forces receive 18 per cent (this is an increase of about 23 per cent in the amount of money allocated in 1951–52.

c. Major Economic Developments Which Might Appreciably Affect Aid Levels

Declining agricultural prices and restricting dollar markets are affecting most of the major export crops of Haiti with the exception of coffee. Unfortunately, the coffee crop for this year is forecast at below normal levels. This will adversely affect Government revenues, which are based primarily on customs duties on imports and exports. Haiti has had a balanced budget for some forty-odd years and falling revenues undoubtedly will restrict the ability of the Government to undertake certain of its planned public works. This may cause it to seek more outside aid in the coming year.

d. Defense Alliances and Other Developments in International Relations Affecting Security

None.

e. Effect of MSP Aid in Furthering Internal Political Stability and Security

Discussed in III above.

f. General Progress in Activation of Planned Forces

The Haitian General Staff has not obtained the complete agreement of its own Government for the creation of a mobile task force for use as an instrument of U. N. policy (under the Uniting for Peace Resolution[4]), nor has it received any encouragement from the United States on this score.

g. General Effect on Progress towards Force Goals of Deliveries of U.S.-Furnished End-Items

No military items furnished.

h. General Ability of Haiti's Defense Establishment to Utilize Military Aid

See VI–b.

i. Major Developments with Respect to Defense Production Plans and Programs

Not applicable (unless applied to the commercial production of sisal, which may be expected to decline for the next few years).

j. Major Trends with Respect to Economic Development Plans and Programs

The Haitian Government is presently engaged in implementation of its $40,000,000 Five Year Plan for the economic development of Haiti with emphasis on construction and repair of schools, construction of hospitals and dispensaries and other public health and sanitation projects, agricultural development including irrigation, drainage, stock breeding, farm demonstrations, grain storage, etc., road construction, and urban development. Expenditures to date have been included in the regular national budget and are set at $5,000,000 for 1952–53.

Also included in the national budget is provision for implementation of the Artibonite Valley agricultural development program with an allocation of $1,500,000 for 1952–53 to be spent in coordination with the Exim Bank loan of $14,000,000.

The Haitian budget for 1952–53 also sets aside $255,000 for health and sanitation and $200,000 for agricultural development, although the Haitian Government has agreed to provide $317,000 to match the U.S. contribution of $105,000. In addition to these local contributions to the IIAA–TCA programs the Haitian Government has provided $196,000 as the local contribution to a World Health Organization anti-yaws campaign.

In addition to these budgetary commitments, the Haitian Government is seeking to extend its road system, to rehabilitate its telephone system, and has under study plans for construction of an international airport, harbor improvements, construction of two new workers' cities, extensive municipal improvements in Cap-Haitien and Gonaives, and numerous other projects in more or less advanced stages of planning.

Finally, in 1949 Haiti adopted legislation designed to promote industrial development, providing in the law for special customs and tax privileges for so-called "new industries".

k. Economic and Social Effects of Point IV Programs

Total expenditures of the Point IV Program in Haiti in the fiscal year 1952–53 may be estimated at $750,000. While a substantial sum, expenditures of this size spread over a people numbering some 3,000,000 with a national income of perhaps $150,000,000 and a national budget of $28,000,000 cannot be expected to have spectacular economic and social effects. The Point IV Program is providing a very useful service in irrigation extension, in demonstration farms, stock and poultry breeding and the like and will be instrumental in development of some 60 to 70,000 acres of land in the Artibonite Valley. The health and sanitation part of the Program is gradually reducing the incidence of yaws, hookworm, malaria and other diseases prevalent in the country. Over a longer period the effects of these two programs will vitally affect the lives of thousands of Haitians. The rubber experimental farm is providing high grade seed and clones for rubber development (as well as in fields of health, education, administration, sphere.

The capacity of Haiti to receive aid in almost all fields of economic development (as well as in fields of health, education, administration, etc.) is limited more by the amount of aid available than by capacity to absorb such aid. Its capacity to utilize effectively aid provided, has increased in recent years and with few exceptions has been adequate. Careful screening of expanded aid by the Embassy, the local IIAA–TCA office, and the control offices in Washington is, I believe, sufficient guarantee that aid will not be extended into fields which might prove unproductive or in amounts beyond the local capacity to absorb.

l. Attitude of the Haitian Government and Public towards U.S. Aid Programs

Public and Government attitude is very favorable and cooperative with reference to the Point IV Program, and indeed toward all aid from abroad. The United States is expected to supply most of the aid. It may be noted that in the past, U.S. programs to aid Haiti have been welcome, but in some cases have been criticized following conclusion of the project; this has been especially true of projects which have resulted in increase in the public debt or liabilities of the State. It will probably not be the case with pay-as-you-go programs such as the agricultural and health and sanitation programs. It may arise in the case of the Artibonite project should that undertaking not be a demonstrable success after a reasonable period of years.

Finally, in line with the Mutual Security Program objectives, a treaty of friendship, commerce and navigation is now under consideration and has reached the discussion stage between the Haitian Government and representatives of the United States Embassy.[5]

I believe that the contents of this report provide the assurances requested to show that Haiti has taken decisive steps towards self-help and mutual cooperation, thus justifying continued aid (compliance with Section 511(c) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951).

The Chargé in Haiti (Folsom) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL PORT-AU-PRINCE, May 4, 1953.

No. 696

Subject: Haitian Problems as Expressed by Officials to Assistant Secretary of State John M. Cabot.[1]

Summary

In conversations with members of the Haitian Cabinet and President Magloire, lasting from 9:00 a. m. to 1:00 p. m. on April 9, 1953, the problems confronting Haiti were reviewed for the benefit of Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, John M. Cabot. (Mr. Cabot was accompanied by Chargé d'Affaires a.i. Robert S. Folsom at all the conversations and by Colonel Valentine Smith, Army Attaché of the Embassy at the military conversations.) Certain of the Cabinet Ministers presented memoranda containing their views either at the time of the conversations or subsequently. (These are attached,[2] in translation, as enclosures. It is understood that another set[3] in French is being given to Mr. Cabot by Haitian Ambassador Leger.)

In brief, certain factors, as follows, emerged as strongly influencing present thinking of the Haitian Government:

1. Signature of a bilateral military assistance pact with the Dominican Republic, plus other such pacts, the desire of Haiti to improve its defensive force and its hope to contribute to UN Military needs.

2. Adverse economic developments, including a smaller coffee crop, collapse of sisal export prices, drop in sugar and cotton prices and restricting markets for export crops, all of which led to smaller Government revenues at a time when economic development is in progress, raising Government expenditures and creating financial problems.

3. The collapse of SHADA and the role of American management and the Exim Bank therein, plus numerous instances of difficulties with the Exim Bank in initiating work on the Artibonite Valley Project.

Consideration of these factors resulted in Haitian proposal of the following requests to the United States Government:

1. Negotiation of a bilateral military pact

a) to enable Haiti to equip a combat team of 5–10,000 men for national defense requirements and capable of overseas duty, should need arise under UN commitments.

---

[1] Assistant Secretary Cabot visited a number of Latin American countries during the period Apr. 6–May 3, 1953; pertinent documents are in file 110.15 CA.

[2] None printed.

[3] Not found in Department of State files.

b) to enable Haiti to construct the military portions of a new international airport.

c) to lay ground-work for acquisition of other equipment as deemed necessary in the future such as arms, ammunition, planes, etc.

2. Considerations of the possibility of a short-term bank loan of $3,000,000 to be guaranteed by the Haitian Government to permit it to continue its program of economic development:

a) in rehabilitation of the banana industry,

b) in rehabilitation of SHADA,

c) in strengthening the Institute of Agricultural and Industrial Credit, and

d) in the development of tourism.

The planned financial and banking legislation reform was cited as a special consideration.

3. Assistance of the State Department in facilitating relationships with the Export-Import Bank relative:

a) to signature of the proposed IIAA–ODVA contract on the former's role in the Artibonite Valley (with particular regard to apparent Bank insistence on retaining management control) and

b) to settlement of day-to-day problems of working relationships.

4. Reconsideration by the Exim Bank of the question of hydroelectric power for the Artibonite Valley Project.

5. Consideration of revision of the existing rates of U.S. and Haitian contributions to the technical assistance programs in the future (present rates—U.S. 1 per Haitian 3).

6. U.S. aid in securing for Haiti a larger sugar quota on the international market.

7. Sympathetic consideration for a larger quota for Haitian sugar in the U.S. market and lower tariffs, and

8. Various specific requests for aid.

Mr. Cabot throughout the conversations emphasized that he was not present to negotiate or to make any commitments, but rather to listen to the exposé of Haitian problems. He pointed out that Haiti is protected from aggression under the Rio Pact,[4] in discussing the proposed bilateral military agreement, and also stressed the existing heavy financial commitments of the U.S. in regard to military aid to other countries. He expressed great interest in Haitian difficulties in obtaining U.S. arms, ammunition and replacement parts.

With regard to the economic request, Mr. Cabot expressed interest, while cautioning that revision in the sugar situation was unlikely and that a loan would require careful consideration, admitting, however, that the financial and banking reform might provide a special favorable aspect. He stressed the role of private investment in economic development and the need to create a favorable climate for such investment.

I. —Military Phase

Discussions opened at 9:00 a.m. in the office of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. In addition to the Foreign Minister, also present were the Secretary of State for National Defense, Interior and Justice, Ducasse Jumelle, and the Chief of Staff of the Haitian Army, General Antoine Levelt, Assistant Secretary of State John M. Cabot and Robert S. Folsom, Chargé d'Affaires a.i. of the American Embassy. (Colonel Valentine Smith, Army Attaché of the American Embassy was also present at the military talks.)

After a few brief preliminary remarks of welcome to Assistant Secretary Cabot by the Foreign Minister and the Minister of National Defense, General Levelt was asked to speak for the Haitian Government.

General Levelt stated that the Haitian Army is a combination of army and police force in which the officers are primarily military and only secondarily police, while the reverse holds true for much of the enlisted force, which is detailed for constabulary duty throughout the provinces. He emphasized the American character of the Army, pointing out that it uses U.S. manuals, has the U.S. table on organization and that training of officers and men is by U.S. methods.

He pointed out that with a population of 3,000,000 Haiti has available some 300,000 for military service (i.e. enough for 30 divisions). He asserted that manpower and training presented no problem for increase in the army, and that the sole limiting factor is equipment.

Turning to the Haitian Air Force, he noted that the pilots, and other officers and men, were trained to handle and service many types of planes and that, if equipment (planes) were available, the Haitian Air Force would be useful for submarine patrol in case of war. He suggested that the Air Force could patrol the Windward Passage (Haiti–Cuba) and the passage between Haiti and Jamaica.

He suggested the need for a bilateral military pact with the United States with one of its objectives the creation of a combat team of 5,000 men or perhaps a light division of 10,000 men capable of service abroad. In this connection, he emphasized that U.S. aid should be given as Haiti reaches certain attainments.

He said that the present airport is rapidly becoming obsolete. He noted that a study had been made by the U.S. Air Force Mission in cooperation with the staff of General Kiel,[5] which placed the cost of a new field (excluding cost of the land) at from five to six million dollars. He said the project had also been discussed with Juan Trippe, President of P.A.A., recently and that the latter had suggested that the new landing strip be made in three sections, the center part to be civilian, with a cost of about $2,500,000 (exclusive of buildings) for which P.A.A. would seek an Exim Bank loan. Mr. Trippe had also suggested that P.A.A. would share in the cost of buildings. General Levelt said he sought aid from the U.S. in connection with the military sections of the field ($2,500,000–$3,500,000).

Mr. Cabot replied, emphasizing the existing U.S. commitments to aid Haiti in case of attack and the already heavy financial commitments of the U.S., but said he was glad to have the Haitian views on the subject of a bilateral treaty.

General Levelt then emphasized the psychological importance of a bilateral pact, especially in view of the pact just negotiated with the Dominican Republic.

He then set forth certain specific minor problems. First, he emphasized the difficulties (actually the impossibility) experienced in 1947 in seeking to obtain parts for Springfield rifles even on a cash basis.* He noted that, as a result, the Haitian Army had been forced to turn to Belgium for Mauser guns. He pointed out that the case of Haiti was by no means unique; that other Latin American nations had the same problem and that the effort at standardization of equipment has been materially damaged. He noted also that Haiti has had offers from three different European Governments, each of which has offered to sell U.S. aircraft, Springfield rifles and other arms and equipment.

Enclosure No. 1, a memorandum prepared by the Department of National Defense, summarizes the views of General Levelt and the Ministry.

II. —Financial and Economic Phase

Following conclusion of the military phase of the discussion, there was a brief recess while the Minister of Defense, General Levelt and Colonel Smith withdrew and the other members of the Cabinet took their places at the round table.

a) Minister of Finance and National Economy, Lucien Hibbert, was called upon for the first exposé. Following an outline of Haiti's economy and its problems in general, he noted that Haiti had signed the Investment Guarantee Agreement.[6] He also spoke briefly of land reform, noting the need for regrouping of small holdings rather than for breaking up of large holdings.

*General Levelt admitted later that he knew that it was not the policy of the U.S. to give arms to unstable Governments, referring to the period of the overthrow of President Lescot and the early days of the Estimé régime. Since 1947 no effort has been made to acquire ammunition in the United States. [Footnote in the source text.]

Noting that Haiti is a one crop country with coffee supplying more than 50 per cent of exports, that sisal prices had collapsed and that the banana industry is nearly dead, he discussed the consequent losses in foreign exchange and Government revenues and suggested a short-term (four year) credit of $3,000,000 to give the Government more elasticity in carrying out its program of economic development during a period in which it was proposed to reorganize financial and banking legislation.

Mr. Cabot interjected that the Exim Bank usually does not consider credits to cover budgetary deficits, but that, in view of the proposed banking and financial reforms, the Bank might consider the case as a special exception.

The Foreign Minister noted at this point that the budgetary deficit was not the fault of the Government, but of outside forces (world prices, etc.).

The Finance Minister then said that he had not intended to imply the need for a credit to cover a budgetary deficit, but rather to enable the Government to aid economic development in four specific areas: (1) the banana industry, (2) the sisal industry (SHADA), (3) the Institute of Industrial and Agricultural Credit, and (4) tourism, through roads, hotels, beaches, etc. He added that he contemplated a bank-to-bank (Exim Bank to Banque Nationale de la République d'Haiti) short-term loan guaranteed by the Haitian Government. He asserted that such a loan in the amount of $3,000,000 would remove all development projects from the budget leaving revenues free for normal functional expenditures.

He suggested that, after all financial and banking legislation had been implemented and after the economy was in good shape, Haiti might seek a long-term loan to consolidate its short-term loans.

Mr. Cabot cautioned that usual interest on long-term loans is about 5%, as against 3.5% on short-term loans.

Enclosure No. 2 summarizes very succinctly the views of the Minister of Finance.

b) Director of ODVA, Major Alcide Duviella, stated that good progress was being made on the Artibonite Project, except as regards the IIAA–ODVA Agreement, in which it appeared that the Exim Bank did not agree with either the IIAA or the ODVA as to who should name the Director of the project.

He emphasized the need for development of hydroelectric power and asked that the Exim Bank reconsider its position on this subject.

Mr. Folsom stated that to be economic, the Port-au-Prince market must be opened for the sale of hydroelectric power, and that to obtain this market a modus vivendi had to be worked out with the Compagnie d'Eclairage Electrique des Villes de Port-au-Prince et du Cap-Haitien. He emphasized that, under the present contract, the Company could not amortize even existing equipment and would not be able to undertake additional installations to connect up with the hydroelectric power, unless some arrangement were reached. He asserted his belief that, with a reasonable arrangement, the Company would be amenable to purchase of hydroelectric power. (This led to some discussion and expression of diverse opinions.) The Foreign Minister stated his belief that a reasonable arrangement could be made.

Enclosure No. 3 summarizes the views of the ODVA. It should be noted that the last sentence of the final paragraph is in error, as Mr. Folsom did not concede any Haitian point of view, but rather stressed the need for the Haitian Government to reach a satisfactory arrangement with the local light and power company.

c) The Minister of Public Health and Labor, Roger Dorsinville, suggested consideration of revision in the proportion of U.S. and Haitian contributions to the Point IV Health and Sanitation program (now $1.00 by the U.S. for each $3.00 contributed by Haiti). He also spoke in general terms of projects he had in mind.

Enclosure No. 4 summarizes the views of the Ministry of Public Health.

d) The Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, Daniel Heurtelou, asked for consideration for revision of the international sugar quota assigned to Haiti and, more particularly, for an increase in the U.S. quota assigned for Haitian sugar and more favorable treatment in the U.S. markets.

Mr. Cabot drew attention to the Sugar Act[7] and stated any change in the U.S. market situation would be obtained only with great difficulty.

Enclosure No. 5 summarizes the views of the Ministry of Commerce.

(At this point, no time remained for continuation of the conference, which was adjourned accordingly to permit Mr. Cabot to keep his appointment with the President.)

Enclosures Nos. 6, 7 and 8 are respectively summaries of the views of the Ministries of Agriculture, National Education and Public Works. The latter is rather an amazing list of requirements.

III.—Conference with President Magloire.

At 12:15 p. m. Mr. Cabot and Mr. Folsom called on President Paul E. Magloire, who received them in company with Foreign Minister Liautaud and Mr. Daniel Theard, Chief of Protocol.

The President, after welcoming Mr. Cabot, summed up the views already expressed by his Cabinet officers at the conference earlier in the morning, stressing:—

1) his interest in and desire for a bilateral military pact with the United States;

---

[7] Apparent reference to the Sugar Act of 1948 (Public Law 388), approved Aug. 8, 1947; for text, see 61 Stat. 922.

2) the need for a better working relationship with the Exim Bank on the Artibonite Project (pointing out the disastrous results of mixed responsibility in the case of SHADA and placing almost all the blame for its failure on the first and last American managements and the Americans on the Board of Directors, specifically Mr. Darton of the Exim Bank. He stressed that he was anxious to avoid any such fiasco in the Artibonite Valley);

3) the desirability of revision in the ratios of U.S.-Haitian contributions to the technical assistance programs (towards a reverse in the ratios);

4) the need for an international airport and his hope for U.S. assistance; and

5) his hope that Haitian sugar might receive more favorable treatment in the United States.

In stressing the need for U.S. economic assistance, he readily admitted that previous Haitian administrations were to blame for the collapse of the banana industry, though, as noted above, he placed blame on Americans for part of Haiti's present problems with the sisal industry.

It is a regret that transmission of this despatch has been delayed. Copies of most of the enclosed memoranda were not received from the Ministry for Foreign Affairs until April 30, 1953.

738.5 MSP/5–2153

Memorandum by George O. Spencer of the Office of Regional American Affairs to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 21, 1953.

Subject: Inclusion of Haiti in the Grant-Aid Military Assistance Program.

As you are aware, the Haitian Ambassador last week presented us with a note[2] requesting that we include Haiti in the grant-aid military assistance program. Several months ago he asked us why Haiti had been excluded and we replied in writing that in choosing countries, the U.S. had to take into consideration the limited U.S. funds available for the program and the military capabilities of individual Latin American countries for making a hemisphere defense contribution. In short, we gave him a polite negative answer. Meanwhile, the Haitian military has been making strong pleas to the Pentagon for a place in the program. The last I heard was that the Pentagon intended to refer the Haitians to the State Department, which it apparently has done.

[1] Addressed also to Deputy Assistant Secretary Mann and Director of the Office of Middle American Affairs Rubottom.

[2] Not printed.

I am told by my contacts in the Pentagon that the Navy is the only Service Department having an interest in a Haitian program. However, the other two Services have vetoed the idea of even a Navy program for Haiti each time the question has arisen. I believe, therefore, that we stand virtually no chance of obtaining Pentagon approval short of an appeal by the Under Secretary to the Joint Chiefs during his meeting with them tomorrow.

According to the majority opinion in the Pentagon, the present program has one sole purpose, namely, to obtain from Latin American countries a commitment to prepare military units of a type which would be of practical military assistance to U.S. armed forces in defending the Caribbean area in time of war. The Pentagon view is that countries like Haiti plainly are not capable of preparing such units, even with some U.S. assistance. In short, they haven't enough trained soldiers for such units or they haven't the money to spend on material and facilities they would need in addition to the equipment we would provide in the program.

I believe that important political considerations require that we attempt to over-ride the Pentagon thesis on political grounds, in the case of Nicaragua, El Salvador and Honduras. While it would be politically desirable to have Haiti in the program, I believe that our reasons are not strong enough to make a persuasive case to the Pentagon. I therefore suggest that we not ask the Under Secretary to urge the Joint Chiefs to include Haiti in the program during his discussions tomorrow, but that we have him devote his efforts to persuading the Pentagon to concur in our proposal regarding Nicaragua, Honduras and El Salvador—the countries that count most in our plan to deal an effective blow against communism in Guatemala. In the meanwhile, if you concur, I plan to submit the Haitian request formally to the Pentagon at the lower levels, so that we may have something in writing from the Pentagon on which to base a reply to the Haitian Ambassador.[3]

838.2614/10–953

Memorandum of Conversation, by William B. Connett, Jr., of the Office of Middle American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 9, 1953.

Subject: Artibonite Project

Participants: M. Lucien Hibbert, Haitian Minister of Finance
Jacques Leger, Haitian Ambassador
General Glen Edgar Edgerton, Managing Director
Export-Import Bank
Mr. Phil Atterberry—ED
Mr. Connett—MID

The interview with General Edgerton was arranged directly by M. Hibbert who requested at the last minute that the interview be private. However, he did not object to the presence of representatives of the Department of State whom he had earlier asked to attend. The interview lasted for over two hours, during which time M. Hibbert did most of the talking. Early in the interview M. Hibbert requested from General Edgerton that he be permitted to call in a stenographer, Madam Nicolas, whom he had brought with him from the Haitian Embassy. General Edgerton said he had no objection but remarked that he would not feel quite as free to talk as he would if he were not speaking for the record. The General also requested that he be provided with a copy of the stenographic notes. M. Hibbert agreed to make them available both to the Eximbank and the Department of State.*

Mr. Hibbert's exposition, which lasted almost an hour and a half, roughly paralleled what he had told Mr. Folsom in Haiti prior to his departure, as reported in Port-au-Prince despatch No. 157 of September 24, 1953.[1] His presentation was divided into three principal parts: part one was designed to show the poor condition of Haiti's finances; part two consisted of a general review of the Shada situation; and part three was a recommendation that the Artibonite project be reviewed with a view to ascertaining whether its scope might be reduced and its priorities rescheduled so as to assure the technical soundness of the project and to lessen the financial burden on Haiti. M. Hibbert's remarks are summarized briefly below:

Part one: Haitian finances are directly influenced by the volume and value of a very few agricultural exports, principally coffee and sisal. Because of a smaller coffee crop and reduced prices for sisal and other export commodities, the Haitian economy has suffered a recession from which it is not likely to recover for some years. Two years ago, when the expanded Ar-tibonite project was agreed upon, prospects were much brighter that the Haitian economy could stand the strain.

The Eximbank has asked the ODVA where the Haitian Government will obtain the funds to pay for the Artibonite project. The ODVA, because this matter was not within its competence, referred it to M. Hibbert, the Secretary of Finance. The immediate problem involved raising the amount of 2.6 million dollars to cover the Haitian contribution to the Artibonite for this (fiscal ?) year. The long range problem involved the question of where Haiti, faced with a downward curve in the business cycle, would find these large sums in future years. M. Hibbert could not see how he could raise 2.6 million dollars this year, particularly since his Department had an over-draft with the National Bank of Haiti for 2.5 million dollars from the last fiscal year and over a million dollars from the preceding year.

Part two: Through gross managerial incompetence Shada, which ten years ago had been acclaimed by its enthusiasts as Haiti's economic saviour with prospects of tripling the national agricultural production, had become a colossal failure. M. Hibbert, trained in economics and statistics, had foreseen this all along, although it was not until he was appointed to the Special Commission to Investigate Shada that he realized how hopelessly incompetent the American management had been. Because of inefficiency and improper planning, Haiti was despoiled of some of its richest resources, particularly the Pine Forest which was wantonly exploited without provision for reforestation. M. Hibbert himself, because he exposed the magnitude of Shada's failure and because he spoke critically of the role played by the American directors, particularly Mr. Darton of the Eximbank, and of the American management, particularly Mr. MacQueen, was branded as anti-American and was advised by the President of Haiti not to go to the United States with the mission which in late 1952 negotiated the Shada settlement.

The lessons to be learned from Shada's failure were: (1) The general inefficiency of bureaucracy and government planning where the profit motive is largely absent (Plantation Dauphin, operating under the free enterprise system, was an example of American management at its best). (2) The costliness of failure of large agricultural development projects like Shada which has saddled the Haitian Government with a 4 million dollar debt which has become an obligation of the Haitian treasury and will make it more difficult to pay for the Artibonite project. (3) In general Shada's failure opened the eyes of the Haitian President and public to the dangers of a similar failure in the Artibonite, where there are signs already of faulty planning.

Part three: The Artibonite presents a number of serious technical problems; among them are: (1) the cadastral survey has suceeded in establishing property boundaries but has only established ownership in 800 plots out of some 24,000, (2) the lowering of the mouth of the Estère River would deprive the inhabitants of that region of water for their rice, and hence of their livelihood, for several years to come, or until the Peligré dam and irrigation works are completed, (3) no provision has been made for evacuation and resettlement of the inhabitants of the reservoir area, (4) the reservoir will silt up in thirty years and, for technical reasons, it will not be possible, as is done in some parts of the United States, to construct another dam further up stream when it is no longer useful.

These technical problems, together with the poor condition and prospects of Haitian finances, counsel a much smaller project, along the lines of the one originally conceived several years ago by Mr. Norman Armour, then Assistant Secretary of State, and M. Hibbert. This project would have cost around 5 million dollars and would have been within the reach of Haitian finances. The KTAM engineers, however, like all engineers who know nothing of economics and give no consideration to who is going to pay and how, decided that a much bigger project would be better. The Haitian Government, at that time not fully aware of the magnitude of Shada's failure, agreed to this proposal. The IIAA planning group elaborated an expensive agricultural development program but gave no hint in their report of how the Haitian Government was to pay for this tremendous project which they themselves estimated would require total outlays by the Haitian Government over a 50 year period of $113 million, which figure the planning group admitted would exceed by $19 million the expected revenues from the project over the same period. To make matters worse, estimated revenues from the project are not realistic and it is doubtful that they would ever reach significant proportions, certainly not during the first 15 years of the project. Practically the only crop which the peasants know how to grow and would grow is rice, and the domestic market for rice in Haiti is already beginning to decline.

The number of people to be benefitted by this costly project amounts to only some 60,000 out of a population of three and a half million. The Haitian Government would be allocating, for years and years to come, a disproportionate share of its revenue for the benefit of a small segment of the population. President Magloire has brought political stability to Haiti but this stability cannot continue unless the Government can show the public some tangible economic results. The Artibonite project cannot hope to do this; on the contrary, it will be a serious drain on the Haitian treasury with no prospect of even breaking even. It would be much more intelligent to apply these funds to developing the tourist trade which could be Haiti's best dollar-earner after coffee. A new airport is also needed, as are roads and improved power and telephone service.

These conclusions made it imperative that the whole Artibonite project be reviewed with a view to curtailing its scope and rescheduling its activities so that it will not constitute such a drain on Haitian economy and so that it can be made technically viable. Perhaps the Canneau intake and related works could be undertaken first, and if this proves a success, consideration could then be given to constructing the Peligré dam after adequate planning for resettlement and erosion control. The decision to go ahead with the expanded project would, of course, be dependent on Haiti's economic outlook at the time.

Following this exposition, M. Hibbert said that he would like to discuss the whole question with members of the Bank's staff to see if some satisfactory arrangement could be worked out.

General Edgerton said that his staff would, of course, give full consideration to M. Hibbert's proposals, though he could not promise what, if anything, could be done to meet them. He assurred M. Hibbert of the cooperation of the Bank in this matter although he added that he could not help but be disturbed that M. Hibbert doubted the economic and technical viability of the project and wished to modify it. General Edgerton said that he could understand some of the Minister's concern, and that he knew, for example, the difficulty of obtaining the cooperation of independent farmers in government planning. He said that he was not too concerned about the silting up of the reservoir, since only a couple of reservoirs in the world had ever completely silted up. He said that even when a reservoir became largely silted up, its usefulness still remained considerable. He said also that he would have assumed that the engineering firm, in which he had great confidence, would have taken into consideration the various technical problems which M. Hibbert mentioned before proceeding, and that therefore it was not entirely clear to him why a new survey of the project would have to be undertaken now. Furthermore, he pointed out that if M. Hibbert's proposals involved a cancellation, or even a major modification, of the construction contract this would inevitably entail extra expense. M. Hibbert then commented that he was not urging a cancellation of the contract but merely a modification of it to rearrange priorities and curtail the scope of certain activities.

In taking leave of M. Hibbert, General Edgerton again assured him that he could count on the full cooperation of the Bank's staff. M. Hibbert said he would like to commence discussions with the staff, if possible, on Monday, October 12, and General Edgerton said he believed this could be arranged.[2]

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Middle American Affairs (Burrows) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Woodward)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 10, 1953.

Subject: Current U.S.-Haitian Problems

By memorandum of November 3, which is attached,[2] your attention was invited to a recent despatch [3] from Ambassador Davis touching on four important problems in our relations with Haiti. Your pencilled note asks whether any action is recommended with respect to these problems. The following comments will answer your question:

(1) Reduction of Haiti's annual contributions to the Eximbank-financed Artibonite Project: A letter from General Edgerton to Ambassador Leger dated November 3[4] asks the Haitian Government whether, in view of the doubts expressed by Finance Minister Hibbert, it wishes to: (a) liquidate the project, (b) continue as planned, or (c) reschedule the activities so as to lower annual costs. Pending an answer to this letter no further action would seem warranted.[5]

(2) Haitian interest in private financing for public works: Action on our part would not seem appropriate because: (a) negotiations are being carried out directly with private U.S. construction and banking firms by the Haitian Government; and (b) it might not be in our best interest to encourage Haitian Government to seek to finance additional public works at a time when it says it cannot afford to pay for the Artibonite Project.

(3) Haitian hope of reducing Shada indebtedness: A year ago the Haitians sent a special mission to Washington to negotiate a settlement of the Shada crisis. The Department lent its good offices with the Eximbank, and the Haitian Government received considerable relief in the form of funding arrangements, a moratorium on interest, etc. It would not seem advisable to reopen this issue now and it is very doubtful the Bank would agree to a better deal for the Haitians.

[5] In a memorandum for the files, dated Dec. 1, 1953, Mr. Connett stated that the Export-Import Bank had informed him that it had received a reply from the Haitian Government to General Edgerton's letter of Nov. 3. According to the Bank, the reply indicated, inter alia, that despite budgetary problems the Haitian Government was determined to proceed with the Artibonite project as planned, and also that although the Government had budgeted $2 million for the project for FY 1954, it wished to have its annual contribution to the project "average" $1.5 million (838.2614/12–153).

(4) Problems of U.S.-owned power company:[6] Embassy Port-au-Prince, on the Department's instructions, recently lent its good offices in bringing officials of the parent company together with the Haitian President, who displayed a reasonable attitude. It remains now for the Company and the Haitian Government to try to reach an agreement. For the present, there would seem to be no reason for the Department to intervene.

[6] Apparent reference to the Electric Light Company of Port-au-Prince (Compagnie d'Eclairage Electrique des Villes de Port-au-Prince et du Cap-Haitien) which wanted to negotiate a modification of its concession. Pertinent documents are in file 838.2614 for 1953 and 1954.

738.5 MSP/1–754

The Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs (Nash) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, January 7, 1954.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to memorandum dated 19 October 1953,[1] from the Department of State, requesting information as to whether the Department of Defense considers that a bilateral Military Assistance Agreement with Haiti would be desirable from a military point of view and, in particular, whether the Department of Defense is prepared to develop a hemisphere defense task for Haiti in establishing its eligibility for grant military assistance under the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have recommended that, from a military point of view, it would be desirable to negotiate a military assistance agreement with Haiti. Further, in a recent revision of U.S. war plans for Latin America, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have included a defense task for Haiti, the execution of which will require the development by Haiti of naval forces estimated at 3 LSFF's (Landing Ships Flotilla Flagship). The force bases for developing and refining the FY 1955 MDA Program are being amended to include these ships. However, the presently proposed FY 1955 MDA Program does not include funds for the provision of military assistance to Haiti.

Attention is invited to the fact that provision of 3 LSFF's to Haiti under the grant military assistance program will constitute a departure from the precedent hitherto followed in Navy programming for Latin America. No vessels have previously been provided under grant aid programs to Latin American countries.

[1] Not printed (738.5 MSP/10–1953).

On the basis of the recommendation by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Department of Defense considers that defense plans and the hemisphere defense task assigned to Haiti require that country to participate in missions important to the defense of the Western Hemisphere. It is, therefore, requested that the Department of State initiate a request that the President find that such military assistance as may be furnished Haiti is in accordance with defense plans which require Haiti to participate in missions important to the defense of the Western Hemisphere.[2]

Sincerely yours, FRANK C. NASH

[2] On May 13, 1954, President Eisenhower made the necessary finding under the Mutual Security Act of 1951 that Haiti's participation in the military assistance program was required by Hemisphere defense plans, and he authorized the initiation of negotiations with Haiti for a bilateral military assistance agreement (738.5 MSP/6–254).

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, February 26, 1954—7:19 p.m.

84. From Eximbank. For your information General Edgerton sent letter[1] Minister Hibbert February 24: (a) expressing satisfaction work on Artibonite progressing as planned; (b) rejecting idea of limiting Haitian contribution future years $1.5 million in light inadequacy of this figure and difficulties estimating construction and agricultural development requirements more than year in advance; (c) recognizing no financing problem exists this year in consequence unexpended balances Haitian funds; (d) expressing hope high coffee prices and exports will enable Haitian Government put aside additional funds this year over and above $2,021,000 budgeted as reserve for Artibonite; (e) suggesting Bank mission to Haiti late March to discuss Haitian Government budget figure for Artibonite for 1954–55 and suggesting present information indicates reasonable figure might be about $2.5 million.

Bank study on basis field trip last December and information received since makes it abundantly clear construction program should proceed as planned. Criticisms of project due primarily unwarranted concern Haitian financial and economic prospects. Haitian contribution $1.5 million 1954–55 and 1955–56 would result inadequate financing construction and agricultural development by early 1955–56. In light excellent export prospects and consequent high tax revenue extremely important Haitians build up reserve for Artibonite to avoid possible financing difficulties if coffee prices weaken year from now.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Secretary of State[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 2, 1954.

Subject: Recommendation that President Magloire of Haiti be invited to visit the United States

Discussion:

On May 29, during your brief absence, Mr. Murphy sent the attached recommendation to President Eisenhower (Tab A)[2] that President Magloire of Haiti be invited to visit the United States.

The visit was recommended because it would demonstrate the importance we attribute to friendly relations with a very small and poor country, particularly at this time when discussions are taking place with respect to possible action against Guatemala.

Although we have not wished to make this question one of color, it is of interest that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has repeatedly urged that an invitation be extended to the President of Haiti.

It is understood informally from the White House that President Eisenhower wishes to discuss this with you before making a decision.

Recommendation:

That, if you agree, you recommend to President Eisenhower that this invitation be extended.[3]

[1] Drafted by Deputy Assistant Secretary Woodward.

[2] In the referenced memorandum, dated May 28, 1954, Mr. Murphy, on the recommendation of ARA, proposed a 3-day state visit for President Magloire in September 1954, but in a memorandum for the Secretary, dated May 31, 1954, President Eisenhower expressed regret at the number of state visits already planned for 1954 (738.11/6–954).

[3] In a memorandum for the President, dated June 9, 1954, Secretary Dulles recommended, in view of the President's feelings in the matter, that President Magloire's visit be put forward to January 1955 (738.11/6–954). Department telegram 121, to Port-au-Prince, dated June 22, 1954, informed the Embassy that President Eisenhower approved the extension of an invitation to President Magloire to visit the United States in January 1955 (738.11/6–2254).

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Financial and Development Policy (Corbett) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Waugh)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 9, 1954.

Subject: Haiti—Public Works Project

Estabrook and Company, Boston, and the Utah Construction International have inquired whether Eximbank would be willing to guaranty 80% of approximately $10 million financing needed for the dollar costs of a four to six year public works program proposed by Haiti.

Estabrook would form a syndicate of commercial banks, including First National of Boston, to undertake the financing. The syndicate would take risk on 20% of the bond value (about $10 million) outstanding at any one time and on interest payments.

The project calls for alternative programs of either (1) a $20.5 million works program or (2) $18.7 million program. Involved are 121 miles of highway improvement, expansion of electric power production and distribution, expansion and modernization of telephone systems, and dock and airport improvement at Port-au-Prince. Haiti would cover local costs with one dollar of its money for four dollars of foreign money made available. This is the ratio with Eximbank in the Artibonite project.

ARA thinks: (1) the loan guaranty requested of the Eximbank "would be in the U.S. interest and would contribute to our foreign policy objectives"; (2) the proposed projects are basic to Haiti's needs for economic development and would further U.S. policy of encouraging sound economic development, primarily by private enterprise, in Latin America. The program's success would contribute to the stability of the Magloire Administration which is presently friendly to U.S.

However, ARA has the following Reservations:

(1) It is not clear whether Haiti fully understands Eximbank role in this proposal;

(2) The exact scope of the program or its cost is not clear. The proposal too closely represents a line of credit which ARA believes would be undesirable;

(3) Questions arise as to the relationship of power development to the private American Company and the possible installation of hydroelectric generators in Artibonite Dam;

(4) The proposed draft contract between Estabrook and Haiti gives banking syndicate unwarranted rights, vis-à-vis Haitian Government which, if carried out, could result in political repercussions;

(5) ARA desires prior consultation for political reasons if Eximbank decides to take definitive action on Estabrook's request.

[1] Drafted by Phil R. Atterberry of the Office of Financial and Development Policy; cleared in draft by Chief of the Investment and Economic Development Staff Emerson A. Ross.

Recommendation: ED concurs with the ARA position including the reservations and recommends that the Department's position should thus be approval in principle, but with any definitive action by the Bank to be subject to further prior consultation with the Department after the Bank has obtained more adequate information designed to clarify the economic merits of the proposal and to resolve the Department's reservations.[2]

---

[2] In a memorandum to Assistant Secretary Holland, dated June 14, 1954, Assistant Secretary Waugh indicated his approval of this recommendation, and stated that, at ARA's request, he would informally advise the Export-Import Bank of the Department's position (103 XMB/6–1454).

Information in Department of State files indicates that the Export-Import Bank made no decision on the Haitian request in 1954.

OFFICIAL USE ONLY [WASHINGTON,] September 29, 1954.

Subject: Haitian Petroleum Monopoly

Participants: Ambassador Léger of Haiti
MID—Mr. Newbegin
MID—Mrs. Hood[1]
MID—Mr. Whitaker

Mr. Newbegin stated that the Department had received word that the Haitian Government is actively considering a proposal of representatives of the Murchison[2] oil interests in Texas to build an oil refinery in Haiti under a contract with the Haitian Government, which would assure the new organization certain monopolistic privileges.

Ambassador Léger said that he only knew of this proposal from what he had read in the newspapers and understood that it had been turned down by the Haitian Government. He stated that he believed a monopoly of this sort was unconstitutional in Haiti.

Mr. Newbegin replied that while the U.S. did not wish to interfere in any internal Haitian matters, and followed the policy of encouraging competition between American companies, he wanted Ambassador Léger to know, nevertheless, that our Government opposed any monopoly granted to one American firm which would exclude the competition of others. Mr. Newbegin also stated that while the Murchison interests are well and favorably known, the granting of the contemplated monopoly could have a very serious detrimental effect on future U.S. investments in Haiti, since American businessmen would feel that any other business ventures might suddenly become unprofitable as the result of a similar governmental contract.

Ambassador Léger stated that he would inform his Government by cable of the attitude of the U.S. Government concerning this matter.[3]

---

[3] In a memorandum of conversation between Ambassador Léger and Director of the Office of Middle American Affairs Newbegin, dated Oct. 5, 1954, the Ambassador is reported to have stated that "he desired to give assurances that his Government would undertake no measures which would prejudice established American oil companies in Haiti and would take no steps in this matter without consulting with the U.S. Embassy and cooperating fully with the United States Government." Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Stewart) to the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs (Nolting)

SECRET WASHINGTON, October 6, 1954.

Subject: Grant Military Assistance for Haiti

1. Reference is made to your memorandum of 16 July 1954,[1] which:

a. Expresses the opinion of the Department of State that it would be desirable from the political point of view to conclude a bilateral military assistance agreement with Haiti, and

b. Requests the Department of Defense to make available sufficient funds to provide Haiti with grant military assistance in FY 1955.[2]

2. The Department of Defense has considered all aspects of the Mutual Defense Assistance Programs with respect to Latin America and has concluded that, in view of the limited funds appropriated by the Congress for the current fiscal year and the reduction in the carryover of MDA funds from prior years, it would be infeasible to make any adjustments in the existing programs to provide military assistance to Haiti. It is the judgment of the Department of Defense that funds currently available for existing Latin American programs are required for those programs if U.S. objectives in Latin America are to be met.

[1] Not printed (738.5 MSP/6–1554)

[2] Special Assistant Nolting's memorandum of July 16 reads in part as follows: "It is the understanding of the State Department that only a relatively small amount of funds would be required to provide Haiti with the type of grant assistance recommended. Accordingly, the Department of State requests that the Defense Department make whatever small adjustment may be necessary in other country programs in Latin America in order to make available sufficient funds to provide Haiti with grant assistance during FY 1955." (738.5 MSP/6–1554)

3. In view of the fact that the Department of State desires, from a political point of view, to conclude a bilateral military assistance agreement with Haiti, the Department of Defense will reduce the FY 1955 MDA Program for France and Italy in order to provide the necessary funds to furnish military assistance to Haiti under the provisions of Section 105 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954.[3]

4. It is believed advisable to report the new program for Haiti to the Congressional committees indicated in Section 513 of the Act. Accordingly it is requested that the Department of State furnish this office with the appropriate justification for this program, to be used in notifying the Congressional committees concerned.

Memorandum by the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs (Nolting) to the Acting Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Wilson)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 10, 1954.

Subject: Grant Aid Military Assistance Program for Haiti.

I refer to General Stewart's memorandum of October 6, 1954,[2] which stated that the Department of Defense would be prepared to reduce the FY 1955 mutual defense assistance programs for France and Italy, in order to provide funds necessary to conduct a grant military assistance program for Haiti, in the event a bilateral military assistance agreement should be concluded with that country.

The Department of State was informed by the Assistant Secretary of Defense, in a letter of January 7, 1954,[3] that the Department of Defense considered U.S. defense plans to require Haiti to participate in a hemispere defense mission requiring the development by Haiti of naval forces consisting of three LSFF's. On the assumption that no more than $1 million of funds will be required to implement such a program for Haiti during the present fiscal year, the State Department approves the Department of Defense recommendation that funds now allocated for France and Italy be used for that purpose.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Spencer, with the assistance of Leonard H. Price of the Office of the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs.
[2] Supra.
[3] Ante, p. 1275.

The Department of State will appreciate being informed of the approximate date on which Department of Defense representatives would be prepared to arrive in Port-au-Prince for negotiations with Haitian representatives for the conclusion of a bilateral military assistance agreement and a secret bilateral military plan. As soon as the Department of Defense has indicated its preference for a date for beginning negotiations, the Department of State will make necessary arrangements with the Haitian Government.[4]

With reference to the final paragraph of General Stewart's memorandum, it is suggested that in reporting the new program for Haiti to the congressional committees, this program be related to the hemispheric defense role of Latin America as a whole, with such additional justification as may be indicated in the recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to which reference was made in the letter of January 7, 1954 addressed to the Secretary of State by Assistant Secretary of Defense, Mr. Frank Nash.

[4] In telegram 109, from Port-au-Prince, dated Dec. 21, 1954, the Embassy informed the Department that the Haitian Government was willing to initiate negotiations during the first week of January 1955 for a military assistance agreement (738.5 MSP/12–2154); the negotiations actually began on Jan. 10.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Charles H. Whitaker of the Office of Middle American Affairs

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 10, 1954.

Subject: Most Important Current Problems before the American Embassy in Haiti

Participants: Ambassador Davis
MID—Mr. Newbegin
MID—Mr. Neal
MID—Mr. Whitaker

Mr. Newbegin believed that enough time had now elapsed to permit the Haitian Government to be adequately informed about reactivating the FCN Treaty negotiations. He suggested that the Embassy make every effort to have this Treaty ready for signing when President Magloire is on his official visit to the United States. In this connection, all members present felt it would be desirable not to disclose the status of the Military Assistance Pact until FCN Treaty negotiations have reached a more advanced state in order to give the impression that the latter would be the only document available for signing during the official visit.

Ambassador Davis felt that the problems of the electric light company would soon become much more difficult and that a permanent solution of this matter would be desirable. He agreed to forward a copy of the contract under which the company now operates if this is not now available in the Department. The Ambassador felt that the legal position of the company is weak, that it would probably not fare very well if its case were to be arbitrated and that every effort should be made to arrive at a settlement in the near future.

With reference to problems in connection with the proposed petroleum refinery, Ambassador Davis felt that he should remind the Esso representative of his promise to lower the price of kerosene to a point where it would be able to compete with charcoal and help prevent the denuding of the Haitian forests.

With reference to the Rio Conference,[1] he felt that Minister Jumelle[2] would want more loans and financial aid.

Ambassador Davis stated that the International Bank was not interested in financing a hydro-electric power plant at the Artibonite Dam at this time but would probably agree to special smaller development projects like roads. He added that the Bank was sending a group of specialists to Haiti on November 12. The International Bank plans to suggest a National Development Committee to recommend priorities among different projects and keep President Magloire informed.

The Export-Import Bank is also not interested in financing the hydro-electric power project and feels that the private power company should be much more reasonable with reference to its negotiations with the Haitian Government.

Ambassador Davis mentioned briefly friction between Mr. Duviella of ODVA, who was able but difficult to deal with, and Mr. McCarthy of KTAM, who was inclined to be quite outspoken. Ambassador Davis felt that the Haitian budget, recently reduced from 140,000,000 to 128,000,000 gourdes, contained an appropriation for the Artibonite project.

With reference to the FOA program, Ambassador Davis plans to investigate the underlying causes of recent statements of the Minister of Foreign Relations.[3] Mr. Newbegin felt that if the FOA program was not wanted in Haiti, it should certainly be withdrawn. Ambassador Davis felt that Minister Zephirin was not favorably disposed toward this program.

Ambassador Davis brought up the matter of the sovereignty over Navassa Island, which is most important to the Haitians. He mentioned his belief that Haiti would be willing to sign any type of agreement for our use of this island, should we relinquish our claims to sovereignty over it.

Ambassador Davis reported that Minister Zephirin hates Generalissimo Trujillo. President Magloire also has misgivings but maintains an attitude of correctness and fears Dominican penetration in Haitian politics. He emphasized that the Haitians are doing everything possible to keep relations on an even keel. Ambassador Davis felt that it would be preferable for him not to be here during the visit of President Magloire. Mr. Newbegin stated that this matter was entirely up to Ambassador Davis and if later he thought it desirable to make the trip he should inform the Department so that necessary arrangements can be made.

[3] The particular statements by Foreign Minister Zephirin referred to here were not identified; presumably they were similar to his remarks made on Oct. 31 concerning the attempt of an unnamed "foreign power" to intervene in the internal affairs of Haiti (memorandum by Mr. Hoyt to Mr. Newbegin, dated Dec. 14, 1954, 838.00/12–1954).

Subject: Haiti's Economic Difficulties—FOA Problems

Discussion

(1) FOA Matters

During the past few weeks we have received numerous communications describing the resentment of President Magloire and other Haitian officials at certain actions of FOA personnel in connection with the distribution of the some $2,700,000 worth of relief supplies for Haiti.[2] Most of the criticism was directed against Mr. Stanley Baranson, who was Acting Chief of the USOM at the time and in charge of [1] Addressed also to Mr. Cale; drafted by Henry A. Hoyt of the Office of Middle American Affairs.

[2] The United States furnished emergency relief supplies to Haiti in the wake of destruction caused by Hurricane Hazel which stuck the country in mid-November.

the distribution of the relief supplies. The matter became so serious and had such a definite bearing on our relations with top Haitian officials that it became necessary to transfer Mr. Baranson and Mr. William Shaw, a customs expert.

While the FOA did a marvelous job of allocating and getting these emergency supplies to Haiti, the apparent lack of tact on the part of their representatives detracted from the overall effectiveness of the very charitable and worthwhile emergency program which we developed following Hurricane Hazel. The differences became so great that the Haitian Army is planning to withdraw from the distribution program on December 15, leaving a question as to just how much the relief supplies are needed if the Haitians themselves are not willing to continue their distribution.

(2) Further Emergency Program

On November 30 Mr. Eugene Clay of FOA proceeded to Haiti on an official visit. Although he had recommended that $3,000,000 be budgeted for an emergency program for Haiti in FY 1956, he knew before he left for Haiti that this item had been cut from the budget and that there were no funds available for additional Haitian relief.

Nevertheless, a meeting with President Magloire was held in Port-au-Prince, with Ambassador Davis, Mr. Clay and Mr. Barall of the Embassy present.[3] Haiti's economic difficulties were discussed and it was suggested that a commission be named by the President which would make recommendations as to Haiti's economic needs over and above any assistance which might be obtained through public or private loans. It was suggested that such additional help might be obtained under Sections 401 or 501 of the Mutual Security Act, although it was pointed out that no funds for this program were now available. It appears, however, from correspondence from the Embassy that the Haitians definitely gained the impression that such funds would be forthcoming when they presented a documented request. It seems possible this impression arose from the manner in which Mr. Clay presented the matter.

(3) Artibonite Difficulties

Meanwhile, Brown & Root, the contractors who are building the dam and irrigation canals for the Artibonite Valley project, have experienced difficulties in having claims for payments which they have made on the work processed by the ODVA (the Haitian committee handling the development of the Artibonite Valley). The Eximbank had granted a loan of $14,000,000 for the Artibonite project and the Brown & Root expenses were to be paid from this loan. It now appears there are not sufficient funds to complete the Artibonite project and the Haitians will probably ask the Eximbank for a further loan.

---

[3] No memorandum of this conversation was found in Department of State files.

Representatives of the ODVA are leaving Port-au-Prince for Washington on December 15 and will confer with Eximbank officials from December 20–23. We consider that the Artibonite project is an important and essential one to Haiti's economy and should be continued.

(4) IBRD Mission

A mission from the International Bank just returned from Haiti today after making a survey to determine whether there was a basis for an IBRD loan to Haiti. Apparently, the project being most considered by the Bank is a road from Port-au-Prince to Aux Cayes. Preliminary reports have indicated there might be some question as to whether the Haitians would accept the conditions which the IBRD would place on such a loan.

(5) Other Financial Difficulties

Top representatives of the Haitian National Bank called at the Embassy secretly to inform the Ambassador that Haiti's finances were in extremely bad shape; that there was a deficit of 32,000,000 gourdes ($6,400,000) and that 23,000,000 gourdes of this consisted of an overdraft at the Bank. They estimated that there will be a severe drop in Haiti's income as a result of damage done by the hurricane to the coffee crop and that the Government has not yet been willing to institute the genuine economies and real austerity which is required. The Bank referred to continued graft and expressed the fear that it will be called upon to finance uneconomical development projects.

(6) General Situation

All the foregoing has resulted in a sudden presentation by the Embassy to the Department of a very dismal picture insofar as Haiti is concerned. The Embassy has stated that if assistance is not given, economic chaos in Haiti might result and that even the stability of the Administration might be threatened. A recent letter from Mr. Barall states that the Haitians are so sure they will receive aid from the United States that the failure to receive any such aid will result in the United States being criticized severely and being blamed for Haiti's condition. Mr. Barall recommends that some three to five million dollars be allocated under the emergency program and that the Embassy and the USOM be authorized to "dole out" this amount for projects in Haiti which are sound and which will benefit Haiti's long-range economy. He believes that assistance of this type would not only satisfy Haiti's desire for additional aid, but would also assure that the funds are used wisely.

Comment

So far, we have conflicting reports as to the exact extent of the emergency in Haiti. The Ambassador and other competent observers seem to feel that the hurricane damage has been exaggerated and that the damage to the coffee crop is not as great as at first estimated.

There also seems to be a tendency to blame a lot of conditions, which have existed for many years in Haiti, on Hurricane Hazel. Further, it is a little surprising that this "extreme emergency" has developed so very fast and that we now find ourselves faced with the "urgent problem" of saving Haiti from "chaos."

Recommendations

(1) Complete documentation of all the requests for aid to Haiti should be obtained before any approval is given.

(2) The Artibonite Valley project should be completed, as perhaps the most essential and most important project now under way in Haiti. If additional funds for its completion are needed, support for such funds should be made to the Eximbank.

(3) Any loans which the IBRD feels (as a result of its recent survey) can be made for worthwhile projects, should be encouraged. The Haitians should be urged to comply with any of the conditions required by the Bank.

(4) The Haitians should be encouraged to seek loans from private sources. It has been intimated that the Haitian-American Sugar Company and the electric company in Haiti would be willing to invest further sums if given adequate guarantees by the Haitian Government.

(5) An emergency program for Haiti under the Mutual Security Act should be considered only if it is definitely proven such help is needed over and above aid which can be obtained through private and public loans. Such emergency assistance should be given only on the basis of proven Haitian needs and should not be allowed to develop as another FOA giveaway program.

(6) Aid to Haiti should be conditioned on the basis that Haiti will do more than it has so far to help itself.

(7) No expansion of the regular FOA program should be made unless the Embassy concurs. The Embassy has just made some specific recommendations in this respect, and they should be followed closely.[4]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 27, 1954.

Subject: Emergency Economic Assistance to Haiti

Summary and Recommendation

The $2,000,000 worth of surplus agricultural commodities plus funds for transportation and the $350,000 worth of seeds and light agricultural tools which have already been made available have provided the means for the Government to maintain reasonably tranquil conditions in this immediate period following the hurricane disaster. On the basis of initial reports, however, it was anticipated that additional emergency assistance would be required to enable Haiti to recover from this disaster. The FY–1956 Program proposed by FOA, therefore, included $3,000,000 in addition to the normal technical cooperation program for emergency assistance. This proposed $3,000,000 was eliminated by State.

Since that time, the President of Haiti has orally requested our Ambassador, at a meeting[1] attended by the Director of USOM[2] and myself, for emergency assistance. The Ambassador informed the President that he did not know whether such assistance could be made available, but that in any case, an official written request would be required. Following the oral request, the Director of USOM and I met with a committee appointed by the President and on each occasion it was carefully explained—

(a) that no funds were contained in the FY–1955 or proposed FY–1956 budget for such assistance;
(b) that there was absolutely no assurance that funds could be obtained and it would at best be extremely difficult;
(c) that any request would have to be directly related to the disaster and not for normal economic development, and
(d) that before any request could even be considered, it would have to be established that the emergency could not be met through maximum feasible effective utilization of the country's own resources and borrowing capacities.

It was added, however, that it was believed that the same type of analysis and program would be required as the basis of any loans.

The President again requested the Chargé and the Director of USOM for emergency assistance on December 22 and a formal written request will probably be submitted to the Embassy within the next two weeks. In the interim, however, both the Embassy and the USOM have reported on the basis of the information available to them that emergency assistance will be required. I fully concur in their conclusion on the basis of my own evaluation after a ten day visit to Haiti and believe that the situation requires an immediate policy decision on emergency assistance on the basis of the cables from USOM and the Embassy even prior to receipt of the official written request. It is understood, however, that the Department of State still believes that such emergency assistance is not justified. I, therefore, strongly urge that someone at a high level in this Agency request State to reconsider this decision.

[1] No record of this meeting was found in Department of State files.
[2] Raymond C. Smith.

On the basis of preliminary estimates, it is believed that the minimum additional emergency assistance required is approximately as follows:

FY–1955	$500,000 to $750,000
FY–1956	$250,000 to $3,000,000
FY–1957	$1,000,000

It is recommended that the Mission should be immediately authorized to talk with the Haitian Government in terms of figures as possible maximums in order to induce the Government to get down to reality and to get a concrete program under way while the emergency assistance already provided permits the situation to be kept under control and before really serious trouble arises.

Background

The FY 1953–54 revenues of Haiti were approximately the equivalent of $35,000,000 of which approximately $10,000,000 was utilized for economic services and development including $3,000,000 for the Artibonite Valley development for which the Export-Import Bank is also providing a total of $14,000,000 in loans over a period of years. It is anticipated that as a result of disaster damage to coffee and other crops, revenues will fall to approximately $24,000,000 in the first year following the disaster and that three years will be required before they can be restored to a normal level, even if additional emergency assistance is made available. The Government of Haiti estimates that exports will be down by as much as 50% and although this estimate may be excessive, it is anticipated that they will be at least ⅓ below normal.

The regular normal expenditures of the Government can of course be cut and some planned development projects postponed. The budget, however, cannot be cut to the level of earlier years without bringing practically to a halt the meagre economic development program which the Government has painfully gotten under way in recent years and this, it is believed, would be disastrous. The Government, moreover, is faced with the necessity for heavy additional expenditures for reconstruction and rehabilitation essential to permit a large percentage of the population to again earn a livelihood. There will, therefore, inevitably be an extremely serious gap between revenues and essential expenditures. This gap can not all be met by internal loans or by loans from Export-Import Bank and International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The only internal source from which the Government can borrow funds is the Central Bank which can make such funds available only by an expansion of the note circulation. The Bank believes that any further drawings by the Government would result in disastrous inflation and while I do not have the information to attempt to make a precise analysis, the extent to which the note circulation could be further expanded is at best extremely limited. The Government moreover, does not have the borrowing capacity to obtain funds from the Export-Import Bank or the IBRD to meet this emergency even if repayments were long deferred. The Export-Import Bank has tentatively indicated its willingness to consider increasing the loan for the Artibonite Valley because of increased costs since the time of the original estimates, but this would not take care of internal costs which are normally met from budgetary revenues. It is believed that the maximum additional borrowing capacity above the possible increased loan for the Artibonite is required for the Port-au-Prince–Aux Cayes road and the Artibonite hydro-electric projects which are essential for the economic future of Haiti. These projects are now being discussed with the IBRD and they most emphatically should not be delayed until any loans for the present emergency could be repaid.

Emergency economic grant assistance is required primarily in FY–1956 and on a reduced scale in FY–1957. I believe, however, that it is essential that some funds be made available in FY–1955 under Section 401 for rehabilitation and reconstruction. Work on restoration of irrigation works and rehabilitation of the coffee industry should start immediately, but the Government does not have funds to do so. There is also the problem of the very existence of many of the people in the immediate disaster areas. The emergency food supplies that have been provided should last to approximately February 1. By that time there should be adequate internal food supplies in the country as a whole. A large number of the population in the immediate disaster areas, however, will have meagre crops of their own. Many of them will not have the funds with which to purchase food from other areas in Haiti and the Government will not have the funds to purchase the food for them. Under these circumstances additional surplus agricultural commodities would seriously disrupt the economy of the country and the only logical answer is immediate initiation of the rehabilitation and reconstruction program which would provide employment for at least some of these people.

Any grant emergency assistance provided to Haiti must be strictly conditioned on effective utilization of the Country's own resources and anticipated borrowing capacity. The need is so urgent, however, that the provision of emergency economic assistance should not be delayed until the final decision is made on loans. Instead, such assistance should be made available immediately on the basis of written undertakings by the Government and funds then progressively made available as the Government performs pursuant to its undertakings.

The administration of a program of this kind would be most difficult under conditions existing in Haiti, but the fact that the Acting Mission Director, Stanly Baranson, was able by standing firm to get the Government to distribute the emergency food supplies honestly and effectively is at least some evidence that it could succeed.

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND HONDURAS[1]

The Ambassador in Honduras (Erwin) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL TEGUCIGALPA, April 24, 1952.
No. 650

Ref: Policy Guidance of March 5, 1952[1] to TCA Country Director from Acting Administrator, TCA.

Subject: Comment on Policy Guidance Regarding Labor and Manpower Aspects of TCA Program.

The policy guidance under reference states the policy of the Point Four Program to encourage countries to establish fair labor standards and to develop free labor union movements as collective bargaining agencies. The legislative and administrative aims described in the memorandum are commendable and obviously worthwhile, and they will be borne in mind in carrying out the technical assistance program in Honduras. It is readily perceived that guidance can be offered and given in several labor fields. Industrial training and apprenticeship, for example, offers many opportunities. Point Four will likewise be able to do useful work in labor market analysis, migration, labor statistics and possibly in advising with respect to the establishing of the labor bureau. The importance of labor in accomplishing the ends of the Point

[1] Not printed (MSA–FOA Director's Files, FRC 56 A 632).

Four Program is fully realized by the Embassy and the Country Director in Honduras.

The Embassy would be considerably less than forthright if it left the impression that the Point Four Program here can actively engage in labor propaganda with any hope of success. The scope within which the Point Four Program will have to work in labor affairs will be circumscribed for a long time to come. Although United States Point Four participants are not overlooking the significance of labor in overall planning at this stage, they are aware of its limitations and dangers and particularly of the necessity of proceeding slowly and cautiously.

Honduras is aware of the need for labor legislation. During the last year several labor measures have been passed. Labor legislation was included in a revision of the mining code and in the aviation law; a workmen's compensation act and a women's and children's labor act has been enacted; a labor bureau is to be established. But Honduran development in social welfare compares roughly to that in the United States at about the turn of the century. The help which the United States offers in the labor field must be gauged to this development. To appear to force labor legislation or unions upon Honduras will be regarded as intervening in domestic politics.

The visit of Serafino Romualdi of the American Federation of Labor in 1950 caused trepidation in Government circles. The activities of Argentine labor attachés are resented by the Government. Open advocacy of labor unions by the Embassy will be greeted by the Government with a coolness which will freeze the whole technical assistance program—if indeed it did not result in the whole "kit and kaboodle" of Point Four Experts being declared persona non grata. The Government, for example, has objected to reduction from nine to eight hours of Health and Sanitation programs of IIAA.

Advocacy of unions and labor legislation by the Embassy will be resented by business. The suggestion of C(9) that Point Four people should urge American business to improve labor standards is a thorny proposition. The Embassy's first reaction is that since the labor policy of most large enterprises in Honduras is established by the American headquarters of such corporations as the United Fruit Company, the Standard Fruit and Steamship Company, the New York and Honduras Rosario Mining Company, the Pan American Airways and others, it would be more practicable to begin the suggested campaign of education at the source.

The principal mines in Honduras have been established upon a basis of cheap labor. Every suggestion that labor unions in the mines would be a good thing is met with derision and anger. The Embassy's perception of the need for the improvement of the labor position as a counterweight to Communist propaganda, when communicated to private companies is not readily understood or accepted. As long as the Embassy has to work with such enterprises, it cannot directly aid and abet their unionization. It is much the same with all American enterprises here. Two years ago one of the fruit companies discharged several men for organizing the machine shop. An Embassy employee's suggestion that organization might have been desirable immediately put the adviser under suspicion. Not long ago TACA Honduras, an American controlled company, discharged two employees for agitating for wage increases.

The American companies doing business in Honduras are the backbone of the Honduran economy. They can, with justification, point out that the working conditions of their Honduran employees is much better than that of Honduran workmen in general. The fruit companies, the airlines and the petroleum distributors all pay higher wages and provide more workmen's benefits than Honduran employers. Bearing this in mind, they can quite honestly state that they are the vanguard with respect to social welfare benefits and that without attempting to move too rapidly they are already showing the way to the local Government and local enterprises with respect to workmen's benefits. Sincerely believing that they are benevolently conferring upon Honduran labor advantages and compensations which it would not otherwise receive, these companies could with justification object to United States Government employees' gratuitous attempts to advance social improvements rapidly for these companies strongly feel that Honduran labor is not yet prepared.

Labor is a controversial political matter. Bearing this forever in mind, the Embassy will not overlook its significance in the Point Four Program. As the Department and other end-using agencies in Washington are fully aware, this Embassy has the sympathetic interest of Honduran labor at heart. It has frequently expressed its attitude on this subject in labor reports during the last four years.

Memorandum by Gordon S. Reid of the Office of Middle American Affairs to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 12, 1953.

In view of my forthcoming departure after six years as desk officer, it appears reasonable to set forth some information about Honduras for the benefit of those who will be here after I leave.

---

[1] Addressed also to Special Assistant to Assistant Secretary Woodward, Deputy Director of the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs Neal, and Officer in Charge of Central America and Panama Affairs Leddy.

In early 1947, a telegram[2] was received in the Department which described Honduras as being a "paradise" in the midst of a world of tension and uneasiness. For months thereafter, Honduras was known as the "paradise of the Western world" and this joke became more and more a facetious description of the events in that country. At that time it was still under the dictatorship of Carias[3] who, admittedly, reigned as a beneficial and austere tyrant for sixteen years. His regime brought certain benefits to the country which fell into two main categories, political peace and financial rehabilitation. Honduras has had 116 presidents in 120 years and its external debts, when Carias took office, amounted to around $11 million and its internal debt amounted to about $36 million. However, the cost to Honduras for his regime was not only in the loss of civil rights for the entire population, but also in the shutting off of the country to progress and development. Until 1943, Carias built no roads, maintained his social welfare program at the lowest possible level, and lived primarily on proceeds derived by yearly agreements with the United Fruit Company, Standard Fruit Company, and the New York & Honduras Rosario Mining Company.

In foreign affairs, Honduras maintained a policy of strict neutrality and its army was maintained at about 6,000 men some of whom actually showed up for roll calls, barracks duty and other normal military services. The political hangers-on around Carias devoted most of their attentions to grafting and the Comandantes of the provinces were strong-arm men known to be loyal to Carias.

It is my personal opinion that a part of the trouble now facing the American companies arose from the feeling of security and stability resulting from Carias' policies. They lulled themselves into a belief that Honduras would never change and that their activities were above reproach. During these years, many Hondurans departed in self-imposed exile and came to the United States where they went through school and college and, in some cases, became United States citizens. A smaller number in late years became infatuated with the social experiments in Guatemala and one became the secretary to President Arbenz.

This "paradise" was, therefore, misleading and our Embassy during those years did nothing to look beneath the surface.

[2] Not identified.

[3] Tiburcio Carías Andino ruled Honduras from 1933 to 1949.

Part II

At present the "paradise" has disappeared. With the inauguration of Galvez[4] in 1949, civil rights returned to Honduras and with them came a return of many of those who had been in exile. No political party activities occurred until 1952 when the climate began to warm up for the elections to be held in 1954. Under the Honduran Constitution, a candidate for a party cannot begin his campaigning until one year prior to the election. The Galvezistas, all normally members of the Nationalist Party, began to put pressure on President Galvez to run for office again. The President resisted this pressure and in various statements assured the country that the constitutional requirement that no man succeed himself would be followed. However, after increasing pressure, the National Reform Party was established. It is sponsoring a constitutional amendment to allow Galvez to run again. In the last few months he has made no efforts to stop the activities of this group and it would appear that he is now willing to be reelected.

This action would appear to be about to cause a split between Carias and Galvez and it would also appear that an important, new party has been established in Honduras. The Nationalist Party, headed by Carias, will have to seek a candidate. While they may rely on Carias, it is unlikely that he would again be a candidate at the age of 78. For the future it would appear that a great deal of turmoil will take place and that a dangerous split may arise during the electoral campaign. The bitter feelings engendered might be a forerunner of longtime trouble in Honduras. In the event of Galvez running for reelection against either Carias or another candidate of the Nationalist Party it is very likely that a reasonably honest election would occur and it now appears equally certain that Galvez would win easily.

Philosophically, there is little difference between Galvez and Carias in theory, but in practice Galvez is a much more liberal person, devoted to the rights of the population and abler in the development of his country economically. Both are anti-communists and both fear Guatemalan impingement on Honduran territory and life. The nationalistic trend shown under Galvez would probably continue under Carias, but the American companies would probably once again be able to make "special arrangements" with a Carias government which they could not make, and have not been able to make, with Galvez. The weaknesses of the Galvez regime are obvious. Mainly they are that he relies to a large extent on Ministers who are not experts in their fields and who are easily swayed by nationalistic arguments.

[4] Juan Manuel Gálvez.

The third party in Honduras' political life is the Liberal Party. This party is suffering a period of doldrums resulting primarily from a loss of leadership and its revolutionary tendencies during the Carias regime. It has no real hope in the near future and would probably join with the Reformed Party in reelecting Galvez.

Part III

Financially, Honduras is in excellent condition. Galvez devoted the first year and a half of his term to paying off the last of the external debt and today Honduras owes no bondholders or bankers anywhere in the world. Its internal debt has been cut to $8 million which is well within its ability to service. Dollar reserves now stand at $27 million and each year the budget has shown a surplus averaging about $1,500,000. This type of unbalanced budget would appear to give Honduras a fine place in international credit.

The economic development of the country has progressed under Decrees No. 104 and 105 of April, 1950, which set up an orderly plan for development and one within the Honduran's ability to absorb. Roads have been opened and are being opened. Port development is under consideration and first changes in the reorganization of the government are underway. In cooperation with the Point Four Program of the United States, developmental activities in agriculture, public health, education, and government services are moving ahead. From the beginning of these programs a coordinating committee was established and as a result duplication of effort after the first few months has been unknown in Honduras. United Nations technical assistance has been very limited and is not considered a problem at the present time.

The Honduran policy is to avoid seeking loans for the development work and to set aside a part of the budget each year to accomplish the purposes for which a loan would cover. The Galvez Government may be criticized by Hondurans for slowness in its development program, but it would appear that their approach is a more thoughtful one than is usually found in the Central American countries.

While economic nationalism has grown in Honduras during the last four years, it is not unexpected since a country which had for sixteen years found itself at the mercy of the Carias regime; and special arrangements with American companies, is to be expected to confuse license with freedom. Until the commercial laws of Honduras are revised and the tax laws reviewed, Honduras cannot be said to be a safe place for American investment except under the strictest terms and understandings. While the American companies have complained that their treatment is not as good as under Carias, nevertheless, their profits indicate that they are not suffering so bitterly as they might like the public to believe.

Part IV

In foreign affairs, the Galvez regime has maintained the Carias policy of neutrality in all Central American matters. At the same time it has joined ODECA, joined U.N. agencies, and has been reasonably firm with Guatemala.

Galvez reduced the Army to 2,600 persons all of whom are supposedly actually on duty and of that group a 400-man battalion is under training by a United States Military Mission. At the same time, a small United States Air Force Mission is training the small Honduran Air Force. The Honduran Government has just recently purchased $492,000 worth of military equipment in the United States and from time to time purchases airplane equipment.

A policy of neutrality is so deeply ingrained in Honduras that it is very difficult to get the Hondurans to participate actively in any multilateral organization where commitments for the future are being made. As a result, it is usually necessary for an education job to be done by our Embassy before Honduras will, with any enthusiasm, join in an international effort.

Part V

General Carias is 78 years old, 6 ft. 4 in., weighs about 260 lbs., and is noted for his mustache and his hulking shoulders. He is a quiet and reserved man with little or no humor and as the years have gone on he has tended to be more and more pleased with his position as an elder statesman of Central America.

President Galvez is a charming six footer with a rather sad face but a person of great good humor and intelligence. He was at one time a lawyer for the United Fruit Company and he has had to live down that part of his career. He is vigorous, stomach ulcerish and has, reputedly, bad kidneys. He is approximately 55 years old. He is the father of two sons both of whom reside in Honduras; and Roberto is the Chief of Civil Aviation. . . .

Julio Lozano is the Vice President of Honduras, Minister of Justice, Minister of Fomento, Minister of Labor, and a leading businessman. He is about 65 years old; is considered to be the strong man in the Administration, and Galvez defers to him in matters of economic policy but not on matters involving civil rights. Lozano is an extreme conservative, partially anti-U.S., and given to terrible temper tantrums during which he always resigns. Galvez lets him cool off and then sends his letter of resignation back to him. His presidential ambitions seemed to have been quashed for the moment and perhaps for always since he has never been a popular person and is likely to receive the candidacy only by extra pressure from either Galvez or Carias.

Section[5] VI—Outstanding Problems

1. Inter-American Highway Agreement.

Honduras has never ratified the Inter-American Highway agreement and has stated as its reason that the highway does not run through Tegucigalpa. It is anticipated that when the connecting road is finally built Honduras will probably sign the agreement

2. Economic Nationalism Affecting American Interests.

This situation has become more and more of a problem in recent years and is one which will have to be followed very closely by the Department and our Embassy in that country. It is my opinion that the Embassy could do more in the way of discussing these problems with officials of the Government and by that effort perhaps mitigate some of the nationalistic measures now under consideration.

3. Strengthening Honduras' Anti-Communist Position and its Ability to Withstand Communist Propaganda and Infiltration.

This speaks for itself and again requires an Embassy made up of officers able to be persuasive along these lines.

Section VII

At the present time we have a Consulate at San Pedro Sula on the north coast of Honduras serving the largest commercial city in the country and one growing more rapidly than any other. It is the communication hub of the area and it is in this area where communist seepage will be probably the greatest. It is my belief that the Consul-in-Charge, Mr. Pedersen,[6] has done a very good job and my only comment would be that his reports be sent directly to the Department instead of through the Embassy in Tegucigalpa.

Our Embassy in Tegucigalpa is not competently manned at the present time and is, therefore, becoming more and more unable to handle the problems enumerated above. Mr. Erwin was the originator of the "paradise" theory and firmly believes that by saying and doing nothing, his "paradise" may be maintained. While he has a very large knowledge of Honduras, and is popular with almost all Hondurans and many Americans, his administration of the Embassy and his activities regarding United States problems have not in my mind been satisfactory. During the interim period of five years when he was out of office,

[5] At this point in the source text, the drafter began using the word "Section" to denote portions of the memorandum.

[6] Alfred J. Pedersen.

Ambassador Daniels,[7] Ambassador Bursley,[8] and Byron Blankinship[9] demonstrated that Hondurans are as much receptive to persuasion and to education as are any other citizens and that major successes in policy could be achieved by some hard work. It is my belief that without a change in Ambassadors, and probably changes in the staff, no adequate representation in Tegucigalpa is possible.

Section VIII

If one believes that a "paradise" is not possible in Honduras at the present time it is necessary to think ahead to what may be forthcoming in that country. In my mind, Honduras is awakening from a long sleep and is beginning to understand that it has potentialities not yet exploited. I am fearful of the weaknesses of its Foreign Minister and its general tendencies to believe that one can live with communism on an equal basis. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that the job ahead for the United States is to protect our citizens from economic nationalism, communist infiltration in the form of men and ideas and, lastly, to preach the importance of emphasizing that Honduras is part of an area of major interest to the United States where communism must be faced and defeated.

[9]Between 1947 and 1952, Mr. Blankinship served as Second Secretary and then First Secretary of the Embassy in Honduras.

Editorial Note

On December 9, 1953, President Eisenhower authorized the initiation of negotiations with Honduras for the purpose of concluding a bilateral military assistance agreement. Representatives of the United States and Honduras undertook preliminary conversations during the early part of 1954; formal negotiations began on May 17, 1954. Pertinent documents are contained in Department of State file 715.5 MSP for 1954. A Military Assistance Agreement was signed at Tegucigalpa, May 20, 1954, and entered into force on the same date; for text, see TIAS No. 2975, or 5 UST 843.

Concurrent with the negotiations for the Military Assistance Agreement, representatives of the United States and Honduras negotiated a related bilateral military plan. The "Plan of the Governments of Honduras and the United States of America for Their Common Defense," initialed at Tegucigalpa, May 20, 1954, was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 505, from Tegucigalpa, dated June 2, 1954 (715.5 MSP/6–254).

715.5 MSP/1–554

The Officer in Charge of Central America and Panama Affairs (Leddy) to the Ambassador in Honduras (Erwin)

CONFIDENTIAL
OFFICIAL–INFORMAL

[WASHINGTON,] January 5, 1954.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: An important part of the problem created by Communist influence in Guatemala is the need to strengthen other Central American countries economically so as to increase their capacity of resistance to subversive infiltration. We have long been in total agreement with this principle, and taken many steps to implement broad programs in Honduras. At the present time, we are faced with a review of possibilities for enlarging and making more effective such programs in the economic sphere.

It is natural to think of TCA as the existing organization to carry out these objectives. The Department desires, however, to consult with you informally in order to obtain your advice as to specific lines along which we could propose increases to the present TCA program, on a significant scale. The subject of Honduran economic needs has received study by various agencies. What is now desired is an expression of your views, based on the overall picture which you have seen from your own observation and experience.

As a concrete suggestion, it appears to me that the road construction would probably be the primary channel of increased assistance. No industrial development appears feasible, and the field of technical assistance seems limited necessarily to agriculture, public health, education and government service. TCA has proposed a budget for fiscal year 1955 at $1,048,200 as against the 1954 budget of $855,900; and a corresponding increase to 38 American technicians as against 29. This does not represent an increase on the visible scale which is an objective of the present inquiry.

I hesitate to propose any precise project but in discussions here have come across the following possibilities: (1) aid in present construction of a highway from Tegucigalpa to a junction with the Inter-American Highway at Jicaro Galan on the western coast; failure to route the Inter-American to the capital city has so far blocked Honduran accession to the Inter-American Highway Agreement, so that aid on the present job might bring Honduras into the fold on this project. (2) Aid on the proposed road from Salvadoran border near Nueva Ocotepeque in Honduras to Santa Rosa de Copan, present terminus of the Honduran Western Highway, to provide a western road link with Puerto Cortes. In addition, it might be possible to interest El Salvador in extension of the road across the border and to run on to the Pacific side, so as to provide a cross-isthmus highway.

It is my understanding that President Galvez has been interested in the Western Highway. This might be a factor assuring Honduran cooperation on any extensive assistance the United States might be able to offer, which is now purely tentative.

As you will see from the foregoing, the purpose is not only to produce results economically beneficial to Honduras, but of such significance and tangible proportions as to be noteworthy by Guatemala. I have been directed to present this inquiry to you in these broad terms in the hope that your own observations and experience, as well as those of your staff, might be synthesized for suitable presentation by the Department. Any enlarged program of economic assistance will of course require substantial special appropriations, probably apart from TCA. If the Embassy should recommend specifically what projects might be undertaken by Honduras with United States financial assistance, with as exact as possible an estimate of the cost involved, the Department would be able to work out a "package plan" when, in the near future, an opportunity may arise for a high level review of our Central American problems.[1]

Sincerely yours, RAYMOND G. LEDDY

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President[1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, May 11, 1954.

Subject: Unsettled Labor and Political Conditions in Honduras

In view of the serious situation developing in northern Honduras and the implication of possible action by the United States, I thought it important that you receive a brief report on the area.

An estimated fourteen thousand United Fruit Company employees in Honduras went out on a general strike on May 5 demanding a fifty percent wage increase. The strikers are excellently organized, still avoiding violence, but massing in focal spots in the banana-growing area. The Honduran Minister of the Interior has strongly recommended to the President of Honduras an immediate declaration of martial law in the affected areas.

Concurrently there have been reports of suspicious movements of planes and men from Guatemala. A Guatemalan plane arrived in the area on May 1 without clearances and was detained. The Guatemalan Ambassador protested the detention of the plane and justified its sudden arrival by alleging that Guatemalan authorities are expecting an armed attack to be led by an exiled Guatemalan from Honduras and had felt the need to communicate urgently with its Consulate in Puerto Cortes. Following this, the Honduran Government considered closing the Guatemalan Consulate at Puerto Cortes and declared two Guatemalan representatives persona non grata.

Our Embassy in Tegucigalpa is watching the situation carefully, especially for any evidence of possible movements from Guatemala. In accordance with arrangements which have been developing for some time, negotiations between the United States and Honduras for a grant-aid bilateral military assistance agreement are scheduled to begin on May 17.

At the request of the Department of State, the Department of Defense is preparing a plan which might be put into effect for providing direct military assistance to Honduras, in the event that Government requests such assistance from the United States under Article 3 of the Rio Treaty[2] and also in the event that the United States Government is satisfied that there is conclusive evidence that Honduras is being subjected to an armed attack by Guatemala or any other State.[3]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 17, 1954.

Subject: Your question as to mechanism for informing other American Governments and obtaining advance approval of action we might take in case Honduras should call on us for aid under the Rio Treaty against armed intervention by Guatemala.

Under Article 3 of the Rio Treaty, the signatories are obligated to give immediate assistance to any State directly subjected to an armed attack. Thus, if such an attack occurs, and the attacked State requests assistance, the signatory states have in principle approved action in advance. In such a case, the Organ of Consultation meets "without delay" to examine the measures taken and determine whether others should be agreed upon.

In the absence of invocation of the Rio Treaty, there is no formal mechanism for consultation under it. However, informal exchange of information with the Parties to the Treaty is not only possible but generally desirable.

Advance information to other Parties to the Treaty of an intention on our part to provide military assistance in the event of an armed attack would create a precedent which might well create subsequent difficulties. Request for advance commitment for such assistance has, for example, long been an aspiration of the Uruguayan Government. However, we are informing other Parties to the Treaty of the seriousness with which we view the developments in Honduras and of the fact that we are following them closely in the light of inter-American treaty commitments, and in close consultation with the Honduran Government.

Holland spoke with Montgomery[2] fifth (urtel 419, June 4)[3] on basis Department's interest in strike settlement as essential to Central American stability in face of Guatemalan Communist threat (and possible OAS consultation) and your estimate anti-Communist leaders would benefit from higher UFCO pay scale than Standard's. Montgomery last night reported, after phoning Turnbull[4] La Lima, UFCO's offer 19%, 10% and 5% increases (which he said with added fringe benefits are substantially better than Standard's) likely be accepted and strike ended by ninth, but today UFCO not so optimistic due to another change in strike leadership midnight; that Bishop Capdevilla persevering in attempt get strikers accept above offer today, which offer UFCO would explain in flysheets, encouraging return to work which believed wanted by many employees. Holland gave Montgomery positive lines on back-to-work movement and impressed our serious concern strike continuance.

In continuing your close contact with officials UFCO and Govt, you should without intervening in specific issues discreetly exert influence on both toward prompt settlement on enduring basis, making clear to Galvez that we regard Honduran internal stability most desirable before OAS meeting. TEGUCIGALPA, June 30, 1954.

DEAR GENERAL: Thanks for your letter of June 26.[2]

At the time of writing this it looks like the Guatemalan problem is all over but the shouting, plus some political maneuvering which is supposed to start today in San Salvador between Castillo Armas and the most recent Junta of Guatemalans who succeeded Arbenz.

For a while it was a very close thing but as you can expect, air power did the trick. In fact, it looks to me from what I know of the situation that about three P–47s and half dozen Cessnas which bombed by dropping blocks of dynamite (attached to hand grenades) did it.

Now if we can settle the Communist-inspired United Fruit Company strike here in Honduras maybe I can get away and have a chance to see you. Things have been mighty active here with a series of 48-hour days.[3]

This has to be all for now.

My very best to you and Anna in which Louise joins me.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Ambassador in Honduras (Willauer)[1]

SECRET OFFICIAL–INFORMAL [WASHINGTON,] July 16, 1954.

DEAR WHITEY: I am devoting this letter wholly to the subject of additional military equipment which you desire be added to the grant military assistance program we are conducting for Honduras. I have requested that answers be obtained to the other questions raised in your letter of June 7, 1954[2] and will send them to you as soon as they become available.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Spencer.

[2] Not found in Department of State files.

We are awaiting a formal response from the Pentagon to your despatches Nos. 515[3] and 517[4] which recommended: (a) that the Honduran Army unit being provided with grant assistance be activated by early September; (b) that in order to accomplish activation by that date, Honduras be provided additional equipment, such as tentage, building hardware, transportation equipment, etc., which was not originally planned for the Honduran program; and (c) that four C–47 aircraft be included in the program and delivered at an early date. A copy of your despatch No. 551,[5] reiterating your earlier recommendation that Honduras be supplied with four C–47 aircraft and requesting that Honduras be provided 28 additional planes, has also been forwarded to the Pentagon. Yesterday we were told that we could expect to receive a Pentagon reply within the next few days. However, from the information provided us orally, I am sure that the Pentagon response will be negative. Some of the problems which make a favorable response to your recommendations difficult are enumerated below.

First, most of the items requested in your despatch No. 515, such as tentage, building hardware, etc., fall in the category of material defined as "defense support". The criteria used by the Joint Chiefs of Staff for determining types of military assistance which should be provided to foreign governments does not permit the provision of "defense support" items except in very exceptional circumstances. The theory is that such items, although they have a military application, are procurable from commerical sources. There are cases, such as Indo-China, Formosa, Greece and Turkey where we are providing defense support, but in each case separate funds for assistance must be obtained each year from the Congress.

Secondly, we have been advised informally by the Pentagon that the U.S. Air Force has no available C–47 or B–25 aircraft and that the only F4U–4's in the possession of the Department of the Navy are those which are now being used by naval reserve units.

Even if all of the aircraft recommended in your despatch No. 551 could be made available—and our understanding is that they cannot—the total estimated cost of providing them to Honduras, according to the Pentagon, would be at the very minimum about $1½ million. Funds appropriated for the Latin American program to date are insufficient to absorb an increase of that amount. The grant assistance program for Latin America has been justified to the Congress as a program which can be carried out in its entirety with approximately $100 million, and slightly more than that amount already has been appropriated to date. We are using this relatively small amount of money to provide assistance to ten Latin American countries, with some expectation that programs for El Salvador and Haiti may be commenced this year. The Congress is being requested to appropriate $13 million for FY 1955, but virtually all of these funds have been earmarked by the Pentagon for spare parts and training.

In addition to the practical difficulties enumerated above, there are important considerations of a policy nature which would make it difficult to comply with the Honduran request. All of the programs we are conducting in Latin America are based on the principle that mutual defense assistance funds shall be devoted exclusively to assisting the other governments to activate units which they have agreed to prepare for hemisphere defense missions specified in secret bilateral military plans with the U.S. The Joint Chiefs of Staff in each case determined the type of foreign military units which would be useful to U.S. military forces engaged in the defense of the Caribbean area in time of war and defined the hemisphere defense mission which each unit should perform. For example, the secret military plan concluded with Honduras specifies that the Honduran infantry battalion will be activated for the purpose of assisting the U.S. to "protect the Panama Canal and the sea and air communications in the Caribbean Sea excluding the territorial rights of other countries". I realize that it is somewhat theoretical to expect a country such as Honduras, which has military forces barely sufficient to maintain internal order during an emergency, to provide material assistance to U.S. military forces engaged in defense of the hemisphere during an emergency. In fact, the Pentagon for a number of months strongly resisted our efforts to induce it to develop a hemisphere defense mission for Honduras, largely on the ground that Honduras, with limited U.S. assistance, would not be able to perform a hemisphere defense role. However, the Pentagon, after much urging on our part that a program would be desirable for political and psychological reasons, taking into account our objectives in Guatemala, finally did develop a hemisphere defense mission for Honduras and thus make that country eligible for grant assistance. To alter the basic concept underlying the Honduran program would require a decision at the very highest level of the government through some instrumentality such as the National Security Council. Moreover, it would be difficult to justify a change in the concept underlying the Honduran program without at the same time justifying a change in the concept underlying other Latin American programs, particularly in those cases where the armed forces of the other country are not as well oriented or equipped as they might be to meet the threat of subversion from within.

I believe it is clear from the foregoing that in order to comply with the Honduran request it would be necessary to urge the Pentagon to accord Honduras extremely exceptional treatment all along the line, treatment which would require justification in the strongest terms to the Department of Defense, the NSC and the Congress. I am inclined to believe that such an effort, even if it had a chance of success, would not be warranted, particularly in view of the fact that the threat of aggression against Honduras has been very substantially reduced by the coming into power of an anti-communist regime in Guatemala.

I can appreciate what I take to be your basic position, namely, that by devoting additional funds to the Honduran program, compared with the vast amounts we are spending on military assistance world-wide, we might come very close to assuring ourselves that subversion, wherever it might appear, in Honduras, would be repressed effectively with armed force. However, our widely spread security commitments throughout the world have necessarily limited the nature and size of the Latin American program. In this connection, for example, the 32 aircraft requested for Honduras would represent almost one quarter of the total number of aircraft being provided to Latin American countries in the entire regional program. Moreover, we are providing no country in the program with as many as 34 aircraft. Brazil, for example, is receiving only 30.

Perhaps we can discuss this and other problems of mutual concern more fully during your visit here later this month.

Sincerely, HENRY F. HOLLAND

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 10, 1954.

DEAR MR. HENSEL: Since the conclusion of a bilateral military assistance agreement between the United States and Honduras on May 20, 1954, the Government of Honduras has been the recipient of grant military assistance furnished under the provisions of Section 401 of the Mutual Security Act of 1949,[2] as amended. According to the secret bilateral military plan, signed by United States and Honduran military representatives, and according to a letter of November 25, 1953,[3] from the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs[4] to the Secretary of State, grant military assistance provided Honduras is being furnished for the purpose of assisting that country to prepare one infantry battalion for a hemisphere defense mission developed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and defined in the bilateral military plan.

After a careful on-the-scene study of Honduran army capability for developing an infantry battalion and using it in the performance of a hemisphere defense mission, the Acting Chief of the Military Assistance Advisory Group assigned to Honduras and the United States Ambassador are strongly of the opinion that such a unit would be unable to perform effectively and expeditiously any type of a military mission requiring the rapid movement of battalion troops and equipment from Tegucigalpa, the capital of Honduras, without military aircraft, which are not at present planned for inclusion in the program. The Ambassador and Acting Chief of the MAAG have pointed out that lack of accessible roads leading from the frontiers of Honduras to Tegucigalpa, where the battalion is stationed, would make it difficult, if not impossible, to move the battalion expeditiously by land to a number of locations outside and within Honduras where the battalion might be required to perform a defense mission. According to the Ambassador, the Acting Chief of MAAG is of the opinion that the minimum number of planes required to give the infantry battalion necessary mobility would be two C–47 aircraft. The Department of State is of the opinion that communist activity within Honduras, which has recently been manifested in labor strikes and riots, and that other types of communist activity in the Central American area, pose a threat to the stability of the present Honduran Government. It is of overriding political importance to the interest of the United States that such disturbances be prevented at this time. In the event of a communist inspired emergency within Honduras, the Department of State believes that it might be necessary to consider the desirability of permitting the Honduran army battalion to be used for resisting communist subversion, which is not, of course, the specific purpose for which the unit is being developed. It is conceivable that a type of emergency dictating such a course of action might arise during the Honduran national elections, which are to be held October 10, 1954.

In view of the considerations mentioned above, which are in part political, the Department of State strongly recommends that the necessary C–47 aircraft be added to the grant military assistance program to provide the Honduran army battalion the capability for rapid movement, and that the aircraft be delivered to Honduras at a date as far in advance of the Honduran national elections as possible. The Department of State recommends that, if necessary, appropriated funds required to include the planes in the Honduran program be made available by means of small adjustments in other Latin American country programs.

Sincerely yours, ROBERT MURPHY

Subject: Honduran Electoral Situation.

Until this morning it appeared likely that a coalition would be formed between Reformists and Liberals. This is the latest in a series of possible coalitions which I have been actively encouraging in an attempt to prevent serious troubles concurrent with or after the October 10 Presidential and Congressional elections in Honduras. As of the moment negotiations have completely broken down but the on-again-off-again history of the last few weeks makes it possible to continue to have some hope, although I must admit that my hopes are currently at their lowest ebb.

The Carías Nationalists, the Williams[4] Reformists and the Villeda Morales[5] Liberals for the moment seem determined to proceed to the elections without coalition. Almost all Honduran and dipomatic sources continue prophesies of serious trouble. These range in degree of gloom from creation of the groundwork for a Guatemala-type ultimate Communist domination, through a Galvez "golpe de estado", to armed uprising by dissident Cariistas or Liberals or at the very least a chaotic situation with bloodshed and general disruption of politics and economics. For reasons stated below I am personally becoming less pessimistic than the average opinion.

I have been extremely active along two lines: First, I have been privately propagandizing for peace, pointing out affirmatively the opportunities for Honduras' growth in a peaceful atmosphere and negatively, the dangers of a flight of capital which might possibly include a decrease of the fruit companies' operations and would certainly mean that the incoming regime would inherit a world of headaches. Second, I have had extensive and frequent personal and frank talks with all three candidates and the principal leaders of their parties. These men have sought my advice and good offices in discussing various forms of coalition. All of the foregoing has been done at the direct request of President Galvez and has been coordinated with him and Foreign Minister Valenzuela.[6] I believe that at the very least the net result of these efforts has been to decrease the likelihood of the most serious of the results prophesied above but my forecast for the future is still gloomy. The inherent selfishness of all three candidates and their cohorts and their very narrowness when it comes to considering their own political future makes the situation inherently one where a completely desirable result is impossible.

In exercising the influence of the United States in these discussions I am doing my utmost to conduct myself in a manner so that we can preserve sufficient good will among all political elements for the purpose of curative measures in any future troubles. I have been facilitated in this by having been called into negotiations involving every possible combination of coalition, and thus have prevented any truthful accusation of taking sides.

The latest possibility of a Reformist–Liberal coalition still appears the most likely of any but I repeat that the chances are not too good. The Reformists and Liberals are mainly kept apart by the personal stubbornness of candidates Williams and Villeda Morales and, indeed, all three candidates and their inner circles appear hypnotized by their own overstated predictions of sweeping success at the polls.

I believe most probably all three parties will go to to the polls and no party will achieve the absolute majority required by the Constitution. This will force the election into the new Congress which meets December 1. However, the Congress can only act if it has a two-thirds quorum. The decision before the Congress will be the choice of a President and Vice President from two out of the three candidates who poll the most popular votes. This requirement, plus the then known relative political power of the parties will tend to promote a coalition between the deputies representing the third candidate and one of the two other candidates. This will be especially true because the alternative to finding a quorum and deciding the matter in Congress is the choice of President by the Carías-dominated Supreme Court (presumably between the first and second place candidates) or Galvez' continuance in power. Galvez could possibly do this legally by declaring that the electoral laws prohibiting fraud, etc., had been violated.

Galvez is still privately considering a "golpe de estado" before or after the elections but he is personally profoundly averse to this course and will act only in the most extreme circumstances. I believe, however, that his continuance would receive great popular acceptance. Galvez, the man, as President would be more desirable than any of the other three candidates. However, his continuance would cause a period of uncertainty and of intense political activity before the permanent form of leadership could emerge. Thus, my preference is for a Reformist–Liberal merger. Among other things I feel that this would present the best possible climate for destruction of Communist elements. I believe this first because the Reformists and many good Liberal elements have avowed their intention to root out Communism and, second, because if the Liberal Party achieves partial participation in the Government it will be less likely to welcome Communist support than if it is left out in the cold completely.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, October 30, 1954.

DEAR MR. MURPHY: Reference is made to your letter dated 10 August 1954,[1] recommending additional grant military assistance of two (2) C–47 aircraft to Honduras.

I have not discussed this subject with Mr. Wilson but I have received the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff which follow:

"The Joint Chiefs of Staff, at the specific request of the Secretary of State and the Assistant to the Secretary of Defense (Special Operations) developed Western Hemisphere Defense missions for Honduras, El Salvador and Nicaragua for political and not military reasons. The basic purpose at the time was to indicate to Guatemala that non-Communist governments could receive grant aid and thus support the anti-Communist elements in Guatemala. Since then Guatemala has changed her form of government.

"The United States does not have C–47 aircraft surplus to requirements. To provide these aircraft to Honduras would require their purchase in the open market or a reduction in our inventory. Costs for the two aircraft plus spare parts for one year are estimated to be between $200,000 and $300,000. With limited funds available, this expenditure would require a considerable revision in the programs of other Latin American countries.

"Increased aid to Honduras could set a precedent upon which Nicaragua might base requests for additional assistance. That country is developing an infantry battalion with grant military assistance and can also claim the necessity for increased mobility. Similar requests could be expected from other Latin American countries for political purposes and such requests could cause embarrassment to the United States should a precedent be established in Honduras.

"The Joint Chiefs of Staff believe that specific tasks which Honduras could perform effectively would be of negligible military value to Western Hemisphere defense and do not justify further expenditures.

[1] Ante, p. 1311.

"In view of the above considerations and from a military point of view, the Joint Chiefs of Staff do not recommend providing Honduras with two C–47 aircraft."

I fully support the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and do not recommend providing two (2) C–47 aircraft to Honduras, however, if you desire I am willing to discuss this subject further.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Middle American Affairs (Newbegin) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)[1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 12, 1954.

Subject: United States Policy in Connection with Honduran Elections

Discussion

Ambassador Willauer has returned to Washington to present his views on the political situation in Honduras and to participate in a reconsideration of our policy regarding the elections. Ambassador Willauer believes the United States policy should be:

A. To encourage the formation of a coalition government in Honduras with substantial Liberal party representation. If absolutely necessary, the Ambassador suggests that he might have to participate with the Ambassadors of other Central American countries in witnessing any agreement for a coalition.

Ambassador Willauer says that he would do this only after failure of an attempt to get the Papal Nuncio or the other Central American Ambassadors to guarantee the coalition by themselves had failed.

B. In the event that it is impossible to work out a coalition government, the Ambassador proposes that he be authorized by the Department to indicate to Galvez in the most discreet manner possible that the United States would view with favor his continuance in office for a year or two. This would avoid the chaotic situation which in the Ambassador's opinion would certainly result from the emergence of Carias as President without the restraining influence of a strong Liberal representation in his government or which would also result from the election of Villeda and his party.

Ambassador Willauer points out that there is already substantial public support for Galvez continuing in power. There is reason to believe Carias woud accept such a development. Williams, of course, would be delighted since it would give him another chance to run for President. Surprisingly, Villeda Morales and the Liberal party are reluctant to agree to any coalition or to Galvez continuing in power. Villeda has the idea that he alone is the properly elected President of Honduras.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Newbegin.

Recommendation

A. The Ambassador should not be a witness to any election arrangement in Honduras. This would be interpreted as our guaranteeing the arrangement and as undertaking an obligation which we would not be able to enforce if one party should back out. Moreover, such an action would create a precedent for similar action or request for action in other Central American countries.

B. It is further recommended that the Ambassador should not, officially or unofficially, seek to influence a coalition of parties, or the continuation of Galvez in the Presidency, as a solution for the political impasse now existing in Honduras but should leave this problem to the Hondurans to resolve by themselves. However, should the Ambassador be asked by President Galvez for an expression of the attitude of the United States toward his continuing in office as President, the Ambassador should indicate that we have had and would continue to have a high regard for the President's administration and would cooperate with him in the future in the same degree as in the past.

Finally, it does not seem either possible or desirable for us to try to evolve a fixed detailed policy with regard to the Honduran political situation at this time. That situation is fluid and subject to change at any moment. We should not set a course which will prevent us from taking advantage of any change that may occur.[2]

A memorandum by Deputy Assistant Secretary Woodward to Assistant Secretary Holland, dated Oct. 26, 1954, reads as follows: "I recommend that, when you see Ambassador Willauer, you caution him to be very careful with respect to internal political maneuvering in Honduras and not consider any further use of the concrete persuasion except in the most extreme circumstances." Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Sparks) to the Deputy Under Secretary of State (Murphy)[1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 18, 1954.

Subject: Political Situation in Honduras

The purpose of the meeting scheduled for 3:00 PM this afternoon at the request of Assistant Secretary Holland is to review our policy in Honduras with respect to the electoral situation in that country.

The essential factors in it are as follows: None of the three parties—National candidate, former President Carias 1932–48; Reformist (an offshoot of the Nationalist party) candidate Williams; or

[1]Drafted by Mr. Newbegin.

Liberal candidate Villeda Morales, received a majority in the final count of the ballots in the popular election of October 10, 1954; the result was 48% for Liberals, 31% for Nationalists, 21% for Reformists. Some responsible observers in Honduras consider that the Liberals did in fact have such a majority but were deprived of it through fraud.

In accordance with the Constitution it now devolves on the Congress in its session beginning December 5 to elect the President from the two leading candidates, Villeda Morales and Carias. While decision in the Congress (56 members) is by majority vote (29), a quorum of two-thirds (38) of the members must be present but there is no assurance that a quorum will be present on December 5. The present Congressional line-up is Liberals 23, Nationalists 22, Reformists 11. Failure of the Congress to act would normally throw the election to the Supreme Court which is believed to be controlled by Carias. The usual Latin American maneuvers and counter-maneuvers are taking place and unless some satisfactory solution is found (presumably based on a coalition) the situation may possibly degenerate into disorder and even into civil war. There is also the possibility that Galvez will take steps to remain in office in the event that a meeting of Congress is not held.

The main U.S. interest is to combat any possible increase in communist influence. Admittedly, our intelligence on communism and communist activity is inadequate. Admittedly, also, such activity exists, although there is no Communist Party as such in Honduras. The election of the reactionary Carias may well tend to perpetuate the very conditions on which communism thrives. On the other hand, although Villeda Morales has publicly taken a position against communism he did not discourage communist support in his campaign and the Honduran communists are alleged to be concentrating their political activity in favor of the Liberal party, which has been out of power in Honduras for 22 years.

Ambassador Willauer has both before and since the elections inevitably been consulted by the various political groups, seeking advice and support. Implementing an OCB decision[2] . . . Ambassador Willauer before the elections endeavored to induce one of the three candidates to withdraw and to form a coalition. This endeavor failed. Ambassador Willauer has of course been accused of intervening in the domestic political situation and each party has endeavored to exploit Ambassador Willauer's action for its own ends.

ARA has concluded tentatively on the basis of information now available that it would be inadvisable at this time for the Ambassador to take any further action to influence a political decision in Honduras. Until some new development arises which clearly points to where our interest lies, we should let Hondurans solve their problem on their own. It was agreed that if President Galvez should inquire as to our attitude toward his remaining in office, Ambassador Willauer should state that the United States has a high regard for his past administration. President Galvez' ability to remain in office is open to some question, in that he has just left Honduras for Gorgas Hospital in Panama, possibly for other reasons than need for medical treatment.

Ambassador Willauer, though disagreeing, accepts ARA's decision on the basis of his own relative lack of experience in Latin America. In view of the above, Mr. Holland would appreciate an expression of your views.

Memorandum for the Files, by the Officer in Charge of Central America and Panama Affairs (Leddy)[1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 19, 1954.

Subject: United States Position on Electoral Crisis in Honduras

After Ambassador Willauer had the opportunity to review and discuss with Assistant Secretary Holland, Deputy Assistant Secretary Sparks, and Messrs. Newbegin, Leddy, and Ohmans of MID, the present electoral crisis in Honduras, which original discussion was held on November 11, 1954, the memorandum of decision dated November 12, 1954[2] was gone over by Ambassador Willauer with Messrs. Sparks, Newbegin, and Leddy on November 17. Ambassador Willauer stated that he disagreed with the conclusion but accepted the instruction, largely on the basis of his own comparative inexperience in Latin America. Having repeated on the same afternoon this view to Mr. Holland, the latter suggested that a review with Deputy Under Secretary Murphy might be useful to assure Ambassador Willauer of full consideration of his views, and this was arranged on the afternoon of November 18 in Mr. Murphy's office.

Ambassador Willauer restated his disagreement with the conclusion in the memorandum of November 12, and said he felt conditions called for stronger action. Mr. Murphy indicated he was not convinced that a case was made out for a different course, and Ambassador Willauer was invited by Mr. Murphy to express his recommendations on present action. Ambassador Willauer recommended that, if no authority is to be given him to take measures, at least it is desirable that . . . . He stated that he would be speaking with Mr. Frank Wisner, Deputy Director of CIA, that afternoon; Mr. Murphy said that he personally would have occasion to talk directly with Mr. Allen Dulles, Director of CIA, in the next day or two, and would discuss this problem.

It was emphasized by Mr. Sparks throughout the discussions with Mr. Willauer that ARA's present position is a tentative one, based on the information now available, and would be subject to constant review and modification on receipt of further information and evidence to be submitted by the Embassy at Tegucigalpa; he urged Ambassador Willauer to keep the Department fully informed of current developments. Ambassador Willauer agreed that this would be done on as rapid a basis as possible, but mentioned inadequacy of communications. When this was stated by him to Mr. Murphy, the latter indicated that steps should be taken by ARA to check into the efficiency of our communications set up with Honduras.[3]

[3] In the left-hand margin of the source text appears a typed statement initialed by Mr. Murphy, dated Nov. 24, 1954, which reads in part as follows: "I discussed this subject with Allen Dulles today. He said that he had not had any conversation with Ambas. Willauer on this subject as perhaps Willauer had talked with Wisner regarding it. Mr. Dulles said that on the face of it, he was inclined to agree with the Department's position."

SECRET TEGUCIGALPA, November 27, 1954—11 a. m.

159. 1. When calling on Acting President Lozano 24th,[1] he confidentially handed me following unsigned memo plan of action, indicating he intends put this plan into operation if Congress fails convene. He did not indicate he would take any steps for or against successful convening of Congress; however, he thought exclusive Carias victory would provoke widespread violence. "In event National Congress does not convene December 5 as prescribed by political constitution, there would result breach of constitutional order.

"That being case, President Galvez or Acting President Lozano would be obliged to issue special decree assuming full powers of nation, until constitutional order restored by means Constituent Assembly elected to that effect in free and unfettered elections.

"Meanwhile in same decree President would create advisory body composed of all Congressmen elected last October, that is Nationalists, Liberals and Reformists. Members this body would act in advisory capacity and receive monthly payment equal that of Congressman.

"One of the main purposes that advisory body would be prepare draft new political constitution. Up to this date all political constitutions issued in Honduras have been drafted and approved by only single party thus resulting in failure. It is expected that a new constitution prepared and approved by representatives of the three political parties would have better chances of stability fulfill line at same time needs, desires and aspirations all people of Honduras.

"Proposed advisory body would serve both as nucleus and pattern for future national government in which the three political parties would participate in more or less equal basis."

2. Villeda and Williams have each told me he working for pact with other (which in essence similar Lozano plan above). Each says pact unworkable unless witnessed by United States Ambassador and that failure achieve such or similar pact will mean internal war.

3. I have carefully followed Department's instructions, saying I will under no circumstances witness or be present at signing political pact. Have added that if it would be any use to signers would be glad listen to their statements after they have completed pact, which would be in accordance my duty as reporting officer.

4. Would appreciate Department's comments or further instructions.

While it is correct to have informed Villeda and Williams you cannot be witness any political pact (Embtel 159) it also should be made clear that listening to their statements after pact completed does not involve US approval, disapproval or responsibility. The Ambassador in Honduras (Willauer) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY TEGUCIGALPA, December 6, 1954—2 p.m.

176. Called on President Lozano[1] 10 a.m. today. He opened conversation expressing deep thanks my "valuable assistance maintaining peace Honduras" recent months. I congratulated him on smoothness his necessary assumption power effected this weekend.

Lozano said he had deliberately shown considerable military force, and in discussions with all three party leaders latter had agreed this best for maintenance public order. Lozano said he had taken steps assume power early this morning with full fore-knowledge and support Cariista and Reformist Parties and he especially appreciated "patriotic gesture" of Villeda Morales who called on him shortly after radio broadcast. Embassy understands that Villeda first asked Lozano if he intended establish truly "national" government (i.e. one assuring liberal participation) and on receiving affirmative answer gave Lozano public "abrazo" and assurance support. Lozano said he understands Villeda has issued liberal manifesto containing "two or three strong paragraph" about Lozanos assumption of power, but that he (Lozano) understands these necessary in order show Villeda's followers Villeda has not sold out.

Lozano said Galvez telephoned from Miami December 3 would return Honduras "some time this week", and wished Lozano luck. Lozano now expects Galvez return (presumably as private citizen) December 8 and this return confirmed by telephone from FOA director Hummel[2] still with Galvez Miami. Lozano deliberately expressed great admiration Galvez and obviously desires create impression he loyal Galvez.

[1]On Dec. 6, 1954, Acting President Lozano Díaz decreed himself Supreme Chief of State, following the failure on the previous day of the Honduran National Congress to convene, because of lack of a quorum, to elect a president.
[2]John L. Hummel.

Lozano added he appointing Congressmen elect to Consultative Board today, and will add prominent (Conservative) Liberal Antonio Castillo Gega as member Consultative Board and President that body's Fizmaq Executive Board to which Lozano appointing two representatives each party.

Lozano said he had been questioned as to whether members Consultative Board would enjoy prerogative personal immunity as they would have if members Congress. He replied he had specifically omitted this guarantee, in order prevent any "Leftist" from acting or speaking under cloak immunity.

Lozano deeply pleased at maintenance peace, and embarking with apparent sincerity on "reconciliation of Honduran family"; says he has sent instructions all local commandants work toward this goal.

I told Lozano that although I would personally recommend US Government recognition, if necessary, and support his regime, I did not know whether there was in fact any problem of normal recognition and accordingly my visit could only be a personal one without implying any commitment US Government attitude.

I recall when consulting in Department there seemed considerable doubt whether any act of recognition required if Galvez continued, and personally feel that since Lozano initially took over legally when Galvez left country, the legal situation is same as if Galvez had continued. Recommend if possible avoid recognition issue but if not, strongly recommend rapid recognition because of obvious democratic machinery set up by Lozano, evidence widespread support, and probability that act and manner of Lozano's assumption power has saved Honduras from very nasty situation from which communism would have been sole gainer.

After calling on Lozano I telephoned Villeda extending personal congratulation his "patriotic gesture" of support Lozano. Villeda was obviously greatly pleased.[3]

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO[1]

Mann–Woodward files, lot 57 D 598, "Mexico, 1952"

The Ambassador in Mexico (O'Dwyer) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann)

CONFIDENTIAL MEXICO CITY, January 14, 1952.

DEAR TOM: Regarding your letter of January 5th, 1952,[2] the Embassy is also of the opinion that if the Migratory Labor Agreement[3] should expire, and if the flow of wetbacks[4] should continue, a relations problem with Mexico could result. I shall make it a point, on an appropriate occasion, to inform Sr. Tello that the President is making every effort to obtain control of the wetback situation, and that it is hoped that the Mexican Government may be able to redouble its efforts to prevent the flow of illegal labor to the United States.

As to the question of penalties for the employment of wetbacks, the Ministry has repeatedly informed representatives of the Embassy that Mexico will not agree to the extension of the present Agreement, nor to the negotiation of a new one, until the United States passes some sort of legislation to apply sanctions against employers of illegals in the United States. Whether Mexico will stand pat on this, we do not know.

We do know that it is of as much interest to Mexico as it is to the United States to maintain some sort of control over the use of Mexican migrant labor in the United States, and it is for this reason I feel that Mexico, when she is convinced that the Congress will not pass legislation for the application of penalties against the employers of illegals, will agree to negotiate a new Agreement. Otherwise, utter confusion will prevail, detrimental to the United States and Mexico.

Sincerely, WILLIAM O'DWYER

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of Middle American Affairs (Rubottom)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 17, 1952.

Subject: Mexican Agricultural Workers.

Participants: Mr. David Stowe, the White House;
Mr. Thomas C. Mann, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs, ARA;
Mr. R. R. Rubottom, Jr., Deputy Director, Office of Middle American Affairs, MID.

Mr. Mann and I called on Mr. Stowe at his request to discuss the United States–Mexico migrant labor situation. Mr. Stowe began by telling us that the prospects of getting prompt action by the Congress on the so-called penalty legislation had been dimmed by the decision in the House to give the omnibus immigration bill[1] priority over all other proposed legislation. There is, according to him, no chance of having the Walter Bill[2] brought up first and, while the omnibus immigration bill contains all of the Walter Bill's items except the anti-pirating clause, the debate on the omnibus bill will be lengthy and there is no assurance of its ultimate fate.

Mr. Stowe told us that, in the meantime, there was a reasonably good prospect that the legislation required to meet the President's program and to carry out his commitment to President Aleman might be passed by the Senate. He said that several representatives of the growers were keeping in touch with him and that they were working on their friends in the Congress to get the desired legislation passed at the earliest possible moment. There is a possibility that the bill will pass the Senate by February 1 or at least prior to the termination on February 11 of the 1951 agreement with Mexico.

President Truman is holding firm to his decision that there will be no new labor agreement with Mexico unless the Walter Bill or something similar is enacted into law but, according to Mr. Stowe, the situation will be re-examined should the legislation pass even one House prior to February 11, i.e., the Senate.

[1] Presumably a reference to the bill which became the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952.

[2] The Walter Bill (S. 1851, 82d Cong., 2d sess.) made it a felony to aid anyone entering the country illegally or to harbor or conceal an illegal alien. Debate on the bill began in the Senate on Feb. 5, 1952. It passed the Senate on Feb. 6, the House on Feb. 26, and was signed by President Truman on Mar. 20, 1952, becoming Public Law 283; for text, see 66 Stat. 26.

During the course of our conversation, Mr. Mann and I pointed out to Mr. Stowe the difficulties involved in allowing the present agreement to expire, thereby requiring that a completely new agreement be negotiated with Mexico in the event a decision is reached to seek another agreement. We mentioned that, while Mexico has already achieved in the present agreement most of what she was seeking a year or two ago, we could reasonably expect that she would seek even more if another agreement has to be formulated. It was further pointed out that the existence of a migrant labor agreement is one of the greatest deterrents to the entry of illegal wetbacks and that, without an agreement, a serious border problem would probably result from the increased illegal traffic which would almost certainly follow.

Finally, we indicated that from the standpoint of the United States bargaining position both at home in dealing with the growers and abroad in dealing with Mexico, it behooved this Government to reach a final decision on whether it is more in our national interest to try to maintain a migrant labor agreement, whether or not the legislation is passed, or to let the agreement expire and get along without an agreement regardless of the consequences.

Mr. Stowe expressed his understanding of all of the above considerations and said that regardless of the outcome of the migrant labor agreement, he felt strongly we should ask the Mexicans to do more than it has in the past to cut down the exit of potential illegal wetbacks from Mexico.

Editorial Note

In early January 1952, the United States invited Mexico to enter into military grant aid negotiations to be held in Mexico City. The Mexican Government accepted the invitation on January 23, 1952, but had difficulty agreeing with the United States on the wording of a suitable press release announcing the beginning of negotiations. At issue was the question of whether or not the Mexican Government would be willing to employ its military forces outside its borders in meeting a threat to the hemisphere. United States policy with regard to military aid was governed by the Mutual Security Act of 1951 which stipulated in Section 401 that United States assistance would depend on the recipient country's willingness "to participate in missions important to the defense of the Western Hemisphere." Mexican officials, however, insisted on a joint press release which gave far greater emphasis to developing Mexican defensive military capacity than to hemispheric defense. (Documentation on this subject is contained in Department of State file 712.5 MSP.) The statement finally released on January 25, 1952, simply stated that the two countries had agreed to begin negotiations on a bilateral military assistance agreement; for text, see Department of State Bulletin, February 11, 1952, page 211.

[1] Department airgram A–556 authorized the Embassy in Mexico City to initiate the negotiation of a bilateral military assistance agreement based upon the U.S. draft of Nov. 20, 1951 (712.5 MSP/1–2952). An annotated copy of the draft is contained in file 720.5 MAP/11–2351. Counselor of the U.S. Embassy Culbertson acted as chairman of the U.S. negotiating team with Gen. Albert Jones heading the military group of three which participated in the conversations. Brig. Gen. Alberto Salinas Carranza, chairman of the Mexican Delegation, was assisted by Mexican Foreign Office representatives Oscar Rabasa and Ambassador Joublanc Rivas.

(B) As otherwise mutually agreed, in a manner inconsistent with the internatl obligations of both govts,"

Making clear this language could not be used in basic agrmnt.

We suggested adjourning until tomorrow purpose OSR studying their proposal.

After gen mtg Gen Salinas, Rabasa, Gen Jones, Culbertson had frank talk. Said we understood present polit sit and could only accept their constitutional argument. To make clear our gen goal Jones gave brief picture hemis mil plan and intention use Mex forces. We indicated prelim view we could not accept their basis further discussion. Also indicated failure go along at this time might prejudice Mex position any further grants.

Rabasa [and] Salinas belabored fol points: Mex different from other LA countries; Mex is on outside in event conflict but to be of value Mex mil must be built up; Mex–US comm best means this matter.

We made clear present proposals and grant aid could not come under Mex–US comm.

We consider basis agrmnt as proposed by Mexs completely unacceptable and propose so inform Mex del tomorrow's mtg.

Since they cannot accept our draft and we can't accept their proposals feel we shld find most graceful way out.

While Mex del lays most emphasis on constitutional difficulty, we feel polit it may be more important to them. Opposition and other polit elements are attacking possibility of a mil agrmnt and such attacks may well have their effect. We feel PRI (the govt party) can ill afford opening itself to popular attack at this time. The uncertainties surrounding Avila Camacho and Cardenas[3] place PRI in a delicate situation, and if either or both shld throw their influence against the PRI candidate, who has only a modest public appeal, the election could go to elements probably left of present govt and probably less favorable to US.

If, as looks likely, no agrmnt can be reached now, we feel a formula shld be found by which the door can be kept open to agrmnt under future grants.

Editorial Note

In telegram 1031 from Mexico City, dated February 14, 1952, the Embassy reported that it had informed the Mexican Delegation at the February 13 meeting that it had no authority to proceed on the basis of the Mexican proposals. The telegram further stated that the negotiations could easily be kept going for the time being. (712.5 MSP/2–1452) The Department replied in telegram 1013 to Mexico City, dated February 19, 1952, that the United States military negotiating team could depart for the United States on February 21, and that the Mexicans should be informed that the team was returning to Washington for consultation and further instructions. The Department continued that although it seemed obvious that there could be no constructive outcome from continuing the negotiations, it wished to consider the possibility of writing a full reply to the Mexican written statement, summarized in Mexico City telegram 1026 (page 1327). (712.5 MSP/2–1252) On February 20, 1952, in a meeting with Department officials in Washington, Mexican Ambassador Rafael de la Colina stated his belief that the failure to reach agreement on the military assistance question was primarily the result of Mexico's current presidential campaign. He said that the opposition had attempted to demonstrate that the negotiations proved the allegation that the PRI and President Alemán had sold out to the United States. He concluded that further negotiations should be postponed until after the elections. (Memorandum of conversation, February 20, 1952, 712.00/2–2052)

The President to the Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board (Nyrop)

[WASHINGTON,] September 8, 1952.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: On May 22, 1946, I approved certificates for air services to certain points in Mexico issued to Eastern Air Lines, Braniff Airways, and Western Air Lines. On May 22, 1947, I approved an amendment to the certificate issued to Western Air Lines. No air service has been provided by any of the holders in the six years since the certificates were approved.

Since that time, this government has repeatedly attempted to work out a bilateral agreement with the Government of Mexico to establish a stable pattern of air transportation services between the two countries. The existence of the three outstanding but non-operative certificates has been a significant factor in the failure to work out a satisfactory bilateral agreement with the Mexican Government. It is clear that as long as there is no inter-governmental air agreement with Mexico and these inoperative certificates remain outstanding, a government other than our own will have the sole voice as to which, if and under what condition, any of these services will be initiated and the ability of this government to negotiate a bilateral agreement best adapted to the broad interests of the United States will be restricted.

Furthermore, the efforts by this government to develop a long term pattern of air transportation services between the two countries on a government-to-government basis have been and may further be prejudiced by private efforts to negotiate on an individual basis without regard for the overall air transportation interests of this country and in disregard of directions by this government not to engage in such conduct.

Because of these and other foreign policy considerations and in order to assure the necessary flexibility of action by this government in stabilizing and clarifying the air transportation relationship between the United States and Mexico, I take the following action:

1. I withdraw my approval of the three certificates for air service to Mexico issued to Eastern Air Lines, Braniff Airways, and Western Air Lines, described above.

2. I direct the State Department to take appropriate action, in accordance with the procedures followed in other similar negotiations, to institute negotiations with the Government of Mexico with a view toward effecting at an early date a fair and equitable bilateral air transportation agreement providing for a sound pattern of air transportation between the two countries and consistent with the best interests of the United States.

3. I direct the Civil Aeronautics Board, upon execution of such a bilateral agreement, to take all steps necessary and appropriate to accomplish at the earliest possible moment the pattern of air transportation contemplated by the bilateral agreement.

Will you please officially record the action that I have taken withdrawing my approval, and notify the airlines by immediately sending them copies of this letter.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Thorp) to the Secretary of State[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 22, 1952.

Subject: Negotiations with Mexico for an Air Agreement

Recommendations

1. You initiate discussion of this subject during your meeting with the President today.

2. You urge the President to permit you to select a wholly independent, proven negotiator, preferably Dr. George P. Baker.[2]

3. You permit me and one or two additional Departmental Officers concerned to brief you verbally prior to your meeting with the President.

Conclusions

1. High level political pressures both in this country and in Mexico may easily combine to bring about an agreement wholly unacceptable to the Department, the Congress, the Civil Aeronautics Board and certain influential segments of the air transport industry. The only way that these pressures may be offset is by the appointment of a strong, knowledgeable, independent Chairman of the U.S. Delegation whose final personal recommendation would be supported by the President.

[1] This memorandum was drafted by Director of the Office of Transport and Communications Policy Barringer and cleared by Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs Mann. A handwritten notation on the source text indicates that the Secretary saw the memorandum.

2. Two serious and far-reaching difficulties could flow from an unacceptable agreement:

(a) The whole pattern of U.S. aviation agreements with South American countries based upon regulated competition on reciprocally operated routes between major traffic centers would be jeopardized.

(b) Congressional protest, stimulated by certain disappointed U.S. air carriers would almost certainly take the form of a renewed effort to deprive the President of the power to execute agreements, at least in the field of air transport, without the advice and consent of the Senate.

An "Unacceptable" Agreement could have been obtained with Mexico at any time within the past six years. Such an agreement would recognize the concepts of exclusivity on major traffic-generating routes between the two countries or possibly of required stops to give undue competitive advantage to the airlines of Mexico.

An "Acceptable" Agreement with Mexico, based upon the principles espoused by the United States throughout the world, has eluded us, solely because of the continued Mexican insistence upon their "right" to at least one monopoly on an important route (i.e. Los Angeles–Mexico City) and on other devices designed to give competitive advantage to Mexican carriers.

The Present Situation arises from the President's action, taken on his own initiative, in his letter of September 8, 1952 to the Civil Aeronautics Board (Annex A)[3] and his memorandum to you asking the Department to arrange for immediate inauguration of negotiations. The Department complied by sending instructions to Ambassador O'Dwyer (Annex B)[4] to seek agreement that the negotiations should be undertaken in the near future in Washington. On Friday, September 19, word was received from Embassy, Mexico that the Mexican Government had informally agreed subject to holding the negotiations in Mexico.

Need for a strong independent Chairman of the U.S. Delegation

The three U.S. carriers, Eastern, Braniff and Western whose inoperative certificates were revoked by the President's action of September 8 (Annex A), will undoubtedly be extremely and justly critical of the Department and the Administration if the negotiations are not conducted by a Delegation which would fully appreciate the consequences of an "unacceptable" agreement on the international civil aviation policy of this Government.

The U.S. Chairman of the next negotiation should be a person who is to the maximum extent possible free of pressures but at the same time thoroughly informed concerning the nature of our Mexican difficulties and of the various aspects of U.S. civil aviation policy. Someone with these qualifications, independent of the Government, would be in the best position to evaluate the differences arising in the new negotiations and to reconcile the conflicting political objectives.

There are few men of these qualifications available who also enjoy the confidence of the President as well as of the airlines concerned. Outstanding among these is Dr. Baker, whom you know. It is believed that Dr. Baker would have the knowledge, forcefulness and courage to offset the pressures anticipated.

Concurrence of Civil Aeronautics Board Chairman, Donald W. Nyrop

The action recommended to you was discussed yesterday with Mr. Nyrop who fully shares our apprehension and concurs with the recommendation that you urge Dr. Baker to chair the U.S. Delegation. While Mr. Nyrop carefully stated that he was expressing a personal view and could not speak for his Board, he assured that he will advise the President along the same lines. He further stated that he would be glad to discuss this problem with you at your convenience.

The Secretary of State has full legal authority to negotiate as he deems best: Section 802 of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 provides:

"Sec. 802. The Secretary of State shall advise the Authority of, and consult with the Authority concerning, the negotiation of any agreements with foreign governments for the establishment or development of air navigation, including air routes and services."

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Transport and Communication Policy (Barringer)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 22, 1952.

Subject: Mexican Air Agreement

Participants: President Truman
Secretary Acheson

The Secretary raised with the President the question of the negotiation with Mexico for an air transport agreement, which negotiation the President had directed in his memorandum to the Secretary dated September 8.[2] The Secretary told the President that he was anxious to obtain his thinking on this matter in order best to carry out his wishes. The President stated that for a number of years he had been most anxious to complete a satisfactory air agreement with Mexico and that he had reason to believe that President Aleman was equally anxious to complete such an agreement before he left office in December. The President further stated that he had taken the action to suspend three of the certificates issued in 1946 to US air carriers in order to create a more favorable situation for this negotiation.

The Secretary pointed out to the President the Department's ideas with respect to an acceptable vs. an unacceptable agreement. The President emphasized that he wanted competition on the major routes and could not accept any agreements which would give an exclusive right on such routes to a Mexican carrier.

Pointing out to the President the controversial character of the proposed negotiation and the various pressures which might combine in an attempt to force the United States to concede to certain anticipated Mexican demands and thereby produce an unacceptable agreement, the Secretary urged that the President permit him to select a competent knowledgeable negotiator, independent of Government, who could then best serve all the United States interests involved. The President assured the Secretary that it was his (the Secretary's) responsibility to conduct the negotiations and that he should certainly be free to select anyone he considered would be helpful. In response to the Secretary's suggestion that Mr. George P. Baker would be ideally suited, the President voiced his complete confidence in Mr. Baker. The President then stated that his principal adviser in this matter was Mr. Donald W. Nyrop, Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board, and urged the Secretary to meet with Mr. Nyrop as soon as possible, making a note that Mr. Nyrop should be called to meet with the Secretary.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Transport and Communication Policy (Barringer)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 24, 1952.

Subject: Mexican Air Agreement

Participants: Secretary Acheson
Donald W. Nyrop, Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board

Mr. Mann, ARA

Mr. Barringer, TRC

Pursuant to the President's instructions, Mr. Donald W. Nyrop today met with the Secretary and the above-listed Departmental officers. Mr. Nyrop reviewed briefly the past negotiations with Mexico for an air agreement, including some detail on the negotiation which he conducted in December 1951. He pointed out that each negotiation had failed because of the Mexican insistence on the retention for a Mexican carrier of exclusive rights on the route from Los Angeles to Mexico City. He pointed out that this route was operated by CMA, a Mexican carrier, approximately 40 percent of the capital of which was owned by Pan American Airways. The Mexican interests in this company have been among the most important political supporters of President Aleman.

Mr. Nyrop reviewed in detail the various routes between the United States and Mexico which are now being operated, and those additional routes which might also be exchanged in an agreement acceptable to the United States. Mr. Nyrop indicated that he hoped the CAB, in making its finding, would indicate that the minimum position for the US would incorporate equal competitive opportunity on the three major routes to and from Mexico City: Los Angeles–Mexico City; Dallas–Mexico City; and New Orleans–Mexico City. He suggested that the Board might agree to a temporary one or two-year delay in the inauguration of United States service either from Los Angeles or from New Orleans in order to give a Mexican carrier an opportunity to develop its service. It appeared that, if the general basis outlined by Mr. Nyrop were to be incorporated in the Board's opinion, it would meet the President's expressed desire for competition on the major routes.

Mr. Nyrop then stated that the Civil Aeronautics Board would recommend to the Department on or before October 3 a maximum and a minimum United States position. It was agreed that this position would be discussed and then approved by the President prior to the inauguration of negotiations. In closing, Mr. Nyrop requested that the Secretary again confirm with the President his preference for having these negotiations conducted by Mr. Baker, inasmuch as Mr. David Stowe had suggested that the negotiations might be appropriately handled by the Ambassador, assisted by himself.

Editorial Note

In telegram 522 to Mexico City dated October 8, 1952, the Department reported that one or two of its senior representatives would be able to arrive in Mexico City on October 15 for exploratory conversations with Mexican officials to determine whether a basis for an aviation agreement in fact existed. The telegram requested that the Embassy advise the Department if this schedule and general approach would be acceptable to Mexico (611.1294/10–852). In reply, Paul Culbertson, Counselor of the Embassy, telephoned from Mexico City on October 10 that Mexican Foreign Minister Tello had agreed to tentative informal conversations on October 15, noting that both he and Ambassador O'Dwyer were disappointed in the implication that the Ambassador would not be designated to negotiate this agreement with the Foreign Minister. In accordance with the President's request of September 25[2] I arrived at the White House at 10:00 a.m., Sunday, October 12.

Chairman Nyrop laid before the President a map graphically depicting the recommendations of the Civil Aeronautics Board for a pattern of air routes to be operated by United States and Mexican air carriers under the proposed agreement. The position presented was identical

[2] On Sept. 25 Secretary Acheson had met with the President to report on recent developments regarding the aviation question. At that time they agreed to meet again on Oct. 12. (Memorandum of conversation, by the Secretary of State, dated Sept. 25, 1952, 611.1294/9–2552) with that outlined in paragraph A2 of the briefing memorandum from E dated October 11.[3] Before Mr. Nyrop had completed his presentation, Mr. Stowe questioned him and the Department's representatives on the economic justification for two United States and one Mexican route between New York and Mexico City, two via New Orleans and one via Dallas, particularly in light of anticipated competition on this segment by European and United Kingdom carriers operated as extensions of their routes across the North Atlantic.

After completion of the presentation, discussions centered upon the essentiality of obtaining equal competitive non-stop rights between Los Angeles and Mexico City. It was the President's expressed desire that equal competitive opportunity on this route be a primary condition to any agreement. There followed discussion of the difficulties with other countries that would result from the grant to Mexico of exclusive rights between Mexico City and Miami and between Mexico City and New Orleans. Comparable concessions have consistently been denied to several other Latin American countries with whom the United States is currently negotiating commercial air agreements. It was pointed out that it might be possible for the United States to grant a monopoly route between Mexico City and Miami but that the additional grant of a similar monopoly route to New Orleans would have an extremely adverse effect on our relations in this field with these countries as well as establishing an undesirable precedent for requests from other countries throughout the world.

I suggested that no decision be reached on these concessions until we are able to ascertain from the Mexican Government the exact nature of their demands in the negotiations. The President agreed that this particular question should be reviewed after an initial exploratory conversation with Mexican officials. It was further agreed that only President Aleman would be able to supply the necessary definitive information as to the exact nature of the Mexican requests.

I then suggested to the President that we should address ourselves to the best way in which an initial approach could be made to President Aleman and recommended that Mr. Baker and Mr. Stowe talk to President Aleman as soon as a meeting could be arranged. Mr. Baker outlined in some detail the procedure in which similar negotiations had been carried on in the past indicating that they usually extended over a period of several weeks, if not months, with careful consideration by all agencies concerned of offers and counter offers. He did not think it entirely desirable to make any determinations that would involve deviation from past United States principles followed in air route negotiations unless they were hammered out in arm's length bargaining and subjected to full consideration and debate.

It was agreed that the Department would undertake to ascertain if a meeting could be arranged with President Aleman prior to Wednesday evening, October 15, at which time Mr. Stowe would be required to accompany the President on a trip.[4]

Discussion of this phase of the problem was concluded. I remained with the President to take up other matters.

[4] The Embassy in Mexico City was unable to arrange a meeting before Oct. 15 because President Alemán planned to depart Mexico City on that day. Consequently, Stowe requested State Department officials to try to set up a meeting with President Alemán after Nov. 4. Participants: Mr. David Stowe, Administrative Assistant to the President
R. R. Rubottom, Jr., Director, MID

I telephoned Mr. Stowe on Saturday afternoon to relate to him what I had just been informed by the Officer in Charge of Mexican Affairs, Mr. William Belton, who had just returned from Mexico, to the effect that the key official in the Foreign Office on policy matters affecting Mexico and the U.S., Mr. Rabasa, had indicated to Mr. Belton that there was little chance that an aviation agreement could be concluded in the short period between the U.S. election on November 4 and the inauguration of the new Mexican President on December 1. Mr. Rabasa told Mr. Belton, however, that any U.S. representative who comes to Mexico to discuss aviation will be cordially received.

Mr. Stowe expressed little interest in the above information and said that he realized that whether or not there would be an aviation agreement depended almost entirely on President Aleman. He said that if the latter wants an agreement there can be one in 24 hours. He said that if President Aleman is not willing to concede on the west coast monopoly run, then there would not be any agreement.

I gained the impression that Mr. Stowe was planning to go to Mexico around November 10 or 11 come what may, providing President Aleman is willing to receive him.

Subject: Mexican Air Negotiations

I expressed my doubts to the President as to the wisdom of this Administration, in its closing weeks, attempting to reach an air agreement with the Mexican Administration, also in its final weeks. The President agreed with my concern about this and said that the best thing to do was to drop the matter altogether. I took it that this was his considered decision, and I think we should act upon it as such.

Finally, the President saw no reason why I should not return to New York, holding myself ready to return here on a call from him.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot) to the Ambassador in Mexico (White)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 12, 1953.

DEAR FRANCIS: I was sorry not to have talked to you at greater length regarding the Department of Justice's proposal to use Army and National Guard forces to stop the wetback traffic across the California frontier. Since I have every reason to suppose that telephone conversations between the Embassy and officers of the Department are recorded and since I do not wish the Mexican Government to know all the gory details about this matter, it seemed to me that we had better handle it by an exchange of letters, the more so as the Department of Justice will not act for some days at least. I should perhaps add that practically everything I said to you was aimed at the recording machine rather than at you.

I do not, I am sure, need to tell you that the Department of Justice as well as this Department have been increasingly concerned at the enormous number of wetbacks who are slipping into the United States, nor do I need to point out to you how undesirable this traffic is. In California the situation has become particularly bad in that the wetbacks are resorting to violence and the people of Southern California are getting both alarmed and fed up. In other words, whether we like it or not something has got to be done about it. Interestingly enough, the same complaints do not come from Texas despite the fact that the wetback traffic there is also heavy. The Texas farmers seem to favor the traffic despite its inconveniences.

You are also familiar with the many representations which the Mexicans have made to us asking us to take effective measures to stop the traffic of wetbacks. It is true that the measure they have normally requested is that we crack down on the farmers employing the wetbacks. Practically speaking this is not possible for political reasons and, therefore, if we are going to do anything at all, it must be something else.

We recognize that the use of the military to stop the wetback traffic will almost certainly provoke incidents and that those incidents will react on our relations with Mexico. I am sorry that this is the case. Nevertheless any enforcement measures we take, or indeed any lack of enforcement measures we take, are bound to lead to incidents due to the tremendous pressure of the wetback movement. Under these circumstances and recognizing that we face a choice of evils, it seemed to me better to seize the bull by the horns, see how effective military measures could be on one section of the frontier, stimulate both sides to demand a mutually satisfactory bracero agreement and do what we can to convince the Mexican Government that our measures were at least in part due to their pressure. It was precisely to get the fairest possible opinion on the latter point that I talked to Brownell as reported in my memorandum of conversation of August 8.[1]

I would greatly appreciate a detailed expression of your views. Probably we could not stop the proposed measures even if we should make a last ditch fight of it, but naturally I should like to do what is right even if it is not likely to succeed. I shall therefore await your views with the keenest interest.[2]

With every good wish,

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN M. CABOT

The Ambassador in Mexico (White) to the Secretary of State

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL
VERY URGENT

MEXICO CITY, August 14, 1953.

DEAR FOSTER: When I came to Mexico, I determined not to add to your burdens with matters here unless they were of such importance or gravity that you should know about them. Such a situation has now arisen and it is of such importance to you personally, to our relations with Mexico, to our relations with Latin America as a whole, and to the Republican Party that I bring it to your attention.

At 5:30 o'clock on the afternoon of August 11th, I learned that the Attorney General, Mr. Brownell, was proposing to use Federal troops and the National Guard to stop the wetback traffic across the California Border and that a proclamation to that effect had already been drafted. Apparently, some of the authorities in California had presented the matter to him in such a way as to upset him and make him feel that some drastic action should be taken.

The bracero wetback problem is a difficult one but the way to handle it, in my opinion, is definitely not by the use of force. It seems to me that such a policy is just as unimaginative and negative a policy as it was to intervene with troops years ago in some of the Caribbean and Central American Republics. It took me from 1922 to 1926 to get the Marines out of Nicaragua. I was then sent to Spain for a few months, and when I returned, I found the Marines back there and it took from 1927 to 1933 to get them out again in an orderly way. Having lived with that situation for eleven years, I know what such a blunder can entail in the work of the Secretary of State and of the Department. I feel that the expedient of calling out Federal troops and the National Guard in the wetback case on the Mexican Border would be an even more tragic blunder than was the sending of Marines to Nicaragua. Mexico is so much more important and is the keystone of all our relations with Latin America. The effect of such action on our relations would be disastrous.

I have been working closely with Señor Padilla Nervo, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, since I have been here to make the meeting at the Falcon Dam[1] a success. I was much gratified last week when he told me spontaneously and in all sincerity that the Mexican Government really wants to make the Falcon Dam meeting an outstanding demonstration to the rest of Latin America of the mutual friendship, understanding and regard that exists between the United States and Mexico. He and other Mexican officials are fully cognizant of the special role that Mexico plays in our relations with Latin America and have told me so. Other countries in Latin America look to our relations with Mexico as a barometer with which to judge our whole Latin American policy. A number of the Latin American Ambassadors here have told me the same and some even implied that watching that situation was their most important duty here.

With troops on the Border shooting at Mexican citizens, our relations will so deteriorate that I am afraid the Falcon Dam meeting would not be the auspicious affair we hoped for it and it might even have to be abandoned.

From comments that have come to me from several sources, one of the points which I brought out in an impromptu talk at a luncheon given for me to meet Mexican bankers was my contrast between the Iron Curtain frontier of other countries and the Falcon Dam on the United States-Mexican frontier. We won't be able to make capital out of that if we have bayonets and muskets on our frontier.

[1] President Eisenhower and President Ruiz Cortines of Mexico were scheduled on Oct. 19, 1953, to dedicate Falcón Dam on the Rio Grande, 75 miles south of Laredo, Texas. The meeting was arranged at the Department's initiative in May and June 1953.

Despite certain newspaper comments to the contrary, relations with Mexico are now on a friendly and sound basis of cooperation. Shootings along the frontier can completely change all that. If troops are sent there to keep the wetbacks out, how are they going to do it? Not by giving them a pat on the back and asking them politely to go home. If their job is to keep the wetbacks out and they see some fellow trying to sneak across, somebody is going to use his gun. Even if it is only a warning shot, he will be shooting south and somebody is going to get hurt. Incidents will inevitably happen.

When the Simpson Bill[2] was under consideration in the Congress, some of the unfriendly press carried headlines that the United States declared war on Mexico. What would it be when troops are called out to man the Border and also when incidents occur? Even the friendly and important press will certainly carry most invidious headlines and editorials.

This situation will be exploited throughout Latin America. It will be seized on by the Communists for anti-American propaganda here, in Latin America and in the rest of the world. The Argentine Embassy here is spending very considerable sums of money on anti-American propaganda. This will be hand-tailored for their purposes. Also the National Guard will undoubtedly contain many members whose homes are near the Border and who often speak in most derogatory terms of the Mexicans. They are apt to be very trigger-happy and will supply further fuel in an anti-American campaign.

I understand that some of the reasoning back of this move is that many representations have been made to us by the Mexican Government asking us to take effective measures to stop the traffic of wetbacks and that military measures on the frontier would stimulate both sides to demand a mutually satisfactory bracero agreement.

The Mexican Government in a purely informal way in conversations regarding the bracero matter has asked that we do something to prevent the wetbacks coming into the United States. This is because they contend that the wetbacks depress the price of labor in the United States and hence the price that we pay under our contracts with the braceros. There has never been any demand that Federal troops be called out or the National Guard so far as I am aware. Nothing of the sort has been remotely suggested to me since I have been here and I have consulted all members of my staff concerned with the matter and no such representations have ever been made to them. If any have been made by the Mexican Embassy in Washington to the Department of State, this Embassy has never been advised thereof. What the Mexicans are interested in, I repeat, is higher wages for their braceros. They have asked that we pass a law making it illegal for anyone in our country to employ an illegal immigrant. This, of course, would be out of the question politically at home as it would make every individual responsible for enforcing our immigration laws and these immigrants get right up to the Canadian Border at Detroit and other places. It has been pointed out to the Mexican Government that that is not the solution. There is a very long frontier between our two countries and the Border Patrol, from economic necessity, cannot be sufficient to control the matter. The Mexicans could help on their side and should do so because these people are not only violating our immigration laws, but they are violating Mexican law in leaving the country without the proper permits.

[2] The Simpson Bill (H.R. 5894, 83d Cong., 1st sess.), introduced by Pennsylvania Representative Richard M. Simpson, provided for mandatory curbs on the importation of certain commodities which threatened or caused injury to U.S. producers. The bill, favorably reported out of the House Ways and Means Committee on July 8, 1953, was sent back to committee and effectively killed by a majority vote of the House on July 23, 1953.

There are few railway and highroads leading from the center of Mexico to the Border and when the Mexicans know that on these few routes, thousands of people are traveling to the Border to leave Mexico illegally and enter the United States illegally, the Mexicans could take precautions, if they would, to prevent their getting to the Border where they can fan out over the country and cross the frontier with relative facility. The Mexicans' reply to that is that a Mexican can travel anywhere in the country he wants, that his travel is not illegal, until he crosses the frontier. They have wanted to put the whole burden and onus of preventing the traffic on us. The most they have done recently is to send three or four jeeps and about fifteen men to the Rio Grande Valley around Reynosa and even these have now been withdrawn, according to the best information we can obtain.

It has been suggested that the Mexicans have used troops to patrol their side of the Border. The Embassy can find no confirmation of this whatsoever except once under the Presidency of Aleman when troops were used to make the peons harvest the cotton crop on his ranch and the ranches of a few of his friends near the Border. When this was done, the troops were withdrawn and the wetbacks allowed to come over. It is even reported that some of the soldiers discarded their rifles and uniforms and crossed the Border also as wetbacks, lured by the two-dollar a day wage as contrasted with their pay of thirty cents a day.

The effect of this on the Republican Party is also obvious. The Democrats would be provided with a wonderful issue that the good-neighbor policy had been jettisoned and we were back to the use of troops and force.

In this connection, I may say that last Friday, Nancy and I went to a small dinner of ten—all Mexicans but ourselves—in the home of an important Mexican official. He took me aside after dinner and said that a Cabinet Officer had recently told him that the Republican Party is hostile to Latin America. My friend replied that Mexico has been invaded several times by the United States but always when we had a Democrat administration at home. He evinced concern over this and a desire to talk with me further on the matter to see what we could do to offset it. As a result, he is lunching with me alone on Monday to go into the situation fully. Troops on the Border will support the Cabinet Officer's contention.

Only yesterday, I received information from a very trustworthy source that the informant had been shown what purported to be a memorandum given by an unidentified Mexican to President Ruiz Cortines setting forth purportedly the Republican Party's evaluation of the present Mexican Cabinet. The memorandum specifically stated that the Foreign Minister, Señor Padilla Nervo, is an out and out Communist. This, of course, is absurd. I am trying to run the matter down and find out more about it. Perhaps your sources of information can find out whether such a memorandum was prepared by the Republican Committee or others last January. It is quite possible, of course, that this is a spurious document planted for mischievous purposes and it shows what we have to contend with.

The bracero problem is a serious one and the agreement regarding it expires December 31st of this year, but it is only one problem in our relations with Mexico, and to jeopardize those other interests here and throughout Latin America to get a bracero agreement would, I feel, be a tragic blunder. We can get a bracero agreement and without calling out of troops. In fact, that might make it much more difficult. If the matter is entrusted to the Embassy for negotiation with representatives of the Labor Department merely to give technical advice from Washington or perhaps down here, it can be worked out. The last time it was negotiated by representatives of the Labor Department who pounded the table and threatened to leave and break off the negotiations on numerous occasions. It did not promote good understanding. I feel that the Embassy can negotiate it if negotiations are in its hands. We succeeded in the foot-and-mouth disease matter when we took over after the Department of Agriculture's representatives here had taken a very intransigent position and impugned the good faith of the Mexican Minister of Agriculture.

In this whole connection, it is important to know that the authorities of the State of California often go off half-cocked in these matters. Just recently an official of the County of Los Angeles called on me, introduced by his Senator. He maintained that the Mexicans are giving the Californians no support in curbing the narcotics traffic across the Border, and he wanted me to take the matter up with President Ruiz Cortines. I did discuss the matter informally at length with the Mexican official in charge of narcotics. He showed me documents showing that Mexico has gone far beyond its treaty obligations in this matter and has been praised therefor by Mr. Anslinger, head of the Bureau of Narcotics of the Treasury Department. Seven years ago, Mr. Anslinger and his Canadian counterpart had been the most outspoken critics of Mexico and over two years ago, were the first to state openly in the International Narcotics Control Committee that Mexico had done far more than required and that its action should be a model for other nations. As a result, this Mexican official has for the last two years been elected chairman of that Committee.

Despite this, a report of the California Crime Commission criticized Mexico a while ago. The Mexican Consul in Los Angeles took the matter up with the Chairman of that Committee and showed him the documents to prove his case. The Californian stated that the Crime Committee, having made its report, was dissolved; that the statements were not those of the official committee but merely of the members thereof, and admitted that they had drawn that section of their report up rather hurriedly and without thoroughly going into the matter!! If we act on half-baked complaints of the Californians, we are bound to be in very hot water. I am assembling material to put them right on the narcotics matters.

It is also alleged that the wetback situation in California has become particularly bad because the wetbacks are resorting to violence. The information we have indicates that there has been violence in sporadic cases and that the fault has been about fifty-fifty on the part of our enforcement agents and the wetbacks. Recently a wetback was wounded by gunfire and about two months ago a member of the Border Patrol repatriating wetbacks stopped the bus carrying the deportees to pick up another wetback hiding in the bushes. When the guard got out to go after this man, some of the wetbacks in the bus jeered him and the guard picked up a clod of earth, threw it through the open window, hitting a deportee in the eye, which resulted in his loss of the eye; so the violence is not all on one side.

I am bringing this matter to your urgent attention because the information I have from Washington is that probably we could not stop the proposed measures even if the Department should make a last-ditch fight of it. I feel that it is imperative that that last-ditch fight be made. I read last night in the number of the New York Times that I received yesterday that Mr. Brownell is now in California studying the matter and will be back in Washington next Tuesday, August 18th. This morning's Mexican press reports further that he will stop off in Denver on Monday to report to the President. For these reasons, I feel it imperative to get this information to you as quickly as possible.[3]

With kindest regards,

Yours very sincerely, FRANCIS

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 18, 1953.

DEAR FRANCIS: On my return from a blissful weekend I received your letter of the 14th[1] with regard to the wetback problem and I have also talked with General Smith about it.

I have the impression that things in Washington are beginning to turn more favorably to the viewpoint which you have so forcefully expressed in this problem. General Smith, from his personal experience on the border, does not like the idea of using Federal troops to stop the wetback traffic and is only less opposed to National Guard units. Also there seems to be considerable reason to suppose that Brownell, who went out west avowing that drastic action must be taken, is returning convinced that some people out west view it one way but others a different way.

In view of General Smith's position and since we in ARA have never been happy about the proposed use of troops, we shall do what we can to dissuade Brownell from his intentions when he returns. I believe he is due back today or tomorrow. We shall doubtless have a meeting about it in the very near future.

With every good wish,

Sincerely yours, JOHN M. CABOT

Memorandum by the Officer in Charge of Mexican Affairs (Belton) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 27, 1953.

Subject: Suggested Position on Migrant Labor Problem.

In your further discussions with Attorney General Brownell on the wetback problem, the following position is suggested:

1. Penalties against employers have long been felt by the Mexicans to be the answer to the wetback problem. There is no doubt that a system of administrative fines would be pleasing to them. However, this is a domestic matter and one on which the Department probably should not voice an opinion. Attention is called to the suggestion which appeared in a letter to the New York Times, published August 22, that Social Security cards be denied to wetbacks and that employers be denied income tax deductions for labor expenses paid to persons not possessing such cards.

2. There is no objection on the part of the Department or, so far as is known, of the Mexican Government, to the return of wetbacks to the interior of Mexico in the most efficient and effective way possible, probably by airlift. The Department will be happy to assist in making any necessary arrangements with the Mexican Government for whatever system of transportation may be devised.

3. The Department has for years been endeavoring to persuade the Mexican Government to take effective action against the departure of wetbacks, with practically no success. The Mexican Government maintains it is constitutionally unable to take action against its citizens at the points where policing would be most effective, some one hundred miles or more south of the border. This is a matter of interpretation, however, and our Embassy has called the attention of the Mexican Government to provisions of Mexican law which appear to authorize such action. The New York Times of August 24 carried an article stating the Mexicans had started patrolling well south of the border. This has not yet been officially confirmed, but if it is the case it may indicate a reversal of the previous stand. We will ask Ambassador White to discuss this subject with the Mexican Foreign Minister.

4. The present Migrant Labor Agreement expires December 31. Preliminary conversations between this Department and the Department of Labor concerning a new agreement are already under way. An entirely new approach to the problem is being considered with a view to devising a simplified agreement to reduce the relative advantage of being a wetback or hiring one. There is no basis for optimism that the Mexican Government will agree to this new approach, but as soon as the matter has been fully explored within our Government the Department will ask Ambassador White to discuss the subject with the Mexican Foreign Minister. At the same time, we might take up the question with Ambassador Tello.

5. If a new type of agreement does not prove feasible, the possibility of operating unilaterally may be explored. The Department of Labor would require additional legislative authority before this could be undertaken.

6. Either a new type of agreement or a unilateral operation would presumably route large numbers of potential wetbacks into legal channels. In so far as a disposition still existed on the part of employers to hire illegals or there remained a sizable number of applicants for whom work was not available, adequate enforcement machinery would continue to be essential.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 19, 1953.

Subject: Mexican Wetback Problem

Participants: Mr. J. Lee Rankin, Assistant Attorney General
Mr. John M. Cabot, Assistant Secretary of State

I called on Assistant Attorney General Rankin by appointment with regard to the Mexican wetback problem and we discussed the various considerations underlying it. At the end of the discussion, Mr. Rankin proposed that it might be possible to make an arrangement more or less along the following lines. The United States would establish, for Mexican-born citizens crossing into the U.S, arrangements substantially similar to those now prevailing for Canadians at the Canadian border. Mexicans coming into the U.S. for legitimate reasons other than employment would have no further formalities to face. Those seeking employment would be required to go to Department of Labor offices which would arrange with farmer associations to see that the applicants were sent to places where labor was required. The applicants for labor would be required to pay prevailing wage rates, provide proper housing, food and other working conditions and pay for transportation. By requiring evidence that labor had been legally obtained and refusing income tax deductions in the absence of such evidence, the employers could be forced to employ legitimate labor. On the other hand, the requirement that Mexicans seeking employment go to Labor offices would provide a means of choking off immigrant labor in the event that unemployment should become serious again in the U.S. American labor should be satisfied that wages and working conditions would be less depressed by this condition than by the easy influx of wetbacks. The Mexican Government might not be altogether pleased but it could scarcely object to our permitting the entry of Mexican citizens under easy conditions, and the responsibility for preventing Mexicans from leaving Mexico to seek employment in the U.S. would not only be its own, but also might be one which it would be unwilling to take. I said, however, that I did not think that the Mexicans would permit us to put labor recruiting officers in Mexico under such an arrangement. Mr. Rankin will examine this with Labor and wanted to have our considered views of it.

It was understood on both sides that the entire conversation was tentative and exploratory and was held in view of the danger that we may find it impossible to negotiate any satisfactory bracero agreement or solve the wetback problem.

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 13, 1953.

Subject: Meeting with President Ruiz Cortines of Mexico.

Attached is background information on the President of Mexico and on United States-Mexican relations which you may find helpful in your conversations with President Ruiz Cortines on October 19. I believe it would be of value if you would emphasize your views as to the serious nature of the Communist menace. You might also stress the determination of the United States, while in the vanguard of the fight against Communism, to respect the rights and integrity of other nations and to maintain its own liberal tradition. If you touch upon any specific problems of Mexican-United States relations you might emphasize United States desire to work harmoniously with Mexico toward solutions compatible with the national interests of both countries and productive of the greatest possible benefits to each.

The most likely specific topic which President Ruiz Cortines will mention is that of Mexican migrant labor (see page 2 of enclosure), which has produced a flood of illegal ("wetback") entries.

Since the Mexicans have indicated that they are definitely not prepared to enter into a military pact (page 2) at the present time, it would be inadvisable to raise this question.

[Enclosure]

BACKGROUND INFORMATION FOR MEETING WITH PRESIDENT OF MEXICO
OCTOBER 19, 1953

1. President Adolfo Ruiz Cortines may be addressed as President Ruiz Cortines (Roo-ées Cor-téen-ace) or President Ruiz; not as President Cortines.

He is 60 years old; usually quiet and reserved; almost sombre in appearance; married with children; not an active church member. He is believed to speak some English and has visited the United States at least once, at Los Angeles in 1948. At the time of your visit to Mexico in August 1946, he was Governor of Veracruz, and you did not meet him.

Ruiz Cortines is a politician by profession, having held political or Governmental positions almost continuously since 1913. His most important posts before becoming President were Governor of the State of Veracruz, 1944–1948, and Secretary of Government (the highest ranking position in the Mexican Cabinet), 1948–1951. Elected President in July, 1952, he assumed office December 1, 1952.

He has a personal record of honesty, integrity, and conservatism. His public record is marked by economy and caution.

2. Mexican-United States relations are stable and friendly. We know what to expect from Mexico and understand her limitations. The same is true of Mexico's attitude toward the United States, although it is traditionally colored by vague suspicion of our motives. This arises from past incidents, the peculiar course of Mexican history, the fear by the weak of the strong, and the activities of groups interested in fomenting discord. Mexican Foreign Minister Padilla Nervo recently made it abundantly clear that the Mexican attitude toward us is currently affected by doubt as to continuation of our own liberal tradition, and by concern that we may mistake domestic reforms among our neighbors for Communism.

Many problems exist between the two countries, mostly stemming from our geographic juxtaposition. All are probably susceptible of settlement without undue concessions by either side, although lack of auspicious circumstances at any given moment may prolong their final disposition. None of the problems is of sufficient dimension that the national security of either country is seriously menaced now, but prompt solution of some is clearly in our national interest.

3. The Communist danger is not fully appreciated in Mexico because of her tradition of extreme liberalism. A few prominent Mexicans are Communist advocates. Often no sharp distinction is made between these individuals and the more numerous and important proponents of the typically Mexican revolution which, while definitely leftist and socialistic in tendency, has no Marxian basis and no Soviet connection. The governing and only effective political party in Mexico today is essentially capitalistic and orthodox in outlook, although committed to improving the economic condition of the rural masses through land reform and socialized agriculture.

In spite of an apparent lack of concern with Communism within the country, (where it has not won a significant number of followers) and of a non-committal attitude toward the efforts of the United States in the East–West struggle, there is little doubt that in time of crisis Mexico would be on our side.

Important problems of current interest include:

4. A Military Assistance Pact was suggested to Mexico in 1952, but it soon became apparent that this was not feasible from the Mexican domestic political viewpoint. The United States has now readjusted its assistance pact program to exclude Mexico and has found that many of the objectives of a pact are being met through the secret proceedings of the Joint Mexican-United States Defense Commission. The Mexican Government and public continue to exhibit nervousness that the United States will try to force a pact upon them. We take every opportunity to assure Mexico that, while we would still welcome a pact, we respect her decision and do not intend to raise the issue again.

5. Uranium Exploration in Mexico might uncover deposits which could constitute an important source of supply for the United States. The Mexican Government has assumed complete control of uranium, although exploration is limited and no desposits have been proven. The United States has tried to encourage Mexican exploration activity by offering assistance and purchase contracts. Mexico has not responded, probably due to nationalistic and domestic political considerations, reluctance to export unprocessed raw materials, and unwillingness to become involved in an atomic weapon race. We continue to emphasize that action in this field could benefit Mexico's own economy and security.[2]

6. Mexican Migrant Laborers have proven essential to important segments of United States agriculture. Higher wages in this country and, currently, a Mexican economic recession, stimulate the northward flow of workers. Agreements between the two Governments to regulate this flow have been largely ineffective due to lack of willingness of many employers and workers to conform to agreement procedures. Efforts are now under way to improve immigration law enforcement and to negotiate a new agreement (the current one expires December 31,

[2] Documents pertaining to this subject are contained in Department of State file 812.2546.

1953) designed to attract more complete support from workers and employers.

7. Foot-and-Mouth Disease in Mexico is being combatted under a program administered jointly by a Mexican-United States Commission. It has not made satisfactory progress, for the disease, although closely restricted, continues slowly to spread. A firm and consistent administration of the procedures agreed upon is essential. Secretary Benson has assigned Walter Thurston, former Ambassador to Mexico, as his personal representative to administer the United States portion of the program. It is hoped that President Ruiz Cortines will take full advantage of Mr. Thurston's abilities and experience in solving this problem to the mutual advantage of our two countries.[3]

8. Shrimp boats from the United States are often seized by Mexico in or near her waters, which she claims extend nine miles from shore. They are accused of illegal fishing, although at least some are innocent. These seizures create serious losses for United States shrimping interests and motivate many public repercussions harmful to United States-Mexican friendship. The United States intends to propose a treaty which, while not recognizing Mexico's claims on territorial waters, will regulate access to them by United States shrimpers and eliminate this problem as a source of friction.[4]

9. Waters of the Rio Grande below Fort Quitman are divided between Mexico and the United States by the Water Treaty of 1944. Falcón Dam now makes additional water available for irrigation, but enforcement of diversion rights remains a problem. Recent moves by Texas authorities may provide adequate controls over United States users, some of whom take Mexican waters in times of scarcity. If not, this enforcement could become a Federal obligation.

Mexico is urging fulfillment of a commitment to construct the small Anzalduas Diversion Dam below Falcón. Performance awaits local government action to meet a Congressional stipulation that necessary United States lands must be acquired by donation. One county is now undertaking practically the entire donation, and construction can probably be started soon.

The Water Treaty calls for a dam on the Rio Grande above Laredo. Its location, long a subject of public discussion, must be determined on engineering grounds to provide maximum water utilization. The Mexicans have agreed to proceed with intensified study of sites, and the Boundary and Water Commission is expediting numerous steps antecedent to requesting appropriations for construction.[5]

Editorial Note

A record of the conversation between Presidents Ruiz Cortines and Eisenhower at Falcón Dam was made by Louis R. Blanchard, the American Consul at Tijuana, Baja California, and the official United States interpreter at the dedication ceremonies. This record was incorporated into a letter forwarded to Mr. Belton on October 24, 1953. The two participants discussed few matters of substance at the meeting; none of the outstanding issues between the two countries was mentioned. According to Blanchard's account the meeting was cordial, relaxed, and friendly, and the dedication addresses of both Presidents were warmly received by the assembled public. (Eisenhower Library, Eisenhower papers, Whitman file) President Eisenhower's speech at the dedication ceremonies is printed in the Department of State Bulletin, November 2, 1953, pages 579–580.

Memorandum by the Acting Secretary of State to the President[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 4, 1953.

Subject: Mexican Migrant Labor Agreement Negotiations

In view of the great public interest in the Mexican migratory labor problem, you may want to know the present status of the subject:

The agreement regulating the legal entry of migrant laborers from Mexico expires on December 31, 1953.[2] This agreement, while of use, has not prevented an alarming increase in illegal entries. Both Governments desire a new agreement, but the United States requires certain fundamental changes to make a new agreement worthwhile. Primarily, these would limit the power of Mexican authorities to obstruct operations by unilateral and arbitrary actions and would make legal entry more attractive to laborers and the use of legal laborers more advantageous to employers, thus reducing illegal entries.

Ambassador White is presenting the United States viewpoint very effectively, but there is yet no assurance a new agreement will be achieved.

Plans are now being formulated whereby, in the absence of an agreement after December 31, Mexican laborers who apply for admission to the United States can be processed unilaterally under essentially the same safeguards as at present. It is anticipated that a large proportion of those now entering illegally can be diverted to controlled legal channels. This will be much more in the United States interest than the present situation.

The Mexican Government will be reluctant to see the United States undertake a unilateral program and may accept our principles for an agreement when it sees we are determined to do so. At any rate, it will be informed of our readiness to return to bilateral operation whenever it cares to accept these principles.

Some Mexican criticism of a unilateral United States program is inevitable. This would not be likely to affect our overall friendly relations and is a moderate price to pay for effective control over a potentially dangerous security situation on our southern border. Investigations are now under way to determine the feasibility of simplifying our entry procedure for all Mexican visitors in such a way as to create a favorable impression in Mexico and eliminate a large proportion of any adverse reaction.[3]

WALTER B. SMITH

[3]In a memorandum to President Eisenhower dated Dec. 28, 1953, Secretary Dulles stated that no new agreement was likely before the expiration of the existing one, and that postponement of the expiration date seemed undesirable from the American point of view. However, in order to allow the Mexican Government one last opportunity to reach an agreement with the United States, the Secretary recommended deferring the operation of the unilateral recruitment program until Jan. 15. This would permit the Mexicans to realize that the United States was serious in its proposals and allow them time to accelerate negotiations with us "before we are under way alone." Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] February 3, 1954.

Subject: Entry of Mexican Agricultural Workers into the United States

Participants: The President
Señor Don Manuel Tello, Ambassador of Mexico
Mr. J. Lee Rankin, Assistant Attorney General
Mr. John M. Cabot, Assistant Secretary

After an exchange of courtesies, the Mexican Ambassador said that he brought a very cordial personal message from President Ruiz Cortines to President Eisenhower. He said that President Ruiz Cortines was disturbed that it had been impossible to reach an agreement in regard to the entry of Mexican agricultural workers into the United States and that he felt that this was a matter which should be possible to settle between reasonable men given goodwill on each side.

The President expressed his great pleasure in receiving President Ruiz Cortines' message and in his turn asked the Ambassador to convey his warm personal greetings to President Ruiz Cortines. He said that he fully agreed with the latter's views and asked what the essential difficulty was.

The Ambassador said that the only trouble was with regard to wages. He said that it seemed there was a wide area of agreement between the two governments: the Mexican agricultural laborers wanted to come to the United States; American farmers wanted and needed them; the Mexican Government wanted its workers to receive fair pay; the American Government also wanted them to receive fair pay because otherwise the wages of American workers would be depressed; both sides wanted to stop the illegal entry of many Mexican workers. If only the question of wages could be ironed out, the Ambassador said, he thought our difficulties would be solved.

The President expressed some surprise at this. He said that he quite agreed that Mexican workers should be paid fair wages in our interest as well as theirs. Mr. Cabot pointed out that the more difficult question was to get an agreement which really worked in practice. The American farmers wanted to get Mexican labor at as little expense and trouble as possible and Mexican labor was perfectly willing to enter illegally and receive lower rates than those paid legal entrants. Both the American and Mexican Governments wanted to stop this but, like the prohibition law, it was right in theory but did not work out in practice. The question was how to get the illegal entrants into legal channels both for their own protection and for that of the United States. Mr. Cabot emphasized that we would prefer to have a bilateral agreement to the present arrangement.

The President referred jokingly to the troubles in enforcing the prohibition amendment and then again emphasized our willingness to negotiate at an early date and his confidence that with a conciliatory spirit on both sides it should be possible for representatives of two great governments to get together on an agreed plan. He said that maybe it would be wise if new faces could negotiate for both sides, since those who had negotiated earlier had taken positions from which it might be difficult to recede. He of course was not placing any blame on either side in the past negotiations, but merely suggesting that this might be a means conducive to an agreement.

The Ambassador expressed his sincere thanks to the President and, after reiterating again his point in regard to wages, he together with Mr. Rankin and Mr. Cabot departed.

Following the discussion, Mr. Cabot said that he had not appreciated that the Mexican Ambassador considered the wage question the real point at issue. Under our law the Secretary of Labor could not agree to a given wage scale but could simply determine what the prevailing wage was. The Ambassador pulled out Ambassador White's memorandum regarding the agreement and pointed to the first sentence of the paragraph on the determination of wages. He said that under this the Secretary of Labor, favoring the farmer, might fix a very low wage. Mr. Cabot pointed out that that was not at all his understanding of Ambassador White's purpose, that on the contrary the Secretary of Labor by determining the prevailing wage in a determined locality protected the Mexican worker from exploitation, since in the absence of such determination the Mexican laborer having no organization might accept much less than the prevailing wage. On the other hand, the Secretary of Labor had no authority under our law to negotiate regarding wages to be paid. Ambassador Tello pointed out that in most of the areas where the Mexicans were employed the great majority of workers were of Mexican origin and the prevailing wage rates, therefore, tended to be low and would be affected by the entrance of workers from Mexico. He suggested that maybe the laws could be amended to read more or less "not less than the prevailing wages". Mr. Cabot said that we would study sympathetically any proposals which the Mexicans might care to make, particularly for an interim agreement. Both Mr. Cabot and the Ambassador expressed the hope that a fresh start could be made toward reaching an agreement and departed on that note.

The Ambassador in Mexico (White) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)

MEXICO CITY, February 8, 1954.

DEAR JACK: I have received this morning a copy of your memorandum of conversation of February 3rd[1] at the White House with the President and the Mexican Ambassador.

Just because the matter may come up again at the Caracas Conference,[2] which I assume you will attend, I should like to point out that while we have a very definite interest in channeling all Mexican laborers into the legal and out of the illegal field, this is not the problem that is concerned in the matter of wages. The only question is that the Mexican authorities have not lived up to the recently expired Agreement. It was the abuses that have resulted in the carrying out of that Agreement that caused it to break down. The Agreement is the fairest of any existing in the world for workers. Italians going to England and France do not have such protection; Spaniards going to Cuba and Argentina do not have that protection. Guatemalans coming into Mexico do not have that or any other protection. The wages are most fair and adequate. In the matter of wages, the workers have the following benefits: 1) They are getting the prevailing wages for American domestic workers; 2) This prevailing wage is determined and published by the Secretary of Labor; 3) The Secretary of Labor cannot publish a capricious figure but must find the facts and be prepared to defend them before an investigating committee; 4) The Secretary of Labor agrees not to publish a wage rate adversely affected by the presence of illegal Mexican workers; 5) Mexican workers are going to the country with the highest wage rates in the world, rates that are 12 to 15 times what they are in Mexico; 6) The United States guarantees payment of the wages, subsistence and transportation of the workers; and, 7) If the Mexican Government or its agents have reasons to believe that the Secretary of Labor has erred in his findings, they can always ask him to make a reexamination of the situation. Instead of doing this the Mexicans have attempted to fix wages in the United States which is contrary to our laws and to the Agreement. That is the nub of the matter, and has nothing to do with sumptuary legal points such as the prohibition laws. I am sorry this point was not brought out for the President's benefit, so that he would know that there is real substance to our position in the matter of wages. Should the matter come up at Caracas, where it is very important for our relations with the rest of Latin America, I hope our position will be clearly and forcefully stated.

With all good wishes,

Yours sincerely, FRANCIS

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] February 10, 1954.

DEAR FRANCIS: I have your letter of February 8[1] and I am sorry that my memorandum of conversation at the White House was not clearer. I do not think there is any essential difference between the view which you take and that which I took in the course of this conference. One of the principal difficulties with the whole agreement was unquestionably the abuses to which it was subjected by the Mexican consuls. These abuses were the straw that broke the camel's back. I think we must remember, however, that when wages are 12 to 15 times higher in the United States than they are in Mexico, as you point out, the question of abuses was not the only reason it broke down. The fact is that it would have been difficult to enforce no matter how smoothly it worked. There was, moreover, the fact that the whole agreement in itself entailed a good deal of red tape for the farmer employer.

My personal feeling is that no agreement—or unilateral arrangement—is going to work well. Because of the immense disparity in the economic levels of the two countries, Mexicans will enter illegally no matter how hard we and they try to prevent it. I do believe, however, that it is very desirable to have a bilateral agreement since it means a great deal in our relations with Mexico.

From our viewpoint the whole wage question is a phony, but I do think we must recognize that the Mexicans are sincere in raising it. It seems to me highly important that we should allay their suspicions on this point. On the other hand, I hope we can convince the Mexicans eventually that no agreement is better than one which does not work in practice, as the former one did not. Granted that abuses were partly responsible for this, I think the basic question is more fundamental.

With every good wish,

Very sincerely yours, JOHN M. CABOT

Subject: Mexican Migrant Labor Problem.

The United States position on the migrant labor agreement negotiations with Mexico has been that the urgency of an adequate solution to the problem has been so great we should either obtain all of our major points or control the migrant movement unilaterally. Legislation to authorize unilateral action has been reported out of Committee in both the Senate and House and will be debated on the House floor Monday, March 1.

After several months of fruitless negotiation, the Mexicans during the past two weeks have receded to a position generally acceptable to us on all but one point, that of border recruiting. Ambassador White feels that he has "squeezed all of the juice out of the lemon". He has reached a tentative understanding with the Mexicans that the border recruiting question should be referred to a joint commission for investigation and recommendation by June 30, 1954. Other lesser problems would also go to this commission. In view of the considerable success attained in the negotiations and the possibility of still obtaining border recruiting after the commission reports, we should press the Departments of Justice and Labor to accept such an agreement. This will have a beneficial effect on our over-all relations with Mexico and will be a salutary development in connection with the Caracas Conference.

An immediate problem arises out of the necessity of returning to Mexico no later than today some 35,000 workers who came here under the old agreement. Ambassador White has worked out an arrangement with the Mexicans to permit these workers to stay here pending the wind-up of negotiations for the new agreement. This will require a joint announcement today which will indicate the progress on the new agreement. Such an announcement has the one disadvantage of possibly weakening the chances of passage of the pending legislation, which, although probably no longer necessary for the immediate situation, is still desirable to have on the books for the long run.

Subject: Mexican Migrant Labor Legislation.

The Mexican migrant labor bill,[2] on which action was completed March 4 in Congress, has caused serious concern to the Mexican Government. This stems basically from Mexico's belief that, in the absence of legislation, we will be compelled to reach agreement with her in order to gain effective control over the migrant labor movement. Our desire for the legislation originated from the need to act unilaterally if we could not reach an agreement with Mexico which would provide effective control. Although agreement now appears close, the authority in the legislation will be very useful for future contingencies.

The fact is that authority exists for admission of Mexican workers in the absence of agreement with Mexico, but without this new legislation, there is no authority for expenditure of funds to control the movements and protect the interests of these workers.

[2] This bill amended Title V of the Agricultural Act of 1949 to authorize the Secretary of Labor to recruit Mexican workers for U.S. employment in the absence of a U.S.-Mexican Treaty, as long as the United States had made "every practicable effort" to reach an agreement. It was approved on Mar. 4, 1954, as Public Law 309; for text, see 68 Stat. 28.

Because the reasons in paragraph one have been recognized and emphasized in public discussion of the subject, the Mexican Government feels it would appear to be acting under duress if it signed an agreement shortly after the legislation becomes effective. It has asked that whatever possible be done to prevent the bill from becoming law.

During February when the legislation was passing through Congress, negotiations for an agreement with Mexico which began last October suddenly accelerated to the extent that conclusion of an agreement is now anticipated within a very few days, probably no later than March 10.[3] In view of the Mexican sensitivity on signing an agreement after the legislation becomes effective, and because they have told us that this problem would be less acute if the agreement is signed before the legislation, the Department recommends that Presidential action be delayed until March 15.

Mexican sensibilities would be further assuaged by a brief Presidential statement at the time the legislation is signed, pointing out the beneficial effects for Mexican workers mentioned in paragraph two above. A draft statement for possible use in this regard will be forwarded in the near future.

The above information has been furnished to the Bureau of the Budget.

[3] A new Migratory Labor Agreement with Mexico was in fact signed on this date and was scheduled to remain in force until Dec. 31, 1955. On the question of wages it stipulated that "wage rates paid to the Mexican worker may not be less than the prevailing wages for domestic laborers performing the same activity in the same area of employment as determined by the Secretary of Labor." Mexico had the right to request a review if it believed the prevailing wage rate for a specific area was incorrect. For the text of the agreement, see 5 UST 379.

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 8, 1954.

Subject: Report of Revolutionary Plotting in Mexico

Background:

Ambassador White has reported a conversation of February 13[1] in which the . . . said that he is taking part in a plan to overthrow the Mexican Government. Because his group is short of funds, they are joining forces with a political party, the Henriquistas, which opposed the Government party in the last presidential election. Although Henriquez, a wealthy construction contractor who has accepted extreme leftist support, received only a small number of votes in the presidential election, he has always asserted that he would have won if the elections had not been fraudulent. The Henriquistas allegedly have some military backing, some new military equipment, an abundance of ammunition, and substantial financial support.

Ambassador White told the informant, . . . that the U.S. Government will not intervene in the domestic affairs of other countries and that we will respect our commitments under various inter-American treaties. . . . said he knew our position but hoped for our sympathy and possible assistance.

Evaluation:

It seems unlikely that these plotters would be successful. Such plots are reported from time to time, but serious and successful revolutionary movements are usually not so specifically known in advance. The rumors about this plot have circulated sufficiently so that the Mexican Government is aware of the plot. The Government appears relatively strong and popular.

This information is submitted to you only as a precaution so you would be in the position of having been informed in the event there should be a revolutionary attempt in Mexico.

CONFIDENTIAL MEXICO CITY, June 3, 1954.

Subject: Report of Interview with President Ruiz Cortines

I called on President Ruiz Cortines by appointment at 7:30 last evening. He received me most graciously, as always, and the conference lasted just an hour.

After a few opening pleasantries, the President produced the aide-mémoire[1] I had given to Señor Padilla Nervo the day before setting forth the views of our Government regarding the consultative meeting under the Rio Treaty and the four points which we suggested the resolution might contain, as well as the four points supporting our position.

The President said he had the aide-mémoire and smiled and said I could see that he was getting a diplomatic education. He asked if I had come to him in connection with that matter or had I something else to take up. I told him no, I had come in connection with the possibility of a consultative meeting under the Rio Treaty. The aide-mémoire was in Spanish and the President read it out loud. He asked if I would like the matter taken up point by point or consider it as a whole and I told him I would be guided by his preference.

The President then read paragraph one and looked to me for comment and I told him that that set forth what we thought the facts of the case so far developed indicate and constituted findings that such a meeting could justifiably make. I referred in that connection to the information I had given him at our last meeting regarding Communist penetration into Guatemala. The President said that he had read that information with great care and that the long list of Guatemalans who had gone behind the Iron Curtain which I had sent to him had reached him while he was at Veracruz last week. He asked whether I wanted an acknowledgement of my letter or whether his very sincere thanks to me now for sending it would be sufficient. I told him that his statement that he had read the material and was happy to have it was what I wanted and not to think of bothering to send me an answer.

Then I referred to the recent secret shipment of arms to Guatemala. I read to the President and left with him a Spanish translation of the four points set forth in the Department's circular telegram No. 443 of May 29th.[2] The President seemed very much impressed at the furtive way the shipment had been made and observed that if Guatemala could not get arms from the United States or Mexico or other countries and needed arms for its own defense, it could have bought the armament in a perfectly normal and above-board way but doing it as they had had naturally caused one to feel that the transaction was not just a normal, proper one.

In this connection the President stated again that Mexico has sold no arms to Guatemala and added that since he has been in office Mexico has sold arms to nobody. The President was apparently impressed by the suggestion that for the Soviets to permit an arms supply from their satellites to Guatemala they must have confidence that the Government of Guatemala is following their objectives. He was also impressed by the fact that the minimum cost of the recent shipment was $10,000,000, and that Guatemala's military budget is less than $7,000,000. He inquired whether that meant their total budget including salaries and I told him that that was my understanding. He then commented that that would leave them only about half a million dollars for purchase of equipment and therefore such a large shipment is all the more subject to suspicion.

The President then read paragraphs two, three and four. After doing so, he asked me if I had discussed the matter with the Foreign Office. I told him that I had discussed it the day before with Señor Padilla Nervo. The President remarked that Señor Padilla Nervo was ill so he

[2] Circular telegram 443, not printed, was sent to all posts in Central and South America and repeated for information to Guatemala City. had not been able to discuss the matter with him. I told him that I would be glad to tell him of my conversation with Señor Padilla Nervo and the President said he would welcome it.[3]

I said that when I had handed the aide-mémoire to Señor Padilla he had read it over twice and I had then asked him for his personal views. Señor Padilla had emphasized that of course he had not seen the matter before and so had no chance to discuss it with the President or anybody else and had emphasized that while he was not speaking for the Mexican Government, he would give me his own personal views which were that he was in favor of a consultative meeting. The President interjected here to say that he had given orders to the Foreign Office last week after our conversation of May 24th[4] that Mexico's policy must be complete and full cooperation and friendship with the United States. That is to be the policy and it is up to the Foreign Office to find ways of implementing it. I expressed great gratification at this and added that we had been disappointed that this cooperation had not been achieved at Caracas.[5] The President said our objectives there had been the same and that the only obstacle to fuller cooperation was their Constitution; they must operate within its provisions. He did not elaborate on what constitutional provisions were involved and I did not press the point merely observing that in the present case I felt Mexico would not run into constitutional problems as every country has the right of self preservation and protection. The President assented and added that he is in full accord with President Eisenhower's policy set forth in his Memorial Day address at Columbia University[6] and mentioned specifically the President's statement about thought control. The experts in the Foreign Office had expressed their preference for a meeting of the representatives of all the American nations and not just consultation with Mexico and the Central American countries. The President said that he personally was gratified that this is what we are suggesting and that of course it is acceptable.

I then said that Señor Padilla had told me that he was very optimistic that such a conference calling on Guatemala under point four of our proposal would carry the necessary moral suasion to settle the matter. I said that he had also said that he was in accordance with the [5] At the Tenth Inter-American Conference the United States introduced a resolution, entitled "A Declaration of Solidarity for the Preservation of the Political Integrity of the American States Against International Communist Intervention." After several sessions of debate in which minor revisions were made, 17 of the American Republics voted in favor of the resolution, Argentina and Mexico abstained, and Guatemala voted against it. Further information is contained in Tenth Inter-American Conference, Caracas, Venezuela, Mar. 1–Mar. 28, 1954, Report of the Delegation of the United States of America with Related Documents (Department of State Publication 5692, Washington, May 1955). For documentation on the conference, see pp. 264 ff.

two points stipulated under No. 2, namely, measures to prevent further arms shipments to Guatemala and to stop the movement of Communist agents into and out of Guatemala but that he had told me that he was fearful that if sanctions were applied it might result in armed intervention and that he was opposed to armed intervention because it leaves wounds that take a long time to heal.

I told the President that I had replied to Señor Padilla that I of course hoped that moral suasion would be successful and that a united stand in that sense by all the American nations would give the anti-Communist element in Guatemala the added strength and courage to handle the matter themselves and get rid of the Communist domination but that I had told Señor Padilla very frankly that I did not share his optimism in this matter. I said that Communists have not shown themselves susceptible to any moral suasion. They have the definite purpose of controlling the world and doing it by any means possible and they will not be deterred by moral suasion. I added that they want to disrupt the Organization of American States and, being recalcitrant to any moral suasion would help that objective of theirs and they were perfectly willing to sacrifice Guatemala or Guatemalans in this attempt. I said that we have hopes, however, that if point two of our program should be carried out punctiliously and with publicity that might have more effect. I said it was not foreseeable at this time that there should have to be armed intervention in Guatemala as Señor Padilla Nervo fears but should the situation so develop, we would have to be able to meet again and consider it and I felt personally that it is most important that we should not be irresolute now but should think the thing through thoroughly and be prepared to do whatever is required to finish up the job. I called the President's attention again to the final paragraph of my aide-mémoire where it is stated that we have no feelings against the Guatemalan people and desire to take only the minimum measures required to stop and eradicate Communist penetration in Guatemala. I said I thought it would be fatal to the Organization of American States if the Soviets should get the idea that there are limitations in our inter-American agreements that would prevent us from doing what is necessary to get and keep them out of this Hemisphere. I said that after all the United States and fifteen other nations had fought the Communists in Korea on the other side of the world to try to defend freedom and it would be the utmost folly, in my opinion, to let them get the idea that we would not fight them on our own continent and that the American nations are not resolute in meeting this situation and standing together prepared to take whatever measures may eventually be necessary, starting out with those proposed in our program for the meeting but resolute to go as much further as may be required to do the job.

The President immediately and without hesitation said that he agreed completely. He said we have to do the job and stand together.

I had opened the conversation by telling the President that in this matter I had been instructed to discuss the situation with him personally as both my Government and I personally have the highest regard for his opinion and views and that we want to cooperate most fully with him and his Government. He thanked me for this confidence in him and said that this confidence is fully reciprocated in their feeling toward me and that he and his Government want to work with us and cooperate with us and have, as he had stated before, closer relations than we have with any other country. After he made the above statement on the action which we must be resolved to take, I thanked him most sincerely, personally and on behalf of my Government.

The President then proceeded with the reading of the memorandum covering the points to be stressed to the Mexican Government. After reading the sentence that Guatemala constitutes at the present time one of the various points of conflict between Soviet Communism and the free countries of the world, he stopped and said Guatemala is the only such link in the Western Hemisphere. I assented that fortunately Guatemala is the only Government the Soviets have so far been able to penetrate. He gave his assent to all the other points brought out in point one.

On point two he referred again to what I had told him of the subterfuges of the steamer Alfhem and when he got to the final clause saying that Guatemala was trying to cloud the issue by dragging in the matter of the United Fruit Company, he remarked that I had fully explained that point to him during our previous meeting.

He then read the third point about our position in the United Fruit Company matter and when he read the statement that before making any claim on behalf of the Fruit Company, the United States had formally and publicly proposed arbitration or adjudication by an international tribunal and that while this proposal still stood, Guatemala had ignored it, the President ejaculated "caramba!". He then read it over a second time and shook his head in apparent disapproval of Guatemala's action.

On point four, stating that the Communist penetration in Guatemala has been along similar lines in other places under the direction of the Kremlin, the President again interjected that these other places under the direction of the Kremlin are outside of this Hemisphere. I assented thereto.

The President then made a remark that indicated that the training of leaders was only in Guatemala. I replied that unfortunately that was not the case. I said that the same thing happened with Mexicans. He looked very much surprised and said that the Communist Party in Mexico, dating from 1918, is of no importance whatsoever. He mentioned Encina and one or two others and said Encina was half crazy and didn't amount to anything. I told him I had a memorandum with me that showed the recent travel of Mexicans to Soviet satellite nations and handed him a translation of a memorandum . . . listing the travel of Mexicans behind the Iron Curtain and pointed out to him that Mr. Encina was No. 1 on the list. He smiled at this and looked it over. It listed over twenty who have recently been behind the Iron Curtain, a number of whom are still there. The President remarked that there were one or two he didn't know of but he said there are one or two Communists also that I had not listed. I told him that this was not a list of Communists in Mexico but those who had recently travelled behind the Iron Curtain, some of whom are still there.

The President at once said that these people are not important and he said should it be necessary or should we so desire, he could have them all arrested in five minutes and would do so but he thought they were not important enough to warrant doing so. I told him I was not making any such request of him but merely wanted to show that Communists are as active here as they are in the United States. I said that I realized that the Communist Party here is not strong and important but it is the beginning and that I understand that recently there has been one significant change in the Communist Party in Mexico in that up to three or four years ago the members were rather ignorant and unimportant people who had no knowledge of conditions outside of Mexico but recently the Party has included people of some education who have been given trips at Communist expense to Communist China and to the European countries behind the Iron Curtain.

The President said that he was not blind to this fact but still felt that they are now unimportant but of course bear watching and he then made the categoric statement that there are no Communists in the Mexican Government. He referred to the recent newspaper articles listing high officials as Communists and said that that was ridiculous. I did not feel it was the time to go into any greater discussion of the matter with the President. I merely wanted to prepare the way for doing so at a later date should the Department feel it advisable for me to do so. I left the list with him.

I also told the President that in the last issue I had received here of U.S. News & World Report of May 28th, there was a very revealing and discouraging article of tortures recently carried out on Guatemalans which I found so shocking that I thought he would like to see it. I gave him the magazine with a Spanish translation of the article in question. The President had never seen the magazine before and said that he only had seen Time. I told him that I thought that this is one of our most serious magazines and mentioned that it was owned and edited by David Lawrence. He said that he knew Mr. Lawrence by reputation and he was one of the outstanding journalists of great prestige and immediately showed great interest in having the magazine and the article.

I then asked the President whether I might consider what he had told me about our suggestion for a resolution to be adopted at a consultative meeting as the reply to the Department's inquiry.

The President at once said that I might of course advise my Government of what he had said as setting forth the policy of his Government and their moral support of us but that as he does not know all the technicalities, he would prefer a formal answer to come to me through the Foreign Office and that he would give them instructions today. He added that due to Señor Padilla Nervo's illness it might be a few days before I got their formal reply.

611.12/9–2254

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 22, 1954.

Foreign Minister Padilla Nervo of Mexico called today to say he brought a personal message from the President of Mexico to affirm the friendship of our two countries and the determination of the Mexican Government to develop the most cordial relations. The Foreign Minister said that he felt that relations already were excellent and indeed that there was no time in our history when the feeling in Mexico towards the United States was as good as at the present time. He deplored some trouble-making articles written by Sydney Gruson of the New York Times, and said that he had often thought of asking the Times to substitute someone else to cover their Latin-American relations. I asked how he got along with Ambassador White. He said that he had the greatest respect for him, but felt that sometimes he was a litttle too rigid and "strong" in his presentation of matters, and did not adequately take into account the susceptibility of the Mexican people.

The Foreign Minister then went on to talk at great length about the problem of the Guatemalans who had sought asylum in the Mexican Embassy. He obviously felt that the United States position as presented by Ambassador White had been too exacting—in asking that they should either be returned to the present Government of Guatemala or sent to Iron Curtain countries. He referred to the Convention on Asylum to which Mexico was a party. He also said that on matters which involved points of honor, the Mexican people were highly sensitive. He said they would accept material sacrifice, such as was involved in the devaluation of the peso; but that if the national honor was touched, then they reacted strongly and unanimously. He felt that it was best to let the refugees disappear into anonymity rather than to make martyrs of them.

I then showed the Foreign Minister the draft of what I proposed to say in my UN speech with reference to the Organization of American States and Guatemala.[1] I said I did not want to say anything that could be offensive to his Government or hurt our relations. He read the statement and indicated only some slight reservations. He was obviously embarrassed lest the fact that Mexico had abstained at Caracas would be interpreted as indicating they were not sympathetic with the anti-Communist policy. He asked me to put in at one point "without exception" to indicate a present unanimity of viewpoint.

The Foreign Minister referred to the personal relations which had existed between us for many years and the high regard which he said he had of me, and wanted me to know that if ever the relations between our countries seemed embarrassed or strained, he was sure that he and I could personally find a solution.

NICARAGUA

UNITED STATES RELATIONS WITH NICARAGUA[1]

717.11/5–152

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President[2]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 1, 1952.

Subject: Visit of General Anastasio Somoza, President of Nicaragua

President Somoza of Nicaragua is having lunch with you at 1:00 p.m. on Friday, May 2. He is in Washington, accompanied by his wife, Salvadora De Bayle de Somoza, on route to the Lahey Clinic in Boston for medical treatment. His visit is entirely unofficial. President Somoza will come to the White House after calling on me in the morning.[3]

President Somoza has two sons: Luis, a Senator, and Anastasio Jr., a graduate of West Point (1946) and Chief of the General Staff. A daughter, Lillian, is married to Nicaragua's present Ambassador to the United States, Guillermo Sevilla-Sacasa. He is proud of the fact that he has ten grandchildren, and also that one son is married to an American. As a young man Somoza lived in Philadelphia for six years and there met his Nicaraguan wife. He speaks fluent English and likes to recall your visit to Nicaragua when you toured Central America on a special mission as Senator.

Somoza is an able man with an engaging personality. He is informal, genial, energetic, persuasive and politically astute. He is also impulsive, vain and egocentric. His desire for personal gain is very great.

In 1933 he became and still remains Director General of the Nicaraguan National Guard which the American occupation forces had organized. In 1936 he ousted the president. In a subsequent vote he was overwhelmingly elected to the presidency. He served in this office from 1937 to 1947. His present term runs from 1950 to 1957.

While the Nicaraguan government is democratic and republican in form, President Somoza has run it largely as a one man show. His methods have often been criticized in the United States and Latin America. He has, however, restored order to Nicaragua and in recent years has been less repressive. Nicaragua now has a two party system and a free press. Recent delegations to international meetings have been bi-partisan.

Nicaragua has consistently supported United States foreign policy. The government and the people give every evidence of friendship to the United States and our prior occupation of Nicaragua has left no residue of ill-feeling. Somoza, himself, is a great admirer of this country and he considers his official visit in 1939 as guest of President Roosevelt a highlight of his career. The Fourth of July is celebrated enthusiastically throughout Nicaragua.

The tension which intermittently characterized Somoza's relations in Central America in the post war period has been eased since the Nicaraguan and Guatemalan governments recognized each other last year and joined the newly formed Organization of Central American States. Somoza remains, however, a target for a loosely knit group of revolutionaries and expatriates frequently called the Caribbean Legion.

Recently, Somoza has shown active interest in economic development, particularly road construction. The Nicaraguan highway department has done excellent work on the Inter-American Highway and construction of feeder roads is being carried on vigorously with funds loaned by the International Bank. Somoza's present administration has greatly improved Nicaragua's financial and economic position.

Somoza especially desires completion of the Rama Road, a lateral route across Nicaragua which President Roosevelt undertook to construct with United States Emergency Funds as a substitute for the ship canal authorized in the Bryan–Chamorro Treaty of 1914. Undoubtedly, he will discuss this matter with Congressmen here. Authorizing legislation is now before the Congress in the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1952.

President Somoza has not indicated any special matters he would like to raise with you. Likewise, there are no matters which we wish to raise with him. However, he may bring up the question of the Rama Road. If so, you may wish to assure him that the Department of State has been supporting legislation for the Rama Road. To date, 4 million dollars, provided from President Roosevelt's Emergency Fund, has been spent on this project. Pending legislation if passed will authorize the expenditure of 8 million dollars in two years to complete the job. Both the House and Senate Committees on Public Works have favorably reported this item.

Should Somoza bring up the question of development loans, he should not be encouraged to believe that the United States is interested in supporting any new application to the Export-Import Bank at this time. Nicaragua and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development are currently working up a balanced five year program of economic development to cost from 55–75 million dollars. He should be encouraged to continue to work with the IBRD as the logical source of development program planning and loans. The IBRD program, if adopted, would probably absorb Nicaragua's financial capacity. We should not encourage anything which might lead to an over-extension and to political repercussions in Nicaragua.

As for Point IV, an effective program is underway. Any large expansion at this time might also create an impediment to financing the IBRD program.

Memorandum by the Officer in Charge of Central America and Panama Affairs (Siracusa) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 6, 1952.

You may be interested in the following information on the IBRD program being developed by Nicaragua.

The IBRD mission in its report[1] stated that "few underdeveloped countries have the sheer physical potentials for growth possessed by Nicaragua" and that "the country, in relation to population, has almost unlimited land for development, land which can grow almost every tropical crop and a number of crops not typically tropical".

After commenting on the fact that the country's fiscal, administrative and monetary systems are inferior to the country's physical potentialities, the report states that with the greatly improved political stability in recent years and a favorable world outlook, the stage is set for a period of growth and development unparalleled in the country's history.

The report presents both a minimum and an optimum program, the first calling for total expenditure in five years of over $57 million and the latter of over $74 million.

The stated aims of the program are:

a) Increase the level of real per capita income in five years by 15 percent, allowing in this estimate for natural population growth; and,

b) Increase the physical volume of agricultural and industrial production by 25 percent.

The IBRD mission believes such a program to be well within Nicaragua's capacity to finance. It recognizes, however, that it is asking Nicaragua to do as much in five years as she probably has accomplished in the last 50 years.

Our Embassy, in commenting on the report, states that it is in general agreement with the stated objectives although it feels that the report tends to gloss over and minimize the very real and serious obstacles which will be encountered in attempting to implement the recommendations therein. Principally, the Embassy feels that, because the capacity to finance is largely dependent upon external circumstances (world market prices, etc.) which are beyond the ability of Nicaragua to control, it may be too optimistic to project these accomplishments upon present expectations. It also makes other technical criticisms related to the incidence of taxation in the country, etc.

It is my opinion that, if Somoza keeps his health and remains in control, Nicaragua has grounds for real optimism in the next few years. Somoza has gone through a necessary period in establishing stability in the country and is giving increasing evidence of a forward-looking determination to do something for the lasting and general good of the country. Happily, the physical capacity exists in Nicaragua and this, coupled with the proper intent and resourcefulness, should produce solid results.

Miller files, lot 53 D 26, "Nicaragua"

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 29, 1952.

Subject: Nicaragua's Desire for Arms

Participants: Señor Dr. Don Guillermo Sevilla-Sacasa, Ambassador of Nicaragua
ARA—Mr. Mann
MID—Mr. Ohmans

The Ambassador called on Mr. Mann at the latter's request to continue the discussion of September 26[2] concerning the plans of the Central American nations to join in action against Guatemala.

The Ambassador devoted a considerable part of the discussion to Nicaragua's urgent need for arms. He said confidentially that Nicaragua needed usable arms badly.

[1] Drafted with the assistance of Mr. Ohmans.

[2] Ambassador Sevilla Sacasa met with Mr. Mann for only a short time on this date but indicated that Nicaragua was considering the possibility of organizing a military group of Central American states to overthrow the Guatemalan Government (Miller files, lot 53 D 26, "Nicaragua").

The Ambassador referred again to the many advantages that Nicaragua offered for the cooperative defense of the Panama Canal and he expressed the hope that the Joint Chiefs of Staff would decide that negotiations should be initiated with Nicaragua to conclude an agreement under the Mutual Defense Assistance Grant Aid Program.

Referring to Nicaragua's desire to purchase arms from the United States, the Ambassador said that his country was in no position financially to purchase the arms it needed. He emphasized the great concern of his government over the activities of Arbenz in Guatemala, who, he said, was stronger now than he was five months ago, and also expressed concern with the growing strength of the Figueristas in Costa Rica. He said that Romulo Betancourt[3] was the guiding hand behind Figueres and that a Figueres victory in Costa Rica would contribute greatly in the resurgence of Betancourt's power in Venezuela. He said quite frankly that Nicaragua did not have any effective arms to contain any action from outside the country or to maintain internal peace.

Mr. Mann then said that he wanted to speak very frankly and very carefully to the Ambassador and emphasized that although his remarks were in the friendliest manner possible, he was speaking officially for the State Department. He made the following points:

1. The United States is very friendly with Nicaragua and holds the friendship of that nation in the highest esteem.

2. The United States shares the concern of Nicaragua over the spread of communism in Guatemala.

3. The United States agrees that Nicaragua should have an adequate quantity of modern arms. Here he pointed out that the manner of getting those arms was a problem which had to be considered in the light of existing U.S. legislation available to provide transfer of the arms to Nicaragua. Mr. Mann said that the Department of State did not know what the Joint Chiefs of Staff would say with respect to the negotiations of a military assistance pact with Nicaragua. The program as developed in several of the Latin American countries was strictly a military plan and the State Department did not wish to recommend that defense considerations be subordinated to political desires. If the Joint Chiefs of Staff should decide that Nicaragua's participation is necessary to an adequate defense preparation, the Department of State would not be in opposition. Mr. Mann suggested that the Ambassador might talk with Major General Robert Walsh on this subject.

4. Mr. Mann mentioned his understanding that the Western Arms Company had offered to buy Nicaragua's old arms which would help in meeting some of the costs of the acquisition of new arms. He inquired whether the Ambassador was aware of negotiations which had been carried on in Managua. He said that if Nicaragua decided to sell its old arms to the Western Arms Corporation, the problem of payment would at least partially be solved. Mr. Mann suggested it might be helpful to know how much had been offered by the private corporation.

5. With respect to any loans for the purchase of arms, Mr. Mann said that he did not know of the Export-Import Bank policy, but doubted if under the bank's policy a loan would be possible for the purchase of the arms. This, however, is something which would have to be explored with the Bank.

6. Mr. Mann said that the Department of State considers that the problem of Figueres in Costa Rica is different from the Guatemalan problem. He said that if Figueres becomes President of Costa Rica, he saw no cause for fear of Costa Rican aggression since the Rio Treaty[4] would be applicable in such an event.

7. Mr. Mann then went on to refer to the subject of great importance which the Ambassador had discussed with Mr. Miller and Mr. Mann on Friday, September 26.[5] He made these points:

a) The Department of State does not believe it wise to speak of military adventure against Guatemala participated in by a group of American States. The United States has subscribed to principles in the UN and the OAS which are inconsistent with military adventures of this kind, and we would find it difficult to fight aggression in Korea and be a party to it in this hemisphere. Mr. Mann said that no responsible person could say that if the military adventure were consummated we would give tacit approval to it. Furthermore, the proposal was, as a practical matter, reckless since it would not be possible to maintain secrecy as is illustrated by the fact that the Department already has received vague press inquiries concerning the plan.

b) Mr. Mann said that he thought it might be constructive to consider whether it would be practicable to deal with the problem of communism in Guatemala in a legal way, as, for example, in the Organization of Central American States or in the Organization of American States. Consideration might be given by all countries concerned with the problem of communism as to whether the Rio Treaty is applicable and if so how much unanimity of opinion there might be concerning its applicability. He said that he was not in a position to make any definitive statements, but that if the other interested states felt likewise, the idea would certainly be worth exploring. Mr. Mann said that it was apparent from the foregoing that there was a common desire to face up to the question of communism and that as far as he knew the difference in the United States and Nicaraguan position might be called one of procedure.

The Ambassador of Nicaragua was obviously disappointed to hear that the Department did not give at least tacit approval to the suggestion of a military operation but he nevertheless expressed himself as understanding very clearly the Department's position and the reasons for it.

During the course of the conversation Mr. Mann stated that Mr. Miller planned to speak along these same general lines to Zuleta Angel of Colombia should they meet in Panama and that if a suitable opportunity presents itself, to "Tachito" Somoza (the President's son).

The Ambassador in Nicaragua (Whelan) to the Department of State[1]

SECRET
No. 430

MANAGUA, March 6, 1953.

Subject: Policy Toward Nicaragua

In view of possible adjustments of our policy toward Latin America, this Embassy wonders if the time is not appropriate to invite the Department's attention to the strategic importance of the Republic of Nicaragua, not only in relation to Hemispheric Defense but also in relation to the spread of Communism from Guatemala.

President Somoza previously informed this Embassy unofficially that he would like to have Nicaragua considered for Military Grant aid under the Mutual Security Act and that he would like Military Training Missions for the Nicaraguan National Guard and the Air Force. The request for the Air Mission was finally transmitted through official channels and a Mission will arrive in April. He has not asked officially for military aid or a mission to train the National Guard because he has heard from some source that we would refuse the request.

Whatever may have been the reason for the Department's disinclination to consider military aid for Nicaragua, the Embassy believes it was based upon conditions which no longer exist. This country has undergone an almost complete transformation within the last ten years. One has but to read the report of the Mission of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development to get a picture of the tremendous changes in the economy of the country and the almost boundless opportunities for its future development. The general political situation (which will shortly be reviewed in a report from this Embassy) is stable for the first time during this century. Despite the widespread impression to the contrary, Somoza is not a dictator in the true sense of the word. Somoza's political enemies have joined him. Most of them have grown old and feeble. The Embassy knows of no one who could successfully challenge his political position.

[1] Drafted by Rolland Welch, First Secretary of the Embassy in Nicaragua.

It seems to have been customary in some quarters to have attacked Somoza's character. The Embassy agrees that he appears to have an insatiable thirst for money and a considerable love of power. Nevertheless, the Embassy believes in his expressions of friendship for the United States. During the last war he virtually offered to turn this country over to us. He says (and we believe him), he would do so again. He has consistently instructed his delegates to United Nations Assemblies to cast their votes in support of the policy of the United States. He once offered his services in combatting the spread of communism from Guatemala but cancelled his plans when he learned they were unacceptable to us. He has repeatedly said that he would do exactly as we say, and we know of nothing in his record that shows any inclination to fail us in international matters. It is probably true that he admires Latin America's "strong men"—including, for that matter, Peron—but he recognizes that his country's real ties are with the United States.

He said in a press interview in New York some months ago, in reply to questions about political conditions in this hemisphere, "we are tied to the United States, if it should fail, obviously we will all fail."

He has said that while he wished to do what we wanted him to do, he has frequently had difficulty in learning our opinions because we have been evasive. In the Embassy's opinion Somoza talks straight and likes straight talk. In our efforts to help in the development of the country (inter-American highway or Point IV), Somoza has consistently matched our financial contributions or has exceeded them. Yet he has complained that we have not required other countries to match dollar for dollar in development programs. The Embassy recognizes considerable truth to his statement that we have done more for our enemies than for our friends. The Embassy also believes that in some respects we have not accepted the friendship he has proffered us, and we have not taken full advantage of his willingness to be helpful.

Fear has been expressed in the past that if Nicaragua had stronger military forces, Somoza might use them against Figueres in Costa Rica, for whom he seems to have unrelenting hatred. While Somoza thinks that as of now Figueres will be elected President of Costa Rica and that that country will then become another Guatemala, he has said many times that we need not fear that he will take any action without consultation and approval.

In fact, the Embassy does not believe military aid would have to be so large as to make his forces a threat to neighboring states. It is believed that such a force might actually be a comfort to El Salvador and Honduras where there is current fear of communist infiltration from Guatemala. There have recently been talks between leaders of military forces in Nicaragua, El Salvador and Honduras and we understand these conversations explored the possibility of presenting a common front in the event of trouble with Guatemala. Somoza has frequently proposed a meeting of the Presidents of the Central American states or of the countries of the Caribbean area (see my despatch 416 of March 3, 1953),[2] and he firmly believes that such a meeting would lead to the creation of an active anti-communist bloque. He would wish to be guided by the United States in calling such a meeting and would solicit our advice as to matters to be discussed.

Nothing has been said to encourage the President to indulge in wishful thinking, but it is certain that he would request through official channels military aid and a Training Mission (either or both) if he thought the request would be received favorably.

We believe that his ideas about calling a meeting of Presidents and his wishes for a Military Mission and of Military Grant aid are worthy of consideration and further exploratory conversations.

Subject: Proposal for a Military Agreement between the U.S. and Nicaragua

Participants: Señor Dr. Guillermo Sevilla Sacasa, Ambassador of Nicaragua
U—The Undersecretary[1]
ARA—Mr. Mann

The Ambassador called at his request on the Undersecretary and, after presenting the greetings of President Somoza, spoke of the concern of his Government with the growth of communist influence in Guatemala. He said that because of the disparity in military strength between Guatemala and its neighbors to the south there was, in the opinion of Nicaragua, both a danger of communist infiltration from Guatemala into small neighboring republics and a risk that these neighboring states would reach an understanding with Guatemala. Communist influence also exists to a lesser degree in Costa Rica and the communist plan doubtless is eventually to control Central America, Panama and Venezuela. He described the situation in Venezuela as "not good".

[1] Walter Bedell Smith.

The Ambassador then said that Nicaragua, as the traditional and constant friend of the United States, is the logical and strategic place to build up as an anti-communist bulwark. Nicaragua needs arms and is ready to sign a bilateral western hemisphere agreement similar to the ones which exist between the United States and some seven other American Republics. Nicaragua is prepared, he said, to sign irrespective of whether or not similar agreements are signed with other Central American countries.

The Undersecretary said that he valued Nicaragua's friendship and shared the Ambassador's apprehensions concerning the dangers which communism represent in Central America. He said that the possibility of entering into agreements of the kind mentioned by the Ambassador is already under consideration and he instructed Mr. Mann to expedite a decision.

After leaving the Undersecretary's office the Ambassador informed Mr. Mann that he was very pleased with the conversation.

Editorial Note

In a letter to Secretary of Defense Wilson dated April 9, 1953, Secretary of State Dulles recommended that Nicaragua, as well as El Salvador and Honduras, be declared eligible for military grant aid assistance under the Mutual Security Act of 1951 (716.5 MSP/4–953). On December 9, 1953 in a memorandum to Foreign Operations Administration Director Stassen, President Eisenhower authorized the initiation of bilateral military negotiations with all three nations (717.5 MSP/12–1453). Negotiations between the United States and Nicaragua began in February 1954, and a bilateral military assistance agreement was signed on April 23, 1954 (despatch 426 from Managua, dated April 23, 1954, 717.5 MSP/4–2354). CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 5, 1954.

Subject: President Somoza's Charges Against President Figueres

President Somoza has charged unofficially and semi-publicly that President Figueres was involved in the recent assassination plot against him in the following ways: (a) That he allowed the revolutionaries to plot and to form up in Costa Rica, despite warnings of the intended action by the Nicaraguan Ambassador to Costa Rica; (b) that Figueres personally plotted with Romulo Betancourt and Juan Bosch,[2] among others, this assassination attempt; and (c) that Figueres and his Administration assisted the revolutionaries to buy arms in Costa Rica.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Ohmans.

[2] Writer and politician from the Dominican Republic who founded the Dominican Revolutionary Party in 1939.

The Embassy in Managua was allowed to photograph many of the documents and the arms taken from the revolutionaries. The pictures showed clearly that boxes carrying the ammunition came from Punta Arenas, Costa Rica. The photographs in the possession of the Department do not clearly implicate Figueres, although there are frequent references in the captured documents to the arms obtained from the Government in Costa Rica. There are many rumors of Figueres' personal involvement, even to the extent of bidding the plotters good-bye as they left Costa Rica, but the Department is not in possession of any definite information. Perhaps President Somoza obtained some confessions from the plotters who were not killed immediately. Incidentally, two Costa Ricans, including a former member of Figueres' Presidential staff, were among those killed.

152. Deptel 142, May 6.[1] Somoza's principal evidence is 45-page single spaced confession of Rivas Montesa, Legionnaire[2] from Honduras, and shorter confessions of Legionnaire Gustavo Zavala and Luis Armando Morales Palacios.[3] All entered from Costa Rica. Weakness of confessions is that they connect Figueres often by quoting Pablo Leal who was killed and Manuel Gómez who has escaped capture. . . .

The Costa Rican Ambassador told us yesterday his stand is Somoza's statements are pack of lies. Nevertheless, the confessions make convincing reading. Rivas goes back many years connecting Figueres with Legion activities and attempted revolutions several countries. As to the April 3–4 attempt the most direct charges taken at random from his confession follow:

"It was the President of Costa Rica who most encouraged preparations. He gave orders to Vice Minister Security Humberto Pacheco, the Secretary of General Command Colonel Rodolfo Quiroz and later to Director General Guardia Civil Colonel Rodolfo Herrera Pinto. Chief of detectives Cambronero had instructions to cooperate, and on more than half dozen occasions he had interviews with Pablo Leal and Juan Bosch. Figueres told Juan Bosch to remove arms hidden in Pablo

[1] Department telegram 142 to Managua urgently requested the Embassy's convictions on the extent to which President Figueres of Costa Rica was personally involved in the Somoza assassination plot (717.00/5–654).

[2] Reference is to the Caribbean Legion.

[3] Nicaraguan officials apprehended these men in the attempt on Somoza's life. Testimony was not elicited from the other two leading participants, Leal and Gómez, for the reasons mentioned in the text.

Leal's house so police could search it and find nothing. Figueres offered Juan Bosch 100 Mausers. He got 50 and when Bosch asked for the rest he got 30 more.

"Early in February Figueres gave Bosch a Colt machine gun which was brought from Figueres' ranch. Later he gave two more Colt machine guns brought us by Colonel Herrera Pinto and Juan Bosch. According to Bosch, the President met with him and Romulo Betancourt to talk of the movement. Pablo Leal met with Figueres half dozen times. One or two days before leaving San Jose, Pablo Leal, Manuel Gómez, Juan Bosch and maybe one or two others met with Figueres who wished them good luck. The President loaned two trucks to take us to the border.

"Early in March Figueres' adjutant, called Nato Jimenez, a captain, got license plates (he means Guardia Civil plates) for Leal's Landrover to take arms to border. In 1951 ex-Doctor Henriquez said he was looking for three men in Mexico to assassinate Somoza, that Jose Figueres would pay $30,000."

Somoza says Rivas' brother-in-law is Chief of Administration of Ministry Fomento San Jose, father-in-law collector customs Punto Arenas.

Gustavo Zavala's statement includes following remarks: Leal said half the arms were coming from Mexico and half from Figueres. I heard many times Figueres was backing us. Also cooperating were Vico Pacheco and Colonel Rodolfo Herrera. Colonel Herrera accompanied us from Sanisidro de Coronado to beyond Alejuela March 30. Manuel Gómez told me he had obtained arms from Figueres. He told me the afternoon before leaving he had just seen Figueres. Pablo Leal said Figueres was very enthusiastic. Figueres offered a radio transmitter to control action. The arms were carried in Figueres' trucks. The chauffeurs told me they belonged Figueres.

Confession from Luis Armando Morales Palacios adds little except jeep with Guardia Civil plates accompanied them when they left San Jose. He said that at an earlier date he was told a group of Caribbean Legionnaires were training on Figueres' ranch for invasion Nicaragua.

Copies these confessions being pouched.

tevideo I think Washington would be a better place. The Ambassador as Dean of the Latin American Diplomatic Corps there should be of considerable help to the Department and he has instructions to follow any suggestions the Department may make. As for myself I would be pleased to communicate personally with President Peron if the Department would like me to try to enlist his support. I would certainly be most surprised if he sided with the Guatemalan rather than the Nicaraguan point of view. Perhaps I can be helpful with other countries but I will not do anything until I hear from my Ambassador."

In this conversation as in all others he directly connected Figueres and Arbenz saying he had definite proof they were still working to bring about his downfall. In fact on this occasion he gave us the names of several who he said "while working for Figueres are secretly my own agents giving me detailed report".[3]

Embassy is sending separately upon this matter. Meanwhile it is plain he thinks the best proof he has of Guatemala's threat to Nicaragua is Guatemala's connection with Figueres scheming. I have repeatedly stressed Department's desire is to adhere to the single topic of Communist influence in Guatemala and I assumed Department has made this equally plain to Sevilla Sacasa upon whose advice the press seems to be relying.

617.18/7–1354

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Under Secretary of State (Smith)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 13, 1954.

Subject: Costa Rican-Nicaraguan Political Difficulties

1. Current tensions between Costa Rica and Nicaragua are largely reflections of the great personal and ideological incompatibilities of their leaders. Figueres of Costa Rica is an extreme liberal; Somoza of Nicaragua is an authoritarian supported by a strong military organization. Both support the United States, but they hate each other.

2. In 1948 Figueres led a successful "war of liberation" against corrupt followers of ex-President Calderon who fled to neighboring countries. Late in that year the Calderonistas tried to return to Costa Rica from Nicaragua with some support from Somoza. They were unsuccessful, and the OAS helped to negotiate a new friendship pact between the two countries.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Ohmans.

3. In April 1954 Nicaraguan exiles came into Nicaragua from Costa Rica to try to assassinate Somoza. They failed. Somoza freely charged that Figueres aided the revolutionary group, providing arms and a base for the planning, and demanded that Costa Rica deport a number of Nicaraguan exiles. Costa Rica answered the note after some delay, saying its officials were not involved, but admitted that the Nicaraguan plotters came from Costa Rica. It said that three of the exiles would be deported.

4. Venezuela has considered Costa Rica a greater menace than Guatemala because its former liberal president, Romulo Betancourt, is in exile there and allegedly plotting his return to Venezuela. There is substantial reason to believe its officials are plotting against Figueres. One of its planes recently dropped pamphlets over Costa Rica's capital attacking the Figueres and Betancourt association.

5. After Army-less Costa Rica unsuccessfully sought a military aid treaty with the United States, they bought a half million dollars worth of light arms. Shipment was delayed during the Guatemalan crisis, but will arrive in Costa Rica on July 14. Costa Rica has exploited the shipment as an indication of United States support. Both Venezuela and Nicaragua have been informed in advance, but Venezuela in particular resents this action by the United States.

6. Recently Costa Rica nervously has reported concentrations of men in southern Nicaragua preparatory to entering Costa Rica. Costa Rica's Foreign Minister has been especially jittery and anxious for the arms to arrive. The Costa Ricans blacked out San Jose Friday night, but on Saturday Figueres said all was tranquil.

7. The Department has endeavored to ameliorate the political tensions in the area. It has worked through United States Ambassadors in Nicaragua, Venezuela, and Costa Rica to inform all concerned of our great desire to see stable political conditions return once more to the Central American area.

[1]This telegram was drafted by Messrs. Holland, Woodward, and Ohmans and approved by Mr. Woodward. It was repeated for information to San José as telegram 46.

After Nicaraguan note May 15[2] Department urged Costa Rica reply promptly and in conciliatory terms. She did on June 24.[3] Department then agreed with Ambassador Sevilla-Sacasa it would undertake persuade Costa Rica deport certain Nicaraguans whose deportation Nicaragua represented would end all its complaints against Costa Rica. Sevilla-Sacasa gave Department President Somoza's assurance that immediately upon report from Department exiles had left Costa Rica he would express gratification and propose meeting of chancellors discuss re-establishment cordial relations. Somoza requested this agreement not be revealed to Costa Rican Government so Department stated only Costa Rica could confidently anticipate gesture of cordiality from Nicaragua in response to expulsion. Fulfilling its part of agreement Department urgently recommended deportation listed individuals. On July 15 Figueres promised compliance by today and apparently will actually perform by Sunday. On July 15 Department notified Sevilla-Sacasa exiles would leave Costa Rica on July 23 and requested his Government be prepared immediately afterwards fulfill its agreement to request meeting Foreign Ministers.

Under circumstances stern note to Costa Rica from Nicaragua delivered today[4] most unfortunate making it difficult Figueres expel exiles, constituting move inconsistent with agreement with Department which has been collaborating closely and placing Department exceedingly embarrassing situation in view its assurances to Figueres of gesture of cordiality from Nicaragua.

[2] Presumably the note referred to in telegram 159 from Managua, dated May 17, 1954, p. 1382.

[3] Telegram 230, dated June 26, 1954, reported that the Costa Rican note was conciliatory but that it cleared all Costa Rican officials of complicity in the assassination attempt with the exception of those in Puntarenas who permitted concealed arms to enter Nicaragua (617.18/6–2654). President Somoza was reportedly not satisfied with the note, indicating that he would never be happy as long as Costa Rican President Figueres remained in office and continued plotting against him (telegram 9 from Managua, dated July 6, 1954, 617.18/7–654). No copy of the Costa Rican reply was found in Department of State files.

[4] Telegram 44 from San José reported that this reply to the Costa Rican note of June 24 accused the Costa Rican Government of violating the spirit and letter of the 1949 friendship treaty and that its note of June 24 indicated that Costa Rica was not disposed to renew friendly relations with Nicaragua. The Nicaraguan message indicated that since Nicaragua had not received satisfaction from Costa Rica, it would seek redress from "international law." The Embassy in Managua interpreted this to mean that the Nicaraguan Government would refer the case to the Organization of American States. (617.18/7–2354) President Somoza later explained that Costa Rica's failure to expel those involved in the assassination plot, and its refusal to admit involvement in it or to promise to prevent its recurrence, justified the stern tone of the note. Somoza maintained that persons in Costa Rica implicated in the conspiracy were simply being allowed to leave of their own free will with permission to return in the future. (617.18/7–2454)

Ambassador should do utmost obtain Somoza's assurance that if Figueres does expel exiles despite Nicaraguan note of today Somoza will immediately and in cordial terms propose chancellors meeting thereby fulfilling agreement with Department. Ambassador should also suggest to Somoza that effective preliminary method of showing good faith would be to take steps discourage shipment into Costa Rica of Nicaraguan newspapers with inflammatory articles critical Figueres.

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 28, 1954—6:50 p. m.

Subject: Nicaragua–Costa Rica Situation

Participants: American Ambassador Thomas E. Whelan—Managua, Nicaragua
Assistant Secretary Henry F. Holland

Mr. Holland telephoned Ambassador Whelan and said he was calling at the Secretary's request. The Secretary asked that Whelan transmit a personal message from him to President Somoza. The message is that a continuation of the present state of tension between Nicaragua and Costa Rica will create and is creating serious problems for the Secretary and for this Government both in our domestic political picture here and in our international sphere, particularly in the UN; that the Secretary would be grateful if our good friend, and we know he is our good friend, President Somoza would take those steps that will be effective to bring about a rapid dissipation of this tension that exists between those two countries, confident that in taking those steps he can count on our collaboration and our support. Mr. Holland said that the Secretary would be grateful if Whelan would go and convey this personal message to President Somoza and give us a ring here transmitting whatever it is President Somoza wants to report back.

[1] Drafted by Mabel Karydakis of the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs.

Ambassador Whelan asked if Mr. Holland has seen his telegram No. 19 which he said was "the ball game".[2] Mr. Holland said that he was familiar with the telegram but felt that, nevertheless, in view of the fact that the Secretary would like this personal message transmitted, it would probably be sound if Whelan would see President Somoza and express those views to him and transmit to us what he says. Whelan said that he was to see the President about seven o'clock but would try to see him right away and would telephone Mr. Holland right back if he could.

Mr. Holland said in an effort to put this thing in shape where we could dispel this tension he had done some more talking with our Embassy in Costa Rica and if President Somoza will repeat the request made in his earlier note to Costa Rica that the two Foreign Ministers meet to discuss a solution of this thing he was sure that Somoza's proposal would immediately be accepted.

[2]Telegram 19 from Managua, dated July 27, 1954, stated that the departure from Costa Rica of most of the individuals believed to have been involved in the assassination plot had somewhat placated President Somoza. However, the Costa Rican announcement that these individuals left the country voluntarily caused him to insist that the Government of Costa Rica submit to Nicaragua a written communication certifying that all the persons named in his May 15 note had been deported. Only then would Somoza authorize his Foreign Minister to meet with his Costa Rican counterpart to normalize relations between the two countries. (617.18/7–2754)

Editorial Note

In telegram 21 from Managua, dated July 28, 1954, the Embassy reported that President Somoza insisted that the Government of Costa Rica (1) submit in writing assurances that Rómulo Betancourt and others allegedly involved in the assassination attempt be deported, (2) undertake to investigate fully the complicity of all officials suspected of involvement, and (3) return three persons taken the previous week from Nicaraguan soil (617.18/7–2854). Assistant Secretary Holland telephoned Ambassador Whelan on July 30, 1954, to report that the Costa Rican Ambassador had delivered a note which advised the United States that Costa Rica was taking action which appeared to satisfy President Somoza's three conditions. The note to the United States, however, did not specifically name Betancourt as one of the individuals who had been deported, a condition which Ambassador Whelan believed that Somoza would insist upon. (Memorandum of telephone conversation by Mr. Holland, dated July 30, 1954, 617.18/7–3054) In telegram 64, dated August 7, 1954, the Embassy in San José reported that Costa Rica would not include Betancourt's name in an official note to Nicaragua since the Costa Rican Foreign Minister had publicly stated that Betancourt could return to Costa Rica in the future (617.18/8–754). Telegram 38, dated August 8, 1954, confirmed that President Somoza would only accept a Costa Rican note which specifically included Betancourt's name in the list of persons outside of Costa Rica to whom reentry to Costa Rica would be refused (617.18/8–854). At the Secretary of State's staff meeting on August 12, 1954, Assistant Secretary Holland reported that United States efforts to reduce tension between Costa Rica and Nicaragua had been unsuccessful. He therefore recommended that no further efforts be made to placate Somoza and that the Department should "let it be known to Somoza by appropriate means that he had impaired his position with the United States." Under Secretary Smith concurred. (Secretary's Staff Meetings, lot 63 D 75, Note No. 255) For the balance of 1954, relations between Costa Rica and Nicaragua remained tense despite continuous United States efforts to arrange a mutually acceptable solution to the controversy.

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND PANAMA[1]

719.001/1–1152

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 17, 1952.

Subject: Situation in Panama

With reference to the question which you raised with me last Friday,[2] the United States Embassy in Panama has reported a marked increase in recent weeks of communist activity in the Republic of Panama. This report comes at a time of severe economic depression and increasing political tension arising from the developing campaign for presidential elections in May. It has created concern regarding the possible impact of these developments on United States interests in Panama. Ambassador Wiley has proposed, as a counter-measure, immediate United States economic assistance to Panama with a view to alleviating the current widespread unemployment there.

The Department is alert to the situation and has requested on an urgent basis a National Intelligence Estimate.[3] This estimate will be directed primarily toward an assessment of the current and potential communist strength and capabilities in Panama and of the factors there which are conducive to communist penetration and influence. It will be used as a basis for determining whether in fact the communist threat is sufficiently serious that emergency measures should be taken by this Government in Panama and in the Canal Zone to safeguard our national interests on the Isthmus. An anti-communist propaganda campaign of significant proportions has already been launched by the Department.

Special Estimate[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 24, 1952.
SE–21

PROBABLE POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS IN THE REPUBLIC OF PANAMA THROUGH MID-1952[2]

THE PROBLEM

To estimate probable political developments in the Republic of Panama through mid-1952 with special reference to Communist and other anti-US developments which might adversely affect US interests in Panama.

CONCLUSIONS

1. As an organized political entity operating in its own name, the Communist Party in the Republic of Panama is weak. The Communists cannot themselves seize power in Panama, or otherwise politically endanger US strategic interests there, during the period of this estimate.

2. Economic, social, and political conditions in Panama are fundamentally unsound, however, and are susceptible of Communist exploitation.

3. Panama is suffering an economic depression attributable immediately to the postwar reduction of US expenditures in the area, but basically to the neglect of Panama's economic potential. Panamanian officials and businessmen look to the United States for economic assistance and are likely to exaggerate the Communist danger in order to obtain it.

4. The principal danger to US interests in Panama is the rapid rise of the ultra-nationalistic (anti-US) Patriotic Front Party. This Party is not now Communist controlled, but is an important avenue of Communist penetration and influence.

5. The principal candidates in the presidential election to be held on 11 May 1952 are José Remón, who is favorably disposed toward the United States, and Roberto Chiari, who is not unfavorably disposed but is dependent on the support of the Patriotic Front. Remón could

[1] Special Estimates (SEs) were high-level interdepartmental reports presenting authoritative appraisals of vital foreign policy problems on an immediate or crisis basis. SEs were drafted by officers from those agencies represented on the Intelligence Advisory Committee (IAC), discussed and revised by interdepartmental working groups coordinated by the Office of National Estimates of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), approved by the IAC, and circulated under the aegis of the CIA to the President, appropriate officers of cabinet level, and the National Security Council. The Department of State provided all political and some economic sections of SEs.

[2] A note on the cover sheet of the source text, not printed, reads in part as follows: "The intelligence organizations of the Departments of State, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force and the Joint Staff participated with the Central Intelligence Agency in the preparation of this estimate. All members of the Intelligence Advisory Committee concurred in this estimate on 24 January 1952."

probably win a free election with his present support and would almost certainly win with the additional support of Arnulfo Arias. The Patriotic Front and the Communists, however, are likely to resort to mob violence in their determination to defeat him. Remón, who has the goodwill of the National Police, is reluctant to resort to force to gain the Presidency, but might do so if he concluded that otherwise his election would be prevented. It is not certain that the Police would support Remón in a coup d'état, but it is likely that they would do so. Whatever course they took would probably prove decisive.

6. Civil disturbances are probable in connection with the forthcoming election and a coup d'état by either side is possible. The intensity of such disturbances will affect both the outcome and the ensuing political situation.

7. Remón, as President, could expect the continuing, implacable opposition of the Patriotic Front and the Communists. If he had come to power by the use of force those elements would claim justification for their charge of militarism against him and would probably receive greater popular sympathy for their continued opposition than would otherwise be the case. Remón could probably control the situation, however, so long as he had the support of the National Police.

8. Chiari, as President, could probably free his administration of dependence on the Patriotic Front and the Communists if he had the support of the National Police and the active cooperation of the United States.

9. If Chiari became President in circumstances which rendered him completely dependent on the continued support of the Patriotic Front, Communist penetration of the adminstration would ensue and in time the Communists might attain dominant influence.

DISCUSSION

Basic Factors in the Situation

Panamanian Dependence on the United States

10. Informed Panamanians realize that close relations between Panama and the United States are inescapable, not only because of US strategic interest in the Canal and US occupation of the Canal Zone, but also because of Panama's economic dependence on the United States. At the same time they are extremely sensitive to any supposed infringement of the sovereignty of Panama. Any Panamanian government must strike a nice balance between satisfaction of the popular demand for the assertion of Panamanian sovereignty and accommodation to the realities of the situation. All Panamanian governments, however nationalistic their antecedents, have made this accommodation.

Basic Economic Conditions

11. Panama's economic development has been limited by sparsity of population, meagerness of natural resources, dearth of capital and concentration on the "Canal economy" to the neglect of agricultural development. Foreign trade is almost exclusively with the United States. Although most of the working population are engaged in agriculture, foodstuffs are the principal import (70 percent). Exports consist largely (61 percent) of one crop, bananas, controlled by two US firms. There is normally a large adverse balance of trade which in 1951 amounted to $30,000,000. This adverse balance is normally offset by dollar earnings in the Canal Zone. Thus the economy of Panama is highly sensitive to the level of US activity in the Zone.

Basic Social Conditions

12. The population of Panama is classified as 14 percent white, 19 percent Negro, and 65 percent mestizo or mixed. Racial tension exists with respect to the Negro minority of British West Indian origin. A few white families control most Panamanian economic activity above the level of subsistence farming. The principal employers of wage labor are the United States (in the Canal Zone) and the United Fruit Company.

Basic Political Conditions

13. Panamanian politics are essentially a contest for the perquisites of office among the few families which dominate the economic and social life of the country. Consequently they are based almost exclusively on personalities rather than on issues and are characterized by kaleidoscopic shifts in alignment amongst the many personal factions involved. Political activity is limited largely to the principal cities, Panama and Colon.

The Patriotic Front Party

14. The personal politics of Panama are increasingly influenced by the development of an ultra-nationalistic youth movement now organized as the Patriotic Front Party. The rank and file of this Party are young workers and students; the leaders are older and more experienced agitators who have developed use of the mob as an effective political weapon. The Party's vehemently anti-US line is addressed to supersensitive nationalists and to depressed social elements allegedly suffering the consequences of Yankee imperialism.

15. This ultra-nationalistic youth movement was initiated by Arnulfo Arias in 1944. Its popular demonstrations were an important factor in Panamanian rejection of the Defense Sites Agreement in 1947. Although instrumental in elevating Arnulfo Arias to the Presidency in 1949, it participated in his violent overthrow in 1951. The dominant, though covert, influence in the Patriotic Front now appears to be that of Harmodio Arias, the master mind among old line Panamanian politicians.

Communism In Panama

16. The Communist apparatus in Panama is presumably in at least indirect communication with Moscow. There are some indications that the channel may be through the Czech Legation at Caracas. The Communist-controlled Federation of Workers (FSTRP) has connections with the major Communist labor federations, the Latin American CTAL and the world-wide WFTU.

17. As an organized political entity operating in its own name, the Communist Party in Panama is weak. Called the People's Party, it has only some 500 members, of whom no more than 50 could be regarded as a hard core. Leading Panamanian Communists are mostly individualistic intellectuals. Some have been expelled from the party in the course of its internal dissensions, but retain their Communist ideology. In some circumstances, the Party may be able to enlist proletarian support through its control of the Worker's Federation and through its potential influence among the Negro employees of the Canal.

18. The most dangerous aspect of Communism in Panamanian politics is the influence of individual Communists (both Party members and expellees) among the intelligentsia. In these circles, in which philosophical Marxism is a respectable and widely accepted doctrine, Communism is not regarded as an alien menace. Communism exerts a strong influence upon both teachers and students at all levels of the Panamanian educational system and, through them, may eventually gain control of the Patriotic Front.

The National Police

19. The only armed force of the Republic of Panama is the National Police, the present active strength of which is 2,453. The Police are fairly well equipped with small arms and control the only considerable stock of arms in Panama. Their morale is good: they are unlikely to become divided by political partisanship.

20. The National Police are capable of suppressing any probable Communist or Patriotic Front disorders. They may hesitate, however, to fire upon student rioters, some of whom would be sons of the "best families" of Panama.

The Current Crisis

The Economic Situation

21. The postwar reduction in US expenditures in the area has caused an economic depression in Panama. Some 15,000 persons, probably 15 per cent of the normally employed population of Panama City and Colon, are now unemployed. Bank deposits have declined and there has been an important bank closure. Local mismanagement, graft, and capital expenditures for unproductive purposes have contributed to this situation. Most Panamanians, however, disclaim any national responsibility in the matter and look to the United States to solve the problem through economic assistance. With that end in view officials and businessmen may purposefully exaggerate the Communist danger, the favored formula for obtaining US aid.

The Approaching Election

22. There is danger of riotous disturbances in Panama, not primarily as a result of Communist exploitation of the economic situation, but in relation to the presidential election to be held on 11 May 1952, in which José Antonio Remón and Roberto Chiari will be the principal candidates. Such disturbances would be in the ordinary course of Panamanian politics.

Remón and the National Patriotic Coalition

23. In October 1951 Colonel Remón resigned as Commandant of the National Police in order to qualify as a candidate for the Presidency. The miscellany of traditional parties or factions supporting him calls itself the National Patriotic Coalition. Their program, as expressed by Remón, includes the maintenance of friendly relations with the United States, special attention to agricultural and financial problems, and free elections.

24. An important element of strength on Remón's side is the goodwill of the National Police. The present Commandant, Colonel Vallarino, favors Remón's candidacy, but is not subservient to him. It appears that the Police, as a force, are now committed no further than to maintain order.

Chiari and the Civil Alliance

25. The opposing candidate is Roberto Chiari, a successful businessman and member of one of the old families of Panama, supported by a group of parties and factions called the Civil Alliance in contradistinction to Remón's "military" character. Chiari is reasonably well disposed toward the United States, as are his conservative supporters. Common opposition to Remón, however, has brought to Chiari's side the ultra-nationalistic (anti-US) Patriotic Front Party. The (Communist) People's Party is not formally a member of the Civil Alliance, but is also actively opposing Remón and is represented in the Alliance through the participation of Communists in the Patriotic Front.

26. The dominant personality in the Civil Alliance is Harmodio Arias, who is determined that Remón shall not attain the Presidency. If necessary, Arias would probably employ the Patriotic Front's capabilities for mob violence in an effort to defeat Remón.

Arnulfo Arias and the Panameñistas

27. A third factor in the political situation is Arnulfo Arias, the deposed President,* who is in jail but retains a considerable popular following organized as the Panameñista Party. Arias is willing to exchange his political support for his liberty and may hold the balance of electoral power.

Probable Developments

28. The course of events will largely depend on three uncertain factors: the direction in which Arnulfo Arias throws his support; the possibility of mob action by the Patriotic Front; and the conduct of the National Police.

29. Remón is a self-made man and is ambitious to achieve respectability by attaining the Presidency, hitherto reserved for the socially elect. He is therefore sensitive to the charge of militarism and anxious to come to power by respectable (constitutional) means. Probably he could win a free election with his present support. Almost certainly he would win with the additional support of Arnulfo Arias.

30. Harmodio Arias is determined to prevent Remón from attaining the Presidency. It is possible that he might do so by gaining for Chiari the support of Arnulfo Arias. It is quite likely, however, that Harmodio Arias will feel it necessary to resort to mob violence in order to accomplish his purpose.

31. If Remón concluded that his election would be prevented, by one means or the other, he might attempt to seize the Presidency with the aid of the National Police. The behavior of the National Police in such a case, or in the face of student disorders in behalf of Chiari, is uncertain but likely to favor Remón. Whatever course the Police took would probably prove decisive.

32. Remón, as President, could expect the continuing implacable opposition of the Patriotic Front and the Communist. If he had come to power by the use of force these elements would claim justification for their charge of militarism against him and would probably receive a greater degree of popular sympathy for their continued opposition than would otherwise be the case. Remón could probably control the situation, however, so long as he had the support of the National Police.

33. Chiari, as President, would not himself be unfriendly to the United States and could probably free his administration of dependence on the Patriotic Front if he had the support of the National Police and the active cooperation of the United States.

34. If Chiari became President in circumstances which rendered him completely dependent on the continued support of the Patriotic Front, Communist penetration of the administration would ensue and in time the Communists might attain dominant influence.

*The present President of Panama, Alcibiades Arosamena, is not an important factor in the situation. His possible resignation before the election might, however, precipitate a crisis. [Footnote in the source text.]

35. In no circumstances is the political situation likely to develop in such a way as to endanger immediately the strategic interests of the United States in Panama, or to bring the Communists directly to power there.

Memorandum by the Ambassador in Panama (Wiley), Temporarily in Washington, to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller)[1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 11, 1952.

Subject: Disorders in Panama

All sources in Panama agree that serious disorders are impending. It is impossible to forecast whether or not these disorders will take on the nature of a "Bogotazo." However, this possibility is sufficiently real to require a policy decision of considerable magnitude.

In 1936, the United States relinquished its right of intervention in Panama. Nevertheless, serious disorders in the Republic could easily lead to a request for intervention on the part of the President of the Republic, and there is nothing in international law or treaty commitments to prevent the United States from intervening if invited should it so desire.

However, for the purpose of the present memorandum it may be assumed that the United States would categorically refuse directly to intervene politically in the affairs of the Republic. This memorandum, therefore, has to do with other types of intervention which might have effects equivalent to political intervention.

For example, armed forces of the United States might enter the Republic to evacuate American citizens. This could have the effect of a military demonstration. Also, if fired upon, shots might be returned. Moreover, the President of Panama might request aid to save life and property. The Fire Department of the Zone might enter the Republic and the situation could then require protection for it from the armed forces in the Zone.

In other words, the Embassy might be called upon by the armed forces to acquiesce in an operation to save life and property in cases such as, for example, fire and mob violence threatening the National City Bank. Does the Embassy say "hands off"? If so, this should be on the authority of clear-cut instructions from the Department.

I am, of course, delighted to follow any course the Department may lay down. However, events in Panama could take unexpected turns, and it is hoped that the Department can give the Embassy instructions that would cover any eventuality.

It may be added that the principle of strict non-intervention is already to some extent abandoned if the evacuation plan foresees the entry of armed forces into the Republic in order to bring Americans to safety.

719.00/3–2152

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller) to the Ambassador in Panama (Wiley)

TOP SECRET OFFICIAL–INFORMAL [WASHINGTON,] March 21, 1952.

DEAR JOHN: We have been giving considerable thought to your memorandum to me of March 11 entitled "Disorders in Panama"[1] in which you raise the question of possible intervention by American forces in the Republic in the event of serious disorder such as a "Bogotazo" occurring in the Republic. As you point out this problem raises policy questions of the first magnitude. It is our view that we should get up a joint State–Defense paper on the subject which would serve as a directive both to you and to General McBride, which would deal as specifically as it is possible to do, in advance of the actual outbreak of any such disorders, with what your course of action should be. Pending the preparation and clearance of such a directive, I am writing to give you my preliminary views as a result of talks which we have had here.

Our preliminary views are as follows:

1) We are in principle opposed to any intervention in Panama, even at the request of the Panamanian Government. Last May during the revolution which unseated Arias, we were insistently requested by Arias to intervene; we refused to do so; and our judgment was subsequently borne out to be correct.

2) It is impossible in advance of knowing the exact situation that may transpire to authorize either the Embassy or CINCARIB to deviate from our treaty commitments against intervention. Consequently, we are not able to delegate any blanket authorization which would contemplate intervention. Authorization to either the Embassy or CINCARIB to intervene in Panama without prior specific consultation at the time with Washington would appear to presuppose a failure of communications. In the event that a special situation such as a "Bogotazo" should arise wherein the Ambassador and/or CINCARIB would feel that intervention should be authorized, a telecon can be set up between the Canal Zone and the Pentagon which would permit a decision to be reached rapidly on the specific recommendations of the Embassy and CINCARIB in the light of then existing conditions. Consideration might be given to establishing a secure direct line between the Embassy residence, the Chancery and Quarry Heights so as to facilitate communication between the Embassy and the Zone.

[1] Supra. The reactions of Assistant Secretary Miller's subordinates to Ambassador Wiley's letter are contained in memoranda by Officer in Charge of Central America and Panama Affairs Siracusa (719.00/3–1252, 611.19/3–1152), and by Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Mann (719.00/3–1352).

3) If political rioting should occur centered around the Palace, as in the case of the revolt against Arias last May, it would probably not be necessary to order or permit intervention by U.S. troops in the Republic even if the civil authorities of the Republic should request it. The mere fact that U.S. troops happen to be conveniently accessible to the Republic of Panama should not alter the general inter-American rule with respect to intervention. In fact the very proximity of the Canal Zone would argue against any such exception since American civilians residing in the Republic have ready access to a haven which is not found in the case of other countries in the Hemisphere.

4) The foregoing does not of course affect operations under the evacuation plan for Panama. Nevertheless the evacuation plan will be reviewed immediately to make certain that it takes into consideration all of the circumstances mentioned in your memorandum.

5) If rioting of the proportions of a "Bogotazo" should occur where the total destruction of Panama City would be threatened and this in turn would endanger the safety of Balboa, a different set of circumstances could arise in which it would be neither morally appropriate nor in accordance with our self-interest to refrain from intervening with troops. However, before authorizing intervention even in such circumstances, the whole situation should be reviewed by telecon or other means of communication. Naturally, in the unlikely event of failure of communications the decision would have to be left in the hands of the Embassy and CINCARIB.

We will as promptly as possible prepare the joint directive contemplated in the first paragraph of this letter. Meanwhile you should be guided by this letter although we would be glad to have any comments you may have on it.

Sincerely yours, EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

Memorandum by Edward W. Clark of the Office of Middle American Affairs to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 25, 1952.

Subject: United States–Panama Relations

The following developments in Panama have given rise to serious concern within the Department.

1. Treatment of the American-Owned Fuerza y Luz Utility Company

The Supreme Court on October 20 invalidated the municipal tax exemption provision of the company's 35 year old contract. On October 30 the Court dismissed the rehearing petition of the company. The company also faces a tax suit for alleged non-payment of taxes of $320,000 on profits and a fine of $254,000 for alleged late payment of income tax on dividends.

2. Political Interference with the Point IV Program

While there appears to have been some justification for the Panamanian Government's position in insisting upon full administrative control of programs not supported by joint funds, there now appears to be some question as to whether the Panamanian Government will not attempt to take a similar position with respect to the jointly supported Point IV Servicios.

3. Assembly Resolution Critical to the United States and Growing Clamor for United States Treaty Revision

The Assembly Resolution charges the United States with non-fulfillment of its treaty obligations and calls for a larger annuity payment. Administration officials, including Remón,[1] appear to be inspiring the popular clamor for treaty revision. By espousing such demands, without determining the attitude of the U.S., Remón puts himself out on a limb.

4. Possible Cancellation of Contracts Negotiated Under Decree Law 12 of 1950

There are indications that the Government may not continue to recognize the validity of contracts involving exemptions from import taxes negotiated under this law, originally designed to attract foreign capital. Some American companies are involved.

5. Possible Break Down of Negotiations with World Bank

The Panamanian auditing firm which has assumed the job of reorganizing Panama's internal revenue department has withdrawn from the project because of the Administration's failure to abide by its promise to protect the firm from political pressures in matters of personnel. The World Bank is concerned over this development and is sending a mission to Panama at the end of this month.

Some of the above developments are not matters on which the United States can properly protest formally. What concerns MID is the trend in the thinking and attitude of the Remón Administration which these developments would seem to indicate; that is, looking to the United States for Panama's economic salvation, regardless of the means which may be resorted to in extorting such aid. They indicate also an apparent belief that the way to obtain concessions and help from the United States is through a "get tough" policy. This course is taken as the easy way out instead of adopting the basic administrative and fiscal reforms advocated by the World Bank.

If you concur, would you be so good as to discuss with Mr. Miller the advisability of the latter's calling in Ambassador Heurtematte for a frank expression of our concern over these developments.

611.19/2–1353

Memorandum by the Ambassador in Panama (Wiley), Temporarily in Washington, to the Under Secretary of State (Smith)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON, February 13, 1953.]

PANAMA

For the United States the importance of the Republic of Panama derives from its unique geographical situation and our special treaty rights having to do with the Panama Canal Zone, which strategically, politically and economically is the most important installation possessed by the United States anywhere. The Canal Zone, a foreign corridor bisecting Panama, a sovereign nation, presents a continuing problem of great delicacy to the United States. The security of the Canal is linked with the stability of the Republic. The daily functioning of the Canal depends to an important extent on friendly collaboration with the Panamanian authorities. It is in the interest of this Government to ensure, insofar as possible, that the Government of Panama at all times be well disposed toward the United States.

It is most desirable that American policy towards Panama be reviewed from time to time with a view to meeting the exigencies of the moment and the developments of the future. The nature of the relationship between the United States and Panama is such that periodic readjustment will always be necessary by force of circumstance. In recent years such readjustments took place in 1936 and again in 1942. Extensive and perhaps excessively generous concessions were made at that time by the United States to Panama. Now a moment of readjustment seems again at hand. The advent of a new administration in Panama has given impetus to a growing and insistent clamor for new concessions, including inter alia a higher annuity payment on the part of the United States. President Remón and his government, responsive to local pressures, seem to be embarked on an undisguised policy of extracting as much as possible from the United States. Their attitude seems to be that only in a forthright way will anything substantial be obtained from the American Government and that they are in a position to exact demands without concern or preoccupation since Panama, which in international affairs is friendly to the United States, is too valuable to the United States for relations between the two countries to be disturbed by their exigencies.

The question of yielding periodically to Panamanian demands involves great danger of encroachment upon the treaty rights enjoyed by the United States in the Canal Zone since concessions could, in the course of years, have dangerous cumulative effects. It would seem desirable, in view of the very extensive concessions made to Panama in the past, that the United States avoid at this time a repetition of the procedures followed in 1936 and 1942. If there are any inequities in the Canal Zone to be remedied, measures for their correction should be limited to unilateral administrative action. No "commercial treaty" or other formal engagement should be entered into with the Government of Panama at this time whereby action by the United States would take the form of a binding international engagement.

But an alternative course must be found, since our relationship with Panama should not be based on a negative attitude alone. It might, therefore, be opportune for the American Government to consider collaboration with the Government of Panama in the economic field. Such a procedure at this time would seem particularly desirable since the economy of Panama has been based almost entirely on the Canal, a static installation which no longer suffices to support the expanding population of the Republic. Economic conditions are illustrated by the fact that there are at present 24 thousand Panamanians unemployed in the terminal cities of Panama and Colón. This unemployment of a quarter of the working population of the two cities is not due to economic depression—it is due quite simply to the fact that the necessary jobs do not exist in the present stage of economic development of the Republic. So neglected and undeveloped are Panama's own resources that Panama today imports over 60% of its foodstuffs at a cost of about $11,000,000 annually, as compared to a total annual government budget of about $40,000,000. This economic underdevelopment in turn begets and aggravates political instability, which has resulted in Panama's having had six presidents since 1948. It bears heavily upon the masses in Panama and is dangerously exploitable by leftists, communists and demagogues who find it expedient to ascribe Panama's many ills to the Canal Zone and United States policies therein. It is, therefore, desirable and timely to do everything possible to establish the economy of the Republic on a viable basis, in order to take the Panamanian mind off the Canal Zone and to contribute constructively to political and social evolution and progress. The logical point of departure for this step lies in the field of agriculture.

The annual income of the nation could be very substantially increased through an intelligent and serious approach to the reorganization and development of agriculture. The fact that Panama is a dollar country within the American economic orbit would save such an appropriation from being a mere grant. Indeed, it would have in this respect more the character of a domestic operation, since the benefits to the American economy would be immediate and real. Another most important advantage of such a program would be the development for the first time in the history of Panama of a substantial hard core of trained Panamanians which would in time permit a wholesome and much needed reorganization of the public services of the country.

It is suggested that the Department consider the possibility of seeking appropriations from Congress whereby $5,000,000 a year could be expended in Panama for, say, a period of ten years. The purpose of this grant should be specifically to develop, in the interests of agriculture, access roads, warehousing and market facilities for agricultural produce, agricultural equipment pools, land settlement, irrigation and small industry related to the processing of foodstuffs, as well as intensified technical collaboration. Whatever financial aid may be decided upon should be expended in the Republic for specific purposes under the sole and continuing control of the United States, and such funds as might not be disbursed would revert to the Treasury of the United States. The program should be entirely unilateral and without negotiated commitment on the part of the United States.

In furtherance of this program, an expression of the strategic interest of this nation in the development of political and economic stability in Panama might be sought from the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The development of agriculture in Panama would provide a local source of food supply for the garrisons and population of the Canal Zone, thus eliminating the present necessity in time of emergency of diverting sufficient foodstuffs from the United States to feed the populations of both Panama and the Canal Zone as well as to supply the necessary shipping for the purpose. Recognition of this Government's special interest in Panama would provide ample justification for special programs in Panama without creating a basis for claims by other Latin American Governments for similar treatment.

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann) to the Under Secretary of State (Smith)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] February 13, 1953.

Subject: Ambassador Wiley's Proposal for a $50 million Agricultural Grant for Panama.

Our problems with Panama divide themselves into two categories.

The first is a problem common to all of Latin America. The people are demanding higher living standards and this demand translates itself into domestic political pressures on governments which, in turn, try to shift the onus to the United States by imputing to us responsibility for their difficulties. Nationalists and Communists exploit this "rising expectation" and point to the disparity in living standards between the area and this country. I therefore agree with Ambassador Wiley to this extent: One of our most important tasks is to help Latin America acquire the dollars they need to increase productivity—to expand their agriculture and industry. And I intend to recommend to Mr. Cabot that, to accomplish this, the lending policies of the World and Exim Banks should be liberalized and made more responsive to our foreign policy requirements in Latin America or, if this is not feasible, an economic grant program for the area comparable to that for the rest of the world.

The second category comprises numerous problems which arise out of the fact that the canal zone bisects the Republic of Panama.

I do not recommend a $50 million agricultural grant program for Panama at this time because:

1. The economic problems of Panama should be treated as a part of the general problem; discrimination in favor of Panama will create trouble for us in Brazil and other countries essential to hemisphere solidarity.
2. Panama is already receiving very substantial aid from us and has not requested the program.
3. It would not satisfy the aspirations of the Panamanians concerning their relationship to the canal zone.

719.11/3–753: Telegram

The Ambassador in Panama (Wiley) to the Department of State

SECRET PANAMA CITY, March 7, 1953—2 p. m.

460. Called on Foreign Minister this morning. He referred to President Remon's press conference yesterday (Embtel 459)[1] stating Remon desired visit Washington April. He added considerable importance attached to Remon's proceeding April. He explained Remon did not himself intend to engage in negotiations for treaty revision et cetera but wished merely to see President Eisenhower in order arrange initiation negotiations for which purpose Panamanian Government would appoint committee of which two or more members would remain in Washington for duration negotiations.

I inquired what points Remon desired to include in proposed negotiations. Foreign Minister replied that advisory committee was preparing report on the subject which probably ready by March 15. Until report completed he was of course not in position to inform me. He did however tell me privately and off record that points would include an increase in annual annuity, question of incorporation of [Canal Zone?] into a company, trans-Isthmian transportation, competition of commissaries and general economic relations of Canal Zone with Republic, construction of docks and harbor facilities in Colon free Zone, and financing of a building project.

In reply I suggested that any visit of Remon as Chief of State to Washington would involve very considerable preparation and moreover new administration at present confronted problems greatest urgency and magnitude and I therefore thought any idea President Remon's visiting Washington near future was most premature. Foreign Minister answered Remon considered it essential to have new agreement with US ready for presentation to national assembly in October. He felt if negotiations not initiated in April there would not be adequate time to prepare new agreement. I answered him in very vague terms that question US economic collaboration with Panama was receiving interested consideration in Department and that certain studies were being initiated on working level. I feared however some months at least must elapse before such questions could be considered on the higher policy level. Foreign Minister appeared unimpressed.

Before my departure for Washington in January there had been several press references to possibility Remon's proceeding US. At that time I already attempted in every way to discourage project.

President Remon's present initiative probably responds to much pressure particularly from Foreign Minister. From remarks attributed to Remon he seems to be under impression that in Washington he would become golfing companion of President Eisenhower. He perhaps hopes that through personal contact he would out do ex-President Harmodio [Arnulfo] Arias who extracted extensive concessions from President Roosevelt.

If the Department replies that no visits of Chiefs of State to the US are being contemplated as yet and that any desire the Panamanian Government may have for readjusting relations between two countries should be first presented through diplomatic channels, I hope message will be embellished in such way as least to wound Remon's sensibilities.[2]

[2]The Department replied in telegram 271 dated Mar. 13, 1953 that it was impossible to schedule the Remón visit for the current year because of the large backlog of requests for official visits and the demands such visits made on the Chief Executive's time. The Department also noted that a visit during which substantive problems were to be discussed should be preceded by considerable study of the issues involved. (719.11/3–753)

Foreign Minister stated Ambassador Heurtematte not informed as yet of Remon's plan.

472. At Constituent Convention yesterday establishing national patriotic coalition as party, President Remon stated in speech:

"We are making studies—and since local newspaper which doesn't seem Panamanian (La Hora) commented we are going ask for Ancon Hill and 'millions' I wish now to deny it and tell you we do not want either millions or alms; what we want is justice. We want, gentlemen when discussions start, the youth of Panama to know 1903 treaty signed under very disadvantageous circumstances; that 1903 treaty was signed 15 days after November 3, 1903 treaty was signed by a great traitor alien to our country. And if true that in 1936 treaty in which partial revisions were introduced and in which one must recognize good-will of that great statesman whom we can never sufficiently lament, to whom we Panamanians render respect and admiration, that great man called Franklin Delano Roosevelt, I repeat only partial revisions were introduced in 1936 treaty but clauses of 1903 treaty remained pending, remain still in effect which Panama has duty insisting be revised.

"It is for that reason, in discussions which must be held, Panama will insist always that clauses treaty be complied with; that Republic Panama and US of North America have joint interest in Panama Canal. Panama will also take interest in Panamanians and North Americans receiving like treatment in that Canal Zone and finally dear fellow countrymen, we shall insist all those huge sums which American Government spends on telling countries of Europe and Americas how nice they are be demonstrated with deeds doing justice to Republic Panama. In this I appeal to all Panamanians not only to members of national patriotic coalition who in fact are also in this crusade, I appeal to all Panamanians that when we make our claim we be one single family so that we may be heard and justice done us."[2]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 24, 1953.

Subject: United States Relations with Panama

It has always been politically expedient in Panama to exploit points of friction stemming from the Canal Zone, and a growing nationalism has complicated their settlement. However, the United States has viewed some Panamanian aspirations as not compatible with the efficient operation and security of the Canal. Although sweeping concessions were made to Panama in 1936 and 1942, Panama still aspires to

a) A higher annuity (originally $250,000, raised to $430,000 in 1936).

b) Increased limitations on or elimination of Canal Zone commissaries and PX's, and certain commercial activities in the Canal Zone.

c) Elimination of "racial discrimination" in Canal Zone, and fulfillment of United States "commitments" re equal treatment of Panamanian labor.

d) Exercise of jurisdiction in certain fields in the Canal Zone, despite grant of exclusive jurisdiction to the United States in 1903.

e) Fulfillment of United States commitments to build bridge or tunnel at Pacific end of Canal and to move railroad station in Panama City.

f) Preferential position in supplying Canal Zone markets.

Despite the fact that no specific demands have yet been officially transmitted to this Government, President Remon has been publicly demanding "justice, not alms" from the United States and has announced he will visit President Eisenhower soon. We have informed him that such a visit does not appear to be possible at this time and that advance preparation is indispensable. Remon is not well educated and lacks experience in international affairs, but is strongly anti-Communist and is considered pro-United States.

Our Ambassador is informing the Foreign Minister that this Government is willing to discuss mutual problems through normal diplomatic channels, but intimating that to make unspecified demands in public before communicating them to us is scarcely courteous and will prejudice their solution. He will also express our appreciation of Remon's friendship.

SECRET PANAMA CITY, April 10, 1953—1 p.m.

528. Remon and wife dined alone with us last night.[1] Remon insisted he set no store on visiting Washington except for purpose initiating conversations. I nevertheless believe he would welcome invitation at later date. He denied emphatically any intention insisting on treaty revision (but he clearly has farfetched ideas on treaty interpretation). However, he was obliged to be in position when National Assembly convenes in October to present positive results. "US must make a gesture" otherwise he would appear before National Assembly only in order present his resignation as President Republic. He and wife have utterly distorted concept treaty commitments between US and Panama. Apparently their point of view revolves exclusively around letter Theodore Roosevelt to Secretary of War Taft 1904.[2] They are entirely convinced commercial activities Canal Zone completely illegal.

Our conversation lasted many hours. Remon obviously regrets tone his speech March 15 but both he and wife insisted that only thus could he snatch initiative from dangerous opposition elements. Remon was complacent over having taken Harmodio Arias and Ricardo Alfaro into camp. He has now been assured by Harmodio that tendentious policy of La Hora will be immediately changed. Both he and wife were confident agitation could be controlled provided US made "gesture."

Remon impressed me as being very stubborn and capable of going off the beam in ultranationalistic way. While I am convinced that he is basically not unfriendly, he will require most careful handling.

Memorandum by the Officer in Charge of Central America and Panama Affairs (Leddy) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 20, 1953.

Subject: Panama Negotiations

I. Background and Status

1. The Panamanian Foreign Minister, Señor Guizado, came to Washington on April 3, 1953, to arrange a visit by President Remón to President Eisenhower, "to settle all outstanding problems between the two Governments". He was received by Secretary Dulles, Under Secretary Smith and Assistant Secretary Cabot, and visited Vice President Nixon and the United States Senate. Mr. Dulles informed him that we are ready at all times to discuss mutual problems but that careful negotiations should precede any visit by President Remón, and that President Eisenhower would not wish to deal with the subjects directly.[1]

2. Señor Guizado addressed a note to the Department on April 7, requesting negotiations, and the Department's reply acceded to this request and indicated negotiations could start in the latter part of June.[2]

3. The Panamanian request is "to review the entire field of relations between the two Governments arising out of the construction and operation of the Panama Canal". Four points were mentioned by Panama; although very broad and vague, these appear to have to do with "sharing of profits" from the Canal, elimination of commercial competition from the Zone, increase in the annuity, and elimination of discrimination against Panamanian workers in the Zone. The Panamanians have stopped talking officially about "treaty revision" after the difficulties and delays in such action were brought home to them, although the Panama press still headlines "treaty revision".

4. Panama has named three negotiators (headed by Ambassador Heurtematte) and two consultants (Ricardo Alfaro and Harmodio Arias) for the negotiations to be held in Washington. We are presently organizing the American negotiating group, which is to be headed by the Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs.

5. An Inter-Departmental Committee, consisting of eight Federal agencies other than State with responsibilities related to the Canal Zone has been organized to prepare the United States position for the negotiations. This Committee will hold its first meeting next week.

II. Problems

1. The principal objective in these negotiations is to remove as far as possible any real grounds for Panamanian complaints, in order to project our relations constructively on as satisfactory a basis as possible. Good relations are considered necessary to the security of the Canal, and to our peaceful and friendly exercise of jurisdiction in the Canal Zone. While Panamanian complaints will perhaps always be endemic, we must in our own self-interest spare no efforts to mitigate or remove them, consistent with the maintenance of our present treaty rights.

[1] A record of this conversation is contained in a memorandum of conversation by Mr. Cabot, dated Apr. 3, 1953 (611.19/4–353).

[2] The opening of the negotiations was later postponed until Sept. 10, 1953, primarily as a result of Panamanian Ambassador Heurtematte's preference for a later date (memorandum by Mr. Sowash, dated June 8, 1953, 611.19/6–853).

2. Our negotiations will be on a firm plane of seeking fair and equitable relations, without relinquishing in any way the exclusive jurisdiction and treaty rights we exercise in the Canal Zone. Many of Panama's complaints are of long standing and may well merit our unilateral action, without any bargaining; these are, mainly, the issues of "equal pay for equal work" in the treatment of labor, the reduction or elimination of segregation, restrictive measures to combat commissary and PX abuses, and the granting of labor benefits such as social security and retirement to Panamanian workers. In so far as labor treatment is concerned, the greatest number of Panamanians is affected; in so far as alleged commerical competition is concerned, the most influential group of Panamanians, the well-connected merchant class, is most affected. A settlement of these problems would better relations constructively. Such settlement might be worked out with the Armed Forces and with the civilian authorities (the Panama Canal Company and the Canal Zone Government).

3. There are several major issues outstanding with Panama, such as our 1942 commitment to build a tunnel or bridge crossing the Canal and our agreement to move the railway station in Panama City. These and similar issues of long standing may be brought up in the negotiations and if so, we may take the opportunity to dispose of them by some new agreement.

4. We are not in favor of treaty revision as such, and are encouraged that the Panamanians are now talking of reaching agreement through "application and interpretation" of the existing treaties of 1903 and 1936. An increase in the annuity is the only one of the four points listed by the Panamanians which would require an amendment to these treaties. The annuity was established in 1903 at $250,000 in gold, and revalued in 1936 at $430,000, to reflect our 1934 decrease in the gold content of the dollar.

5. We emphasize that Panama's case is neither unfounded nor, on the other hand, unexaggerated. Our objective is to correct any practices which can be used to incite hostility to the U.S., and to reestablish as far as possible a cordial and effective working relationship, without relinquishing any of our paramount strategic interests in the Zone. The lessons of recent years in Iran and Suez are solid reasons for our constructive efforts.

III. The Negotiations

1. Since treaty revision is not an objective, neither side is naming "plenipotentiaries" and discussions will be primarily exploratory. If a basis for agreement is established, much of this may be carried out by executive action on our part rather than treaty revision. If any treaty is necessary, it will take more time, and the Panamanians are in a hurry.

2. The Panamanian Government is always under political pressure on these issues and the Assembly, which meets again in October, is a forum for opposition demands for action by the Remón Administration. This pressure is real and should not be discounted as mere internal politics, as was seen in the bases setback in 1947. We will therefore endeavor to accelerate negotiations during the summer months, so as to avoid any unnecessary exposure of the Remón Government to opposition attack, Remón being basically friendly to the United States.

3. The Department wishes to keep the Congress informed of developments and will be glad to do so during the course of negotiations, through appearances at this Subcommittee or visits by Departmental officers to the Committee Chairman.

611.19/8–2153

The Ambassador in Panama (Wiley) to the Officer in Charge of Central America and Panama Affairs (Leddy)

SECRET OFFICIAL–INFORMAL PANAMA CITY, August 21, 1953.

DEAR LEDDY: Naturally, we have been thinking a good deal about the course the negotiations will take in Washington, and for such interest as it may present I shall attempt a résumé of the way things look to us in Panamá.

From our point of view the domestic situation in Panamá assumes considerable importance. President Remón has put himself at the head of a movement for a radical alteration in the relationship between the two countries and with the Canal Zone. What the consequences in Panamá may be is subject to varying interpretations. Highly qualified observers are apprehensive lest the eventual reaction in Panamá to possible disappointment be violent. For example, Dr. Harmodio Arias has spoken to me very seriously of the danger of an "explosion."

In considering the negotiations from a purely tactical point of view I have in mind five dates, namely, the initiation of the negotiations on September 10, the visit of President Remón to Washington on September 28–30,[1] the convening of the National Assembly on October 1, the commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the Republic on November 3–4, and the visit of the Queen of England to Panamá on November 29. I believe it would be very desirable to try to bridge this chronology with tranquility. For the purpose, the following technique might perhaps be used:

When the negotiations start on September 10 it might be well to devote as much time as possible to questions involving organization and procedure. Then, following the suggestion of Mario de Diego, great emphasis might be placed on clarifying the terms of reference for the negotiations. This could take time, particularly if questions were raised which required the Panamanian delegation to seek new instructions from Panamá. In any event, it would be desirable to keep the negotiations in the realm of innocuity until the advent of President Remón.

At that time there will undoubtedly be a conversation or conversations with President Remón on the policy level. I think every effort should be made then to straighten out his thinking. It might be well, tactfully but forcefully, to let him know that the American Government has been neither impressed nor pleased by his efforts to gain outside support for purely bilateral negotiations and that his sponsoring the popular demonstration to be held on August 27 is looked upon as extracurricular and as setting a precedent that might eventually work against a mutually satisfactory solution of the questions at issue between the two countries. I would suggest, though, that no inkling be given him at this time of any negative attitude the American Government might eventually adopt with regard to questions of principle which may be posed by the Panamanian delegation.

Of greatest importance with President Remón is, in my opinion, the need of persuading him, when he returns to Panamá for the opening of the National Assembly on October 1, to make only a restrained and constructive statement instead of further disturbing the situation by demagogic declarations. From what he has told me in the past, I know that he has had a burning desire to announce at that time a dramatic achievement or the imminence of such an achievement; or, on the other hand, to assume a somewhat violent position if Panamá appears to have been rebuffed. Even for him to appear before the National Assembly and address it in the tone he used in his speech of March 15 would not be helpful. If at all possible, President Remón should be committed in advance to what he will say when the National Assembly convenes.

In Panamá there is common talk that the negotiations will, in the pattern of the past, require from one to several years before the questions under discussion are resolved. At this end, I am quietly and discreetly endeavoring to exploit this concept, pointing out that as a result of World War II the American Government has grown to great dimensions, that in the forthcoming negotiations many governmental departments and agencies will be involved and that, of course, the task of composing different points of view among them will require considerable time and effort on the part of the Department of State. I am therefore urging that the Panamanians approach these negotiations in a spirit of great patience. Perhaps the same line could be emphasized in Washington.

I mention above the commemoration of the cincuentenario. There will be many foreign delegations and the celebration may take on somewhat the aspect of a very minor Congress of Vienna. Caribbean diplomacy will be active. It would not be a good moment for the airing of grievances on the part of Panamá or the crystallization of conflict between our two countries. Also, during the visit of the Queen of England the eyes of the world will glance briefly at Panamá. That too would not be a good moment for unfriendly demonstrations.

Indeed, I think the negotiations should be kept in as fluid a state as possible for as long as possible. I suggest this for several reasons. It would give the Department an opportunity to study carefully the Panamanian position and techniques in presenting the Panamanian point of view. Also, I think it likely that there will be a growing lack of harmony within the Panamanian delegation, which might perhaps be exploited. Moreover, the State Department would have fuller opportunity to compose differences of viewpoint in Washington, to crystallize the American position and, perhaps, to formulate a positive policy toward Panamá in studied compensation for whatever negative attitude it may be found necessary to adopt toward Panamanian demands. Also, in the world in which we live it is impossible to foresee what developments may take place in, say, the next six months, and this in turn might have an important bearing on the negotiations. There is one thing in particular that I hope we avoid: the premature use of the negative. For example, the Panamanians will probably offer base sites to the United States. It is equally probable that we shall not desire to accept the offer. I would, however, keep the matter under consideration for a very protracted period. In fact, in approaching the negative I would not for the present go beyond "perhaps." It might be well, for, say, the first three months, to keep the negotiations treading water with greatest energy, then recapitulate and set the course of the future.

I would be glad if you would discuss this letter with Ambassador Muccio.

Yours sincerely, JOHN C. WILEY

611.19/9–853

Memorandum by William B. Sowash of the Office of Middle American Affairs to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 8, 1953.

Subject: Meeting with the Secretary on Panamanian Affairs

On Friday, September 4, at the request of the Secretary, Mr. Woodward, Ambassador Muccio and I called upon the Secretary to give him some background on the negotiations with Panama which will be inaugurated this week. The current situation in Panama which has given rise to the Panamanian request was outlined to the Secretary, who indicated considerable interest in the matter.

The Secretary stated that he considered the 1903 Treaty a model one and said that, unless he could be persuaded to the contrary, the United States position in the forthcoming talks ought to be one of firm resistance to any demand on the part of the Panamanians for revision or renegotiation of the 1903 and 1936 Treaties. He expressed concern as to whether it had been made sufficiently clear to Ambassador Wiley and the Panamanian Government what our position is on this point. On the basis of the language of the Department's notes to the Panamanians concerning the conversations, your conversations with President Remón while in Panama in April, and the many discussions on the subject between officers of the Department and Panamanian Ambassador Heurtematte, the Secretary was assured that the Panamanians were cognizant of our position regarding revision, although it was becoming apparent that they were choosing to ignore it. The Secretary said that he thought this point should be driven home at every opportunity.

The Secretary was shown a copy of the list of subjects which the Department believes may be raised by the Panamanians in the forthcoming talks. He showed particular interest in two items: The question of Panamanian sovereignty in the Canal Zone and the annuity. It is his view that the annuity should not be increased and that no concessions should be made which would permit any encroachment upon the complete jurisdiction which the United States presently exercises in the Canal Zone.

611.19/9–1753

The Ambassador in Panama (Wiley) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL
OFFICIAL–INFORMAL

PANAMA CITY, September 17, 1953.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Thank you very much for your letter of September 11th.[1]

I was delighted to learn that we shall yield none of our basic jurisdictional rights in the Canal Zone. My policy recommendations to the Department have been from the very outset entirely opposed to encroachment of any kind on our treaty rights and privileges in the Canal Zone. Moreover, I have been against increasing the annuity. To do so on the basis of the depreciated purchasing power of the dollar would create a bad precedent in general and inevitably open the door to continuing future demands for additional increases.

[1] Secretary Dulles on Sept. 11, 1953 responded to a previous letter from Ambassador Wiley in which Wiley discussed an offer of limited collaboration in the treaty talks from Dr. Harmodio Arias, adviser to the Panamanian negotiating team (611.19/8–1853).

I have just seen in a Departmental memorandum to Mr. Cabot of September 8, 1953,[2] that in a meeting in your office on September 4 you expressed concern lest the United States position on revising or renegotiating the 1903 and 1936 treaties had not been made sufficiently clear to me and the Panamanian Government. A letter of mine to Mr. Sowash of April 10 sets forth in detail the very forthright statements I made to Remón and his wife[3] regarding the United States position on revising the agreements or yielding our basic treaty rights in the Canal Zone. Certainly, neither the Department nor I have ever erred on this point in Panamá and I have left nothing unsaid or undone to make matters entirely clear to President Remón, Foreign Minister Guizado and other heads of the government, as well as Dr. Harmodio Arias. Actually, when Mr. Cabot was in Panamá we succeeded, when we met with Remón and Guizado, in introducing into the official Panamanian press release given out on April 18, 1953, the phraseology limiting the negotiations to a review of the "interpretation and application of existing treaties and agreements," thus clealy excluding revision or renegotiation of these treaties and agreements. At the same time I have not failed to keep the Department fully informed regarding the attitude of President and Mrs. Remón. Both are undoubtedly suffering from an acute Patrick Henry–Joan of Arc complex with regard to the 1903 treaty, which they have described to me as being "entirely unacceptable." They both revile the memory of Bunau-Varilla, and Mrs. Remón in particular is convinced it was a calamity for Panamá that the Canal was not constructed in Nicaragua. All this should be taken into account. It is deep-seated and dangerous.

In the past, Remón has been invariably pro-American. He took over the government when it was in a state approaching chaos and has been eminently successful in stamping out corruption, in consolidating the domestic political situation and in giving the country a strong, democratic form of government. It is most unfortunate that he and his influential wife should now have deviated to a nationalistic tangent that may easily and seriously upset the otherwise favorable developments in the Republic.

I am convinced that it would be well to consider adopting—from both the immediate and long range point of view—a positive policy of economic collaboration with Panamá in order to develop the country's latent natural resources, chiefly agricultural. Such a policy might offset to some degree a negative attitude on our part required by many or most of the Panamanian demands. Moreover, if promptly formulated it might constitute a gesture and prevent Remón from returning to Panamá with loss of face. Most important, it would relieve the Republic of its unwholesome economic dependence on the Canal Zone. Actually, a positive, well designed program for the economic rehabilitation of the Republic would be bread upon the waters. Wealth would be created; we would benefit!

[3] Summarized in telegram 528 from Panama City, dated Apr. 10, 1953, p. 1409.

Unfortunately, in Panamá the negotiations will have as Begleitungsmusik lots of negative nationalism. Much of it will be genuine. Some of it will be tactical—on the part of the opposition—and then, of course, the subversive element will be astutely active to exacerbate. I hope that we can talk over the problem of Panamá when I reach Washington with the Remóns.

Yours very sincerely, JOHN C. WILEY

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 25, 1953.

Subject: State Visit of President Remon of Panama

As you know, President Remon is coming to this country in conjunction with the negotiations on the Panama Canal and will be seeing you Monday afternoon. As I discussed with you last week, Remon has been behaving rather badly, and his people have raised a great number of complicated issues with us. I am sending you, as attachments hereto, material outlining these in some detail.[2]

I think that the fundamental question here is the matter of the revision of the Treaty. I think we must continue to make it clear that we will not, under any circumstances, enter into discussions directed at a revision of the Treaty, but that we are willing to discuss interpretation and application of the Treaty as it now stands. I believe President Remon will undoubtedly require tactful handling but, if we remain firm in this regard, we should not have undue trouble with him.

COMMENTS ON KEY ISSUES INVOLVED IN CONVERSATIONS WITH PANAMA[3]

Of the points presented for discussion by Panama (Tab A)[4] many of those of greatest import to Panama concern matters regarding which the United States unilaterally can make certain adjustments—adjustments which would benefit Panama and at the same time conform with the overall interests of the United States.

This brief discussion is predicated on the proposition that a politically and economically stable Panama is essential to the defense of the Canal and the maintenance of its present status, and therefore that it is in the United States interest to take all practicable steps to stimulate the development of Panamanian commerce, agriculture and industry. The development of the Panamanian economy—especially agriculture—also has a defense facet, to insure the basic food supply of the Canal Zone in time of emergency. It is believed, however, that the Panamanian economy can best be stimulated by closer integration with that of the Zone rather than by United States grants and bounties.

The matters of major concern to Panama at the present time are considered to be:

1. Increased Share in Supplying the Zone Market.

Substantial purchases in Panama are now being made by the United States agencies in the Zone but they are restricted to a degree by the Buy American Act and riders to the annual appropriation acts. If these restrictions were removed our relations with Panama would be improved greatly and at a saving in money to the United States Government.

2. Elimination of United States Government-financed Commercial Competition.

In earlier times it was necessary for the health and welfare of Zone personnel for the United States to operate various types of processing and service facilities in the Zone. Examples are slaughter house and meat processing, ice cream plant, dairy, soda water bottling, etc. Panamanian commerce is now able satisfactorily to meet the need in many of these fields. By closing United States facilities which duplicate those of Panama we could confer a substantial benefit to Panama's economy at no cost to ourselves. It also would be helpful if the post exchanges and commissaries were to leave the sale of foreign luxury items to the merchants of Panama.

3. Treatment of Panamanian Labor in the Canal Zone.

General McSherry made a thorough study of the labor problem in the Canal Zone upon inter-Departmental request in 1947. He reported that, despite the commitments of the United States to Panama to the contrary, there is discrimination against Panamanian workers in the Canal Zone. McSherry made a series of recommendations, the most important of which have yet to be carried out. The abolition of the present dual wage scale in the Canal Zone, greater opportunities for Panamanians to compete for higher paying jobs, and adherence to a policy of equal pay for equal work would go a long way toward removing Panamanian discontent on this point. In addition, it would be most desirable to have uniformity in the labor policies and practices of the several United States Government agencies operating in the Canal Zone, which at present vary widely. Finally, it is desirable that adequate retirement provisions be made for the present local-rate workers of the Canal Company Government. At the present time, these workers are thrown upon the charity of the Republic of Panama when retired, since the present maximum of $25 per month fixed by the Cash Relief Act of 1937 is inadequate.

[3] Drafted by Mr. Sowash on Sept. 24, 1953.
[4] Not printed.

4. Fulfillment of Existing Commitments to Panama.

The two most important alleged unfulfilled commitments to Panama are the removal of the railroad station in Panama City and the construction of a bridge or tunnel at the Pacific end of the Canal, which were made in the Executive Agreement of 1942. The bridge or tunnel commitment is not clear; it has not been implemented primarily because of uncertainty regarding future plans for the Canal and the high cost involved. The commitment to move the railroad station in Panama City is conditioned on Panama's supplying another site. Legislation now is before the Bureau of the Budget which would permit the carrying out of the R.R. station commitment whenever Panama offers a suitable site.

5. Return to Panama of Lands Outside the Canal Zone no Longer Necessary for the Operation of the Canal.

Although there is no treaty obligation for the return to Panama of the following areas, Panama apparently desires the return of Paitilla Point, New Cristobal and the present railroad terminal site in Panama City, if and when the station is moved.

The current discontent in Panama regarding relations with the Canal Zone involves two additional matters:

1. Exclusive United States Jurisdiction in the Canal Zone.

By the 1903 Treaty, the Republic of Panama granted to the United States all the power and authority within the Zone "which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority". Panama, however, aspires to the exercise of jurisdiction in the Canal Zone in all fields outside of those essential for construction, operation, maintenance, sanitation and protection of the Canal. The exercise of such jurisdiction by Panama is not authorized by the present Treaties, and Panamanian demands for such jurisdiction should be firmly resisted by this Government as incompatible with the security of our position on the Isthmus.

2. Increased Annuity for the Canal Zone.

There has been widespread criticism in Panama of the $430,000 annual payment made to Panama for the Canal Zone, since 1934, as insufficient. (Theretofore, the United States paid Panama 10 million dollars plus $250,000 annually, the increase in the annuity having been made after the change in value of the U.S. dollar.) The absence of this item from the list of subjects presented by the Panamanians, is probably contingent upon this Government's granting the greater economic opportunities in the Canal Zone which the other Panamanian demands would provide. To agree to an increase in the annuity would necessitate revising the 1936 Treaty, and such action would open the door to requests from succeeding administrations in Panama for further increases.

Sr. Henrique de Obarrio, Comptroller General of Panama
Ambassador John C. Wiley, U.S. Ambassador to Panama
Mr. John M. Cabot, Assistant Secretary of State

The President of Panama began the substantive conversation by referring to the question of post exchange and commissary competition with Panamanian business. He pointed out the injury the latter was receiving and expressed the hope that the United States would be prepared to take effective steps to prevent this allegedly unfair competition. He referred particularly to the sale of luxury items such as perfumes by the post exchanges and complained that, while in the United States post exchanges were obliged to pay duty, in Panama they operated tax free. The Panamanian merchant was unable to compete.

President Eisenhower said that he was very familiar with this problem since he had served in the Canal Zone from 1921 to 1924 and that the same old problems that he remembered from his service there still seemed to exist. He assured President Remon that we would give most sympathetic consideration to the Panamanian viewpoints. President Remon then briefly referred to the labor dispute and thereafter spoke of the questions which had arisen regarding treaty revision. He pointed out that under the 1903 Treaty the Panamanian Government could not tax Panamanians employed by the Canal Zone even on Panamanian territory although the Panamanian authorities had to supply schools and other services for these Panamanian families. If treaty revision were not to be accepted, this injustice could not be corrected.

President Eisenhower was somewhat shocked and indicated that this was a situation which seemed to require correction. Secretary Dulles then proposed that in a matter of this nature it would perhaps be possible to negotiate a new treaty covering tax matters. The Secretary made it clear that the United States had no intention of altering the present treaty structure with Panama. He remarked inter alia that while the United States negotiated new treaties with Spain, for example, the treaty involving the purchase of Florida was never touched; neither did any treaty with Russia have to do with the status of Alaska, which had likewise been purchased by the United States.

President Eisenhower pointed out that it would, of course, be impossible to reach any final conclusions in the course of President Remon's visit to the United States. He suggested that a joint statement might be issued regarding their conversation to be published when President Remon left Washington. Secretary Dulles mentioned that a draft was already under consideration. President Eisenhower said that in his opinion a communiqué would simply have to say that he had assured President Remon that all of the points which the Panamanians desired to raise would receive the most sympathetic consideration in the light of the specially close relations existing between the two countries and that he had expressed his confidence that the negotiators could agree upon mutually satisfactory arrangements which would, on the one hand, satisfy just Panamanian aspirations and, on the other, protect vital United States interests in the Canal. This seemed to meet with general approbation.

Mr. Cabot pointed out that with one exception all of the matters so far brought up by the Panamanian negotiators could probably be settled without any need for treaty revision. He said that the principal difficulty was to overcome the opposition of established interests to giving up the advantages they had. President Eisenhower said that the established interests would have to give way where they justly should. Mr. Cabot said that he quite agreed with that but that, for example, there were some established interests which were very firmly entrenched, such as the American labor unions in the Canal Zone. The President indicated that what he had earlier said applied also to the labor unions. The party then broke up; the conversation had lasted about forty minutes.

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, September 29, 1953.

Regarding: Panama-American Relations

I understand that your representative, Under Secretary of the Army Johnson, is sitting in with State Department representatives to discuss certain points of friction between the governments in the Panama Canal Zone. President Remón personally presented some of his specific complaints to me. I give you a few from memory:

a. Without the consent of the Panama Government, the whole Panama operation was reorganized something like two years ago, setting up the Canal as a corporation, solely owned by the United States Government. Apparently the purpose of this reorganization was to make the operation largely free of control from Washington and of the normal processes of government.

My own reaction to this complaint is that, assuming the alleged change was prefectly legal and proper under the Treaty, there was still a rather arbitrary attitude displayed and, in any event, no kind of organization can relieve the Administration of complete responsibility for the action of its agents. Consequently, the Panama Canal must be directed and run in such a way as to be in keeping with the integrity, dignity and reputation of this government.

b. The Panama Canal has certain special privileges, recognized by Treaty. In general, these privileges make certain that American employees in the Canal Zone will be treated as well as American employees in any other place. However, the complaint is made that these privileges are consistently and flagrantly abused. It is claimed, for example, that the Panama Canal, operating as a corporation, sells supplies to ships passing through the Canal. This, the Panamanians believe, is not only in direct violation of the spirit of the Treaty, but is the cause of very great resentment on the part of the normal citizen.

It is claimed that personnel within the Canal Zone take advantage of their commissary and post exchange privileges, and conduct black market operations outside of the Zone.

It is further claimed that people within the Zone make imports from all over the world of items that come in completely duty free. Thus these items entering the region escape the normal tariff tolls of Panama and of the United States as well. This practice, it is alleged, further encourages black marketing, and robs Panama of tariff revenues and of trade that might otherwise come to that country.

c. It is maintained that if a Panamanian is employed by the Zone, then Panama has no right whatsoever to tax the individual. This applies even though the individual lives outside the Zone, sends his children to Panama schools, and participates in the advantages deriving from public expenditures of many kinds.

All these are merely illustrative.

I promised the Panama President that we would take up every single complaint and try jointly to decide each on its merits. I promised that we would try to apply our sense of logic and of justice to the whole problem.

In the presence of the Secretary of State, I specifically stated that we would not entertain the thought of revising the basic Treaty, but that if we found that abuses had grown up and persisted in the Zone, that we would take the necessary steps to correct them, even if this process should call for the drawing up of a new Treaty dealing with these particular points.

I do not know whether Mr. Johnson is participating in negotiations as your representative or as a representative of the Secretary of the Army. In any event, I believe he should be informed that it is the purpose of this Administration to be fair and just in working out solutions to these several problems.

I am sending a copy of this memorandum to the Secretary of State so that if there is any substantial error in it—either of commission or of omission—he can so indicate to you, and to me.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot) to the Secretary of State[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 7, 1953.

Subject: Discussions with Panama.

The Panamanian Mission has completed the presentation of their proposals. This has been done in the form of 21 documents, a synopsis of which is attached (Tab A).

It appears that we will be able to meet at least to a degree the desires expressed in several of these documents without derogating from our fundamental treaty position.

Position papers outlining this Government's position on these proposals are now being prepared in collaboration with representatives of the Armed Forces and the Panama Canal Company. These papers will be submitted for your consideration in due course.

The majority of the proposals will have to be rejected in whole or in part. Some, for example Document U, would affect our fundamental rights and others, for example Document H, are clearly unjust or impractical.

[Tab A]

SYNOPSIS OF PROPOSALS PRESENTED BY PANAMANIAN MISSION SEPTEMBER, OCTOBER 1953

Document A

Restriction on right to import into Zone, Panama to have privileged position regarding sales to Zone, limitation on operations of commissaries; restriction on manufacturing, processing, etc., in Zone; sales of surplus materials only to Panamanian Government; privileged position for Panama regarding sales to ships and ship repairs.

---

[1] Drafted by Eldred D. Kuppinger of the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs. Addressed also to the Under Secretary of State.

This is in line with basic Panamanian contention that U.S. Government sponsored economic activities in the Canal Zone have stifled the development of Panamanian agriculture, trade, and commerce and that Panama has been deprived of the benefits it should enjoy from its geographic situation.

Document B

Panamanian citizens employed by Zone agencies to be guaranteed treatment in all respects equal to U.S. citizens, i.e., equal pay, promotion opportunities, leave, pensions, etc.

Document C

Panama to have right to levy taxes on Panamanian employees of Zone agencies who reside in Panama or who reside in Zone; also to tax private enterprise in Zone.

Document D

Panamanian flag to fly alongside U.S. flag in Zone, and on commercial vessels transiting Canal; Spanish and English to be official languages in Zone.

Document E

Panama Railroad Company activities to cease in Panama; its properties, assets and other rights in Panama and those of any other agency of the United States to become property of Panama (except Madden Dam).

Document F

Formation of Mixed Commission to formulate plans and take measures for civil defense throughout the Isthmus—i.e., Canal Zone and Panama. All costs, except salaries of Panamanian members, to be borne by the United States.

Document G

United States to cease issuing consular exequaturs. Panamanian exequaturs to be recognized in Zone.

Document H

United States to grant duty-free import quotas on 11 Panamanian products, namely:

a) refined cane sugar, b) alcohol and liquors (derived from sugar cane), c) coffee, d) meat, e) hides, f) shrimp, g) cacao, h) vegetable oils, i) copra, j) vegetable fibers, k) cashew nuts.

Most of these products are not now in production sufficient to permit export. This is obviously an effort to gain an assured market in advance of increasing production.

Document I

Annual payment of 20% of gross toll receipts, with guaranteed minimum of $5,000,000.

Document J

Construction of port and docks at Colon for benefit of Panama. Thereafter all cargo transshipments to be made through these facilities.

Document K

Full access to Canal Zone docks, lower wharfage costs, elimination of travel tax and any discount enjoyed by any U.S. Government agency from any ship line operating to or from Panama, development of Free Zone and exemption from U.S. taxes for any U.S. company operating therein, and stimulation of tourist traffic ($500 duty exemption).

Document L

Stimulation of U.S. private investment in Panama by exempting profits of U.S. investors from U.S. taxes.

Document M

Elimination of 1903 Treaty restriction on construction of interoceanic railways and highways by Panama.

Document N

United States to construct, within 5 years, bridges or tunnels at Atlantic and Pacific ends of Canal and to afford corridors in those regions to Panama—corridors and bridges or tunnels to be under Panamanian jurisdiction.

Document O

Establishment of Mixed Tribunals to handle civil cases in Zone involving Panamanians.

Document P

United States to give up present treaty right to prescribe sanitary ordinances in Panama City and Colon and, if necessary, to enforce compliance therewith; limitation of such authority to Canal Zone and Madden Dam area. United States to furnish water for Panama City and Colon at fixed rate.

Document Q

Use of Panamanian postage stamps in Zone, to be purchased at discount.

Document R

Panamanian customs authorities to have free access to vessels arriving at Zone to examine persons and cargo destined for Panama; jurisdiction over Panama registered ships arriving at Canal; construction of customs houses in Zone for Panamanian customs and immigration officials use.

Document S

Recognition by the United States that treaties concerning Canal Zone do not affect Panamanian sovereignty over that territory.

Document T

Reference of controversies respecting any and all U.S.–Panama treaties to International Court of Justice.

Document U

Termination of present treaties 99 years from date of this agreement. Thereupon, new treaty to be drawn up under which Panama will recognize the United States as concessionary of the Canal.

Memorandum by the Acting Secretary of State to the President

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, November 7, 1953.

Subject: Relations between the United States and the Republic of Panama

I refer to your memorandum of September 29 to the Secretary of Defense[1] concerning certain complaints of President Remón of Panama.

These complaints are for the most part not new; most of them are the subject of agreements, and of continuing discussion, since 1903. On the whole, it can be said that the Canal Zone authorities have taken all reasonable steps to guard against the abuses mentioned, often without corresponding cooperation by the Panamanian authorities. The specific complaints made to you by President Remón are one-sided. I have discussed these in brief detail in the accompanying attachment.

These complaints are among those under study by an Interdepartmental Committee, established upon the initiative of the State Department. This Committee has the task of formulating the United States position on the issues which the Panamanians are raising in the conversations, now under way in Washington, on the whole field of United States–Panama relations arising from the construction and operation of the Canal. A genuine effort will be made to reach fair and just solutions, as you have directed.

While President Remón presented the Panamanian side solely, I believe that there are a number of steps which might be taken by this Government which would, without sacrificing any of our basic rights in the Zone, go a long way toward removing current Panamanian dissatisfactions. Among these might be listed the transfer to Panama of certain lands no longer needed for the operation and/or protection of the Canal and its auxiliary works, increased purchases from Panama, closer adherence to our commitment to pursue a policy of equality of treatment and opportunity for Panamanian labor in the Canal Zone, fulfillment of our commitment to build a bridge or tunnel, to be under full United States jurisdiction, at the Pacific end of the Canal, and the granting to Panama of the right now prohibited by treaty to tax Panamanian citizens employed in the Canal Zone. I shall place before you certain recommendations when the current conversations have progressed to a point where such a step is feasible.

The Department of the Army has concurred in this memorandum.[2]

COMMENTS ON ISSUES RAISED BY PRESIDENT REMÓN

1. Establishment of the Panama Canal Company.

The reorganization of the Panama Canal Company was the result, not of a desire to make the operation free of control from Washington, but of a study by the Bureau of the Budget which recommended certain organizational changes with a view to putting the Canal on a business-like basis. In its report to the President of the United States in 1950, the Bureau of the Budget recommended that the operation of the waterway and all related business enterprises be transferred to the Panama Railroad Company, a United States Government-owned corporation operating as an adjunct to the Canal and already conducting most of the business enterprises related to the Canal. This recommendation was transmitted to the Congress by the President with his approval, and implementing legislation was enacted in 1950, becoming effective on July 1, 1951. The Company was renamed the Panama Canal Company.

The Panamanians apparently fearful that the word "company" implied a commercial enterprise, formally protested the new organization in March 1953, as indicating the intention of this Government through such reorganization to escape fulfillment of certain treaty obligations to Panama. The Panamanian protest was rejected on the grounds that it is for the Government of the United States to determine which agencies or instrumentalities are appropriate for the exercise of its rights and the performance of its obligations. At the same time, the Panamanian Government was assured that it does not seek in any way to avoid fulfillment of its treaty obligations to Panama. The Secretary of the Army, under delegation of authority from the President, gives continuous and close personal supervision to the operations of the Company and the Canal Zone Government with respect to basic policies and selection of officials.

[2] The original State Department draft of Oct. 5, 1953, included "elimination of sales of foreign luxury items in Canal Zone stores" in its list of possible concessions to the Government of Panama. The Department of the Army objected to this point, which was subsequently deleted in the final memorandum. There were several other changes in wording. (Letter by Earl D. Johnson, Under Secretary of the Army, to Mr. Cabot, dated Nov. 3, 1953, 611.19/11–353)

2. Sales to Ships.

The sale of supplies to ships passing through the Canal, which President Remón alleges to be a violation of the spirit of the treaty, is in fact expressly authorized in a note accessory to the 1936 Treaty with Panama. Panamanian suppliers, however, are permitted and encouraged to participate in this market, and the Panama Canal Company, for the express purpose of permitting Panamanian merchants to compete, imposes a special surcharge on many items sold by the Panama Canal Company to such ships.

3. Commercial Competition.

The United States is pledged to regular and continued opportunity for conference and exchange of views on this question. A joint commission is maintained in an endeavor to suppress smuggling from the Zone into Panama. The Zone also maintains a costly system of checks to insure that only duly authorized persons purchase at the commissaries and PX's, where prices are lower than in Panama. Undoubtedly some purchases in the Zone are made by authorized persons for friends and relatives who lack the privilege, and it is virtually impossible to control such transactions in the home. The Panamanian Government, on its part, has never adopted or enforced measures complementary to those of the Zone. The Panamanians aspire to the elimination of the commissaries and PX's, and a monopoly of the Canal Zone market. Such a step, however, under present circumstances would work a hardship on Zone personnel by placing them at the mercy of price-gouging merchants in Panama. However, as long as prices in the Canal Zone are cheaper than those in Panama, this problem will continue to be an irritant in United States–Panama relations. Imports into the Zone are duty-free, with resultant lower retail price, because the Canal Zone is outside the customs area of the United States and by treaty is not subject to Panamanian duties.

One source of complaint in this field is in the process of liquidation. The supply and storage yards formerly maintained by contractors on military reservations in the Canal Zone are being discontinued. The Government of Panama had pointed out that such yards were susceptible for use as bases of contraband operations.

4. Panamanian Taxation of Panamanian Employees of the Canal Zone.

The right of the Government of Panama to impose taxes on persons employed in the Canal agencies was expressly relinquished by Panama in the 1903 Treaty. This restriction appears to work an undue hardship upon the Republic, since many of these persons enjoy the benefit of Government services from the Republic. The matter of permitting Panama to tax its citizens residing in Panama or the Canal Zone, as well as United States citizens working in the Zone but residing in Panama, is being explored by the United States agencies concerned.

Memorandum by the President to the Secretary of Defense (Wilson)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] February 26, 1954.

On the occasion of the visit of President Remon of Panama last fall I issued jointly with him a statement on October 1, 1953[2] stating in part:

"We have equally agreed that inasmuch as the two countries have a mutual and vital interest in the work of the Panama Canal, the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment must have full effect in regard to the citizens of Panama and the United States employed in the Canal Zone as set forth in the exchange of notes of March 2, 1936 on this subject and that wherever circumstances should be found which in any manner interfere with the observance of that principle, appropriate measures will be taken by the United States."

The Department of State informs me that prolonged consultation with the Department of Defense has failed to bring agreement. In order to give effect to the joint statement, and apart from the matter of the applicability of the note accessory to the 1936 Treaty, I believe that the Department of Defense should promptly take steps necessary to enable our negotiators to inform the Panamanians that we are prepared to give effect to the following objectives:

(1) The merging of the present dual-wage systems into a single-wage scale and uniformity in treatment of non-American labor;
(2) Have this new single scale and uniformity in treatment apply to all United States Government agencies operating in the Canal Zone; and
(3) Have whatever retirement system finally adopted applied uniformly to non-American employees of all Government agencies in the Zone.

We should be in a position to make this announcement to the Panamanian Delegation prior to the opening of the Caracas Conference on March 1st. If you have real objection to the formulation of such policies, please see me at once.

The Ambassador in Panama (Chapin)[1] to the Department of State

SECRET NIACT PANAMA CITY, February 27, 1954—2 p. m.

223. Foreign Minister Guizado told me last night, that Remon telegraphed President Eisenhower yesterday, asking that he instruct Mr. Dulles to intervene personally in Panama–United States negotiations.[2] I expressed some surprise at this end-run. Guizado explained Remon wished to leave no stone unturned to solve impasse and that this procedure implied no lack of confidence in Embassy.

Guizado went on to say that Panamanian Government regarded United States offer of 1 million a year for 10 years, as completely unacceptable and even insulting.[3] Panama of course, could not accept a penny of such a hand out, particularly in view Remon's oft repeated declaration that Panama wanted justice, not alms.

During our two-hour conversation, Guizado, of course, ran gamut of Panama's well known complaints, emphasizing demand that Panama be given percentage (20 percent was figure mentioned) of canal company's "gross profits".

In conclusion, Guizado stated categorically that unless Washington talks took quick turn for better, Remon had decided to withdraw Panamanian negotiators with fanfare.

While statements, such as those made by Guizado last night, contain some elements of bargaining and bluff, I am forced to conclusion that Remon and Guizado are serious in their threat to break-off, dramatically, negotiations unless Panama obtains something considerably more substantial. It cannot be over emphasized that these substantial gains to which Panama aspires are not only material, but psychological in character. Remon is so deeply committed politically to Panamanian public that I fear that failure in Washington would be only first step towards what might develop into a violent nationalism, i.e., anti-Americanism by his administration or its successor, if he forced to resign.

[1] Selden Chapin replaced Mr. Wiley as U.S. Ambassador to Panama on Jan. 22, 1954.

[2] President Remón telegraphed that he was availing himself of President Eisenhower's suggestion, made during Remón's visit to the United States in September 1953, that he bring to Eisenhower's personal attention any difficulties arising in connection with the negotiations. In view of the U.S. negotiating team's rejection of several Panamanian proposals, he specifically requested that Eisenhower permit Secretary Dulles to grant an interview to Panamanian representatives while in Caracas, so that they might be able to explain in person the Panamanian Government position. (611.1913/2–2754).

[3] The U.S. Delegation to the U.S.-Panamanian talks made this offer on Feb. 23, 1954, in lieu of an increase in the annuity (Department telegram 167 to Panama City, dated Feb. 23, 1954, 819.00 TA/2–2354).

Strongly urge immediate re-examination our position regarding payments supplementary to annuity with emphasis on possibility of percentage "share" of gross tolls without guaranteed minimum.

Department will no doubt bear in mind desirability forestalling break during Caracas Conference.

Memorandum by the Deputy Secretary of Defense (Kyes) to the President [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, 27 February 1954.

I refer to your letter dated 26 February 1954 [2] in which you mentioned three points regarding United States Armed Services wage and retirement policies in the Canal Zone. Mention was also made of a desire to announce a change in these policies to the Panamanian Delegation prior to the opening of the Caracas Conference on 1 March 1954.

The request of the Panamanian Government for changes in the wage policies of the Armed Services in the Canal Zone is presently under consideration in this Department. I wish to assure you that the Department of Defense regards these matters as being of considerable importance and we fully appreciate the significance of maintaining excellent relations with our Panamanian neighbors. In this connection, there are a number of factors of profound importance to the Armed Services and the United States Government generally, which I believe should be brought to your attention. The more important of these factors follow:

1. The establishment of a single U.S. pay schedule for U.S. and non-U.S. citizens employed by the Services in the Canal Zone conflicts with the world-wide policy of the Armed Services of paying non-U.S. citizen personnel liberal wages based on local prevailing rates.
2. Adoption in the Canal Zone of U.S. wage rates for non-U.S. citizens would have world-wide implications. The Services employ hundreds of thousands of non-U.S. citizens throughout the world and pressure would certainly be brought to bear which would result in a tremendous increase in the operating costs of the Services.
3. The Panamanians have indicated they do not desire persons of other than U.S. or Panamanian nationality to receive pay based upon U.S. rates. However, the United States employs a significant number of personnel of other nationalities in the Canal Zone against whom there should be no discrimination.
4. The 1936 Accessory Notes make no mention of the establishment of a single U.S. wage schedule, but rather provide for equality of opportunity and treatment. The Services have followed this principle.

[1] The ribbon copy of this memorandum in the folder entitled "Wilson, Chas. E." at the Eisenhower Library is signed by Deputy Secretary of Defense Kyes; the Department of State file copy has Secretary of Defense Wilson's name typed on the signature line (611.19/5–354).

[2] Presumably the memorandum of that date, p. 1429.

5. The establishment of a single wage schedule such as that proposed by the Panama Canal Company would require legislative changes. For example, the Civil Service Classification Act would require amendment.

6. The Department of Defense agrees that a uniform retirement system should apply to non-U.S. citizens employed in each foreign area. This problem is under consideration by the Kaplan Committee and it is believed action should await its recommendations.

In view of the foregoing, it is my considered opinion that action at this time on the points mentioned in your letter would have a significantly adverse effect on the overseas operations of this Department. Accordingly, it is recommended that we not act on this matter prior to the Caracas Conference.

The Ambassador in Panama (Chapin) to the Department of State[1]

CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY PANAMA CITY, March 4, 1954--4 p.m.

227. Because of carnival, this morning was first opportunity to see Remon re position set forth his telegram February 26 to President Eisenhower (my telegram 223 February 27).[2] I had asked for appointment stating that I would be glad if President could give me any further information or if I could be of any assistance in clarifying Panamanian position to my government. Fortunately I was able to deliver President Eisenhower's message to Remon (Deptel 177 March 3)[3] who expressed appreciation President's prompt reply and said he had every confidence President and Secretary Dulles would carry out encouraging declaration regarding Panama's aspirations which they had made to him at time his visit to states. Remon said course of negotiations in Washington só disappointing that he had availed himself of President Eisenhower's invitation to appeal directly to him.

Although I endeavored elicit specific points of complaint it apparent that it was alleged general US approach which perturbed Remon. He said it was not merely that US attitude was negative but that this negation seemed based in almost every case on unwillingness to accept Panamanian proposals even as basis for discussion. He called for documents just brought by courier from Washington and opened them in my presence. These referred to US comments on paragraph 1 to 4 of Panamanian document A "Panamanian Participation in Canal Zone

[1] Repeated to the U.S. Delegation at Caracas.

[2] Ante, p. 1430.

[3] In his message, President Eisenhower indicated that he was pleased to have Secretary Dulles discuss matters pertaining to the Panama Canal with Remón's representatives in Caracas. He stated that he believed substantial progress in the negotiations was being made in an atmosphere of cordiality, and that he was confident that the talks would result in adjustments of mutual benefit to both countries. (Department telegram 177, dated Mar. 3, 1954, 611.1913/3–354)

Market". He said these and, as another random example, our attitude toward Panamanian shipping illustrated US unreceptiveness.

I then inquired whether he had received any word of US attitude on return of certain properties outside Canal Zone citing this as instance of what I considered generous US attempt meet Panamanian wishes. Remon said he had received nothing on this and inquired whether this was connected with request for use Rio Hato area and whether we wanted that land for military base or for maneuvering area. I assured him Rio Hato desired only for maneuvering area but that he should shortly receive proposed draft agreement. I remarked that it was probably encouraging for Panama that our army felt it needed Rio Hato area since this indicated there was no immediate intention make substantial reduction in zone garrison and should be source of continued economic advantage to Panama.

During course our interview Mrs. Remon telephoned from Caracas saying inter alia that Secretary Dulles had promised receive Guizado and others of Panamanian delegation before his return to US in order discuss Panamanian treaty revision. It is perhaps not without significance that Remon became obviously excited when at one moment he thought Guizado was going to see Secretary alone and insisted to his wife that Foreign Minister be accompanied by other members delegation. In conclusion President Remon stressed that Panama's dissatisfaction not engendered solely by US refusal to increase annuity and disappointing US counter offer of economic assistance nor did it spring from any other specific point. Panama's disappointment he declared was basically due "generally unsatisfactory tenor of discussions". I replied that while I could appreciate that from his point view all Panama's demands important it might be useful if he were to indicate to me some few issues to which he attributed especial significance so that I could better explain Panama's position to my government. I remarked casually, that we had referred to a log jam but that it was always important to break out the first three or four logs. Remon seemed to accept my suggestion and said he would have conference "with some of his people" after Caracas meeting with Secretary Dulles and hoped therefore next week he might be able to pass on to me informally his views on some of most outstanding issues.

DEAR JACK: Kupp and I have sat here the last couple of days doing a bit of "self-criticism". Result attached.

We have gone a substantial distance toward meeting Panamanian aspirations. Panama will never be contented. We can hope only to have them satisfied for the time being. I feel very definitely that if we can avoid being used by individual Panamanian politicians and can make progress in solving the pending main problems we will be able to bring these negotiations to a reasonably successful conclusion.

I hope to see Roderick and the Governor again soon, using this memorandum as a basis for further discussion of our remaining problems.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 5, 1954.

Subject: Review of Panamanian Negotiations.[1]

The basic approach to the consideration of the Panamanian proposals has been a firm stand against any derogation of our fundamental treaty position in the Zone. There is no disposition to give ground on that score although many of the Panamanian proposals are aimed at that goal.

The Department of State, however, feels strongly that it is in the national interest, in promoting the security of the Canal, to make such adjustments as can be made in Panama's favor as do not prejudice the U.S. position or discriminate against our personnel residing in the Zone.

Many of the positive steps we are considering taking vis-à-vis Panama should have been taken voluntarily by us over the years rather than to hold fast until Panamanian resentment reached a high emotional pitch. To do these things all at one time and at Panamanian urging has given rise to the superficial impression that we are making great concessions to Panama. Such action takes on another face, however, when it is considered that we are, in large part, discharging recognized obligations, rather belatedly in some instances.

Our relationships today with Panama would undoubtedly be better if we had taken steps on our own initiative long since to reduce the irritation arising from the competition with Panamanian commerce as results from the manufacture or processing of consumer goods in the Zone; we should have endeavored to broaden our purchases in Panama; we should have given greater consideration to the commissary problem; we should have taken steps to implement more completely the commitment we made in 1936 with respect to Panamanian labor in the Canal Zone (this matter is still pending inter-agency agreement); and we should have fulfilled before now the bridge/tunnel commitment we assumed in 1942.

To do so even at this relatively late date will still serve to improve our relations but the favorable impact would have been much greater had we done these things voluntarily and more seasonably.

In addition, we are now prepared:

a) to accede to the Panamanian request concerning the levying of income tax on their nationals who are employed by Zone agencies. This provision of the 1903 Treaty is now an anachronism and equity clearly dictates its repeal.

b) to enter into an arrangement by which Panama can more effectively compete in the sale of certain ships' stores to ships transiting the Canal.

c) to turn over to Panama certain parcels of land to which the United States holds title in the Isthmus which are no longer essential for Canal purposes, together with improvements where they exist, all without cost to Panama. In some cases title to these lands was acquired by purchase and not by condemnation under the 1903 Treaty. Thus, this gesture takes on substantial proportions in view of the considerable value of the lands and improvements. The requests we are making in return are modest and involve very little cost to the Panamanian Government. On balance this gesture weighs very heavily in Panama's favor, and the United States can properly assert that it has acted with generosity in this case.

d) to meet—indirectly—the request for an increased annuity by agreeing to seek Congressional approval for an economic aid program involving the expenditure for jointly-approved and financed projects of up to $20 million over a period of ten years in lieu of a direct increase in the annuity. It is generally agreed that the present annuity figure is inadequate; the principal question we have had to consider is what would be the most desirable way to handle the matter. Considerable sentiment has been expressed against a direct increase in this payment and the economic aid program was evolved as a desirable substitute. Panama, however, is very much dissatisfied with our proposal in this regard. To them the annuity is an important symbol; is it something tangible in the way of benefits accruing to Panama from the Canal which is understood by everyone. It may well be the case that we shall have to review our thinking on this matter largely from the point of view of the political implications which are tied to this question.

Purchasing policies, limitations on commissaries, elimination of competitive manufacturing and processing in the Zone, sales of ships' stores, labor policy, income tax, transfer of lands and the annuity payment are tangible matters on which we have made, or hope to make, adjustments which will move toward meeting in varying degrees those of Panama's aspirations which we consider justified.

Less spectacular perhaps, but nonetheless important in that Panamanian sensibilities are involved, are the adjustments we are prepared to make in the field of intangibles. Income tax jurisdiction can be included in this category also since we will remove an impediment which has prevented Panama from exercising the normal tax powers of a sovereign nation with respect to non-U.S. employees of Zone agencies; also included in this category are our willingness to waive our monopoly rights with respect to the construction of trans-Isthmian railroads and highways; and our disposition to give up our treaty right to exercise jurisdiction over sanitary matters in the terminal cities.

We can point to these actions as proof of our willingness to make adjustments in our relations where changing circumstances have altered the situations which originally gave rise to special grants of authority and where no question of our fundamental position in the Zone is concerned. While we can and should take full credit for displaying an enlightened outlook in this regard, we may also admit among ourselves that such action is no more than we feel it desirable to take in our long range national interest under the precepts which guide our international relations.

The Panamanian proposals, when originally received, gave rise to a considerable degree of puzzlement on our part since many were predicated on the Panamanian theory of limited jurisdiction on the part of the United States in the Zone with reserved jurisdiction remaining with Panama. As the Panamanians well know, we reject this theory completely and hold to the position that our status in the Zone is clearly set forth in Article III of the 1903 Convention which confers on the United States "all the rights, power and authority . . . (as) if it were the sovereign" to the entire exclusion of the exercise by Panama of such rights. The Panamanians who prepared their proposals were fully aware of this divergence of interpretation and, unless they thought they could catch us unawares, they must have known that acceptance by us of proposals predicated on their theory was completely out of the question. Therefore, on a scoreboard basis they could have foreseen that the negotiations would end with Panama on the short end of the score, comparing proposals accepted against those rejected. Now it is also known that several persons closely identified with these negotiations on the Panamanian side have political ambitions which might be furthered if President Remon had to take the responsibility for failure to obtain significant success in attaining Panamanian aspirations. A complete failure of these negotiations could conceivably result in Remon vacating the presidential office—an event which might not be to our interest. A new president, if not particularly well-disposed toward the United States, coming to power on the wave of a tide of resentment toward the United States would inevitably result in strained relations between the United States and Panama—the very thing we are seeking to avoid.

We believe that even though some of the Panamanian proposals have been loaded—intentionally or not—with requests which are unacceptable to the United States, the result of the negotiations can be shown to be, on balance, favorable enough to Panama that fairly informed public opinion can be satisfied if, in addition to those tangible and intangible adjustments we are prepared to make, we can resolve the three important remaining problems: (a) the annuity payment, (b) treatment of Panamanian labor in the Zone, and (c) ease Panamanian keen disappointment at the limited degree to which we are prepared to limit manufacturing and processing and sales practices in the Canal Zone, and especially at our reluctance to give any formal commitment in this regard.

The annuity matter could possibly be solved without too much difficulty by bringing the figure up to $2 million, the amount we had in mind for the economic aid program. In fact, by so doing, we may save $430,000 per year.

The labor problem, however, requires an alteration of attitude on the part of the Defense authorities. If they persist in their adamantly negative position on this question, the result of these negotiations will remain in jeopardy with attendant dangers insofar as our long range relations with Panama are concerned.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL
EYES ONLY

[WASHINGTON,] March 17, 1954.

DEAR SELDEN: When I was in Caracas, a considerable amount of interest was aroused by statements by Senora Remon that the United States was practicing racial discrimination in the Canal Zone. The implication was that this was something more than a question of "equal pay for equal work" which is being discussed up here.

Would it be possible for someone in the Embassy, without letting it be known, quietly to gather for transmittal on a strictly confidential basis what the facts are in this respect.

I might say that there is interest in this in the highest quarters.

If it cannot be done on a strictly confidential basis, just let me know and I will approach the matter otherwise. Possibly you already know enough about the situation yourself so that you could at least give me a preliminary fill-in.

Sincerely yours, JOHN FOSTER DULLES

CONFIDENTIAL
OFFICIAL–INFORMAL

PANAMA CITY, March 23, 1954.

DEAR FOSTER: In reply to your letter of March 17[1] regarding the racial discrimination in the Canal Zone, I hasten, as you suggest, to give you the following "fill-in."

I am afraid there is little doubt that there has been, since the beginning of the construction of the Canal, discrimination in the Canal Zone against non-U.S. citizens. The Panama Canal Company, the Canal Zone Government and the Armed Forces divide their civilian employees into two general categories: U.S.-rate and local-rate workers. It is to be noted that the U.S.-rate group contains not only highly qualified technical personnel and office workers but also skilled artisans and even manual workers, whereas the local-rate group, although containing some minor clerical personnel, is largely composed of manual workers, both skilled and unskilled. These two groups were originally established, for payroll purposes, as the "Gold" and "Silver" rate groups, but the present terminology was put into effect as the result of the McSherry Report, referred to later, dated 1947. The grouping has, however, acquired secondary meanings of segregation and racial discrimination since, with very, very few exceptions, all U.S.-rate workers are white U.S. citizens. On the other hand, local-rate workers are predominantly black West Indians or their descendants. U.S. raters receive higher pay for corresponding jobs, i.e., a U.S.-rate truck driver will receive almost double the wages paid to a Panamanian or West Indian truck driver. In addition, the U.S.-rater enjoys a 25% differential applied to his salary.

The division into payroll categories has in practice segregated the local-rate (West Indian or Panamanian) worker from the U.S.-rate (white) worker and to some extent has limited his opportunities for advancement. Local-rate workers live in special communities and use separate schools, recreational facilities, commissaries and motion picture theatres, etc. In Gorgas Hospital, for example, washrooms are plainly marked "U.S. Rate" or "Local Rate" as the case may be. Since Panamanians, regardless of color, are with a few very notable exceptions employed in the local-rate group, there is some confusion in Panamanian discussions of discrimination as to whether such discrimination is racial (color) or national. It is to be observed, however, that there are some Panamanian citizens employed in the U.S.-rate group, in offices, PX's, commissaries and even as doctors and surgeons in the hospital. Theoretically there is no bar against the employment of Panamanians or, for that matter, West Indian negroes, in U.S.-rate positions, and we have repeatedly, since construction days, assured the Panamanians that we intended to give them equal opportunities with American citizens. In practice, however, the employment officers and the AFL union here have alleged in the past, as an excuse for failing to employ more Panamanians, that they were not sufficiently well trained for the more technical U.S.-rate jobs. This, it may be noted in passing, is somewhat inconsistent with the Union's frequently-expressed fears that if they should let down the bars many of their jobs might be taken away from them by Panamanians at lower salaries.

In fairness, however, to the Canal Zone personnel management, it should be pointed out that the local-rate wage scale in the Zone is, nevertheless, higher than the wages generally paid in Panama for similar services. For example, recently when the Hotel Washington in Colon, formerly run by the Canal Zone Government, was leased to a Panamanian company, that company promptly made a general cut in the wages of the hotel staff. I understand that similar cuts were made in the wages paid to truck drivers and other workers in the Sanitation Department when garbage collection in the cities of Panama and Colon was turned over to the Panamanian Government.

The Panamanian attitude with regard to West Indian negroes was rather succinctly stated in an article by Professor John Biesanz in "Phylon, the Atlanta University Review of Race & Culture," Vol. XI, No. I, 1950:

"Nor is Panama greatly concerned with the plight of her adopted children. Panamanian protests against discrimination in the Zone, loud as they may be when diplomats are bargaining for their country's advance, are in part negated by two factors:

"First, most of the silver workers are West Indian immigrants and their descendants. Panamanians regard them as an out-group, culturally different and economically competitive, and have prohibited further immigration of English-speaking Negroes. They feel no racial solidarity with them; few Panamanians will admit their Negro blood, if indeed they are conscious of it. They resent being lumped with this out-group by the caste system of the Zone. They do not want the system abolished; they consider it quite good enough for the West Indians. What they do want is upper-caste status for themselves on their own soil.

"Second, Panamanian government officials do not really want wages raised. Members of the traditionally privileged group, they shudder at the thought of what a substantial raise in the Zone would do to their own labor market. They have brought private pressure to bear on Zone officials not to raise wages to any great extent.

"Thus, West Indian exploitability, Panamanian nationalism, and American race prejudice, assisted by the inertia of a going bureaucracy, have all tended to encourage persistence of the Zone dichotomy."

In 1947 Brigadier General Frank J. McSherry, Ret., prepared for the Governor of the Canal a secret report on "Alleged Discrimination in Treatment of Citizens of Republic of Panama and Alien Employees of Panama Canal, Panama Railroad Company," which sets forth in detail various aspects of discrimination and segregation in the Canal Zone. With only minor exceptions (I have noted the change in designation of Gold and Silver rates to U.S. and local rates) his observations are still true today. A copy of this report is understood to be on file in the Department.

More recently, the Embassy sent in a despatch, No. 84 of July 30, 1953,[2] on the treatment of Panamanian labor in the Canal Zone, discussing the obligation of the United States toward Panamanian workers and the problems arising in the fulfillment of that obligation, including the existence of separate wage scales for local-rate and U.S.-rate employees, the extent of employment opportunities for Panamanian citizens, varying personnel practices of the U.S. agencies in the Canal Zone and the problem of racial discrimination.

In conclusion, I may say that Panamanian thinking on the question is certainly fuzzy. I do, however, feel that in addition to any tangible benefits which we may be prepared to offer Panama as a result of the conversations now taking place in Washington, it is most important that we offer something along the lines of a reasonably decent solution for their demand for equality of treatment for Panamanian labor. This seems much more important to me than the commissary problem, particularly from the point of view of Panamanian prestige.

With all kindest regards,

Sincerely yours, SELDEN CHAPIN

The Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Wilson)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 25, 1954.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The point has now been reached, in the negotiations which are currently being carried on between representatives of this Government and representatives of the Government of Panama, where the Panamanian Delegation has been informed of the present United States position on all principal points raised by Panama with one exception: the question of treatment of Panamanians employed by United States governmental agencies in the Canal Zone.

[1] Drafted by Ambassador Muccio.

It is becoming increasingly imperative that this Government's position on this question be communicated to the Panamanian Delegation at an early date. This is a matter which has been under the active consideration of representatives of our respective Departments since June of last year. As noted in this Department's letter of January 18, 1954,[2] the dual-wage system and other inequalities constitute the most conspicuous and long-standing single irritant in United States–Panama relations. I consider it essential to our national interest that prompt remedial action should be taken by the employing agencies in the Zone to mitigate this situation.

Certain suggestions along this line were embodied in the above-mentioned letter of January 18, 1954, which I consider should merit your favorable consideration. It would not appear that there is any fundamental reason why the dual-wage system cannot be abolished and uniform personnel policies and retirement provisions applied by the three Armed Services and the Panama Canal Company-Government. Mr. Kyes appears to have the impression, which he revealed to General Smith, that the President had conceded, in the course of the conversation at the White House on February 27[3] in which Mr. Kyes and I participated, that the Defense Department should attempt to reorganize its systems for treatment of employees all over the world at the same time that it remedies the situation in the Canal Zone. I think the President's memorandum to you of February 26[4] indicated his concurrence in the need to carry out his commitment to President Remon when the two met in the White House and was later incorporated in the two Presidents' joint communiqué of October 1, 1953. I believe that the systems in the Canal Zone should be equalized without awaiting such sweeping world-wide reorganization to avert the possibility of having the negotiations now under way blow up on us.

There has, I believe, been some misconception of the effects of the changes that have been suggested. Elimination of the dual-wage systems would simply involve a combining and dovetailing of the existing two wage schedules and would not in itself increase Panamanian wages. The obvious existence of two different wage scales has had a very undesirable psychological effect, and a large part of this disadvantage could be eliminated by a single scale. This, with uniformity of treatment by all United States agencies, would be the minimum which would carry out the commitment made by President Eisenhower in September.

It has been necessary to give negative replies to a large number of the Panamanian requests which are unacceptable because they would impair our fundamental position, constitute a detrimental relinquishing of treaty rights, or involve special treatment or heavy expenditures for which we see no justification or obligation. On the other hand, in my opinion, there are enough important items on which we can take favorable action as to constitute a sufficiently handsome package to bring the negotiations to a mutually satisfactory conclusion if the problem of the treatment of labor can be resolved.

I feel strongly that we should not lose the opportunity to better United States–Panama relations by further delay in dealing with the labor problem. This is the only remaining principal item on which a United States position has not been expressed in these negotiations. Our inability to express a position is now resulting in a lapse in the negotiations. A prolonged lapse, resulting from indecision on this point, will serve only to exaggerate the importance of this item and to increase irritations resulting from the existing situation. Prolonged silence on this subject is tantamount to a negative reply and may well result in a failure of these negotiations with consequent serious effects on relations between the United States and Panama. I, therefore, urge upon you the importance of agreeing very soon to a satisfactory position with respect to this matter as advanced in the President's memorandum of February 26.

Sincerely yours, JOHN FOSTER DULLES

The Secretary of Defense (Wilson) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, May 3, 1954.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to your letter dated 25 March 1954[1] regarding the status of discussions currently being carried on between representatives of this Government and the Government of Panama. I fully concur with your concern as to the need for expeditious action in this matter.

Regarding the point made in your letter on the matter of the pay policy followed by the United States Armed Services in the Canal Zone, it appears to me that there are certain basic considerations that must be clearly understood if the discussions with the Panamanian Government are to be concluded in a manner satisfactory to the United States. The employment of non-US citizens by Department of Defense agencies has world-wide implications and it is neither practicable nor advisable to disassociate our policies in the Canal Zone from those in effect in other parts of the world. In this connection, I wish to point out that this Department is not contemplating the reorganization of its world-wide personnel pay policies for non-US personnel. The establishment of a single-wage scale for all personnel employed by the Armed Services in the Canal Zone would establish a precedent and would have an immediate serious impact by the application of pressure from non-US citizen groups employed by the Armed Services in other parts of the world.

As you know, it is the policy of the United States Armed Services to pay non-US personnel liberal wages based on local prevailing rates. It is believed that this policy is proper from the US economic viewpoint and is least likely to cause economic problems to other governments.

The 1936 Accessory Notes do not mention the establishment of a single-wage schedule for all personnel employed by US Government agencies in the Canal Zone. The notes do, however, set forth the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment of Panama and United States citizens employed in the Canal Zone and this principle is applied by this Department.

It is my understanding, as the result of our meeting with the President at the White House on 27 February 1954, that the President agreed in substance with the position of this Department regarding payment of non-US personnel. A copy of the Department of Defense position in this matter is attached for your information.[2] The original of the memorandum was left at the Whte House following the discussion.

To my knowledge, no mention was made of a single-wage scale for personnel employed in the Canal Zone in the discussions between the President and President Remon in Washington or in their joint communiqué issued on 1 October 1953. Assurances were given with respect to equality of opportunity and treatment, but in my view this does not imply a single-wage scale.

I wish to assure you that this Department regards the matter of a satisfactory settlement to the labor questions in the Canal Zone as being of extreme importance and recognizes the necessity of maintaining excellent relations with our Panamanian neighbors.

Sincerely yours, C. E. WILSON

SECRET PRIORITY PANAMA CITY, May 31, 1954—1 p. m.

324. The substance Department circular telegrams 442[1] and 443[2] communicated this morning to President Remon and Foreign Minister Guizado.

President appeared impressed with gravity situation and listened attentively, interrupting now and then to ask clarification of points. He appeared concerned over exact interpretation clause within parentheses of point two recommendation and inquired whether US alone would undertake concrete action regarding detention and inspection of ships and other means of transport. When I stated my understanding this clause was intended for general action by all American states he offered no comment.

Remon stated Panamanian position on Communist penetration amply set forth in his several statements and that Panama recognized seriousness of threat and prepared in principle support US in any measures to prevent spread Communism this hemisphere and to preserve peace and security therein and particularly in any measures deemed necessary for the defense of the canal.

As respects the specific proposal of the US outlined to him today, he could say that in principle Panama was in favor of hemisphere side consultative meeting, but that he would prefer to study four points of proposed resolution before giving definite answer as to Panama's views.

Remon stated, however, that while he did not specifically object Montevideo as site proposed meeting, it was his personal feeling that some place nearer to focus of infection might be more effective. He based this observation on belief that Uruguayan and other governments well to the south could not feel as directly menaced by or concerned with situation in Guatemala and would not have picture as clearly in mind as if their representatives were meeting somewhere closer to Guatemala. Guizado suggested Miami might be more convenient spot, but it was clear to me that although unspoken thought of Panama as site was in forefront their minds. President also seemed somewhat mystified that meeting would not take place until early July. Guizado remarked at this point that there might be difficulties in getting some of South American countries in line.

[1] In circular telegram 442, dated May 29, 1954, the Department suggested holding a consultative meeting in Montevideo under Article 6 of the Rio Treaty of 1947 to consider the recent Communist penetration in Guatemala. The telegram outlined the major points which should be included in a resolution and the leading arguments which should be made to induce Latin American governments to support it. (363/5–2954) For text, see p. 1149.

[2] Department circular telegram 443, dated May 29, 1954, provided in some detail the reasons why the Department regarded the recent shipment of arms from the Soviet bloc to Guatemala as a threat to Central America (414.608/5–2954).

President stated he hoped to be able to give me definite answer by tomorrow when he was going out of town for his birthday.

In response to my inquiry re present state of previous discussions re meeting of CA Presidents based on Figueres' proposal, Remon stated he had agreed to send a special personal representative, possibly his brother, to meet with Figueres for a discussion of matters of general interest, and specifically to find out what Figueres had in mind. He added Figueres has stated his problem with Nicaragua would in any case not be a subject of discussion.

Remon did not know whether Salvadoran or other Presidents had been invited to do likewise.

CHAPIN

611.19/6–554

The Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Wilson)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 5, 1954.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to my letter of May 13, 1954,[2] concerning the question of the treatment to be accorded Panamanian labor employed in the Canal Zone, a matter which is the most crucial point under consideration in the current discussions between representatives of the Government of the United States and the Government of Panama.

As indicated in my letter under reference, it was the intention of this Department in replying to that section of the Panamanian memorandum of May 14[3] dealing with the labor question, to confirm that it was not intended that local employees of the Armed Services be included within the single wage system contemplated by the Canal Company-Government. It was added, however, that if Panama should return formally to the matter it might become desirable to review the question.

The Panamanian reaction to this position was expressed at the meeting held on May 20. The relevant extract of the transcript of that meeting is enclosed.[4]

It is clear that Panama will not willingly accept the position which has been expressed by this Government on this matter and that unless the United States position can be more nearly accommodated to the Panamanian position this subject will remain as a point of serious irritation in Panama–United States relations. In fact, if this matter cannot be more satisfactorily resolved, I doubt whether these discussions

---

[1] Drafted by Mr. Kuppinger.

[2] Not printed (611.19/5–354).

[4] This extract contained a statement by a member of the Panamanian Delegation arguing against the institution of a dual U.S. policy in the Canal Zone which, while eliminating wage discrimination for Panamanian employees of the Canal Company, would preserve it for workers employed by the Armed Services (611.19/6–554).

can be brought to a successful conclusion. I consider it of the utmost importance, especially in view of recent developments in that critical area, that all semblance of discrimination in employment practices in the Canal Zone based on nationality and/or color be removed. So long as a dual wage system is maintained in the Canal Zone by any agency of the Government of the United States, we are vulnerable to such charges and provide our enemies with material on which they can capitalize to the detriment of our position and prestige in that area and throughout Latin America.

I therefore recommend to your most favorable consideration a choice of one of the following possible courses, either of which I believe would provide a satisfactory solution of the problem:

a) That Armed Services agencies in the Canal Zone contract for their local personnel from the Panama Canal Company, thereby according such employees the same conditions of employment as those to be enjoyed by Canal Company employees. This would free the Armed Services from possible embarrassment elsewhere on the grounds of deviation from their uniform employment practices abroad since the Armed Forces would not be the actual employer, or

b) That the Armed Forces take the position that the Canal Zone situation is unique in that such a situation does not exist elsewhere in the world. Thus employees in other areas abroad would have no sound basis for demanding similar treatment on the ground of uniformity.

This subject is to be discussed again in the very near future with the Panamanian Delegation. I earnestly hope that this matter will be accorded renewed consideration by your Department and that you will find it possible to take the decision to adopt one or the other of the courses of action outlined above.

Sincerely yours, JOHN FOSTER DULLES

It noted that Guizado's own reaction was that the wording was "rather strong" and that the text was tantamount to a declaration of war since it imposed a blockade. cordance Depcirtel 482.[3] FYI to date eleven Latin American Governments have made specific commitments. End FYI. Tactfully determine whether or not Panama approves draft resolution. Department confident Remon Government's firm anti-Communist stand will be reflected in its effective cooperation in present problem of Guatemalan Communism, which is the most clear-cut and challenging manifestation of Soviet intervention in the Western Hemisphere to date.

However, Panama's delay may be due to (1) its interest in linking cooperation with U.S. on this problem with favorable outcome Panama's claims in present negotiations with U.S.; or (2) possible Panamanian fear proposed resolution may work to detriment of Panama registered shipping. You may in your discretion use following with Foreign Minister and President if either of foregoing factors are in Panamanian minds:

(1) Way will be cleared for more intensified efforts to solve Inter-American economic problems once critical immediate political problem of Communist penetration in Guatemala is settled. Substantial progress on Panamanian negotiations has been made, but presentation of any concessions re Canal Zone for Congressional approval would be unthinkable to this Department if Panama withholds vote against Communism in Guatemala. Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Secretary of State[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 17, 1954.

Subject: Annuity Payment to Panama

Discussion:

The last two meetings with the Panamanian Delegation in the current review of relations with Panama have dealt exclusively with the annuity question. The Panamanians have made it very clear that they regard this as the paramount issue in these talks. They hold that to the Panamanian people the annuity is the symbol of the benefit which Panama derives in return for the grant made by Panama to the United States for the construction of the Canal.

The head of the Panamanian Delegation, an able lawyer, recognizes that Panama has no legal right to demand an increase in the annuity. However, as is to be expected, they advance elaborate legal arguments to support their claims for an increase.

The Panama Canal Company and the Department of the Army are inclined to favor an increase in the annuity. Ambassador Chapin also strongly supports an increase. In view of the importance attached to this matter by both the Government and people of Panama, I concur provided that our legal position in this matter can be properly safeguarded. I feel we can qualify an increase so as to protect our legal position. I am convinced that failure to reach an agreement on the annuity question will jeopardize an overall settlement in these talks.

I think that an offer from us at this time, provided that the Panamanians in writing recognize and admit that they have no legal right whatsoever to an increase, would substantially improve our bargaining position. I am not at all sure they would accept it; but it would define the issue as being a disagreement, not on money, but instead a disagreement as to Panama's legal right to re-open this treaty.

Recommendation:

That you approve an offer of an increase in the annuity on the condition that Panama specifically recognizes (1) that it has no legal right to an increase or to re-open any article of the treaty and (2) that the increase is granted solely as an act of grace on the part of the United States Government with no recognition of any responsibility.

DEAR MR. HOLLAND: From the meagre reports that percolate South to the Embassy and to the Commander-in-Chief Caribbean it would appear that the rebel movement in Guatemala is not meeting with much success and, in fact, is apt to disintegrate at any time. From what we can gather Castillo Armas hazarded everything on the belief that the population would rise and that a substantial portion of the Guatemalan Armed Forces would defect. This apparently has not been the case so far. It would seem to make little practical difference whether this is because of loyalty or mistaken patriotism or whether as is probably the case the peasants, workers and soldiers have not been impressed with the possibility of a successful revolt and are therefore just plain scared. From my own experience behind the Curtain I would doubt extremely whether sincere belief in communist ideology plays much of a part except for the leaders in the Guatemalan Government.

It is no use "crying over spilt milk", beyond expressing some regret that the expedition was not better organized and better timed. Whether the rebels had or have any support from unofficial American sources I do not know or wish to know. If so, it is to be regretted that such support was not greater and more intelligently directed. In any event, however, I feel sure that it would be impossible to persuade the average Latino that the rebel forces did not have some backing official and unofficial from the U.S. I say this as a result of conversations with Panamanians and Latin American Diplomatic colleagues who are apparently friendly to us and are deeply concerned with the march of events in Guatemala. If this be true of such intelligent and well informed and well disposed, how much more true it must be on the part of the man in the street not to mention the professional Yanqui hater?

It is perhaps gratuitous of me to remark that human reactions are very often illogical in that they sometimes run opposite to ones own interest. There are very few real communist sympathisers in these countries but there are a great many people who descend from generations long influenced by a belief in the superiority of Latin culture to that of the Anglo-Saxon and who have been indoctrinated since birth with the fear of Yanqui imperialism and jealousy of the Colossus of the North. While these catch words have happily passed out of current language in most Latin American circles the sentiment and interest which engendered them remains latent ever ready to come to the surface. This is one reason why even among our friends I sometimes detect a certain well concealed satisfaction when the U.S. stubs its toe.

It is ironical that in this day and age we, as the greatest Democracy on earth, seem to find our friends in this area among the more reactionary dictatorships and some of our Latin American friends, particularly those to the South, have not been slow to seize upon it unquestionably is an additional source of this rising anti-American feeling since they continually throw at us that we do not practise in our Foreign relations what we preach.

Then there is another factor which might be mentioned. Although many of our Latin leaders complain that we do not give them enough economic support etc. they are well aware that they have been treated rather generously although in recent times perhaps they have not received as much of the gravy as has Europe. Nevertheless it appears to be a strong feeling—alas not limited to Panama—that big hearted stupid old Uncle Sam will, in the last analysis, come to the rescue financially if the screech is loud enough economically. In other words, they have a feeling that no matter how often we say no we will eventually come across. In this connection they seem to believe that the U.S. will tolerate almost anything because of its wish to be loved or to put it in a negative sense its wish not to be hated. They are quite willing to work these two themes to the limit and I suggest that in doing so they build up a kind of contempt of what they feel is essentially a weakness in our international policy.

While I of course have no recent personal experience in Latin American sentiment to the South I confess myself disturbed by the newspaper reports from Chile, Argentina, Bolivia, and even our former staunch supporter Uruguay of their reaction to the Guatemalan embroglio. It seems possible to me that this anti-Americanism which is beginning to be noticeable here may have advanced even further in those countries to the South particularly those of Hispanic origin. In the other direction Guizado mentioned to me yesterday his concern over the reported attitude of the Ex-President Cardenas–Mexico, who is stated to have come out with some remarks strongly supporting Arbenz.

As I stated in mytel 375, June 23,[1] I have the feeling that no matter how the Guatemalan revolt comes out we will be blamed for having incited it and for supporting the rebels if, as seems likely, at present writing the Government should win out we will be faced with a situation which may be cause for the most extreme measures to put right. I cannot conceive that irrespective of right or wrong we could tolerate a full fledged Soviet satellite in such a strategic spot close to our own frontier and to the Panama Canal. I base this statement on the supreme and overriding policy which is that right of self preservation. While I am not prepared nor would it be my place to suggest at this time any active intervention by the U.S. in the Guatemalan struggle I think it would be only realistic to recognize that if the Arbenz Govt should win out we may eventually have to use such measures and if economic and other sanctions are not enough we may have to use force. I say this in full recognition of the gravity of my statements and after living with the problem for several days. The thought has also occurred to me that since blame is a relative term and we are already receiving blame for the situation in Guatemala that strong measures applied at this time if they almost have to be uni-lateral on our part or with the support our friendly Latin American countries may in the long run prove less damaging to our general interests in Latin America than would greater pressures and the use of larger forces at some later date.

In the meantime one thought occurs to me which I venture to pass on. It is one which could be considered as pressure only in an indirect sense but which I believe might be effective on Latin American opinion in this particular area although less so admittedly to the South. What I suggest is that consideration be given from primarily a political point of view to sending one entire North American Combat Division to the Panama Canal Zone. I suggest that the repercussions of keeping such a force "in being" as Old Naval strategists used the term it might have a very deterrent effect upon any active anti-American activities throughout Central America and if it were necessary throughout Northern South America. The existence of a trained, equipped force of this character kept with means of transport would be both a warning and an assurance of protection. As for the Panamanians needless to say they would be delighted from the purely profit motive!

I have not talked over this matter at length with General Harrison who as you know has just arrived, although when I briefly mentioned it to him Wednesday he was not unreceptive and promised to give the matter some study. I gather that in any event there are sufficient quarters left over from the large garrison here during the war to house such a body of men. I would think moreover that from a military point of view it might be good practise to have at least one U.S. Division trained in jungle or tropical warfare.

Summing up what I wish to make clear that I have no thought that this Division or whatever additional strength of the Forces down here might be effected would be used in active operations unless the situation should deteriorate even to a greater degree than I think possible but rather that such Forces would form what in the eyes of some of these countries would appear to be a potential expeditionary force of overwhelming strength.

With all kindest regards,

Yours sincerely, SELDEN CHAPIN

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Ambassador in Panama (Chapin)

SECRET OFFICIAL–INFORMAL [WASHINGTON,] July 2, 1954.

DEAR AMBASSADOR CHAPIN: Thank you very much for your letter of June 25, 1954,[1] regarding the Central American situation and your idea regarding a combat division for Panama.

As you will note from the press coverage, the Guatemalan situation is going along as well as might be expected. We are watching the situation closely.

The suggestion of stationing a full combat division in the Canal Zone would seem to have considerable merit. It would be a force readily available if its services were required in the area, an opportunity would be afforded for training in jungle warfare (a field in which U.S. forces have not heretofore been as proficient as might have been desired) and our relations with Panama should be benefited as the result of the economic shot in the arm the expenditures of the personnel of the division would give Panama. Presumably the division to be selected for this duty would be one already in being in the United States. The cost of stationing it in the Zone would probably not be appreciably higher than the cost of maintaining it in the United States so that it would not seem that this suggestion would result in substantial extra cost to the Government. There would, however, seem to be a matter of timing involved. If these additional troops were to be stationed in the Zone, their transfer to the Zone should be deferred until quiet shall have been restored to Central America in order to avoid giving rise to unwarranted inferences as to the reasons and motives underlying that action.

We will pursue the matter from this end and would appreciate any further comments you may have.

I wish to thank you for your good work regarding the proposed OAS meeting and the resolution.

Sincerely yours, HENRY F. HOLLAND

The Ambassador in Panama (Chapin) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL PANAMA CITY, July 7, 1954—2 p.m.

4. During call which Sowash and I made on him yesterday Guizado discussed with great frankness Panamanian attitude on present Washington negotiations. He expressed pleasure at great progress made in recent informal talks and noted that material outstanding points had been narrowed to four—labor, annuity, commercial competition and economic assistance, upon which he was confident that given mutual understanding and cooperation agreement would be reached before long.

He figured conversations should be completed within two months and delegation would then return home for final instructions before drafting definitive text. Guizado said he inclined to belief he himself would at that point or sometime before finalizing go to Washington on a last exploratory visit.

Guizado then said that in addition to four points already mentioned there remained one more—that of sovereignty. Panama had its just aspirations for some recognition even if token in character in this matter. He referred to statements of Theodore Roosevelt, William H. Taft, Goethals, certain Supreme Court justices, etc. Panama by no means wished to put forward any claim to the exercise of sovereignty in zone or to anything which would interfere with operation and maintenance of canal but government felt it imperative that it should obtain in negotiations some minor concession which it could show to its people.

Both Sowash and I expressed disappointment that matter of sovereignty and jurisdiction should be brought up and stressed generosity of our offers to date in global sense, pointing out enormous value of concessions and material contribution to Panamanian economy and welfare. Guizado stated that US offers were generous, the land concessions he even described as "magnificent gesture". Parenthetically he referred to plot of land across from Embassy chancery as being ceded to US (I did not correct him and stated he hoped we might landscape it as a beautiful little park).

We both stated opinion very firmly and frankly, that US could not cede one iota on sovereignty or jurisdiction.

Guizado however returned to point of sovereignty, indicating that some unimportant concession such as our acceptance of Panamanian exequaturs for foreign consuls as applying to zone or even the flying of the Panamanian flag jointly with US ensign by ships transiting the canal would be sufficient prestige sop on sovereignty issue.

Meeting which took place at his house was most informal and cordial. Guizado took no umbrage at our frank statements regarding US attitude on jurisdiction. Nevertheless it is apparent to me that quite aside from very real material concessions we are prepared make, and since it is my understanding that we are not prepared to concede any point even if minor on sovereignty, we might endeavor to manufacture some apparent concession, however empty, which can be used by Panamanian Government as point of national prestige.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Ambassador John J. Muccio of the United States Negotiating Team

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 30, 1954.

Subject: Panama–US Discussions: Treatment of labor in Canal Zone

Participants: Secretary of Defense Wilson
Under Secretary of the Army Slezak
Assistant Secretary of Defense (Manpower) Dr. Hannah
Assistant Secretary of the Army Roderick
Vice Admiral Davis
Mr. Wheeless, Office of Assistant Secy Defense (Manpower)
Mr. Henry F. Holland
Mr. John J. Muccio

The problem of treatment of the non-Americans employed by the US Armed Forces on the Isthmus of Panama was reviewed in detail during the luncheon session. At the conclusion, Secretary Wilson instructed Assistant Secretary of the Army Roderick with the assistance of Mr. Wheeless to work out an employment policy for the Armed Forces on the Canal Zone parallel to that being evolved by the Panama Canal Company–Canal Zone Government. This involves a single wage scale and no discrimination on the basis of citizenship, race, or color.

During the course of the discussions, Secretary Wilson pointed out that he wanted no dragging of feet but that the Armed Forces should proceed right away and complete reclassification of positions, etc., by January 1, 1956.

Mr. Roderick and Mr. Wheeless will work up a position paper which Mr. Holland will use as a basis for presenting this to the Panamanian Delegation.

40. Embassy wishes make following comments on Deptel 35 August 11[1] and Holland–Muccio memo August 7[2] received today.

[1] Not printed (611.1913/8–1054).

[2] In the memorandum of conversation of Aug. 7, 1954, Mr. Holland directed that Panama be granted a $1 million annuity and a $1 million yearly grant for a development program (Holland files, lot 57 D 295, "Panama, 1954").

1. In view our inability grant Panama prestige demands re sovereignty and uniform single wage scale throughout zone,[3] believe mature reflection that annuity of only one million dollars plus one million annually for US administered economic development program is not sufficient to compensate for dropping overboard these demands and will prove bitterly disappointing to Remon Government and Panamanian people. It may well create serious political opposition to Remon personally and may force him into role of rabid nationalism if he is to stay in power.

2. Earnestly recommend Department (which I understand was prepared to raise economic development program to two million per year) reconsider position and add this sum to present annuity rounding out proposed figure to two and half million dollars per annum. Believe that even at this figure, we may have difficulty in concluding negotiations satisfactorily in aura of good will. I suggest this cheap price for insuring stable and friendly government here and affording example of just and generous dealings by US with its friends in Latin America.[4]

3. Have no other observations to make on other points of memo except note with some disappointment that no mention is made of low-cost housing project suggested by Embassy.

4. If suggested prohibition of Panamanian commercial traffic on proposed Trans-Isthmian highway has not already been mentioned to Panamanian delegation, see little use in risking possibility of riling Panamanian feelings over management of project not even in survey stage. Incidentally CARIBCOMMAND advises that funds for survey will presumably not be available before fiscal 1956.

Would greatly appreciate telegraphic summary when final decision has been reached as to labor, commissaries, et cetera, but Embassy in full agreement that these are best handled by unilateral declaration.

[3] The Embassy in Panama City had evidently not been informed of the Department of Defense's willingness to institute a single wage scale in the armed forces (memorandum of conversation, dated July 30, 1954, supra).

[4] The Department responded in telegram 40 to Panama City, dated Aug. 13, 1954, that subject to the final clearance of the Secretary of State it was prepared to increase the annuity by $1 million (to $1.43 million) in addition to an annual $1 million grant to Panama for 10 years to be spent on economic development projects. Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 16, 1954.

Subject: Discussions with Panama

A point has now been reached in the discussions which we have been carrying on with representatives of the Government of Panama where we are prepared to give full and final replies to the proposals which Panama has presented for consideration.

I propose, subject to your approval, to present to the Panama Delegation the offers and requests summarized below as the totality of the United States position with reference to these proposals.

United States offers:

1. To increase the annuity by one million dollars, which would more than triple the presently agreed amount.
2. To seek legislative authorization to institute a single wage scale applying to all employees of the United States Government in the Canal Zone, together with other measures favorable to non-United States citizen employees of Canal Zone agencies.
3. To seek legislative authorization for the transfer to Panama of:

a) Panama City railroad yard, with improvements,
b) J. N. Vialette and Huerte de San Doval tracts and the Aspinwall tract on Taboga Island,
c) Paitilla Point,
d) Las Isletas and Santa Catalina Military Reservations on Taboga,
e) Those areas of Colon known as de Lesseps, Colon Beach and New Cristobal, with improvements (with the exception of two lots in the de Lesseps area which the U.S. intends to use for consulate purposes),
f) Railroad passenger station site and structure in Colon,
g) Certain lands and waters on the coast of Colon,
h) Lot in Colon now reserved for consulate purposes.

4. To seek legislative authorization to make grants for the economic development of Panama, particularly in the field of housing. This would be in addition to the Technical Cooperation Program administered by the Foreign Operations Administration.
5. To amend Article X of the 1903 Convention to enable Panama to levy income tax on employees of Canal Zone agencies who are Panamanian citizens wherever resident and on non-Panamanian, non-United States citizen employees residing in Panama.

[1] This memorandum, drafted by Mr. Kuppinger, was sent to President Remón under cover of a letter from President Eisenhower, dated Aug. 23, 1954. In his letter to Remón, Eisenhower noted that the United States was not able to agree to those proposals which would in any way undermine the U.S. position relating to the Panama Canal or would involve large sums of money for projects which the U.S. Government felt went beyond its proper obligations. However, he stated his belief that the Panamanian President would find that the U.S. positions on all other Panamanian proposals were distinctly favorable to his country's legitimate interests. (611.1913/8–2354)

6. To exempt United States agencies in the Canal Zone from the scope of the Buy American Act, as a gesture of good will toward Panama and as further evidence of the desire of the United States to assist in all appropriate and practicable ways in the development of the Panamanian economy.

7. To extend the existing arrangement regarding sales of "sea stores" to sales of "ships' stores" and, in cooperation with Panama, to give greater effectiveness to that arrangement.

8. To seek legislative authorization and appropriations for the construction of a bridge or tunnel at Balboa, referred to in the 1942 General Relations Agreement.

9. To withdraw certain sales and service privileges in the Canal Zone from non-resident, non-United States employees of Zone agencies.

10. To make of record a declaration that in connection with the matter of the importation of items of merchandise for resale in the sale stores in the Canal Zone, it will continue to be the practice of the agencies concerned to acquire such items either from United States sources or Panamanian sources unless, in certain instances, it is impracticable to do so.

11. To terminate gradually certain manufacturing and processing activities in the Canal Zone.

12. To make of record a declaration that Canal Zone agencies in making purchases of supplies, materials and equipment will, so far as permitted under United States legislation, afford to the economy of the Republic of Panama full opportunity to compete for such business.

13. To waive the monopoly on the part of the United States for the establishment of any system of communication by railroad or highway across the Republic of Panama between the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean, with certain reservations.

14. To terminate that provision of Article VII of the 1903 Convention which has reference to the exercise of sanitary jurisdiction by the United States in the cities of Panama and Colon.

15. To give sympathetic consideration to Panama's request for the functioning of nautical inspectors in Canal Zone ports concerned with laws relating to vessels of Panamanian registry under conditions which would not prejudice the expeditious transit of vessels and which would be consonant with the jurisdictional position of the United States in the Canal Zone.

16. To give consideration to the feasibility of withdrawing from the handling of commercial cargo for transshipment on Canal Zone piers so soon as Panamanian port facilities are in satisfactory operation in Colon.

United States requests which are to be considered in conjunction with the United States offers:

1. Extension of post exchange privileges, on a limited basis, to visiting foreign military personnel of friendly nations.

2. Reduction of price of alcoholic beverages.

3. Termination of the obligation provided under Article XIX of the 1903 Convention regarding free transportation on the Panama Railroad.

4. Lease of certain property adjacent to the United States Embassy residence; preservation of the area in front of the Embassy office building as a park area.

5. Maneuver rights in the Rio Hato area.

6. Favorable consideration of certain proposals which the United States may wish to make relating to the use of a projected trans-Isthmian highway within the Canal Zone.

This over-all position has been coordinated with the interested agencies of the Government, as well as with the Congressional Committees particularly concerned with such matters. I believe that the position summarized above fully reflects your direction that Panama's proposals be treated fairly and generously and that we should seek mutually satisfactory arrangements that would, on the one hand, satisfy Panamanian aspirations and, on the other, protect vital United States interests in the Panama Canal. I am confident that the United States offers are generous to Panama and equitable to both Governments.

SECRET PRIORITY PANAMA CITY, August 28, 1954—2 p. m.

67. This morning I delivered President Eisenhower's letter and Secretary's memorandum to Remon.[1] He read them with deep concentration nodding his head in comprehension passing sheets to Guizado who was present.

President expressed general approval of terms of memorandum and indicated that he would like to proceed promptly with next phase. I told him that I had originally planned to fly to Washington to report and then go on leave, but that in circumstances I was not only willing but anxious to postpone leave indefinitely if I could expedite prompt settlement. I told him that telegram received this morning indicated Department desired drafting of final agreements be carried out here and that we had partial draft ready in Washington. He stated that he was in accord with this procedure and hoped I would ask that draft be sent down immediately so that work could begin.

I then told him that Secretary had suggested to Fabrega[2] that he would approve increasing annuity to total of $1,930,000 in lieu of Economic Aid Program.[3] Remon said that he inclined to feel this second additional increase in annuity preferable to economic aid. He rapidly got point that part of this increased annuity might be used as pledge for loan for housing and other purposes.

President then said that occasion called for glass of champagne. In ensuing conversation Remon stressed desirability of winding up negotiations quickly adding that he would give me official view Wednesday morning September 1.

In this connection he said coming Assembly would be less inclined to play partisan politics than following session which would immediately precede elections. I believe in fact Remon desires speed conclusion negotiations so as to present signed treaty and completed agreements act at opening of Assembly October 1. Meeting extremely cordial throughout and Remon appears impressed and delighted with President's letter and Secretary's memorandum.

CHAPIN

Editorial Note

The first meeting to draft the proposed agreement was convened on September 13, 1954, and meetings continued throughout September and October, first at a high level including President Remón and Ambassador Chapin and subsequently at a lower level. In telegram 74, dated September 6, 1954, Ambassador Chapin expressed his disappointment that domestic political pressures in Panama had apparently obliged President Remón to name members of the official Panamanian negotiating team to draft the agreement in order to protect himself against the attacks of political enemies (611.1913/9–654). At the September 28 meeting, members of the Panamanian drafting team raised objections to the substance of several articles on which Panamanian and United States negotiators had previously reached tentative agreement in Washington (telegram 107 from Panama City, dated September 29, 1954, 611.1913/9–2954). The Embassy reported in telegram 157, dated October 27, 1954, that disagreement on the wording of several articles still persisted after the final meeting of October 26. The telegram continued that President Remón was having a letter drafted in response to President Eisenhower's letter of August 23, 1954, and that he planned to send Dr. Harmodio Arias to Washington to present the letter to Eisenhower in person. The Embassy indicated that Arias might make "one last desperate effort as personal appeal from Remon to Eisenhower for greater economic concessions", and expressed the hope that the President would stand firm. (611.1913/10–2754)

Memorandum Prepared in the Department of State[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON, undated.]

MATTERS, THUS FAR NOT COMPLETELY RESOLVED, WHICH DR. ARIAS MAY BRING UP FOR DISCUSSION WITH THE PRESIDENT

1. Article II, Treaty (taxation):

The Panamanians object to the limitation of the scope of this Article to income tax alone. They wish it to be extended to cover "contributions or charges of a personal nature of any kind". This would conform to the terminology used in Article X of the 1903 Convention and give them complete tax jurisdiction over their citizens who are employed by Zone agencies rather than to have their jurisdiction limited to income tax.

They base their case on principle. They say there are no additional personal taxes presently in force to which these persons would become subject. We have thus far refused to consider broadening the scope beyond income tax, saying that their proposal is so vague and undefined that we cannot foresee what would be involved. They say that it is none of the business of the United States what personal taxes Panama may levy on Panamanians so long as this group is not the object of discrimination; a non-discrimination guarantee is embodied in this Article. In reply to our query concerning social security taxes, they have said such taxes are not considered "personal" but that they would be glad to insert a statement in the treaty to the effect that social security taxes would not come within its scope.

The Governor is inclined to be sympathetic with the Panamanian desire to be free of restrictions on the exercise of tax jurisdiction over their citizens but is apprehensive that broadening the scope of this Article might result in the levying of taxes which would complicate his labor relations problem. He seems to have in mind the levying of taxes under the Panamanian labor code—he has not been able to define precisely just what kind of taxes might be involved. His apprehension is based on distrust—that if given an opportunity Panama is likely to attempt to extend its jurisdiction into the Canal Zone; in this case by levying "personal" taxes upon employees which would include Panamanian employees of Zone agencies. In view of this apprehension the Governor does not favor broadening the scope of this Article.

2. Article X (Zone highway)

The Panamanians have refused to agree to our draft. They have proposed joint traffic control over this road. The Governor and CINCARIB will have none of this. Not only is joint traffic control unacceptable in principle (giving Panama a voice in a matter concerning Zone administration) but it is inconsistent with their concept of this road.

[1] This document, presumably dated Nov. 8, was found in the files with the memorandum to the President, infra. (611.1913/11–954)

They point out that Panama has a trans-Isthmian road which we built for them and continue to maintain; that Panama has no just basis for complaint if we desire to construct a road within the Zone for our own use. They insist that this is a concession Panama must make.

It is not clear just how much emphasis Panama will place on this matter. We think that they will accept it rather than lose the Treaty on this issue alone. However, it is possible that Dr. Arias may bring this up with the President, claiming that it is inconsistent with our traditional close relationship for the U.S. to attempt to discriminate against Panamanian traffic on this road.

3. Article XIII (reopening of treaties, etc.):

Unless we are able to come to an agreement on a text of this Article prior to his call upon the President, Dr. Arias is certain to bring up this subject. He will take exception to any language which might lend itself to the interpretation that the treaties are "frozen" and to language which might imply that arguments based on rebus sic stantibus and equity cannot be brought into play in connection with proposals for the revision of the treaties.

4. Item 10, Memorandum (nautical inspectors):

The Panamanians take strong exception to the phrase "consonant with the jurisdictional position of the United States in the Canal Zone". They say that this would commit Panama to acceptance of the United States thesis on the question of jurisdiction in the Zone. The Governor admits this is so, saying that we would not enter into any arrangement which did not accord with our position on the jurisdictional question; therefore, this should be made clear in advance. He argues that if any doubt in this regard were permitted to arise we would lay ourselves open to charges of bad faith when we subsequently made it clear that any such arrangements had to conform with our jurisdictional thesis.

Our recommendation on this item is that if Panama continues to object, they be offered the alternative of deleting it from the Memorandum.

5. Item 11, Memorandum (transshipment of commercial cargo at Colón):

The Panamanians profess to attach a great deal of importance to this item and have remained insistent that our undertaking be expressed in more definite terms. Rather than saying that "consideration" will be given to withdrawing from this activity so soon as adequate Panamanian port facilities are available at Colón, they insist that we say that when such port facilities are available we "will withdraw".

The Governor is adamant in his refusal to enter into such a commitment. In fact, upon reconsideration, he has certain qualms about the undertaking we have already agreed to give the Panamanians on this subject. He is concerned about mixed cargo, especially that arriving on Panama Line vessels, where, for example, 90% of the cargo would be for the Zone and 10% for transshipment. He is apprehensive that even under the undertaking we have offered them we might have to move such ships from one pier to another; he is certain that this would be the case under the type of wording of the undertaking insisted upon by the Panamanians. Actually, we think we are safe under the present wording since "consideration" of the matter gives some leeway to allow for situations such as this. The type of undertaking desired by the Panamanians, however, would not give us any such leeway; we think the Governor's position is sound and should be supported.

Our recommended position, therefore, is that we are not interested in handling the commercial transshipment business over our docks and are perfectly willing for Panama to take it over; however, we must remain in a position to arrange for exceptions in cases where ridiculously high costs would be incurred in handling small amounts of cargo.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 9, 1954.

Subject: Appointment with Dr. Harmodio Arias

Dr. Arias, who has an appointment at 9:30 a.m. on November 10, will deliver President Remon's reply to your letter of August 23, 1954 which listed the Panamanian proposals on which this Government was willing to take affirmative action.

Further negotiations took place in Panama during September and October in an effort to draft texts on these subjects. For the most part agreed texts were arrived at. However, there are a few points remaining which are not completely resolved.

Dr. Arias will probably bring up these matters in the hope that he can prevail upon you to make immediate decisions on them favorable to Panama. Dr. Arias is an effective advocate and in presenting his side of the issues will give his case a considerable degree of plausibility. These disagreements, however, involve important questions of principle and policy. The Department of State, the Department of Defense and the Governor of the Canal Zone are agreed that the United States should maintain its position on these points.

In view of the technical complexity of these questions, I recommend that you permit Dr. Arias to present his arguments but decline to commit yourself, saying that you will consider the points of view he has presented and will instruct the Secretary of State in the premises; and that such further conversations as may be required will be conducted under the direction of the Secretary.

Since Assistant Secretary Holland will conduct such further conversations as may be necessary, I recommend also that he be present during Dr. Arias' call.

I am enclosing a copy of your letter of August 23, 1954 to President Remon and a biographic sketch of Dr. Arias.[2]

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 10, 1954.

Subject: United States–Panama Treaty Negotiations

Participants: The President
Sr. Harmodio Arias, Adviser to the Remon Government on United States–Panama Treaty Negotiations
Assistant Secretary Henry F. Holland

Mr. Arias delivered to the President the original of a letter from President Remon [1] and an enclosure. The President read them and stated that the letter and enclosure raised a number of technical points upon which he was not sufficiently well informed to comment. Mr. Arias said that copies had been delivered to the Department of State. The President said that he felt sure that Secretary Dulles and those associated with him would work on these matters sympathetically. The President said that we valued highly our relations with Panama because our association in the Canal was one for eternity. He said that he personally liked Panama and liked President Remon and wanted all matters rising between us to be studied with interest and sympathy.

Mr. Arias said the points remaining for discussion between us, in his judgment, involved questions of phraseology rather than of substance.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador in Panama (Chapin), Temporarily in Washington [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 10, 1954.

Subject: Dr. Harmodio Arias' Call On the Secretary

Participants: Dr. Harmodio Arias, Special Representative of President of Panama
The Secretary
Assistant Secretary Holland
Ambassador Selden Chapin

After an exchange of civilities, Dr. Arias stated he had delivered to President Eisenhower that morning a letter from President Remon in reply to one received last August from President Eisenhower. Dr. Arias said that the points remaining at issue in the draft of the proposed treaty and accompanying memorandum of understanding boiled down to seven of which only one was in the treaty draft. He felt that there was no essential difference in substance between the United States and Panama proposals, but rather a matter of wording. Panama simply could not accept certain provisions as worded in the United States draft.

The Secretary replied that he himself was of course not familiar with all the details, but confessed his disappointment if the whole subject were to be reopened as he had felt that negotiations had really terminated last August and that the United States proposals were eminently fair. We had gone a long way to meet Panamanian aspirations. He knew Dr. Arias was eager to return to his law practice in Panama, but suggested that a meeting be held between Mr. Holland and Mr. Chapin and Dr. Arias to see if points of disagreement could be worked out.

Mr. Holland said he was anxious to hear Dr. Arias' point of view, but that as the latter knew he had to leave town for the rest of the week, but would be back Saturday night. In view of the urgency of the matter and the fact he himself must leave for the Rio meeting in about a week's time, he suggested a meeting on Sunday morning unless Dr. Arias preferred to put off the matter until after the Rio conference. Dr. Arias accepted the offer to meet Sunday with alacrity. Later after leaving the office, Dr. Arias expressed to Mr. Chapin his doubts whether points of difference could be settled in one or even two meetings, but said it was worth while to make the effort.

Memorandum by the Ambassador in Panama (Chapin), Temporarily in Washington, to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 17, 1954.

In the event of a breakdown in the treaty talks with Panama, should Remon decline to accept our global offer, it is possible that Panama may attempt some maneuver to galvanize Latin American opinion against the U.S. This might take the form of some appeal to the Organization of American States, to the UN, or World Court or a press campaign with or without organized mass demonstrations.

It is my understanding that we would counter any such propaganda attack with one of our own setting forth clearly and in detail the generous and understanding nature of our offers to Panama. I believe that even the most biased Latin American critic could find little fault with most of our concessions, but am somewhat concerned as to how much headway the Panamanians might make over old Article XII[1] or the revised alternates thereto given to Dr. Arias. I do not suggest that we should in fact depart from our position which is well grounded. Rather do I feel that irrespective of the rights and wrongs of this position, we should explore what effect a strong Panamanian protest, which might enlist Latin American public opinion and which would undoubtedly be exploited by Communist and other unfriendly elements, might have on our general Latin American relations. Undoubtedly the effort would be made to have us appear as the brutal domineering colossus attempting to cower a small, peace-loving and deserving nation with all the lies and exaggerations of which such a campaign is capable and with which unfortunately we have been so familiar in the past.

Undoubtedly you have taken into consideration the above possibility which could result in a setback to our whole Latin American policy. However, it occurs to me that should Remon refuse the treaty on the grounds of Article XII or its alternatives, we might, rather than risk the showdown, proceed with the other alternative—namely that of striking such language and that providing for an increase in the annuity and of offering direct economic aid. In your conversation with Arias no mention was made of the amount of such aid and the only figure, so far as I know, given to the Panamanians was ten million over ten years. If, as I understand from another Departmental memo, we are in fact prepared to raise this to twenty million over ten years, it might be useful if I were authorized to come forth with such a figure should the necessity arise. I should be grateful for your views.

188. Guizado told me today in "strictest confidence" that both he and President Remon are entirely satisfied with new drafts of Article XII brought back by Doctor Arias. He added that on his return here Ambassador Chapin would have redrafts of paragraphs 1 of memo of understandings and Article X of treaty and that if these proved as satisfactory as anticipated he believed treaty could be signed next week.

While in optimistic mood Guizado admitted considerable irritation over apparent US intent to bar proposed Canal Zone road to Panamanian commercial traffic. He said he understood our desire to construct and preserve "strategic highway" but felt strongly there should be no pronounced discrimination against Panamanian trucks. He concluded he would offer no objection if "all commercial vehicles" were barred from highway.

I sought to convince Guizado re reasonableness of our views and believe he will go along regardless of what changes have been effected in now disliked article.[1]

180. Salvidar's impression that Fund approval of a country's exchange system overrides bilateral trade agreements is not correct (urtel 363 Jun 23).[2] US view is that tighter obligations of later bilateral agreement apply notwithstanding looser obligations of earlier multilateral agreement. Reasoning behind this is that provisions multilateral known when bilateral finalized and that parties to bilateral agreed to commitments more restrictive than those contained multilateral. US Exec Dir[3] reserved US rights under its Trade Agreement with Ecuador in IMF Exec Bd Mtg of Nov 30, 1950 with respect to certain proposals of Ecuador involving exchange taxes.[4]

No. 387

Ref: Department's Circular Airgram of November 24, 1952.[2]

Subject: Operation and Status of Program under Mutual Security Act—Quarter Ending December 31, 1952.

As this is the first quarterly report on the subject, discussion will not be confined solely to events of the fourth quarter of 1952 but will include certain background information providing a framework for subsequent reports.

A small land-locked country with a simple agricultural and pastoral economy, Paraguay's economic development has not progressed in relation to that of other countries of this area. The standard of living is low and conditions of poverty prevalent. Until three years ago it was notably politically unstable and the fact that no coups d'etat have occurred since then should not be taken to mean that underlying tensions do not persist. While of a remarkably homogeneous character, the population does not appear to possess the native intelligence and capacity, the educational background, and the drive which lead to progress in the economic sphere. Some prosperity was achieved during the war because of high prices for export commodities, and relatively large foreign exchange balances were accumulated. These have been dissipated and for a number of reasons, external and internal, Paraguay is now passing through a period of severe economic and financial stress.

Point Four type operations were begun in Paraguay in 1942 and from that date to July 1952 a total of 6.1 million dollars have been expended by the United States to carry out the program in Paraguay, operations considerably expanding since 1950. Leaving apart our wartime objectives, the purpose of our contributions is to achieve a stable and developing economy so that a vacuum does not arise which would have unfortunate economic as well as political repercussions on our long and short term interests in the River Plate area endangering the security of the hemisphere, and at the same time to combat any Communist penetration or extension of influence.

Paraguay is a truly under-developed country and provides a fertile ground for almost all types of Point Four assistance. The need for aid in the fields of education and public health, for instance, is virtually limitless. The execution of our program with limited funds and doubtless higher priorities in other areas must, however, necessarily be related to the degree of economic development which exists at present and which the country can reasonably be expected to achieve in the foreseeable future.

It must be said that progress in meeting our policy objectives in this country through the medium of Point Four is gradual but slow as it must necessarily be in a country of its degree of social and economic development. Paraguay is pathetically eager to escape from the economic morass into which it has fallen, but is in some doubt as to the measures to be taken to so do. In 1950, 1951, and 1952 it called upon the International Monetary Fund and the Federal Reserve Board for technical missions to advise it in the financial and monetary fields. In 1951 it made application for a loan from the IBRD and subsequently obtained $5 million[3] for the purchase of agricultural and road building equipment; high officials of the Bank state that this loan which is speculative in character would not have been granted had it not been that Point Four technicians were intimately working with the Paraguayans in the agricultural servicio and could render advice in carrying out the purposes of the loan. Thus far no purchases have actually been made; at the close of December bids were let for a considerable quantity of equipment. Subsequently in April 1952 there was established a National Planning Commission for Economic Development to formulate and integrate economic policies. The effectiveness of this Commission has yet to be proved. It has drawn up an "Economic Stabilization and Development Plan" approved this month for execution in calendar 1953. Its present plans envisage greater encouragement to investment of private capital, foreign and domestic, which is so greatly needed, and an amelioration of governmental controls on business and industry which have hampered the business community and facilitated as well graft and corruption by governmental officials in charge of these controls. In addition to these measures of self-aid, Paraguay has had recourse to other UN agencies for technical advice and assistance of a Point Four character.

The present Point Four program comprises major assistance in the field of agriculture and animal husbandry, the basis of Paraguayan economy, and to a lesser extent aid in public health and education. These are long-standing projects designed to supplement and support governmental measures in these fields. That such measures are often ineffective and imperfectly executed reduces the effect of our programs on the economy. The country's capacity to utilize the assistance being provided is influenced by factors inherent in the Paraguayan psychology: the inexperience and incapacity of many of those in positions of authority, the low state of public ethics and morality, the often over-riding influence of political considerations, et cetera. Given this condition, progress is not always rapid and certain specific projects have failed to have the successful results that were perhaps initially contemplated. A re-evaluation of the program in the light of ten years' experience is now being undertaken by the Point Four organization to bring it more into line with current objectives.

In addition to the three major fields of agriculture, education, and public health, assistance is also being given in the field of public administration (civil service, budget, taxation, land management, et cetera) and in more direct development programs such as hydroelectric power, mineral resources, transportation, et cetera. In the case of the former, the inertia that is encountered is formidable but there is evidence that our help is appreciated and is gradually being made effective. In the case of the latter, important studies have been made which indicate the possibilities and the lines of such public development schemes. The question of financing is important here if such projects are to be brought to fruition. The point has been reached when serious consideration must be given by the Paraguayan authorities to the possibilities of obtaining adequate financial support, either from domestic or external sources, for soundly conceived projects.

A factor in this situation to which the Point Four program has been attentive is the trend of the Government towards a degree of socialization. As the economy weakened in recent years the inclination was to seek alleviation by the extension of State controls. It has been one of the objectives of Point Four in the fields in which it is working to endeavor to arrest and discourage this trend so that free enterprise may have the greatest possible exercise.

The attitude of the Government toward our aid program is one of great enthusiasm. The informed members of the Government deeply appreciate our assistance, recognize the benefits it might bring to the country, and would be greatly offended if it were restricted or withdrawn. Notable among these are President Chaves, Foreign Minister Ocampos, and the Ministers of Agriculture,[4] Education,[5] and Public Health.[6] In the carrying out of the program, relations with these officials have generally been harmonious and they are receptive to guidance and suggestions and eager within the limited abilities and capacities of the country to give it necessary support. In the public mind, Point Four and the three servicio operations have come to be accepted as among the facts of life and as integral parts of the Government. While criticism of specific projects may occasionally be voiced, the program as a whole receives approbation and no responsible, important sector of public opinion would be in favor of withdrawal. The Communist Party continues to subject it to violent bitter attack as might be expected, but its influence is certainly not great. The Liberal Party in exile derides the program as tending to give support to and maintain in office a minority party controlling an anti-democratic government, but its attacks are so obviously for the purpose of making political capital that, while they cannot be ignored, they can largely be discounted. The Embassy is confident that any party in control of the Government (other than the Communist) would strongly oppose any diminution in our Point Four program, particularly as it is recognized that if Paraguay is to be in a position to resist pressures from Argentina and to maintain its position it must endeavor to make itself economically strong by seeking assistance from the United States, the United Nations, or other sources.

With reference to the general provisions of Subsection 511 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, the Embassy is of the firm opinion that the supplying of assistance to Paraguay strengthens the security of the United States and promotes world peace. Paraguay has definitely aligned herself on the side of the democratic nations and avows every intention and desire to cooperate with us in achieving the objectives of a free world. In his Christmas message this year President Chaves expressed this attitude explicitly, declaring "The Government of the Republic interpreting the deepest sentiments of its citizens has concretely defined its position in this struggle which keeps men and people divided. Without hesitation and with decided democratic leanings Paraguay has expressed on every occasion it could its adherence to the principles of democracy and liberty and its tenacious opposition to all that bears relation to international communism". Its record in support of the position of the United States in international conferences and undertakings compares favorably with those of other Latin American countries. That it does not do more to give concrete material support to the sentiments it expresses is due to a number of factors, the principal of which is the backward state of its economy and people. Instances have been noted above of the decisive steps taken toward self-aid in the economic sphere: the plan to foment agricultural production through the medium of the IBRD loan, the establishment of the National Planning Commission; the embarking upon an ambitious colonization scheme designed to bring immigrants from Europe to settle upon and develop the land, among others. There is no question of its desire to help itself. The fact remains, however, that its efforts in this direction are in some cases mis-directed, improperly implemented, or badly administered so that their full effect is at times either lost or dissipated. To this extent, therefore, our Point Four program is vitiated and to have greatest validity must be viewed over the long term.

During the quarter under review some very effective work was done in meetings of the Joint United States-Paraguayan Commission for Economic Development in discussing current problems and coming to common agreement on them. The Paraguayan members, the Ministers of Foreign Affairs and Finance, regard the Commission as of great importance, and it is, as the meetings demonstrated, a useful instrument in reaching policy determinations. The Commission enjoys great prestige locally and it is a forum in which we can wield considerable influence. I believe it has further potentialities, and it is my desire to make of it a really effective body, serving as a clearing house on a ministerial level for Point Four problems of mutual concern. Likewise during this period, extension agreements covering the three servicio operations were negotiated and signed. While the United States contribution was increased only slightly, the Paraguayan Government substantially augmented its share (the devaluation of the guarani, of course, being a factor here) and it now contributes approximately 6.3 percent of its total annual budget to these operations in contrast to 4.3 percent in the previous fiscal year. In addition to these developments during the quarter, it may be reported that with the new incumbent in the Ministry of Finance, Dr. Guillermo Enciso,[7] who also sits on the Joint Commission, our several technicians working in the Ministry are finding a more cooperative attitude and feel that their recommendations and studies are being more effectively utilized.

The Point Four budget for Paraguay in fiscal 1953 is $1.5 million. The Embassy has come to the conclusion that under the present circumstances we have reached the maximum contribution we should make to the program in this country considering Paraguay's capacity to absorb our assistance and make effective use of it. With the expanded program now in effect for two years involving a substantial additional contribution over that of former years, we should carefully examine and are examining the program as it is developing with a view not to further expansion but to achieving the most effective utilization of our resources in the best interests of the United States and Paraguay. On the whole, the Embassy is not dissatisfied with the results obtained thus far considered in the light of the objectives and qualifications of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, believes that a certain tightening and reorganization of the program can profitably be made, and unless higher priorities exist in other areas would urge that there be no major diminution in funds for our program in Paraguay.

Subject: Request of Paraguayan Government for Extension of U.S. Military Mission Agreement for Four Years.

[1] Drafted by Ambassador Shaw.

[2] Not printed; it concerned Paraguayan interest in an extension of the U.S. Military Mission Agreement (734.58/8–2252).

[3] Not printed; it instructed the Embassy to present appropriate notes to the Paraguayan Government with respect to an extension of the Military Mission Agreement (734.58/6–2653).

[4] Not printed; it contained a report on the status of the military mission in Paraguay (734.58/9–353).

The United States Military Mission Agreement signed on December 10, 1943[5] as extended, expires on December 10, 1953. The Paraguayan Government has asked for a further extension of this agreement for a period of four years. The request for the extension of the agreement makes no suggestions for changes in the text of the agreement. The request brings up a consideration of the advisability of recommending a further extension. It is thought advisable for the Department to have at hand the views of this office concerning not only the military but the political effectiveness of this mission during the ten years just past.

The real reasons why the Paraguayan Government wants a United States Military Mission can only be deduced from local knowledge and from Article 1 of the original agreement which reads as follows:

"The purpose of this Mission is to cooperate with the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the Republic of Paraguay and to serve as instructors at the Paraguayan Superior School of War and for such other purposes as may be agreed upon by the Chief of the Mission and the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces."

The Paraguayan Government transmitted its Note No. 24 of June 13, 1953[6] to the Embassy, and at the same time informed its Ambassador[7] in Washington of the action it had taken instructing him at an appropriate time and in his discretion to follow up this request and to express to the Department an interest in the progress of it. The Foreign Office has sent Ambassador Boettner no instructions or communications on the subject since that time. It is understood that Ambassador Boettner did inquire about this matter on August 21, undoubtedly in accordance with the instructions he had received in June. The Foreign Office which had some difficulty even finding the file does not seem to be concerned about the progress of the matter except to express the hope that an extension may eventually be granted. During the informal conversation on this subject the Minister of Foreign Affairs was quoted as stating that should there be any negotiations on this matter involving changes in the text or revisions of the agreement, both he and the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces[8] would prefer the negotiations to be carried out in Asunción.

A consideration of the ten years of experience with this mission in Paraguay; the knowledge of this Embassy of Paraguayan thinking and attitudes; the importance of the military elements in the political picture; the difficult financial situation of the Government; and, numerous other factors including that of personalities, lead to the following conclusions as to really why Paraguay may desire this extension:

The presence of a United States Military Mission lends prestige to Paraguay and, more particularly, to the Paraguayan military establishment. In the Paraguayan mind it shows to neighboring countries that the United States is backing the Government of Paraguay and the party in power, which remains in power largely because of the military.

The presence of the mission enables Paraguay to say that it is following United States military doctrine. It also, by Paraguayan thinking, justifies a claim that Paraguay is cooperating with the United States by accepting the military mission.

Paraguay has impressions also that it is easier to send officers to General Staff and similar schools in the United States, although this is not necessarily so, and the same thing applies to lesser ranking officers, cadets, mechanics, etc.

There crops up in conversations on this subject also a latent desire for Paraguay to get financial aid for the purchase of new and modern military equipment.

While Paraguay desires the presence of the mission, the authorities made it plain that they do not want the mission to extend its influence too far. The language of the present agreement is explicit that the officers are instructors and that is their well recognized field of activity. It is not desired that they get into the field of determining general policy in military instruction.

The stated United States objectives are set out in a confidential communication of the Department of the Army dated June 9, 1950 (AGAO–S 334 (29 May 1950) G3–M).[9] Subject: "Standing Instructions for the Operation of United States Army Missions in Latin American Countries."

The stated purposes follow with appropriate comment:

The United States Army Missions in Latin America are constituted for the purpose of promoting hemispheric security by assisting Latin American Governments in military affairs.

Comment: The effect of the mission in Paraguay toward promoting hemispheric security at this time and through its limited operations and slight impact on the Government is very small. It is admitted that it might be advantageous to have the mission established here in case of another world crisis and when it might be desirous of bringing some additional pressure on the Paraguayan Government military-wise. It is an expensive precaution in the meantime.

---

[9] Not found in Department of State files.

To foster friendly relations and strengthen the ties of Inter-American solidarity.

Comment: The ability to do this depends in a large degree upon the personalities of the Chief of the Mission and his staff; their command of the language, their ability to mix with the population, their knowledge of the local situation, which pre-supposes close cooperation with the Embassy, all in addition to a high degree of technical ability. The relations of the present mission are friendly but not impressive, or particularly effective. It is seriously not believed that the amount of strengthening of the ties received justifies the considerable expense involved.

To occupy the field of military cooperation in Latin America and the exclusion of non-Western hemisphere participation and influence.

Comment: The mission undoubtedly is occupying one segment of the field and the agreement itself probably would serve to prevent the establishment of a European mission. An existing agreement with the same terms and a mission half the size would accomplish the same thing. While it has been stated as a matter of policy that the United States Government does not object to other friendly Latin American nations establishing military missions in this country, the establishment, expansion, and operation of such missions have, from the correspondence, given us concern. This has been especially true of the willingness of Argentina to replace our influence in Paraguay at every opportunity. There are now two Argentine missions present—a military geographic mission, and military officers actually in charge of and instructing the police school. It is understood that a proposal for an Argentine naval mission is now under consideration. There is present a Brazilian mission about three times the size of the American mission which is operating on the level of combat troops rather than exclusively at general staff level where the United States mission operates. If the objective is to exclude a non-Western hemisphere nation, this might well be accomplished by leaving the field open to such a friendly nation as Brazil which has the same exclusive clause in its agreement as does the United States.

To increase the efficiency of Latin American forces by training their personnel in the military doctrine of United States military forces.

Comment: The instruction given by the United States mission has, as stated above, been limited to the general staff level and has had little effect on the efficiency of the Paraguayan forces generally. Even in the general staff, the United States doctrine is largely a matter of paper organization and competent observers have reported that the office of the Chief of Staff, who is a graduate of courses at Fort Leavenworth, does not have his office organized in accordance with United States Army standards. There must be some eventual results of teaching ranking officers our methods, but they are not readily visible and it is quite certain that the net result is obtained at high cost.

To promote standardization of United States equipment and organization and to encourage the use of material of United States manufacture and design.

Comment: Ten years of effort have resulted in equipping the Paraguayan army with just two 105-mm field howitzers. No other armament is of American manufacture. If material in its broad sense is contemplated, then it should be noted that such trucks and cars as are used are of American manufacture. There are various reasons for this situation, but the fact remains. It is doubtful if the Paraguayan Army will be in a financial position in the foreseeable future to re-equip any large part of its armed forces with United States material. This is the least important reason for the mission remaining in the field.

The above officially stated objectives of the mission did not include the factor of enlisting Paraguayan support of the United Nations and the United States in any foreign campaign. While the Government made a contribution of $10,000 to the Korean situation, it has consistently refused to make a definite statement as to whether Paraguayan troops might be available for service abroad, even if they were equipped, trained, transported, and armed by a friendly nation or nations.

Historical Comment

The Brazilian Military Mission appears to have come to Paraguay in May 1942.

The United States Military Mission signed its first agreement on December 10, 1943.

The Brazilian Mission continued to operate informally until August 3, 1948. When the agreement was signed, Ambassador Warren[10] sent his Note No. 85 of July 30, 1948[11] to the Foreign Office stating that this Embassy had no objection to the agreement with Brazil as proposed. In expressing this concurrence, it was understood that Article 3 of the Brazilian contract in no way cancelled or modified the provisions of Article 1 of the United States agreement in which the primary position of the United States Army Mission and its right to participate and work in any or all phases of Paraguayan military activity was established. The Paraguayan authorities have referred to this communication and have pointed out that, as a matter of fact, the Brazilian mission was in the country and operating before the United States mission and for some five years with its tacit consent, at least without any objection, and that in expressing its agreement for the signing of the Brazilian contract it did not violate Article 20 of our agreement as it was within the terms of Article 20 which says, "except by mutual agreement" between the Governments. There is nothing in either the United States or Brazilian contracts which refers to a "primary position", and the Paraguayan Government considers that the missions are on an exactly equal footing each operating in distinct fields, that the question of rank or precedence does not arise. If the Department feels that this matter should be clarified, during the negotiations for the extension of this agreement is the time to do it. In view of the evident attitude of the Paraguayan Government, this Embassy does not feel that this should be made an issue.

The Paraguayan Government also does not concede that the United States has a "right to participate and work in any or all phases of Paraguayan military activity". It considers that the purpose of the mission is as stated in Article 1 and that is for the officers to serve as instructors, "and for such other purposes as may be agreed upon by the Chief of the Mission and the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces". The Commander in Chief has pointed out that there has been no such agreement for activities for other purposes. It is believed that the mission might well during the past ten years have sold the Paraguayan military on an expansion of its activities and field of influence, but it is equally evident that this has not been done. If this is really desired it will require a bit of negotiating. It is not recommended that it be made an issue now. The time element is mentioned in view of the recommendation for action mentioned below as regards a short term agreement with an automatic extension clause.

The Paraguayan Government has on occasion offered to give the United States Military Mission exclusive jurisdiction in the instructional field, at the price of taking over all of the activities, which would mean increasing the size of our mission to double or treble its present complement.

Conclusions and Recommendations

The record of the last ten years shows that the United States military mission has fallen far short of obtaining the objectives outlined by the Department of the Army. It has accomplished something, of course, but the results have been obtained at considerable expense and it is doubted if they could be justified economically. During the period of the war they could, undoubtedly, be justified politically and as a matter of expediency. That is not true today. The military mission could be pulled out of Paraguay and, while the Paraguayan Government would not like it any more than it liked the closing of the military attaché's office recently, it would have no serious effect, at least militarily.

There is a question of the bolstering up of the present constitutional Paraguayan Government. It is believed that removing the mission would discourage the Government considerably. Its enemies would make capital of it as would the enemies of the United States. It is believed that the mission's removal next year might well be contemplated.

Economically it has been pointed out that, while the maintenance of the mission is expensive, transferring these officers to another post of duty would not relieve the United States Government of the cost of their salaries and allowances. The Paraguayan Government pays them some extra compensation and it provides office quarters (see Embassy Despatch No. 116 of September 2, 1953[12]) and certain other privileges so the cost really is not as great as it might appear to be at first glance nor would the saving be as great as might be thought by withdrawing the mission.

In view of the foregoing, it is recommended that the objectives be reviewed and restated, and that the chief of the military mission be informed that the principal objective is political, and that it must be achieved through close cooperation with the United States diplomatic mission and through its guidance and knowledge of the general situation. This has not been the case heretofore; in fact, there has been an evident lack of desire to maintain close contact with the Embassy and the help which the Embassy has received from the mission and which it might logically expect has not been forthcoming.

It is further recommended that certain minor changes be made in the text of the agreement. It is believed that there would be no objection to changing the title to read "Army Mission Agreement". The Chief of Staff would consent to inserting in the preamble after the word "officers", "and enlisted men". This would simplify customs procedures in connection with free entry.

It is not recommended that any attempt be made to force the Paraguayan Government to give the United States Mission precedence or control over the activities of the Brazilian or Argentine missions at this time. It is recommended that the Chief of Mission endeavor to sell this idea to the military authorities during the coming year. This will depend upon the personality and influence of the Chief of Mission, which should be one of his outstanding characteristics. The Department is informed that any attempt along this line would probably bring forth a counter-proposal from the Paraguayan Government to take over all their military instruction at the price of increasing the mission at least three-fold. It is doubtful, according to what appears in current instructions on economy, that our Government would be willing to undertake this proposal. There is also the objection that the Brazilian Mission is instructing the horse cavalry and we do not appear to have officers available for detail to this type of duty.

[12] Not printed; it concerned the obligation of the Paraguayan Government to furnish quarters for the U.S. military mission in Paraguay (734.58/9–253).

It is recommended that the United States do not show too great an eagerness to renew this agreement, but as a practical matter it might advantageously follow the lead of the Brazilian Government and propose that the agreement be extended for a period of one year, with the proviso that the agreement would continue to be extended year by year indefinitely, unless either Government advised the other in writing three months in advance of the expiration date. It is strongly recommended that this clause be inserted and it is believed that it would be accepted by the Paraguayan Government. The advantage of it is that it would relieve the United States Government, including the Department of State and the Department of the Army, of periodically considering an extension. Simply taking no action at all would allow the agreement to run as long as desired. On the other hand, it could be terminated at any time on three months notice. The door would not be closed to modifications of the agreement at any time in the future.

The Embassy has now established contact and familiarity with the points involved as well as a working basis with the responsible military officers and would be happy to undertake the negotiation of any of the changes recommended above or any others which the Department may have in mind.[13]

[4] Not printed; it contained a recommendation by the U.S. Operations Mission for dissolving the Joint Commission for Economic Development (734.5 MSP/10–2053).

There were only two joint commissions set up in Latin America by the above provision of law.[5] One was in Brazil which was organized for a specific purpose and which was eliminated as of July 31, 1953. The other is the commission in Paraguay which makes this organization unique in the Latin American technical assistance program. Technical assistance projects are developed, requested, considered, and approved or rejected in all of the other countries of Latin America by direct negotiation and through normal diplomatic channels.

As of Fiscal Year 1953 Paraguay had the third largest technical assistance program in Latin America, being surpassed only by Brazil and Peru. There is no doubt that this program in recent years became overdeveloped, or at least it developed more rapidly than the economic and political structure of Paraguay could absorb it. There is considerable reason for believing that the Joint Commission, originally designed as a neutral ground for developing technical and economic aid, may be partly responsible for the type of development of the program since 1950.

During the past year there have been considerable periods of inactivity, and those sessions that were called, mostly on the initiative of this Embassy, were for the purpose of requiring careful justifications of projects, which were not always forthcoming, and which, therefore, resulted in denials of applications or reductions in operations. The Commission up until recently has been considered by the Paraguayan Government as little more than a body where requests for technical assistance may be presented with almost a certainty of approval. The attitude of the Government on one occasion was illustrated by the comment of the late Minister for Foreign Affairs Dr. Bernardo Ocampos, who said in effect, at a meeting when the American Ambassador indicated that a request might not be approved, and with some surprise, "You understand this is an official request of the Paraguayan Government", indicating that denial of the request was just out of the question. That was an attitude I took some care to alter.

On the other hand, the Commission has from time to time, and probably still could serve a useful purpose as a meeting place where projects could be discussed at length around a table at a high level and pretty well justified or rejected before ever coming in formal manner to the Embassy or to the Department of State. It is not believed, however, that the Commission has ever done much more, or is it equipped to do more now, than to follow out the first duty specified in the law; namely, to examine the requesting country's requirements with respect to technical assistance. There has never been any budget or organization for making extensive studies of the country's resources and potentialities. Such data as have been considered have been obtained from other sources, namely the Economic Section of the Embassy and certain research done by the Office of the Director of Technical Cooperation of IIAA (now USAOM). The detailed and careful examination of policies to remove deterrents to and otherwise encourage the introduction, local development, and application of technical skills and particularly the creation and effective utilization of capital, both domestic and foreign has not been done by the Commission. Neither have any useful studies or reports been prepared by the Commission as such, nor is any organization or funds available for that purpose.

At one point United States technicians were sent to Paraguay on the theory that they were being attached to the Joint Commission, but the Joint Commission had no budget and, as a matter of fact, the technicians were first carried on the Embassy payroll and later transferred to the IIAA local office.

The economic studies and planning contemplated in Section 410 of the Act are now being done largely by the National Planning Commission of the Paraguayan Government (through the UNTA) working under the Economic Council, which in turn is essentially the Cabinet. There was an effort to have the Director of Technical Cooperation sit in on the National Planning Commission, possibly with the idea of carrying out some of the original ideas of Section 410. But, due to the necessity of direct intervention in government affairs and the political repercussions that might have been expected, the Department disapproved such action. The National Planning Commission, however, went ahead under the direction, and largely on the initiative and energy, of the head of the United Nations public administration group. It has lately been stated that the National Planning Commission (UN) now contemplates obtaining background data and prepare justifications for technical assistance projects to be presented to the United States under its bi-lateral agreement. Presumably these requests, when prepared and documented by the National Planning Commission, would be referred to the United States-Paraguayan Joint Commission for Economic Development for approval, a rather second-hand procedure.

The late Minister for Foreign Affairs Dr. Bernardo Ocampos early in 1953 presented the American Ambassador with an informal memorandum[6] suggesting that the functions and operations of the Joint Commission be overhauled and redefined. I did not think the time was opportune for such reorganization at that moment and Dr. Ocampos did not press his suggestion. He has since died and in view of the considerations mentioned above, it is believed that action should now be taken on defining the future policy of the Commission.

[Here follows discussion of the administration of the Joint Commission.]

It will be seen that the Joint Commission has never been taken very seriously by either government. It simply has been a meeting place to discuss technical assistance projects, and nothing more. Offices were set up in the Parfina Building, consisting of a secretary's office and a conference room. These are paid for by the Paraguayan Government (the rent was to be raised in July). The conference room is not used except on the rare occasions when there are meetings. The secretary's office has for at least the past year been occupied and used by the secretary of the Director of Technical Cooperation, at present it is used by the Program Officer, and the conference room is used principally for the frequent meetings of the Program Planning Committee (now USAOM).

In the meeting of April 17, 1951, the Minister for Foreign Affairs requested monthly reports from the technicians who were presumably attached to the Commission, and the United States technicians not included in any one of the three servicios did make more or less regular reports in Spanish of their activities each month. These reports were frequently late in being submitted and there is no evidence that they were ever read or any action taken there. In the meeting of January 27, 1953, I pointed out the above fact and suggested that the reports be discontinued, which the Minister readily agreed to do, at the same time indicating that he had never been very interested in the first place.

The meetings of the Joint Commission were frequently called by the Foreign Minister who refused to state the reason for calling the meetings and who sometimes sent out word that he was calling them as "President of the Commission". It was evident that the Foreign Minister considered the Commission as desirable more for building up political prestige for himself than for any constructive action the Commission itself might take. It was with some difficulty during the past year that I convinced the Paraguayan members of the Commission that notices should be sent out in writing in the name of the Secretary General and that an agenda should be prepared so that the members on both sides should know why the meeting was being called.

The meetings had customarily been held in the office of the Minister for Foreign Affairs. The group simply sat in a number of chairs and there was no table or other facilities upon which to place papers, the meeting being dominated completely by the Minister for Foreign Affairs. During the year, I succeeded in having the meetings held in the conference room of the Joint Commission. While this was agreed to the Minister for Foreign Affairs was never enthusiastic about going to the conference room to attend the meetings or to the implication that the Paraguayan and United States Sections of the Commission were meeting on an equal footing. This was illustrated by the fact that on January 27, 1953, the Minister called a meeting (really citing us to appear), not in the committee rooms, but in the Foreign Office, and although I made repeated inquiries of the Secretary General he, on the instructions of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, refused to state why the meeting was being called. Upon arrival it was found that the Minister cared to discuss the possibility of having Point IV technicians serve as advisors on Planning Commission sub-committees. On another occasion the Minister called the meeting and would not state the reason, although it was held in the conference room of the Commission. Upon arrival on March 19, 1953, it was found that the Minister for Public Works desired to announce his impending trip to the United States and his proposal to solicit a loan for $7,200,000 to finance the Asunción water works. It occurred to the American Section of the Commission that the high-handed manner of calling the Commission together and informing them of the intention to solicit a loan, without having given any previous inkling of the reason for calling the meeting, was a poor approach for enlisting sympathetic consideration of the project. It appeared later, when I mentioned this fact in private conversation, that the President was given credit for the idea. I am of the opinion that it originated with the Minister himself.

It will thus be seen that many political considerations have entered into the negotiations of the Joint Commission and it might be well at this time, and in view of the now radically changed situation, to make the Embassy less vulnerable to direct pressures from the Government and to allow the technical assistance organization, under the direction of the Director of the Operations Mission to work out its projects directly with the various ministries and governmental organizations and to get full justifications before even allowing them to come up for consideration and approval by the Embassy policywise.

There have been since its inception thirty meetings of the United States–Paraguay Joint Commission for Economic Development. The record of its meetings were not kept in an orderly manner and finding and organizing them has been a difficult task. However, in the past few months these minutes have been completely rewritten in the orderly form established by the present Commission and are now on file in the Embassy and in the office of the Country Director of USAOM.

[Here follows an extensive list of Joint Commission meetings and brief summaries of matters discussed at the meetings.]

Suggested Policy and Procedure

The new Minister for Foreign Affairs, Dr. José Antonio Moreno González, appears to be an active and intelligent man. When the matter of possibly dissolving the Joint Commission was mentioned to him a few days ago his first reaction was that of opposition. He stated that he thought the Commission should continue and that it would be useful as a place where the technical aid program could be discussed at a high level, more or less informally and, as he expressed it, "face-to-face". His point of view was that while it would place an additional burden on the Minister for Foreign Affairs, "he had to work anyway and had to eventually consider these matters; therefore, he might as well do this in the most convenient place and manner". It was pointed out to him that there has been a change in the concept of the technical aid organization now known as the United States of America Operations Mission, and that the Ambassador will be available for policy guidance on important matters but that he is not desirous of sitting in regularly on meetings that handle current operations, and thereby having to assume responsibility for following through on them.

Experience has shown that despite good intentions, such as those expressed by the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Paraguayan officials seldom follow through on programs involving steady and concentrated work. It will be noted that the Paraguayan Government has not shown any interest in having a meeting of the Joint Commission since last May and as there were a number of matters the Embassy desired to avoid, it took no action. The result was that there were no meetings. Such matters as have come up in the meantime have been handled by direct negotiation. This includes lengthy discussions with all of the Ministers involved in technical aid matters and consideration of such important subjects as detailed budget figures. This situation could continue.

It is recommended that the United States Government do not name formally another U.S. member to the Joint Commission but allow the Country Director and the Deputy Chief of Mission of the Embassy, who is an alternate, to attend if the Government should initiate a meeting. If the Ambassador should miss a meeting or two it is quite probable that the Minister for Foreign Affairs would promptly lose interest in the proceedings.

It is recommended that the Embassy continue to point out to the Minister for Foreign Affairs the feasibility of handling technical aid requests and negotiations directly rather than through a Joint Commission.

It is recommended that as soon as possible these points of view also be conveyed to the President who takes a personal interest in this matter.

It is recommended as a final step that as soon as the President and the Minister for Foreign Affairs can be convinced of the desirability of doing it, the Commission be dissolved by exchange of formal notes, and with suitable preparation of the public through the press.

It is recommended further, however, that if the United States Government does not decide to work towards the dissolution of the Commission, the Ambassador of the United States in Asunción be named by President Eisenhower as the senior member of the U.S. Section of the Commission; and, that the Paraguayan Government be required to take the same action regarding the Minister for Foreign Affairs so as to put the Commission on a formal and effective basis for constructive work.[7]

GEO. P. SHAW

[7] In instruction A–39, to Asunción, dated Nov. 12, 1953, the Secretary stated that the Department agreed with Ambassador Shaw's recommendations, and he instructed the Embassy to initiate the formal steps necessary to terminate the Joint Commission (834.00 TA/11–1253). On Feb. 5, 1954, Chargé Shillock notified the Paraguayan Government that the United States desired to terminate the Commission, and on Feb. 20, the Paraguayan Government expressed its agreement (Despatch 365, from Asunción, dated Feb. 25, 1954, 834.00 TA/2–2554).

Memorandum of Conversation, by Robert M. Sayre of the Office of Regional American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 4, 1953.

Subject: Interest of Paraguay in Obtaining United States Aircraft

Participants: Mr. Leighton Cain, Office of the Secretary of Defense
Lt. Col. Charles McGarrigle, Office of the Assistant for Mutual Security, Department of the Air Force
Mr. Paul J. Kern, Department of the Air Force
Col. Sydney T. Smith, Chief, U.S. Air Force Mission to Paraguay
AR—Mr. Jamison, Mr. Sayre
OSA—Mr. Havemeyer

A meeting was held in Mr. Jamison's office to discuss a prospective purchase by Paraguay of United States military aircraft costing approximately $2,000,000. (The estimated cost and availability of the desired aircraft is given on the attached data sheet.[1])

The principal problems raised by this prospective purchase were (1) whether Paraguay was economically in a position to make such dollar expenditures and (2) what procedure Paraguay should follow in presenting its request to the United States.

[1] Not printed.

Colonel Smith said that the purchase of United States aircraft had first been discussed with him by the Commander in Chief of the Paraguayan Armed Forces. The original proposal involved only procurement of twenty T–6D aircraft.[2] However the President of Paraguay added the additional aircraft[3] as also being necessary and desired. Colonel Smith considered the request reasonable although he did think it might be advisable to space procurement over several years. He said the Paraguayans contemplated spreading it over a four year period. He also said that he was himself in a position to place the request before the U.S. Government for Paraguay.

Mr. Havemeyer expressed concern over the dollar expenditure such a purchase by Paraguay would require. He noted the meager dollar resources available to Paraguay and Paraguayan efforts to obtain loans from the Export-Import or International Banks to carry out projects important to the Paraguayan economy, and difficulties they had with making payments on such loans. He thought it would be difficult to justify these efforts to obtain loans at the same time sizeable dollar resources were being spent on military equipment and that it would be particularly difficult to explain if, as a result of such purchases, Paraguay defaulted, as it had done, on existing or possible future loans.

Mr. Jamison agreed that this was something that had to be carefully considered but he also noted that we were selling military equipment to other countries that were obtaining loans, some in financial straits similar to those of Paraguay. While the Department or our Embassy might diplomatically point out to the Paraguayans this problem, in the final analysis the manner in which Paraguay, or any other government spent its money, was for that government to decide.

With respect to any payment terms except cash dollars in advance, Mr. Cain said that this was a matter to be decided by FOA. He thought that this purchase would be eligible for the "dependable undertaking" method of payment which, in the case of Paraguay, would probably be an irrevocable letter of credit drawn on an American bank. Mr. Jamison added that he did not personally think we should recommend any credit terms for Paraguay which might involve risk of default in payment after the equipment was delivered.

With respect to the procedure being followed by Paraguay in presenting its request, Colonel Smith said it was not quite clear to him why the Paraguayan Government was reluctant to have its Embassy in Washington handle the matter. Mr. Jamison thought unless there were overriding reasons that the normal procedure should be followed, i.e., a request submitted through the Paraguayan Embassy in Washington to the Department of State. Unless it were handled in the usual manner he had some difficulty in seeing how the transaction could be concluded, especially with respect to the sales contract which must be signed by an authorized Paraguayan official.

Colonel Smith said that when he returned to Paraguay he would discuss the matter with the United States Embassy. It appeared that the best thing to do was to suggest to the Paraguayan Government that it submit a request now only for those aircraft that it wanted immediately and could pay for and submit requests over the next four years for the remaining aircraft as it wanted and could pay for them. Regarding procedure, if the Paraguayans were for whatever reason unwilling to go through the Embassy channel, it might be possible for the President of Paraguay to designate a Paraguayan officer to serve, in effect, as a purchasing mission.

Mr. Jamison agreed that this appeared to be a satisfactory way to handle the problem. He wanted to emphasize, however, that the Department of State might have reservations on economic grounds, and that in discussions with the Paraguayans every effort should be made to avoid the impression that the request had already been or would be approved.[4]

[4] Department instruction A–42, to Asunción, dated Nov. 17, 1953, reads in part as follows: "If deemed necessary to do so, the Embassy may inform the Paraguayan Government that the Department would have no objections to the purchase of these aircraft. At the same time, however, the Department believes it to be desirable for the Embassy to suggest orally to appropriate officials that Paraguay may wish to consider this sizeable dollar expenditure in connection with its possible effect on the country's ability to obtain and service dollar loans." Editorial Note

On May 5, 1954, the Paraguayan Army deposed President Federico Cháves, and the National Assembly thereupon named Tomás Romero Pereira, President of the Governing Board of the Colorado Party, as Provisional President of Paraguay. He served in that capacity until August 15, 1954, when General Stroessner, having been duly elected on July 11 to fill the unexpired term of President Cháves, assumed the office of President. Documents pertaining to these events are in file 734.00 and 734.00(W) for 1954.

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, May 11, 1954.

Subject: Recognition of New Paraguayan Government

During the past ten days the Paraguayan Government has undergone a revolutionary change. The Department does not foresee that the new government will differ substantially from its predecessor. The change resulted from rivalries within the ruling Colorado Party and no outside influences are considered to have been involved. The new regime appears firmly in control of the country. The United States Chargé d'Affaires[2] reports that members of the diplomatic corps in Asunción are recommending recognition of the new government prior to Paraguay's National Holiday, May 14, 1954.

I recommend that you authorize me to instruct our Embassy to resume relations with the new Paraguayan Government provided satisfactory assurances are obtained that the new government will assume all its foreign obligations.[3]

The Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Kalijarvi) to the Managing Director of the Export-Import Bank (Edgerton)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 13, 1954.

DEAR GENERAL EDGERTON: Reference is made to your inquiry of August 10 as to the State Department's position with regard to the pending application of the Paraguayan Government for an Eximbank credit to assist in financing the Asuncion Water Works Project.

The Department supports consideration of this project by the Bank as indicated by Mr. Corbett[1] at the Executive Committee Meeting of July 8. While it is known that the Paraguayan Ambassador is urging immediate action on his Government's application, the Department is of the opinion that it would be advantageous for United States-Paraguayan relations if the authorization of this credit could follow

The Department would not object if for banking reasons the Eximbank wishes to take action immediately on the application, provided that no announcement is made until Ambassador Ageton informs the Paraguayan President of the Bank's action at the time he presents his credentials.[2]

Sincerely yours, THORSTEN V. KALIJARVI

PERU

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND PERU[1]

Editorial Note

On January 7, 1952, representatives of the United States and Peru initiated negotiations at Lima for a bilateral Military Assistance Agreement. Documents pertaining to the negotiations are in Department of State file 723.5 MSP. The Agreement was signed on February 22, and entered into force on April 26, 1952; for text, see Department of State Treaties and Other International Acts Series (TIAS) No. 2466, or United States Treaties and Other International Agreements (UST), volume 3 (pt. 2), page 2890.

Concurrent with the negotiations for a Military Assistance Agreement, representatives of the United States and Peru conducted negotiations for a related bilateral military plan. The "Plan of the Governments of the United States of America and Peru for their Common Defense" was initialed at Lima also on February 22, 1952, and transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 893, dated February 25, 1952, not printed (723.5 MSP/2–2552).

From the effective date of the Military Assistance Agreement, United States military missions in Peru performed the functions of a Military Assistance Advisory Group (MAAG) on an interim basis. In early February 1953, the Department of Defense recommended the establishment in Peru of a separate MAAG consisting of four officers and four entlisted personnel at a total cost of $93,000 for an 18-month period. On February 9, the Department of State instructed Ambassador Tittmann to undertake negotiations with the Peruvian Government to secure its consent to provide local currency to cover the administrative and operating costs of the MAAG (airgram A–200, dated February 9, 1953, 723.5 MSP/2–953). In telegram 314, from Lima, dated February 26, 1953, Ambassador Tittmann reported that the Peruvian Government agreed to pay the amount requested by the United States (723.5 MSP/2–2653).

The Ambassador in Peru (Tittmann) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller)

SECRET OFFICIAL–INFORMAL LIMA, February 25, 1952.

DEAR ED: I saw President Odría on February 18 at his request. He wanted to talk about the Military Assistance Bilateral Agreement and the Bilateral Defense Plan. He said that while he felt that the Agreement was all right, he was, on the other hand, not over enthusiastic about the Plan. Nevertheless he would give orders to have both documents signed by the Peruvian authorities (this was done on February 22, 1952), so that the treaties could be submitted to Congress for ratification as soon as possible. He felt that the Plan was inadequate, offering as it did, so little to Peru and he was especially unhappy about the Army's share, since he was an Army man and his fellow officers were sure to feel that he could have done better for this own branch of the Armed Forces. He demonstrated some apprehension lest Peru might be even more hindered than she was at present in purchasing the necessary equipment and supplies for her "internal defense" (that is, her defense against the Communists and her allegedly covetous neighbors) under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949[1] if she tied herself up too tightly with the Mutual Security Act of 1951[2] (I wrote him a letter[3] which, I hope, will counteract these fears). Odría recalled that Peru had always experienced a great deal of difficulty in securing delivery of the equipment she had purchased under the Act of 1949. What Odría wanted very much was some kind of assurance from us that when the Peruvian Armed Forces needed equipment and supplies, Peru would not only be able to continue as before to purchase them in the United States, but also that we would permit the arms thus purchased actually to be shipped to Peru. In this connection, it was obvious that Odría had been made suspicious, rightly or wrongly, of our methods and motives. We seem to him to be placing one obstacle after another in the way of delivery, especially as regards the DE's and the F–47 aircraft which had been fully paid for by Peru. He hoped very much that when I reported his ideas to you, we would be able to tell him something to set his mind at rest on this score.

Odría went on to say that Peru was 100 percent on the side of the United States in the struggle against Communism and that we could count on her whole-hearted cooperation at all times. He added, however, that in order to make this cooperation effective Peru must be strong and able to defend herself internally as well as externally. What was the point, he asked, in preparing for an external attack if Peru were unable to defend herself internally. In the event that a shooting war with Russia were to break out today, the Communists all over Latin America would start agitation within their respective countries. In his opinion, Brazil and Peru were the only two countries capable of dominating this agitation. Therefore, Odría concluded, it was in the highest interests of the United States that the latter should see to it that Peru continued strong internally as well as externally. Solely in this way could she remain the bulwark against Communism in Latin America that she is today.

Odría asserted emphatically that it was ridiculous to think that Peru would ever use her armaments in an aggressive act against a neighbor. He pointed out that at the present time relations were not good with any of her neighbors (they all wanted something), including even Brazil, which looked with covetous eyes on the petroleum possibilities in eastern areas of Peru. It was therefore unthinkable that Peru would ever take the offensive against a neighbor as this would mean that one or all the others combined would eagerly and greedily fall upon her from the rear. Under these circumstances, her defeat would be certain and her lands divided up among the victors. On the other hand, a well-defended Peru would discourage any neighbor from attacking her and the peace in this area of Latin America would thus be maintained.

I enclose two memoranda of conversations[4] on the foregoing subjects: one dated February 14 between General Morla,[5] the Chief of Staff of the Peruvian Army, and the Military Attaché of the Embassy;[6] and the other dated February 21 between President Odría, General Niergarth,[7] and the Military Attaché.

My overall impression is that Peru so far is not particularly keen on the military grant-aid project, especially since other important countries seem rather slow in accepting the same thing. Contributing factors to this attitude are: (1) emphasis on external rather than internal defense (the latter is the only thing that really interests the Peruvians at this stage of world developments); (2) a faint suspicion that the new project will make it still more difficult for the Peruvians to purchase arms and supplies in the United States under the Act of 1949; (3) a fear that Peru will be treated less favorably than other countries as regards military grant-aid, the revelation of which might have an adverse effect on Odría's political position.

While I am confident that Peru will go along with us in almost anything we may propose in regard to military matters involving the defense of the continent, I nevertheless think that it would be a good thing to smooth the way wherever possible. Permission to purchase one of our old cruisers would create a very favorable popular reaction all over the country and would help us politically no end. I don't believe the Department fully realizes the popular appeal of a cruiser. DE's, new submarines, and other vessels are probably appreciated by naval men more than an old cruiser, but it is the cruiser that impresses the rank and file and is therefore a political asset. I understand that it has been explained to the Department why a new cruiser for Peru should not upset the balance of naval power on the West Coast since it would merely replace the three old ones which the Peruvians now possess.

Sincerely yours, HAROLD H. TITTMANN

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller) to the Ambassador in Peru (Tittmann)[1]

SECRET OFFICIAL–INFORMAL [WASHINGTON,] March 5, 1952.

DEAR HAROLD: Thank you for your detailed letter of February 25[2] reporting on and analysing the attitude of Peruvian officials, and especially President Odria, toward the military grant-aid program and the other assistance Peru has received or would like to receive from the United States in the military field. Before discussing the points raised, however, I should like to express the appreciation of those of us here particularly concerned with the grant-aid negotiations for the excellent and effective manner in which you and others similarly involved in Lima carried the negotiations with Peru to an expeditious and successful conclusion. It was a job very well done.

With reference to your impression that Peru is not enthusiastic about the grant-aid program because of its preoccupation with internal security, it is perhaps understandable that the transition from concepts of nationalistic self-interest to genuine adherence to the practice as well as the principle of collective defense will call for difficult adjustments both practical and psychological, and, in some cases, such as Mexico and Argentina, will not happen quickly. We can only hope to make some headway with the encouragement provided in the present program, and Peru's participation is all to the good.

Insofar as Peruvian concern is related to the size of the program for that country, while I do not know all of the factors and considerations which led the Department of Defense to take up with Peru the particular tasks and units specified in the Military Plan, it seems to me that, as one of a relatively small number of countries approached with an offer of assistance to all three armed services, Peru has come out rather well. After all, the total program is not very large. Furthermore, there seems to be a slight inconsistency between preoccupation with internal defense and concern at not being cut in for more in the grant-aid program, which is so clearly directed at external military effort.

It is reassuring, however, that the President does not seem to consider that Peru's needs for her immediate security should be on a grant basis. One of the most frequent adverse criticisms of our program has been the charge that, however closely its purposes and objectives may be tied to strengthening the hemisphere against the threat of Soviet imperialism, the assistance will actually be used for other purposes.

[2] Supra.

With regard to President Odria's concern lest the grant-aid program will prejudice acquisition of military assistance on a reimbursable basis, there are several points to be considered. In the first place, it is entirely correct that participation in the grant-aid program will not prejudice acquisition on a reimbursable basis of equipment, etc., which is available and which is clearly needed by Peru to maintain her own defense. This does not mean, of course, that we can escape the fact that the capacity of this country to meet military requirements throughout the world limits availability, nor does it mean that we shall approve without question any request that Peru may wish to make. There are necessary limitations which must continue to be imposed.

One of the basic assumptions of the Peruvian position as reported in your letter appears to be that they have not been receiving fair or equitable treatment in the acquisition of military assistance on a reimbursable basis. When one compares what Peru has actually received with what Latin American countries of Peru's size, or even larger, have received under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, one is struck with the fact that Peru has not fared badly. In this connection, I have enclosed for the Embassy's own information the latest cumulative figures of the transactions which have taken place under the MDAP with this area since October 1949, as of January 31, 1952.[3]

With respect to the pending request for a cruiser for Peru, this question is, I understand, far from being decided in Defense. No reply has as yet been received to the Department's letter to Defense of January 5, 1952,[4] requesting to be advised as to the military requirement of Peru for a heavy cruiser in relation to any mission she would be likely to perform in hemisphere defense. I believe a copy of this letter was sent to Lima informally. I shall see that you are kept currently advised on developments in regard to this request and appreciate receiving your views on it.

Sincerely yours, EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

[3] The enclosure attached to the source text shows that Peru received reimbursable military assistance valued at $1,343,236, an amount more than that received by any other Latin American country, except Argentina, Brazil, and Chile. A footnote to the figure for Peru, however, reads as follows: "This figure does not include the three D–E's which have now been delivered to Peru. Their cost plus rehabilitation amounted to $4,425,000. With their delivery, Peru now probably leads all countries in value of items actually received."

Memorandum of Conversation, by Charles W. Kempter of the Lend-Lease and Surplus Property Staff

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 28, 1952.

Subject: Peru—Lend-Lease Settlement Negotiations.

Participants: ARA—Mr. Thomas C. Mann
OSA—Mr. Maurice M. Bernbaum
Mr. Robert J. Dorr
OFD—Mr. Francis T. Murphy
Mr. Charles W. Kempter

A meeting was held in room 4213 New State at 2:30 pm today to discuss the situation relating to lend-lease settlement negotiations with the Government of Peru. Mr. Mann wished to have a clear outline of the position of the office responsible for lend-lease matters in order that he might reply directly to Ambassador Tittmann's telegraphic appeal to him for support in the Embassy's urgent recommendation that the Department agree to accept the proposal of the Peruvian Government to pay in soles. The Embassy feels that this may be the last and only opportunity we may have for a long time to settle this long delinquent obligation.

Mr. Murphy said that we had made a very thorough examination of all the factors involved and had discussed salient points with Treasury as well as with our Foreign Buildings Division and Finance Division. It had been conclusively shown that, as the FBO appropriation has been used up, there will be no hope for new funds before July 1, 1953 and even that hope is speculative since no enabling legislation has as yet been assured. U.S. Government agency needs for soles, if maintained at present schedules, would require at least ten years to use approximately 45 million soles (estimated return from lend-lease at 15.-plus). Treasury and OFD objects to taking on any long position in soles.

The Peruvian suggestion of 6 years to pay was discussed and it was indicated that the Department would not accept anything over 5 years. It was generally agreed that the economic position of Peru is the best it has been for a long time and that there is no reason why Peru cannot pay the lend-lease account in dollars at this time. Mr. Mann said that President Odria had some unique ideas in respect to dollar payments in general and to the liquidation of the lend-lease account in particular. He asked if giving special consideration to Peru would be likely to have unfavorable repercussions from other countries which not yet have reached settlement terms. He was told that it probably would and that such an inadvisable course of action might unfavorably react against other settlement arrangements with certain of the American republics which are now "current" in their payments.

The OFD position is that a counterproposal should be submitted to Peru by the Department on a "take it or leave it" basis and that it should be noted that such a counterproposal is not a starting bargaining point but is the maximum to which we will go to secure Peruvian concurrence. Such "last word" terms are:

1. The immediate transfer to the lend-lease account of the credit of $125,910.37 from interim-arms contracts.

2. Payment of the net obligation of $2,844,831.63 in semi-annual installments on the following schedule:

June 30, 1952	$244.831.63	in U.S. dollars
December 31, 1952	200,000.00	–do–
June 30, 1953	300,000.00	(see note below)
December 31, 1953	300,000.00	–do–
June 30, 1954	300,000.00	–do–
December 31, 1954	300,000.00	–do–
June 30, 1955	300,000.00	–do–
December 31, 1955	300,000.00	–do–
June 30, 1956	300,000.00	–do–
December 31, 1956	300,000.00	–do–

Note: The agreement would be expressed in dollar terms, as is the usual practice, giving to the United States the usual option to draw local currency to meet any and all of its expenditures in Peru.

3. Peru could anticipate any payment and pay in advance in dollars at any time. The agreement would contain the usual exchange rate language which provides that each conversion shall be that rate most favorable to the U.S. which at the time of each such transaction, is available to any party provided that such rate is not unlawful and, if both countries have agreed par values established with the International Monetary Fund, such rate is not prohibited by the Articles of Agreement of the Fund.

4. Interest shall be paid in U.S. dollars at the fixed rate of 2⅜% per annum on the dollar amount of any installment payment not made by its scheduled due date; such interest shall begin at due date and continue to the date on which payment is made.

(Should Congress provide new funds for the buildings program by FY 1954 consideration would be given to taking proportional payments in soles to meet building program needs as well as administrative requirements not satisfied from other sources. However, no commitment of any kind can be made by the Department until such new funds are definitely provided.)

Mr. Mann went over these terms, one by one, and asked what would happen if the Peruvians did not accept them. He said that the friendly government officials now willing to come to terms for payment in soles might change and that there was no assurance that new officials would view the payment of the lend-lease accounts as a responsibility of the Government of Peru. Mr. Murphy said that that was something which had to be faced but that, so far as he was concerned, non-acceptance of the foregoing terms of settlement would mean that eventual settlement would be put off for a while. He believed that circumstances dictated that, in the light of all of the factors involved, it is better to delay a settlement than to enter into one which we could not justify as being satisfactory from a financial standpoint either to ourselves or the Congress.

Mr. Mann said that he would send the Ambassador a telegram[1] saying that a letter[2] containing a full story of the lend-lease matter was being drafted and would soon be on its way to him via airmail. A copy of this letter will be furnished LL for its files.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Olmsted) to the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs (Cowen)

SECRET WASHINGTON, March 31, 1952.

Subject: Purchase by the Peruvian Government of U.S. Naval Vessels for use by the Peruvian Navy. Case No. Peru–13

1. Reference is made to memorandum from your office 5 January 1952,[1] requesting information concerning the status of the Peruvian Government's current request for the purchase of a cruiser from the United States Government under Section 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended.

2. The following information is furnished relative to the status of subject request:

a. The request of Peru for a cruiser is still under active consideration by the Department of Defense. In the event that it is found that a cruiser can be made available to Peru, no assurance can be given at this time as to the identity of the cruiser that might be made available.

b. Public Law 3, 82nd Congress, 1st Session,[2] requires Congressional approval prior to disposal of battleships, carriers, cruisers, destroyers, and submarines which have not been stricken from the Navy Register. It is the opinion of this office, as of now, that representation to the Congress for disposal of a cruiser to Peru during this session should not be made and would not meet with favorable consideration if made.

[2] Reference is to the "Act to authorize the construction of modern naval vessels, and for other purposes," approved Mar. 10, 1951; for text, see 65 Stat. 4.

c. The Department of Defense is unable to confirm the information which Admiral Saldias[3] reports having received of various officers in the Department of the Navy and subsequently relayed to the State Department by Mr. Aramburu,[4] Minister Counselor of the Peruvian Embassy. Admiral Saldias was informed, however, during a visit to the Office of the Secretary of the Navy and subsequent to letter from this office, 15 December 1951,[5] subject: Request by the Government of Peru for U.S. Naval Vessels, that the Peruvian Government's request for a U.S. cruiser is being considered.

d. The concept of the Joint Outline War Plan for Latin America is based upon Latin American Forces in being, and the two Chilean modern cruisers now in the plan are capable of countering the threat of raider action on the west coast of South America. It is considered that Peru would contribute more to hemisphere defense by maintaining the combat efficiency of her patrol type ships to fill the critical need of convoy escorts in the event of hostilities than to contribute a cruiser, not required to fill the Naval Force gap in the plan. On the above premise there is no overriding military requirement for a Peruvian cruiser in the defense of the Western Hemisphere.

3. This confirms certain information previously furnished your office by letter 15 December 1951, discussions with representatives of your office and this office, 26 February 1952, and various telephone conversations.

The Minister stated the Navy had said it would be able to find a cruiser for Peru and would sponsor legislation for a transfer if it appeared legislative approval could be obtained." SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 31, 1952.

DEAR HAROLD: We have been looking further into President Odría's suggestion described in your letter of July 21[2] that a United States Air Force officer be made Chief of Staff of the Peruvian Air Force.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Jamison.

[2] Not found in Department of State files.

An initial question was whether this would be legally possible, in view of the Constitutional prohibition against acceptance of office from a foreign state without the consent of Congress. The Defense Department lawyers would only give us a very informal reading to the effect that it might be possible to interpret some of the legislation authorizing detail of military personnel to assist other governments (which is the basis for our Mission Program in Latin America) in a manner which would permit such an assignment, but only under conditions which would appear to be completely impracticable, if not impossible, to meet. For example, the office of the Department of Defense's legal counsel advises informally that it would be necessary that there be a finding by the President that such transfer would be in the national interest and it would also be necessary that the freedom of the individual concerned to take orders from the foreign government would be strictly limited to certain specific subjects. Furthermore, it would be necessary for the other government to waive any requirement that an oath to that government be taken, which would seem to affect any command functions he might need. It appears certain that the necessary steps could not be taken unless it were deemed to be of overriding importance to the national interest, a condition which, in my opinion, the present proposal does not meet. None of those with whom we discussed this matter either in State or Defense have been able to recall any instance in which such an assignment has been made, except under war conditions.

Whatever may be the legal or administrative technicalities, however, it seems to me that there are extremely important policy reasons why it would not be desirable for a United States officer to assume such a command position. To whatever extent we may sympathize with the President's desire to clean up a messy situation, and however valuable such rehabilitation would be in improving Peru's hemisphere defense capabilities, there is great danger that even the most discreet person in such a position would be precipitated into internal quarrels and conflicts against his will. An attempt to extricate himself after the trouble had broken out, in accordance with Odría's suggestion, would simply add to his difficulties. Even more important, however, I believe that putting a United States officer in such a command postion would immediately be taken elsewhere, if not in Peru, as confirmation of the charge that our military policy, particularly the grant-aid program, has the ultimate objective of putting Latin American armed forces under United States command. This could have a severely adverse effect upon our whole program.

On the basis of the information obtained thus far, I believe it would be well to emphasize the technical and administrative obstacles to such a proposal, rather than any strictly legal ones, but that it should also be frankly pointed out that the exercise of command functions by a United States officer, even if it were possible or practicable, would pose very serious policy problems, and would not, in our view, be in the best interests either of the United States or Peru. This could be coupled with an indication that we would be prepared to consider what might be done by way of special augmentation of the Air Force Mission aimed at dealing with specific difficulties in the Peruvian Air Force but only in a strictly advisory capacity. It is possible that some arrangement might be worked our under which we could thus assist the Peruvians in doing what they should be able to do themselves.

With reference to the second part of the proposal (which Colonel Stroh[3] does not believe necessary)—that a member of the Mission be made director of the Air Force school—there appears to be precedent for such an arrangement in El Salvador and perhaps in Brazil. This might require an amendment of the existing Mission Agreement[4] but apparently it could be done, provided, I assume, that no command function or oath of allegiance is involved.

Sincerely yours, EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Olmsted) to the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs (Martin)

WASHINGTON, August 11, 1952.

Subject: Reimbursable Military Assistance Under Section 408(e) of the MDAA, as Amended—Case Nos. OMA Peru 23 and 23/1

1. Reference is made to memoranda from your office, subject as above, dated 16 April 1952[1] and 3 July 1952.[2] These memoranda forwarded notes from the Peruvian Embassy requesting purchase of 26 T–6G Aircraft, 6 T–7 Aircraft, B–25 Aircraft (number not specified) and cartridges, bombs and rockets.

2. The following is the status of the above requests:

a. There are no B–25's available from USAF stocks for sale to the Peruvian Government.

b. There are no T–6G aircraft available from USAF stocks for sale to the Peruvian Government.

[1] Not printed (723.5 MSP/4–1652).

[2] Not printed (723.5 MSP/6–352).

c. There are no T–7 aircraft available from USAF stocks for sale to the Peruvian Government. It is understood that the Beech Aircraft Corporation is manufacturing the civilian version of this aircraft in the C–45 configuration (civilian designation D–18S). It is believed that Peruvian Government representatives have made direct contact with the Beech Aircraft Corporation in connection with the purchase of this type aircraft.

d. The Department of the Air Force is in the process of making a pricing and availability study on the ammunition, bombs and rockets portion of Case No. OMA Peru 23. This study will be forwarded to the appropriate Peruvian representatives when completed.

3. The following additional data is forwarded for information in connection with the Peruvian request for T–6G aircraft. At present, Lt. General Armanda Zamudio, Commanding General of the Peruvian Air Force, is in the United States with members of his staff, for the purpose of procuring equipment and material from commercial sources for the Peruvian Air Force, and expediting the delivery of items being purchased under Section 408(e) of the MDAA, as amended. As part of General Zamudio's activities in the commercial markets of the United States, he has been making an effort to purchase 20 T–6 aircraft. Concurrently with his search for this type aircraft in the commercial market, the Department of the Air Force was making an effort to procure on behalf of the Peruvian Government the 6 T–6 aircraft requested under Case No. OMA Peru 23. Due to the shortage of this type aircraft, it was discovered that the activities of the Department of the Air Force and General Zamudio had the effect of competing for the same limited number of available aircraft. As a result, it was explained to General Zamudio that the Department of the Air Force would postpone any further action pending the outcome of his effort to procure the aircraft direct from commercial sources. For the same reason, it is not considered advisable to initiate procurement action on behalf of the Government of Peru for the 20 T–6G aircraft requested under Case No. OMA Peru 23/1.

4. If the Peruvian representative fails in his effort to procure T–6 aircraft on the commercial market, it is requested that this office be advised if further action is necessary toward the procurement of this aircraft on behalf of the Peruvian Government.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Linder) to the Administrator of the Defense Materials Procurement Agency (Larson)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 30, 1952.

DEAR MR. LARSON: This is in reply to your letter of December 20[2] in which you invited the Department's comments on the proposal of the Defense Materials Procurement Agency to assist the American Smelting and Refining Company in the development of the Toquepala copper deposits in Peru. I am very glad to give you our views.

As you have recognized, there are important aspects of this question that are outside the competence of the Department of State. We are, nevertheless, very much interested in certain results which would follow from a development of this sort.

At a time when nationalistic feeling seems to be rising in Latin America and declarations in favor of nationalization of mineral resources have become the fashion, it would be very salutory if a large private development, offering substantial benefits to the country concerned, could be begun. It would be especially fortunate if this could take place in Peru, which has recently adopted a mining code unusually favorable to foreign private investment. On the other hand, since the Company's plan has received public attention in Peru and other Latin American countries, the failure of the United States Government to lend whatever assistance is appropriate, or any decision on the part of the Company not to proceed, might give additional impetus to the nationalization drive, with serious consequences to our future supplies of industrial raw materials.

This Department is also particularly conscious of the problems created by the heavy dependence of the United States on copper imports from a single source—Chile. In our negotiations with Chile for the copper agreement which Chile denounced last spring, and in our subsequent efforts to assure a continued flow of copper to the United States at reasonable prices, we have been handicapped by that dependence. The development of an alternative source of the magnitude of Toquepala would greatly improve the bargaining power of this Government and of American private industry.

In the light of the foregoing, the Department believes that the Toquepala project is in the interest of our foreign policy and, if it meets the requirements of the Defense Production Act, is hopeful that it can be favorably considered by your agency.

Sincerely yours, HAROLD F. LINDER

Memorandum by the Acting Secretary of State to the President[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 22, 1953.

Subject: Appointment with the Peruvian Ambassador and Navy Minister on Thursday, April 23, at 12 Noon

Ambassador Berckemeyer will present Rear Admiral Roque A. Saldias, Navy Minister and special envoy of Major General Manuel A. Odria, President of Peru. Admiral Saldias, pro-United States and a leading figure of his Government, will present a letter (translation attached)[2] from President Odria expressing his appreciation for having been awarded the Legion of Merit and discussing Peru's position in her boundary controversy with Ecuador.[3] According to the Ambassador, he will also present orally:

1. Assurance of Peru's desire for full cooperation with us in a uranium program.[4] The Vice President of Peru[5] met with the Atomic Energy Commission early this week on this matter, and a survey expedition will be arranged shortly.

2. Peruvian concern over bills pending in the Congress to raise duties on United States imports of lead, zinc and tuna fish. Increased duties would seriously affect Peruvian exports and would be interpreted by Peru as contrary to a United States policy of friendship and economic cooperation.

3. Peruvian preoccupation over the Bolivian situation[6] and her conviction that Argentina is attempting to create political and economic difficulties for Peru, principally through withholding needed food shipments and infiltration efforts by Peronista labor activities.

A statement by you expressing satisfaction over Peru's sound economic progress and affirming our serious interest in and desire for continued cooperation with Peru would be reassuring to Odria's friendly government.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Chief of Protocol (Simmons)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 23, 1953.

Subject: Call on the President by Peruvian Minister of Marine

Participants: The President
Peruvian Minister of Marine
Peruvian Ambassador
Chief of Protocol

The Peruvian Minister of Marine, Rear Admiral Roque A. Saldías, called on the President today, by special request, in order to deliver a personal letter[1] and message from the President of Peru. The Minister was accompanied by the Peruvian Ambassador. The letter dealt almost exclusively with Peru's annoyance at what it terms Ecuador's intransigeance in failing to complete its surveys so as to bring into effect the Rio Protocol of 1942, settling the long-standing Peru–Ecuador boundary dispute. The letter also mentioned, in general terms, other matters which the Peruvian President wished the Minister to bring to the President's attention.

The Ambassador opened the interview by telling the President of Peru's hope that no increased American tariffs might be imposed on our importations from Peru of lead, zinc and copper. He said that the matter is one of great importance to the Peruvian economy. He described, in answer to the President's questions, the diversified nature of Peru's economy, indicating its most important exports to this country as cotton, oil, copper and other metals, as well as textiles made from llama and vicuña skins, and a few other items, mainly agricultural. The President explained that he was not in a position to say what Congress would do on the tariff question, but that he was ready to use his influence at all times to try to prevent any injustices being done.

From this point the Ambassador, and later the Minister, entered upon a detailed and somewhat lengthy discussion of the adverse and anti-United States attitude of President Peron of Argentina. They both stressed Peron's growing influence in other countries, bringing out the points that Paraguay was now merely an Argentine province, that Argentina was the dominating influence in Bolivia under the new regime of President Paz Estenssoro and that even Ecuador, under its new pro-Argentine President, Velasco Ibarra, was turning more than previously toward Peron for leadership. The Ambassador said that Chile was still maintaining a strong independent position but that its economic situation was unsatisfactory, a factor which might, if continued, swing it towards the Argentine camp. As for Peru, the Ambassador said that its economy is strong, that it now has a free foreign exchange market and that its finances are in fine shape. He said that Argentina often tries to drive sharp trade bargains based on Peru's need for Argentine beef, but that, if Peru had adequate means of sea transportation, they might improve their own negotiating position with Peron by purchasing meat in Nicaragua. The Minister said that it was important to the United States to have an economically strong Peru in order to avoid having all South America falling into the Argentine orbit. Therefore, he said, we should give all possible support to Peru. Communism, he said, was a great and growing danger, and Argentina would be a fertile field for increased Communist activities. A prosperous Peru, he felt, was a bulwark against Communism.

He added, and this was corroborated by the Ambassador, that a widespread means of Argentine infiltration is its practice of sending to its various Embassies abroad a corps of highly trained "labor attachés". These people, he said, citing the situation in Lima as a striking example, stir up labor troubles in the countries where they are stationed, infiltrating themselves into inner labor circles and thus having a hand in encouraging strikes and in labor activities of a political nature. The President suggested the possibility that such individuals could always be declared persona non grata if their actions became particularly offensive. In practice, the Ambassador said, this was possible but often difficult because of the complexities of Argentina's diplomatic set-up and the delicacy of disturbing its diplomatic relationships.

The President expressed interest in all these matters, asked about Peruvian wheat importations (about 200,000 tons annually) and reiterated his belief in closer relations with Latin America. He said that he had wished to visit Latin America himself but was prevented by his duties here from so doing. For that reason he was sending his brother, Dr. Milton Eisenhower, as his personal representative on a forthcoming Latin American trip of good-will and study.[2] Dr. Eisenhower, he said, would work in close cooperation with the Department of State and our Embassies.

A curious part of the interview was that the Ecuador boundary dispute, the main subject of the letter, was mentioned only briefly, although with some feeling.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Edgar L. McGinnis, Jr., of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 2, 1953.

Subject: Various Peruvian Economic and Political Problems

Participants: Rear Admiral Roque A. Saldias, Peruvian Minister of Marine
The Peruvian Ambassador
ARA—Mr. Cabot
OSA—Mr. McGinnis

Admiral Saldias said that he was taking advantage of his visit to the United States to attend the launching of the new Peruvian submarine Tiburon at Groton, Connecticut, to discuss various important economic and political matters with Mr. Cabot at the suggestion of President Odria.

The Admiral said that Peru was undergoing a period of economic strain resulting from the decline in world market prices of its principal exports. He said that while the Government had the situation in hand, there was always the possibility that Peru might have to resort again to governmental control of foreign exchange which it had previously abandoned. He said that Peru wished to avoid this since it was ever mindful of the example it had set for other Latin American countries in freeing its economy of official controls.

The Minister then referred to various economic problems in which he thought the Department could be of help and said that while he did not ask for any commitments from Mr. Cabot, he bespoke his serious and favorable consideration of them. Admiral Saldias said that the principal economic problems were sugar, the Toquepala copper project and the IBRD's refusal to consider further loans until Peru had settled its sterling indebtedness. Both Admiral Saldias and the Ambassador bespoke the Department's aid in obtaining a larger sugar quota for Peru under the International Sugar Agreement.[1] They explained in detail Peru's reasons for refusing to sign the Sugar Agreement and indicated that there were means to increase Peru's quota if United States support were forthcoming. With respect to the Toquepala project they described its importance to Peru and urged serious consideration of its merits. The Ambassador then spoke out strongly against the IBRD's refusal to act upon Peruvian loan applications until Peru had reached a settlement with British holders on its sterling debt. He regarded this as unfair since it required Peru to negotiate with the British under a tremendous handicap. The Ambassador asserted that Peru had made a fair offer to the British which included payments on the principal at the rate of $4.86. Moreover, pending settlement of the matter the Peruvian Government is setting aside funds regularly to meet these obligations.

Mr. Cabot replied that insofar as the sugar question was concerned, this appeared to be a multilateral problem. He pointed out that it would be almost impossible for the Department to take the position that the International Agreement and the Sugar Act[2] be amended but that he would look into the possibility of providing some relief for the Peruvians through the use of unused quotas.

Regarding the Toquepala project, Mr. Cabot said that he continued to be very much interested in it and hoped that an appropriate time might soon come to bring this project forward again. He indicated that Dr. Eisenhower's report[3] is shortly to be distributed to the interested agencies of the Government and that this might afford a good opportunity. He said that he considered the project a sound one, but that due to its magnitude it was necessary also to think of the question of timing in pressing for its execution.

As to Peru's relations with the IBRD, Mr. Cabot observed that the international character of that institution placed limits upon our ability to intervene in individual cases. He expressed his regret that it had not been possible to have a meeting of minds between the Peruvian Government, the American Bondholders Committee and the British Bondholders Committee and said that he would again ascertain whether anything could be done to hasten the granting to Peru of the IBRD loans which had been delayed pending the completion of Peru's foreign debts settlements.

The Ambassador then stated that he was leaving with Mr. Cabot three formal communications[4] relating to sugar, forthcoming United States tariff hearings on lead and zinc, and Peru's relations with Colombia and Ecuador. Regarding its relations with Colombia and Ecuador, the Ambassador stated that Peru was seriously concerned over unfriendly statements made by Colombian and Ecuadoran officials in connection with the recent meeting of Presidents Velasco and Rojas Pinilla which were directed at Peru. More particularly, Peru regards indications of a Colombian-Ecuadoran military alliance as a serious threat to Peru. Admiral Saldias added that he was leaving with Mr. Cabot a copy of his Groton speech[5] made upon the occasion of the submarine launching. The Admiral said that in his speech he made it clear that the strengthening of Peru's naval forces represented a sincere desire to cooperate with the United States in the maintenance of peace and to insure this Hemisphere against outside aggression.

Mr. Cabot replied to the Admiral that we appreciated this attitude of his Government and observed, with respect to the Ambassador's remarks, that he was confident that neither Colombia nor Ecuador harbored aggressive designs against Peru.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 25, 1954.

Subject: Peruvian Request for Stabilization Loan

Participants: Ambassador Berckemeyer, Peruvian Embassy
ARA—Mr. Cabot
OSA—Mr. McGinnis

Ambassador Berckemeyer said that following discussions in Lima with his Government, he had been instructed by President Odria to request a stabilization loan from appropriate sources in the United States for the purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the sol and paying off the backlog of commercial debts. He stated that while Peru had imposed credit restraints and had taken measures of retrenchment to prevent the further depreciation of the sol, these measures had not yet shown results. He indicated that overspending by the Government on development was a major contributing cause and that this was being remedied. The Ambassador went on to say that the situation was aggravated by a flight of capital which would be prevented through a restoration of confidence in the value of currency. For this reason, a loan was necessary. Although, he said, it was unlikely that the loan would be drawn on to any great extent. The simple fact that dollars were available from such a loan would reestablish confidence in the currency. The Ambassador said that his Government did not desire to resort again to official currency and import controls which it had worked so hard to eliminate when the Odria administration came into power.

Mr. Cabot said that we were aware of this situation and had already given some preliminary consideration to the matter. He said that it appeared that the best method would be for Peru to request a drawing from the IMF. When the Ambassador indicated that this procedure might not yield sufficient amounts for the purpose Peru had in mind, Mr. Cabot replied that this could be regarded as a first step. If other steps were needed later, we would be glad to consider which further measures might be necessary. He said that in view of Peru's favorable record in encouraging foreign private investment and eliminating official economic controls, there existed a favorable disposition among United States officials to be of assistance in this situation. Mr. Cabot said that he personally had a good hope that appropriate assistance could be rendered and inquired as to the sum the Peruvian Government had in mind for stabilization purposes.

Ambassador Berckemeyer replied that his Government had a figure of $30 million in mind which could be used both for purposes of stabilization and for elimination of the backlog of commercial debts. In reply to an inquiry by Mr. Cabot, the Ambassador said that he would be available for a meeting with IMF officials tomorrow morning, but that he would be out of town from noon Tuesday to about noon the following day. He remarked that he had to travel to New York to be present at the opening of the exhibition of Peruvian art objects at the Museum of Modern Art.

Mr. Cabot said that he would be pleased to do what he could to help arrange an early meeting with IMF officials and said that he would communicate later with the Ambassador on the subject.

The Ambassador said that a memorandum[1] had been handed by his Government to Ambassador Tittmann describing the current exchange situation and Peru's request for assistance. When Mr. Cabot stated that the memorandum had not yet reached Washington, Ambassador Berckemeyer promised to send a copy to the Department today.

The Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Woodward) to the Acting Regional Director for Latin American Operations, Foreign Operations Administration (Hardesty)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] February 24, 1954.

DEAR MR. HARDESTY: In response to your oral inquiry, I am pleased to report to you that the Department of State has been informed by the International Monetary Fund that it entered into a stand-by credit arrangement with the Peruvian Government on February 17, 1954 that will enable it to draw up to $12,500,000 as support for stabilization of the Peruvian Sol. At the same time, the Treasury Department of the United States Government signed an agreement[1] with the Peruvian Ambassador by which $12,500,000 of the Stabilization Fund of the Treasury Department is earmarked for stabilization of the Peruvian Sol. Likewise, the Department has learned that the Chase National Bank has signed an agreement with the Peruvian Government by which a stand-by credit of $5,000,000 has been opened for possible use in stabilization of the Peruvian Sol.

In response to your further inquiry with respect to discussions with the Peruvian Ambassador concerning a possible transaction by which the Peruvian Government might purchase wheat from this Government, the Peruvian Ambassador has indicated to officers of this Department that (1) his Government does not wish a gift of wheat but that it would be interested in purchasing wheat (2) in Peruvian currency which would not be convertible into United States dollars, and (3) at a price which would provide the wheat to Peru as though it were purchasing the wheat at the market price but at a rate of 15 soles to the United States dollar—in other words, since the present rate of the sol is approximately 20 to the dollar, at a discount of approximately 25% from the world market price. The Ambassador indicated, moreover, (4) that the wheat thus purchased would be the normal requirements of Peru for wheat and would not be a quantity beyond those regularly purchased through the regular channels of trade.

The Peruvian Ambassador has been informed that there is no authorization in present United States legislation for the sale of wheat by the United States Government in foreign currency that is not freely convertible into United States currency. It was predicted to him that it would seem unlikely, in the event there should in the future be such authorization, that there would be provision for the sale of wheat for foreign currency at a substantial discount below the world market price. Moreover, it was mentioned to the Ambassador that it seemed probable that the Government of the United States, in any arrangements for the sale abroad of United States wheat surpluses held by the United States Government, would not wish to provide the normal and regular needs of countries that may be in such economic and financial condition as to be able to purchase those normal needs through the regular channels of trade.

The Department of State is in accord with the view of the Foreign Operations Administration, as mentioned orally by you, that there does not at present appear to be basis for a surplus wheat transaction with Peru in connection with the stabilization problem.

Sincerely yours, ROBERT F. WOODWARD

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of South American Affairs (Atwood) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 13, 1954.

Subject: The Haya de la Torre Visa Case[2]

On the basis of available information it appears that if Haya de la Torre applies for admission into the United States he will seek a non-immigrant visa as a representative of the International League for the Rights of Man, a non-governmental organization affiliated with UN–ECOSOC. Such a visa would have to be affixed to a Peruvian passport or some other document valid for a period of six months beyond the date of his anticipated departure from the United States and authorizing his re-entry into his own country or into another country (Section 101(a) 30 Immigration and Nationality Act[3]). In January 1949 the Department instructed Embassy Lima by telegram that it had no objection to the admission of Haya to the United States. Since then, the passage of the Immigration and Nationality Act would require a re-evaluation of the case.

---

[1] Drafted by Edgar L. McGinnis, Jr. and Milton Barall of the Office of South American Affairs.

[2] Víctor Raúl Haya de la Torre, a Peruvian political leader, had sought political asylum in the Colombian Embassy at Lima in January 1949. The Peruvian Government refused to grant him safe conduct to leave Peru until March 1954, whereupon he departed for Mexico.

[3] Public Law 414, approved June 27, 1952; for text, see 66 Stat. 163.

If he applies, we would have to determine whether his admission into the United States would be inimical to our interest as defined by Sections 212 (a) 26, 27, 28, 29 of the Immigration and Nationality Act. Aside from those sections dealing with members of totalitarian organizations, the language of the Act would appear to be sufficiently broad to refuse admission to anyone whose presence here would be prejudicial to public interest or endanger our welfare. Thus, if we determine to keep Haya out of the country, it could apparently be accomplished without difficulty.

Though there has been no formal request that the United States refuse a visa, the Peruvian Embassy here is anxious to keep Haya outside the United States and away from the sounding-board of the United Nations because of anticipated attacks upon the Odría administration. Hence his admission would probably complicate our relations with Peru and, to a limited degree, might be prejudicial to our national interest. On the other hand, if we refuse admission to Haya, there could most likely be widespread adverse repercussions in Latin America from democratic and liberal elements in the area. The communists, and others who seek political power by attacking the United States, would probably argue that the United States is always lined up on the side of the dictators and almost never with so-called "popular" causes. Moreover, the Department could expect attacks by influential press organs in the United States, including the New York Times and the Washington Post and Times Herald, labor organizations, and organizations and groups concerned with the preservation of civil liberties.

The ICFTU, its Western Hemisphere affiliate ORIT, and the AFL and CIO have long been interested in Haya. The ORIT and AFL have frequently indicated publicly their support for him during his asylum in the Colombian Embassy in Lima. Haya consistently assisted the anti-communist labor groups when he was a powerful political force in Peru and it was through his invitation that ORIT's founding convention was held in Lima in 1948.

While a review of the files indicates that Haya was probably influenced by both communist and fascist ideology in formulating the APRA's program in the 1920's, it does not appear that APRA is a communist-dominated organization or that Haya is a communist or a fellow traveler. Some of the principles espoused by APRA such as land reform, anti-clericalism and concern for the Indian have perhaps made APRA vulnerable to charges that it is Communist influenced. However, even in the early days, there were ideological differences between APRA and the Communists. Haya has publicly spoken out against communism. The latest information regarding Haya's political views appears in the May 3, 1954, issue of Life (page 164) where he says inter alia that "I believe that democracy and capitalism offer the surest road toward a solution of the world's problems, even though capitalism still has its faults."

Haya's admission into the United States appears to be more of a public-relations problem than one involving basic security issues. While Haya may be a demagogue and a political opportunist, and may have been more interested in seizing power than in securing the reforms he advocated, it would be almost inconceivable that he should engage in activities within the United States which would jeopardize our security. After study of the files and evaluation of the effect on relations with other countries, OSA is of the opinion that greater damage would be done to the United States if Haya were refused a visa than if he were admitted.

On the basis of the information which has been available to OSA thus far, it does not appear that Haya is inadmissible, nor that the issuance of a visa would cause irreparable damage to our relations in Latin America.

Recommendation:

It is requested that you approve, from the political point of view, the granting of a visa to Haya de la Torre.[4]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 30, 1954.

Subject: Joint Private U.S. Government Financing of the Toquepala Copper Project in Peru.

Discussion:

On April 14, 1953 the American Smelting and Refining Company presented a proposal to the Export-Import Bank for a loan of $120 million to finance a $168 million development of the Toquepala copper mine in southern Peru. It was contemplated that $60 million of the loan would be from the defense funds and $60 million from the Eximbank's own funds.

[1] Drafted by Director of the Office of South American Affairs Atwood; concurred in by Assistant Secretary Waugh.

On July 7, 1954 the American Smelting and Refining Company submitted new data which represent a sharp reduction in the Government participation and a corresponding increase in the capital to be provided from private sources.[2] Roughly the new proposal amounts to private capital in the amount of approximately $98 million and Eximbank loans and capital totalling approximately $98 million.

This latter figure is very close to the recommendations currently being made by the Eximbank staff which contemplate Eximbank loans and guarantees totalling $90 million. (Tab A).[3]

I should like to stress the political importance of such a large private investment and especially when it is being made in a country that has handled its economy in a manner thoroughly in keeping with U.S. principles. I should also like to stress the significance that the approval of this project would have in clarifying U.S. principles and objectives prior to the Rio Economic Conference.[4]

We and the Commerce Department have strongly favored the development of Toquepala and it is believed that FOA has a similar opinion. I also understand that the Office of Defense Mobilization still views the Toquepala Copper Project as very important for the United States and one which it hoped could be brought into production in spite of the absence of defense funds for the purpose.

Mr. Brownell,[5] President of the American Smelting and Refining Company, will probably discuss and urge approval of this project with Secretary Humphrey. (The Treasury Department has thus far not signified its approval.) I hope that Mr. Brownell will be able to persuade Mr. Humphrey of the wisdom of the U.S. helping to finance this project. In the meantime the project will continue to be considered at the Eximbank.

Recommendation:

While I hope the above measures will be adequate to obtain approval for this project, I recommend that you authorize me to continue support of this project, including an approach by you or possibly Mr. Hoover if this is felt necessary.[6]

---

823.246/7–2154: Instruction

The Acting Secretary of State to the Embassy in Peru[1]

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, September 8, 1954.

Subject: Declaration on Maritime Zones

A–41. While the Department appreciates the force of the views set forth in the Embassy's despatch No. 40 of July 21, 1954,[2] and would not desire to take any action which would affect adversely the situation of American fishing interests operating off the coast of Peru, nevertheless, it feels that this Government's position must be made clear to the Peruvian Government.

As the Embassy is aware, the Department desires if possible to have the draft articles on the continental shelf recommended by the International Law Commission of the United Nations considered at the 10th General Assembly. Furthermore, the Organization of American States is planning a conference for the consideration of these and related matters in 1955.

At the instance of the United States fishing industry, the last Congress passed a law[3] to reimburse American fishermen for losses sustained through the imposition of fines for fishing in areas claimed by foreign countries as territorial waters, but which claims are not recognized by the United States. Members of the Congress have indicated, in connection with this legislation and at other times, their unmistakable interest in the maintenance by this Government, in all appropriate ways, of its traditional position with respect to the freedom of the high seas.

In view of the above, the Department considers that the legal position of this Government must be brought to the attention of the Peruvian Government, and that a routine reservation of rights is inadequate. However, the time and manner in which this should be done are left to the discretion of the Embassy, which is authorized to act separately and at such time and in such manner as to remove, as far as possible, implications of coordinated United States-British pressure,

[1] Drafted by Assistant Legal Adviser for European Affairs Raymund T. Yingling.

[2] In the referenced despatch, the Embassy reported that the Peruvian Government had recently reaffirmed its claim of 200-mile territorial waters and was currently preparing to take additional steps to strengthen the claim. It further stated that a strong protest by the United States in coordination with the British Government, which the Department was considering, raised the possibility of a "distinctly unfavorable Peruvian reaction." Such a protest was likely to result in a stiffening of the Peruvian position and inspire Peru to concert with other Latin American governments making similar claims, which "in turn could adversely affect the hopes evidently entertained by United States fishing interests of obtaining needed port privileges and other concessions in Peru." The Embassy suggested that the Department consider a separate, moderately-worded note reserving U.S. rights. (823.246/7–2154)

[3] Apparent reference to "An act to protect the rights of vessels of the United States on the high seas and in territorial waters of foreign countries" (Public Law 680), approved Aug. 27, 1954; for text, see 68 Stat. 883.

but the Embassy is not to take any action which will in any sense tend to mitigate against the effectiveness of the British approach, as it is the policy of the two Governments, based on an informal understanding, to consult together and to take such action as is possible to prevent encroachments on the freedom of the seas.

In accordance with the foregoing the Embassy may substitute for the note enclosed with the Department's instruction No. A–6 of July 9, 1954,[4] a note substantially along the following lines. The Embassy's note should make clear the disappointment of this Government that despite its previous indication of nonrecognition of the Peruvian claim to sovereignty over the waters off the coast of Peru to a distance seaward of 200 marine miles, the Peruvian Government has signed at Santiago on August 18, 1952, the Declaration Regarding Maritime Zones adopted by delegates of Chile, Ecuador and Peru in conference, which declaration reiterates the previous Peruvian claim and further purports to lay the basis for the regulation of fishing and whaling in the maritime zone defined.

The position of Peru is not only contrary to the position of the United States as contained in Section 3 of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, enacted on August 7, 1953,[5] but is also inconsistent with the Articles on the continental shelf adopted by the International Law Commission of the United Nations at its Fifth Session, which articles the United States regards as generally expressive of international law. The Peruvian claims to jurisdiction over great areas of the high seas, which find little support elsewhere, cannot be recognized by the United States, which considers that under international law there is no obligation to recognize claims to territorial waters in excess of three miles from low-water mark on the shore.

While the United States recognizes that the conservation of the natural resources in the high seas, outside the limits of territorial waters, may be a legitimate interest of the coastal state, it feels that conservation measures must be taken in concert with the other parties to which they are intended to apply, and that they are not a matter for unilateral determination by the coastal state.

The Government of the United States must, therefore, reserve all of its rights in the event the Peruvian Government should attempt to implement the principles set forth in the declaration of Santiago under reference.[6]

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Woodward) to the Under Secretary of State (Hoover)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 4, 1954.

Subject: Toquepala Loan

Discussion:

In order to send Mr. Holland the latest information concerning the consideration by the Eximbank of the Toquepala loan, I asked General Edgerton[1] on October 3 whether the Eximbank expected soon to make a specific recommendation to the National Advisory Council concerning the action to be taken on the loan application. General Edgerton, who had implied on September 23 that he considered the Eximbank to have sufficient information upon which to complete its study and make a firm recommendation, now said that he was in doubt concerning the sense of the NAC discussion on September 22, in which you took part. I told General Edgerton that I had the distinct impression that it was the consensus that the loan could be made, if the higher figures for the total amount of United States exports of goods and services involved—stated to be over $100 million—should prove to be accurate estimates. I added, however, that I believed you considered it would be desirable to have some further discussion with the American Smelting and Refining representatives concerning the identity, and possibly the amount, of private participation other than their own.

The Bank does not appear to be moving ahead with its study of the application. If the application is to be approved, it is important that action be taken within the next few weeks in order to give an outstanding example of the use of the Eximbank in economic development, prior to the Rio Meeting of Economic and Finance Ministers.

General Edgerton made the general remark that the Eximbank had already given a tentative commitment to participate in the venture to the extent of $60 million and that he thought, after further consideration, the Bank might find it possible to go substantially higher.

On the evening of October 3, by coincidence, I happened to be talking with Mr. Robert Guggenheim, recently-returned Ambassador to Portugal, and he mentioned on his own initiative that the Kennecott Company and A S & R are joining together in financing the Toquepala project. This may indicate that the minority private investors already lined up by A S & R are principally the Kennecott Company. If A S & R has already solicited participation from Kennecott, this might satisfy Secretary Humphrey, who expressed the view on September 22 that other large United States copper companies might be willing to provide a large part of the capital which is being requested from the Eximbank.

Recommendations:

That you authorize me to make arrangements for Mr. Brownell of A S & R to come to see you, and to see General Edgerton subsequently, "in order to clarify certain points" with respect to the loan application.

That you ask Mr. Brownell who the other prospective private investors are, and form your own opinion as to whether A S & R should be expected to obtain larger private participation.

That you then express your views to General Edgerton, and possibly also to Mr. Humphrey, in order to encourage the Eximbank to make a specific recommendation on the loan application.

Telephone Report

Date and time of call—2:45 pm October 8, 1954
Participants: Mr. Hoover and General Edgerton of Eximbank
Subject: Toquepala loan.

Abstract of conversation: In response to Mr. Hoover's query about the status of the Toquepala loan, Gen. Edgerton stated that the Eximbank still has it on hand under advisement of the Treasury people and that he hasn't made any final commitment. The new modifications have been under study and the project is ready for the Executive Committee to work on now. A day or two ago the General had corrected a misunderstanding about total amount of dollar expenditures which now stand at $105 M. for supplies, services at $20 M. and total construction costs $180 M., bringing total probable requirements to $224 M. The minimum the bank would lend would be $60 M. and could probably stretch it to $75. His Board members are going to be away for a while but the General expected that the next week or two would bring the problem to a firm position. Mr. Hoover elicited from him the promise to move a little more quickly.

Gen. Edgerton added that they would be influenced by what they felt was the attitude of NAC and that the Department should not get involved to the extent that the Toquepala people got the idea that they are making their sale in the Department.

Memorandum by Charles W. Kempter of the Lend-Lease and Surplus Property Staff to Edgar L. McGinnis, Jr. of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 10, 1954.

Subject: Peru—Settlement of Lend-Lease Obligation.

On the basis of the several recent conversations held within ARA with the Peruvian Ambassador in connection with the long pending completion of the Lend-Lease Settlement Arrangement and to my recent talks with Messrs. Welch, Belton, Corliss, and you on the same matter, I have prepared a "position paper" which outlines the course taken in our negotiations since 1948 with the Peruvians, reviews certain factors which have to be considered at this stage and provides an expression of LL's views covering the over-all situation. Two copies are attached in case you may wish to send one to our Embassy, Lima.

In writing this paper strict adherence to facts high-lighted by the records may put a friendly nation in an unfavorable light. There has been no intention to derogate but simply to point up situations as they actually occurred and to reflect interpretations of those situations arrived at both in and out of the Department. Together our comments may contribute to a better appreciation of things which, otherwise, could very easily be misconstrued.

As you know, it is LL's delegated responsibility to see that lend-lease accounts are settled in a form satisfactorily guaranteeing eventual payment. It is hoped that the present visits of Mr. Holland and Ambassador Berckemeyer to Lima, and the latter's promise to again try to convince President Odria of the desirability of settling the lend-lease debt, will bear fruit,—a variety which will be found palatable to the Department. If that comes to pass, the attached paper will serve as nothing more than as a documentary review of the case. Should the contrary transpire, or should counter proposals advanced by Peru be unrealistic, it may be helpful to all concerned in the matter since, of course, there will have to be a prompt resumption of negotiations in which LL will wish to be represented.

PERU—POSITION PAPER ON LEND-LEASE OBLIGATION

Origin of Program.

Under the authority of the Act of March 11, 1941,[1] there was signed in Washington on March 11, 1942, by the United States and Peru, a formal Lend-Lease Agreement.[2] Under its terms the United States agreed to furnish Peru, under stipulated conditions, defense aid (no civilian) having a cost value to the United States of not more than $29 million. A discount of 58.62% against the value of the aid furnished was extended to Peru and payments were scheduled over a period of years with a final payment due on March 1, 1948.

Implementation of the Lend-Lease Program.

Under the Lend-Lease Agreement of March 11, 1942, (generally known as the "Treaty Agreement") aid was furnished at a cost to the United States Government of $16,633,423.50 upon which Peru was charged at 41.38% of that cost or $6,882,910.64. During the late war years Peru deposited in a Lima bank soles which eventually were converted to dollars and a payment of $4 million thus was made on "treaty account" leaving due $2,882,910.64.

Other program accounts were:

A Pipeline Account (undelivered lend-lease materials on V–J Day) representing a cost value of $36,122.30. Under an exchange of letters between the Department (OFLC) and the Peruvian Embassy it was agreed that these goods would be delivered and charged for as though they were within the "treaty account". As a result Peru was billed in the sum of $14,947.41 and, in spite of the fact that payment was promised within a period of 60 days, the account remains long past due.

Cash Accounts representing an aggregate value of $615,762.69 based upon their cost to the United States were facilitated in order that Peru might acquire needed equipment which was not eligible under "treaty terms". These accounts were repayable at full value (100%) and a total amount of $542,878.74 has been repaid leaving a net sum still due of $72,883.95. (Actual figures show $76,647.84 as due and a credit item of $3,763.89.)

A Ships' Account covered the disposal of 12 ships furnished under lend-lease (Charter Party). Valued at $1,381,000 these ships were offered to and purchased for cash by Peru at a price of $68,000 or at 4.9% of value. (Equivalent to a discount of over 95%.)

Negotiations Undertaken for a Settlement

As stated, the Lend-Lease Agreement with Peru provided for the full and final payment of the "treaty account" by March 1, 1948. Although reminded both through billings and discreet references made

*The fiscal reports published in the Reports to Congress show total defense aid to Peru as $18,916,471.85. The difference is due to additional charges which were reported after the final billing covering the "treaty account" was sent to the Embassy of Peru. In other words, Peru received equipment having a value of approximately $250,000 for which, because of slow reportings by the United States Services, no charge was levied against the account figures which were established as a settlement base.

Viewed from another angle, Peru received lend-lease aid (Cash Accounts excepted) valued at an aggregate of $18,300,709.16 for which a total charge of only $6,965,858.05 was made, or 38% of cost to the United States of the aid furnished. [Footnote in the source text.]

by the Department that account, as well as the pipeline and cash accounts, remained unsettled at the date set for payment and became "past-due".

Formal negotiations began on March 3, 1948, when Ambassador Ferreyros was asked to come in for a preliminary discussion. During 1948 and 1949 a total of 10 meetings were held with various Peruvian Government officials, a number of formal notes were sent to the Peruvian Embassy and briefing talks were held with Ambassador Tittmann during a visit to Washington.

Among the Peruvian officials with whom discussions were held in the course of the negotiations were Ambassador Berckemeyer who succeeded Ambassador Ferreyros, Senor Pedro Beltran, then President of the Central Reserve Bank of Peru, Senor Foley,[3] Peruvian Comptroller General, and a number of Embassy aides including Arturo Garcia and Carlos Gibson, Secretaries of Embassy. On the other side, in addition to talks with our Ambassador, detailed discussions were held with Charles Bridgett, Commercial Attaché at Embassy, Lima, and with Gene Gilmore who succeeded him in looking after our interest vis-à-vis the Peruvian Government offices in Lima.

The Peruvian reaction in almost every instance seemed to follow a predetermined formula or pattern. In our talks they generally responded evasively, often indulging in overt inconsistencies. Promises were made but never kept. Even our formal notes to the Ambassador remained unanswered until the Embassy was "needled" into action. Ambassador Berckemeyer, in his personal reactions, was mercurial and frequently bored. While professing to be cooperative at one time, he was cool and admittedly disinterested at others. He confessed to disappointment in his Government and said that, despite his efforts to get a settlement made, he was left "in the air" without a sense of direction.

The series of talks held in 1948 and 1949 were continued at intervals throughout the ensuing years. For political and economic reasons there were periods of inactivity by the Department but it had been made clear to Peru that the United States expected these war time obligations to be settled and paid. The responsibilities vested in the Department are clearly defined but, keeping within the terms of reference, every effort was made to be lenient and considerate in our efforts to reach a mutual settlement formula.

Throughout the earlier negotiations there was strong insistence by Peru that the United States take soles and not dollars as a medium of payment. Unfortunately both the Government of Peru and our Embassy seemed to have some misconception concerning the policy limitations placed on the Department in respect of foreign currency acquisitions. That policy, in brief, limits the acquisition of such currencies to actual needs of the United States in a given country. The accumulation of foreign currencies for payment's sake constitutes a speculative risk and, as such, is almost invariably avoided.

Attempts made to limit soles acquisitions to the defrayment of operating expenses of the Embassy and to the financing of a buildings program failed of realization as Peru did not wish to pay any part of the lend-lease balance in dollars. (Later Peru, itself, revived the buildings program matter but it was then too late for FBO appropriations had been used up or committed and prospects for new funds were almost negligible.) The course of these talks was interspersed with requests for old documents and copies of fiscal data which already had been furnished long before.

In a gesture of "cooperation", the motive for which is not clear, Peru made an "offer" to settle the lend-lease obligations by making small monthly soles deposits in a Lima bank over a period of time almost too fantastic to calculate. Then, on March 5, 1952, our Embassy, in its despatch No. 923 of March 3, 1952,[4] transmitted to the Department a new settlement proposal made by Finance Minister Dasso suggesting 6 annual payments, the last to be in 1957, (or payments on a semi-annual basis if desired) in soles but with the option reserved by Peru to pay dollars instead of soles whenever it felt like doing so! Of course, it wasn't possible to consider such terms and the discussions continued.

Meanwhile the Department was informed by one of its representatives that the Klein Mission,[5] then in Lima, had strongly urged President Odria to expedite a settlement of the lend-lease debt along the lines suggested by the Department. The Mission viewed the delinquent status of the accounts as being detrimental to Peru's credit standing throughout the world. Odria believed that Peru's wartime contribution to the Allies' cause was sufficient repayment for the defense aid Peru had received from the United States and apparently thought that dilatory tactics would eventually lead to the "forgiveness" of the obligation!

During 1952, while the Government of Peru was completing negotiations for resuming service on its government and government-guaranteed debt, long in default to American and British bondholders, overtures were made to both the EXIM Bank and the World Bank for loans. In spite of the fact that some small financial aid was given by the World Bank for certain specific purposes there was strong indication that the continuing default of the lend-lease obligation was considered by the Bank in reviewing loan requests in the fact that inquiries were made of the Department regarding the lend-lease situation. Again, a Secretary of the Peruvian Embassy informed us that, because the lend-lease matter hadn't been taken care of, the EXIM Bank had given the Peruvians the brush-off! Concurrently, rumors reached us that Peru was endeavoring to buy, either from the United States or an European country, a number of jet and other type aircraft on credit.

The general situation was discussed at intra-Departmental meetings and the results communicated to our Mission which, in turn, renewed its representations vis-à-vis the Peruvian Government. In a communication dated April 28, 1952,[6] the Embassy, Lima, informed the Department of the acceptance by Peru of a United States payments formula calling for 10 semi-annual installments of about $300,000 each, the first ($244,831.63) to be paid June 30, 1952, and the last ($300,000) to be paid on or before December 31, 1956. All payments were to be in dollars but with the United States holding the option to take enough soles to defray any and all expenses of the United States in Peru. Procedures covering exchange rates and interest on delinquent payments were defined. It is interesting to note that, even before receiving Peru's acceptance of these terms, information was received that funds for the first payments already had been approved and appropriated by the Peruvian Congress. (As the settlement papers continue unsigned it may be assumed that those funds were diverted to other channels.)

On the strength of Peru's definite acceptance of the United States settlement terms there was prepared and sent to the Mission on May 13, 1952, an instruction[6] under cover of which there were transmitted drafts of notes to be signed by our Ambassador, acting for the Department, and the Peruvian Government. Inasmuch as, at one time, Finance Minister Dasso, had himself suggested that a two year settlement would be, in his opinion, a reasonable one, the Department believed that the accepted terms would elicit an appreciative reaction from the Peruvian Government.

Again there followed a series of delays of varying sorts occasioned, in part, by visits made to the United States by Minister Dasso and Comptroller General Foley. Assurances were abundant that the settlement documents would be signed when both had returned to their official duties in Peru. However, it was soon reported that, due to failing health, Dasso was resigning. It did not improve the prospects for the lend-lease settlement when there was named as his successor Peru's Ambassador to Argentina, Romero.[7] Whereas Dasso, a pro-American, had exerted his best effort to get a settlement finalized, Romero—said to be anti-American in his sentiments—was ready to adopt President Odria's thesis that Peru owed the United States nothing on World War II account.

Minister Romero, during his incumbency, may have felt encouraged to take this opposing position as a matter of expediency. It was a simple matter to view the consistently friendly consideration shown by the United States and even the final comparatively lenient settlement terms as a mark of "softness" on our part,—an imaginary weakness inviting requests for still further concessions in those terms. That thinking may have been abetted by the fact that the Department had, at times, closed its eyes to purchases of military equipment in the United States and abroad by Peru notwithstanding the fact that such practices were contrary to the spirit of a long-standing policy. At any rate, our objectives, in the post-Dasso period, became progressively less promising of attainment.

On September 30, 1954, this matter remains exactly as it was when the negotiations were started on March 3, 1948. Only one constructive step, and that of a minor nature, has been taken. When it was found that final accounting of Peru's interim-arms program would show a moderate refund due that country it was agreed that that money, instead of being returned, would be sequestered in a Treasury Department account and would be credited as part payment of the first scheduled installment concurrently with the receipt of the balance of that installment from Peru in dollars. This is covered in the terms of the settlement notes.

The story throughout 1953 and the earlier part of this year has been almost a repetition of 1952 and earlier years. Energetic representations by our Mission, in an effort to bring matters to a conclusion, have been unproductive. Another fairly long period of inaction was considered advisable on account of the situation in Guatemala.

Hoping that the current visit of Secretary Holland to the South American countries might create an atmosphere favorable to the mention of the lend-lease matter in Peru he was provided by OSA with briefing notes for that purpose. Whether or not related, some encouragement may be taken from the recent series of conversations held with Ambassador Berckemeyer by ARA officers. It is regretted that the Ambassador's talks with President Odria in Lima last August resulted only in an expression of hope that those settlement terms already accepted by Peru would be revised so that payments would be extended, more local currency taken and the principal amount of the obligation written down.

Even with a very deep sense of understanding of the importance of fostering friendly relations with all of the other American republics it is difficult to find rationalization in Peru's aspirations in respect of the lend-lease indebtedness. The negotiations since 1948 have been conducted by the Department with patient understanding and a degree of leniency never accorded so extensively to other Latin countries with which settlements have been made and all of the others have settled their "treaty" accounts leaving Peru the sole exception. (Ecuador and Bolivia owe moderate balances on their "contingent" lend-lease accounts.)

The Department's standing policy has been to maintain the integrity of international agreements and to insist, after due consideration of political and economic factors, that obligations assumed under such agreements be discharged in accordance with their terms. Furthermore, any action taken with respect to Peru would, in this instance, have to be viewed in the light of the non-discriminatory treatment already applied in reaching settlements with other American republics. Any question of writing down the Peruvian debt would be contrary to the Department's past practice and probably would involve the winning over of the Treasury Department and consultations with the Bureau of the Budget, the Comptroller General and possibly even the Congress. It may be desirable to find other means than debt reduction to assist a friendly country financially or economically.

Department Circular No. 25 of May 15, 1953, made mandatory the securing of the approval of the Secretary of State to any new Executive Agreement. Such approval was given to the Peru Settlement Arrangement on the basis of the draft notes prepared within the Department and sent to the Mission in Lima for formal signature. Any relaxation in the terms would necessitate again bringing the matter before the Secretary with supporting argument.

Thinking that perhaps a way might be found, without changing a single word of the proposed settlement notes (except payment dates), by means of which the Department might partially alleviate Peru's concern over the foreign currency angle, an effort has been made to canvass other offices in order to determine, if possible, their projected needs for Peruvian soles so that, if the idea were found acceptable to all concerned, the Department might privately inform the Government of Peru of the minimum number of soles it would be prepared to draw down each year of the life of the payments schedule. The results have not been encouraging. Due to a lack of appropriated money some earlier plans for programs in Peru are in suspense with the result that the Department could not now safely assume a responsibility to draw soles for anything other than to defray the normal average operating expenses of the Embassy in Lima which represent a minimum requirement of about $150,000 a year after allowing for consular fees and other normal income.

Perhaps unfortunately, it seems necessary to discard such thinking for, according to present indications, a transaction between Peru and the United States involving wheat appears to be coming to a head. If consummated there will accrue to the United States a vast supply of soles sufficient, if not used for some other directed purpose, to satisfy any and all needs of this Government for soles for a long time to come. In the meantime, and until Peru is ready to establish with the IMF a par value for the sol, the Department would be even less disposed than ever to engage in a commitment to take soles on lend-lease account.

In a conversation held on September 27, 1954,[8] Ambassador Berckemeyer stressed the fact that his Government regarded the lend-lease debt as a valid obligation. As he was returning to Lima the next day he would take the matter up with President Odria again in the hope that he would be authorized to offer a settlement with payments to begin in 18 months or earlier and in dollars.

While the Department is constrained to stand upon the status quo of the settlement terms consideration would, of course, be given to a rational request for a modest and reasonable modification of the terms if it were found that to grant them would be in our national interest.

Good will should not be unilateral. Where it exists and people strive earnestly and realistically, a way usually can be found, with honor and fairness, to compose differences in a constructive and statesmanlike spirit.[9]

The Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs (Nolting) to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration (Stassen)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 22, 1954.

DEAR MR. STASSEN: I have been informed that the Government of Peru has requested that it be sold United States Air Force equipment, at a price of approximately $6 million, on terms which would permit payment by installments over a three year period, as provided for in Section 106, Public Law 665, approved August 26, 1954.[2]

The Department of State is of the opinion that the present Peruvian Government has a satisfactory record of making payments on loans extended by United States Government lending institutions, that it is financially able to assume an obligation of $6 million and that it would comply with the terms of an agreement providing for payment of that amount by installments over a three year period. Although the Government of Peru is at present in arrears in payments on its lend-lease account, the Department of State has been advised by the Peruvian Government that Peru is prepared to initiate payments, beginning June 30, 1955, looking toward the liquidation within five years of that debt.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Spencer; cleared by Messrs. Holland, Woodward, and Atwood.

[2] Reference is to the Mutual Security Act of 1954; for text, see 68 Stat. 832.

The Department of State approves the sale to Peru of military equipment in the amount of approximately $6 million on credit terms and understands that the Defense Department favors the sale for important military reasons. The Department of State believes that other Latin American governments may request the purchase of military equipment on credit terms during the present fiscal year and assumes that it will be possible to offer them credit, provided that:

(1) the equipment can be made available for sale by the Service Departments; (2) it is determined politically and militarily desirable to comply with the request; and (3) from the economic point of view, taking into account the credit standing of the other government, the extension of credit is considered desirable and justifiable.

Sincerely yours, FREDERICK E. NOLTING, JR.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 25, 1954.

Subject: Toquepala Project.

Problem:

Views to be expressed by the Department in the discussion of the Toquepala copper project in the NAC meeting of October 26.

Discussion:

The Department has continued to press for a favorable decision on the financing of the Toquepala project in Peru. It has stated that it would be very salutary if a large private investment offering substantial benefits to Peru could be begun. Peru, at a time when nationalistic feeling is rising in Latin America, has been outstanding in its treatment of foreign private investment and, in particular, has adopted a mining code unusually favorable to investments of that nature (Tab A[2]). It is believed that the institution of such a development as Toquepala would create a favorable impression at the Rio Economic Conference.

At the time this project was considered by the Defense Mobilization Board, experts in that Agency reached a conclusion that the long-run benefits of a new source of supply of copper in this hemisphere would be of importance to the U.S. It would further diversify our sources of supply in this hemisphere and it would improve our bargaining position vis-à-vis Chile (Tab B).

The only real "limitation" upon the authority of the Bank to finance this project is that of avoiding competition with private capital. A corollary of this "limitation" is that the Bank should in its loans supplement and encourage private capital (Tab C). The present proposal of A.S.&R. contemplates the participation by other partners of $46 million, slightly less than the $50 million of equity capital being supplied by A.S.&R. (Tab D) An increase in the amount of equity capital to be supplied by other partners would place A.S.&R. in a minority position, which it wishes to avoid. The inclusion of Kennecott and Anaconda raises two additional problems for A.S.&R.: (1) both have interests in Chile which might make their participation unacceptable to the Peruvian Government and (2) a combination of such companies in this project may have anti-trust implications.

The Export-Import Bank is prepared to recommend a $90 million loan at 6% for this project. A.S.&R. has stated to both the Bank and Treasury that it would not wish to proceed with this project with less than $90 million of financial assistance from the Government. There are attached the most recent formal credit applications to the Bank by A.S.&R. and the minutes of the last NAC meeting on Toquepala attended by yourself, General Smith and others (Tabs E and F).

Recommendation:

That the Department support for reasons of foreign policy and long-run need for copper the proposed extension of $90 million of credit assistance to the Toquepala project by the Export-Import Bank.[3]

The Chairman asked General Edgerton to outline the Export-Import Bank's thinking on the financing of the Toquepala Copper project. General Edgerton said that the application for Bank financing was for approximately $100 million on a $205 million project. The Bank felt that the minimum Bank financing which would permit the project to go forward would be approximately $90 million. On this assumption, total financing for the project would be as follows:

Millions of dollars
97	Equity
90	Export-Import Bank loan
10	Other loans

Given the estimate that the project would be self-liquidating in 12 or 13 years at a 20-cent per pound price for copper, he felt that the following terms would be appropriate. On the interest rate, the NAC formula would work out at a shade less than 5½ percent, but he believed that 6 percent might be reasonable, in view of the favorable prospects of the project. The Bank would be prepared to take notes for the interest payments for the period of construction. Repayment of principal would be made in equal installments over 12 years following the construction period. Assuming the construction period were 5 years, this would make the loan repayable in 17 years.

General Edgerton said that he had discussed with the applicant for the loan making a guarantee of completion of the project a condition of Bank financing. He had also discussed inclusion of an acceleration clause on repayment of principal in the event of an increase in the price of copper.

General Edgerton indicated that the Bank did not expect to charge a commitment fee in this case and generally did not do so.

Secretary Humphrey suggested that a guarantee that the borrower would complete the project was the most important provision. He stated that in operations of this kind actual costs usually run substantially in excess of the initial estimates. Secretary Weeks asked General Edgerton what kind of a guaranty had been discussed with the applicant for the loan. General Edgerton replied that he had not discussed the precise way in which such a guaranty might be expressed in the loan contract but that the general principle had been reviewed. He said that the applicant for the loan had not indicated whether such a guaranty would be an acceptable condition. Following some further discussion of terms, Secretary Humphrey suggested that if the loan were made the terms might be as follows: (1) Export-Import Bank would lend up to $100 million participating in the financing on a 50–50 basis; (2) the Bank's loan would be the senior obligation of the borrower; (3) the borrower would be required to guarantee completion of the project to the Bank; (4) repayment of principal would begin 5 years after the loan and be made over a 15-year period; and (5) interest would accrue from the date or dates of disbursement by the Bank and be payable with the installments on principal.

Secretary Humphrey stated that approval of this project with financing on a 50–50 basis might set a precedent for the financing of a wide range of projects of a similar nature with public funds and discourage private financing. The proposal thus raised major policy issues. In considering some of the issues raised by this and similar projects, the Council discussed briefly the question of the use of public funds to finance competitive enterprise abroad. The Council also discussed the question of whether Export-Import Bank financing of US enterprises abroad tended to discourage expropriation by foreign governments.

Mr. Hoover agreed with Secretary Humphrey that the Toquepala proposal raised some far-reaching issues, but felt that a policy of making loans of this kind would be better than a "give-away" program in South America. Mr. Holland expressed similar views. Mr. Hoover then read from the NSC decision of September 2 with respect to lending in Latin America.[1] Secretary Humphrey stated that this policy would be reconsidered in the Security Council. Mr. Hoover also referred to the ad hoc committee on Southeast Asian policy, of which he had been appointed Chairman, where far-reaching questions of foreign economic policy would have to be considered.

Secretary Humphrey said that there were a great number of important policy matters being considered by a variety of committees. He said that Mr. Dodge was working on a reorganization of the Executive Branch in the field of foreign economic policy[2] which should help centralize responsibility for these matters.

It was agreed with respect to the possible loan for the Toquepala Copper project General Edgerton would submit a proposal to the Council along the lines indicated by Secretary Humphrey above. The Chairman stated that because of the policy considerations raised, he proposed that the matter be discussed with the President[3] before a final decison was made.[4]

Memorandum of Conversation, by John K. Havemeyer of the Office of South American Affairs

Subject: Proposed Negotiations for an Agreement to Supply Grant Aid to Uruguay under the Mutual Security Act—1951[2]

Participants: Ambassador of Uruguay, Mr. Mora
Assistant Secretary Miller
AR—Mr. Jamison
OSA—Mr. Havemeyer

Ambassador Mora called on Mr. Miller by appointment to discuss the subject. He explained that he had received a letter[3] from the Uruguayan Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Jimenez de Arechaga, stating that the Foreign Minister[4] had not taken any action with respect to initiating talks[5] under the MSA because the Foreign Minister did not wish negotiations to start and then have a change of Government on March 1[6] which would require bringing the Herrerista Party into the negotiations. The Ambassador reiterated his hope that his Government would be able to discuss these negotiations and have them carried through to satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. Miller confirmed the fact that conversations could begin any time prior to March 15. He continued that there were many administrative details which must be accomplished after an agreement is reached and funds appropriated for this fiscal year must be committed prior to July 1. He stated that we hoped to obtain additional ap-

Mr. Miller assured Ambassador Mora that he hoped Uruguay could enter into this program, and if negotiations do not take place it will make no difference in the relations between our two countries.[7]

[7] In telegram 345, from Montevideo, dated Mar. 13, 1952, Ambassador Roddan informed the Department that the Uruguayan Government on Mar. 7 had decided to authorize the initiation of conversations with representatives of the United States to consider the possibility of receiving aid under the provisions of the Mutual Security Act of 1951 (733.5 MSP/3–1352). The conversations were subsequently set to open on Mar. 31, 1952.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller) to the Ambassador in Uruguay (Roddan)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 24, 1952.

DEAR ED:

[Here follow personal comments.]

The new government has certainly done well so far in its principal tests. In addition to suppressing the Peace Congress and going along with the bilateral military conversations, its action in suppressing the public health strike seems adequately vigorous.

[Here follow additional personal remarks, references to Cuba, and to the book by Havelock Ellis entitled The Soul of Spain.]

I have been gravely concerned with your remarks about the wool situation.[1] The gravity of my concern arises not simply from what you say but from the fact that on top of all this the Treasury Department is seriously considering the imposition of countervailing duties on wool tops from Argentina and Uruguay on the theory that the multiple

[1] In his letter to Assistant Secretary Miller, dated Mar. 17, 1952, Ambassador Roddan stated in part the following: "Uruguay is definitely feeling the pinch caused by failure to dispose of the wool crop and it may have serious consequences. The Foreign Minister mentioned the wool problem, without suggesting that we take up the situation with our government. There is no doubt that Uruguay is looking toward the United States in the hope that something may be done and I wish it were possible to find an answer. However, in the present state of affairs, I do not see how our government can guarantee a high price for the world wool crop or make an exception for Uruguay. Meanwhile, only about one-fifth of the wool crop has been sold and the new crop will be coming along in a few months. The government budget is sharply unbalanced, the lack of dollars is severely felt, and wage strikes may be numerous in the next few months." (Miller files, lot 53 D 26, "Uruguay") exchange rate system in operation in those countries amounts to a bounty or subsidy. This, of course, is a highly debatable point, but the Treasury is under strong pressure from Senator O'Mahoney[2] and the wool growers, and their eagerness to get the Customs Simplification Bill[3] passed by Congress in this session makes them particularly vulnerable to this kind of pressure. We are trying desperately to hold the line but it is a difficult matter to fight on since Treasury claims that the law is mandatory. I can imagine nothing that would more seriously damage our relations with Uruguay than this or which would tend to throw them into the arms of the Argentines, much as they would hate so to be thrown. As for the Argentines, this, coming on top of our difficulties with Bolivia over tin and our current negotiations with Chile over the price of copper, would be just about the last weapon that they would need to have in their arsenal of anti-American propaganda.

I have just come from a long meeting in the Treasury Department to which I went with Willard Thorp but we encountered very stiff resistance. The matter is not yet finally settled but it is very hard to counter Treasury's arguments that a bounty or subsidy is indirectly conferred upon producers of wool tops by virtue of their enjoyment of a more favorable exchange rate than that in effect for the bulk of Uruguay's exports. We are playing for time and, at the very least, I hope that we will have a chance of discussing this in full with the Uruguayans before any final determination is made.

I hope your health will continue to be better, and again many thanks for your letter.

Please give my best to Ed Trueblood.[4]

Sincerely yours, EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Thorp) to the Secretary of State [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 1, 1952.

Subject: Treasury's Proposal to Impose Countervailing Duties on Argentine and Uruguayan Wool Tops

Problem

Section 303 of the Tariff Act of 1930,[2] the countervailing duty law, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall impose an additional duty on imports of any dutiable products upon which any country ". . . shall pay or bestow, directly or indirectly, any bounty or grant upon the manufacture or production or export . . ."

Treasury now proposes to apply the provisions of the law to a fairly extensive group of new cases. Initially, the Treasury would apply countervailing duties to wool top exports from Argentina and Uruguay, on the grounds that exporters are receiving a bounty through the operation of a system of multiple exchange rates. Simultaneously, or perhaps shortly thereafter, all other products moving from these countries at the same or more favorable rates would be subjected to countervailing duties. This would probably be followed by an examination of the various multiple exchange rate and export retention schemes in effect around the world, to determine the extent to which countervailing duties should be applied to these.

If the Treasury were to apply this new policy with restraint, its initial effects would be principally in Latin America; as nearly as we can judge, about nine countries would be involved, and the affected trade would amount to over $100,000,000. If the Treasury extended the approach to any degree, a considerably larger number of countries, and about twice as much trade, would be involved.

We recognize that the interpretation of the statute is Treasury's primary responsibility under the law. However, the interpretation Treasury now proposes adopting, an interpretation which would declare the use of multiple exchange rates in most cases to involve a bounty, is not clearly required by the law. The foreign policy implications of Treasury's proposal are so extensive as to justify intervention by the Secretary and, if need be, by the President.

Recommendation

1. It is recommended that you discuss the problem with Secretary Snyder, making the following arguments against Treasury's proposed action. (For amplification, see the latter part of the "Discussion", beginning at page 4, which has been numbered to parallel the paragraphs below.)

a. The action will profoundly disturb relations with a good many countries, particularly those in Latin America. It will increase our difficulties in obtaining their scarce materials and conflict with our objective of encouraging the development of sound processing industries.

b. The action is not an appropriate way of forcing other countries to adopt unitary rates. Our representative in the International Monetary Fund could press the case more constructively and with less "big-stick" appearance.

c. There is room for genuine doubt whether a subsidy does exist in the wool tops cases. Treasury found that none existed a year ago, though the rates were the same then. The rate structures of Argentina and Uruguay are such that these governments are making a profit on the resale of the dollars they buy from the wool-top exporters, which hardly indicates that a bounty is being paid these exporters.

d. This action will not ease the passage of the Customs Simplification Bill in its present form, as Treasury assumes. On the contrary, it is likely to kill the provisions of the bill which circumscribe the circumstances in which countervailing duties can be applied.

2. If Secretary Snyder does not agree to refrain from action in the wool tops cases on the grounds outlined above, it is recommended that you suggest both of the following steps.

a. The President should be consulted immediately on the problem with a view to obtaining the adoption of the course set out in paragraph b.

b. The Administration should approach Congressional leaders and should explain that Treasury is not prepared to impose countervailing duties in the wool tops case in view of the possibility of real doubt that a subsidy in fact exists, within the meaning of the law as it is now phrased; that Congress may wish to give a clearer indication of its intent in connection with the consideration of the Customs Simplification Act; and, if so, that Treasury and State would like to testify on the implications of the various possible policies which might be adopted.

Discussion

There are various devices which the courts, at one time or another, have ruled to be within the purview of the countervailing duty law since its prototype was first enacted in 1897. Nevertheless, Treasury has made very little use of the law, and in recent years, at least, has only applied the law in response to specific substantial complaints.

There are a good many governmental measures in effect around the world which, intentionally or not, may affect the volume and composition of countries' exports. Multiple export rates, whereby the stated local currency return per dollar of exchange earned varies according to the class of transaction, is one of these measures. Attached hereto as an Annex[3] is a table showing the countries employing multiple rate systems; also shown are countries employing other systems which might be said by those desiring to impose countervailing duties to have analogous effects to a multiple rate system.

In trying to determine whether a system of multiple rates results in a bounty to particular commodities, there is always room for an honest difference of views. One of the difficulties boils down to the fact that there must be an arbitrary judgment as to what is the "true" rate of exchange, and in what direction the particular multiple rate deviates from the true rate. What Treasury now proposes is apparently to adopt as the "true rate", the rate at which the bulk of a country's exports move, and to consider that any more favorable rate constitutes a bounty in the amount of the difference.

As the attached table indicates, over half of our imports from Argentina would be affected by this ruling, as would substantial proportions of our imports from other principal Latin American countries.

[3] Not printed.

The following comments amplify the arguments which it is suggested be used against the proposed Treasury action.

a. Treasury's action will profoundly disturb our relations with many countries, particularly Latin America where there is already dissatisfaction concerning failure of the United States to allocate adequate quantities of scarce materials, high prices of United States exports, and low prices which the United States is willing to pay for the strategic and critical materials which we need from these countries. These countries may well react in a stiffer attitude in our negotiations with them to obtain critical materials. Moreover, greater obstacles to sales to the United States will strengthen the hands of elements in those countries favoring sale of strategic materials to the Soviet Union, which is in some known cases offering higher prices than United States importers; these offers have so far been turned down under export restrictions maintained at our urging. For example, the Communists in Uruguay are asserting that Uruguayan wool, which would sell in the United States for only 23¢ per pound, could be sold to the Soviet Union for 40¢ per pound. Although Uruguayan wool exports to the United States are down about 85 percent, none has been sold to the U.S.S.R. in line with a policy of not exporting to the Soviet bloc. If, as a result of pressure, the action is extended by analogy to the dollar retention and related export schemes of Europe and Middle and Near Eastern countries, its effects will be even worse. It will significantly reduce the dollar-earning capacity of the countries affected, increasing the need for direct financial assistance, and aggravating the dollar shortages which have been a major factor in developing the multiple rate systems. In fact, some of the incentive schemes which would give rise to countervailing duties under Treasury's new interpretation of the law, were urged on those countries by ECA.

b. In view of the fact that the United States favors unitary exchange rates and deplores resort to multiple exchange rate practices, the proposed measures will be widely interpreted as an attempt on our part to force other countries to abandon multiple rate systems and to adopt unitary exchange rates. Since most important trading countries in the world, including the United States, are members of the International Monetary Fund, the constructive policy for the United States would be increased efforts to exert appropriate pressure in the Fund to persuade members with multiple rate systems to simplify their rate structures.

c. There is genuine doubt, in the wool tops cases, whether a subsidy does result from the practices in question. Argentina is pursuing a general policy of discouraging agriculture, and has adopted export rates on agricultural products which are consistent with this objective; moreover, like other South American countries, Argentina has long relied upon export taxes on basic products as a source of revenue; both the proceeds of wool tops exports and of raw wool exports are a source of profit to the Argentine Government in that the dollars purchased from these exporters are resold, on the average, for more than the Government has paid for them.

In Argentina the present rates on wool tops have been in effect more than a year; in Uruguay for more than two years; some of the multiple rate situations which would now become the basis for countervailing duties have existed for much longer. Treasury previously found, in December 1950, that this same wool tops situation results in no bounty.

d. As to Treasury's contention that if action is not taken the Customs Simplification Bill will be jeopardized, we believe that the proposed Treasury action is no less prejudicial to the bill. The Customs Simplification Bill, as passed by the House, amends the countervailing duty law to require that injury be shown as a condition to the imposition of duties. Our feeling is that it will be impossible to secure this amendment if the effect would be to remove a basis for acting under the law with respect to a class of cases on which Treasury had recently acted. To be sure, if Treasury withholds its decision or refuses to impose the wool-tops duties, serious risks still would exist; but it might then be possible for the Administration either to propose or to accept as a further amendment to the law some reasonable definition of the cases in which multiple rates will be considered to bestow bounties, which definition might then be added to the law along with the insertion of the injury test.

The Ambassador in Uruguay (Roddan) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller)

SECRET OFFICIAL–INFORMAL MONTEVIDEO, April 22, 1952.

DEAR ED: I made myself a pledge never to burden you with long letters but the political stream is moving so swiftly that I think you should have adequate background information. This is being written at intervals between engagements and I imagine that before I finish "new developments" may make many of the observations out of date.

My initial plunge into diplomatic negotiations was certainly baptism by immersion. The MSA got into trouble from the outset due in some measure to the temperament of Dr. Domínguez, partly to the inexperience of our military negotiators, and in good measure to the explosive political situation which has been engendered here.

Domínguez started the trouble, a week after the talks opened, by summoning only myself and Trueblood to a meeting at which he said the entire Military Plan would have to be rewritten because it was written in the "imperative", and contained commitments which were utterly unthinkable under the Uruguayan Constitution. In response to my plea he declined to submit changes in phraseology but handed me the job of making a complete revision. Obviously that was impossible.

To keep the talks moving, I drafted a single provision which provided adequate constitutional safeguards—in fact it was very largely drafted beforehand because I had anticipated some such objection to the overall agreement. The US military negotiators at first agreed but the next morning were unanimous in declining to make any overtures to Domínguez. They bitterly resented the fact that he had omitted them from discussion of the Military Plan, they insisted upon the letter of their instructions, and in general their attitude was that Domínguez must take it or leave it.

In fact, their attitude was so rigid that at first I concluded that the phrase "military negotiator" must be a contradiction in terms. After many long weary hours of discussion however, they have come around very nicely and on the whole have done as good a job as could be expected.

[Here follow personal remarks.] Because he [Domínguez Cámpora] undertook the wool problem, he had us meeting nights on MSA when we should have been meeting days with fresh minds and plenty of time. Worst of all, he insists upon meeting in his own library without adequate office help. The result is that when he has a proposition to submit, we get one copy in Spanish and no English text. This resulted in a ludicrous situation last Saturday when he handed us a text on which we could agree only to be informed later when we returned to the office that the draft given us had been wholly erroneous.

Yet he has real and tremendous problems and there are indications now that the issue of MSA has completely shattered the collaboration between Colorados and Herreristas on the Council and it may even completely paralyze the entire system of Collegiate government. It has already forced out Foreign Minister Castellanos[1] and it will certainly rock Congress, if the pact is ever submitted, in explosive debate.

Basically, the trouble would have occurred at some time because the majority party leaders were so unrealistic in bringing the minority party into the executive branch of the government. They invited the lion into the parlor and now they're paying the penalty. In the first few weeks, because pride was at stake, the Council moved with such firmness and decision that everybody was agreeably surprised. But the first real problems they hit—MSA and the financial crisis—put an end very quickly to the atmosphere of superficial cooperation and developed deep-seated antagonisms which may spell extreme danger in the not too distant future.

However, I am still convinced that despite the mercurial qualities of his temperament, Doctor Domínguez deserves help because he has a hard problem at hand and because he and his group are our genuine friends. If we lose out here, we may lose the last bastion of friendship for the United States on this end of the continent. The Constitutional provision which gives Parliament authority over sending troops abroad is definite and it must be met. The argument about submitting all international agreements to Parliament is less convincing because that provision has been in the Constitution for 75 years and Uruguay has had no difficulty in carrying on its foreign relations in realistic fashion. In fact, Dr. Domínguez explained confidentially how he once tried to get a secret commitment from Brazil, as an offset against Argentina, without getting more than a restatement of traditional Brazilian policy. Domínguez knows that the security of Uruguay lies in the Organization of American States which actually means the military power of the US. But there are two immediate factors which concern our country:

1. Isolation is being fanned by the minority party and it may be spreading. Apparently, it was bitter feeling over MSA which forced the Foreign Minister's resignation.

2. This new government leaks like a sieve. There is a trend towards "French journalism" in which the opposition lets out all secrets to its favorite press. "El Debate" was first to print that Dr. Domínguez was handling both wool and MSA and it was first to print the rumor of the Foreign Minister's resignation. If it goes to the point where minority members reveal even the details of secret negotiations, perhaps even hinting at military plans, then obviously our policy must come under review. So far this has not happened but I am apprehensive.

In a general way, the contagion of unrest throughout Latin America may be spreading here, helped along, of course, by the current financial crisis. A huge build-up has been going on for some time for Batlle Berres[2] arrival tomorrow and there are the usual rumors that he may take measures against the National Council. So far this is merely idle talk without basis in fact.

I believe Uruguay may ask for some kind of a money loan from the US to substitute for wool revenues but they have made no approaches thus far. If the financial crisis is solved, things may settle down and the Council may be able to worry through. They realize here that any attempt to link up wool and MSA would be fatal.

Your letter[3] to Dr. Domínguez was wholly adequate and helpful. Sorry you are not coming here but the reasons are sound.

With best wishes.

Sincerely, ED

Memorandum of Conversation, by John K. Havemeyer of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 24, 1952.

Subject: Uruguayan Exchange Rates with Special Emphasis on the Rates Applied for the Export of Wool Tops.

Participants: Ambassador Mora
Sr. Bermúdez, Commercial Counselor
Deputy Assistant Secretary Mann
Mr. Havemeyer

Ambassador Mora said that he had received a cable[1] from his Foreign Office which contained a draft decree law which would remove the decree law issued April 5, 1952, banning the export of wool tops. The new draft would provide for the export of wool tops at the rate of 1.519 pesos to the dollar. He asked Mr. Mann what he thought Treasury's reaction would be to such a proposal. Mr. Mann replied that he believed Treasury would find such a decree law acceptable, but he suggested that the Ambassador make an appointment directly with Under-Secretary Overby of the Treasury to ascertain Treasury's views with respect to the proposed decree law. The Ambassador read the new decree law in Spanish, and it was noted that in the "whereases" the proposed decree provided agreement with the U.S. laws.

On April 25 officers of the Treasury Department including Messrs. Southard, Fields, Willis, Hebbard, McNeill, deBeers, and Messrs. Corbett and Havemeyer from State attended. The Treasury Department was informed of the proposed Uruguayan decree law which Ambassador Mora intended to discuss with Under-Secretary Overby. Several Treasury representatives thought that this proposal would temporarily solve the wool top problem vis-à-vis U.S. countervailing duties, but at the same time would create new problems with respect to the Uruguayan multiple exchange rates. The primary feeling was that this action by Uruguay would pave the way for other changes in the Uruguayan exchange rate system. It was agreed that such a decree law was a temporary measure for the Uruguayans prior to deciding what to do with their multiple rate structure. Mr. Southard reported that Dr. Paraguana,[2] the Uruguayan representative on the IMF, thought this step made no sense for Uruguay, as it does not deal with the overall problem of the monetary exchange rates. Regardless of what was said in the Treasury Department, Paraguana will coach the Uruguayans on this subject. Dr. Paraguana thinks the only way to solve the problem is to consolidate the buying and selling rates. Mr. Southard and Dr.

[1] Not identified.
[2] Octavio Paraguaná.

Paraguana both agreed that an intermediate buying rate between 1.519 and 2.35 would be the most satisfactory for Uruguay but that it was up to the Uruguayans to make the proposals on their rates to the IMF.

It was recognized that Uruguayan revenues depended for a large part on the spread between its buying and selling rates. Mr. Southard said that we had actually two problems, one of working on the Uruguayan exchange rates in the IMF, and two, countervailing duties as interpreted under U.S. law. The encouragement for the enforcement of this law by members of Congress was also emphasized. Mr. Southard said that his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee had given fair warning to those members of Congress interested in the problem that if a higher unitary rate than 1.519 were applied to raw wool exported from Uruguay, larger quantities would move immediately than are presently moving under the 1.519 rate.

Mr. Hebbard reported that all the Uruguayan rates which became effective October 6, 1949, were temporary rates and that at that time Uruguay had agreed to continue to look into the problem in order to further simplify their exchange rate structure. Consensus was that the new Uruguayan decree law would ease the problem now in Congress vis-à-vis Argentina and Uruguay. It was agreed that Mr. Overby advise Ambassador Mora that as a temporary measure the immediate pressure in the U.S. would be removed and that we had no objection to the proposed decree law. In addition he was to remind the Ambassador that as long as multiple rates existed in Uruguay, the U.S. would be faced with the problem of countervailing duties on dutiable commodities exported by Uruguay to the U.S.

The broad policy of the U.S. attitude toward multiple rates, subsidies and bounties was discussed. Mr. Southard requested that his testimony given before the Senate Finance Committee be used as Treasury's policy and that studies be made of all countries which had multiple rates or subsidies and that a decision be arrived at in order to find which countries fall within the criteria outlined in his testimony. Specifically, Argentina, France, Yugoslavia, Ecuador, Chile, and Venezuela were mentioned. The problem in Ecuador was given more emphasis than the other countries.

(Subsequent to the above meeting Mr. Mann spoke with Mr. Bermúdez by phone and it was learned that Ambassador Mora had decided that he did not wish to have an interview with Under-Secretary Overby prior to his departure for Uruguay on April 29. He intends to spend one week in Uruguay in consultation with officials of his Government with respect to the entire exchange rate structure in Uruguay. Upon his return, if appropriate, he will then request an interview with Mr. Overby. Mr. Havemeyer informed Ambassador Mora of the position taken at the working-level meeting in Treasury with respect to the new proposed decree law.)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 8, 1952.

Subject: Negotiations with Uruguay for Military Agreement

Participants: Lt. General Charles Bolté, Deputy Chief of Staff (Army)
Major General Robert Walsh
Col. Crawford[1]
Col. Hall[2]
Mr. Mann, ARA
Mr. Jamison, AR
Mr. Bennett, OSA

The meeting was arranged in General Bolté's office in connection with Mr. Mann's forthcoming trip to Uruguay to assist in the negotiations for a military agreement between the United States and Uruguay.

General Bolté emphasized the strong interest of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in achieving a military agreement with Uruguay. He said that the Joint Chiefs have no desire to quibble over phraseology in the Agreement or Plan so long as the requirements of our law are met. In response to specific questions from Mr. Mann, General Bolté stated that the Joint Chiefs are entirely agreeable to inserting language in the agreement which would provide that action to be taken in the future by Uruguay should be in accord with her constitutional procedures. The General stated that there would be no objection on the part of the Joint Chiefs to other changes with respect to specific missions assigned Uruguayan military forces so long as the Uruguayans understand that matériel can be furnished them only for specific missions set forth in the military Plan. The General indicated that there would be no problem in adding language regarding other missions by Uruguay to be agreed on in the future by the two parties. He assured Mr. Mann that he could negotiate with entire confidence on the above points in the knowledge that he enjoyed the full backing of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

In sum General Bolté stressed that the Pentagon is interested in agreement with Uruguay and has no desire to be unduly meticulous over phraseology. General Bolté commented that the amount of matériel being allocated for the Latin American program is not large comparatively speaking and added that there might well be difficulty with deliveries, at least on the larger items; he expressed the view that the primary importance of the agreement with Uruguay is its indication of solidarity between our two countries. The important thing is that a Government give indication that it is prepared to do the right thing in the future if trouble should come.[3]

SECRET MONTEVIDEO, December 15, 1952.

No. 459

Subject: Uruguayan Foreign Minister[2] Protests Delivery of Aide-Mémoire on Plight of American Packers.

The Ambassador and Mr. Trueblood went to see the Foreign Minister on Saturday morning, December 13th, at his request. The Foreign Minister was alone. We were not advised in advance of the subject of the meeting. We were not long in doubt because the Foreign Minister immediately launched into a vigorous oral protest against the Aide-Mémoire[3] which had been delivered to the Foreign Office on December 9 and which had set forth the present financial plight of the American Frigorificos and the fact that they have been compelled to suspend operations because of the numerous restrictions imposed by the Uruguayan government.

We assumed that the Foreign Minister had discussed the subject the night before with at least some members of the National Consejo or with other government officials and that this probably accounted for the intensity of his feeling.

The Foreign Minister got to the point at once by stating that while efforts would be made to relieve the situation, it would be better to consider that the "mémoire" had never been delivered because of the attendant embarrassment if it should become public. The Ambassador replied that our government would be advised of his viewpoint, adding his personal belief that any question which might cause concern between friendly governments should be the subject of full and frank discussion.

[1]Drafted by Ambassador Roddan.

[2]Fructuoso Pittaluga.

[3]The referenced aide-mémoire, dated Dec. 9, stated that the meat packers (frigoríficos) were confronted with a situation that made it impossible for them to continue to engage in slaughtering operations. This situation was the result of delay on the part of government officials in fixing and approving production costs, failure of the government to liquidate its indebtedness to the companies, the companies' inability to market stocks of meat in storage, and the government's preferential price system which prevented the companies from buying cattle on a freely competitive basis. A copy of the aide-mémoire was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 451, from Montevideo, dated Dec. 11, 1952 (811.05133/12–1152).

The Foreign Minister then responded at length and with emphasis. He denied the right of diplomatic intervention in behalf of private interests and again requested that the Ambassador consider the Aide-Mémoire as not having been presented. He proceeded to point out what he considered would be the "unfortunate effects" upon the pending ratification of the MSA agreement if it should become known that the American government had made representations on behalf of private packers. While his manner was not rude, his tone and the stern manner of delivery certainly seemed excessive even allowing a margin of tolerance for the fine sensibilities of Uruguayan officials. It was a "dressing down" for the Ambassador. The fact that the Aide-Mémoire had been cleared by Washington was not mentioned in the conversation, so it is not known whether the reproof was also directed to our government.

The Ambassador again thanked the Foreign Minister for his frank exposition of the views of the Uruguayan government. He ventured to remark that the American Congress has always taken the view that the application of tariffs under U.S. law was solely a matter for internal determination. But when it seemed that the good relations of our government with Uruguay might become involved over the question of wool imports, the Department of State had not only welcomed but solicited an expression of views on the part of the Uruguayan government. The Foreign Minister replied that the cases were not analogous, that the issue at stake on wool tariffs was wholly one between governments. The Ambassador courteously disagreed stating that wool was sold by private owners to private buyers and that the issue was the proper application of a law passed by the United States Congress. There was no further discussion of that point. This undoubtedly will give further pain to the Uruguayan officials who frown upon a discussion of meat and wool in the same conversation. But it may be added in extenuation that the wool question has at least as much pertinence to the current problem as the possible refusal of Uruguay to enter into a mutual assistance pact with the United States.

The Embassy feels that the incident was unpleasant but that the course pursued by our government was eminently right and that it should not have been avoided merely because it might have unpleasant consequences. At least it has partially cleared the atmosphere over a problem that has been most disturbing for the past three years and may continue to be so for some time to come. The preceding Ambassador[4] worked faithfully to bring about a satisfactory solution and so has the present Ambassador. The conversations were informal and no effort has ever been made to bring pressure upon the Uruguayan government. In fact, the spurned aide-mémoire merely outlined the present circumstances in which the United States packers find themselves. These oral representations were received politely and assurances given which have never been fulfilled.

In the New York Times account of the debate over the Uruguayan resolution about the right to exploit national resources (before the UN General Assembly's Economic and Financial Committee) it was reported that the Mexican member asked if the resolution would bar diplomatic representations but "the point was not cleared up". Perhaps it has been cleared up here. The American packers, rightly or wrongly, feel that their interests are being expropriated indirectly by the Uruguayan government and it does seem that the question should be a matter of legitimate inquiry by our government. But the Uruguayan government apparently resents this as somehow infringing upon its sovereignty.

Basically, there has been no change in the Uruguayan attitude. The Embassy has been aware all along that the Foreign Office received even the most informal representations on this question with reluctance and that, as far as can be ascertained, nothing has ever been done looking to an alleviation of the situation. The Embassy takes the view that for the present at least nothing further should be done here.

Meanwhile, the plight of the American packers is really serious. They cannot resume operations unless the parent companies reverse their present attitude and send down capital from the United States or they receive payments from the Uruguayan government. It is doubtful that the cause of the packers has been set back by the incident outlined here and it may be that after the Uruguayan officials have time to reflect, the packers may get some relief. The situation cannot drag on indefinitely despite the attitude of the Uruguayan government that it is not a matter for representations between governments.

Subject: Critical Problem Raised by Shutdown of American Packing Plants in Montevideo: Brief Summation of Historical, Economic and Political Factors Involved.

The present shutdown of American packing plants in Montevideo, Compañia Swift de Montevideo and Frigorifico Artigas, S.A. (Armour), and the danger that this shutdown may become permanent constitutes one of the most serious problems between the Government of the United States and the Government of Uruguay. This despatch is an attempt to review the situation as it now stands and put together in one place the enormously complicated factors involved.

I. Background.

The basic trouble of the private packers stems directly from the fact that they are competing against a government-sponsored slaughtering house in a country which is semi-socialistic in character and tradition. This means competition, not only for markets and competition in price, but competition also for cattle, the essential raw material of their business, because the number of animals available for slaughter by the private packers is becoming less each year. And each year, the Uruguayan-sponsored frigorifico is demanding—and getting—new concessions for their business at the expense of the American and British firms.

To understand how the present situation came about, a brief historical review may be helpful. Uruguay since the time of its settlement two centuries ago has been a land of cattle and sheep. In the last century, the animals were slaughtered for home consumption with only a small amount of jerked beef, hides and fats going into the export market. Then the American packing houses came here shortly before the first world war, and the shipment of frozen beef for export became an essential part of the Uruguayan economy. Later, British interests established the Anglo packing house at Fray Bentos, a small city on the River Uruguay about 125 miles from Montevideo. This packing plant still supplies all the meat for Fray Bentos besides shipping frozen beef and processing by-products. Until the foreign packers arrived, by-products were largely wasted.

In the early part of the 20th century, the dominant Batllista faction of the Colorado Party set about transforming Uruguay into a semi-socialistic state. During subsequent years the government, under Batllista control, assumed ownership of a number of public utilities, set up a government-owned insurance system and a government bank. There has been a constant urge to extend the area of public ownership.

In 1928 Frigorifico Nacional was established as a packinghouse in competition with the private firms. The economic set-up of this concern is complicated. Private citizens, many of them cattle raisers, are on the board of directors but essentially it is a public business and the government has assumed the payment of its operating deficits. At the time of its establishment, Frigorifico Nacional was described as an "ente testigo"; in other words, it was conceived as a "witness" or yardstick to measure and perhaps control indirectly the profits of foreign-owned packers. The idea behind it was that the cattle growers of Uruguay were at the mercy of foreign interests who, because of their monopoly position, could fix cattle prices at whatever figure they wished.

In the intervening years, Frigorifico Nacional has been the fastest growing unit in the packing business, due largely to the advantages conferred upon it by the Uruguayan Government. In fact, the original conception of Nacional as an "ente testigo" is outmoded. It is now the giant of the packing business and it is constantly engaged in a grim campaign to enlarge its operations at the expense of the private packers.

The American packers are convinced that the aim of Nacional is the ultimate extinction of the private packers, thus giving Nacional a complete monopoly. The reason behind this is not merely the natural desire for growth, but in the view of the American plant owners, it is motivated also by the fact that the private plants are more efficiently operated and hence their existence is a constant source of irritation to the operators of Nacional.

In its campaign against the private packers, Nacional has powerful political backing. As pointed out earlier, the majority Batllista political group has traditionally favored government ownership and, accordingly, tends to be sympathetic toward Nacional. It appears to have the support of strong associations of rural cattle growers. It has the support of leaders of the Herrerista Party, the minority, nationalistic party which traditionally has represented the interests of the large agricultural landowners and which is anti-United States in its political orientation. One of the Herrerista members (Alvaro Vargas) of the National Executive Council was for years retained by Nacional as its lawyer. And finally, the regulation of the packing industry is to a large extent in the hands of the Ministry of Agriculture and the evidence seems to support the view that many department officials are favoring Nacional against the legitimate interests of the private packers.

II. Present System under which Packinghouses Operate.

The private packing houses in Uruguay have been operating under an exceedingly complex system of government control. The essential elements of that control, as the Embassy understands it, may be briefly summarized as follows.

1. The prices which must be paid the producers for most types of cattle are fixed by the government. The cattle producers represent a powerful political group within the country and the prices appear to be fixed primarily on the basis of internal political considerations. Competitive bidding among buyers in the livestock market is thus eliminated and the influence of consumer prices (prices in the world export market in the case of meat for export and domestic consumer prices in the case of meat consumed internally) which would exist under a free system is eliminated.

2. The principal markets for exportation of meat are divided among the several private frigorificos and Frigorifico Nacional (the government sponsored packinghouse) on a quota basis. Quotas allocated to several packinghouses bear a rough relationship to the historical export business of the respective houses. Export is controlled not only in the sense that each house must keep within its export quota but also in that prices obtained must be approved by the government. In the case of exports to the UK, the principal single export market, prices are fixed by inter-governmental agreement; in the case of shipments to the so-called free market, prices obtained must meet the minimum figure established by the government.

3. Frigorifico Nacional has a practical monopoly on the slaughter of cattle for consumption in the Montevideo market. In order that Frigorifico Nacional may obtain sufficient cattle to meet the Montevideo demand during the slack season it is permitted by decree to pay a higher price for cattle during four months of the year than that permitted the private slaughter houses. The higher prices which Frigorifico Nacional is authorized to pay during four months of the year means that the private frigorificos will be practically unable to purchase cattle during approximately six months of the year since cattle producers will either hold cattle from the market prior to the period of premium price or hasten it to the market during the latter part of that period in order to take advantage of the premium offered. Furthermore, the American private slaughter houses point out that Frigorifico Nacional's dual role as supplier of the domestic Montevideo market and as exporter of meat permits it to juggle its cost figures in such a way as to show lower costs for exports and higher costs for internal supply. This is of particular importance owing to Frigorifico Nacional's role as "ente testigo" mentioned above.

4. Since the prices fixed by the government for the purchase of cattle bear little relation to the internal or external prices for meat, the government has to bring these two economic factors into alignment by means of subsidy payments. The price of meat in the Montevideo market is fixed by the municipality and Frigorifico Nacional is paid as a subsidy the difference between the cost of production, including purchase of cattle, processing costs, and a reasonable margin of profit and the amount realized through the sale of the product. Similarly in the case of meat for export the amount of the subsidy is theoretically the difference between the costs of production including reasonable profit and the amount realized through the sale of the product. The managers of American slaughter houses are careful to point out that although the subsidy determined as payable on their export production is paid directly to them it constitutes in fact compensation for the higher price in cattle which they have been obliged to pay and is therefore not a subsidy to the packinghouse but rather to the producers of cattle.

5. As will be apparent from the foregoing the determination of costs becomes under the existing system a matter of the utmost importance to the packinghouses. While a reasonable profit is theoretically included in the cost determination, cost figures submitted by the private frigorificos are reviewed by the government (attention is called again to Frigorifico Nacional's function as "ente testigo") and final determination of allowable cost figures is determined by the government. Until cost figures have been officially determined by the government it is impossible for the private packinghouses to determine whether their past operations have been conducted in fact at a profit or at a loss.

6. Salaries and wages paid employees and day workers are in final analysis fixed by the government.

7. Foreign exchange earned by the packers through their export operations must be converted through the Bank of the Republic at fixed rates. These rates vary with the type of meat product from 1.519 pesos per dollar in the case of chilled and frozen beef to 2.35 pesos per dollar in the case of canned meats. Foreign exchange thus bought by the Bank of the Republic is subsequently re-sold to importers at fixed rates and profits or losses on the exchange operations appear as earnings or charges against the Exchange Differential Fund. The subsidies paid to the packing houses (including Frigorifico Nacional for domestic supply) are likewise paid from this fund. The Minister of Finance has estimated that on the export of chilled and frozen beef to the UK the fund will earn 6,660,000 pesos and through the export of chilled and frozen meat to the European market 4,880,000 pesos during 1953. These profits result from the purchase of foreign exchange earned at the rate of 1.519 per dollar and the re-sale of the same at an average profit of .37 pesos per dollar. Similarly the Minister of Finance has estimated the following charges against the Exchange Differential Fund arising from meat: Subsidy of exports of chilled and frozen meat to the UK, 2,280,000 pesos; loss on exchange in exportation of canned meats owing to purchase of foreign exchange at 2.35 per dollar, 5,040,000 pesos; subsidies to Frigorifico Nacional on meat for domestic consumption, 5,500,000 pesos. From the foregoing figures it is apparent that during the coming year the Minister of Finance expects the exports of meat to earn a total of 11,240,000 for the Exchange Differential Fund while subsidies on the exportations charged to the fund amount to 7,320,000 pesos leaving thus a net profit to the fund from exportation of meat of 3,920,000 pesos. This amount is, however, more than used up in the domestic subsidy of 5,500,000 referred to above. In other words on the basis of the Minister of Finance's estimates for 1953, earnings on the exportation of meat will not only liquidate the corresponding subsidies but will provide a substantial part on the subsidy for domestic consumption. While there are no doubt strong reasons for maintaining the present low price on meat to the consumer in the Montevideo market arising from the government's desire to control inflation and from political considerations, it is worth noting that this low price not only constitutes a drain on the Exchange Differential Fund but also encourages increasing consumption for meat internally thereby further accentuating the government's balance of payments problem.

III. Difficulties of American Packing Houses.

The American meat packing houses in Montevideo have not purchased or slaughtered livestock since September 17, 1952. The American plant managers for Swift and Armour maintain that this drastic action was made necessary by the unworkable restrictions imposed upon their operations by the Uruguayan Government and that the plants cannot reopen until the government undertakes a sweeping remedial program to remove the obstacles about which they complain.

According to the managers of Swift and Armour, the principal factors which have compelled them to cease the purchase and slaughter of livestock are as follows:

1. Lack of operating capital with which to finance the purchase of livestock and pay operating expenses. The lack of operating capital is attributed to three causes: (a) failure on the part of the government to pay the companies subsidy funds which would compensate the companies for the prices which they are required by law to pay producers for livestock purchased. On the basis of their own cost figures for the past 2 years the companies estimate that the government owes them approximately 10 million pesos. (b) Inability to export, owing to government restrictions, large stocks of meat now held in cold storage. (c) Unwillingness or inability of the parent companies to invest more capital in the present uncertain circumstances. Finally the companies have about exhausted the possibility of obtaining further bank credits locally.

2. Delay on the part of appropriate governmental authorites in fixing and approving costs of production makes it impossible for the companies to determine whether their business operations over the past two years have been conducted at a profit or at a loss. Agreement between the government authorities and the frigorificos regarding cost for 1951 and 1952 has not been reached.

3. Frigorifico Nacional's authority to pay a preferential price for cattle during part of the year makes it difficult, if not impossible, for the private companies to enter the market during approximately 6 months of the year.

In a letter to the President of the Agricultural and Livestock Committee of the NEC dated December 4 the companies stated that it would be impossible for them to purchase or slaughter any type of livestock unless an overall solution as outlined below is provided for the problems confronting the industry.

a. An exchange rate or other facilities which would make it possible to cover costs and give a reasonable profit margin.
b. Receipt by the companies of full value of the merchandise as stated in the preceding paragraph at the time of shipment.
c. Assurances that the companies will be allowed to export soon after killing.
d. Payment by the government of all amounts owed the companies and arrangements enabling the companies to export present stocks promptly, and
e. Elimination of the preferential position of Frigorifico Nacional in the purchase of livestock.

In their present stand the American firms have been joined by the operator of Frigorifico Anglo, British owned packinghouse, so that in effect this constitutes a united stand of the private foreign-owned packinghouses against the economic policies pursued by the Uruguayan Government. The managers of the American packinghouses have informed the Embassy that this united stand, which has been approved by the parent organizations of the three companies, is unique in Uruguay where the companies normally are vigorous competitors and that it is an indication of the desperate conditions in which the companies find themselves. According to the same sources the companies are pledged at present to refuse any individual offers of settlement and to stand together in demanding relief along each of the lines indicated above.

The American plant managers think that the course pursued by the Uruguayan Government is tantamount to indirect expropriation of their holdings, and unless relief is given they are reconciled to the indefinite and perhaps permanent closing of their Montevideo plants. They are also aware of the possibility that their plants may be seized by the government.

IV. Attitude of the Uruguayan Government.

The Uruguayans argue that the foreign packers have made large profits in the past and that present profits including interest on money owed them by the government are guaranteed—hence the packers have little to complain of. (To this the packers reply that these are "paper" profits which may be wiped out entirely when cost figures are established and that in any case their problem of obtaining operating capital is not solved by piling up "paper" profits).

The provision of full relief as requested by the packers confronts the government with major difficulties. The packers themselves have expressed the belief that the government does not have available and cannot raise at the moment the full amounts of money owed them. Furthermore, as long as Frigorifico Nacional is by law the sole supplier of the Montevideo market, abolition of its preferential position in the purchase of cattle during short season would risk meat shortages in Montevideo with resulting public dissatisfaction and unrest. The three foreign packers are being paid 4.3 million pesos of the total amount claimed by them (pesos 15 million) and draft legislation has been approved by the NEC for submission to the Uruguayan Congress which would permit the use of general government revenues rather than exchange earning fund (which is now exhausted) in paying the remainder. (Subsidy payments to Frigorifico Nacional have been made in this way.) There is the additional factor that the packers insist (to this date at least) that payment of arrears would remove only one of their difficulties and that the government must go much further in affording relief before operations are resumed.

The attitude of the Uruguayan Government toward the foreign-owned packinghouses is disturbing because after making due allowance for the factors listed in the preceding paragraph, including some recent improvement in the outlook, the Embassy has the clear impression that there exists within the government little sympathy for the foreign packinghouses and that on the contrary there is an underlying hostility toward them and a clear bias for Frigorifico Nacional. This is evidenced not only in the slowness of the government in advancing toward a solution of the problems confronting the private packers but also in the difficulties which the private packers appear to have had in obtaining serious consideration of their problems by the government, in the general trend of comments made publicly by high officials of the government including members of the NEC. Some of the comments of these officials have been transmitted to the Department in despatch No. 478 of December 24, 1952.[3] The underlying tone of such comments has been to place emphasis on the harm to the national economy resulting from the suspension of operations by the private foreign owned packinghouses and to couple this with thinly veiled threats that unless the companies resume operations their export quotas may be reduced and their principal competitor, Frigorifico Nacional, may be given expanded facilities and put on a 24-hour a day basis in order that it might handle the entire slaughter. Notably absent in such comment and statements has been recognition of the claim of Swift, Armour and Anglo that closing of their plants is involuntary and that they simply cannot operate the plants in the circumstances in which they find themselves.

V. Conclusion.

The American packers have generally been inclined to cry wolf whenever their traditional position in Uruguay appears threatened in any way. It has been, of course, impossible for the Embassy to determine conclusively the accuracy of some of their statements and charges and it is suspected that some times in the past they have been prone to exaggerate the magnitude of their difficulties. However, in the present case all of the evidence available to the Embassy indicates that their plight is, as stated by them, indeed desperate. The Embassy has no evidence to show that the prolonged inactivity of the government in the face of the situation of the companies arises from any present or conscious intent to force the companies into a position where expropriation in one form or another will follow. The Embassy believes that such is not the present intent of the government and that the delays in proposing any solution of their difficulties arise rather from the difficulties of the government in providing remedy and the general inertia of Uruguayan Government proceedings. However, the Embassy does not rule out the possibility that certain individuals within the government and in Frigorifico Nacional may view with complacency continuation of the present situation as paving the way to liquidation of the foreign packers and absorption of their share of the industries by Frigorifico Nacional. In short, while we are inclined to expect that the government will in due course propose some sort of compromise (which the companies may or may not accept), we see in the present situation indications that the private foreign packers will sooner or later lose their unequal struggle with Frigorifico Nacional and be forced to liquidate their enterprises in this country.

agreements act, impose numerous restrictions. It also includes provision looking toward application countervailing duties in multiple rate cases.

Considered opinion here that in absence definitive action on tops by Uruguay or US, it most likely that Congress will enact mandatory countervailing duties provision covering wool tops and many other products. Also, chances of obtaining Congressional approval provision requiring showing domestic injury as condition imposition countervailing duties which Executive is recommending will be greatly impaired.

Accordingly, unless other action taken by Uruguay as suggested below, Sec Treas plans announce on May 2 existence of bounty connection export Uruguayan wool tops and application of appropriate countervailing duty.

You instructed discuss foregoing urgently with Yriart with view ascertaining whether Uruguayan govt prepared act prior to May 2 to reduce rate on tops to rate applicable raw wool and to agree with us to keep it there. Such agreement would probably forestall imposition countervailing duties on other Uruguayan products as well as wool tops. You should make following points:

(1) Dept appreciates suggested course would raise serious problems for Uruguay.

(2) Dept believes, however, that action by US would have considerably worse effects. Should Treasury proceed take action on wool tops under existing legislation principles might be involved which could have effect of extending countervailing duties to other Uruguayan products. Mandatory provision placed in law on Congressional initiative likely have even wider application.

(3) Failure on part Uruguay or ourselves act on tops also likely jeopardize customs simplification bill and interfere with efforts obtain simple extension trade agreements program.

(4) In order for advantages be obtained Uruguayan action, as contrasted disadvantages US action, necessary Uruguay act not later than May 1.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Regional American Affairs (Cale)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 2, 1953.

Subject: Proposed Countervailing Duty Action on Wool Tops

Participants: The Secretary
H—Mr. Morton
E—Mr. Linder
E—Mr. Leddy
ARA—Mr. Mann
AR—Mr. Cale

Mr. Mann said that he had been requested by the Uruguayan Embassy to bring to the Secretary's attention the note[1] addressed to the Secretary by the Uruguayan Foreign Minister on the above subject. Mr. Mann provided the Secretary with an English translation of the note (see attachment), which the Secretary read.

Mr. Mann pointed out that the Uruguayan Government took the position that the manufacture of wool tops is a natural industry for Uruguay since tops are made out of Uruguayan raw material. He also pointed out that the Uruguayans look upon the manufacture of wool tops as one way which they can help diversify their economy and raise the general level of living in Uruguay. Mr. Mann said that the Treasury Department, on the other hand, is of the opinion, especially in view of complaints from our wool interests, that the Uruguayan Government is subsidizing the exportation of wool tops and that the countervailing duty provision of the Tariff Act of 1930 should be applied. If this is done, our action will certainly be resented in Uruguay to an extent which it is difficult to predict with accuracy. On the other hand, the Uruguayans have not been cooperative in helping us find a mutually satisfactory formula.

Mr. Morton called attention to the need to go through with the action on wool tops as a means to improving the chances of obtaining Congressional approval of a one-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act. He said that the White House hopes that it may be possible to persuade Congressman Simpson[2] to withdraw substantially all the amendments provided for in his bill, but that he will insist that countervailing duties be levied on Uruguayan wool tops, even if he agrees not to press for the amendments.

Mr. Linder reviewed for the Secretary the discussions which we have had with Treasury Department representatives regarding the matter. He then said that he believed it is likely, in the absence of action on wool tops by the Executive, that Congress may take action which will make it mandatory that the Executive levy countervailing duties on a much larger scale. He also stated that he thought the Treasury representatives would be in an impossible position in testifying on the Customs Simplication Bill in the absence of action on wool tops.

The Secretary asked that a reply be prepared to the note from the Uruguayan Foreign Minister expressing the Secretary's regret that he was not able to accede to the Minister's request. He also asked that a letter to Senator Millikin[3] be drafted for his signature enclosing a copy of the Foreign Minister's note as an indication of the difficulties raised in our foreign relations by action such as that contemplated on wool tops. The Secretary pointed out that Senator Millikin had requested that he consent to the proposed action by Treasury on wool tops.[4]

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in Uruguay[1]

SECRET PRIORITY WASHINGTON, May 8, 1953—12:52 p. m.

200. Uruguayan Embassy has delivered long memorandum[2] (urtel 311).[3] We hope our reply now being drafted will help dispel misunderstandings.

Suggest meanwhile you emphasize verbally these points to Uruguayans.

1. Countervailing duty fixed at 18% invoice value based on extent bounty found by Treasury although complaints received alleged bounty totaled 49%.

2. Treasury action open to review if Uruguay takes action which eliminates basis for finding bounty exists and we are willing continue consultation effort find mutually satisfactory solution.

3. Uruguay informed more than year ago and many times since difficult situation caused by stimulation export wool tops U.S. plus law Congress making countervailing duty mandatory where bounty existed.

[3] The referenced telegram, dated May 5, 1953, is not printed (411.3331/5–553).

In repeated discussions problem since then Uruguayans have not proposed any solution.

4. Our tentative figures show general imports of Uruguayan wool tops increased from about 3% U.S. consumption 1951 to 9% in 1952. Total imports from all sources about 11% consumption. However, relationship of imports to U.S. consumption is not basis for conclusion bounty exists.

5. There is no intention discriminate against Uruguay. Rather it has been found exports wool tops from Uruguay to U.S. in effect receive benefit of bounty. So far bounties not found exist on wool tops imports from any other country supply significant amounts U.S. market. If any other countries are found be granting bounties on their exports wool tops to U.S. similar countervailing duties will be applied.

6. Question MSA legislation in our opinion unrelated this problem.

7. Right to levy countervailing duty in event subsidy internationally recognized. Treasury action cannot be interpreted as U.S. return to high tariff policy since action required by long existent law. President Eisenhower favors expanded world trade balance at high levels and administration will conduct exhaustive studies to determine future trade policies[4] for attainment this objective.

Without minimizing importance countervailing duty action to Uruguayan economy we should attempt discourage tendency (1) portray this as political rather than economic measure (2) exaggerate its importance (3) assume pessimistic attitude possibility satisfactory future resolution problem.

Points mentioned above may be used at your discretion for statement urtel 313.[5]

The Ambassador in Uruguay (Roddan) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)

[Extract]

CONFIDENTIAL MONTEVIDEO, May 13, 1953.

MY DEAR MR. CABOT: This is a belated note of greeting and good wishes. Now that Tom Mann is leaving for the field, and in view of the approaching visit of Dr. Eisenhower,[1] I believe this may be an opportune time to give you a brief résumé of the Uruguayan situation.

[1] Reference is to the factfinding mission to the countries of South America undertaken by Dr. Milton Eisenhower between June 23 and July 29, 1953, at the request of President Eisenhower. Regarding Dr. Eisenhower's trip, see the editorial note, p. 196.

The wool tops controversy is still smouldering although with diminishing heat. The Batlle-Berres faction is really bitter because it has long had political, and perhaps economic, ties to the tops industry. The Herreristas keep up the clamor for reasons of political expediency. Their interests are allied with the greasy wool producers and they never did like the tops industry. There is a measure of public resentment, without a real understanding of the issue, because many people believe the United States took an unfriendly action towards Uruguay. However, underneath there is a realization by moderates that the United States had justification for its action and hence the resentment will probably die away. Ambassador Mora now plans to leave for Washington this week-end and he should be able to give you a worthwhile view of the situation. He was very helpful here because of his restraining influence.

There is one adverse consequence of the wool tops ban which will linger on—that is, a worsening of the Uruguayan dollar position which is already bad. Exports to the United States constitute the principal source of dollars, amounting last year to $50,000,000 including $15,000,000 from tops, but this sum was more than offset by the dollar value of imports from there. In addition, Uruguay carries on trade in dollars with other countries at a net loss. Provisional estimates of trade with the United States for the first quarter of 1953 show an improvement of the Uruguayan position but at the expense of diminished imports from the United States. While the subject is too involved for treatment in a letter, it is certain that the loss of tops dollars will be fairly serious.

Overshadowing the economic factors, there is always the sensitive question of Uruguayan relations with Argentina. The Department was undoubtedly right in failing to mention Argentina in connection with tops in view of the explosive situation across the river, but this failure caused uneasiness here. The Peronista pressure against Uruguay continues, and it will probably continue even if the gentleman carries out his agreement to send an Ambassador here. Our Embassy is convinced that Perón did what he could to undermine this government during the general strike last September and the Uruguayan government is always apprehensive that he may try it again.

The Uruguayans, as we advised the Department, dislike the idea of Dr. Eisenhower coming here on a week-end and they will probably grumble again when they learn that he is visiting Argentina first. I think we can work out an acceptable schedule of dates without complicating the schedule too much and the business of visiting Argentina first should not be too important.

It is highly probable that on his visit here, the Uruguayans will seek some assurances from Dr. Eisenhower vis-à-vis Argentina and it may be well to begin thinking about it now. I appreciate that on a good will visit to eleven Latin American countries, Dr. Eisenhower can hardly single out Uruguay for preferential treatment. Yet, Uruguay has been constant in its friendship to the United States and steadfast in its devotion to democratic principles and I think it deserves a degree of consideration a little above the ordinary. (Perhaps each Ambassador thinks the same about his post.) Quite frankly, just what we can do to reassure Uruguay or possibly to help overcome its economic difficulties, I haven't been able to figure out.

The press has reported that you may come along with Dr. Eisenhower and if so we shall be happy to do what we can to make your visit pleasant and profitable.

With best wishes.

Sincerely yours, EDWARD L. RODDAN

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Officer in Charge of River Plate Affairs (Dearborn)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 26, 1953.

Subject: Problems of International Packers in Argentina and Uruguay

Participants: Mr. Thomas Taylor, International Packers
Mr. Guy Whitney, International Packers
Assistant Secretary Cabot
Mr. Cottrell (OSA)
Mr. Dearborn (OSA)

Mr. Thomas Taylor and Mr. Guy Whitney of International Packers called on Mr. Cabot this afternoon to discuss the problems of their company in Argentina and Uruguay. Mr. Whitney said he had been on leave in the United States since last May and planned to be back in Buenos Aires August 31.

Mr. Taylor asked about US-Argentine relations since the visit of Dr. Milton Eisenhower to Buenos Aires. Mr. Cabot replied that they had improved and that certain concrete steps had been taken by the Peron Government which were favorable to us. He remarked however that he wished confidentially to say that while he hoped we could take advantage of Peron's apparently friendly disposition to work toward basic improvements, in view of Peron's past performance we could not be certain that we were permanently heading for such improvement. For the time being we wished to encourage Peron in his present attitude and we did not wish to take any steps that would induce him to revert to his anti-US position. Mr. Whitney said that this view seemed to him a very good one.

Mr. Cabot went on to say that since we were still unsure of our ground he questioned whether we should push Peron too hard. For this reason he thought it might not be a propitious time for our Embassy to make representations on behalf of International Packers. He made it clear that the Department wished to do all it could to assist the packers but that timing would be most important. Mr. Taylor agreed with this point but said that the situation was now so serious that the packers did not feel they had much time left. He amplified his remark by describing something of their difficulties. He said that his firm had been through some difficult times in Argentina during the past six years but that it had always been able to reach some agreement with the Government through friendly negotiations. He said, however, that at no time had the situation been as serious as at present and that in fact the company could not continue much longer under present circumstances. Their losses had never reached the high figure of $60,000,000 pesos which was where they were now. The situation was particularly discouraging because the packers were now unable to see the necessary high level officials who were in a position to help them. Furthermore about two weeks ago all the accountants on the Meat Board had been dismissed on the charge that they had given information to the packers. The packers' relations with the government and their general situation was at a dead center and it was most important to make progress toward a solution of their problems. Mr. Cabot replied that the Department would send a telegram to Ambassador Nufer advising him that Mr. Whitney would call on the Ambassador early next week and requesting the Ambassador to assist the packers in any way he thought would be helpful. He explained that Ambassador Nufer would be the best judge of what could be done at any given moment. Mr. Taylor and Mr. Whitney were obviously pleased by Mr. Cabot's offer to send this telegram and said they would appreciate it.

Mr. Taylor then brought up his firm's difficulties in Uruguay. He said he and Mr. Whitney had just had lunch with Ambassador Mora who had always been helpful. The Ambassador had assisted them considerably last April in obtaining action from the Uruguayan Government toward the payment of its debt to the packers. However, after Ambassador Mora left Uruguay to return to the US the company's relations with the Government had deteriorated. They had operated in Uruguay for many years and their relations with local officials had always been good but during the past year these relations had deteriorated greatly. Mr. Whitney was highly critical of the present Uruguayan Government and said that under it the country was being ruined through mismanagement and a program of subsidies which the economy could not stand. Mr. Taylor stated that the US packers were particularly disturbed by a recent decree which failed to grant them their traditional export quota. This he said was apparently retaliation by the NEC against the plants for having closed down. Mr. Taylor felt very strongly on this question of the quota and said that the US packers had a right to expect their traditional proportion of exports. In this connection he stated that the Castro interests had been assigned the amount taken from the US packers.

Mr. Taylor remarked confidentially that he was informed that the Eximbank had received an application for a loan to finance canning equipment for the Castro interests and that Uruguay had an application for a loan before the IBRD at the present time. He thought the treatment of the US packers should be considered in connection with the position taken by the US on these loans. He was particularly emphatic with regard to the canning equipment application because he said International Packers already had very large facilities of this type in Uruguay and that the country had no need for more than was already there.

Mr. Cabot said he was sorry to hear that things were going so badly in Uruguay generally and with the US packers in particular. He asked what our Embassy had been doing to help. Mr. Taylor replied that he has just received a telegram from his people in Montevideo to the effect that the Embassy was reluctant to take up the matter of the quota with the Government since the US packers had "voluntarily" closed down from January to May. Mr. Taylor took vigorous exception to the Embassy's use of the word "voluntarily" and pointed out that that was hardly the word since the plants had closed because they could not afford to keep open. He said they had borrowed all the money they could borrow in Uruguay to operate as long as they had. With reference to the application for canning equipment before the Eximbank Mr. Cabot asked Mr. Dearborn to look into the matter and said that unless there were aspects to the case that had not yet appeared he thought we should prevent such a loan from being authorized since it would run counter to the very purpose of the Bank's existence. He suggested that Mr. Dearborn also look into the applications that the Uruguayans might have before the IBRD to determine what our position should be with respect to them in the light of Uruguay's treatment of the packers.

Mr. Cabot said he thought the Uruguayan Government should be directing its efforts toward growing more cattle and sheep rather than toward increased industrialization of the cattle industry. Messrs. Taylor and Whitney were in full agreement. Mr. Cabot also expressed the view during the conversation that in his opinion American business abroad had a duty to carry on a public relations program designed to explain to local populations how the latter were benefiting from US investments. He pointed out that many US firms abroad were suffering today because of their failure to pay more attention to public relations. He made clear that he was not criticising International Packers but was stressing the importance of the subject in general. Both Mr. Taylor and

Mr. Whitney concurred and said that they were endeavoring to work out a plan which would improve their relations with the Uruguayan Government and public. Mr. Cabot suggested that the problem was one of importance to all US business abroad and he thought something might be worked out through local American Chambers of Commerce.

733.5 MSP/8–1153: Instruction

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in Uruguay[1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, September 2, 1953.

Subject: Failure of Uruguay to Initial Military Plan

A–19. Embassy despatch No. 98 of August 11, 1953[2] setting forth the situation which appears to be responsible for the failure of Uruguayan Defense officials to initial the bilateral Military Plan, despite ratification of the MSA Agreement by Uruguay, has been reviewed in the Department with great interest. From time to time since Uruguayan ratification was completed, consideration has been given to the question of whether some special effort should be made, perhaps along the lines of the last paragraph of the reference despatch, to urge Uruguayan officals to take the step essential to the initiation of deliveries of equipment to Uruguay under the Agreement, especially since initialling of the Military Plan immediately after Uruguayan ratification of the Agreement was a commitment explicitly agreed upon as a condition to our approval of the unique procedure which was followed in this case. It was decided, however, that it would be difficult for such action on our part to be taken without creating the unfortunate impression that fulfillment of the program was something more desired by us than it was in the interest of Uruguay itself.

However, it may soon become necessary for planning purposes and administrative reasons, to reach a definitive decision on implementation of the program for transfer of equipment to Uruguay, and it will be essential to know whether Uruguay intends to meet the indispensable condition prerequisite to participation in the program. It is therefore suggested that you take an early opportunity to discuss this matter with Domínguez Cámpora, making it plain to him that it is essential for the reasons given above that those responsible for implementing the program in this Government know whether Uruguay actually wishes to receive our assistance in the manner contemplated when the negotiations were carried on. While we are sympathetic with regard to any internal difficulties this may pose, it is our desire that Uruguay understand fully the possibility that extended delay in initialling the Plan may make it impossible for this significant strengthening of Uruguay's defense capability to be carried out.

If Domínguez introduces extraneous issues into the conversation, such as wool tops, he should be reminded of the irrelevance of these issues in the light of past history. At his own request, explained entirely on the basis of the special aspects of the Uruguayan constitutional system, the United States waived the practice insisted upon in other negotiations of initialling the Plan immediately after the signing of the Agreement. This was accepted only because Domínguez assured us that the Plan would be initialled immediately following ratification.

With reference to the fourth paragraph of the Embassy's despatch No. 98 of August 11, the Department believes that the Embassy should make no further effort to discourage Uruguayan officials from showing the Plan to Herrerista members of the Consejo, since this is so strictly an internal Uruguayan matter that suggestions from us pertaining thereto might be counterproductive.

RESTRICTED [WASHINGTON,] October 27, 1953.

Subject: Call on the President of Dr. Alberto Domínguez Cámpora

Participants: The President
Dr. Alberto Domínguez Cámpora
The Ambassador of Uruguay
John F. Simmons, Chief of Protocol

His Excellency Dr. Alberto Domínguez Cámpora, Chairman of the Uruguayan Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly, called on the President by appointment at 11:15 a.m. today.

The main theme of Dr. Domínguez Cámpora's conversation with the President was the difficulty constantly being experienced by Uruguay in relation to the intrigues of the neighboring country of Argentina which seemed to be constantly revealing its hand as wishing a kind of "hegemony" over Uruguay.

He said that the Uruguayan Government and people were constantly being exposed to this type of intrigue, usually taking the form of infiltrations of individual Argentine agents, in large measure among the junior officers of the Uruguayan Army, as well as in the universities and in the political life of the country.

He said that this question was so serious that he felt compelled to bring it personally to the President's attention. He stressed the point that, the moment any apparent deterioration came to light in our relations with Uruguay, such as in our recent commercial disputes, this fact was seized upon and exploited by Argentina to create further difficulties. In referring to Argentina, he usually spoke of the "Perón Government".

The President assured him that we have the highest respect, admiration and friendship for Uruguay; that there are no real differences at all between our two countries; that divergent viewpoints are always apt to occur in international relations and particularly in commercial matters.

Dr. Domínguez Cámpora expressed profound satisfaction at hearing these reassuring words and said that the Uruguayan Government and people always have had, and will continue to have, the greatest admiration and respect for the United States and its people.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot) to the Chargé in Uruguay (Trueblood)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 2, 1953.

DEAR EDDIE: I am very grateful to you for your letter of October 26[2] and am naturally much distressed at the violence of the Uruguayan reaction to our rapprochement with Peron. I frankly find myself a little puzzled at the tenor of this reaction.

I should think that the Uruguayans would realize that, since we have signed solemn commitments of nonintervention, we should live up to them. Even if we had not made any such commitment, it strikes me that it would be inherently poor diplomacy to cultivate bad relations with every government we didn't altogether like. If we were to seek quarrels rather than conciliation, we should have to complain of the dictatorships in several other Latin American republics; we should have to complain of graft in practically every one of them; we should have to complain of mismanagement and inefficiency in others; we should have to complain at the treatment of American companies in a number of countries, including Uruguay; and we should have to take into account all sorts of unfriendly sentiments expressed from time to time by officials or officially-inspired media of publicity in yet others. Considering that we maintain cordial relations with Tito, Franco, Chiang, Syngman Rhee and an assorted group of heads of government whose policies are not altogether to our liking, it frankly seems to me that this is a very shortsighted attitude to take. In the present state of world affairs we simply cannot afford the luxury of quarreling unless we have to.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Cabot.
[2] Not printed.

The fact is that Peron has shown his intentions to improve relations with us by a whole series of actions. I need merely cite the cessation of the vicious Argentine propaganda against us throughout the Hemisphere and the vastly improved position of American news agencies and periodicals to show the important advantages we have secured by a conciliatory policy.

With regard to Uruguay's position vis-à-vis Argentina, one of the reasons (a minor rather than a major one, to be perfectly truthful) that we sought to improve our relations with Argentina was the thought that it would help Uruguay in the jam in which she has gotten herself in her relations with Argentina. The Uruguayans should appreciate that these matters will not be settled in a day and that they would be well advised to be conciliatory rather than stiff necked. I do feel, however, that relations between Argentina and Uruguay are likely to improve as a result of the improvement in relations between Argentina and the United States.

With regard to our economic policies, I am frankly at a loss to understand the Uruguayan position. Since I have not studied our trade agreement and its applicability to the particular situations we face today, I do not know which would be the more hurt if the Uruguayans should denounce it. However, my impression is that the Uruguayans have blandly ignored it whenever it suited their convenience. We have, of course, imposed countervailing duties on their wool tops and I think you know how much we in this Department regretted that decision. I hope that the reduction in this duty of which Mora will be informed today will somewhat assuage their wrath. They seem, however, to overlook the fact that, due to their monkeying with the exchange rate, wool tops were really muscling into our domestic market and that they did nothing effective about it when we warned them that they were heading for trouble. I do not know whether we are equally misinformed in thinking that only a few Uruguayan firms were directly affected by this order. I would say that we had an equal right to feel aggrieved regarding such Uruguayan moves as the UN resolution they sponsored which tried to pull the rug from under our foreign investments or the way in which they have hamstrung our packing companies in Uruguay.

I am very seriously concerned as to what might happen to our relations with Uruguay if we increase the duty on wool. As you must be aware, we have been doing everything we can in the Department to fight this possibility, but we are up against very serious opposition. If the increase should go through I would understand Uruguayan resentment, but at the moment I think they are being more emotional than reasonable in their attitude toward the United States. However, they're not the only ones in the world.

You were, of course, right in reporting these things even though they seem unreasonable and make unpleasant reading. You might give my personal greetings to Juan Yriart and tell him that so far as I am aware I haven't yet started to grow horns.

With every good wish,

Very sincerely yours, JOHN M. CABOT

The Secretary of Agriculture (Benson) to the President

WASHINGTON, December 9, 1953.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In 1949 the United States negotiated tariff concessions with Uruguay at Annecy under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade[1] with respect to United States duties on canned beef, pickled and cured beef and veal, and meat extract.

The Government of Uruguay delayed entering the agreement until the middle of the past month. During the intervening 4 years the deadline for signing the agreement was periodically extended for Uruguay. It appears that the reason Uruguay finally signed was that the GATT will permit them to increase their duties and make their import restrictions on United States' products more severe than permitted under our present bilateral reciprocal trade agreement.

Since the agreement was negotiated in 1949, we have had a marked change in our domestic beef situation. Production has expanded to an all time high level, and farm prices have dropped to extremely low levels. We are now spending vast sums in an attempt to bolster sagging cattle prices. In view of this situation, the lowering of our import duties on beef at this time would subject the Administration to severe criticism.

On December 1, we wrote[2] to the Secretary of State and called to his attention the need for action to remove these beef items from the duty reduction list which we understood you were to proclaim in the next several days. However, in a reply dated December 4,[3] the Acting Secretary of State, the Honorable Walter B. Smith, indicated that since Uruguayan action has been completed, there would appear to be no legal way in which the United States could refuse to carry out its commitments. The letter also stated that failure to extend the concessions to Uruguay as well as to other parties to GATT would be a breach of faith.

We are firmly convinced that a way must be found to either withdraw the beef items from your proclamation or delay its issuance indefinitely. Unless this is done, the granting of concessions at this time would, in the public mind, tend to nullify in large part our efforts to strengthen the cattle market.

We have just learned that the Government of Uruguay has indicated informally that if notice is received from the United States prior to December 16, and if we will specify the future date on which the schedules would apply, Uruguay would be prepared to delay application of the GATT schedules. This suggestion would meet our problem if the postponement were tied to such time as the present distress situation in the U.S. cattle market is terminated.

I would be glad to have the opportunity to discuss this matter with you and the Secretary of State.[4]

Sincerely yours, E[ZRA] T. BENSON

Memorandum by the Legal Adviser (Phleger) to the Under Secretary of State (Smith)

[WASHINGTON,] December 10, 1953.

Subject: Proclamation Carrying Out the Annecy Protocol of Terms of Accession to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade with Respect to Uruguay

At the conference attended by you, Assistant Secretary Cabot, Deputy Assistant Secretary Kalijarvi, Mr. John Leddy, Director, Office of Economic Defense and Trade Policy, Mr. Walter Hollis, L/E, and myself, after discussion of Secretary of Agriculture Benson's letter to the President on this subject, dated December 9, 1953,[1] all present agreed on the following program:

(1) That the United States concessions should not be proclaimed on December 16, 1953 pending discussions with Uruguay of the possibility of modifying the commitments that we have undertaken.

(2) That Assistant Secretary Cabot and Deputy Assistant Secretary Kalijarvi would initiate discussions at once with the Department of Agriculture looking to an agreement as to what representations could be made to Uruguay that would lead to securing agreement by it that the tariff concessions on the meat items would be dropped from the schedule to be proclaimed, it being recognized that to secure the Uruguayans' cooperation they should receive some assurances that if they met the requirements of the United States in this matter that no action would be instituted by the Department of Agriculture under Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act[2] with respect to beef.

(3) After this matter has been discussed as above, Assistant Secretary Cabot is to have discussions with the Uruguayans for the purpose of developing some satisfactory mutual arrangement which will have the effect of modifying the treatment of the meat items in the proclamation. This may well involve concessions to Uruguay which will be reported and discussed.

11 December 1953

Deputy Assistant Secretary Kalijarvi and Assistant Secretary Cabot had a conference this morning with Under Secretary of Agriculture True Morse on the above subject. The latter is to consider the matter with other officials in Agriculture to be followed by further discussion with the first-named.

HERMAN PHLEGER

411.333/12–1153

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Kalijarvi)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 11, 1953.

Subject: Proposed Duty Reduction on Beef Imports

Participants: Mr. Morse—Under Secretary of Agriculture
Mr. Cabot—ARA
Mr. Kalijarvi—E

Mr. Cabot and Mr. Kalijarvi told Mr. Morse of the meeting with General Smith on December 10,[1] and made clear the understanding and sympathy with which the Department of State regarded the problem of the Department of Agriculture with respect to the Uruguayan beef situation.

Mr. Cabot voiced concern that the Uruguayans be handled in this matter in such a way as not to produce unfavorable repercussions in the forthcoming Caracas Conference.[2] He stated that favorable Uruguayan consideration of the difficulty in which the United States now finds itself with respect to the contemplated proclamation on December 16 was colored by their anger over the countervailing duties that had been imposed by the United States on Uruguayan wool tops.

[1] See the memorandum, supra.

[2] Reference is to the Tenth Inter-American Conference, held in Caracas, Mar. 1–28, 1954; for documentation on the conference, see pp. 264 ff.

Mr. Morse stated that the amounts of beef involved were relatively small, but the problem was great in terms of its political significance. Mr. Kalijarvi pointed out that it was the feeling of the Department of State that the United States was morally and legally obligated to issue the proclamation on December 16, but that there were considerations of national interest that perhaps transcended the moral and legal factors. In the light of this, the following possibilities were discussed.

1. Withholding of the proclamation pending further study, such withholding to be done with the concurrence of the Uruguayans. (In this connection, Mr. Morse suggested the possibility of making the proclamation on December 16 as required, but omitting therefrom the meat items. He was informed that it was the view of the Department of State that such a proclamation would merely highlight the items in controversy and that it would be preferable to withhold the proclamation on the entire list.)
2. Concessions on wool or wool tops or some other item which might be used in negotiation with the Uruguayans on this matter.

It was emphasized that the Department of Agriculture should undertake not to institute any Section 22 proceedings[3] with respect to beef if an arrangement were entered into with the Uruguayans along the lines indicated above.

Mr. Cabot stated he did not believe it wise to enter into discussions with the Uruguayans until the Department of Agriculture had canvassed what it was prepared to concede on items of interest to Uruguay.

The meeting closed with the undertaking by Mr. Morse to take the problem back to the Department of Agriculture for further consideration along the lines discussed.

394.31/12–1453

The Under Secretary of Agriculture (Morse) to the Under Secretary of State (Smith)

WASHINGTON, December 14, 1953.

DEAR GENERAL SMITH: This is in response to your request for our comments regarding the feasibility of offering new concession items to Uruguay as some compensation to them for the United States decision to delay application of the duty concession on various beef items negotiated in 1949.

We have reviewed our situation with respect to these points. We can agree to your informing the Uruguayans that we would not object to a prompt withdrawal of the countervailing duties on wool tops imported from Uruguay as soon as the Treasury Department has found that subsidies are no longer being paid on such imports.

Also, we believe you should emphasize to the Government of Uruguay that action at this time to put the duty concessions on beef into effect would not be in their long time interest. First, Uruguay is not the major supplier[1] of these items to the United States. Therefore, the benefit would have accrued primarily to the other supplying countries. Second, the establishment of lower rates would have increased pressure for restrictive action under import control legislation.

Sincerely yours, TRUE D. MORSE

[1] The "principal supplier" rule was basic to the U.S. concept of multilateral tariff reduction within the framework of GATT.

Editorial Note

On December 24, 1953, President Eisenhower issued a proclamation making effective as of December 16 certain tariff concessions initially negotiated with Uruguay in 1949 within the framework of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, excluding the duty reductions provided for in the 1949 Agreement with respect to canned beef, pickled and cured beef and veal, and meat extract. The Ambassador in Uruguay (McIntosh) to the Department of State

SECRET MONTEVIDEO, January 19, 1954.

NO. 328

Subject: Report by the U.S. Ambassador to Uruguay to the Director for Mutual Security on the Operation and Status of Programs Under the Mutual Security Act of 1951. Period Covered: July 1 to December 30, 1953.

The bilateral military assistance pact between Uruguay and the United States became fully effective on October 14, 1953, with the initialling by representatives of each government of the military plan.[1] Thereafter, pursuant to the Department's instructions, conversations were begun by the Service Attachés with the Minister of National Defense[2] with a view to encouraging the Uruguayan Government to make available the amounts of local currency needed to establish a MAAG. Unfortunately, the Minister took the position that due to the fact that Uruguay is entering a pre-election period with national elections scheduled for November 1954, it would be imprudent for the Government here to take any steps which might make the pact a campaign issue. The Minister recalled the bitter fight which the government had had to obtain congressional ratification of the pact and expressed the view that the setting up of a military advisory group at this time would be certain to attract attention and thus revive the whole issue. The Minister and the Inspector General of the Army suggested the possibility of an ad hoc operation of the agreement (involving no expenditure of funds by Uruguay) whereby either existing U.S. service personnel in Uruguay would be utilized, or if additional personnel were required, they should be incorporated in the Attaché set-up rather than as part of an advisory group.

[1] Concurrent with the negotiations for the Military Assistance Agreement between the United States and Uruguay, representatives of the two countries conducted negotiations for a supplementary military plan. This "Plan of the Governments of Uruguay and the United States of America for Their Common Defense," initialed on Oct. 14, was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 199, from Montevideo, dated Oct. 16, 1953, not printed (733.5 MSP/10–1653).

A further complication is the Uruguayan constitutional provision which forbids the voting of appropriations in the 12-month period immediately preceding elections. This would apparently preclude any request for additional funds for the MAAG until after the elections, even providing the government here was disposed to request such funds.

At the close of the period under review, instructions were received by the Embassy to make a further effort to persuade the Uruguayan government to implement the pact by setting up the MAAG. In view of the facts as described above, the officers concerned with this problem are not optimistic that it will be possible to change the Uruguayan government's decision. The Foreign Office, however, has sent instructions on the subject to the Uruguayan Ambassador in Washington, who is expected to further discuss the matter with the Department.

The actual situation is that at present the pact is being implemented and operated without the setting-up of a MAAG organization in Uruguay. This has been accomplished through the USAF mission performing the duties of MAAG. To date, approximately 75 tons of aircraft spares have been received. This equipment is now being warehoused. End-item utilization of some of these parts is expected before the end of the fiscal year 1954.

Due to the problems attending the initiation of MAAG in Uruguay, it is doubtful that visits of the programmed teams will be called during this fiscal year. However, this project will be given further consideration as the conditions surrounding MAAG in Uruguay are clarified.

As regards Uruguay's ability to meet the financial obligations incurred under the pact, reference is made to comments on this subject in Ambassador Roddan's report of July 10, 1953[3] in which he called attention to the government's growing financial difficulties. Since that was written, the government's financial position has further deteriorated. Considering, however, that only relatively small amounts of local currency are required to establish a MAAG in Uruguay, it can be expected that once the government feels able to move ahead, the necessary funds should be forthcoming.

The situation between Uruguay and Argentina continues unsatisfactory with trade and travel practically at a standstill. There seems no immediate prospect of improvement in this situation, which inevitably creates tension and anxiety in a small, relatively defenseless country such as Uruguay. The recent improvement in Argentine-U.S. relations, however, while regarded by many Uruguayans with some uneasiness may eventually pave the way for more normal relations between Uruguay and Argentina.

There has been a definite cooling of Uruguayan traditional friendship for the United States during the past six months, due in part to uneasiness as just mentioned, over the closer relations between Washington and Buenos Aires, as well as to resentment over U.S. tariff policies, belief that the U.S. is too tolerant of dictatorships, etc. Despite this cooling, however, we believe that there is no reason to doubt that Uruguay would stand firm with the United States on the great issues in world affairs.

In technical assistance, FOA/IIAA activities, civil aviation was added during the past six months to the fields of assistance provided in Uruguay. This makes a total of three new fields of activity initiated during 1953, the other two being Industrial Safety and Census and Statistics, bringing to a new peak the scope of technical assistance to Uruguay. The program continues relatively small, however, with only nine U.S. personnel assigned to this country.

The principal activity in the past six months has continued to be in Public Health, with emphasis on the operation of six health centers. The tenth anniversary of the cooperative health program was celebrated in November with various ceremonies. The U.S. Ambassador made the trip to Young, near Paysandú, and to San José, to participate in the opening of a new health center in those towns. Both the ordinary citizenry and the Uruguayan officials in the localities are fully aware of, and appreciative of, U.S. participation in these projects, which have been widely publicized in the local press.

[3] Apparent reference to despatch 20, not printed (103 MSA/7–1053).

In the field of public administration, progress continued in advising the government on a public purchasing law, sound procurement policies, etc. The census consultants attached to the program continue to work with Uruguayan officials toward the goal of the first national census in many decades. An expert on industrial safety continued his work in this field and an in-service training course for inspectors of the Ministry of Industries and Labor was completed on November 30. A survey was completed in December 1953 of the air traffic control at the international airport in Carrasco near Montevideo. In December, at the request of the Uruguayan state-owned airline, a survey of eight airports in the interior of the country was initiated by an engineer of the regional aviation assistance group. Training grants were awarded in a total of 14 for the year 1953, in the fields of:

Social Welfare Home Economics
Vital Statistics
Statistics
Agriculture
Industrial Safety
Coast and Geodetic Survey
Railroad Management Airport Management
Labor

Satisfactory progress in the FOA field continued during the last six months of the year. However, the program continued to be handicapped by dilatoriness of both governments in making their financial contributions available. This delay, usually on the side of Uruguay, has handicapped technical assistance activities in Uruguay practically ever since their inception. In view of the cumbersome way the Uruguayan government proceeds, however, there is little hope that this situation can be entirely cleared up. At the end of the period under review, the Institute had presented to Washington the question of whether the Uruguayan government should be requested to extend the health and sanitation program until 1955; otherwise, it would terminate in 1954. Instructions are being awaited on this point.

Technical assistance is needed in Uruguay to a greater extent than has been requested. Receptivity of the assistance is generally good among the executive departments. On the other hand, the political situation results in slow or no action on proposals before the legislature, under similar conditions encountered by the military assistance pact. The agricultural agreement remains unratified by the parliament and is considered dead in view of the present proposal to obtain assistance from the Food and Agriculture Organization. The basic technical assistance agreement likewise has not received legislative consideration. The Industrial Productivity agreement received preliminary bipartisan approval in August by the plural Executive, but nothing is known as to the reception it may find if and when presented to the parliament. Requests for assistance are usually initiated within the government agencies by interested Uruguayan officials who steer the project so as to obtain the approval of top executive authorities. This manner of making requests, lacking as it does a coordinated approach, has resulted in a spotty program rather than an integrated, balanced program. The prospect for a more balanced program exists, however, if multilateral technical assistance in agriculture through FAO, now awaiting legislative approval, and the Industrial Productivity Program through IIAA, are initiated.

The hundreds of favorable contacts made annually by U.S. technicians with government officials and business men of Uruguay, in addition to the substantive results of technical assistance, are considered to be significantly helpful in focusing attention on the interest of the U.S. in Uruguay's welfare, thus strengthening the feeling of friendship with the U.S among numerous Uruguayans.

Despite the various discouragements and setbacks, it is believed important to the national policy for the United States to continue to try to assist Uruguay in the field of technical assistance.

Subject: Transmitting Conversation with Minister of Finance

Continuing the policy of discussing informally with important government officials the problem of the American packing houses in Uruguay, I met with the Minister of Finance[1] in the latter's office on August 23 for the purpose of further discussing this problem with him (see Emb. Desp. No. 26 of July 20, 1954).[2] Attached hereto is a memorandum[3] summarizing my conversation with the Minister.

With reference to the informal discussions that I have had with government officials, I should add that the American packers had one of their periodic meetings with the Minister of Agriculture and other government officials on the day following my conversation with the Minister of Finance. The manager of Frigorifico Artigas (Armour) informed the Embassy subsequent to that meeting that the Minister of Agriculture, at the conclusion of the meeting, said that he has received reports that a "foreign diplomat" was "intervening" in matters being discussed by the committee and that if he confirmed these reports, he was disposed to suspend the work of the committee and carry the matter to parliament. The representative of Frigorifico Nacional at the meeting, following conclusion of the session, informed the American packing house managers that he associated himself entirely with the views of the Minister. A subsequent meeting of the committee was held on August 26, during which, according to the manager of Frigorifico Artigas, the Minister made no reference to his earlier remark and was, on the contrary, exceptionally friendly as was also the representative of Frigorifico Nacional.

As the Department will appreciate from my reports of my previous conversations, I have been careful to discuss these problems on a very informal basis and I have refrained from making any demands or even "representations" during such discussions. Officials with whom I have discussed the problem have been invariably friendly, evidencing no trace of resentment. On the contrary, they have indicated to me that they welcomed the opportunity to discuss the matter in a frank and friendly atmosphere. It will be noted that during my last talk with the Minister of Finance, he himself suggested that I seek another interview with the President of the National Council of Government. While I do not discount entirely the possibility that the Minister of Agriculture, who has an emotional, volatile temperament and who is under heavy criticism from all sides, might attempt to divert criticism from himself or justify a failure of the meetings that he has been conducting to find a solution to the packing house problem, by raising a question of "diplomatic intervention", I believe that we have been following a correct course and that we should not permit his threat to divert us from that course if it appears otherwise desirable that we continue it. On the other hand, I do not believe that we should permit pressure from the private packers to push us along such a course to the point that it becomes counter-productive or jeopardizes other interests.

I should add that the meetings of the government committee with representatives of the private packing houses which have now been going on for a month and a half, have as yet produced no concrete results and that the managers of the American packing houses believe that the only hope of achieving concrete results in these discussions lies in continued informal manifestation of interest on our part in the problem.

Ref: Circular Airgram Control 2139, November 24, 1952.[1]

Subject: Report by the U.S. Ambassador to Uruguay to the Director for Mutual Security on the Operation and Status of Programs Under the Mutual Security Act of 1951. Period Covered: January 1 to June 30, 1954.

A. Country's Adherence to Commitments Made in the Course of MSP Aid Negotiations.

With the entry into effect of the Bilateral Military Assistance Pact on October 14, 1953, the way was cleared during the period under review for sending grant aid matériel provided for under the agreement. It should be pointed out, however, that only the Air Force was able to receive this matériel since the U.S. Air Force Mission in Uruguay was able to function as an Air Force section of MAAG. This was due to the position taken by the Minister of National Defense who, because of the approaching national elections in November 1954, felt it unwise to set up the type of MAAG contemplated by the agreement and which would result in both further expense to the Uruguayan Government (which would have to be covered by an appropriation sought from the Congress) as well as the entry into Uruguay of additional foreign military personnel at a time when this might be criticized by the Blanco Party, which has consistently made an issue of the military bilateral pact.

Conversations were begun in June with the Minister of Foreign Affairs designed to permit the attachment to the Air Mission of four Navy personnel who would then act as a Navy MAAG and permit the shipment of Navy matériel to begin. The outlook was that the Minister of National Defense would agree to this arrangement.

Uruguay's new National Government will take office on March 1, 1955, and it is hoped that shortly thereafter the position of MAAG can be regularized and to include all three services.

B. Political Developments Affecting Prospects of Adherence to Force Goals, Including Action on Defense Budgets.

The approaching national elections made the majority Colorado Party somewhat timid about full implementation of the pact, as explained above. It was considered a foregone conclusion that the Blancos, traditionally anti-U.S., who fought the ratification of the bilateral pact in Congress at the time it was under discussion, would also make a campaign issue out of the pact.

C. Major Economic Developments Which Might Appreciably Affect Aid Levels.

Following a slow and uncertain beginning, the world market for Uruguayan wool steadied and improved which, combined with careful control of Uruguay's imports, resulted in a definitely easier foreign trade position during the period under review. Since wool sales to a large extent determine Uruguay's prosperity, the good season was reflected in a somewhat improved budgetary position for the Government which, however, was still unable to balance its budget. The series of deficits in recent years, combined with the limited local capital market, have tended to make credit tight and restrict new investment. Following a feeling of disappointment that the Inter-American Conference in Caracas in March did not take up economic questions, as the time of the Economic Conference to be held in Rio de Janeiro[2] in November approached, the Government manifested increasing interest in this meeting, at which it hopes major achievements in promoting inter-American economic stability will be forthcoming. A significant economic development during the period under review was the entry of the USSR into the Uruguayan market for heavy purchases principally of meat.

D. Defense Alliances and Other Developments in International Relations Affecting Security.

Uruguay's relations with its powerful neighbor to the West, Argentina, continued unsatisfactory, with full diplomatic relations interrupted, travel requirements so onerous as to greatly restrict the number of persons each way, and trade substantially curtailed. The Embassy has no reason to believe there is any likelihood of any substantial change in the situation in the near future.

Relations with Brazil continued friendly, although the inroads of Communism and the ineffectualness of the Vargas regime were disturbing thoughtful Uruguayan observers.

There was considerable uneasiness manifested during the period in review over Argentine encroachments in Paraguay.

The Guatemalan situation was followed with great attention in Uruguay, especially since for a time it seemed as though the projected Foreign Ministers' Conference would be held in Montevideo. Sectors of the press and public opinion were inclined to discount U.S. motives in the Guatemalan case and to be critical of the U.S. position opposing consideration of the case by the UN Security Council. These developments were heavily exploited by anti-U.S. elements in Uruguay.

E. Effect of MSP Aid in Furthering Internal Political Stability and Security.

None.

F. General Progress in Activation of Planned Forces.

None.

G. General Effect on Progress Toward Force Goals of Deliveries of U.S. Furnished End-Items.

The Air Force Mission continued to perform the duties of an Air Force Section, MAAG, grant aid matériel arrived in substantial quantities, cleared the customs without difficulty and was properly warehoused by the Uruguayan Air Force.

At the beginning of this period very little progress was shown by the UAF. Since that time, as more supplies began to arrive and as greater pressure was placed on them by the US Air Force Mission, a definite change in attitude was observed. The morale of personnel has increased proportionately with the amount of supplies arriving. An increased effort to begin utilizing the equipment and to place aircraft in commission has been undertaken and appears to be improving with each passing month. The tactical aircraft in particular are getting a very high priority of consideration in this program. The B–25s began flying during the latter part of this period for the first time in over a year. Additional F–51s were placed in commission as a direct result of the matériel received.

H. General Ability of Country's Defense Establishment to Utilize Military Aid

The personnel problem is increasing in severity as spare parts become available to place aircraft in commission. Sufficient trained specialists to maintain the UAF are not available. The supply and maintenance fields are hardest hit by this shortage of personnel. Every effort, as indicated in other paragraphs of this report, is being made to rectify the situation. Very little improvement can be expected in less than one year, as this is the expected duration of the first training program now under way in the Technical Training School.

The Air Force MAAG is firmly convinced that more progress has been made by the UAF during this six-month period than at any other time since the arrival of the Mission. Key staff personnel have accepted new responsibilities and are pushing the MDA Program in a definite attempt to maintain their portion of the mutual security pact.

Although many major problems still exist, it is felt that the hump is passed and real progress will be shown during the forthcoming period.

I. Major Developments with Respect to Defense Production Plans and Programs.

None.

J. Major Trends with Respect to Economic Development Plans and Programs.

None.

K. Economic and Social Effects of Point IV Programs.

In view of the small scale of the Technical Assistance Programs, the country has no problem in utilizing effectively the assistance being provided. The Health and Sanitation program continued to perform a useful function during the period under review, and in addition there was activity in each of the following fields: Public Administration, Census and Economic Statistics, Industrial Safety, Civil Aviation, Development of National [Natural?] Resources, and the Training of Nationals in the United States. In addition, negotiations were continued for expanding the scope of the Technical Assistance projects being performed to include the following: A university contract for Technical Assistance in Public Administration; an Industrial Productivity Servicio to aid Uruguay with its problems of industrialization; a project of budgetary management in one of the principal Ministries; and a program for exchange of books between the Uruguayan libraries and the U.S. Book Exchange.

L. Attitude of Government and Public toward U.S. Aid Programs.

There was no progress during the period under review toward ratification of the General Agreement on Technical Assistance, which has been awaiting congressional ratification since 1951. It will be recalled that an Agricultural Program for which an agreement was also signed in 1951 had to be abandoned after U.S. experts had spent considerable time in Uruguay because of failure of the Uruguayan Congress to ratify the Agreement. Negotiations for the Industrial Productivity Servicio were proceeding satisfactorily at the close of the period under review and it appeared as though there was definite interest in the Uruguayan Government for concluding this agreement. The dilatoriness of the Government toward the ratification of the General Agreement, however, and the failure of the Agricultural Agreement (which normally would be one of the most important fields for Technical Cooperation), indicates that the present political situation in the Parliament does not create the most favorable condition for requests for additional technical cooperation. It is believed that this factor should be kept in mind in planning new programs and also in connection with any consideration of extending the life of the Health and Sanitation Agreement which is scheduled to expire in 1955, but which is to be subject to a critical analysis of future needs in November 1954.

Insofar as the general public is aware of what the U.S. is doing in technical assistance for Uruguay, there is a healthy and friendly attitude toward such cooperation. The FOA experts enjoy considerable prestige and assert an effective influence in the spheres in which they operate. It is still doubted whether in the most important activity—the Health and Sanitation Program—the Uruguayan public realizes the extent of the contribution of U.S. taxpayers.

On the side of military aid, the beginning of deliveries of matériel for the Air Force created an excellent impression in the Armed Forces and among top Government officials familiar with the situation. As deliveries are extended to the Navy, and perhaps later to the Army following official establishment of a MAAG, it is certain that this feeling will become even stronger. It is to be desired that at some future stage after the new Government is inaugurated, steps may be taken to educate the Uruguayan public concerning the utility of U.S. cooperation with the Uruguayan military forces.

CONFIDENTIAL
OFFICIAL–INFORMAL

MONTEVIDEO, December 1, 1954.

DEAR HENRY: The results of the Uruguayan elections are now in and Luis Batlle Berres and his Lista 15 have won by an unexpectedly large majority. The result is that Lista 15 will have 6 of the 9 members in the new National Council of Government with Luis Batlle Berres as the President.

It is obviously important that we develop and maintain close friendly relations with Batlle Berres in the future. As you know, Batlle Berres is a strong, dominant character and he will unquestionably personally exercise a great deal more power and authority in the Uruguayan Government, which comes into office next March, than the present president, Martinez Trueba has done.

Batlle Berres has never been to the United States and he has indicated on a number of occasions that he would be very much interested in visiting the States. I personally feel that if an official invitation were to be issued to Batlle Berres to visit the United States, such a visit would be a tremendously important factor in improving our relations with Uruguay in the future and I would urge that serious consideration be given to extending an official invitation to Batlle Berres as soon as may be possible. It is quite possible that Batlle Berres, if an invitation were extended to him, would be prepared to visit the United States in January or February in the capacity of the elected president of the National Council of Government of Uruguay, but if an invitation could not be extended that soon, I presume Batlle Berres would welcome an invitation to make an official visit to the United States later in the year.

Due to his temperament, I feel that Batlle Berres would be particularly affected by the attention which would be paid to him on an official visit and in my opinion, such a visit to the United States would result in Batlle Berres' becoming a more friendly and a more dependable ally of our country. While ostensibly friendly to the United States, at various times during the past year, in his newspaper Acción, Batlle Berres has taken quite a critical position towards us, but I feel that a visit to the United States would do much to change his attitude in the future.

I fully understand that I should not indicate to Batlle Berres in any way that he may expect an offical invitation to visit the United States, and I have not done so, nor will I do so in the future unless I am instructed accordingly. However, I feel that the matter is of such importance that I am writing to you to recommend that the Department consider the extension of an invitation to Batlle Berres at the first opportunity.[1]

I am sure that the Conference in Rio has been very difficult, but I trust the final results will be reasonably satisfactory.

With kindest regards, I am

Sincerely yours, DEMPSTER MCINTOSH

POLITICAL, ECONOMIC, AND MILITARY RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND VENEZUELA[1]

731.5/2–152

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Military Attaché in Venezuela (Shaw)[2]

TOP SECRET CARACAS, 31 January 1952.

Ambassador Warren and Col. Shaw had an audience with Col. Marcos Perez Jiménez[3] this morning from 11:30 a.m. until 12:10 p.m. The Ambassador had requested the audience for the purpose of discussing with the Minister (1) certain points concerning military aid to Latin American countries under the terms of the Mutual Security Act[4] and (2) the continuation of military planning talks between the Ministry of Defense and General Morris'[5] headquarters in the Canal Zone.

The Ambassador began the conversation with an explanation to the Minister that a recent United States law authorized the granting of military aid to Latin American countries at United States expense in order to further western hemisphere defense. Venezuela has not been included in this program because the law is aimed primarily at arming those Latin American countries which cannot afford to arm themselves. Since Venezuela has a splendid record of wishing to pay cash for all arms assistance that she may receive, it is hoped that Venezuela will understand why she is omitted from the current list of countries to receive free arms aid and will continue to be willing to pay in the future as she has been in the past. It was also brought out that Venezuela's desire to pay for whatever she needs had been of assistance in obtaining the Mutual Security Act.

Colonel Perez Jiménez seemed to accept without hesitation the idea that Venezuela will continue to pay her own way, then entered upon rather warm remarks to the effect that although Venezuela is willing to pay and wants to pay, she has been unable to receive any of the arms that she has sought to buy from the U.S. He referred to the destroyers which Venezuela had wanted to buy from the United States but had been unable to procure even though Chile and Peru received destroyers. The Ambassador replied that he was very familiar with the negotiations for and the sale of naval equipment to Latin American countries and made it clear to the Minister that no request to purchase ships had been received from Venezuela while he was in the Department and that all countries making requests had been treated equally.

The Minister then turned to a general discussion of the army weapons and equipment that have been requested by Venezuela and talked at considerable length detailing the specific equipment and arms that Venezuela wanted and always coming back to the point that Venezuela was having very little success in obtaining the items. He referred to the military planning talks which took place in General Morris' headquarters in March 1951[6] and stated since that time Venezuela—although its army wants have been made known since late 1950—had not received one item of equipment. It had received some replacement parts for F–47 aircraft and that was all.

The Ambassador then asked Colonel Shaw if he wished to make any remarks to the Minister in this matter. Col. Shaw stated that according to his understanding from State Department correspondence addressed to the Ambassador plus talking to Department of the Army officials, the United States was willing to proceed with the sale to Venezuela of practically everything on the list with the exception of tanks which are not currently available because tank production is going to our United States forces and to European nations under NATO. So far as tanks are concerned, Col. Shaw stated that the United States has never refused to sell these to Venezuela, but has stated repeatedly that the tanks will not be ready for some two years and as a substitution proposed an armored car for almost immediate delivery but with Venezuela, however, not being willing to accept the armored car as a substitute for tanks. Col. Shaw further stated that it is currently his understanding that within the past few months four (4) contracts of sale have been offered to Venezuela by Department of the Army and that no word has been received from Venezuela as to whether or not it accepts the contracts.

The Minister of Defense then replied that Venezuela does not want to pay full price for the articles at the time of signing the contract but wishes the advantage of some form of percentage payments (referring to the matter which was taken up by this Embassy in November 1951 when Col. Moreno[7] informed the Army Attaché that the Minister was not agreeable to further military planning talks until the United States had agreed upon some form of installment payments). The Ambassador then stated that it was his understanding that the Venezuela Foreign Office had instructed its Washington Embassy to discuss payments with the State Department. The Minister hesitated somewhat upon hearing this remark and then upon recovering himself stated that about two weeks ago the Foreign Office had notified its Washington Embassy that it would not concur in the method of payment as outlined by the State Department (in advice to this Embassy).

The Ambassador then stated to the Minister that he personally and the Army Attaché considered the matter of the arms purchase to be so important that they stood ready at all times to do everything possible to clear the matter up, to resolve misunderstandings, and to speed the sale and receipt of the desired equipment. He asked if the Minister could furnish the Embassy with a list of all material which has been requested by Venezuela and which has not been received. The Minister agreed to do this and stated he would get his staff to work upon the list immediately.

The Ambassador then asked the Minister about the possibility of resuming the military planning talks in the near future and the Minister replied that he hoped to give us an answer on that soon after discussing it with his Chief of Staff. The audience terminated at this point.

The audience was conducted in a friendly atmosphere but was none the less very frank on both sides. It should be remarked that at the opening of the conversation, the Minister spoke rather passionately as if Venezuela has not received equal treatment with other Latin American countries. Certainly, while the thought was not specifically expressed, he left no doubt that he was not happy in this thought. At the end of the conference after hearing the Ambassador and Col. Shaw, the Minister seemed more subdued as if he had begun to realize that perhaps not all the delay in the purchase of military equipment lies with the United States.

The Ambassador in Venezuela (Warren) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller)

SECRET CARACAS, February 5, 1952.

DEAR ED: While I am sure you know I have never suffered from any illusion that the successful negotiation of revisions to our existing reciprocal Trade Agreement[1] with Venezuela would be an easy matter,[2] I have never been pessimistic with regard to the eventual outcome and I am not pessimistic today. However, I am enough of a realist to recognize after my few months in Caracas certain of the difficulties which must be overcome. I have just had a long talk with the Foreign Minister, Dr. Gomez Ruiz, and the principal item on my agenda was the Trade Agreement. As a result, it is my judgement that, in addition to the Embassy's despatch no. 1198 of today,[3] containing an analysis of present thinking in Venezuela relative to the Trade Agreement, together with my telegram no. 340 of today,[4] you should be informed directly in this manner of the way the problem seems to be shaping up.

The fundamental difficulty, as I see it, is that unfortunately and due to causes entirely beyond our control, this matter of the Trade Agreement has been delayed too long. You are familiar with the efforts made last year by the Embassy to prevent a unilateral denunciation of the existing Agreement when local pressures from the protectionist group powerfully influenced the thinking of the Foreign Minister from a domestic political standpoint. Eventually the necessary legislation renewing the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act was passed by the Congress,[5] and this was followed by a brief period of high hopes on the part of the Venezuelans that it would not be long before a revised agreement could be reached. Despite all our efforts, they simply did not understand the cumbersome and time-consuming procedures required by our laws, and, despite the fact that the hearings before the Tariff Commission and the Reciprocity Information Committee were accomplished without any unreasonable delays, a general atmosphere of dissatisfaction and impatience developed toward the end of the past calendar year.

With the return from abroad of the Foreign Minister, he found himself faced with a situation that was far from easy from a domestic political standpoint. He is too well informed to believe that formal negotiations for revisions can actually begin much before April 1st, and the time necessary for such complicated negotiations, even at the most optimistic estimate, would not be less than 90 days. The question confronting him then is whether or not he feels strong enough to hold the line through the first six months of this calendar year.

Dr. Gomez Ruiz knows very well that we in the United States are in the middle of an election year. He also knows that within his own country the Government in power is committed to a carrying through of the electoral statutes without delay. Under such circumstances it seems to me that we must recognize the fact that the Government of Venezuela at present is not only a Military Junta but that more and more real power is being concentrated in the hands of one member[6] of the Junta. There is no Cabinet Minister today in Venezuela whose authority is great enough to stand alone on any major political subject, and, regardless of how much the Foreign Minister may wish a successful renegotiation of the Trade Agreement, he may be forced, if there are further delays, accompanied by increasing domestic pressures, to accede to the wishes of one member of the Junta.

I believe firmly that if there should be a failure to negotiate successfully a revision of the existing Trade Agreement, there would inevitably set in a deterioration in relations between the United States and Venezuela, and in all probability the solution of many pending problems, such as, for example, our bilateral Civil Aviation Agreement,[7] might become impossible of mutually satisfactory solution.

Unless the administration in power can present to the people of Venezuela a revised Trade Agreement which will clearly and unequivocally show a material improvement over the Mexican Agreement as far as oil is concerned and simultaneously give to the protectionist group in Venezuela part of what it demands, the prospects at this moment, to my mind, of a successful renegotiation are definitely not bright. I believe, therefore, that if anything can be done in the way of speeding up the delivery of arms and military equipment to Venezuela, such action would tend to remove existing irritation and help to put the Military Junta in a more favorable frame of mind to support the Foreign Minister in his plea for more patience. Furthermore, if we are finally able to enter into actual negotiations, every member of the U.S. team must be impressed with the fact that under the existing emergency there is far more to be gained by granting concessions, even at the risk of having it considerd a "one-way street", than there is to try to negotiate on a strictly legalistic basis.

As I said at the beginning, I am not pessimistic. The Foreign Minister is subject to the influence of his principal adviser on this matter, Dr. Reyna,[8] who has pointed out clearly that Venezuela has a better chance for obtaining a degree of protectionism if it does not fight too hard on petroleum. Furthermore, Mr. Wolf[9] has continually pointed out to Dr. Reyna that in the redrafting of the basic provisions of the existing Trade Agreement, certain advantages may accrue to Venezuela, particularly with regard to quantitative restrictions, which could eventually prove more valuable than the specific items in Schedule I. Reyna knows these things, and the Foreign Minister is considering this problem. However, we are fighting against the bad effects of long delays and no one who is well informed could say positively today that the patience of the Foreign Minister himself may not become exhausted any day. To prevent this from happening, we must find some way to create a new atmosphere of hope. I have only suggested specifically the speeding up of the delivery of arms and military supplies. Other ways of accomplishing our purpose may be apparent in Washington.

This afternoon Mr. Proudfit[10] of Creole called on me to discuss the two problems of the oil concessions and the Trade Agreement, which problems, incidentally, he regards as probably closely related. He had just spent almost four hours with Otis Ellis[11] and was seriously disturbed. After he had presented his views relative to the danger, not only to Venezuela but to the United States, of Venezuela's granting new concessions to independents without adequate financial and moral responsibility (and I cannot emphasize too strongly that he would be more than willing to see the right types of independent operators come in) he stated that he was gravely concerned with the possibility that the Foreign Minister might denounce the Trade Agreement unless he could clearly show to the Venezuelan people that he had obtained something better than the Mexican Agreement. He said he was thoroughly convinced that the peril point findings of the Tariff Commission had resulted in a rate of 10½ cents and he added that while Otis Ellis protested continually his ignorance, he felt Otis Ellis was convinced that the rate is 10½ cents. He said that he was considering departing for Washington immediately by air in order that he could do his part without any further loss of time in preventing any official action on the part of the United States which might force Gomez Ruiz to denounce the Agreement. Mr. Proudfit analyzed at great length and with considerable force the reasons for the present thinking of the Foreign Minister. He then added that he was unable to understand why, in a matter of such grave importance as this to the United States, the President might not be convinced of the advisability of declining to accept the findings of the Tariff Commission, inasmuch as the President in his announcement could always refer to the fact that domestic American interests were adequately protected under the law by the escape clause. He realized that it was a presidential election year, but he felt that the risks involved at this time of emergency of the possibility of deterioration of our relations with Venezuela were all together too great to permit the President to be too much influenced by the domestic political situation of our country.

Both Mr. Wolf and I were greatly impressed with the intense seriousness of Mr. Proudfit, a man who is not only extremely level headed but has been the outstanding leader in the petroleum industry in Venezuela for more than a quarter of a century. We believe that he is not in any way acting from selfish interests, and I am sure that, if he should indeed depart for Washington within the next few days, you will not only want to receive him but do everything possible to facilitate the purposes of his mission.

While the above was being written, Mr. Nelson Rockefeller called to pay his respects on February 6th. We reviewed the political situation and during our conversation he asked me about the progress on the Trade Agreement. I told him frankly of the situation as related in paragraph 5 of my telegram of today.[12] He immediately asked me if the oil people understood the situation. I told him that Mr. Proudfit had followed the matter as closely as has this Embassy, and that he had the matter very much on his mind and was trying to figure out what he might do about it. Mr. Rockefeller stated that he was seeing Mr. Proudfit later today (I believe he left my office to go to see Mr. Proudfit). As our conversation progressed, he said that he would like to do something to assist in the matter and, after reflection, stated that he could talk with Mr. Steelman[13] at the White House since his relations with that official are very good. He asked me what I thought of the idea, and I did not hesitate to say that I thought it was opportune and very good. Consequently, we will have the support of both of these gentlemen in an endeavor to get an agreement.

I should add that last evening (February 5) I saw Mr. Swensrud,[14] President of Gulf Oil. He had learned about the stand of Dr. Gomez Ruiz, and asked me about it. Without talking as freely or to the extent that I did with Mr. Rockefeller, I told him what the situation is at this time. He said that, when he got back to New York, he might make a trip to Washington to see whether he could be of any assistance. I feel sure he will come to see you should he decide to try to assist. I was much impressed by him.

All of us in the Embassy are agreed that there is no time to be lost. Unless some way can be found at once to assure the Foreign Minister that there is a chance of his coming up with a revised agreement, better on oil than the Mexican Agreement, there will probably be, at an early date, a denunciation of the existing agreement with all the unfortunate effects which I am sure are evident both in Caracas and Washington. Franklin Wolf and I see Srs. Reyna and Gomez Ruiz on Monday. We shall try to hold the fort until the recommendation of the Tariff Commission is known and we can be sure what are the next steps to be taken.

The Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann) to the Ambassador in Venezuela (Warren)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] February 6, 1952.

DEAR FLETCH: Ed Miller has referred to me for reply your letter of January 24, 1952.[1]

As you know, the premise on which the policy rests—and which I believe to be sound—is that contributions by American-owned companies to the political campaigns of particular groups render the companies vulnerable to charges of partisanship and intervention. We believe that the long term interests of American-owned companies are best served by their observance of strict impartiality in local politics.

The suggestion that contributions can be considered as directed against the communist simply doesn't hold water for, unless conditions have changed greatly since I was there, communist strength is relatively small compared with that of the COPEI, URD and Accion Democratica supporters. If it should become known that contributions to the government party have been made, all three of these non-communist groups would be antagonized and no one can be sure that one or all of them will not one day exercise political power in Venezuela.

If contributions were made in order to obtain concessions, the concessions, if they were granted, would be tainted with fraud which, if established later, would probably be considered by most Venezuelans ground for their cancellations. Not only would the concessions obtained through fraud be in peril but the investments in them as well. The position of other concessions not tainted with fraud would likewise be weakened.

---

[1] In his letter, Ambassador Warren informed Assistant Secretary Miller that Mr. Proudfit had been asked to make a contribution to the campaign fund of the party in power in Venezuela on the grounds that Communists were aligning themselves with opposition forces for the forthcoming elections. He further stated that Mr. Proudfit had refused the request, but in view of the possibility that other firms would be approached, the problem for the Embassy was how to assure a united front among the American-owned oil companies (Miller files, lot 53 D 26, "Venezuela").

We therefore believe that Mr. Proudfit's decision was a wise one and I hope that he will hold to it regardless of what other companies may do. I believe he was also wise in passing the buck, as it were, to the Embassy which is in a better position than Creole to resist pressure for contributions.

As for the other companies, I hope they will do likewise though I have no doubt that a few individuals will be tempted to repeat, in a different form, the mistake made a few years ago when a petition condemning Accion Democratica was signed by a number of American citizens.

It is, as you say, extremely difficult to ensure that the oil industry will present a united front on this issue. As a practical matter, we do not have the power to force them to accept our advice. I never subscribed to the theory that an American-owned company making a contribution forfeits all claim to protection by our Government. It might be possible that the circumstances surrounding the contribution would be so flagrant that we would be unable to give effective protection if action were taken by the local government to punish the company for intervention; but even within these narrow limits I believe that the prudent thing is to avoid discussion of the degree of protection which we might or might not decide to give in the future.

It seems to us that the problem of bringing about a united front is essentially one of tactics which you are in a better position to judge than we. I assume that Mr. Proudfit would, if he has not already done so, present the Department's and Embassy's views to his colleagues. If you believe that informal conversations between you and the heads of companies would have good results, there would be no objection to your discussing the problem with them informally on the basis of their self-interest. I think this largely depends on your personal relationships with people like Bill Woodson. Perhaps Mr. Proudfit would have some suggestions on whether this or some other kind of an informal approach would, under present circumstances, be helpful.

I am sorry I am unable to be more explicit but the tactics must, I think, be made to fit the local situation. In any case, I am sure that we will agree that whatever is done should be done quietly and in a friendly manner and that the Embassy should report any such political contributions which come to its knowledge.

Sincerely, THOMAS C. MANN

Memorandum of Conversation, by Maurice M. Bernbaum of the Office of South American Affairs

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 13, 1952.

Subject: Venezuelan Position on Military Equipment

Participants: Arthur Proudfit, President, Creole Petroleum Corporation
George Koegler, Standard Oil Company
Ambassador Edward Sparks
Mr. Mann
Mr. Bernbaum

Mr. Proudfit described a recent conversation with Colonel Marcos Perez Jimenez, Venezuelan Minister of Defense and Member of the Military Junta, regarding Venezuelan-US relations. Colonel Perez Jimenez then told him of his complete dissatisfaction with the negative response of the US Government to Venezuela's repeated orders for military equipment and expressed the opinion that the US did not really intend to furnish Venezuela with its requirements. While conceding good will toward Venezuela in the Department of State and in the US as a whole, he expressed the opinion that such good will did not apply to the present Military Government and that this situation was accordingly reflected in US indifference to the aspirations of the Military Junta for a build up of its military strength. Responding to Mr. Proudfit's protestations that there must have been a misunderstanding, Colonel Perez Jimenez went on to say that there was no basis for any misunderstanding since Venezuelan requirements for military equipment were clearly stated and actually approved by the US Military Negotiators at the US-Venezuelan Military Staff Talks recently held at Panama. Colonel Perez Jimenez stated that he was fully aware of the limitations on the extent to which Venezuela could expand its military forces and that Venezuela would not be in a position under any circumstances to do any effective fighting outside of its own territory or, for that matter, adequately to defend the sea approaches to Venezuela. He did insist, however, on his determination to build up a force adequate to protect Venezuela's strategic petroleum and iron ore installations. Colonel Perez Jimenez was further quoted as having stated that this question of military equipment was the most important of all outstanding problems between Venezuela and the United States. Mr. Proudfit explained this emphasis on military equipment as due largely to the pressure being exerted upon Colonel Perez Jimenez by a large number of his subordinate officers. One of them was quoted as having stated that they amount to no more than tin soldiers in the absence of the equipment necessary to make the Venezuelan army an effective fighting force. (It may clearly be inferred that Colonel Perez Jimenez considers that his most important problem is that of maintaining his prestige within the army as the basis for his continued control over the army and Venezuela as a whole. His ability to secure modern arms in adequate quantity would be a most important factor.)

Mr. Mann thanked Mr. Proudfit for this information and told him that this problem of military equipment was thoroughly understood in the Department which had been devoting a great deal of time and energy to its solution. He then described in detail the long series of misunderstandings due largely to the fact that the Venezuelan Government had not been following through with the Department of Defense on its orders for equipment. He pointed out that the list submitted by the Venezuelan Government at Panama had been submitted as an explanation of Venezuela's aspirations and had not been supplemented by firm orders to the US Government. In those relatively limited cases in which firm orders were submitted through the Department of State, there had not been the necessary follow-through to confirm such orders after the Venezuelan Military Attaché in Washington had been apprised of the results of price and availability studies. In other words, the problem here seemed to be largely one of procedure rather than of substance which would best be solved by the appointment of capable Venezuelan personnel both in Washington and in Venezuela to formulate Venezuelan requirements and follow them through the Departments of State and Defense. Mr. Mann stated that ARA had finally determined that it would be necessary for it to furnish this service to the Venezuelan Government. The Bureau has as a result undertaken the unprecedented function of maintaining a running check list of equipment ordered by the Venezuelan Government through the Department in order that such requests might be carried through to a successful conclusion.

Mr. Mann then stated that the Venezuelan Government had little to fear from the priority situations. Although its needs for specific items of military equipment would naturally be evaluated in terms of the needs in other theaters faced with present or potential shooting wars, its priority position had recently been improved to the point where it was in a far more favorable position than most countries outside of NATO. Mr. Mann added that this was a most encouraging development in the Department of Defense which had been sponsored by State and that it should undoubtedly be reflected in a relatively smooth flow of equipment to Venezuela on the basis of orders effectively placed by that country. He pointed out, however, that it would not always be possible to grant to the Venezuelan Government the specific items of equipment when desired. He mentioned tanks as an example of equipment desired by Venezuela which was also in critical demand for Korea and the build up of essential NATO forces. He added that the Venezuelans had insisted upon the most modern models and had thus far consistently refused to accept any old models or substitutes such as armored cars which would do an equally effective job in Venezuela. He stated that the Venezuelan Military Attaché had recently been referred to the appropriate Defense authorities in the hope that a mutually satisfactory arrangement might be worked out.

Mr. Mann then referred to Venezuelan grievances over payment terms. He stated that our laws did not permit us to accede to the Venezuelan suggestion that all equipment be purchased on the basis of a 25% down payment with the remaining 75% to be paid upon delivery. We have, however, been able to work out an arrangement which was equal to the best treatment accorded any other country. Venezuelan purchases were, under this arrangement, divided into three categories:

1. Equipment already available for delivery on which payment would naturally be made immediately;
2. Equipment requiring rehabilitation or modernization—payment terms in this case would involve periodic payments on demand for the cost of rehabilitation and payment for the original value of the equipment shortly before delivery; and
3. New equipment requiring manufacture—in this case orders might be divided into two general categories: the first would involve equipment being manufactured by firms which could not finance their own operations for one reason or another and which accordingly required progressive payments as equipment was being manufactured. Since the US Government was precluded by law from financing such advances on behalf of a foreign government, these advances would have to be made by the Venezuelan Government upon demand. The other involved equipment being manufactured by firms in a position to do their own financing. In such cases the Venezuelan Government would not be required to make any payments until shortly before delivery. Mr. Mann then pointed out that this represented a tremendous cutting and elimination of red tape and appeared to constitute a most reasonable approach to the matter. It clarifed the fact that it was not the US Government which was manufacturing and selling the equipment to the Venezuelans but rather individual firms for which the US Government was in fact acting as agent.

Mr. Mann stated that the foregoing had recently been conveyed to the Ambassador [1] on one occasion and on another to the Counselor[2] and Military Attaché[3] of the Venezuelan Embassy in the form of a memorandum[4] and detailed oral explanation. Although hoped that this information would be passed on accurately to the Venezuelan Government, we are also furnishing it to our Embassy in Caracas which would be in a position to make certain that all was completely understood by the appropriate Venezuelan military officals.

Mr. Proudfit expressed his complete understanding of the problem being faced by the Department and approval of the manner in which it was being handled. He added that he would be delighted to pass on this information to Colonel Perez Jimenez immediately upon his return to Venezuela. In thanking Mr. Proudfit for his assistance, Mr. Mann suggested that he visit the Embassy for a thorough briefing on details before seeing Colonel Perez Jimenez. Mr. Proudfit agreed that this would be a good idea.[5]

Venezuelan Trade Agreement

5. Mr. Miller reported Venezuela's desire to renegotiate their trade agreement, in order to have a lower duty on petroleum products. He reviewed the trade agreement as it is related to the cancellation of the Mexican trade agreement. ARA feels that it is necessary to go down to 5¼ cents a barrel duty on petroleum products. If this is done by the President, it would disregard the peril point findings of the Tariff Commission. Mr. Miller and Mr. Thorp have had discussions with Mr. Steelman who is sympathetic with our position. The basic problem involved is whether we will have to disregard the Tariff Commission findings and go below the peril point. Mr. Thorp felt that it would help if we got some concessions from Venezuela. Mr. Miller pointed out that some of the oil companies would support our move, but the coal people would generally oppose it. Mr. Thorp noted that we are approaching Defense on this problem.

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the Executive Secretary of the National Security Council (Lay)[1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, February 29, 1952.

Subject: The National Security Interest in Successful Trade Agreement Negotiations with Venezuela

There is transmitted herewith for circulation to the National Security Council, with the request that it be scheduled for consideration at the Council's meeting on Wednesday, March 5, 1952, a memorandum relating to the national security element in current trade-agreement negotiations with Venezuela.

The question as to the tariff concession on petroleum which should be offered by the United States in current trade agreement negotiations with Venezuela is now being considered by the interdepartmental Trade Agreements Committee, which will make its recommendations directly to the President. Members of the Committee feel, however, that an important factor to be weighed by the President in making his decision is the extent to which the United States has a national security interest in Venezuelan petroleum, and that this national security element is a matter on which the President may wish advice from the National Security Council.

Accordingly the attached memorandum for consideration by the Council relates solely to the importance of the national security element as a factor to be weighed by the President in making his decision with respect to the tariff concession on petroleum and does not request consideration or approval by the Council as to what that concession should be in the light of all the factors involved.

THE NATIONAL SECURITY INTEREST IN SUCCESSFUL TRADE AGREEMENT NEGOTIATIONS WITH VENEZUELA

PROBLEM

To evaluate the national security interest of the United States in successful trade-agreement negotiations with Venezuela.

---

[1] Forwarded to the National Security Council for consideration at its meeting on Mar. 5, 1952, under cover of a memorandum by Mr. Lay, dated Feb. 29, 1952, not printed.

[2] No drafting information appears on the source text; presumably drafted by Chairman of the Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Agreements Carl D. Corse.

DISCUSSION

1. Upon termination of the trade agreement with Mexico on January 1, 1951, the tariff on certain petroleum products imported into the United States* increased from 10½ cents per barrel, applicable to all imports, to a tariff quota arrangement under which annual imports in excess of a specified quantity † were made dutiable at 21 cents per barrel. This was the customs treatment originally provided for in the 1939 trade agreement with Venezuela.

2. On request of the Venezuelan Government, the United States agreed to negotiate a supplementary trade agreement with Venezuela under which a reduction in the present tariff on these petroleum products would be considered.

3. As required by the Trade Agreement Extension Act of 1951, the Tariff Commission reported a "peril point" finding on the petroleum tariff to the President on December 28, 1951. The Tariff Commission was evenly divided in its vote. Three Commissioners found that the existing customs treatment, i.e. the present tariff quota arrangement, was the peril point. The other three Commissioners found that a rate of 10½ cents on all imports would not result in injury being caused or threatened to the domestic industry. For all practical purposes, therefore, the "peril point" is 10½ cents on all imports. The findings of all the Commissioners were based on the prospective threat to domestic industry posed by possible future contingencies (e.g. return of Iran to world oil trade) rather than an immediate threat under existing conditions of trade.

4. Fairly conclusive evidence exists that the Venezuelan Government will not accept an offer of 10½ cents on all imports, that it will break off negotiations of the supplementary agreement unless a concession going below that level is offered, and that it will then proceed to terminate the existing trade agreement. Although it is proposed to use every effort to persuade the Venezuelans that it is in their interest to agree to negotiate on the basis of an offer of no less than 10½ cents on all imports of petroleum, such efforts may be unsuccessful.

* Crude petroleum, topped crude, residual fuel oil and distillate fuel oil. In general, United States tariff rates apply equally to imports from all foreign sources except countries under Soviet domination. [Footnote in the source text.]

5. Successful conclusion of a supplementary trade agreement with Venezuela, therefore, may entail the granting by the United States of a tariff concession on petroleum which would go below the "peril point" for petroleum found by the Tariff Commission. The President is legally authorized to make such a concession, if he reports the reasons to Congress. Also, if such a concession were qualified to prevent any threat to domestic industry posed by possible future contingencies, he could properly make the concession without departing from his commitment to Congress that he will not administer the Trade Agreements program so as to endanger a domestic industry. Nevertheless, there would be strong criticism from domestic petroleum and coal interests which could easily cause a setback to the trade agreements program as a whole. It is important, therefore, to determine whether our national security interest in maintaining satisfactory trade agreement relationships with Venezuela is an important element to be weighed by the President in reaching his decision.

6. The national security elements to be considered are as follows:

a. An adequate supply of Venezuelan oil is vital in event of total mobilization in the United States. NSC 97/2[3] concludes, on the basis of PAD–185, that total supply of petroleum available to the free world, (including Venezuelan production from existing concessions) will fall short of requirements by 1,300,000 b/d‡ (barrels per day) during the first six months of a war commencing on July 1, 1952, and by 600,000 b/d in 1955. A more recent and lower estimate of Venezuela's productive capacity from existing concessions indicates even greater deficiencies during this period. The granting of new concessions by Venezuela would help fill this deficit. Although substantial progress has been made towards securing such new concessions, the Venezuelan Government has suspended action on concession applications already filed pending the outcome of the trade agreement negotiations. Failure to reach a satisfactory agreement with the United States, reinforcing existing political opposition to the granting of new concessions, might result in the cancellation or at least the curtailment of new concessions.

b. Venezuela is an outstanding example to the rest of the world of cooperation between foreign investors and the government for their mutual benefit. The danger of nationalization of the oil industry in Venezuela is not critical. However, popular sentiment for such action is present in Venezuela. Deterioration of relations as a result of failure to conclude a trade agreement would undoubtedly strengthen such sentiment. Retention of foreign oil production in the hands of private American companies to the fullest possible extent better serves our security interest in oil than does national ownership of oil resources.

[3] NSC 97/2, entitled "A National Petroleum Program," was approved by President Truman on Dec. 13, 1951; for text, see Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. I, p. 978.

‡ Assuming the loss of Middle Eastern and Southeastern Asian oil. [Footnote in the source text.]

c. The terms of the existing tax provisions between Venezuela and the oil companies provide that the Government shall receive at least 50% of the profits. This pattern is being used as a basis for stabilizing relations between oil companies and other governments, particularly in the Middle East. If no new trade agreement is agreed to and the existing trade agreement is terminated, Venezuela will undoubtedly insist on renegotiating the existing contracts in order to recover loss of revenue resulting from an increase in United States tariff on petroleum.

d. Because of its geographical location and because of the availability of other strategic materials such as iron ore, there is a collateral security interest in maintaining the best possible relations with Venezuela.

RECOMMENDATION

7. That the National Security Council (a) affirm the importance to the national security of our petroleum arrangements in Venezuela and (b) recommend to the President that this national security interest be given full weight in determining the tariff concession on oil which might be offered to Venezuela consistently with the principles and policies governing the administration of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Program.[4]

[4] The NSC at its 113th meeting on Mar. 5, 1952, adopted the recommendation in paragraph 7 and subsequently submitted it to the President for consideration. (NSC Action No. 616)

Memorandum by the Secretary of State[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 5, 1952.

REPORT ON NSC MEETING[2]

Item 4. National Security Interest in Successful Trade Agreement Negotiations With Venezuela

The President said that he assumed everybody had read the recommendation from the State Department,[3] that he concurred in it fully and if there was no objection to it, it would not be necessary for me to present the matter in detail. Everyone expressed agreement and the paper was adopted. The only important observation was made by General Smith, who said he could not underline too strongly the importance of the State Department's recommendation, and hoped that it would be followed through vigorously.

[1] Secretary Acheson is indicated as the drafting officer on the source text, but the memorandum is initialed by Special Assistant to the Secretary Lucius D. Battle; apparently circulated to Deputy Under Secretary of State Matthews, Counselor of the Department Bohlen, Assistant Secretary Miller, and Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs Thorp.

[2] Reference is to the 113th meeting of the NSC, held Mar. 5, 1952; a memorandum of discussion at this meeting is contained in Truman Library, Truman papers, PSF–Subject file.

[3] Supra.

After the meeting, General Smith and I talked to Mr. Lay to see whether, in the absence of a full discussion, it was fully understood that this meant that, if necessary, we could go below the peril point recommendations. Mr. Lay said that the President understood this and had said to him that we would have to do whatever was necessary. Both he and General Smith agreed to follow it through with the President, and if I see him tomorrow, I shall mention it again.

The other papers were received for information.

The President indicated to us that he hoped to be able to leave on Friday, but could not be sure until the last moment.

Secretary Acheson

Mr. Lovett telephoned the Secretary and urged that the Committee working on Venezuela Trade Agreement negotiations should not only get to work terribly fast but that they should not be in the position of "representing" any other "American commercial" interests. In other words, they should not work for quid pro quos. The Secretary said this might be difficult because the Committee was trying to work out an agreement which will stand on its own feet.

Mr. Lovett said he did not think it was possible in this case to work out an agreement with Venezuela that would stand on its own feet and at the same time accomplish the overriding objectives which we have toward the new steel production and oil. These are so important to us that they must override all other considerations, and he did not think there were any other considerations, not excluding coal, that should be allowed to interfere with or confuse the main objectives.

The Secretary said he would talk with the people who were working on the matter. He also said that the President understood the problem, was expecting a recommendation, and would approve it when received.

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President[1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, March 14, 1952.

Subject: Recommendations of the Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Agreements with respect to negotiations with Venezuela of a supplementary trade agreement.

There are attached recommendations of the Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Agreements with respect to negotiations with Venezuela of a trade agreement supplementary to the existing agreement which was signed on November 6, 1939.

The recommendations are in two parts. Under the first recommendation, your approval is sought for offers of duty concessions by the United States to Venezuela, and for requests of duty concessions from Venezuela to the United States, on the assumption that Venezuela will agree to negotiate on the basis of an offer by the United States of 10½ cents per barrel on all imports of crude petroleum, distillate fuel oil, and residual fuel oil. The rate of 10½ cents per barrel is for practical purposes in accordance with the "peril point" findings of the Tariff Commission.

In view of the probability that Venezuela will refuse to negotiate on the basis of 10½ cents per barrel, the Committee is also asking, under its second recommendation, for authority to reduce the duty below the peril point findings of the Tariff Commission on certain grades of these products. The authority requested under this second recommendation will not be used until serious efforts have been made to persuade the Venezuelans to negotiate on the 10½ cent per barrel basis, and such efforts have clearly failed.

The difficulties which have arisen in connection with the preparation for the negotiations with Venezuela under procedure set up under the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951 have already been discussed at the meeting of the National Security Council on March 6 [5], 1952. The circumstances surrounding this problem provide a clear illustration of the adverse effects on the trade agreements program of the peril point procedure which was set up by Congress in the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951. In my opinion, this procedure is both cumbersome and unnecessary to provide adequate safeguards to domestic industry.

I recommend that the recommendations of the Committee be approved.

Memorandum by the Chairman of the Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Agreements (Corse) to the President[2]

SECRET WASHINGTON, March 14, 1952.

Subject: United States Offers to and Requests of Venezuela in the Negotiation of Supplementary Trade Agreement with that Country.

On August 29, 1951 you approved negotiations with Venezuela for the purpose of arriving at a trade agreement supplementary to the existing agreement, which was signed on November 6, 1939. Since that time, preparations have gone forward for the purpose of engaging in these negotiations. As part of that preparation, and in accordance with Section 3 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951, the Tariff Commission reported to you on December 27, 1951 its findings as to the limit below which concessions could not be granted without causing or threatening serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive products (popularly known as the peril point findings).

The findings of the Tariff Commission were unanimous except for a group of petroleum products.* Such petroleum products make up 90 percent of Venezuela's exports to the United States, and a concession on them is a sine qua non to a supplementary agreement with Venezuela.

In their report on this group of petroleum products (for convenience, hereinafter described as Venezuelan oil), three of the Commissioners found that the peril point was the existing tariff quota arrangement (10½ cents per barrel or ¼ cents per gallon on a quantity equal to 5 percent of the total quantity of crude petroleum processed in refineries in continental United States during the preceding calendar year, and 21 cents per barrel on imports in excess of this quantity).† The other three Commissioners found that a rate of 10½ cents per barrel on all imports would not result in serious injury being caused or threatened to the domestic industry. While one or more of the three Tariff Commissioners who found against the reduction of the existing tariff treatment felt that serious injury might be the immediate result of any such reduction, the principal point of difference betwen the two groups of Commissioners was the degree to which a threat of serious injury arising out of certain future contingencies was imminent or probable. Among the future contingencies weighed by the Commissioners were (1) cessation of the war in Korea, (2) return of Iranian oil to the world supply, (3) curtailment of general mobilization programs, especially in the United States, and (4) a recession in the United States. For practical purposes, the peril point may be considered as 10½ cents per barrel on all imports.

Fairly conclusive evidence exists that the Venezuelan Government will not accept an offer of 10½ cents on all imports. Venezuelan high officials have indicated, in the strongest possible terms, that they will break off negotiations of the supplementary agreement, unless a concession going below the level of 10½ cents is offered, and that they will then proceed to terminate the existing trade agreement.

Faced with these circumstances, the Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Agreements, after the fullest consideration, asks that you approve the following two recommendations. In making these recommendations the Committee took full account of the statement made by you that the Trade Agreements Act would not be used to endanger domestic industry.

(1) Offers by the United States which are described in Annex B,[3] and the requests of Venezuela by the United States, which are described in Annex C.[3] These offers and requests were prepared on the basis of an offer of 10½ cents on Venezuelan oil.‡

(2) An offer going below 10½ cents on imports of certain grades of Venezuelan oil,§ other grades to be subject to the 10½ cent rate. Such authorization will be used only after serious efforts have failed to persuade the Venezuelans to negotiate on the basis of an offer of 10½ cents on all Venezuelan oil, and they have officially indicated their determination to terminate the existing trade agreement. The grant by the United States of such a concession would be made dependent upon obtaining concessions from Venezuela of widespread benefit to American exporters and of value commensurate to the value of concessions granted by the United States.

Recommendation 1:

None of the offers for which approval is requested in Recommendation 1 are in excess of the respective peril points. They consist of reductions in the existing import tax on crude petroleum, topped crude petroleum, gas oil, distillate fuel oil, residual fuel oil, kerosene and petroleum liquid asphalt. Bindings of existing tariffs would be offered on pig iron, granular or sponge iron, gasoline, naphtha, unfinished oils

‡ Annex C also includes the additional requests which will be made of Venezuela if it is found essential to utilize the authority asked for in Recommendation 2. [Footnote in the source text.]

except topped crude petroleum, lubricating oils, paraffin, and paraffin wax. Bindings of existing duty-free entry would be offered on iron ore and solid petroleum asphalt. The trade value of imports (direct and indirect) from Venezuela in 1951 of these products are given in Annex D.[4] Although the petroleum products listed make up over 90 percent of the total value of present imports from Venezuela, it is expected that with the development of the iron ore resources of Venezuela, the concessions on iron ore, sponge iron and pig iron will be of increasing importance. The recommendation of the Trade Agreements Committee (the representative of the Mutual Security Agency being absent and not voting) is unanimous with regard to these offers.

The requests which the United States would make in return for an offer of 10½ cents on Venezuelan oil cover a wide range of products of interest to American export industries located in 37 States. Reductions in duty will be requested on such important products as iron and steel manufactures, fruits and vegetables, fruit juices, frozen chickens, eggs, vegetable oils, animal feeds, cheese, certain cotton and rayon textiles, certain paper and glass products, leather goods, whiskey, beverage syrups, and certain rubber manufactures.

Bindings of existing rates of duty will be requested on wheat flour, modified milk, rice, shoes, tinplate, aluminum manufactures, automobile chassis, agricultural implements, industrial machinery, office machines, motion picture films, biologicals and anti-biotics, and other pharmaceuticals and chemical products. Figures of exports from the United States to Venezuela of these request items are given in Annex D.

As part of the negotiations, Venezuela wishes to withdraw or modify upward certain concessions which are already in the existing agreement. They are prepared to substitute equivalent concessions for these withdrawals or modifications. The requests which are submitted for your approval include the response to Venezuelan requests on these withdrawal or modification items. For some items we are agreeing to their request, for others we are making counter-proposals which only in part meet the Venezuelan requests. Some of these counter-proposals, such as the one on canned salmon and sardines and wheat flour will undoubtedly prove unacceptable in the first instance to the Venezuelans. Furthermore, some of our requests on other items will probably not be granted by Venezuela. It is contemplated, therefore, that the concessions which Venezuela will finally agree to grant will be somewhat changed in detail from the list of requests in Annex C. Your approval of the entire results of the negotiations including the specific concessions offered by Venezuela will be requested before the United States accepts them definitively.

Recommendation 2:

There are two formal dissents, those of the Tariff Commission and Department of Labor members, to Recommendation 2 of the Committee. Written dissent of the Tariff Commission member,[5] in accordance with Executive Order No. 10082, is attached[6] hereto immediately following this memorandum. The Department of Labor member concurs in this statement of dissent of the Tariff Commission member. One agency, the Mutual Security Agency, was not represented at the meeting of the Committee when this recommendation was approved. The other six agencies represented on the Committee voted in favor of the recommendation.

The Committee members were unanimous in believing that every effort should be made to persuade the Venezuelans that it would be in their interest to negotiate on the basis of a 10½ cent offer on the crucial petroleum products, and that the authority to exceed a peril point should not be utilized unless it was absolutely essential in order to obtain an agreement. Before arriving at their decision, the various consequences which might result from action by the President to exceed a peril point were carefully weighed against the other national interests, including the security interest, which might be jeopardized by failure to conclude an agreement with Venezuela because of unwillingness on the part of the United States to exceed a peril point.

Among the possible consequences which might result from action which exceeds the peril point are (1) extreme congressional criticism which might take the form of a congressional Act withdrawing the authority of the President to give effect to the oil concessions negotiated with Venezuela under the Trade Agreements Act, as amended; (2) the enactment by Congress of restrictive legislation on petroleum imports either through a separate bill or through the inclusion of additional crippling amendments when the Trade Agreements Act comes up for consideration next year (it will be recalled that efforts to restrict imports of petroleum products to 5 percent of domestic production failed passage by the Senate by only one vote in 1949); and (3) crippling amendments of a general nature to the Trade Agreements Act which would further reduce the effectiveness of the program.

A particularly difficult situation which will also arise if the peril point on Venezuelan oil is exceeded is that the report of the Tariff Commission on these products must under the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951 be submitted to the Ways and Means and Finance Committees with the result that they undoubtedly will become public. Opponents of the trade agreements program will be able to quote statements from the report which will carry a false sense of factual objectivity, when actually the statements reflect personal judgments. For example, two of the three Commissioners who found that the existing tariff quota arrangement was the peril point stated categorically, "Our report clearly shows that we based our findings and recommendations on what actually did happen in 1949, what is happening right now, and what is most likely, if not quite certain, to happen again in the near future unless the present taxes and quotas are retained . . .".|| Actually, it is extremely doubtful that the domestic oil industry suffered any serious injury in 1949 as result of imports. As a matter of record, the Tariff Commission, by a vote of 4 to 2 on May 3, 1949, decided that the situation was not serious enough even to order an investigation in connection with an application on February 15, 1949, by the independent oil producers for escape clause action. The present situation to which the two Commissioners referred in the quotation in the context of possible serious injury was a temporary cutback of "allowables" (the amount of oil that is permitted to be produced within a given month) in Texas in November and December, 1951, and January 1, 1952. Prior to these months the Texas conservation authorities had indicated to the Department of State that Texas production was in excess of sound conservation practice and that they were permitting such production only because of the Iranian situation. Texas allowables were increased in February and reached an all time peak in March 1952.

It is also unfortunate that the Tariff Commissioners engaged in a controversy with regard to their record on escape clause actions. This controversy was generally irrelevant to the problem at hand, but would probably become public as part of the report.

On the other hand, inability to arrive at an agreement with Venezuela because of unwillingness to exceed a peril point finding by the Tariff Commission would bring in jeopardy certain national interests, including security interests, of the United States. The Venezuelan market is of importance to United States exporters of a large range of products. It is one of the few markets where United States exports are not limited because of balance-of-payments difficulties. During the hearings held by the Committee for Reciprocity Information on this negotiation over 160 United States export interests either filed briefs or presented oral testimony. These exporters came from many sections of the United States. In general, the request was that their market in Venezuela be protected and stabilized both by the obtaining of tariff concessions from Venezuela and by the granting of concessions on Venezuela oil. Since it is probable that the Venezuelans will terminate the existing trade agreement if negotiations of a supplementary agreement are unsuccessful, they would be unprotected against increases in the Venezuelan tariff treatment of their products. At present there is strong pressure being put on the Venezuelan Government to increase the tariff protection for many domestic Venezuelan industries.

The security interests in the United States in arriving at an agreement with Venezuela are of such importance that the Department of State, following a recommendation by the Trade Agreements Committee, asked the judgment of the National Security Council in order that such interests might properly be weighed by you in making your decision with respect to tariff concessions on petroleum. The recommendations which were adopted by the Security Council are given in Annex E.[7] Among the security considerations are (1) the possibility that the Venezuelans will delay or limit the granting of new concessions for petroleum exploration and production which are required in order to have sufficient resources in the Western Hemisphere in event of total mobilization, (2) the existing relationship between the Venezuelan Government and the oil companies is being used to provide a pattern for stabilizing relations between oil companies and governments in other parts of the world—the Venezuelan Government may change such relationship in order to recover loss of revenue resulting from an increase in United States tariffs on petroleum, (3) the general strengthening of nationalistic elements advocating nationalization of the oil industry in Venezuela, and (4) the general weakening of relations between Venezuela and the United States which are important because of Venezuela's strategic location and possession of certain strategic resources such as iron ore.

The decision of the Committee with regard to Recommendation 2 was not arrived at easily. While all agencies recognized fully the security importance of the domestic oil industry, no agency except the Tariff Commission felt that a concession going below a peril point on the controversial petroleum items would cause or threaten serious injury to the domestic industry. While acknowledging that a concession below the peril point might be granted in a fashion which would not cause or threaten serious injury to the domestic industry, the Department of Labor joined the Tariff Commission in finding (a) that it was not established that the absence of authority to pierce the peril point would in fact endanger the outcome of the negotiations, or (b) that failure would likely be followed by developments significantly adverse to our national security and other interests. The decision of the members of other agencies rested basically on whether the domestic risks which, to a large extent are political, were greater or less than the possible jeopardy of the national interest of the United States, including particularly the security interest.

The concession which it is recommended be offered, if essential to reach agreement with Venezuela, is one which, without quota limitation, goes below the peril point of 10½ cents only on imports of crude petroleum, distillate fuel oil and residual fuel oil of gravity less than 25 degrees API (American Petroleum Institute rating). On imports of products of gravity 25 degrees or higher API, the offer would be 10½ cents, without quota. From 25 to 30 percent of the total imports of oil from Venezuela are of gravity less than 25 degrees API. The lower than 10½ cent rate would, therefore, apply primarily to residual fuel oil and a small part of crude oil imports. Practically all of the crude oil production in the United States is of a gravity 25 degrees or higher. In recent years, there has been a definite decrease in the percentage of residual fuel oil recovered from domestic and foreign crude oils processed at United States refineries and the deficiency in residual fuel oil supply has been met by imports. Accordingly, the proposed concession below the peril point would not have a materially direct effect on the domestic oil producing industry, and would tend to equalize the competitive effect of imported oil on domestic refineries.

Its principal effect would be with respect to the domestic bituminous coal industry which has always been opposed to imports. Here, however, evidence exists that the impact would be small. According to evidence submitted during the hearings before the Committee for Reciprocity Information, residual fuel oil is competitive with bituminous coal mainly in those Atlantic Coast utilities producing gas and electricity which are equipped to burn either fuel. In this industry, the use of bituminous coal has increased by almost 40 million tons between 1940 and 1950, whereas the use of residual fuel oil increased only 15 million tons (in bituminous coal equivalents). The use of all other sources of energy (e.g. gas) by this industry increased during the same period by over 50 million tons (bituminous coal equivalents). In all other uses where residual fuel oil and bituminous coal might come into competition as a source of energy, such as in railroads, space heating and miscellaneous industrial uses, the situation either is the same as occurred in the utilities field or is that any decrease in use of bituminous coal is primarily because of increased use of sources of energy other than residual fuel oil. Despite the economic fact that direct competition of residual fuel oil with bituminous coal is much smaller than would be indicated by the total imports of residual fuel oil, and that the difficulties of the bituminous coal industry are not due primarily to such competition, there probably would be protests that the concession recommended by the Committee was aimed directly at the coal industry. In answer to these protests, it would be necessary to point out the economic facts in justification of the position that no serious injury is being caused or threatened to the domestic bituminous coal industry by the concession.

It is the belief of certain members of the Committee who are the best qualified to judge, that a concession based on the above degrees of gravity would be more acceptable to the domestic petroleum industry than other possible types of concessions which would go below the peril point.

As is customary, the final results of the negotiations, both the concessions granted and obtained by the United States will be subject to approval by you before signature of the agreement.

Your approval of the two recommendations by the Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Agreements is hereby requested.[8]

Memorandum by the Head of the United States Negotiating Team (Rubottom) to the Chairman of the Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Agreements (Corse)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 23, 1952.

Subject: Revision of Reciprocal Trade Agreement between the Governments of the United States and Venezuela—Recommendation.

Problem

To determine whether there exists, from the viewpoint of the United States, a satisfactory basis for agreement with Venezuela on the revision of the 1939 Reciprocal Trade Agreement.

Discussion

In order to analyze the status of the trade agreement negotiations which have been in progress in Caracas for the past nine weeks, it is necessary to examine the position of both Governments at the start of the negotiations. The United States, for valid and plausible reasons, decided to make an offer on oil of 10½¢ per barrel, along with certain other offers of secondary importance except possibly the offer to bind iron ore free and pig iron at the present low rate. The United States request list, based on that offer, consisted of a large list of items including a number which had already been described by the Venezuelans as "sensitive" and "critical". In fact, the Venezuelans had already officially informed the United States that it did not wish to consider a considerable list of items in those cateogories.

Venezuela, in turn, submitted an offer list to the United States which, while it exceeded the United States requests in certain respects, especially in the field of consumer durables, notably lacked any of the "sensitive" items. This offer list was based on a Venezuelan request for an oil duty of 5¼¢ per barrel, without restriction.

At first glance, the disparity in the positions of the two Governments in the opening phase of the negotiations might seem to be a normal situation from which the two Teams would proceed to bargain to a compromise position. However, at this point the firm position taken by the Venezuelan Government prior to the start of the negotiations should be recalled. In the fall of 1950, Venezuela was on the verge of terminating the trade agreement, as is well known to the Committee; at that moment it might have been possible to reach agreement with Venezuela on the basis of a flat 10½¢ oil offer, but the passage of time apparently made this impossible. Certainly during the months before the negotiations began the Venezuelan position had been made clear that it had to have oil treatment "better than Mexico" if the agreement was to be revised, or even preserved. There was never the slightest deviation from that position, and three days before the negotiations began the Venezuelans informed the Ambassador that, unless we were prepared to make an oil offer of better than a flat 10½¢ per barrel, no basis for the negotiations would exist.

Notwithstanding this statement, the Venezuelans did not refuse to carry on the negotiations after being apprised of the opening oil offer of 10½¢ per barrel made by the United States, and it eventually agreed to a preliminary discussion of the United States request list. However, the Venezuelans stated unequivocally that they would proceed with the discussion of the request list provided they were not compromised in any way with respect to oil and again insisted that they would have to have treatment "better than Mexico" before any agreement could be reached. They undoubtedly were moved in part by a cooperative attitude, which was evident throughout the negotiations, but the United States Team believes that the overriding factor in the Venezuelan tactics at this point was their knowledge that the United States eventually would be prepared to make a better oil offer.

While it would be a mistake to underestimate the importance of this "leak" and its effect on the early stages of the negotiations, it probably would be going too far to infer that the Venezuelans would have accepted the 10½¢ offer had they not known of the possible supplementary offer, in view of the background already outlined above. There was never any indication that the Venezuelans were persuaded by the United States arguments to consider seriously the 10½¢ offer. The economic arguments in support of the offer were rejected out of hand, in spite of the figures which supported them. The political arguments apparently registered on the Venezuelans and may have at least paved the way for their ultimate acceptance of the second oil offer which, they later alleged, did not even fully meet their aspirations.

The United States Team never accepted as valid the Venezuelan position either in formal meetings or in informal discussions. It presented working papers, and supported those with more detailed oral discussions, refuting the Venezuelan arguments, and defending as strongly as the circumstances permitted the merits of the first United States oil offer. But it is inescapable that the Venezuelans not only never intended to consider the first United States oil offer, but that, as well, they did not even place it in the category of an offer. If that is recognized, it would follow that the Venezuelans did not truly begin to bargain with the United States until they got the second oil offer. The history of the negotiations up to this point seems to bear this out.

With this background in mind, the present negotiating posture of the United States is not as unfavorable as it might first appear to be. In one respect, at least, the United States has been successful, i.e., in the defense of its second oil offer, the gravity formula. This formula, tailor-made to be attractive to Venezuela without giving her everything she wanted and, at the same time, designed to cause the United States the least difficulty at home, has been accepted unequivocally by Venezuela. The Foreign Minister's statement to Ambassador Warren and Mr. Rubottom on June 17 confirmed earlier statements by the Head of the Venezuelan Negotiating Team, Dr. Reyna, that the Venezuelan tactics were not designed to obtain a better oil offer. The Committee thus may consider that one of the thorniest aspects of the trade agreement revision has been settled and turn its attention to Schedule I.

Looking at Schedule I from its most unfavorable view, it must be admitted that it has sizable gaps in agricultural items, textiles, and shoes. It is not as satisfactory as the United States had hoped to achieve in the fields of paints, glass, and paper. In spite of every effort made by the United States Team to obtain Venezuelan cooperation in searching for items in those categories which would not compete significantly with local industries, the Venezuelans demurred. They stated at the beginning that they could not give concessions in the so-called "sensitive" items since they would bring on political problems at home and they have continued until now to stand on that position. It is apparent that the highest Government officials have determined that a revised agreement will be satisfactory only if it does not create extreme difficulties at home. Several informed sources have stated that the strongest support for the present Venezuelan Government is coming from the right, which, of course, includes the industrialists and others who are seeking protection. While the negotiations were in progress, it was apparent that the protectionist group was applying steady pressure on the Government. The newspapers regularly reported statements from representatives of the Chamber of Industries and other similar groups following their visits on the Foreign Minister and the Minister of Economic Development.

During the waiting period prior to the acceptance by the Venezuelans of the United States supplementary oil offer and the transmittal of their second offer list, the United States Team, through contact with Dr. Reyna and his colleagues, became aware of a shift in Venezuelan emphasis from oil to Schedule I, a move which seemed to come from the highest circles in the Government. This may have been due in part to the realization that Venezuela would find it difficult, if not impossible, to obtain the flat 5¼¢ oil duty to which it aspired; it may also be attributed to the realization that they had gone too far in their first offer list, especially after consulting with some of the interested industrial and manufacturing groups. It was at this point that the Team recognized and reported to the TAC that the Venezuelan negotiators apparently had lost some of their discretionary authority and were having to check with the Foreign Minister on almost every step taken.

At this point the Committee should consider Schedule I from its more favorable aspects. Starting with the agricultural items, while Venezuela is unwilling to include as many in the agreement as the United States requested, there were assurances during the negotiations that Venezuela did not intend to start raising duties promiscuously on these items. Venezuela, in many cases with the outright encouragement and technical assistance of the United States, aspires to self-sufficiency in food production some day. The Government recognizes that this day is far in the future, and it is quite probable that the United States Team could get agreement on a statement in the agreed minutes indicating Venezuela's intentions with respect to continuing some agricultural imports from the United States at present low duties. The Venezuelan Government is very much aware of the consumer's problem and does not intend to provide protection on foodstuffs at a prohibitive cost to the consumer.

Here it is pertinent to explain that the Venezuelan duties are not mandatory in their application, instead are permissive. For example, the duty on eggs is one bolivar a dozen, and this rate is applied in Maracaibo, whereas eggs enter free at Caracas. The Venezuelans have pointed out that in cases where there is less domestic production on agricultural or other products than anticipated, duties may be lowered to permit imports to fill the gap.

In the field of consumer durables the Venezuelan concessions are valuable. Whereas it would be possible to build assembly plants for such items as refrigerators, radios, and television sets, which would in turn effectively freeze out such valuable United States export products, the Venezuelans have now offered us a reduced duty on refrigerators and have offered to bind the low effective duty on radios. They are still studying the tariff classification on television sets, and it may ultimately be possible to include that item in the agreement. Besides these items, there are also many other consumer durables on which we have been offered very low rates, see attached lists.[1]

Another result of the negotiations which would redound favorably to the United States in the long run is the large number of trade agreement bindings and new bindings. These are all the more valuable when one considers the progressiveness of the Venezuelans and the relatively virgin field which that country offers for capital investment.

Not to be overlooked also is the fact that quite a number of those industries seeking protection in Venezuela are owned by United States companies, e.g., National Biscuit Company, General Tire and Rubber Company, United States Rubber Company, Celanese Corporation. The Committee is fully informed of the position taken by the Celanese Corporation in recent correspondence that it would not have considered investing approximately five million dollars in Venezuela had it contemplated that the United States Government might request a tariff concession for imported textiles which would compete with the production of its new plant.

The United States Team understands the objectives of the trade agreement procedures which have been developed over the past eighteen years. It recognizes that the very nature of a reciprocal trade agreement, which, as far as the United States is concerned, is based on acts of Congress, calls for a treaty which should, as nearly as possible, stand on its own feet from an economic and commercial standpoint. From the beginning, the Team has sought such an agreement with

[1] None printed.

Venezuela and, despite some qualitative shortcomings, it now believes that the respective offers of the two countries are nearly in balance and that an agreement with more or less equal trade coverage on both sides is possible. The detailed tables are attached to this document, but the attention of the Committee is invited to the following summary:

Trade Coverage Value of Venezuelan Offers and Withdrawals

		($1000)
1.	Duty Bindings	110,884
2.	Free Bindings	13,574
3.	Duty Reductions	48,234
4.	Ceiling Bindings (credited for ½ value)	12,324
	Total	185,016
5.	Minus "Withdrawals"	8,501
	Total Net Value of Venezuelan Offers	176,515
	Total Net Value of United States Offers	178,000

It should be borne in mind that the United States exports to Venezuela in 1950, the year used for arriving at the above figures, were the lowest in the last five years, which tends to discount the normal coverage of the Venezuelan offers.

There are, of course, other broad considerations which have unusual importance in respect of any negotiation between the United States and Venezuela. They can be discussed in another paper if appropriate.

The negotiations have now reached a critical stage. It is known that the Venezuelans hoped to finish the negotiations by July 1, although they undoubtedly are prepared to work beyond that date in the interest of a successful revision of the agreement. The Foreign Minister, on June 17, told Ambassador Warren and Mr. Rubottom that their third offer list, transmitted that day, was the "best" offer that Venezuela could make. Dr. Reyna, in the memorandum[2] which accompanied the list, expressed regret that his Government would not be able to offer more than what was included in the list.

The Team is inclined to accept the Venezuelan statement that they have made their "best" offers, although it does not rule out the possibility of obtaining a little bit more in Venezuelan concessions. Any further requests of the Venezuelans, however, should be very carefully examined and should be made realistically with the full understanding that they may be rejected.

If the Committee approves the basis for agreement herein outlined, the Team believes it possible to bring the negotiations to a prompt and successful conclusion. The Venezuelans probably will come to Washington to discuss the General Provisions and any remaining matters, although this is not definite.

Recommendation

1. That the Committee authorize the Negotiating Team to indicate to the Venezuelan negotiators that a basis for agreement exists.

2. That the Team undertake to conclude the negotiations with the present United States oil offer rather than to seek greater concessions by an improved oil offer.

3. That any further concessions requested of the Venezuelans be limited to a very few items, possibly two or three, concerning which there is reasonable hope that they will accede.

4. That the Team be authorized at the same time that the Venezuelans are informed that a basis for agreement exists, to invite the Venezuelans to come to Washington for that phase of the negotiations which will take up the General Provisions, etc.

5. That the Venezuelans be informed that it is satisfactory to the United States for the actual signing of the agreement to take place in Caracas.[3]

[3] No record of the action taken on these recommendations was found in Department of State files. Apparently, however, they were approved. The negotiations were transferred to Washington on July 16, and concluded on Aug. 8. Thereupon the two delegations submitted recommendations to their respective governments; see Acting Secretary of State Bruce's memorandum of Aug. 25, 1952, p. 1628.

National Intelligence Estimate[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 31, 1952.

NIE–67

PROBABLE DEVELOPMENTS IN VENEZUELA[2]

THE PROBLEM

To estimate the current situation and probable future developments in Venezuela with particular reference to factors affecting the availability of strategic materials.

[1] National Intelligence Estimates (NIE's) were high-level interdepartmental reports presenting authoritative appraisals of vital foreign policy problems. NIEs were drafted by officers from those agencies represented on the Intelligence Advisory Committee (IAC), discussed and revised by interdepartmental working groups coordinated by the Office of National Estimates of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), approved by the IAC, and circulated under the aegis of the CIA to the President, appropriate officers of cabinet level, and the National Security Council. The Department of State provided all political and some economic sections of NIE's.

[2] A cover sheet, title sheet, and dissemination notice are not printed. A note on the title sheet reads as follows: "The intelligence organizations of the Departments of State, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Joint Staff participated with the Central Intelligence Agency in the preparation of this estimate. All members of the Intelligence Advisory Committee concurred in this estimate on 24 July 1952."

CONCLUSIONS

1. Venezuela is ruled by a three-man Junta which derives its principal support from the armed forces. The Junta's strongest opponent is Accion Democratica, a leftist but non-Communist party now outlawed and operating underground. Accion Democratica actively seeks to discredit the regime and, given the opportunity, would not scruple to attempt its overthrow by force. Despite this threat, however, the Junta is probably capable of maintaining itself in power.

2. The outlawed Communist Party does not constitute by itself a threat to Venezuelan political stability and has been unable to form any firm alliance with the non-Communist opposition.

3. The Junta wishes to create a legitimate regime through elections and a constituent assembly, but is determined that its opponents shall not take over the government nor the armed forces lose their power to control Venezuela's political course. Hence it is unlikely that elections (if held) will be free, and the opposition may boycott them.

4. The economic condition of Venezuela is good, and is likely to remain so, mainly because of high world demand for oil and iron ore.

5. The oil companies have developed and maintained excellent relations with the government. There is no evidence that the present administration contemplates nationalization of the oil companies. No foreseeable political change in Venezuela would threaten the production and export of petroleum and iron ore.

6. The oil installations are vulnerable to sabotage. Present security measures are probably adequate to deal with sabotage by local elements with limited resources. Additional measures would be required to cope with a large-scale, concerted program of sabotage involving foreign as well as local elements, such as might be expected in the event of war.

7. Venezuela has generally supported US policies in the UN and OAS and has shown willingness to cooperate in Hemisphere defense. The Venezuelans conceive their proper role to be limited to defense of their own territory and strategic industries. They desire to develop military forces adequate for that purpose. They would be unlikely to consent to the stationing of foreign troops on Venezuelan soil.

DISCUSSION

Political

8. Venezuela is governed by a three-man Junta* which overthrew the regime of the Accion Democratica (AD) in November 1948. The Junta has supporters among conservative and wealthy businessmen, industrialists, large landowners, some government employees, and professional men. In general the support of these elements, which tend to place a higher value on order than on civil liberties, reflects satisfaction with a regime to which they have direct access. The Junta's main support, however, is furnished by the armed forces, especially the Army.

9. Upon taking power the Junta outlawed the Accion Democratica. The Junta has abrogated the 1947 constitution, censured political groups for voicing "intemperate" criticism of the Administration, arrested key political figures, and until very recently prevented or impeded opposition political rallies. Its attitude, however, has not been as arbitrary as that of the Gomez[3] dictatorship (1908–1935). The Junta has begun preparations for elections to a constituent assembly, and has insisted, against conservative opposition, on universal suffrage. It has tried to persuade voters that its policies are conceived in the best interests of the nation. But the Junta appears determined that its opponents shall not take over the government nor the armed forces lose their power to control Venezuela's political course.

10. The Junta has continued many of the progressive social and economic policies of preceding governments. These policies reflected the aspirations of the largely illiterate lower classes, especially organized labor, and of the small but expanding groups of businessmen, intellectuals, students, and professional men. The successive administrations between 1935 and 1948 did much to satisfy these groups. Accion Democratica in particular instituted a vigorous pro-labor policy, with numerous projects for improving health, sanitation, and education. It established direct popular elections and in general showed a respect for human rights unusual in Venezuela's history.

11. The Junta is opposed by most of the social groups which supported the immediately preceding regimes. Accion Democratica, despite its outlawry in 1948 and the imprisonment or exile of some of its most important leaders, is the Junta's most powerful adversary and still the most widely supported political party in the country. Led by an able group, whose members operate from exile and from underground, AD is seeking to create conditions which will lead to the overthrow of the Junta. It carries on an active propaganda campaign, utilizing clandestine newspapers and radio transmitters, and it seeks international political and labor support.

12. The principal representative of international Communism in Venezuela is the regular Communist Party (PCV). Also active are a small dissident Communist party, the PRP (c),† which broke away from the PCV in 1944 in protest against PCV collaboration with non-Communists, and various groups of resident foreign Communists of which the most important is Spanish. Altogether the Communists in Venezuela number less than 20,000. Their capabilities are enhanced, however, by their influence in organized labor. In 1950, among 40,000 petroleum workers, some 6,000 belonged to Communist-led unions and in addition there were significant numbers of Communists in AD-led unions. At present, among organized workers in general, some 22 percent belong to Communist-led unions, as compared with 50 percent in pro-AD unions, 10 percent in minor opposition party unions, and 10 percent in Junta-approved unions.

13. In 1950 the Junta suppressed the PCV and dissolved its affiliated labor unions. The PRP(c), however, has enjoyed relative immunity. Even when, in June 1952, the Junta severed relations with the USSR and cracked down on Communists and Communist-front organizations, the PRP(c) was allowed to retain its status as a legal political party.

14. Before the overthrow of Accion Democratica in 1948 its leaders were becoming increasingly hostile to Communism, although they tolerated Communist activity as a counterbalance to that of right-wing, anti-AD groups. The line of demarcation between AD and Communist units in organized labor was gradually becoming sharper. Since the AD was suppressed local AD units have on occasion collaborated with the PCV in student and labor agitation. The national leadership of the AD, however, still realizes that Communist objectives differ from theirs and that full cooperation with the Communists would jeopardize the future of the AD. They differ sharply with Communist leaders in their views on national policy. For these reasons a united front between AD and the PCV has not developed and is unlikely to do so in the foreseeable future. The AD leaders have been able thus far to maintain a hold on their rank-and-file despite Communist efforts to win over AD adherents.

15. The principal remaining legal opposition to the Junta is COPEI,‡ a Christian socialist type party which was the chief (though never formidable) political opponent of the AD before 1948. COPEI has been outspoken in its demand for a return to constitutional government. It has some appeal to both organized labor and conservative elements interested in a restoration of civil liberties, and its strength is said to have grown since 1948. The only other legal opposition party of consequence is URD,§ a secular leftist group which has endeavored, without apparent success, to win over the popular followings of the two suppressed parties, AD and PCV. COPEI and URD are of potential importance, as legitimate, non-Communist means of expressing opposition to the Junta, but they do not now constitute an opposition strong enough to cause the Junta serious concern.

16. Accion Democratica, though suppressed, retains the largest political following in Venezuela. Future political developments therefore depend to a great extent on its capabilities and intentions. Through agitation, and at times even terrorism, the AD will seek to discredit the Junta or any Junta-created regime, to undermine its stability, and to bring it into conflict with other opposition groups and with liberal opinion at home and abroad. Given the opportunity, the AD would not scruple to overthrow the Junta by force, as it was itself overthrown. The AD, however, now lacks the all-important support of the military and without military support is incapable of organizing a successful revolution.

17. The Junta is capable of preventing an AD revolution and of maintaining itself in power so long as the Army remains united behind it. But it desires to install a regime that will be widely recognized as constitutional and will at the same time protect the special interests of the military and of their civilian allies. It is under mounting pressures from political and labor groups to hold elections. Restoration of full constitutional government will be a complex process, which the Junta can speed up or delay to suit its own political purposes. The Junta may so greatly limit political activity as to cause opposition parties to boycott the election. In such an event, the Junta might fail to gain from an election the prestige it desires at home and abroad. But it is also possible that the Junta might succeed in registering a large favorable vote, since it is the party in power and times are good.

18. The military will continue to be the keystone of government in Venezuela. There are personal rivalries among influential officers of the armed forces, and it is possible that these conflicting ambitions might lead to disturbance of the regime, with shifts of power between military groups and personages. We believe, however, that the Junta will be able to heal such rifts as develop within the armed forces, especially if it convinces the military that disunity offers AD new opportunities to undermine the stability of government.

Economic

19. Petroleum accounts for over 95 percent of exports, 97 percent of foreign exchange receipts, and more than 65 percent of government revenue of Venezuela. At the beginning of June output was at the rate of 680 million barrels per annum, which is near maximum capacity without the development of new concessions. The Junta, like the AD before it, has not granted new oil concessions, although recently it has encouraged oil companies to bid for them. It has maintained cordial relations with the companies, which have experienced fewer operational difficulties than at any time since the Gomez regime, perhaps because many of the more serious problems were adjusted during the AD administration.

20. There is no evidence that the present administration is thinking of nationalizing the oil industry. Opposition parties have proposed, from time to time, the eventual nationalization of the industry, presumably after Venezuelans have been adequately trained to take over. Nationalization remains a potential possibility, but is not a present problem. The lack of outcry for nationalization is attributable to the satisfactory arrangements between the government and the oil companies, and to the good public relations established by the companies.

21. Known iron ore reserves in Venezuela are estimated at 2 billion tons, assaying about 60 percent iron. Their development is now in its early stages: exports began in 1951. Current output is at the rate of approximately 2,000,000 tons per annum and is expected to rise to some 13,000,000 tons by 1960. All exports of iron ore go to the United States.

22. Venezuela's general industrial and agricultural development has been slow. Partly because of inadequate internal communications, a large segment of the population lives at a subsistence level. Oil exports provide ample foreign exchange to pay for imports and until recently there has been little incentive to develop local industries. Venezuelan capitalists tend to invest only in domestic real estate or in enterprises abroad. To redress this situation AD adopted the policy of using the government's oil revenues to build up a more diversified economy. The Junta has maintained this policy: government funds are being used to expand agricultural and industrial production and for extensive public works.

23. The present economic outlook for Venezuela is bright. US demand for low gravity oils, which are in short supply and come chiefly from Venezuela, continues to expand. Venezuela's competitive position has been strengthened by developments which have brought oil production costs in the Middle East more in line with those in Venezuela. The country has virtually no foreign debt, a very small internal debt, no budgetary deficits, and a gold reserve of some $336 million. The export of iron ore promises well for the future.

Military

24. Apart from their political role, the military forces of Venezuela have chiefly performed the function of maintaining internal order. The Army and the National Guard (a professional security force) have been the most politically powerful elements in Venezuela's military establishment. There is little evidence that either the Navy or the Air Force will challenge their position in the near future. The officer cadre of the Army comes for the most part from the upper classes and is generally conservative. The rank-and-file are short-term conscripts, mostly from the lower strata of society, and are therefore more susceptible to propaganda directed against the present regime. The officers, however, can almost certainly control the rank-and-file.

25. The Venezuelan Army, Navy, and Air Force are small in comparison with those of other South American nations. The combined strength of the armed forces (including 4,000 security troops) totals roughly 18,000 officers and enlisted men. All branches are deficient in logistics and equipment. None has significant military capabilities, though together they could probably defend Venezuela from attacks by neighboring countries.

26. Venezuela is dependent upon foreign sources for virtually all of its military equipment and the nation's favorable financial position enables it to pay for its requirements. Although a preference exists for US equipment, particularly of the heavier varieties, the military have bought material in Europe when supplies have been unobtainable in the US. Destroyers and jet aircraft have been ordered from the UK and some jets have been received. Semi-automatic rifles have been procured from Belgium and antiaircraft guns from Sweden.

27. Venezuelan military leaders are irritated because the US does not sell them latest models of the best equipment. Nevertheless, they have professed willingness to cooperate in Hemisphere defense arrangements. They insist, however, that Venezuela's role should be limited to the strengthening of its own defenses in order to assure the availability of strategic materials. Military activity in defense, therefore, would probably not extend beyond protection of oil and iron ore installations, coastal defense, and anti-submarine patrols.

Strategic Considerations

28. Venezuelan oil is of prime strategic importance to the Western Powers. Venezuela is second only to the United States in petroleum production and is the world's largest single exporter. In present circumstances Venezuelan oil is in high demand in the United States and Western Europe. In the event of war its continued availability would be essential. The vulnerable location of Middle Eastern oil resources and the relative security of Venezuela serve to increase strategic reliance on this resource.

29. Venezuelan oil exports (including re-exports of refined products from Aruba and Curacao) normally go to Western countries. In 1951 these exports amounted to 588 million barrels, of which about 40 percent went to the United States, 25 percent to Western Europe, and most of the remainder to Latin America. So far as is known, none was shipped to Soviet Bloc countries.

30. The second strategic commodity supplied by Venezuela is high-grade iron ore, all of which goes to the United States. In 1951 the US received from Venezuela nearly 700,000 metric tons, roughly 6 percent of US iron ore imports. Total shipments are expected to reach at least 2 million tons in 1952, 5 million in 1955, and 13 million in 1960. Iron ore transportation is hampered by the remote location of deposits in the Guyana highlands and by transshipment and dredging problems. From the El Pao (Bethlehem Steel) deposits, ore must be carried out by rail to water transportation, and there is an additional transfer from river to ocean-going bottoms. A rail and water route from the Cerro Bolivar (US Steel) deposits is still under development.

31. The oil industry in Venezuela has many features vulnerable to sabotage. Output must be channelled through a few major outlets and processing points. The Lagunillas dike, the narrow Maracaibo channel, and the Maturin bar in the San Juan River all represent points of vulnerability. Underwater operations, which are required for many wells in the Maracaibo area, and the submarine pipelines, especially those which transport oil and water to the barren Paraguana Peninsula, present special protection problems. The system of power plants is of key significance from a sabotage viewpoint. Pumping stations, refineries, storage facilities, and overland pipelines would also be remunerative targets. The effects of sabotage upon production would be increased by the fact that nearly all equipment must be imported. The danger of sabotage is increased by the presence of Communist workers in the oil fields and tanker fleet.

32. Measures to protect petroleum installations have been taken both by the government and by the companies. The former has supplied armed protection (principally by security troops), but the extent of the oil fields causes such units to be widely dispersed. Some assistance is also rendered by the National Service of Investigation, though this Service is generally limited to surveillance of subversive activities in the petroleum industry. The companies, individually and collectively, have taken such defensive measures as establishing a photographic-badge identification system of employees, fencing property, and providing lighting installations. Particular attention has been given to the protection of such facilities as power plants, pumping stations, compression plants, and pipeline terminals. The companies, in cooperation with the local authorities, also screen the crews on the Lake tankers operating between Maracaibo, Aruba, and Curacao. The effectiveness of these measures, however, is to some extent reduced by the fact that the petroleum workers, even those who are non-Communist, are generally disaffected toward the Junta regime and therefore tend to regard with indifference or suspicion government and company efforts to enforce security measures.

33. Existing security measures in the petroleum industry, together with the assistance rendered by the armed forces, are probably sufficient to control strikes and local disturbances and to deal with sabotage by local elements with limited resources. Additional measures would be required, however, to cope with a large-scale, concerted program of sabotage involving foreign agents as well as local elements, such as could be expected in the event of war.

34. The nascent iron ore industry is less vulnerable than the petroleum industry. Iron ore is mined from open pits, and equipment is well dispersed. However, transshipment stations could be sabotaged rather easily and the 170-mile, narrow channel being developed in the Orinoco and Macareo Rivers could easily be temporarily blocked.

International Relations

35. The majority of the Venezuelans are not actively interested in world affairs, and like most other Latin Americans shy away from military involvement in areas remote from the Western Hemisphere. Venezuelan-US relations, in which oil plays an important role, have generally been friendly, but at times delicate because of the nationalistic attitudes of some members of the administration. Some irritation has arisen over trade and tariff policies, the civil aviation agreement, and purchase of military matériel.

36. Venezuela maintains friendly relations with most Latin American states, but its relations with some have varied with the political orientation of the Venezuelan Government. When AD was in power it pursued a policy of close cooperation with the more democratic nations of the Hemisphere. The present government tends to be cool toward those governments with which the AD regime was most friendly, especially when such governments continue to offer refuge to AD exiles. Guatemala is, however, the only Latin American country which has never recognized the Junta.

37. Relations with the USSR, established in 1945, existed merely on a formal level. In breaking off diplomatic relations with the USSR and Czechoslovakia in June 1952, the Junta was no doubt influenced by its long-held view that the Soviet Embassy and Czech Legation were centers for propaganda and subversive activities. It also appears that the Junta expected to reap some domestic political advantage from the act, and possibly also to win favor from the United States.

38. In the Organization of American States and the United Nations Venezuela has generally supported US policies. It has ratified the Rio Treaty[4] and the Charter of the OAS[5] and has expressed willingness to cooperate in Hemisphere defense. Venezuela voted with the US on every important political question at the sixth session of the UN General Assembly. Venezuela has shown reluctance, however, to implement certain UN resolutions for which it has voted. Although it supported the UN action in Korea and the Uniting for Peace resolution,[6] it has not offered military aid to the UN in Korea or promised to set aside armed forces for use by the UN in the event of future aggressions.

39. The Venezuelans conceive their proper role in Hemisphere defense to be the protection of their own territory and strategic industries. They desire to render their own armed forces capable of fulfilling this mission. They would be unlikely to consent to the stationing of any foreign troops on Venezuelan soil.

of 1934, as amended. In addition they are consistent with the recommendation of the National Security Council of March 5, 1952.

If you approve the Committee's recommendation and if the signature text can be prepared in time, it is planned to sign the agreement in Caracas on August 27, 1952. Publicity with regard to the details of the agreement will be released simultaneously by both Governments, but such release may not be made until sometime during the following week.

I recommend that the recommendations of the Committee be approved.

Memorandum by the Chairman of the Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Agreements (Corse) to the President[2]

SECRET WASHINGTON, August 25, 1952.

Subject: Request for Presidential Approval of Results of Trade Agreement Negotiations with Venezuela.

On August 29, 1951, you approved the recommendation of the Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Agreements to enter into negotiations for the purpose of supplementing the 1939 Trade Agreement with Venezuela.

Public announcement of intention to negotiate such a trade agreement was also issued on August 29, 1951. All other procedural steps in connection with the preparations for the negotiations as set forth in Executive Order No. 10082 and the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951 have been taken. Specifically, 1) a list of products on which concessions might be made by the United States was attached to the public notice of intention to negotiate; 2) this list was transmitted by you to the United States Tariff Commission in order that that Agency might report the limit below which concessions in its opinion could not be granted without causing or threatening serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive products (popularly known as peril point findings); 3) opportunity to file written briefs and to present oral testimony with regard to all aspects of the negotiations was given to interested persons; 4) the United States Tariff Commission reported its peril point findings to you on December 27, 1951; 5) digests of trade information on United States import products and on United States export products were made available to the Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Agreements by the United States Tariff Commission and the Department of Commerce respectively.

[2] Drafted by Mr. Corse.

After consideration of the information obtained through the above procedural steps, the Committee obtained your approval on March 17, 1952 of the following two recommendations:

1. Offers by the United States and requests of Venezuela by the United States on the basis of an offer of 10½ cents on Venezuelan oil.*

2. An offer going below 10½ cents† provided that the Venezuelans refused to negotiate on the basis of recommendation 1, and that reciprocal concessions were obtained from Venezuela commensurate to the value of concessions granted by the United States. Other offers by the United States would remain within the peril point findings of the Tariff Commission.

Negotiations with the Venezuelans were begun on the basis of recommendation 1. Every effort was made to persuade the Venezuelans to negotiate on the basis of a 10½ cent offer. Despite intensive negotiation, the Venezuelans refused to accept such an offer as providing a basis for an agreement and were prepared to break off the negotiations and to give notice of termination of the 1939 Trade Agreement. At that time, with the approval of the Trade Agreements Committee, the additional offer on Venezuelan oil, as provided for in recommendation 2,‡ was made and reluctantly accepted by the Venezuelans as providing, from their point of view, a valid concession on Venezuelan oil.

Having surmounted this important obstacle, it was possible to bring the negotiations to a successful conclusion. The text of the agreement is attached as Appendix A.[3]

As compared to the 1939 agreement, Venezuela grants new or improved concessions on $154 million of imports from the United States; on $12 million of imports they are withdrawing the 1939 concessions;

---

*The kinds of petroleum products included in the designation "Venezuelan oil" are crude petroleum, topped crude petroleum, residual fuel oil and distillate fuel oil. For practical purposes, the peril point found by the Tariff Commission for Venezuelan oil may be considered as 10½ cents per barrel on all imports, although three of the Commissioners found that the peril point was the existing tariff quota arrangements (10½ cents per barrel on a quantity equal to 5 per cent of the total quantity of crude petroleum processed in refineries in Continental United States during the preceding calendar year and 21 cents per barrel on imports in excess of this quantity), while the other three Commissioners found that a rate of 10½ cents per barrel on imports would not result in serious injury being caused or threatened to the domestic industry. [Footnote in the source text.]

‡ The technical question of whether imports of topped crude should be excluded or included in the concession set forth in footnote 2, page 2 was reconsidered subsequent to its March recommendations and the Committee decided to include such imports in the concession. [Footnote in the source text.]

and on $6 million of imports the new agreement provides for higher Venezuelan rates than in the 1939 agreement. The trade coverage of the 1939 agreement as supplemented by the new agreement is $240 million or about 60 per cent of total United States exports to Venezuela. Under the 1939 agreement, only 35 per cent of our exports were covered. Among the important items receiving new or improved duty concessions are apples, pears, certain dried vegetables, rolled oats, wheat flour, barley malt, baby and dietetic foods, wrapping paper, laboratory and refractory glass products, galvanized iron sheets, enameled iron and steel manufactures, builders' hardware, table flatware, unassembled trucks and passenger cars, motorcycles, aircraft and parts, trailers, radio and television receivers including parts, phonographs including combinations and parts, phonograph records, automatic refrigerators, scientific apparatus, hand tools, photographic products, office machinery, electric motors, pumps, numerous types of industrial machinery and apparatus and parts, generators and transformers. Among the products on which new bindings of duty-free treatment were granted by Venezuela are road building, textile and printing machinery; stoves, heaters and ovens, and parts for agricultural machinery. The agreement, as revised, covers 179 Venezuelan tariff items as compared with 88 in the 1939 agreement. It includes products of interest to practically every important group of United States exporters. The concessions by Venezuela have particular significance in as much as that country has no balance of payment difficulties in purchasing from the dollar area.

In 1950 United States imports from Venezuela of crude petroleum and residual fuel oil amounted to $288 million or about 90 per cent of our total imports from Venezuela. It is estimated that the 1950 value of trade on which United States granted improved customs treatment is about $175 million, of which practically all was crude petroleum and residual fuel oil. New concessions of potential value to Venezuela consisted of the binding of existing duty-free entry for iron ore, deposits of which are now being developed.

The supplementary trade agreement also revises some of the general provisions of the original 1939 agreement. The more important changes are (1) a revised provision under which tariff concessions are better protected against nullification or impairment by the use of quota restrictions, and (2) the inclusion of the escape clause pursuant to section 6–b of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951. The Venezuelans also agree to extend more favorable customs treatment to products of the Virgin Islands.

If you approve the results of these negotiations, you are required under section 4 (a) of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951 to transmit to Congress, within 30 days after entering into the agreement, a copy of the agreement together with a message identifying the article with respect to which a concession exceeding the peril point was granted and stating your reason for such action with respect to such article. A draft message to Congress is attached as Appendix B.[4]

In addition to the negotiating difficulty caused by the existence of a peril point finding by the Tariff Commission at a rate of duty on Venezuelan oil which was unacceptable to the Venezuelans as a basis for negotiations, the negotiations were further complicated by the desire of the Venezuelans to withdraw or modify certain of the concessions contained in the 1939 Trade Agreement. The products involved were generally agricultural, but did include a few industrial products. Generally, the reasons for such withdrawals or modifications were for the stated purpose of furthering the economic development of Venezuela. The Committee feels that the new concessions offered by Venezuela compensate for the concessions granted by the United States as well as for the 1939 concessions which Venezuela withdrew or modified. There is attached a letter[5] to you from the Secretary of Agriculture[6] which, while expressing concern that there may be an unfavorable reaction to the agreement from the United States agricultural community, does not interpose objection to the approval of this agreement with Venezuela because of the very important strategic value present in the other commodity areas. The Department of Agriculture feels however, that the new agricultural concessions by Venezuela do not balance the agricultural concessions in the 1939 agreement which Venezuela is withdrawing or modifying, and that this is serious in view of the rising tendency toward agricultural protectionism in Venezuela. Every effort was made to obtain additional agricultural concessions from Venezuela but such efforts were not successful.

Although recognizing that the Trade Agreement Act clearly authorizes the President to exceed a peril point finding by the Tariff Commission, the member from the Tariff Commission did not feel free, as a member of the Commission, to cast his vote in favor of a proposed agreement containing a reduction in the import excise tax on petroleum below the Commission's peril point finding. In addition, it was his view that, considering both the coverage and the quality of the concessions which would be granted by each country in the proposed agreement, the balance was decidedly in Venezuela's favor. On the other hand, he recognized that there was room for differences of views regarding the question of balance, and, further that the issues involved include considerations of public policy which the President would, of course, take into account in exercising his authority under the Trade Agreements Act. In these circumstances he felt that the proper course was to abstain from voting.

Considering the supplementary agreement in its entirety, it appears to the Committee that the concessions both ways are substantially in balance. It believes that proposed United States concessions on the controversial petroleum items are reasonable ones and ones which will generally be acceptable to the domestic industry. It is firmly of the opinion that it will be beneficial to the trade and security interest of the United States to enter into the agreement.

Your approval of the results of the negotiation with Venezuela is hereby requested.[7]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 16, 1952.

Subject: Department of Justice Cartel Proceedings

I mentioned briefly to Mr. Bruce this morning the problem which has been created for us in Latin America as a result of the cartel proceedings being commenced against the oil companies by the Department of Justice. In my opinion there is nothing that has happened since I have been in my present position which has done more harm to American investment abroad than the announcement of these proceedings. Mr. Bruce suggested that I bring to your attention the following excerpt from a recent letter[2] from Ambassador Fletcher Warren in Caracas:

"The most unfavorable development not only in August but for months to come was the publication by the Senate's Committee on Small Business of the so-called cartel report.[3] This made mad every oil man of any importance in Venezuela. It seemed to them that their honesty and integrity had been placed in question. They felt that they had been working for Uncle Sam in Venezuela and working successfully. They had set an example for relations between oil companies and national Governments. They were advancing the national defense of the United States. Despite all this, Uncle Sam had let them down by the publication of old information in such a way as to subject them to embarrassment, to cause them unforeseeable difficulties with the Venezuelan authorities. Furthermore, they felt that the report played right into the hands of the Commies and the nationalists, and that we will not hear the last of the report for years. I must say, looking at the situation from the vantage point of the Embassy, I am inclined to agree largely with the oil men. It is certain that the Embassy's work will be made more difficult and that we may be embarrassed by the report at the most inopportune times."

I subscribe wholeheartedly to the above. Mr. Hewittson, Director for Latin American operations of Standard Oil (New Jersey), was in to see me yesterday on another matter and expressed dismay over these proceedings since they go to the very heart of the oil companies' relationship with the Venezuelan Government. This relationship, which has been worked out over a period of years, is based upon an allocation to the Venezuelan Government of 50 percent of the net profits of the companies. Naturally the amount of profit depends upon the prices which the companies realize on oil sales, so that when the United States Government officially alleges that oil prices are noncompetitive the whole basis of the oil companies' position in Venezuela is called into question. One of the Venezuelan cabinet officers recently stated to an official of our Embassy that although the Venezuelan Government was entirely satisfied with the present arrangement, nevertheless the political pressures generated by the commencement of the proceedings would undoubtedly require members of the Venezuelan Government as politicians to agitate for revision of the arrangements with the oil companies.

It is unnecessary to point out to you that the trend for nationalization of private property is getting stronger in Latin America. The entire mining industry in Bolivia is in imminent jeopardy of being taken over. The Brazilian Congress has amended the legislation to create the Government oil monopoly Petrobras in such a way as to eliminate any provision for even minority foreign participation in any oil venture. The copper companies have a serious problem in Chile. In both Argentina and Guatemala, foreign investments are in difficulty and in the latter a far-reaching agrarian reform law has just been passed. In the background is the case of Anglo-Iranian[4] and the Mexican expropriation of oil properties in 1937[5] which is advertised by the Mexicans as having been successful even though experts believe otherwise.

[5] For documentation on this subject, see Foreign Relations, 1938, vol. v, pp. 720 ff.

We have recently successfully concluded negotiations with Venezuela for the modification of our trade agreement and as you know we have had to use our authority to breach the peril point on the rate of duty for petroleum imports. It would be consistent with our efforts in this regard to do whatever is possible to minimize future adverse repercussions for American investment abroad from the cartel proceedings.[6]

[6] In a letter to Ambassador Warren discussing the oil cartel proceedings, dated Jan. 16, 1953, Deputy Assistant Secretary Mann stated that at its meeting on Jan. 9, the NSC had approved and the President had concurred in the recommendations of the Departments of State and Defense to terminate, on the grounds of national security, the criminal action against the oil companies and instead to appoint a Cabinet commission to consider the institution of a civil suit. Mr. Mann also stated that "we in ARA will continue to follow this matter closely and to do all within our power to prevent the continuance of a criminal suit with its attendant publicity and unfortunate repercussions in Venezuela." SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 5, 1952.

Subject: Venezuelan situation.

Elections were held on Sunday, November 30, for a Constituent Assembly which will meet January 10 to review the acts of the governing Junta during the past four years, to draw up a constitution, to establish the procedure for election of a President, and to choose a provisional President to serve in the interim. Voting (by colored cards for party slates) was compulsory for all persons twenty-one years of age or above regardless of literacy, and elections took place in an orderly, quiet manner under the supervision of the Armed Forces. Early returns showed URD (leftist, non-Communist, rather nationalist) leading more than two to one. Principal Army officers then decided they would not under any circumstances turn over the Government to URD. Accordingly, the elections have evidently been rigged so that later returns, still incomplete, show the Government party, FEI, well in the lead.

The three-man governing Junta presented its resignation December 3 to the Armed Forces which appointed it in 1948 and which has now named Col. Marcos Pérez Jiménez (strong man of the Junta) provisional President. The only Cabinet changes were the replacement of the Minister of Interior[2] (who was also a member of the Junta) and the removal of the Junta Secretary[3] who was suspected of plotting with the opposition. The Foreign Minister on Tuesday evening requested our continuance of relations in accordance with Bogota Resolution 35,[4] and Ambassador Warren recommended this action. We feel the question of recognition is not involved, and have instructed him to continue relations through a routine call if satisfied that no influential group of American republics are planning to raise this question or delay action.

It is not yet clear whether Pérez Jiménez will succeed in maintaining the support of the Armed Forces or in making a deal acceptable to the principal legal opposition parties, URD and COPEI. Nevertheless, the opposition called a general strike for noon December 4 claiming that the Government failed to recognize its victory at the polls. Scanty reports thus far received indicate that the general strike has not met with much success. We may expect criticism of the U.S. Government both from elements in Venezuela and in the U.S. for any action which may be interpreted as support of the military government's apparent overriding of election results. However, there is no other course to follow than the continuation of normal relations under present circumstances.[5]

Memorandum by Bainbridge C. Davis of the Office of South American Affairs to the Director of That Office (Atwood)

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, January 14, 1953.

Subject: Balance Sheet—Venezuela.

1—Political structure and orientation of government.

From the coup d'etat of November 1948, which overthrew the Acción Democrática government and dissolved Congress, until December 1952, a three-man Junta governed Venezuela by decree in the name of the Armed Forces. On December 2 the Junta submitted its resignation to the Armed Forces which then appointed Col. Pérez Jiménez, previously the strongest member of the Junta, as Provisional President. A Constituent Assembly elected on November 30, 1952 (with results which indicated a rigged election) met January 9, ratified the appointment of Pérez Jiménez as Provisional President, and approved all existing Government decrees. While the Constituent Assembly is in session, it is empowered to pass on all basic problems confronting the Government. While there is an atmosphere of instability, nevertheless, so long as the Armed Forces remain united, they constitute the final governmental authority. It is expected that Col. Pérez Jiménez, who speaks for the Armed Forces, will continue the policies of the Junta. It is a government of the moderate right which has encouraged continuance of free enterprise and co-operation with the U.S. Government and U.S. private interests in Venezuela.

2—Economy.

The economy of Venezuela is overwhelmingly dependent upon petroleum, over 90% of its foreign exchange, and directly or indirectly, over 65% of its government revenue coming from that industry. It is the world's largest exporter of oil, two-thirds of which is produced by American companies and one-third by British. Large deposits of very high-grade iron ore, which Bethlehem and U.S. Steel are just beginning to exploit, promise to broaden the base of its economy as well as contribute substantially to diminishing U.S. reserves. Venezuela has encouraged private enterprise and foreign investments, and U.S. private investments now total over $2 billion. Due to the oil industry, Venezuela has substantial dollar exchange, no foreign exchange control, and a high credit rating—and it provides one of our largest cash markets in the world today. On the other hand, rising economic nationalism presents a long range threat to our interests.

3—Strategic military importance.

The principal factor in Venezuela's strategic military importance to the U.S. is the fact that it produces over 1,800,000 b/d of oil, 40% of it going to the U.S. and the remainder to other parts of the free world, principally Europe and Latin America. U.S. production is insufficient for domestic peace-time needs, and during a war, Venezuelan oil would be vital to our military operations, while its proximity would facilitate its defense. Venezuelan iron ore is of lesser, though considerable strategic importance.

The geographic location of Venezuela at the entrance to the Caribbean is likewise of military importance. It is assumed that Venezuela's military role would be restricted to the protection of its oil industry and, presumably, as in World War II, the availability of its ports and air fields for transit of U.S. military vessels and planes.

4—Major problems dealt with in 1952 which furthered U.S. objectives.

(a) U.S. Initiative.

Aviation—Substantial progress was made toward the conclusion of a bilateral air transport agreement. Its signature and ratification by

Venezuela awaits the conclusion of a new contract between the Venezuelan Government and Pan American Airways and approval of the agreement and contract by the Constituent Assembly. This agreement is of particular importance as it will terminate the unilateral aspect of non-stop service between Caracas and New York now enjoyed by the Venezuelan airline, LAV, but denied to PAA.[1]

Freight Rates—Through the good offices of this Government, an agreement was reached between the Conference shipping lines serving Venezuela and the Venezuelan government-owned line, CAVN, to increase freight rates. Due to the Venezuelan Government's desire to hold freight rates down and the insistence of the Conference lines on the need for an increase, there was danger of a rate war which in turn would have damaged our political and economic relations. As a result of our efforts, a friendly settlement was brought about.

Point IV—A Point IV general agreement was signed in September 1952.[2] While Point IV operations in Venezuela are presently limited to the continuance of a health and sanitation mission (begun in 1942) and certain training grants, this agreement provides the basis on which any additional Point IV programs may be undertaken. The Venezuelan Government has shown a commendable desire to study its own development needs, and then to seek inter-governmental assistance only when private sources proved insufficient. When technical aid has been desired, the Venezuelan Government has been willing to bear a substantial part of the cost.

U. S. Steel Operations—The signature on January 14, 1952 of a contract between the Orinoco Mining Company (U.S. Steel subsidiary) and the Venezuelan Minister of Development[3] covering operating details[4] ended a long period of delay, and made possible the activation of U.S. Steel's preparations for large scale mining of iron ore. This represented the achievement of one of our major objectives in Venezuela bearing in mind not only the large American investment involved but also the strategic value of expediting the availability of this ore.

(b) Other Country's Initiative.

Trade Agreement—The conclusion of Supplementary Trade Agreement with Venezuela in August 1952 was an outstanding achievement in our relations with that country. The Venezuelans had sought the revision in order to obtain more favorable U.S. customs treatment on their principal export, petroleum, and at the same time to eliminate from the agreement certain Venezuelan tariff items to permit the development of local industry. They stated that failing to obtain their minimum demands on the oil item, they would conclude no agreement and renounce the existing one. In view of the importance to U.S. economic and strategic interests of maintaining favorable trade relations as well as friendly political relations, we took the unusual step (with the concurrence of the National Security Council) of reducing our tariff on oil below the peril point established by the U.S. Tariff Commission.

Military Equipment—In view of the predominant role of the Armed Forces, the Venezuelan Government has been particularly anxious to obtain military equipment from the U.S. It has shown no interest in the military grant aid program, prefering as a matter of pride and in view of its excellent financial position to purchase arms on a reimbursable basis. We have made a real effort to meet Venezuela's request for arms more promptly and to grant favorable treatment in the matter of priorities. In 1951 Col. Pérez Jiménez was dissatisfied with our response, but as a result of the special attention which has been given to requests in 1952, he has indicated his appreciation for our co-operation.

5–Major problems which did not develop successfully in 1952.

Oil Concessions—Throughout 1952 we awaited the granting of new oil concessions to American oil companies to include both present operators and other companies not now operating in Venezuela. In view of the vital importance of Venezuelan oil to the U.S. in time of war, the fact that present concession areas have nearly reached their maximum efficient return and the considerable period needed to develop new areas, the U.S. Government has a direct interest in this problem. No new concessions have been granted since 1945, but in the fall of 1951, the Government indicated that it was about to do so. While no official reason was given for the failure to act during 1952, it is believed that the major factors were a hesitancy to grant concessions prior to legalization of the Government by means of a Constituent Assembly (a point which had been stressed by the opposition) and perhaps the realization that anticipation of such concessions might influence our bargaining position in negotiation of the bilateral trade agreement. The Venezuelan Government has been aware of this Government's desire that concessions be granted, but has always met the issue somewhat evasively.

Military Problem—(See Annex).

(b) Other Country's Initiative. None.

6–Status of pending problems. (Urgent when marked with an asterisk.)

*Aviation Agreement—In view of the fact that an Aviation Agreement was signed in 1948 but never ratified and that the current agreement has been under negotiation for nearly two years during which time LAV has unjustly benefited from non-stop privileges denied to PAA, the prompt signature and ratification by Venezuela of this agreement is of special importance. Unfortunately, the Constituent Assembly must now examine and approve both the new Venezuelan contract with PAA and the bilateral agreement, which introduces another element of delay. LAV's permit to operate its present service expires February 20, and there is a strong likelihood that CAB will not permit unilateral continuation of non-stop service by LAV unless the agreement has been ratified.

Oil Concessions—It is hoped that now that the Constituent Assembly has given an appearance of legality to the present Government, it will act to grant oil concessions.

Oil Cartel Case—The publicity given to oil cartel charges brought by the U.S. Government against several of the largest American oil companies (including Standard Oil of New Jersey whose subsidiary, Creole Petroleum Corporation, produces nearly 45% of Venezuela's total production) has played into the hands of the Venezuelan opposition parties to the disadvantage of American oil company operations there. The opposition has used this to attack the oil companies and the administration of oil laws by the present Government which in turn has felt that a Venezuelan investigation may be necessary in order to protect the Government from further attack. This may also delay Venezuelan action in granting new oil concessions.

Military Equipment—The Venezuelan Government continues to seek armaments of various types, and places importance on our willingness to give them preferred treatment. One aspect of this problem, which will require study in 1953, is the extent to which we can continue to grant this special treatment as a means of winning Venezuelan cooperation without, however, studying the relationship of this equipment to actual defense of the hemisphere. (It is obvious, of course, that most of the equipment now going to Venezuela is intended for strengthening the hand of the Armed Forces in its internal control of the country, and that some of the equipment has no value from the point of view of hemispheric defense even within the limited scope of defense of the oil industry.)

Military Problem—(See Annex).

[Annex]

Additional problem under 5a.

Military Problem—In March 1951 staff conversations were held in Panama between the Venezuelan and U.S. military representatives. An agreement document[5] was drawn up setting forth the results of the planning talks with respect to co-operation of the two countries in providing for the internal and external security of Venezuelan territory with particular reference to the oil industry. These conversations also dealt with the need for military equipment. Further talks were to have taken place in November 1951, but were cancelled on rather short notice by Col. Pérez Jiménez because of his dissatisfaction with the delay in delivery of U.S. military equipment. Despite the fact that he now appears to be satisfied with our co-operation in this matter, it did not seem possible to complete arrangements for the continuance of staff talks.

Additional problem under 6.

Military Problem—Taking into account the foregoing comments under 5*a*—"Military Problem"—and under 6—"Military Equipment"—consideration must be given during 1953 to the desirability of completing the staff talks and formalizing an agreement to indicate the necessity for Venezuelan acceptance of responsibility for specific tasks in hemispheric defense, and Venezuelan understanding that U.S. assistance in obtaining military equipment should be related to this responsibility.

731.5/2–353

The Deputy Director of the Office of South American Affairs (Bennett) to the Ambassador in Venezuela (Warren)

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, February 3, 1953.

OFFICIAL–INFORMAL

DEAR FLETCH: We have been giving some thought to the military staff talks with Venezuela, which were begun in March 1951 but never concluded, and wondering whether this would not be an appropriate time to propose that they be resumed. Before even asking the people in Defense whether they would like to have us arrange for further conversations, we would like your informal comment on the advisability of doing so at this time.

As you will recall, the March 1951 talks which took place at Panama resulted in a memorandum document which was drawn up ad referendum. Arrangements were made to renew the conversations on November 5, 1951, and Lt. Gen. Morris was to visit Venezuela in that connection, but at the last moment, Col. Moreno, speaking on behalf of himself and Col. Pérez Jiménez, indicated that more favorable terms of payment for military equipment must be granted by the U.S. before the conversations could continue. It became evident that failure to receive military equipment promptly and to the extent requested by the Venezuelan Military was an even more important factor influencing the thinking of Col. Pérez Jiménez and his Chief of Staff. Our proposal to resume the talks either in December 1951 or January 1952 did not meet with Venezuelan approval. I also note from your despatch 1182 of February 1, 1952[1] that during a conversation which you and Col. Shaw had with Col. Pérez Jiménez, the latter replied to your question regarding resumption of the talks by stating that he hoped to give you an answer soon, after discussing it with his Chief of Staff.

As a result of vigorous and continued efforts by the State Department, improved terms of payment were offered the Venezuelans in a note of February 8, 1952,[2] and somewhat higher priority, as well as more prompt administrative handling of the Venezuelan requests for military equipment was granted by the Department of Defense. (The delays had also been due to ineffective and careless handling of orders by the Venezuelan military attachés in Washington, and this procedure was likewise improved.)

Despite these efforts on our part and Col. Pérez Jiménez' statement to you that he had hoped to give you an answer soon, it appears that he has not brought the subject up again and that during the past twelve months there has been no progress toward renewal of the talks. I note that you have in your files a copy of a memorandum of conversation dated March 19, 1952[3] between Lt. Col. Bryde[4] of G–3 and Messrs. Bernbaum, Mackay, and Davis in which it was agreed that it would be wiser not to take the initiative in raising the question of further talks until the Venezuelans had actually received some of the M–18 tanks and so had tangible evidence of our willingness to fill their requests. It was realized that some of the equipment being provided was not needed by Venezuela to fulfill its defense role but was being demanded by that country as the price of its resumption of the talks. It was thought that after delivery of some of this matériel the Venezuelans could be told that agreement on a plan for protection of the oil fields[5] would place the U.S. participants in the talks in a better position to support Venezuelan requests for additional equipment. Finally, in a conversation with Col. Bryde on July 10, 1952,[6] Mr. Davis again expressed our opinion that it would be best to wait until some of the M–18's had arrived on Venezuelan soil, but stated that if Defense wished to raise the question sooner, we would be glad to obtain your advice as to timing.

In the foregoing paragraphs I have set forth our understanding of the status of this problem, and would appreciate your comments as to whether this is a correct summary. I judge that the subject has not been raised by either country during the past year. While I suppose it would be too much to hope for real political stability in the near future in Venezuela, Col. Pérez Jiménez, who has so far made the real decisions, is not confirmed by the Constituent Assembly as Provisional President, and he has recently seemed to desire to work more closely with the U.S. We in turn have done as well as we are likely able to do in granting Venezuelan requests of interest to the Military. Therefore, from this distance, the time would seem to be as propitious as any we might choose to arrange for the resumption of the staff talks. Before ascertaining whether Defense has any reason for not wishing to reopen the matter at this time, we would appreciate your appraisal.

Very sincerely yours, TAP

The Ambassador in Venezuela (Warren) to the Department of State

TOP SECRET CARACAS, May 11, 1953.
No. 2032

Subject: Resumption of Military Staff Talks With Venezuela; Venezuelan purchases of United States Military Equipment

The Embassy is of the opinion that this would be an appropriate time to propose the resumption of the military staff talks with Venezuela, which were initiated in March 1951, but never concluded. The Department will recall that the March 1951 talks at Panama resulted in a memorandum which was drawn up ad referendum, and that arrangements were made to renew the conversations on November 5, 1951. At the last moment, however, the Venezuelan Chief of Staff, Col. Félix Moreno, indicated that before the conversations could be resumed more favorable terms of payment for military equipment must be granted by the United States. It became evident that failure to receive military equipment promptly and to the extent requested by the Venezuelan Armed Forces was an even more important factor influencing the thinking of the Minister of Defense, Col. Marcos Pérez Jiménez, and his Chief of Staff. The United States proposal to continue the talks either in December 1951 or January 1952 did not meet with the approval of the Venezuelan Government.

Despite Col. Pérez Jiménez' statement about that time to Ambassador Warren that he hoped to give him an early answer as to when the conversations could be resumed, the Venezuelan Government did not bring up the subject again, and during the past year there has been no progress toward renewal of the talks.

The difficulties of the Venezuelan Government in obtaining military equipment and supplies in the United States, especially modern ships and aircraft, have not only constituted the major deterrent to the resumption of the military staff talks, but also may have far-reaching, long range effects equally serious for the United States. Venezuela has the money and the determination to expand her army, navy and air force, and experience has demonstrated that if she is unable to obtain the necessary equipment and supplies in the United States, she will obtain them from other countries. This Embassy has no doubt that continued purchases of military equipment and supplies from nations other than the United States will seriously jeopardize the positions of the United States Army, Navy and Air Missions to Venezuela, and, to some extent, have already done so.

In this connection, the Venezuelan Air Force has recently acquired six Canberra jet light bombardment aircraft from Great Britain. These six aircraft, added to the 21 British Vampire jet aircraft the Venezuelan Air Force already had in operation, increase the proportion of British aircraft operated by the Venezuelan Air Force to 20 percent of total aircraft strength. Moreover, it is understood that six additional Canberras are being purchased by the Venezuelan Air Force from Great Britain for delivery later this year. Because of the large capital expenditures necessary to establish a stock of replacement parts and to train personnel in the operation and maintenance of advanced jet aircraft, the Embassy believes it unlikely that Venezuela will purchase any aircraft from the United States after its air force has become largely equipped with British Canberras and Vampires.

All except three of the United States aircraft now in use by the Venezuelan Air Force are more than seven years old, while none of the British aircraft are more than two years old. It appears inevitable that the older U.S.-manufactured aircraft will be replaced by modern British aircraft over the next two years unless Venezuela is able to obtain new aircraft from the United States. The prestige and influence of the United States Air Mission to Venezuela is being reduced in direct proportion to the percentage of British aircraft acquired by the Venezuelan Air Force. The recent acquisition of the six Canberra jet aircraft has already had the following results:

1. The Chief of Staff of the Venezuelan Air Force has informally discussed with the British Air Attaché the assignment of a British Air Mission to Venezuela.
2. Venezuelan officers and airmen who would normally be attending United States Air Force schools and factory training courses in the United States are being sent to similar facilities in the United Kingdom.
3. Additional British technicians are being sent to Venezuela to assist in the maintenance and operation of British aircraft.

For the convenience of the Department of Defense, the Embassy lists the following intelligence reports[1] from the Air Attaché relating to the acquisition of non-United States aircraft by the Venezuelan Government:

The same kind of situation is evident with regard to Venezuela's recent purchases of naval equipment and supplies. The Venezuelan Navy has planned a five-year expansion program to build a modern naval force, entailing the purchase of three destroyers, six light destroyers, three submarines, two minesweepers, one troop transport, one light cruiser, and various light patrol boats, tugs and cutters. Although it was originally planned to obtain all of these ships from the United States, the Venezuelan Government has negotiated with other countries for purchases because of difficulties in obtaining the approval of the United States Government, and delay in reaching a satisfactory agreement as to prices. While Venezuelan naval officers admit that there are definite advantages to owning United States ships and equipment, they doubt that these advantages justify the delay involved while the United States decides whether or not to make the material available.

In the naval program outlined in the preceding paragraph, the Venezuelan Government contracted for the purchase of the three larger destroyers in England, and they are now under construction. Contracts for the construction of three of the six light destroyers have been concluded with an Italian shipbuilding firm.

If the Venezuelan Navy is unable to obtain the types of equipment it wants to purchase from the United States, there is no doubt that it will obtain this equipment from other nations. Venezuelan naval officers have very definite ideas of the type of equipment they want, and they will resent any attempts by the United States to try to force other types of equipment upon them, especially since Venezuela is prepared to pay for the best. Venezuela is building a new navy; it wants new equipment, the most modern and efficient available. If the United States is able or willing only to supply obsolete equipment, Venezuela will obtain its requirements elsewhere.

The Embassy considers it important to emphasize that Venezuelan naval officers not only believe that nations other than the United States are more responsive to Venezuela's needs, but in many cases feel that they are not accorded the type of treatment their positions require on procurement and other missions to the United States. The Chief of the Naval Staff has evinced a certain amount of resentment against the United States because Venezuelan naval officers consider that their colleagues have not been courteously treated on recent visits to the United States. The probable reason for this treatment is that Venezuelan naval officers have relatively low ranks even though many occupy important positions; the top naval officer in Venezuela, for example, has the rank of Commander. When dealing with these officers it is important to remember that despite their low ranks as compared with United States Navy ranks, they have the same power and authority that is normally exercised by the highest-ranking United States naval officers. Admittedly it will take a great deal of time and effort to prove to Venezuela that the United States does have a genuine interest in her navy and will actually assist in procuring the equipment and teaching them how to employ it effectively—but we must do just that in order to safeguard our position in this important area.

Although the Venezuelan Army has been obtaining military equipment from the United States, there is dissatisfaction in the method of payment, in the length of time required from the initial request for equipment until actual delivery is made, and in other administrative difficulties. While the Ministry of Defense understands that some types of military equipment cannot be made available immediately, it believes that the time taken to process requests for equipment in the United States is unnecessarily prolonged. The Embassy is pleased to note, however, that improved terms of payment for military equipment purchased in the United States were offered to the Venezuelan Government on February 8, 1952, and that somewhat higher priority, as well as more prompt administrative handling of Venezuelan requests for military equipment, was granted by the Department of Defense. The Venezuelan feeling in respect to military equipment only becomes truly important because of the situations in the naval and air force fields.

In suggesting that the time is opportune for again proposing resumption of the military staff talks with Venezuela, the Embassy has taken into consideration the following:

1. The Chief of Staff of the Venezuelan Navy has informed the Embassy Naval Attaché that the navy would favor the resumption of the conversations at an early date. He declared that his Government is disposed to resume the staff talks with the attitude that the policy of the United States has changed and that there are now good prospects for attaining agreement.

2. On April 19, 1953, Col. Marcos Pérez Jiménez was named President for the next five years, and a constitutional form of government replaced the provisional administration that had ruled Venezuela since military leaders assumed control of the country on November 24, 1948. The transition to a constitutional administration was accomplished in an atmosphere of calm and order, and today the indications are that President Pérez Jiménez will continue to exercise complete control over the country, barring a serious (and at present unlikely) split in the Army. While the nation has not yet achieved and does not claim to have achieved complete democracy, such democratic institutions as a liberal Constitution and national, state and municipal legislatures have been reinstated for the first time since 1948. Moreover, the present Government is strongly anti-Communist and has outlawed the Communist Party. It has broken diplomatic relations with Soviet Russia and Czechoslovakia, and embarked upon the closest supervision of the activities of Communist front groups.

3. The new President has demonstrated on many occasions his friendly attitude toward the United States and his desire to work more closely with the Government of the United States. This attitude has been made clear to our military attachés, to our military and diplomatic missions. All officials of these missions believe in the sincerity of the President's attitude.

4. Embassy Caracas considers that, with Venezuela turning more and more to European sources for military equipment, there is the greatest danger that European military missions will replace our own and make ineffective our declared objective of standardizing equipment and techniques in the other American republics.

5. This Embassy is convinced that the course which Venezuela follows with respect to our military missions and the standardization of equipment and techniques will influence every other country south of the Rio Grande. Once the United States starts losing ground in Venezuela our prestige will be affected pari passu in all the other American republics.

6. Most Venezuelans realize that this country is an important link in the defense of the hemisphere. They also know that, in addition to her strategic position on the Caribbean at the northern extremity of South America, Venezuela has vital supplies of petroleum and iron ore. Today, in contrast to many other Latin American nations, she has no foreign debt and no shortage of dollar exchange. She prefers, she wants American military supplies and equipment.

This Embassy is of the opinion that the time has now come to propose to Venezuela that the military staff conversations be resumed as soon as possible. It stresses that for the conversations to be a success, the United States must be able to assist Venezuela fully in the aeronautical, military and naval fields. This means a careful review of our policy and a decision in keeping with the best over-all interest of the United States.

CONFIDENTIAL
OFFICIAL–INFORMAL

CARACAS, June 1, 1953.

DEAR TOM: I saw President Pérez Jiménez Saturday morning at 9:30 in keeping with the appointment which I had requested. I took along George Phelan[1] in order to have someone with me truly bilingual who could help me out in case I got stuck for a Spanish word and who would be in a position to get any intonation or implication of the [1] George R. Phelan, Attaché, Caracas.

President that I might miss. George and I were with him for about 35 or 40 minutes. I was able to cover all the points that I had decided upon before hand. I found the President, at the beginning of the conversation, a bit reserved. Both George and I are inclined to believe that that attitude is explained by the President's expectation that we were going to bring up the Penzini Hernández article concerning Jack Cabot.[2] As soon as the President saw that we were not raising that matter, his friendliness left nothing to be desired. He was very much on the qui vive and well informed in what he said. I was particularly pleased with the understanding of the matters raised as revealed by his expression, both facial and oral. He gets to be more the President each time I see him.

First, I brought up the visit of Dr. Milton Eisenhower.[3] I stated who the members of the party would be and the purpose of the visit. I told him in a general way what the Embassy expects to do during the visit and added that a member of the Embassy staff would be in touch with the Foreign Office during the present week to be sure that we all kept in step on the program to be set up. (Let me state at this point that thus far nothing has been said about Armed Forces Day on June 24 by anyone in the Foreign Office or the Presidency. However, we believe that ceremonies for the occasion will be held.) The President made it clear that his Government welcomes the visit of Dr. Eisenhower and will do all it can to make his stay here a success. Although I had mentioned Mr. Cabot's name in particular along with that of Mr. Bennett, the President did not refer to him. Both George Phelan and I are inclined to believe that the President's failure to mention Mr. Cabot was a simple omission. In connection with the President's reference to Dr. Eisenhower, both George and I felt that the President had in mind the article of Dr. Juan Penzini Hernández alleging approaches by Mr. Cabot to Latin American Communists or radicals and leftists in exile. However, he did not mention Penzini when saying that occasional articles appear in the local press which are unfriendly to the United States, but that the censorship here is limited to the publication of items or news related to internal politics or domestic affairs. The President went on to mention that certain papers and magazines in the United States, such as the New York Times, Time, Fortune, and others, publish articles most unpleasant to the present Government of Venezuela, but that it is well understood here that such articles do not reflect the United States Government's opinion and that, because of the existence of the free press in the United States, our Government cannot prevent the publication of such articles. George and I are of the opinion that the little President handled his end of the conversation very well indeed, but that we surprised him in not bringing up Penzini or his article.

Secondly, I took the opportunity to make an explanation regarding the Simpson Act[4] and proposals to restrict the importation of fuel oil in the United States. I tried to make plain that the proposals were not aimed at Venezuela in particular and were the result of developments in the United States affecting a considerable percentage of the people of our country. I also touched on the political situation facing President Eisenhower in the American congress because of the small majority which the Republicans have in the House and Senate. I mentioned the good work done by the Executive power, the State Department, and American citizens in setting forth the facts of the oil situation to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives. In effect, I bragged a little bit about how pleased I was with the efforts made by Americans in business in Venezuela to see that the truth about this matter is known in the United States. I stated that it looked as though we (Venezuelans and Americans) would have a year in which to present properly the true situation in order to avoid the imposition twelve months from now of the Simpson or other similar restrictions. I emphasized that it is a mutual problem and one that will call for the best study and attention that can be given by both Venezuelans and Americans. I said that I would try to see that American citizens here in Venezuela do not sound off in such a way as to make our problem in the United States more difficult. I did not mention Venezuelans in this connection but the President got the point.

I found the President well informed with respect to the Simpson proposal and other restrictive measures. He readily admitted that it was a mutual problem. He stated however that he and other members of the Government are rather optimistic for several reasons. First, they are sure that President Eisenhower would not like to see such a law enacted during the first year of his administration. Pérez Jiménez therefore trusts that President Eisenhower will exert his influence to prevent congressional enactment of any of the restrictive proposals. Secondly, President Eisenhower, as a soldier, realizes better than many others that it is important for the United States to preserve its oil reserves within its own territory for emergency cases, as suggested by the Chiefs of Staff. Furthermore, it is of vital interest to important sectors of the U.S. public that the economy of Venezuela be maintained at the present high level. With regard to the possible recurrence of the demand from independent oil and coal producers in the United States next year for restriction, President Pérez Jiménez considers the demand from the coal producers a negligible one because he believes that limitation of oil imports would not induce the American people to use coal instead of oil; and he further considers that, as far as the independent oil producers are concerned, the Venezuelan policy should be to make every effort to arouse an interest in the exploitation of oil in Venezuela. Finally, that enactment of such restrictive measures could be detrimental to the present friendly relations between Venezuela and the United States and most likely would have undesirable influence on our relations with other Latin American countries. President Pérez Jiménez academically understands the relations between our President and the American congress but it was evident to both George and me that, despite what I had said, he still thinks our President should be able to handle the American congress in the same way that he would handle the Venezuelan Senate and Chamber. The President seemed to admit that this is a problem for both Venezuela and the United States, that Washington has done what it could thus far, that Americans and Venezuelans here have been on the alert and active, and that the next 12 months are the trying time. I am afraid that I did not impress him as I had hoped with a need for understandng the political importance of this matter to our own Government. In all of this, he was thinking as a soldier and not as a politician responsible to an electorate. I am sure that during the next 12 months, in speaking to the President, I shall have to go back often to this subject.

[4] No "Simpson Act" has been identified. Ambassador Warren may have been referring to one of several restrictive tariff bills introduced into the 83rd Congress, 1st session, by Representative Richard M. Simpson (R.–Pa.), possibly H.R. 5495, a bill to extend the President's authority to modify tariffs under the Trade Agreements Act. H.R. 5495 became Public Law 215, approved Aug. 7, 1953; for text, see 67 Stat. 472.

My main purpose in seeing the President was to bring up the Air Agreement. I will discuss that in another letter[5] to you under today's date.

At the close of our conversation, the President brought up his desire to obtain quickly ammunition for the tanks which Venezuela bought from us last year. I told him he could count on my assistance, and that of the Military Attaché.[6] I have asked Colonel Haley to prepare me a memorandum on the subject (which he has done). I am forwarding a copy of that memorandum to Mr. Jamison under cover of a separate letter[7] and asking him to do what he can to expedite the shipment of ammunition.

To end up my visit with the President, I, at the request of the Governor of Arkansas, delivered to the President a document conferring upon him the title of "Arkansas Traveler" and making him an Ambassador of good will on behalf of Arkansas to the people of this country. It was quite a pretentious document with plenty of colored ribbon and a gold seal. The President was evidently pleased and said that he would write me a letter accepting the designation and send the communication through channels so that I could pass it on to the Governor of Arkansas. It was nice to be able to end the audience with the President on this pleasant note.

George and I agree that it was a satisfactory visit and I am glad to have it a matter of record.

Cordially and sincerely yours, FLETCH

CONFIDENTIAL
OFFICIAL–INFORMAL

CARACAS, June 1, 1953.

DEAR TOM: I would appreciate your informing Charlie Nolan[1] and others concerned that I saw the President Saturday morning, May 30, at which time I brought up the Air Agreement. I reviewed all our efforts to obtain a mutually satisfactory agreement, pointing out that we had been on this matter for about three years. I said that over six months ago, the Foreign Office and the State Department thought they had reached accord on an agreement that could be signed as soon as Pan American Airways had agreed with the Venezuelan Government on its contractual relations, that for months Pan American has been endeavoring to obtain a definitive, firm offer from the Government of Venezuela. I went on to say that if Pan American understood what Venezuela desires of that company and if I understand Pan American, that company would be able to accept the definitive offers which Venezuela has considered making. I told the President that there is pending at this time an application on the part of LAV for the extension of its permit to fly between Maiquetia and New York. I emphasized that I have done everything within my power to prevent the linking of the renewal of that permit with the Aviation Agreement now pending. I implied that I have now come to the end of my rope, and that I am afraid that I cannot longer prevent the linking up of the two matters. I then said that I wanted to tell him that Pan American has supported the interest of Venezuela in connection with the proposal to restrict the importation of oil into the United States. I said further that Pan American Airways had a Vice President doing all that he could to assist Venezuela in this connection.

The President said that he was pleased to hear about the assistance given Venezuela by Pan American, and that he personally would move to facilitate the early disposal of the Air Agreement. I believe the President intends to act quickly in this matter. At any rate, we have done all we can at this stage without making a threat. I hope our efforts will be successful.[2]

Cordially and sincerely yours, FLETCH

411.006/7–1753

Memorandum by the Special Assistant to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Woodward) to the Under Secretary of State (Smith)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 17, 1953.

Subject: Venezuelan Ambassador's call on you.

Discussion:

On instructions from his Foreign Office, Dr. César González, the Venezuelan Ambassador, has asked to see you briefly regarding a petroleum problem. His call undoubtedly relates to the Simpson Bill, HR–5894,[2] which would restrict U.S. imports of petroleum and fuel oil. This bill would violate the present Supplementary Trade Agreement with Venezuela concluded last August, and would cause about a $300 million cutback in Venezuela's annual crude oil production, thereby affecting the Venezuelan Government's revenue (65% of which comes from oil) and its receipts of dollar exchange (95% of which come from oil.)

We are of course aware of the damage such legislation would do to our own security and commercial interests and our over-all relations with Venezuela. The Department has repeatedly made its views known to Congress with respect to this and similar proposed legislation, and is following the progress of the Simpson Bill very closely. It is possible that HR–5894 will be passed by the House this week. It is not anticipated that it will be acted upon in the Senate.

President Pérez Jiménez and Foreign Minister Otañez on June 25 mentioned to Dr. Milton Eisenhower their earlier concern over proposals in the U.S. Congress for restrictions on oil imports. However, both officials expressed confidence that the threat of such legislation had largely passed and stressed that they understood clearly, as Dr. Eisenhower had pointed out, that it was the policy of President Eisenhower and his administration to oppose such legislation.

[1]Drafted by Bainbridge C. Davis and approved by Mr. Atwood.

[2]Representative Simpson introduced H.R. 5894 on June 23, 1953. The bill was designed to amend the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951, by imposing quotas on petroleum imports and a sliding scale tax on lead and zinc imports. For a summary of the bill's provisions and the views of the Department of State opposing the bill, see Congressional Record, 83d Cong., 1st sess., vol. 99 (pt. 7), pp. 9637–9642. The bill was debated and recommitted to the House Ways and Means Committee on July 23; it was not enacted into legislation.

It is apparently the intention of the White House to do nothing directly to deter protectionist elements from airing their views in Congress. The State Department has, with White House approval, clearly indicated to Congress its opinion that this legislation will have a unfavorable effect on relations with Venezuela and other countries.

The Ambassador may possibly be concerned over a Joint Resolution (SJR–90) which would nullify the present 5¼¢ tax on petroleum products from Venezuela. The Department's opposition to this bill is also being prepared in response to an inquiry from the Senate Finance Committee.

Recommendation:

It is recommended that you receive the Ambassador and that if his concern relates to the Simpson Bill, you assure him of the Department's continued opposition to this measure and of its belief that it will not pass both Houses of Congress. You may wish to add that the Administration is firmly devoted to promoting trade, not additional protectionism. The President's views on this subject are clear, and we have been advised that it would be best to use our most emphatic representations to the Congress in only those instances where there is imminent likelihood that the proposed restrictions might actually become law.[3]

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

1. The importance of Venezuela to the U.S. is due principally to its strategic resources (chiefly petroleum and iron ore), and market for U.S. exports as well as the very large U.S. private capital investment, its geographic location, its support of the free enterprise system, and its political support of the U.S. and the free world in international organizations. (1–9)

2. Recent Venezuelan history has been characterized by rapid economic growth but much slower political evolution. The tradition of strong rule by military leaders has retarded political education, and has caused an acceptance of subversive and violent methods to accomplish political change. This, coupled with a rather sharp division between the very few who are wealthy and the extremely poor masses, without a strong, stabilizing middle class, has facilitated authoritarian government. The gradual education of the masses, the growth of labor unions, and the tests of political power enjoyed briefly by the masses from 1945 to 1948, as well as the rising tide of nationalism throughout Latin America, threaten the continuance of this type of government. (15, 16, 22–24)

3. The present dictatorship, which is constitutional in form only, is not generally liked by the people, but is popular with the majority of the armed forces and of the business interests and privileged classes who prefer a government friendly to them rather than greater civil liberties. So long as the President, Colonel Perez Jimenez, retains the support of the armed forces, there is no likelihood that he will lose control of the country. The leaders of the principal opposition parties are in exile, and while the Government has had only partial success in breaking up the organization of the Accion Democratica party which held power from 1945 to 1948, it is unlikely that any civilian group will be able to overthrow the Government. Efforts to split the armed forces are continuing, but have not so far achieved such success. There is a large and growing element which favors greater economic nationalism and which coincides partially with the group demanding greater civil liberties. Each of these elements will increasingly demand a voice in the Government, and this in itself presents a conflict of interests for us. (17–21, 25–27, 39)

4. Venezuela's economy is overwhelmingly dependent upon petroleum, and both the commercial and military significance to us of this product give it a position of outstanding importance in Venezuelan-U.S. relations. This oil, on which the economy and the Government revenue depend so heavily, is produced ⅔ by American and ⅓ by British-Dutch capital and management. These facts enhance our direct interest in this commodity, and create additional problems in our relations. Increased Venezuelan production and discovery of additional reserves are of strategic importance to the U.S., while at the same time, increasing exports of Venezuelan oil to the U.S. in peace time involve political problems for us because of the objections of our domestic producers. Recognition of the importance of Venezuelan oil and of this market for a half billion dollars of U.S. exports annually were the primary considerations in our acceding last year to Venezuela's request for negotiation of a Supplementary Trade Agreement. Legislation which has repeatedly been introduced in our Congress threatens these trade agreement commitments as well as to varying degrees, our export market, our investments, and our security interests, and it would seriously damage our friendly relations. (4, 7, 11, 45)

5. The development by American steel companies of large deposits of high-grade iron ore is of strategic importance to us, and adds to U.S. private investments in Venezuela now estimated at over $2 billion. Venezuela's position as an exponent of private enterprise and its friendly treatment of foreign capital constitute additional reasons for our desire to maintain friendly relations and to assist in the development of a sound balanced economy. (5, 6, 13)

6. Venezuela's historically friendly attitude toward the U.S., its cooperation with us during the second World War, and its subsequent cooperation with us in both regional and United Nations matters, as well as its anti-Communist stand, and its desire for a more prominent position among the American Republics emphasize its importance to the U.S. However, while this friendly attitude is representative of the ruling element, we must not overlook the distrust and misunderstanding of the U.S. which is widespread on the part of the laboring element and the uneducated masses. (8, 9, 27, 28)

BASIC OBJECTIVES

7. The objectives of the U.S. with respect to Venezuela are:

A. Political

(1) Basic friendliness toward the U.S. on the part of the Venezuelan Government, political parties and people and a resultant support of our economic and military objectives in Venezuela, of our area-wide policy of maintenance and hemispheric peace and solidarity, and of our world policies, particularly in the UN; (40, 41, 57–59)

(2) The elimination of the menace of internal Communist or other anti-U.S. subversion; (41, 59)

(3) Encouragement of orderly progressive development by Venezuela of stable representative institutions in order to strengthen Venezuela's support for the way of life of the U.S. and the free world. (40, 59)

B. Economic

(1) A continuing development of Venezuela's petroleum and iron ore resources; (44–52)

(2) Maintenance of an important market for U.S. exports; (7, 43)

(3) Venezuela's continued adherence to the private enterprise system, including the further development by private capital of its strategic resources of petroleum and iron ore and the continuance of a favorable climate for foreign investments; (42, 54)

(4) Development by Venezuela of a strong and balanced economy so that Venezuela will be an increasingly effective member of the hemisphere system and participant in world-wide economic and political affairs; (54–56)

(5) Development of better living conditions for the Venezuelan masses and an increased share for them in the economic wealth of the country as the surest means of preventing the growth of Communism and of assuring that any more popularly chosen government will not be less friendly toward the U.S. (55, 56)

C. Military

(1) Safeguarding of Venezuelan strategic resources, territory, and adjacent sea and air lanes through individual and collective defense measures against external aggression; (2, 3, 12, 32–37, 60–63)

(2) Ensuring the availability to the U.S. and its allies in time of war of maximum quantities of Venezuelan oil and other raw materials. (32, 36, 44, 45)

COURSES OF ACTION

Political

8. The U.S. should seek to maintain the friendship of the Venezuelan Government and its support for our hemispheric and world-wide policies by:

a. Showing a genuine interest through assistance wherever possible in the economic objectives of that Government; (13, 42, 43, 45, 52–56)

b. Showing respect, wherever warranted, for Venezuela's desire for political leadership among the American Republics; (30)

c. Showing appreciation for its cooperation with the U.S. and other nations of the free world in the UN; (8, 30)

d. Consulting in advance with respect to important UN or other international issues, and showing a willingness to take its views into account rather than merely expecting it to vote on our side. (8, 9, 30)

9. The U.S. should also seek to win the greater friendship of the Venezuelan people and thereby assure itself of support which will outlast any current government, and will not suffer by the development of a more representative type of government. This can best be accomplished by the approach set forth in paragraph 13; also by displaying a friendly attitude in any contact with the political leaders and an interest in their programs insofar as they are not directed against the constituted government, and at all times exercising great care to avoid any action which might be interpreted as intervention in the political life of the country. (19–21, 26–28, 39, 40, 57–59)

10, The U.S. should endeavor to eliminate Communist and other anti-U.S. subversion by:

a. Cooperating with Venezuela in eliminating those conditions which foster the spread of Communism; (22–25, 30)

b. Carrying out the program set forth in paragraph 13;

c. Indicating informally its approval, when appropriate, of anti-Communist measures taken by the Venezuelan Government, but distinguishing clearly between these and the repression of other opposition elements. (41)

11. The U.S. should encourage the development of democratic representative institutions in Venezuela by:

a. Promoting visits to Venezuela of U.S. legislators and leaders in the political life and thought of this country and reciprocally the visits to the U.S. of leaders in the Venezuelan Government and intellectual circles; (39, 40)

b. Bestowing upon leaders in Venezuelan civic life honors at least equivalent to the honors and decorations which it may be considered necesssary or expedient to confer upon those leaders who are symbols of military achievement or authoritarian power. (39, 40)

Economic

12. The U.S. should seek to achieve its economic objectives by:

a. Taking all possible steps to assure Venezuela of a continued and reliable market in the U.S. for petroleum. It is essential to the security of the U.S. to have access to this important nearby source of petroleum, and assurance to Venezuela of a stable peacetime market in the U.S. will encourage the maintenance of adequate production and development of additional reserves of petroleum; (43–45)

b. Encouraging the Venezuelan Government to grant new oil concessions necessary for the development of additional reserves required for the increase or at least maintenance of existing levels of production; (44, 48)

c. Furthering the concept of cooperation between the American oil and iron mining companies on the one hand and the Venezuelan Government on the other, and by taking what measures we can to overcome the natural prejudice of the Venezuelan masses against foreign big business; (27, 28, 46–48, 52)

d. Emphasizing the benefits which the Venezuelan people obtain from investment of private U.S. capital in their country; and supplementing and stimulating the efforts of the large U.S. companies operating these to improve their own labor and public relations programs; (27, 28, 46–48, 52)

e. Continuing to show in public statements by U.S. officials, and by specific measures of cooperation and assistance, our approval of the Venezuelan attitude toward foreign investments; (6, 42)

f. Encouraging private investment and extending Export Import Bank loans where these may be necessary to aid in the sound economic development of the country; (54)

g. Discouraging the development of uneconomic tariff barriers which will limit our export market and decrease trade; (7, 31, 43)

h. Extending upon request technical aid in those projects which will raise the standard of living for the Venezuelan masses, and will serve as an indication of the good will of the U.S. toward the Venezuelan people. (55, 56)

Information and Related Activities

13. The U.S. information and cultural programs in Venezuela should be directed toward gaining the understanding and friendship of the Venezuelan masses by:

a. Presenting the U.S. as a nation without imperialistic intentions which is interested in the increased welfare of those masses and the economic development of the country; (57)

b. Emphasizing the economic and political community of interest existing between the two countries; (59)

c. Using all available resources to convince the people of Venezuela that the best interests of Venezuela and its people will be furthered by economic cooperation and by continuing to attract private foreign capital; that wise nationalism is by no means to be equated with nationalization; and that aggressive demands for nationalization and extreme nationalism are in fact contrary to the best interests of Venezuela; (27, 28, 39, 42, 46–52, 54, 57)

d. Endeavoring to convince Venezuelans that their national safety depends upon hemisphere solidarity and makes it imperative for them to keep their strategic materials available to the free world; (8, 9, 30, 32, 40, 44, 52, 59)

e. Making increased efforts to reach the laboring masses with our information and other programs, bearing in mind their distrust of the U.S. and the appeal of Communist propaganda to this group; (57–59)

f. Furthering the interchange of journalists, teachers, and students as groups particularly susceptible to Communist ideology, but also susceptible to exposure to U.S. democracy; (59)

g. Continuing the work of the binational center and other projects for increased cultural interchange, and the exchange of leaders and trainees in important areas of Venezuelan life. (57)

Military

14. The U.S. should promote cooperative planning for the protection by both countries of Venezuela's strategic resources, territory, and sea and air lanes against external aggression by:

a. Obtaining acceptance by the Venezuelan Government of the specific role which Venezuela should play in defense of the hemisphere in accordance with the Western Hemisphere Defense Scheme.[3]

[3] Apparent reference to the Common Defense Scheme for the Defense of the American Continent, approved by the Inter-American Defense Board, Oct. 27, 1950, and by the Department of State, Jan. 15, 1951; for pertinent information, see Secretary of Defense Marshall's letter to Secretary Acheson, Dec. 16, 1950, Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. I, p. 679.

This can best be achieved by trying to reach agreement with Venezuelan authorities on a program of equipment acquisition which will actually develop Venezuela's ability to participate in such protection, with the understanding that the U.S. will fill equipment requests based on this program on a high priority basis; (32–37)

The Acting Deputy Under Secretary of State (Murphy) to the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs (Nash)[1]

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, October 29, 1953.

DEAR MR. NASH: I refer to the letter of June 25, 1953[2] from the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense[3] to the Secretary of State requesting that arrangements be made through diplomatic channels for the resumption of the military staff conversations of March 1951 between United States and Venezuelan military representatives, which were terminated on the initiative of Venezuelan military authorities primarily because of Venezuelan dissatisfaction at not being able to purchase United States military equipment on satisfactory payment and delivery terms under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949,[4] as amended.

After the receipt of the letter of June 2 [25], 1953, representatives of the Department of State discussed the subject of staff conversations with representatives of the Department of Defense, who agreed that the success of further military conversations would depend in very large part on the ability of the United States to assist Venezuela in the procurement of United States military equipment. Accordingly, it was decided that United States military representatives participating in the conversations should be prepared to discuss the procurement of equipment in very specific terms, and that the Department of Defense should therefore prepare, prior to the resumption of conversations: (a) price and availability estimates on military equipment reported by the United States Embassy, at Caracas, to be desired by Venezuela; (b) an analytical report showing how much of the equipment set forth in the list appended to the Agreement Document of 1951, and how much additional equipment, Venezuela has sought to purchase from the United States since 1951, including amounts actually purchased and delivered. This understanding between Department of State and Department of Defense representatives was transmitted to the United States Embassy, at Caracas, in airgram No. A–9 of June 16, 1953,[5] approved by the Department of Defense, with the request that the Embassy ascertain current Venezuelan requirements necessary for the development of the price and availability estimates referred to in (a) above. The Embassy has set forth current Venezuelan requirements for equipment in despatch No. 562 of October 7, 1953,[6] which requests that the agreed price and availability estimates be prepared and the Embassy authorized to make a formal request to Venezuela for a resumption of staff conversations at a date early enough to avoid conflict with preparations for the Tenth Inter-American Conference planned to convene about March 1, 1954.[7] A copy of the Embassy's despatch is enclosed.

The Department of State would appreciate being informed of the approximate date on which United States military representatives would be prepared to resume conversations with Venezuelan military representatives, taking into account the time required for the preparation of the analytical report and the price and availability estimates which Department of Defense representatives have agreed should be completed before the resumption of conversations. In addition, it is suggested that the Department of Defense indicate whether it would be preferable for the conversations to be held in Caracas, as originally planned, or in the Canal Zone. When this information has been provided, the Department of State will authorize the Embassy to make a formal approach to the Venezuelan Government for the resumption of conversations.

The Department of State is of the opinion that Venezuela will continue to consider the procurement of equipment and the negotiation of defense arrangements to be matters of considerable political importance. In fact, it is conceivable that Venezuelan military representatives participating in the conversations may consider that one or more of the subjects under discussion should be referred to the Venezuelan Foreign Office or the Venezuelan President for discussion with the United States Government at the diplomatic level. In order to be fully prepared to meet such a contingency, it is important that the Department of State be fully advised regarding the subjects to be discussed during the conversations and provided with copies of any arrangements or agreements to be proposed to Venezuelan military representatives, together with copies of the estimates and studies referred to in (a) and (b) above. It is also suggested that the Department of Defense approve the assignment of a political officer from the United States Embassy at Caracas to attend the meetings as a political advisor to United States military representatives.

The Department of State notes that the letter of June 2 [25], 1953 from the Department of Defense has been classified, Confidential–Security Information. Provided that the Department of Defense concurs, the Department of State will apply this classification to all existing papers and correspondence on the subject of military staff conversations with Venezuela.

SECRET WASHINGTON, January 13, 1954.

Subject: Concurrence in Recommendation that Venezuela be Accorded Privilege of Purchasing Military Equipment under Sixty Day Payment Plan

1. Reference is made to your letter, 25 November 1953,[1] on the above subject. This letter requested information as to whether the Department of Defense would concur in a recommendation to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration that Venezuela be permitted subject terms of payment.

2. The Department of Defense concurs from a military viewpoint in recommending to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration that a determination be made that it is in the interest of the United States that Venezuela be permitted to purchase military equipment available from stock and pay for such equipment within sixty days after delivery. This is in accordance with H.R. 7005, which became the Mutual Security Act of 1952, (PL 400, 82nd Congress, 2nd Session, approved 20 June 1952).[2]

3. In connection with the aforementioned recommendation, the following points should be noted:

a. Sale of matériel for payment within sixty days is confined to those items from the stocks of the military departments. The term "stocks" includes those stocks on hand and available for prompt delivery or those on order and available for delivery within thirty days from the date of the order. Any orders received from the eligible foreign government which cannot be filled in this manner will fall within the provisions of Section 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, as amended, relating to dependable undertakings, or arrangements must be made with the country concerned for deposit of cash in advance.

b. If requests, particularly for spare parts and secondary items, were to become numerous, some system involving a blanket dependable undertaking similar to that in effect for Canada would probably be required in order to finance these small scale transactions without the necessity of informing the Government concerned in each and every case that an advance of funds was required.

4. The Department of Defense concurs with the Department of State in the belief that to permit Venezuela to buy military equipment on sixty day payment terms will go a long way in solving a problem in United States-Venezuelan relations.

The Acting Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs (Nolting) to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration (Stassen) [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, January 15, 1954.

DEAR MR. STASSEN: I refer to Section 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, which permits a foreign government, if it is determined to be in the best interests of the United States, to pay for military equipment available from stock sixty days after it takes delivery from the Department of Defense.

I believe that it would be in the best interest of the United States to permit the Government of Venezuela to purchase military equipment from the Department of Defense under this provision of law. There are a number of strategic installations in Venezuela, particularly those connected with the petroleum industry, the defense of which is a matter of serious concern to the Department of Defense. The Department of Defense is desirous of resuming military staff conversations with Venezuela in order to consider with Venezuelan military officials the best means of protecting these installations. Venezuela has not been willing to accept any grant military assistance from the United States which could be used in the defense of these and other installations of strategic importance, preferring instead to pay for the military equipment it receives. This attitude is very commendable and I consider it very important therefore that we do everything that reasonably can be done to assist Venezuela in procuring the required military equipment from the Department of Defense. Permitting Venezuela to pay for military equipment sixty days after delivery would help considerably in this respect.

Venezuela has for some time been dissatisfied with availability of military equipment from the United States Government and the requirement that the equipment be paid for at the time a firm order is placed for the equipment. This dissatisfaction caused Venezuela to break off military staff talks in 1951. The subject has repeatedly been discussed with United States officials by the Venezuelan Government and it has continued to have an adverse effect on our relations with Venezuela. It has also resulted in purchase of military equipment from non-United States sources with consequent adverse effect on our efforts to standardize military equipment in Latin America. In view of the world situation, it has not during the last several years been possible to make available for early delivery all the equipment Venezuela has desired to purchase. This makes it all the more important when we are able to make equipment available that it be made available on the most liberal payment terms possible under the law.

An economic study of Venezuela, a copy of which is attached,[2] shows that at the present time Venezuela has an excellent credit standing and could, without difficulty, make payments on contracts for as much as $50 millions worth of military equipment in any single year. Considering the fact that Venezuela would probably not purchase more than $10 million to $15 million worth of equipment in any year, we could expect prompt payment by Venezuela for any military equipment purchased under Section 408(e).

I therefore strongly recommend that you determine that it is in the best interests of the United States that Venezuela be permitted to purchase from the Department of Defense military equipment available from stock and pay for such equipment sixty days after delivery. I am authorized to state that the Department of Defense concurs in this recommendation.[3]

Sincerely yours, FREDERICK E. NOLTING, JR.

The Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs (Nash) to the Secretary of State

SECRET WASHINGTON, February 8, 1954.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to Department of State letter dated October 29, 1953,[1] concerning the resumption of the military staff conversations of March 1951 between the United States and Venezuelan military representatives.

The United States military representatives will be prepared to resume conversations with the Venezuelan military representatives on 1 April 1954. This date has been selected to avoid conflict with the Department of Air Force sponsored good will tour of Latin America which ends in February, the contemplated visit by the Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces of Venezuela to the United States, and the Tenth Inter-American Conference planned to convene in Caracas about 1 March 1954.

The previous terms of reference provided for these conversations have been re-examined by the Department of Defense and it is considered that no changes should be made at this time.

The Department of Defense has no objection to the attendance at these meetings of a political officer from the United States Embassy at Caracas provided that he acts in an advisory capacity only. Holding the conversations in the Panama Canal Zone has minor advantages for the United States representatives if only the military aspects are considered. However, considering the diplomatic as well as the military aspects, it appears desirable to hold these talks in Caracas as originally planned.

Inclosed are pricing and availability estimates[2] on the list of military equipment reported by the United States Embassy at Caracas to be desired by Venezuela, analytical summaries indicating status of requests for purchases received from the Venezuelan Government and other pertinent comments relative to the furnishing of this equipment. This information should be utilized only for planning purposes.

It should be noted that the estimates on pricing and availability do not constitute a formal commitment on the part of the United States Government. Lead time is computed on the basis of the time required after receipt of a firm order and completion of financing arrangements.

In the last paragraph of reference letter, it is proposed that all existing papers and correspondence on the subject of military staff conversations with Venezuela be downgraded to Confidential. In accordance with security regulations, each document must be classified in accordance with its content. Accordingly, the Department of Defense is unable to concur in this proposal.

Mentioned slow deliveries recently purchased 105mm. artillery for which cash already paid as case in point. He stated Venezuela desirous purchasing fighter jets and other equipment in United States but would turn to other sources if not satisfied with procurement facilities and prices.

I made it clear that my efforts to date based on desire assist rather than desire sell equipment. I pointed out that previous procurement difficulties took place during war being waged by the United States on behalf Venezuela and other Latin-American countries as well as US, and that US sales to Venezuela then represented true sharing with a friend scarce equipment needed for the prosecution of the war. 311. Department 306[1] discussed separately with Foreign Minister and chief Securidad Nacional without revealing our awareness Venezuelan participation in revolutionary plot.[2]

Both Otanez and Estrada skeptical possibilities effective action through conference. Otanez pointed out that readiness some countries support convocation conference might reflect reluctance appear obstructionist rather than readiness support effective action. He emphasized danger to United States and its prestige and counter productive effect on Communist problem of failure conference to produce more than another resolution. He also expressed belief that many countries would interpret utilization arms issue as unwarranted United States attempt control their arms purchases. While mentioning his satisfaction over presumed availability evidence which would justify conference and belief its success Otanez made no attempt conceal his skepticism. Estrada made no bones of his lack of confidence in conference procedure and preference for direct action. He also emphasized that Venezuela, Panama, Nicaragua, Dominican Republic and Peru were just as worried over Figueres as they were over Guatemala and would insist upon action against him as well. Estrada argued that a satisfactory solution to the Guatemalan case would not solve the Figueres problem which he felt required direct action. He feared the possible success of the recent Costa Rican declaration which he interpreted as a diversionary maneuver to buy immunity.

Estrada then confidentially stated that Venezuela had already been approached by Guatemalan and Costa Rican exiles for funds to finance revolutions in both countries. He inquired why the United Fruit Company could not bear its share and urged United States support or acquiescence in such a move as being much more realistic and certain of success than conference action. He admitted that coups had not already taken place only because of the inability of the interested countries to agree.

I answered that the United States was naturally aware of revolutionary ferment in Central America and was convinced that the problem could best be solved at a conference aimed at concrete measures and not just words. I indicated our belief in the feasibility of such action. Estrada did not argue the point but stated somewhat heatedly that Venezuela would send its Canberras and more over Costa Rica Estrada confirmed that he was to depart June 2 on a trip to exchange views with the heads of Panama, Nicaragua and Cuba. He will not visit Ciudad Trujillo because of General Trujillo absence in Europe. He expects to spend about four days in the United States. He stated that he would discuss the trip with the Embassy upon returning. It was also stated that our conversation would be reported immediately to the President whose views he reflected.

I understand that we have not yet answered the Venezuelan queries as to (a) what would we do if the vessel we planned to stop[2] had a naval escort of its flag country, and (b) would the area of search be as large as the Rio Treaty area.

With respect to the answer to (a), we must assume—and I believe that we may do so securely—that this situation will not arise in the case of any vessel other than, possibly, a vessel of a Communist country. If the vessel of a non-Communist country were accompanied by a naval escort, we must expect that the non-Communist government is so fully aware of the activities of the vessel concerned and that it is not engaged in clandestine trade or in other activities that would be contrary to the interests of the free world. To substantiate this point of view, we have indications from the European maritime nations that the United States Government has approached on this problem that they are prepared to give full cooperation in preventing the shipment of arms to Guatemala.[3]

[2] En route to Guatemala, and suspected of carrying military supplies.

[3] For documentation on this subject, see pp. 1111 ff.

With respect to the possibility that a vessel of a Communist country might be accompanied by a naval escort, this would be such a patent indication of direct military collaboration between the Communist bloc and Guatemala that it could be construed as an open defiance of inter-American defense measures. If this highly hypothetical situation were to arise, it would seem reasonable to assert, equally hypothetically, that this display of force would need to be met with force. It would be reasonable to interpret the presence of a naval escort as a specific indication that a substantial shipment of arms was being carried by the vessel escorted.

With respect to (b) while the area of search constitutes a matter to be worked out among the American Republics, I would assume that it would not be larger than the Rio Treaty area and might be entirely in the Caribbean area and off the Pacific coast of Guatemala. (We have made this same observation in response to a query from the Chilean Government.)

I believe you received these queries from the Venezuelans in oral discussion with them. Therefore, you may wish to determine what method should be used for transmitting the reply.

The Secretary of State to the Attorney General (Brownell)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 21, 1954.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: The Department has information that Rómulo Betancourt, who was born at Cuatire, Venezuela, in 1908, is desirous of visiting the United States in order to see his daughter who is studying in San Juan, Puerto Rico, and possibly to visit friends in continental United States.

Mr. Betancourt was President of the Junta which governed Venezuela from 1945 to 1948, and before and since that date he has been Secretary General of the political party Acción Democrática (Democratic Action). Following the overthrow of the Acción Democrática government by a military coup in November 1948, Mr. Betancourt was exiled and his party was outlawed. Since 1952 he has been living in San José, Costa Rica, where he has recently applied for a visa to enter the United States. Allegations have repeatedly been made by certain persons, particularly members of the present Venezuelan regime which overthrew Acción Democrática, that Mr. Betancourt is a communist or communist sympathiser. However, as a result of observation of Mr. Betancourt, both while in office and subsequently, and careful appraisal of available information, the Department is of the opinion that Mr. Betancourt's political orientation may best be described as nationalistic, leftist, non-communist, and frequently outspokenly anti-communist. When in power he co-operated with the United States and since that time, while he has occasionally spoken critically of certain policies, it is believed that he is basically friendly toward this country.

Mr. Betancourt has admitted that during the early 1930's he belonged to the Communist Party of Costa Rica. He has, therefore, been found to be inadmissible under the provisions of Section 212(a)(28) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.[2] He withdrew from membership in the party during the late 1930's.

. . . . . .

Mr. Betancourt's presence in Costa Rica and his friendship with the President of that country have recently constituted a source of increased friction between Venezuela and Costa Rica, which if it continues may lead to the outbreak of hostilities in this hemisphere and serious injury to the inter-American system. Such a development would be contrary to the national interests of the United States and would weaken vital support for this country. Mr. Betancourt has of his own free will offered to leave Costa Rica, accompanied by his wife, and following a visit to his daughter and to friends in the United States, he intends to take up residence in a South American country. This proposed move is considered to be very much in the interest of improved inter-American relations and, therefore, in the public interest of the United States. Our failure to permit his entry into this country at this time would interfere with the achievement of this result. It is, therefore, considered urgent and important that Mr. Betancourt be permitted to come to the United States, notwithstanding the uncompleted investigation cited in the preceding paragraph.

It is requested, therefore, that you exercise your discretionary authority for the temporary admission of Mr. Betancourt under Section 212 (d)(3)(A) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

Inasmuch as the Department has been informed that Mr. Betancourt desires to arrive in the United States on July 22 or at the very earliest moment thereafter, your urgent attention in the matter would be appreciated.[3]

Sincerely yours,

For the Secretary of State:
HENRY F. HOLLAND
Assistant Secretary

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 17, 1954.

Subject: Venezuelan Relations with Costa Rica and the United States

Participants: Dr. César González, Ambassador of Venezuela
Assistant Secretary Henry F. Holland

I had lunch with Ambassador González on Tuesday, August 17. He made the following statements:

President Pérez Jiménez fears that the United States may have decided to adopt an increasingly unfriendly attitude toward Venezuela. He interprets a number of recent events as possibly indicating this:

1. Our recent assistance to Costa Rica in the face of attacks from Nicaragua.
2. The fact that a picture was taken of me at the airport in San Juan, Puerto Rico, in which Gonzalo Facio and Padre Nuñez, both Costa Ricans identified with Figueres, appeared.
3. A newspaper report from Puerto Rico quoting me as having said that the United States would consult Muñoz Marín,[1] widely known as a friend of Figueres, in all of its policies with respect to Latin America, and that wherever Muñoz Marín travels he is to be considered an Ambassador of the United States as well as of Puerto Rico.
4. The fact that Betancourt is reported to be now in Puerto Rico and has announced an intention to come to New York for a month.
5. The fact that Betancourt was in Puerto Rico at about the same time that I was.

I explained the occasion for my trip to Puerto Rico. I explained that Nuñez and Facio were guests of the Puerto Rican Government, and that I had not known they were going to be there when I was. The fact that I appeared in the same picture with them was because Nuñez was leaving on the same plane for New York and Facio had come to the airport to see him off. The quotations attributed to me were inaccurate. A reporter had asked at the airport whether in its inter-American relations the United States would take into consideration the comments of Governor Muñoz Marín. I had replied that, of course, we would. I pointed out that Betancourt had not arrived in Puerto Rico until after my departure; that we had no knowledge of any plan on his part to come to New York, and that he had only a visitor's visa.

I went on to say that there was every reason for the United States to have friendly relations with Venezuela; that it was an outstanding example of private enterprise and respect for private property; that it would be the policy of the United States in this hemisphere to take more and more into consideration its relations with such leading countries as Brazil, Venezuela, Colombia, Peru, and Mexico. I pointed out that, as I had already explained to him, our interest in the Costa Rican problem was in the prevention of any disorder in Central America at this time and in the protection of a constitutionally elected administration.

González said that I would have to understand the situation prevailing in Venezuela. The Government is a military dictatorship and the President is always fearful of its stability. Pedro Estrada has the mentality of a policeman and has to preserve an atmosphere of suspicion and vigilance in order to justify his own position in the Government. The President's naturally suspicious nature makes him accept Estrada's interpretations of events.

González hopes that eventually Venezuela will outgrow its military dictatorship, but feels that, for the present, the Government is doing much for the country and that Pérez Jiménez himself is better equipped to govern than anyone else currently in the picture.

González urges that if the United States will confer a decoration on Pérez Jiménez all of his current resentments and suspicions will disappear. He urges that we consider doing so, and that, if we decide that we can decorate him, we send a General to Caracas to do it. He also says that he would like to bring Pérez Jiménez to the United States on a visit.

I agreed to find out the whereabouts of Betancourt, and to look into the problem of the decoration.

I took up with González a statement made to me earlier in the day by Ambassador Facio of Costa Rica that his Government would like to make its relations with Venezuela more friendly. He said that if the suggestion came from the United States it would be interpreted in Caracas as further evidence of a desire on our part to favor Costa Rica. On the other hand, he said that if Ambassador Facio would take the matter up with him direct, he could and would collaborate fully.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Sayre.

[2] Ante, p. 1664.

Arrangements for the initiation of military staff conversations were not made after the receipt of your letter in view of several problems which arose in our military and other relations with Venezuela, that are already known to members of your staff. It was also considered advisable to delay the initiation of such conversations until after the chiefs of the three military services in Venezuela had visited the United States.

The Commandant of the Venezuelan Navy visited the United States in June as the guest of the Department of the Navy and the Chief of the Venezuelan Air Force is to visit the United States this month as the guest of the Air Force. The chief of the Venezuelan Army is unable to accept a similar invitation.

Our Embassy at Caracas reports that as a result of recent conversations between the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs and the President of Venezuela there has been a marked improvement in the relations between the United States and Venezuela.

In view of the above, this Department considers that it would now be desirable to initiate military staff conversations and I would appreciate being informed of the earliest practicable date that the Department of Defense would be prepared for such conversations so that the matter may be taken up with the Venezuelan Government.[3]

Memorandum by Bainbridge C. Davis of the Office of South American Affairs to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Woodward)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 28, 1954.

Subject: Action on Betancourt Case.

The attached summary[1] of Betancourt's visa status explains the background for the unpleasant alternatives with which we are confronted. Betancourt's time for remaining in the U.S. expired on October 24. He apparently believed that we were willing, without further action on his part, to extend his permission to stay until we had acted on his communist defector application.[2] The facts are, however, that he could have remained only if Immigration Service had extended his stay, upon his application prior to October 24 and with State Department approval; and that he cannot obtain the defector status which he has applied for without making a further trip to a U.S. Consulate.

Since Mr. Holland decided that Betancourt's stay in the U.S. should not be extended and that a communist defector visa should not be granted him as this time, we have the following alternatives:

(a) Take no action, and unless Betancourt leaves voluntarily, Immigration Service will institute deportation proceedings. This will undoubtedly arouse strong resentment in view of his understanding of our position and he will appeal to the State Department.

(b) Inform Betancourt (through Governor Muñoz, Mr. Mann, Mr. Stewart, or by direct communication) that he misunderstood our procedures; that his legal stay has expired; that we are not now able to extend it and are not prepared to permit his reentry at this time; and that he should depart promptly in order to avoid deportation. If presented orally in a tactful and friendly manner, this should not create as lasting a spirit of resentment and hostility on his part or on that of various liberal elements in this country and abroad.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 16, 1954.

Subject: Rómulo Betancourt

Mr. Morales Carrion had telephoned Mr. Jamison of AR on Friday, November 12, to state that Rómulo Betancourt had consulted with him about his not having received an extension of his visa which technically expired on October 24 and which he thought was being granted. Morales Carrion indicated that Betancourt desires to complete the book he is writing and to attend the wedding of his daughter. Mr. Morales asked if he should approach the Immigration Service in Puerto Rico or whether the State Department wished to take some action on the case. Mr. Morales said that Mr. Holland had recently talked to him in Miami about the case and he believed that Mr. Holland was agreeable to Mr. Betancourt's staying a little longer.

Mr. Atwood informed Mr. Morales that the period of Betancourt's Attorney General waiver had expired on October 24 without his having applied for an extension and it was, therefore, impossible at this time for him to receive such an extension. He also explained that no action could be taken on the communist defector application for a visa while Betancourt remains in the U.S. but that it will be necessary for him to apply outside the U.S. for such a visa. Mr. Atwood stated that Mr. Betancourt appeared to have misunderstood the process for obtaining an extension of stay. However, if Betancourt were to remain for the wedding of his daughter in December and would leave promptly after that event, he did not believe that there would be any difficulty. (The Visa Office had already obtained informal assurance from the Immigration Service that in view of the delicate political character of this case, no action would be taken toward deportation of Betancourt prior to the end of December. Mr. Atwood passed on this information to Mr. Morales.)

Mr. Morales asked whether it would be convenient if he encouraged Betancourt to leave the U.S. "for the south" as promptly as possible after the wedding of his daughter in December and Mr. Atwood told him that this was entirely correct.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Secretary of State[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 20, 1954.

I am attaching a few extracts from a letter dated December 8, 1954[2] from Ambassador Warren in Caracas, Venezuela, to Mr. Atwood, Director of South American Affairs (Tab A). They have to do with:

1) The apparent results of our having decorated President Pérez Jiménez.
2) Comments on the Rio Conference.[3]
3) Increased popular support for President Pérez Jiménez.
4) Administrative problems directly linked to a unified Foreign Service.

[5] President Pérez Jiménez was informed on Oct. 22, 1954, that he would be decorated with the Legion of Merit Award (Despatch 436, from Caracas, dated Oct. 28, 1954, 731.11/10–2854).

Venezuelan-American relations in many, many years. We hear the same story of its good effects from Americans of all classes and businesses, from Venezuelans and from other foreigners (with the exception of our British friends). The other day President Pérez Jiménez expressed his appreciation of the decoration to Secretary Humphrey, requested the Secretary to convey to President Eisenhower Pérez Jiménez' grateful and respectful thanks, and added that although he (Pérez Jiménez) appreciated receiving the decoration because it came to him as an individual, it was really important because every Venezuelan felt that he had been decorated when his President received the award. I'm surprised at how near to the truth I think the President came. We thought the decoration was in the best interest of Uncle Sam, as we told you and Henry Holland. The results were much better than even we expected."

2. Rio Conference

The Ambassador and his deputy, in working on the Rio Conference, found: "that the Venezuelans were against the Chilean plan for an International Bank, that to their surprise they are finding themselves, by force of favorable circumstances, closer and closer to our views on many things, particularly in the field of finance and banking. Dr. Silvio Gutierrez[6] returned from Rio with the highest praise for Henry Holland and the other members of the American Delegation, saying they could not have been more helpful and cooperative with the Venezuelans, and that he was going to tell President Pérez Jiménez that the relations between the United States and Venezuela had never been better than they are today."

3. Popular Support for President Pérez Jiménez

"As an American schooled in Texan politics, my guess would be that if an honest election were held today, he would be re-elected. However, if he continues the drive, the intelligent expenditure of money, and the concentration on specific goals during the next two years that he has exhibited in the past, he should be overwhelmingly re-elected whenever the time for that election arrives. It looks to us in the Embassy that he is more firmly in the saddle today than he has ever been. He is just beginning to savour the sweetness that is a politician's when he first begins to feel the warmth of popular support. The other day when the crowd picked him up and carried him on its shoulders at one of the ceremonies, I am told that the little man remarked, 'I am beginning to believe that the Venezuelans like me because of what I am'."

[Here follows discussion of the efforts of other executive departments to develop or to expand their foreign service operations.]

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Sparks) to the Under Secretary of State (Hoover)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 23, 1954.

Subject: Effects on U.S.-Venezuelan Relations of a Possible Reduction or Limitation on U.S. Imports of Venezuelan Petroleum

After some rough going consequent to the Guatemalan affair, our relations with Venezuela are in the best shape they have been for many years. This also applies to the relations between U.S. private companies and the Venezuelan Government. Venezuela is one of our staunchest supporters when it comes to trying to reduce Government-control, Government-regulation, and other "socialistic" tendencies in the economic development and trade expansion program in this hemisphere. Her delegation cooperated fully with us at the Rio Conference.

Any United States Government action to reduce or limit Venezuelan exports of petroleum to the United States would not only raise serious questions with regard to our bilateral trade agreements with Venezuela and provisions of GATT,[2] but would adversely affect directly U.S. security, economic and political interests.

1. We are at present awaiting the Venezuelan decision to go forward with extremely important high level military staff talks regarding security of the oil fields and of the Caribbean area in general.

2. Restriction of U.S. imports of Venezuelan oil would seriously jeopardize the U.S. market for over $500 million worth of annual U.S. exports to Venezuela. In addition, Venezuela pays about $350 million annually to the United States for services. It should also be remembered that these goods and services are paid for in cash. The current favorable climate for the investment of private capital would also be seriously jeopardized. The value of U.S. private investments in Venezuela total over 2 billion dollars. There is talk of considering increased import duties, quotas and possible nationalization in the light of rumors that the U.S. will restrict Venezuelan petroleum imports.

There would be a distinct worsening of our overall political relations which would be felt not only inside Venezuela. It could well have a far-reaching effect and arouse serious doubts regarding the basic economic policies announced by this administration which were so forcibly and carefully outlined at the recent Rio Conference.
