PREFACE

The publication Foreign Relations of the United States constitutes the official record of the foreign policy of the United States. The volumes in the series include, subject to necessary security considerations, all documents needed to give a comprehensive record of the major foreign policy decisions of the United States together with appropriate materials concerning the facts which contributed to the formulation of policies. Documents in the files of the Department of State are supplemented by papers from other government agencies involved in the formulation of foreign policy.

The basic documentary diplomatic record printed in the volumes of the series Foreign Relations of the United States is edited by the Office of the Historian, Bureau of Public Affairs, Department of State. The editing is guided by the principles of historical objectivity and in accordance with the following official guidance first promulgated by Secretary of State Frank B. Kellogg on March 26, 1925.

There may be no alteration of the text, no deletions without indicating where in the text the deletion is made, and no omission of facts which were of major importance in reaching a decision. Nothing may be omitted for the purpose of concealing or glossing over what might be regarded by some as a defect of policy. However, certain omissions of documents are permissible for the following reasons:

a. To avoid publication of matters which would tend to impede current diplomatic negotiations or other business.

b. To condense the record and avoid repetition of needless details.

c. To preserve the confidence reposed in the Department by individuals and by foreign governments.

d. To avoid giving needless offense to other nationalities or individuals.

e. To eliminate personal opinions presented in despatches and not acted upon by the Department. To this consideration there is one qualification—in connection with major decisions it is desirable, where possible, to show the alternative presented to the Department before the decision was made.

Documents selected for publication in the Foreign Relations volumes are referred to the Department of State Classification/Declassification Center for declassification clearance. The Center reviews the documents, makes declassification decisions, and obtains the clearance of geographic and functional bureaus of the Department of State, as well as of other appropriate agencies of the government. The Center, in coordination with the geographic bureaus of the Department of State, conducts communications with foreign governments regarding documents or information of those governments proposed for inclusion in Foreign Relations volumes.

This volume was initially prepared under the general supervision of Fredrick Aandahl and, at a later stage, of William Z. Slany, his successor as General Editor of the Foreign Relations series. N. Stephen Kane was responsible for the planning, review, and editing of the volume. Mr. Kane compiled the documentation relating to United States policy toward the individual Latin American countries and the Latin American states as a regional group, with the exception of the compilations concerning Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, and political developments in the Central American area, which were prepared by William F. Sanford, Jr.

Rita M. Baker of the Publishing Services Division (Paul M. Washington, Chief) performed the technical editing under the supervision of Margie R. Wilber. The index was prepared by the Twin Oaks Indexing Collective.

INTRODUCTION

Scope and Arrangement

This volume presents documents on the major aspects of relations between the United States and the nations of Latin America. The first section records the main lines of United States policy within a general regional framework. The remainder and larger part of the volume presents documents on United States policy toward and relations with individual Latin American nations. These compilations on bilateral relations are arranged alphabetically. Routine economic, political, and cultural issues and exchanges are not included for reasons of space. The compilations in this volume focus upon a number of principal themes prevailing in 1952–1954 in United States-Latin American relations. One of these themes was the effort of the United States to strengthen the nations of the Western Hemisphere against Communist inroads. Another major concern of United States policymakers was the fostering of economic development in Latin America through economic assistance. Military assistance was also being extended to Latin American countries under the Mutual Security Program. Toward the end of the period documented in this volume the overthrow of the leftist regime in Guatemala had a profound impact on U.S. relations with all the other Latin American nations, particularly in Central America.

The documents presented here focus on the diplomatic and economic relations between the United States and the nations of Latin America. The editors did not and could not, under current government declassification policies, procedures, and regulations, attempt to document systematically all aspects of the widening web of official relationships which the United States Government established and maintained in the Western Hemisphere. A more comprehensive accounting of these expanding relationships, particularly in the military and intelligence dimensions, requires readers and researchers to consult official publications and papers of other departments and agencies such as the Department of Defense and the Central Intelligence Agency.

Sources

The documents printed in this volume were primarily drawn from the central indexed files of the Department of State. The decentralized bureau, office, and working level (lot) files of relevant Department units were also examined as were the remaining records of various overseas Foreign Service posts. The editors also reviewed portions of the files of the Mutual Security Agency and its successor organization, the Foreign Operations Administration, as well as record collections at the Harry S. Truman Library in Independence, Missouri, and the Dwight D. Eisenhower Library in Abilene, Kansas.

Official documents originated by other major departments and agencies with foreign affairs responsibilities were consulted and used in the preparation of this volume in accordance with the current regulations, policies, and procedures of those agencies within the general framework of government-wide access and declassification procedures. The present volume includes the key papers from the White House and the National Security Council. It also includes some documents from the Department of Defense and the Central Intelligence Agency.

Principles of Selection

The editors of this volume have selected the documents printed here from among a large quantity of diplomatic correspondence and foreign policy preparation papers. The principles of selection followed by the editors emphasized documents on the formulation and expression of major lines of foreign policy in Latin America. Particular attention was given to identifying recommendations by United States missions abroad and deliberations in Washington within the Department of State and with other departments and agencies of the government having foreign policy responsibilities. The most authoritative expression of official policy was sought in all cases. The editors also attempted to trace, where possible, the mode of implementing foreign policy decisions and the reactions to these policies on the part of foreign, particularly Latin American, governments as well as inter-American institutions.

Foreign government documents were included in this volume in a few cases where such papers were of fundamental importance in explicating the development of an important United States policy. Such documents are printed here with the full concurrence of the originating government.

This volume includes only a few documents that report upon the internal political or economic situation of a particular country or region. The editors have chosen to include from a very voluminous body of such reports in Department of State files only those that bear directly upon bilateral and multilateral relations of some import to the volume. The editors have excluded documents from the substantial body of records and official diplomatic correspondence regarding routine representations by the United States on behalf of its citizens and firms, minor treaty negotiations, ceremonial functions, consular activities, and the management of embassies and consulates abroad.

Methodology

The methodological principles adhered to in the preparation of this volume continue the general practices and procedures maintained for all volumes of the Foreign Relations series. These practices and procedures are, however, constantly in the process of adaptation and adjustment to the requirements of the source materials at the disposal of the editors. Readers should, in using this volume, be aware of the following practices particularly reflected in this volume.

The editors have selected the most authoritative text of each document for publication. When a signed ribbon copy or authenticated file copy of a memorandum was unavailable, a carbon copy was printed, and the editors so indicated in a footnote to the document. The texts of incoming telegrams printed were generally those received in Washington and retained in the central files. In a few cases texts of telegrams were selected from decentralized Department files or other sources. With respect to the telegrams included in this volume, readers should note that although all outgoing cables bear the signature of the Secretary of State, or, in his absence, that of the Acting Secretary of State, they were ordinarily drafted by operational policy officers and signed for the Secretary or Acting Secretary by a senior official with appropriate authority. Incoming telegrams from the field were addressed either to the Secretary of State or the Department of State. Upon receipt in the Department's processing unit, copies were routed to appropriate offices for action. Most incoming telegrams were handled by operational officers in the geographical and functional bureaus. The editors have supplied drafting and other relevant handling information as editorial annotations wherever necessary to clarify the genesis and progress of documents as they moved through the policymaking chain in the Department of State and other departments and agencies. The documentary provenance for documents cited but not printed has generally been provided. If a document was unidentifiable, the editors have inserted appropriate annotation.

UNITED STATES GENERAL POLICY WITH RESPECT TO LATIN AMERICA

Editorial Note

On February 3, 1953, the Senior Staff of the National Security Council (NSC) received from the Department of State a paper drafted in the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, titled "U.S. Policy With Respect to Latin America," dated January 24, 1953, not printed. At its meeting on February 18, the Senior Staff directed the NSC's staff assistants to complete a coordinated draft statement of policy concerning United States objectives toward Latin America, based on the paper submitted by the Department of State. The subsequent draft statement of policy, dated February 19, 1953, not printed, was considered at the Senior Staff meeting on February 23, where a decision was taken to request the Department of State to prepare a revised draft. On March 4, the Senior Staff reviewed the revised draft and approved its submission, as amended, to the National Security Council for consideration as NSC 144, a report on "United States Objectives and Courses of Action With Respect to Latin America." Records of the NSC Senior Staff meetings are contained in S/P–NSC files, lot 62 D 1. Additional documentation relating to the preparation of NSC 144 is contained in PPS files, lot 64 D 563 and S/P–NSC files, lot 61 D 167.

The Senior Staff constituted the principal NSC unit for the formulation and transmission of policy recommendations to the Council. It was comprised of representatives at the Assistant Secretary level from the Departments of State, Defense, and Treasury, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Mutual Security Agency, the National Security Resources Board, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the Office of Defense Mobilization. The Executive Secretary of the NSC served as chairman of the Senior Staff, which met approximately twice a week.

In March 1953, the Senior Staff was reorganized as the National Security Council Planning Board. The Planning Board retained the basic functions of the Senior Staff, but its personnel underwent certain changes. It was chaired by the Special Assistant to the President, and its membership was comprised of representatives from the Departments of State, Treasury, and Defense, the Office of Defense Mobilization, and the Office of the Special Assistant to the President on Disarmament. Additional documentation concerning the organizational structure of the NSC is printed in volume II.

Memorandum of Discussion at the 137th Meeting of the National Security Council on Wednesday, March 18, 1953 [1]

TOP SECRET EYES ONLY

Present at the 137th meeting of the Council were the President of the United States, presiding; the Vice President of the United States; the Under Secretary of State; the Secretary of Defense, and the Director for Mutual Security. Also present were the Secretary of the Treasury; the Secretary of Commerce (for Items 1 and 2); the Director, Bureau of the Budget; the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff; the Administrative Assistant to the President for National Security Matters; the Special Assistant to the President for Cold War Operations; the Military Liaison Officer; the Executive Secretary, NSC; and the Deputy Executive Secretary, NSC. Various staff members from the Department of State, the Department of Defense, the Department of Commerce, DMS, MSA, and CIA, were also present to assist their principals during the discussion of Items 1 and 10.

There follows a general account of the main positions taken and the chief points made at this meeting.

[Here follows discussion concerning United States economic policies which might affect the war potential of the Soviet bloc, civil aviation policy toward the USSR and its satellites, NATO strategy, and other matters not directly related to United States policy with respect to Latin America.]

9. United States objectives and courses of action with respect to Latin America (NSC 144 [2] and Annex to NSC 144 [3])

In introducing this report, Mr. Cutler read the objectives and summarized the courses of action set forth. He then suggested that, beginning with the Under Secretary of State,[4] the members of the Council describe their reactions to this proposed policy.

Secretary Smith said that the paper had been prepared in some haste and represented a shotgun approach. It was, of course, very general, but would be followed by other reports dealing with specific countries which represented problems with regard to United States security interests.

[2] The text of NSC 144, dated Mar. 4, 1953, is identical to that of NSC 144/1, dated Mar. 18, 1953, printed infra, with the exception of the changes adopted as a result of this meeting.

[3] The referenced annex to NSC 144 is an NSC Staff Study, dated Mar. 6, 1953, not printed, which contains a general discussion of the basic considerations affecting U.S. relations with Latin America, alternate lines of policy which the United States might pursue toward Latin America, and the courses of action recommended in NSC 144. A copy of the Staff Study is contained in S/S–NSC files, lot 63 D 351.

Turning then to the question of the costs of the programs set forth in the report, Secretary Smith said that he would not suffer great qualms if the $8 million budgeted for the Inter-American Highway were ultimately to be cut in half. Simply as a matter of tactics, however, Secretary Smith thought it would be wise if Congress did the cutting. As regards the Rama Road, he thought a cut inadvisable, and that every effort should be made to prevent any reduction of the proposed outlay of $25 million for economic assistance [5] to Latin America in Fiscal Year 1954.

Secretary Smith also adverted briefly to plans in the State Department for stepping up visits of distinguished American citizens to the various Latin American republics.

Mr. Cutler interrupted to state that the President had been extremely pleased with the present report and was going to use some portions of it as the basis for his forthcoming Pan American Day speech.[6]

In commentary on this point, Secretary Smith said that he was sure that the Council as a whole was aware of the heavy psychological significance of any policy and program for Latin America.

General Bradley commented next on the military aspects of the policy statement. He noted that it involved no changes in the objectives set forth in the policy which it superseded, viz., NSC 56/2.[7] As regarded military courses of action, the new paper omitted reference to accomplishments already recorded, but added three new items.

Asked for his views, Governor Stassen said that while on the whole he was pleased with the report, it failed to take account with sufficient force of one point that he felt to be of very great importance. It did not reflect the need for Latin American capitalists and business men to provide better treatment for their workers and to take a more progressive and responsible role in the development of the economies of their countries. He therefore suggested the insertion of a new paragraph which would cover this point.

Secondly, Governor Stassen said he felt that greater emphasis might likewise be placed on the problem of Latin American treatment of United States capital and investors. While perhaps less important than his first suggestion, a slight revision would cover this second point.

Secretary Wilson noted his concern to keep the Colombian battalion in service in Korea, and believed that the paper should cover the problem of compensation by the Colombian Government to the United States for services rendered in support of this battalion.[8]

Mr. Cutler assured Secretary Wilson that the staff was aware of this problem and that it would be taken up in the forthcoming policy statement on Korea[9] as applying not only to Colombia but to other countries which had not paid the United States what was due it for logistic support of their forces.

It then became Secretary Humphrey's turn to comment on the paper. He said that the Council would note the inclusion of the clause setting forth the standard Treasury position that policy statements such as this should not be given final approval until the costs of carrying out the proposed program in Latin America had been scrutinized in relationship to priorities in other areas. All the other major areas must be gone into, said the Secretary, before we finally go ahead on this or any other policy. Secretary Humphrey informed the Council that it had already proved necessary for the Export-Import Bank to advance $300 million to Brazil in order to enable it to pay for materials which it had purchased from private interests in the United States.[10] This was a case, and a not very edifying one, of straight overbuying by the Brazilians. Unless something could be done to stop it, Secretary Humphrey warned, it would set the pattern for further expenditures and further requests for loans in the future.

In confirmation of these remarks, Secretary Smith added that the State Department expected the Brazilians to come back very shortly with another request on the Export-Import Bank, this time for $400 million.

Secretary Humphrey said that this sort of transaction obviously needed to be much more carefully policed by this Government in the future. It was already too late when he got a chance to acquaint himself with this most recent transaction involving the $300 million. These matters had very serious implications for the future, and it would be necessary for us to cut off in the near future.

Secretary Smith expressed general agreement with these views.

Secretary Humphrey said that he had one final suggestion to make with regard to United States relations with the Latin American states, particularly in the economic sphere. He felt sure that if we could find a few first-rate business men and send them as our ambassadors to the key Latin American nations, it would do far more good than any amount of money we could dole out.

The President expressed general sympathy with this idea, and Secretary Weeks added that from his own experience as a private business man in Latin America, the efforts of private enterprise needed to be backed up much more strongly than in the past by the Department of State.

This subject, said Secretary Humphrey, brought in the question of tax incentives which formed part of the present report. He felt that tax incentives came logically after and not before you had achieved real stability of American investment. Tax incentives would never induce American investors to invest in Latin America until there was far greater assurance that the investment was reasonably safe.

With this the President expressed hearty agreement, and noted that he had "jumped" the Mexican Ambassador [11] recently on this very point. The Ambassador had replied that the Mexican Constitution itself guaranteed compensation for the expropriation of foreign investments, and that his country was guiltless.

Secretary Smith said that he felt that our people interested in Latin America should go after management contracts instead of following the traditional approach to investment in Latin America. He felt sure that this was a more effective way of doing business profitably in Latin America without giving rise to the problems which so often resulted in nationalization.

Secretary Humphrey expressed some skepticism of this approach, and reverted to his point that the way to get the job done was to send business men as ambassadors to the other American republics.

The National Security Council: [12]

a. Adopted the statement of policy contained in NSC 144 subject to the following changes:

Paragraph 5–d: Change the second sentence [13] to read:

"This does not preclude multilateral action through the inter-American system. . . ."

Paragraph 7: Add a new sub-paragraph f, reading:

"f. Undertaking a thorough study of the means by which we can assist Latin American capital to play a more vigorous and responsible role in economic development of the area."

Paragraph 12: Change the first sentence [14] to read:

b. Noted the President's approval of NSC 144 as amended, and his statement that this approval did not constitute an endorsement of any specific program of military and economic assistance for Latin America, which will be subject to review in the light of (1) the priority of financing of present and proposed programs for Latin America in relation to programs for other foreign areas and to programs for domestic security, and (2) the overall objective of achieving a balanced Federal budget.

Note: NSC 144 as amended subsequently circulated as NSC 144/1.

Statement of Policy by the National Security Council [1]

TOP SECRET

WASHINGTON, March 18, 1953.

UNITED STATES OBJECTIVES AND COURSES OF ACTION WITH RESPECT TO LATIN AMERICA

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

1. There is a trend in Latin America toward nationalistic regimes maintained in large part by appeals to the masses of the population. Concurrently, there is an increasing popular demand for immediate improvement in the low living standards of the masses, with the result that most Latin American governments are under intense domestic political pressures to increase production and to diversify their economies.

2. A realistic and constructive approach to this need which recognizes the importance of bettering conditions for the general population, is essential to arrest the drift in the area toward radical and nationalistic regimes. The growth of nationalism is facilitated by historic anti-U.S. prejudices and exploited by Communists.

[1] The Executive Secretary of the NSC, James S. Lay, Jr., in a note to the NSC dated Mar. 18, 1953, not printed, referred to the Council's action on NSC 144 (NSC Action No. 746) and the President's approval that date of NSC 144 as amended, and transmitted the statement of policy as NSC 144/1 to all appropriate executive departments and agencies.

3. The limited purpose of this paper is to define our objectives and courses of action concerning this and other important problems common to the area; policies toward particular country situations, such as those in Argentina and Guatemala, are left for subsequent papers.

OBJECTIVES

4. The objectives of the United States with respect to Latin America area:

a. Hemisphere solidarity in support of our world policies, particularly in the UN and other international organizations.

b. An orderly political and economic development in Latin America so that the states in the area will be more effective members of the hemisphere system and increasingly important participants in the economic and political affairs of the free world.

c. The safeguarding of the hemisphere, including sea and air approaches, by individual and collective defense measures against external aggression through the development of indigenous military forces and local bases necessary for hemisphere defense.

d. The reduction and elimination of the menace of internal Communist or other anti-U.S. subversion.

e. Adequate production in Latin America of, and access by the United States to, raw materials essential to U.S. security.

f. Support by Latin America of collective action in defense of other areas of the free world.

g. The ultimate standardization of Latin American military organization, training, doctrine and equipment along U.S. lines.

COURSES OF ACTION

Political

5. The United States should achieve a greater degree of hemisphere solidarity by:

a. A greater utilization of the Organization of American States as a means of achieving our objectives, which will avoid the appearance of unilateral action and identify our interests with those of the other American states.

b. Consulting with the Latin American states, whenever possible, before taking actions which will affect them or for which we wish their support, explaining as fully as security permits the reasons for our decisions and actions.

c. Evidencing greater consideration of Latin American problems at the highest levels of government by according sympathetic attention to representatives of Latin America, by exercising care in public statements relating to the area, and through such methods as visits by high government officials and distinguished private citizens to Latin American states.

d. Refraining from overt unilateral intervention in the internal political affairs of the other American states, in accordance with existing treaty obligations. This does not preclude multilateral action through the inter-American system. . . .

e. In determining the extent of U.S. assistance and support to particular American states, taking into consideration their willingness and ability to cooperate with the United States in achieving common objectives.

f. Assisting through the Organization of American States, or by such other means as may be available, those American states which are resisting pressures from their neighbors, whenever such pressures are inimical to U.S. interests and the inter-American system.

g. Encouraging the incorporation of Canada into the Organization of American States.

6. The United States should also:

a. Encourage through consultation, assistance and other available means individual and collective action against internal subversive activities by communists and other anti-U.S. elements.

b. Encourage the development of the regional Inter-American Organization of Workers (ORIT) and the development of responsible, democratic labor leadership in Latin America capable of taking the initiative away from communists and other anti-U.S. inter-American labor movements.

c. Encourage Latin American governments to continue to prevent direct shipments of strategic materials to the Soviet bloc and to adopt an import certificate and delivery verification system to facilitate the prevention of indirect shipments.

Economic

7. The United States should seek to assist in the economic development of Latin America by:

a. Encouraging Latin American governments to recognize that the bulk of the capital required for their economic development can best be supplied by private enterprise and that their own self-interest requires the creation of a climate which will attract private investment.

b. Continuing the present level of International Bank loans and Export–Import Bank loans and, where appropriate, accelerating and increasing them, as a necessary supplement to foreign private investment.

c. Continuing a limited economic grant program in Latin America, including such projects as the Inter-American Highway and the Rama Road.

d. Making it easy for Latin American countries to sell their products to us, through simplification of customs procedures and reduction of trade barriers under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements program.

e. Continuing the program of technical assistance to the area, but designing individual projects within the capability of the particular country concerned.

f. Undertaking a thorough study of the means by which we can assist Latin American capital to play a more vigorous and responsible role in economic development of the area.

8. The United States should encourage the institution of necessary Latin American government fiscal, budgetary and other measures which are indispensable to economic progress in the area through utilization of the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank, the Export-Import Bank, and other appropriate means.

Information and Related Activities

9. The U.S. Information and Cultural Programs for Latin American states should be specifically directed to the problems and psychology of specific states in the area, with the objective of alerting them to the dangers of Soviet imperialism and communist and other anti-U.S. subversion, and convincing them that their own self-interest requires an orientation of Latin American policies to our objectives.

10. . . .

Military

11. The United States should encourage acceptance of the concept that each of the Latin American states is responsible for maximizing its contribution to:

a. The internal security of its own territory.

b. The defense of its own territory, including land communication, coastal waters, ports and approaches thereto, bases located within its area of responsibility and air lanes of communication associated therewith.

c. The allied defense effort, including participation in combined operations within the hemisphere and support of collective actions in other theaters by forces beyond the requirements of hemisphere security.

12. In support of the course of action in paragraph 11, the United States should provide military assistance to Latin America consistent with the agreed plans of the Inter-American Defense Board and other bilateral or multilateral military agreements to which the United States is a party. U.S. military assistance should be designed to reduce to a minimum the diversion of U.S. forces for the maintenance of hemisphere security; and in determining the type of military assistance to be provided each nation, consideration should be given to its role in hemisphere defense.

13. The United States should assume primary responsibility for military operations in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans and the Caribbean Sea, including sea and air approaches to the Panama Canal, and at the appropriate time should seek from other American states acceptance of U.S. military control of the defense of these areas.

14. To the extent that military bases other than U.S. bases in Latin America are required to further joint defense efforts, the United States should technically guide and assist the Latin American countries in their development and maintenance and seek agreements providing for their reciprocal use, rights of air transit and technical stops, and availability for common defense purposes.

15. The United States should take political, economic or military action, as appropriate, to insure the continued availability of U.S. bases in Latin America.

16. Where necessary the United States should assist in the protection of sources and processing facilities of strategic materials and land transportation related thereto. However, each of the Latin American countries should organize its own civil defense.

17. In providing military aid and seeking military commitments the United States should not encourage Latin American nations to contribute to the military effort to an extent which would jeopardize their economic stability.

18. In addition, the United States should:

a. Continue the planning of the Inter-American Defense Board and the Military Commissions on which we are jointly members with Brazil and Mexico.

b. Continue and establish where appropriate, military training missions in Latin American nations.

c. Continue to provide training in the United States for selected Latin American military personnel.

d. Seek a wider participation by Latin America in the UN action in Korea where the type of participation will improve UN capabilities.*

e. Seek the ultimate standardization along U.S. lines of the organization, training, doctrine and equipment of Latin American armed forces.

*The general problem of reimbursement for U.S. logistical support of Latin American forces participating in the war in Korea will be considered in the forthcoming report on U.S. policy relating to Korea. This problem is currently most acute in the case of Colombia. [Footnote in the source text.]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 23, 1953.

Subject: First Progress Report on NSC 144/1, United States Objectives and Courses of Action with Respect to Latin America.

NSC 144/1 was approved as governmental policy on March 18, 1953. It is requested that this progress report as of July 15, 1953 be circulated to the members of the Council for their information.

1. Political

Utilization of the Organization of American States (OAS): Active participation in the normal activities of the OAS and its organs and agencies continued throughout the period. Steps were taken to insure that a report [2] prepared by the Pan American Union relating to the maintenance of internal security against communist or other subversion might be utilized effectively to assist in the attainment of United States objectives. On the other hand, there were two instances in which the United States used its influence to forestall recourse to the OAS when such recourse was unsuitable to the situation and in all likelihood would have proved to be divisive, thereby weakening the inter-American system. One of these was the Deception Island (Antarctica) incident in which a British naval vessel demolished Argentine and Chilean installations on the Island and removed Argentine personnel from the area. When it became apparent that either Argentina or Chile, or both, were giving serious consideration to invoking the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance (Rio Treaty),[3] the United States encouraged settlement of the controversy by direct negotiation or, failing in this, by recourse to instrumentalities in which all parties could be heard. To date the matter has remained in bilateral diplomatic channels. The other instance relates to a border incident between Peru and Ecuador. As one of the four guarantors of the 1942 Boundary Protocol,[4] the United States has joined the other three countries (Argentina, Brazil and Chile) in establishing a commission to investigate the incident. We have also consulted with the Governments concerned and with the other Guarantors on the creation of a Peru–Ecuador group to verify the factual situation regarding allegations of each country of provocative actions on the part of the other.

Consultation with Latin American Countries: The United States took steps to inform or consult with the Latin American States on two important matters relating to the signing of an armistice in Korea.[5] The Government of Colombia has been invited to join the United States in informing the Foreign Ministers of the Latin American governments of the content and purpose of the "Joint Policy Declaration" [6] which the United Nations members with forces in Korea (Colombia is the only Latin American country with forces in Korea) are planning to make following the signing of the armistice. To this end each United States Embassy has been instructed to coordinate and make a joint approach to the Foreign Minister with the Colombian Ambassador shortly before the release of the Declaration.

Pursuant to instructions from the President, the Latin American governments are being consulted with respect to their views on the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations [7] following a Korean armistice. The United States Embassies have been instructed in making the approach, to explain the reasons for the stand of the United States against Chinese Communist representation as fully as is considered advisable in the light of the circumstances of each government. On the basis of reports received to date, it is evident that the United States will be able to count on substantial Latin American support.

Following the Army coup d'etat in Colombia on June 13,[8] in which Lt. General Gustavo Rojas Pinilla ousted President Laureano Gomez, the United States exchanged information with all the other American republics, except Guatemala, before proceeding to recognize the new regime. The consultation revealed that the other American Republics had substantially the same information regarding the Rojas Government as the United States, i.e., that it appeared to be in effective control of the governmental machinery and territory and that the strong statements made by General Rojas indicated a clear intention to carry out Colombia's international obligations. The basic criteria of the traditional recognition policy with regard to Latin America having been met the United States recognized the Rojas Government on June 18, an action which, consistent with Resolution XXXV [9] of the Ninth Inter-American Conference at Bogotá in 1948, did not imply a judgment on the internal policies of the government concerned. Notice of this action was given to all the American Republics in advance.

High Level Consideration of Latin American Problems: The appearance and message [10] of the President before the Council of the OAS commemorating Pan American Day was the outstanding instance during the period of sympathetic attention to Latin American representatives. In his message the President stated his desire that the Government of the United States take careful stock of the economic and social conditions now prevailing throughout the hemisphere and of the efforts being pressed to bring a better life to all of the peoples of the Americas. This assessment is now under way with visits by the Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs [11] to Mexico, the Central American and Caribbean Republics and Panama,[12] and by Dr. Milton Eisenhower to the countries in South America.[13] The Secretary of State in an address [14] before the Council of the OAS on March 23 stressed the purpose of the new Administration to pursue the development of mutual relations of trust and respect with the other American Republics with increased vigor and effectiveness. A further demonstration that Latin American problems are receiving consideration at the highest levels of government, when such attention is required, is evidenced by the announcement from the White House on June 22 that the President, the Secretaries of State and Treasury, and other high officials had discussed the Bolivian problem. The President's unanticipated appearance at Mr. Cabot's dinner for Dr. Milton Eisenhower attended by the Ambassadors of all of the South American countries, his invitation to the daughter of President Vargas and her husband to come to Washington where they were entertained at the White House, his invitation to the President of Mexico [15] to participate in the dedication of Falcon Dam [16] on the Rio Grande River and the award of the Legion of Merit to the President of Peru [17] constitute gestures which have considerable appeal to Latin American sensibilities.

High level attention to the Latin American military include the visits to the United States of the Minister of Defense of Brazil [18] in March and the Commander in Chief of the Paraguayan Armed Forces [19] in June at the invitation of the Secretary of the Army [20] and the visits in May of Chief of Staff of the United States Army [21] to Mexico, Panama and Colombia and the Chief of Staff of the United States Air Force [22] to Mexico, Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Panama, Brazil, Peru and Colombia Assistance to Central American Countries in Resisting Pressures from Guatemala: Action has been taken to give moral support to Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Honduras and El Salvador and military assistance to the latter three to resist pressures from Guatemala. On April 4, Guatemala withdrew from the Organization of Central American States (ODECA) [24] charging the other Central American governments with aggressive intent and entering into military and civil alliances against Guatemala. This action appears to have been taken in response to efforts on the part of El Salvador to have ODECA discuss and agree upon measures to combat communism. As such, it constitutes a victory for communist elements in Guatemala who have consistently opposed ODECA, a victory which would have been complete if as a result of Guatemalan withdrawal the Organization were to collapse. At their initiative, and considering that the continuation of ODECA is desirable as a first step toward possible later consideration in the OAS of the communist problem in Guatemala, the United States gave its moral support to the efforts of the four other Central American States to maintain the Organization and specifically their plans to take action against the infiltration of communism in the area. In addition to this psychological backing, consideration is being given to providing limited military assistance to bolster further their resistance to Guatemalan pressures. The extent of the military assistance is described below.

Control of Subversive Activities: The action of the other American Republics against internal subversive activities during the period under review reveals in general the continued vacillating and superficial nature of Latin American resistance to the communist conspiracy. The following steps of a more than routine importance have been taken to reverse this trend.

Requests received from Venezuela and Brazil served to underline the need for more adequate ways to satisfy the desire of Latin American governments for United States Government training in police methods and anti-subversion techniques. In the absence of any such Federal agency training program available to foreign nations, the attention of interested Latin American governments has been called on various occasions during the past year to the facilities of a private United States police investigative organization, whose personnel have had official experience, and a follow-up is being made to assure that these facilities are being used as widely as possible.

As a result of the increase in external subversive activities of Guatemalan communist forces and the heightening of political tensions in neighboring countries. . . .

Labor: In cooperation with the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT), the western hemisphere branch of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) a third group of prospective Latin American labor leaders, making a total of thirty labor leaders to date, has been trained at the University of Puerto Rico. However, the new leaders of ORIT have shown sensitivity to formal working relationships with any government and have decided not to continue the school. Consequently, it will be continued by the United States Government in cooperation with United States labor organizations.

The program of training prospective Latin American labor leaders, of bringing more mature labor leaders to this country for travel and orientation, and the approach to Latin American labor through our Labor Attachés and labor officers abroad has begun to make a definite impression on the attitudes of Latin American labor.

Control of Shipments of Strategic Materials: No direct exports of strategic materials from Latin America to the Soviet bloc are known to have occurred during the second quarter of 1953. Continuing reports of trans-shipment of Chilean copper through European free ports prompted the presentation of a note to the Chilean Foreign Office on April 29,[25] again recommending institution of the Import Certificate and Delivery Verification system. There have also been reports, so far unsubstantiated, of trans-shipment of strategic materials of Mexican origin.

Embassy Buenos Aires was informed by the Foreign Minister,[26] prior to initiation of Argentine discussions with a Soviet trade mission, that no strategic materials would be offered for exchange.

Embassy La Paz is being kept currently informed by the Bolivian Government regarding trade agreement negotiations now in progress with Czechoslovakia.

With United States encouragement the Government of Costa Rica revoked the registry of two ships transmitting strategic materials to countries in the Soviet bloc.

2. Economic

Encouragement of Private Investment: Little further progress has been made in improving the climate for private investment in the Latin American countries, with the possible exception of Haiti and Bolivia. An investment guarantee agreement has been concluded with Haiti.[27]

Bolivia, which has heretofore followed a policy of developing its petroleum resources through a government monopoly, has signed an agreement permitting a private American firm to exploit two petroleum areas, and Bolivian officials state that they hope this agreement will serve as a prototype for others.

The Bolivian Government on June 10 agreed to an arrangement for payment of American claims arising out of nationalization of the tin mines [28] which should help to reassure private investors regarding the future treatment of foreign capital. With this indication of good faith on the part of the Government it will be possible to proceed with plans for stabilizing the Bolivian economy through a tin purchase program and expansion of the technical cooperation program.

The Chilean Government has failed to make any downward adjustment in the official price of Chilean copper to bring it in line with world market prices, thus precluding the American companies operating in Chile from competing in world markets, with resultant strain on their financial position. Expropriation by the Government of Guatemala of the major portion of the United Fruit Company's Tiquisate properties, under its agrarian reform law, marks further deterioration in the outlook for private captical in Guatemala.

United States Shipping and Aviation Interests in Latin America: The outlook for United States shipping lines operating to the east coast of Latin America has improved. Brazil has recently introduced legislation to cancel certain discriminations against United States shipping, such as exclusive berthing and warehousing privileges accorded the Brazilian line and a consular fee practice which diverted cargo to national flag vessels. On our part, legislation has been introduced which would permit the sale of twelve vessels to Brazil to improve its coastal transportation.[29] As regards the west coast, the United States has found it necessary to make representations to the Chilean Government with respect to its recent actions to divert commercial cargo to Chilean vessels.

A civil aviation agreement with Cuba,[30] which has been in process of negotiation for over a year, was concluded in June. It is anticipated that a similar agreement [31] will be signed with Venezuela within the month.

International Bank and Export–Import Bank Loan Activities: Loans authorized by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD) and the Export–Import Bank of Washington during the second quarter of 1953 totaled $6,755,000 as compared with authorizations of $301,567,000 during the first quarter. Of the first quarter authorizations, $300 millions represented a single loan to Brazil for liquidation of its dollar commercial backlog.[32]

Brazil's dollar balance of payments situation deteriorated during the quarter, making it difficult to meet the conditions imposed under the terms of the loan. Nevertheless a second drawing of $60 millions against the loan was permitted in the light of assurances by the new Minister of Finance [33] of cooperation in adjusting the situation.

The fact that the Joint Brazil–United States Economic Development Commission, organized in 1951, is about to be terminated and that financing of its remaining program is to be considered on an individual project basis and will depend on Brazil's financial position, will tend to slow the rate of lending.

A loan of $120 millions for a copper project in Peru, $60 millions of which was to be covered by a certificate from the Office of Defense Mobilization, was considered by the Export–Import Bank. No final decision has been taken but the Office of Defense Mobilization decided on July 8 not to issue a certificate.[34]

Credits totaling approximately $80 millions are under active consideration by the two banks. They include a $20 million pulp-paper loan to Chile, $49 millions for four projects of the Joint Brazil–United States Economic Development Commission and $4 millions for airports in Ecuador. Negotiations on some of these loans have been protracted, and the political advantage which the United States might have expected to derive from them has been correspondingly reduced.

Technical Cooperation Program: Appropriations of $24.3 millions have been requested to continue the technical cooperation program in nineteen of the twenty Latin American republics during the fiscal year 1954. If approved, this will permit a 10% expansion in the technical cooperation program being administered by the Technical Cooperation Administration.

Grant-Aid for Highways in Central America: The Congress has tentatively agreed to appropriate $1 million for continuation of work on the Rama Road, which should be helpful in our relations with Nicaragua. The amount tentatively appropriated for the Inter-American Highway, however, was only $1 million, or 1/8th of the amount requested and previously authorized. The appropriation bill providing these amounts is now being considered by a Conference Committee.

United States Trade with Latin America: No progress can be recorded toward fulfillment of our objective of facilitating the sale of Latin American products in the United States with almost all efforts being expended in an effort to retain gains already made. Legislation introduced to increase restrictions on the importation of lead, zinc and residual fuel oil have given rise to widespread criticism of the United States in those countries which might be adversely affected by its passage, especially Mexico, Peru and Venezuela.

Fears regarding the future tariff policy of the United States were in no wise allayed by the fact that countervailing duties were imposed during the second quarter of 1953 on Uruguayan wool tops. This is the first instance in recent years of imposition of a countervailing duty to offset a subsidy arising out of multiple exchange rates.

Monetary Stabilization and Fiscal Reforms: On May 14 the Bolivian Government initiated a highly important program of monetary stabilization and reform of the foreign exchange system. This action was taken on the urging of the United States and in close consultation with the International Monetary Fund and the United Nations Technical Assistance Mission to Bolivia.

The International Monetary Fund, the Export-Import and International Banks and the Department of State both in Washington and in Rio de Janeiro have urged Brazil to undertake fiscal, budgetary and monetary reforms. A new Minister of Finance has been appointed whose statements are encouraging but whose program is not yet clearly established.

A preliminary report on the Consultation of the International Monetary Fund with Chile, urging fiscal reforms, was published in Chile. The Department of State has consistently pointed out to the Chilean Government the need for an almost complete overhaul of its fiscal and monetary system in order to cope successfully with its economic and trade problems. Chile's failure to take concrete steps to curb inflation has hampered that Government's efforts to obtain development loans.

The Stabilization Fund Agreement between the United States and Mexico was renewed with modifications on June 9 [35] for a further period of 2½ years.

3. Information and Related Activities

Tailoring Information Program to Latin America: Steps are being taken to direct the information program more sharply at individual countries or groups of countries in the region. In view of developments in Chile which have been detrimental to United States private firms operating in that country, a special information program has been undertaken in Chile with effective results. Efforts directed against the growth and dissemination of communist influence from Guatemala continued successfully. The deteriorating situation in Bolivia, and the blame improperly heaped on the United States as a result, was countered with factual information explaining the United States position but, failing political and economic action which would relieve the situation, the net result of information activities can not be expected to be particularly useful.

Efforts to convince Latin American countries of our interest in them and our determination to devote more attention to them were successfully advanced through information activities connected with (1) the visit of the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs to Mexico, the Caribbean and Central American Republics and Panama and (2) Dr. Milton Eisenhower's visit to the South American countries.

Action Against Communist Sponsored Meetings: Information activities resulted in almost completely discrediting the Communist sponsored Cultural Congress held in Santiago, Chile,[36] to which a great number of non-Communist leaders were invited. This Congress was intended to be a western hemisphere affair and was designed to attack alleged United States restrictions on cultural activities. Attendance was reduced largely to known communists and the Congress failed of its objective. Activities to discredit persons attending local Soviet-inspired "Peace" Congresses as well as European and other "Peace" Congresses continued successfully. An effective exposé contained in a prominent Mexico City daily of Soviet activities out of Mexico City was used to our advantage throughout Latin America.

Local Communist and Other Anti-United States Activities: Continued limited successes in combatting communism on a local level can be reported as well as considerable progress in improving the attitudes of leaders and the masses toward the United States. However, inability to provide propaganda directed at the local level continues to be a weakness of the program.

Little effective work has been done to combat anti-United States propaganda and activities of the Peron Government of Argentina or that brand of ultra-nationalism in a number of Latin American countries which has strong anti-United States overtones. A plan is now in preparation for an information program to meet the problem of ultra-nationalist propaganda.

4. Military

The following report on military relations with Latin America covers the period since the Seventh Progress Report on NSC 56/2, "United States Policy Toward Inter-American Military Collaboration" dated October 14, 1952.[37] The Seventh Progress Report was submitted as of September 25, 1952.

Military Assistance Program: A limited grant military assistance program for Latin America was initiated in early 1952 under the provisions of the Mutual Security Act of 1951.[38] The Congress has appropriated in fiscal years 1952 and 1953 a total of $89,835,750 for this program and is now considering an additional request for $15,000,000 for fiscal year 1954.

A bilateral Military Assistance Agreement with the Dominican Republic was signed in Washington on March 6[39] and, after ratification by the Dominican Government, entered into force on June 10.

After a delay of over a year, the Military Assistance Agreement with Brazil,[40] which was vigorously attacked in Brazil by communist and extreme nationalists and until the second quarter of 1953 rather ineffectively supported by the Vargas Administration, was finally ratified and entered into force on May 19. The three most telling arguments (largely fallacious) used against the Agreement were: (1) it would be used as a pretext to send troops to Korea; (2) it was subject to unilateral amendment by the United States Congress, and is subordinate to United States statutes; (3) it was designed to give the United States control over Brazilian strategic materials and to obtain these materials at reduced prices.

Similar problems plagued the ratification of the Agreement with Uruguay[41] which, almost a year after it was signed, entered into force on June 11. The secret Military Plan, which is an annex to the bilateral Military Assistance Agreement, has not yet been signed by Uruguay.

Prospects of an eventual military assistance agreement with Mexico became much dimmer during the period. Following press reports in the United States that the United States was going to insist that Mexico sign such an agreement, the Mexican press started a rather vigorous campaign against it. The visits of Generals Hoyt Vandenberg and J. Lawton Collins to Mexico in early May were seized upon as an indication that the United States intended to press for reopening of discussions for such an agreement and as a further opportunity to oppose it. This press campaign reached such proportions that it was considered necessary to instruct our Ambassador [42] in June to issue an official release or take other appropriate action denying any effort on our part to reopen discussions. When the joint Mexico–United States Defense Commission had its regular meeting in Mexico City in July the Mexican Minister of Defense [43] went out of his way to state to the press that "Mexico will not contribute a single man for fighting abroad."

Negotiations for funds to cover local administrative expenses of the program are in progress in Brazil, Cuba, the Dominican Republic and Uruguay and have been concluded with Chile, Colombia, Ecuador and Peru.

The Chief of the Military Assistance Advisory Group in Brazil has been instructed to enter into negotiations with Brazilian military authorities looking toward an increase in the number of Army units Brazil would agree to maintain for hemisphere defense.

As a result of increased tension in relations between El Salvador and Guatemala, a special mission to Washington from El Salvador discussed in February the purchase of a substantial quantity of military equipment from the United States and the inclusion of El Salvador in the military assistance program. The Department of the Army, under the reimbursable provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949,[44] has offered to sell El Salvador the arms she desires.

Partly as a result of these discussions with Salvadoran officials preliminary consideration has been given to the possibility of developing defense tasks which would warrant the inclusion of El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua in the military assistance program.[45] The principal factors on which the proposal was based are that inclusion of the three countries would contribute to diminishing Communist influence in Central America, particularly in Guatemala, and increase the willingness and ability of Central American states to resist communist subversion and pressure. Moreover, the implicit emphasis on Guatemala's ineligibility to receive grant assistance might have the effect of establishing in Guatemala a political climate of benefit to anti-communist Guatemalan elements, especially elements in the Guatemalan armed forces. At the present state of consideration, it appears that adequate basis is offered for an approach to Nicaragua to include that country in the military assistance program with the possibility of renewed consideration, if developments in Central America should require, to determine the eligibility of El Salvador and Honduras.

Although Haiti has not been included in the program, that government has again expressed its desire to conclude an agreement.

The principal problems which have confronted the United States in carrying out the program are:

1. Delay in ratification of the Brazilian and Uruguayan Agreements;
2. Working out the necessary administrative and other details involved in carrying out a new military program;
3. Making available, within the existing status of Latin America as the lowest priority area, equipment and supplies to implement the program;
4. Counteracting propaganda attacks by communist and ultra-nationalist, who have made strong efforts to distort the true purpose of the program and prevent its implementation.

Although the first problem has been solved and measures have been taken to solve the second in the near future, it can be expected that the latter two problems will continue to persist in varying degrees as long as the program continues and the world situation remains as it is.

Military Staff Discussions with Venezuela: Consideration is being given to proposing to Venezuela the resumption of military staff talks on the defense of that country's oil fields which were discontinued in 1951.[46] These planning talks were discontinued at the request of Venezuela because of her dissatisfaction over the method of payment for and the delay in delivery of military equipment to that country under the reimbursable provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949. Deliveries of equipment have improved but it is expected that the success of any staff discussions with Venezuela will depend primarily on the ability of the United States to satisfy at least a significant portion of Venezuela's requests for military equipment with reasonable promptness.

Protection of Sources of Strategic Materials: Responsibilities for assisting in the protection of sources and processing facilities of strategic materials in the Latin America area are at present defined by the provisions of NSC 29, "Security of Strategically Important Industrial Operations in Foreign Countries" [47] and action is guided by the determinations of the Special Inter-Agency Committee on Vulnerability of Foreign Sources of Strategically Important Materials. The Tenth Progress Report [48] on this subject was submitted to the National Security Council under date of June 8.

Base Requirements in the Galapagos Islands: Consideration is being given to the most effective means by which it can be assured that Ecuador will agree to make available to the United States base rights in the Galapagos Islands in the event of war or other extreme emergency.

Inter-American Defense Board: The United States has continued its participation and leadership in the Inter-American Defense Board.

Colombia became the ninth country to approve the General Military Plan for the Defense of the American Continent [49] which was prepared by the Board as a result of Resolution III [50] of the Fourth Meeting of Consultation of Ministers of Foreign Affairs and approved by the Board on November 15, 1951.

The significant omission from the list of countries approving either the Military Plan or the earlier Common Defense Scheme for the Defense of the American Continent [51] is Mexico which is understood to have suggested a number of revisions in the General Military Plan.

Joint Brazil–United States Military Commission: United States and Brazilian defense officials have formulated recommendations to their respective governments concerning the continued operation of the Joint Brazil–United States Military Commission in Rio de Janeiro and the Joint Brazil–United States Defense Commission in Washington under a proposed new permanent board on defense. In general, these recommendations would provide for: (a) an exchange of notes providing for the continued existence of these two Commissions under a new board and (b) a secret arrangement between the Brazilian Armed Forces General Staff and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff which would define objectives, functions and procedures for the two existing Commissions and the new Board.

Joint Mexico–United States Defense Commission: The Commission continued its activities during the period. The Defense Planning Committee of the Commission held its third plenary meeting at New Orleans October 13–16, 1952. That meeting was followed by the 61st plenary meeting of the Commission in Washington on November 19, 1952 when the Commission approved the Mexico–United States Emergency Defense Plan which has since been approved by the two governments. The Defense Planning Committee held its fourth plenary session at Acapulco May 18–21 and the Commission held its 62nd plenary session in Mexico City July 6–8.

Army, Navy and Air Force Missions: The United States Government has Army, Navy or Air Force Missions in all of the twenty Latin American republics except Argentina and the Dominican Republic. United States Naval Advisors are assigned to the Argentine Naval School by individual agreement with the Argentine Government but the United States does not have a Naval Mission Agreement with Argentina and does not maintain a mission there as such. At the beginning of the report period, the United States had Missions in the following countries:

Army Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, Guatemala, Honduras, Panama, Paraguay, Peru and Venezuela
Navy Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, Haiti, Peru and Venezuela
Air Force Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay and Venezuela

An Air Force Mission was inaugurated in Nicaragua on April 15.[52] An Army Mission Agreement was signed with El Salvador on May 21.[53] This Agreement replaced a previous Agreement[54] which provided for the assignment of a United States Army officer as director of the Salvadoran military school but which was terminated on January 13 when our officer was withdrawn and El Salvador appointed one of its own officers as director the school. Nicaragua has requested that an Army Mission be assigned to that country.

Training in United States Service Schools: Students from Latin American countries continued to receive training during the period at Service schools in the Canal Zone and in the United States.

Reduction of Attachés in Latin America: Reductions in Attaché offices in Latin America leave the United States with no resident service attaché in Bolivia, Haiti and Paraguay. While assignment of attachés from neighboring countries to serve also in these countries may meet the intelligence requirements of the Service Departments, the reduction has hurt the national pride of these countries and is taken by them as an indication of the lack of importance attached to them by the United States.

Contributions to United Nations Action In Korea: In response to our written inquiry for a clarification of that Government's policy with regard to a troop contribution for the United Nations action in Korea, the Dominican Government has orally informed our Chargé at Ciudad Trujillo [55] that the Dominican Government is thinking of sending 1,000 men to Korea. Our Chargé reports that the Dominican Government is preparing an infantry battalion to be sent to Korea and has urged early acceptance of this oral offer of troops made by Generalissimo Rafael Trujillo, Chief of the Dominican Armed Forces. This offer is now being considered.

Colombia continues to be the only country in Latin America with forces in Korea. A request from Colombia to substitute an artillery battalion for its infantry battalion in Korea has been considered and rejected but with the suggestion that if Colombia desires to train artillerymen it might send an artillery battery to Korea. A Colombia frigate continues to serve in Korean waters. Discussions have been held with the Colombian Embassy in Washington regarding settlement of Colombia's logistical support bill of some $8 millions but no progress has been made,[56] Colombia showing little evidence of intention to pay any of this outstanding bill.

Standardization of Military Equipment: Latin American countries continue to purchase military equipment, primarily jet aircraft and naval vessels, from other than United States sources. Recent significant contracts made by the British include 70 Gloster Meteor jets to Brazil in exchange for cotton and 6 Canberra jet bombers to Venezuela in addition to the 20 Vampire jets Venezuela had previously purchased. There are reports that a contract for 15 jet fighter aircraft has been made with the Dominican Republic. Venezuela has contracted for three naval vessels from England and three from Italy.

The purchase of jet aircraft from non-United States sources came as a result of the desire, not necessarily a need, of the Latin American countries to have modern jet aircraft and the inability of the United States, because of more urgent requirements elsewhere, to meet this demand. The British apparently are able to offer much more attractive terms, including barter arrangements, and assurance of prompt delivery.

Efforts are now being made to meet this situation by making available a limited quantity of training and second-line fighter jet aircraft at prices comparable to those offered by the British. Information that some jet aircraft are available for sale resulted in the Chileans deciding to defer a contemplated purchase from the British and to consider purchasing from the United States. Colombia, Mexico and Peru have also indicated an interest in purchasing United States jet aircraft.

Venezuela's contracts with the British and the Italians for naval vessels arise out of similar circumstances—the inability of the United States to make available new naval vessels to Venezuela at comparable prices and within a reasonable time.

With these exceptions, there have been no significant purchases of foreign military equipment by Latin American countries eligible to purchase equipment from the United States under the reimbursable provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended. As of April 30, Latin American countries have deposited some $32.3 millions for military equipment, $25.7 millions of which has been shipped, under the terms of this legislation, the greater portion of which has been sold at 10% of the original cost plus the cost of rehabilitation.

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 20, 1953.

Subject: Second Progress Report on NSC 144/1, United States Objectives and Course of Action with Respect to Latin America.

PART I

NSC 144/1 was approved as governmental policy on March 18, 1953. It is requested that this progress report as of November 16, 1953 be circulated to the members of the Council for their information.

1. Political

High Level Consideration of Latin American Problems: The outstanding instance of high-level sympathetic attention to Latin American problems during the period under review was the trip of Dr. Milton Eisenhower through South America. Besides its eminent success as an expression of good will, the visit served to provide essential facts on which to build a revitalized Latin American policy. One of the outstanding by-products of the trip was the laying of the ground work for a marked improvement in our relations with Argentina. The improved political climate is reflected in Argentina by the virtual cessation of attacks on the United States in the controlled press, the resumption of service of the United States press agencies, indications of an improvement in the outlook for private investment, a readiness to support the United States position on the question of Indian participation in the Korean Conference [2] and a greater number of prominent Argentines visiting the United States. On its part, the United States has removed its political reservations to Export–Import Bank assistance to business operations in Argentina, adopted a more favorable attitude on the supplying of certain items of military equipment, and indicated its willingness to cooperate with the Argentine Atomic Energy Commission in the development of Argentine uranium ore resources for sale in principal measure to the United States.

The acute economic problems confronted by Bolivia and the interest of Panama in reviewing the whole range of its special relations with the United States arising from the construction and operation of the Panama Canal have also received consideration at the highest levels of government. In an effort to forestall economic chaos in Bolivia, with the attendant possibility of the government moving further to the left, the Department of State and the Foreign Operations Administration, in consultation with the White House, have been engaged in drawing up a program of emergency grant assistance for that country. The program was announced on October 14, 1953 through an exchange of letters [3] between President Eisenhower and President Paz, which were made public by the White House. The Governments of Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Peru were consulted with respect to the Bolivian situation and informed in advance about the total grant made. It is expected that recommendations on any further assistance to Bolivia will give full consideration to the degree with which more moderate elements have succeeded in establishing themselves in the Bolivian Government. This is in keeping with a basic postulate of our Latin American policy, that in determining the extent of United States assistance, consideration be given to the willingness and ability of the recipient state to cooperate with the United States in achieving common objectives. The United States Ambassador [4] has been authorized in his discretion to inform the President or the Foreign Minister [5] of this and instructed to tell the Bolivians that United States consideration of developmental loans, while not certain in any case, would definitely have to await "further economic and political stabilization" in that country.

Last April the United States acceded to the strong desire of the Government of Panama to enter into conversations on the whole range of special relationships between the two countries arising from the construction and operation of the Panama Canal. These talks opened in Washington on September 10 and are expected to continue for several months. Arrangements were also made for President Remon to visit Washington during the end of September [6]—the first visit of a Chief of State under the new Administration—in order that he might present the Panamanian viewpoint directly to President Eisenhower. The visit appears to have been highly satisfactory to President Remon and it is believed to have contributed to a better understanding between the two countries. The conversations with the Panamanian representatives are proceeding satisfactorily, the Panamanians having concluded the presentation of their problems. These problems are concerned principally with a desire for new concessions from the United States with a view to obtaining greater benefits for Panama from the Canal. Panama has also pressed for revision of the 1903 [7] and 1936 [8] Treaties, but has been given to understand that the United States will yield none of its basic jurisdictional rights in the Canal Zone, though it is willing to enter into any new arrangements with Panama which may be found feasible during the course of the present conversations.

President Eisenhower's trip to the Mexican border to join President Ruiz Cortines of Mexico in the dedication of the Falcon Dam; the general fact-finding trip of Representative Jackson [9] and the tour through South and Central America of members of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, headed by Senator Capehart,[10] to investigate the obstacles to the expansion of trade, the problems facing private investment and the need for financial assistance from the EX–IM Bank and the International Bank in the hemisphere, represent further gestures of interest and good-will toward Latin America by persons at the top echelons of governments.

[9] Representative Donald L. Jackson (R.–Cal.), a member of the Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, visited most of the countries in Central and South America during the period from Sept. 15 to Nov. 4, 1953; documents pertaining to his trip are in file 033.1100 JA.

[10] The so-called "Capehart group", which included Senators Homer E. Capehart (R.–Ind.), John W. Bricker (R.–Ohio), and J. Allen Frear, Jr. (D.–Del.), and Representative Brent Spence (D.–Ky.), visited a number of countries in Central and South America during the period from Oct. 18 to Dec. 7, 1953; pertinent documents are in file 033.1100 CA.

During the month of October, Assistant Secretary Cabot delivered two major policy addresses on Latin America. In one [11] he paid sympathetic attention to the economic problems confronting the American Republics and postulated four basic principles which should guide the United States in helping them to solve these problems. In the other [12] he examined some of the specific political problems which the United States has recently faced in its relations with Latin America, particularly with respect to Argentina, Bolivia and Guatemala. In contrast to the sympathetic analysis of the problems facing Bolivia and the measures being taken by the United States to assist the Bolivian Government and the conciliatory statement regarding the improved climate in United States-Argentine relations, Mr. Cabot's treatment of the outstanding issues with Guatemala—expropriation of American property and communist influence—indicated the seriousness with which the United States views the course of events in that Republic.

High level attention to Latin American military officials also continued during the period under review with the visits of the Defense Minister of Chile [13] during July and the Air Minister of Peru [14] during September, and the invitation to the Defense Minister of El Salvador [15] to come to the United States to review various Air Force installations during November.

Consultation with Latin American States: During the period under review the United States informed or consulted with the other American Republics on two important issues: the composition of the Korean Political Conference and the British Guiana situation. On the former Latin American votes were crucial to the success of the United States position. As a result, a special effort was made to enlist their support and in so doing the reasons of the United States for limiting membership in the Conference to the participants in the Korean War were carefully explained. In the vote in the General Assembly on this issue seventeen of the twenty Latin American States sided with the United States and three other countries to block the inclusion of non-belligerents.

Following the firm action taken by the British Government in British Guiana to thwart the efforts of the communist-directed People's Progressive Party to take over control of the Government of that territory, the United States communicated its views thereon to Latin American Governments. They were informed that in our view the establishment of a communist bridgehead in British Guiana would be a matter of deep concern to all the American Republics and that we considered that the American Republics should regard the measures taken by the British with genuine satisfaction. In an effort to counteract an apparent inclination on the part of some of the Latin American Governments to ignore or subordinate the immediate central problem of the threat posed by communist infiltration to the peripheral aspects of the colonial question, the United States has taken further steps to impress on Latin American officials the communist nature of the conspiracy and its threat to the security and independence of the American Republics.

Greater Utilization of the Organization of American States (OAS): The United States continued its active participation in the normal activities of the OAS throughout the period. With the approach of the Tenth Inter-American Conference, scheduled to open on March 1, 1954 in Caracas, Venezuela,[16] these activities have been increasingly directed toward preparations for this quinquennial plenipotentiary meeting. The Council of the Organization of American States, during the period under consideration, has been engaged in the formulation of the agenda for the meeting. In accordance with the objective of using the Organization of American States as a means of achieving United States aims, the United States on October 6 presented a proposal for an agenda item on communism entitled "The Intervention of International Communism in the American Republics". Under this general heading it is expected that the United States will submit specific resolutions on the subject of travel controls with the ultimate purpose of obtaining action by as many American Republics as possible to deny necessary travel documents to native and alien communists or communist sympathizers, and thereby to reduce the amount of travel to, from and throughout the Western Hemisphere on behalf of international communism. Consideration is also being given to declarations on the subject of communist penetration in the fields of education and labor and the threat posed by communist propaganda.

Control of Subversive Activities: The United States encouraged other American Republics to take action against the activities of communists and fellow-travellers through an exchange of information. The United States Embassies were requested twice during the period under review to acquaint the Latin American Governments with the nature of forthcoming communist-front international conferences and the action which the United States proposed to take to prevent its nationals from attending in the hope that they would adopt similar measures.

During Dr. Milton Eisenhower's visit, President Peron indicated that he planned to take stronger action against the official Argentine Communist Party. There are indications that this policy is being put into effect. . . .

Control of Shipment of Strategic Materials: As raw material, and especially metal, prices have declined pressures have increased in Latin America for a resumption of trade with Eastern Europe. Iron ore has been moving from Brazil to Poland under a bilateral trade agreement and Brazil's 1954 trade agreement with Czechoslovakia, now ready for signature, will authorize the shipment of iron ore to an annual volume of $2 million. Although iron ore is not a highly strategic item the United States had received assurances from the Compania Rio Doce, Brazil's largest source of iron ore, that its supply would be reserved for the free world. It was on this understanding that priorities were given by the United States, during the period of export control, for machinery required by Rio Doce.

The Bolivian Government has been persuaded to delay action on a draft Czech-Bolivian barter agreement involving some strategic material of secondary importance until further consultation on the subject can take place between the United States and Bolivia. The Bolivian Foreign Minister has stated that his Government has no intention of violating the Battle Act.[17]

Similar assurances continue to be given by the Chilean Foreign Minister.[18] When there was evidence of a recent authenticated case of the delivery of Chilean copper, refined in West Germany, to an East-West trader, the Chilean government cooperated to prevent completion of the transaction. The United States is seeking to obtain, as a condition of the proposed purchase of Chilean copper, that Government's agreement to institution of an effective import certificate-delivery verification system.

2. Economic

Encouragement of Private Investment: There appears to be some recognition by Latin American governments of the need for taking positive measures to assure fair treatment to foreign investors if they expect to attract foreign capital.

The Dominican Foreign Office has indicated that it expects to resume negotiations, suspended two years ago, for a Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with the United States. The Chilean Government has acknowledged, in the course of current copper discussions, that tax treatment accorded to copper companies should be improved. The Argentine Government has recently enacted legislation permitting remittance of dividends on new foreign investments up to 8 percent per annum and for repatriation of new capital invested up to 10 to 20 percent per annum. We have brought to the attention of the Argentine authorities the belief of American business concerns, both in Argentina and the United States, that the rate of return permitted will be inadequate to attract substantial amounts of capital. The Government of Ecuador has reached a settlement with foreign bond holders [19] (subject to approval of the Ecuadoran Congress) which improves the outlook for future investments of capital in that country.

In Brazil, on the other hand, the outlook is increasingly unfavorable. The passage of the Petrobraz Bill, which virtually excludes foreign participation in Brazil's petroleum development, represents a backward step. Also, recent public statements by the new Finance Minister to the effect that foreign investment is not desirable for Brazil unless strictly regulated has disturbed prospective investors. The effect of Brazil's current austerity program, including the limitation of imports, has depressed the operations of many foreign investors already established in Brazil, and has tended to discourage new investors whose operations would require imported materials.

The outlook for foreign capital invested in Guatemala has not improved. The Department of State made an energetic formal protest to Guatemala against its expropriation of United Fruit Company lands without payment of fair compensation, and the text of the protest was released to the press [20] in order to make clear the United States position.

Progress in Removal of Shipping Discriminations: The outlook for United States shipping lines operating to the East coast of Latin America continues to show improvement. Brazil has legislation pending which will revoke (1) a law providing for a 50 percent reduction in consular fees on cargo shipped in national vessels, and (2) warehousing and berthing priorities in Brazilian ports previously enjoyed exclusively by Brazilian shipping companies. The United States has a bill pending before the United States Congress for authorization to sell 12 vessels to Brazil to improve its coastal transportation. Recent indications concerning Brazilian maritime policy suggest that the Brazilian government is denying all preferences to Lloyd Brasileiro [21] and is following what appears to be a new non-discriminatory policy toward foreign flag shipping. This is a marked accomplishment in our shipping relations with Brazil. The United States is continuing its representations to the Chilean Government with respect to its recent action arbitrarily to divert commercial cargo to Chilean vessels. This problem is being discussed in current copper negotiations in an attempt to find a solution. The United States also made representations to the Ecuadoran Government concerning a 50 percent reduction in consular fees for goods shipped on Ecuadoran or Flota Grancolombiana [22] vessels.

A Civil Aviation Agreement with Venezuela, which has been in the process of negotiations for approximately three and one-half years was signed in Caracas on August 14, 1953.

International Bank and Export–Import Bank Loan Activities: Loan authorizations by the International Bank and Export–Import Bank, during the third quarter of 1953, totaled $51.9 million as compared with a quarterly average of $63.7 million in 1949–52 inclusive. Loans authorized by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD) during the third quarter totaled $47.09 million, distributed as follows: [23]

Brazil	power	7.30
Nicaragua	road construction	3.50
	power	.45
Chile	pulp and paper mill	20.00
Panama	farm machinery	1.20
	grain storage	.29
Colombia	highways	14.35

The Export–Import Bank of Washington made two loans totaling $4.8 million, one of $2.5 million for the development of iron ore properties in Peru and one of $2.3 million for the completion of the Quevedo–Manta Highway in Ecuador. Action on a $3.11 million loan requested by a Brazilian airline, which was deferred pending satisfactory settlement of a rate problem affecting United States airlines operating in Brazil, was approved on October 30, 1953. No further action has been taken on the $120 million loan requested for development of the Toquepala copper project in Peru or the $4 million credit application for airport expansion in Ecuador. Both loans are of considerable political significance in our relations with these two countries. The Bank also approved on October 28 an increase of $2.4 million in the Cochabamba–Santa Cruz Highway credit to provide for the completion of the base surfacing of the highway and the overhauling of the construction equipment which will revert to the Bolivian Development Corporation upon termination of the project. The reconditioning of this equipment will enable the Bolivians to continue construction of feeder and access roads in the Santa Cruz area.

Chile's proposal to tie a commitment of United States Government support for large development loans to Chile into the copper negotiations was rejected. The proposal afforded the United States an opportunity to stress our policy of considering loans individually on the basis of their economic merits.

Grant Aid for Highway Construction in Central America: Notes have been exchanged [24] with the Nicaraguan Government providing for the use of the $1,000,000 appropriated by the Congress for continuation of construction on the Rama Road. The $1,000,000 appropriated for continuation of construction of the Inter-American Highway is being apportioned.

Emergency Grant Aid: In accordance with our policy of extending grant aid in cases of emergency, where desirable from the standpoint of foreign relations, we have announced a grant of $9 million to Bolivia, $5 million under the Emergency Famine Relief program and $4 million for Foreign Operations Administration funds. The Technical Assistance program in Bolivia is also being increased from $2 million to $4 million in an effort to increase Bolivia's production of essential foodstuffs.

Improving the Trade Outlook for Latin American Export Commodities: An international agreement for the stabilization of the world sugar market [25] was concluded in London in August at a conference sponsored by the United Nations. For a period of years, the United States has supported Cuba's efforts to secure a new international sugar agreement. It participated with Cuba and other governments in producing the draft agreement used as a basis for negotiation, and sent a government-industry delegation to the conference, which worked effectively with Cuba and other Latin American countries to bring about an agreement. The agreement provides machinery to keep supplies in the world market in line with world demand to assure a price fair to both producers and consumers, and seeks also to increase consumption and reduce subsidies. Although the agreement is not yet operative, it is anticipated that it will be ratified by the required number of governments and come into force January 1, 1954.

Technical Cooperation Program: Programming of funds appropriated by the Congress for fiscal year 1954 has been completed. The technical cooperation program will continue on about the same basis but at a slightly expanded rate, with primary emphasis being given to agriculture, education and health and sanitation.

Monetary Stabilization and Fiscal Reforms: Fiscal, budget and exchange reforms were announced in Brazil during the third quarter at the instance of the new Finance Minister, who was given broad powers by the President [26] as a means to correct Brazil's serious inflation and balance of payments problem. A new exchange system went into operation on October 12. Three effective buying rates are established, one for coffee exports, a second for all other commodities, and, third, a fluctuating free market rate for invisible items. On the import side, five categories are established, based on the degree of essentiality, and each is allocated a specified proportion of the exchange available. The selling price of exchange within each category is to be determined by demand and supply, but the Bank of Brazil, through its allocation of exchange and management of the categories, plays a significant role in determination of the rates. The introduction of this auction system represents a de facto devaluation of the cruzeiro, but no new parity rate has been submitted to the Fund. It would appear that the amount of exchange flowing into the free market will be reduced. Arrangements to control authorizations to obtain exchange in this market will be required to prevent rates from rising to a much higher level. The Fund did not object to the new scheme as a temporary measure.

Haiti became a member of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and of the International Monetary Fund on September 8, 1953. It may now apply to the International Bank for loans to cover new development projects, instead of relying exclusively on the Export-Import Bank.

3. Information and related activities

Reduction of Information Programs: The resources of the informational and educational programs in Latin America were diminished at the beginning of the quarter by reductions in staff, operating funds, and supporting services, including the elimination in July of the Voice of America's Spanish and Portuguese broadcasts to the area. Although this readjustment occasioned some interruptions and curtailments of activity, substantial work was done on all of the major tasks of the program.

Programs Directed to the Specific Needs of Individual Countries and Areas: Informational activity was coordinated with diplomatic action to explain and emphasize especially in the Central American countries, the legality of the United States position with regard to Guatemalan expropriation of United Fruit Company lands, and at the same time to impress hemisphere opinion with the gravity of the Guatemalan Communist situation. Similarly coordinated action was taken to temper exaggerated expectations on the part of the Panamanian public in the period prior to discussion of the Panama–Canal Zone relationship, and subsequently, to reap advantage from the successful outcome of President Remon's visit to the United States in September. Special materials were prepared in anticipation of the celebrations, to open in November, of the fiftieth anniversary of Panama.

In Bolivia, where anti-United States feeling was ameliorated at the opening of the period by the visit of Dr. Milton Eisenhower, and announcement of the United States decision to sign a contract for tin and to provide direct economic aid, the information program dealt with the problem of maintaining this improved psychological climate through a long period of waiting until the emergency aid was actually awarded. That this effort was at least partially successful has, however, been largely due to the prudently patient attitude shown by the Bolivian Government.

In Chile the uncertainties surrounding the problem of copper exports, together with growing inflation, fanned nationalistic feeling against American-owned companies and United States trade policies, with the result that Communist propaganda increased in volume and effectiveness. Efforts were made to combat the demagogic campaign in favor of selling copper to the Soviet Union by building public awareness of the consequences of such sales in terms of United States-Chilean relations and by discreetly pointing out the unreliability of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics as a customer. Although the problem was not one which propaganda alone could solve, the meager success of these efforts revealed the inadequacy of the information program in the face of the current tendencies towards social demoralization in Chile. This inadequacy was borne out by an opinion survey completed during the quarter and submitted to the Department for study. Accordingly, steps have been taken to provide new information facilities and activities addressed to the sector most adversely affected, i.e., Chilean labor.

A campaign involving cooperation between our military and information officials in Cuba has been developed, in order to dispel a developing wave of resentment, based chiefly on misunderstanding, of our Military Assistance Agreement with Cuba.

Soviet Imperialism: Soviet imperialism gained a psychological advantage during the period as propaganda on behalf of Latin American trade with the Soviet bloc increased sharply. The campaign was given impetus by the signing of an Argentine-Soviet trade pact, the activities throughout South America of a Soviet trade mission based in Buenos Aires, the departure of several Latin American trade missions to Satellite countries, and the implementation by Brazil of a trade agreement with Poland. Much United States informational activity—the revelation of poor economic conditions behind the Iron Curtain, exposure of the Soviet's predatory trade practices, et cetera, as well as the constant promotion of Free World solidarity—tends to build resistance to this propaganda, but it is recognized that in the months to come a concerted effort will be necessary to reduce the attractiveness of the Soviet appeal to Latin American self-interest and combat the political effects of such Soviet bloc trade as may materialize.

Three interlocking youth congresses held in the Soviet area in August and September drew large attendance from Latin America, much of it attributable to the paid travel arranged by international Communist organizations. The Third Congress of the World Federation of Trade Unions, held in Vienna in October,[27] also attracted a considerable Latin American contingent. Communist achievement in these projects, while undeniably significant, was tempered by the action of a number of Latin American governments in confiscating the films and printed propaganda brought back by the delegates and by wide dissemination of the reports of certain travelers who were disillusioned by what they observed.

Local Communist and other anti-United States Activities: Improvement in United States-Argentine relations, discussed above, resulted in the almost complete cessation of hostile Argentine propaganda and instead an occasional constructive article which gave reason to hope that Argentina might turn its elaborate information program to purposes more compatible with the United States.

Decided headway has been made in overcoming the effects of Communist agitation against the United States on the issue of racial discrimination. Developments in Korea were utilized with good effect against the "peace" and "bacteriological warfare" claims of local pro-Communist groups.

Association of Latin American Interests with United States Objectives: Effective efforts were made to expand and prolong the popular impact of the gestures of interest and good will towards Latin America made, as recounted in preceding paragraphs, by top-ranking representatives of the United States. Concerted use was made of such informational tools as films, pamphlets, and graphic materials to impress the significance of these developments upon Latin Americans at all social levels and to direct the pro-United States sentiment thus stimulated into support for this country's views and policies.

The tendency of Latin Americans to consider the British Government's action in breaking the control of local political leaders in British Guiana unjustified, even in the interests of hemisphere security, presented the information program with new problems, i.e., the prospect of increased dissatisfaction with the United States position on colonialism in the Americas, and the emergence of the Caribbean area as a subject of increased interest to the rest of the Continent. Attention is being given to developing new materials and facilities to meet these needs, and to coordinating our efforts, as appropriate, with those of the British information services.

4. Military

Military Assistance Program: The Congress appropriated $15,000,000 for the Military Assistance Program for fiscal year 1954 and re-appropriated some $50,000,000 of unexpended balances from the appropriations for fiscal years 1952 and 1953. Thus, total appropriations for the program in three fiscal years is approximately $101 millions.

Military Assistance Agreements with the following eight Latin American countries are now fully in effect after initialling of the secret military plan with Uruguay on October 14, 1953:[28] Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Peru, Uruguay. Each of the eight countries, except Brazil, Cuba and Uruguay, has contributed currency for local administrative expenses and Military Assistance Advisory Groups have been established in Brazil, Chile, Colombia and Peru. Shipments of equipment have been made to each of the eight countries, except the Dominican Republic and Uruguay. About $11.1 million of the $101 million appropriated to date had been spent on equipment delivered, as of July 31.

There appears to be some basis for considering the inclusion of Haiti in the Military Assistance Program. The Department of the Navy has under consideration a proposal to assign Haiti the defense task of patrolling the Windward Passage with naval craft furnished by the United States.

Military Staff Discussions with Venezuela: The possibility of an effective renewal of staff discussions with Venezuela has improved materially during the period. The principal stumbling block to such renewal has been Venezuelan dissatisfaction over procurement of military equipment from the United States. During the last 60 days it has been possible to comply with a Venezuelan request for Army equipment having a total sales price of over $7 million and to offer it for delivery within 90 days on liberal payment terms authorized by the Mutual Defense Assistance Act. Since this offer appears to have created a favorable Venezuelan attitude toward the resumption of the talks, Embassy Caracas believes that firm arrangements should now be made to this end at an early date.

Requirements for Military Installations in Latin America: United States Air Force personnel, with the consent of the Brazilian Government, are planning a survey of possible sites in Brazil for the location of an instrumentation station of the United States Air Force Missile Test Center. The Air Force is studying the feasibility of plans to conduct a similar survey for suitable sites in Venezuela, provided that the Venezuelan Government consents.

Preparations are being made for a possible approach to the Brazilian Government with a view to obtaining rights for the establishment of a United States Army Communication Center in the Recife area. Surveys have disclosed that this location is probably the best in the world for the establishment of a center to relay messages from the United States to Africa and Europe, and vice versa. It would operate in conjunction with other such stations established or contemplated in Eritrea, Ceylon and Hawaii and will cost approximately $10,000,000.

The Department of the Navy is now working on plans under which shipping control stations in Latin America would be established by agreement between the United States and the Latin American countries concerned. The responsibility for working out these arrangements has been assigned to the United States by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Two problems are now holding up finalization of United States planning.

(1) It is expected that the quid pro quo for agreeing to the establishment of such stations will be a request by the Latin American countries for equipment to operate them.
(2) The Department of the Navy is meeting rather strong resistance from the United Kingdom in making North Atlantic Treaty Organization classified documents on signals and other matters available to Latin American countries, although it is essential that all such stations throughout the world use the same signals, etc.

Inter-American Defense Board: The Board has continued with the preparation of annexes to the General Military Plan. Five Annexes [29] have been prepared, and approved by the Inter-American Defense Board to date for submission to the member governments for approval:

Annex 1—Area of Particular Strategic Importance—10 April 1952
Annex 2—Intelligence and Counter-Intelligence—27 March 1952
Annex 3—Logistics—11 September 1952
Annex 4—Standardization—11 June 1953
Annex 5—Communications—23 July 1953

Chile has approved the General Military Plan. This makes a total of ten countries that have approved the Plan.

Joint Brazil–United States Defense Arrangements: Still under consideration is a proposal to establish a new defense board composed of United States and Brazilian officials. The only problem which now appears to be holding up the formal creation of the Board is a decision by the United States as to (1) whether the Brazilian Foreign Office and the Department of State are to have full membership on the Board and (2) the name of the new board.

Army, Navy and Air Force Mission: During the period under review Army Mission Agreements with Cuba [30] and Costa Rica,[31] an Air Force Mission Agreement with Cuba,[32] and a Naval Mission Agreement with Chile [33] were extended for two or more years. Negotiations for an Army Mission Agreement with Nicaragua are underway.[34] Peru,[35] Paraguay and Honduras [36] have requested the extension of Army Mission Agreements and Paraguay, Honduras [37] and Chile [38] have requested the extension of Air Force Agreements. Mission Agreements with Colombia, Bolivia, Ecuador and Guatemala have lapsed. These countries continue to comply with the provisions of the Agreements. With the exception of the Mission Agreements with Guatemala, discussions have been held on extension of these agreements.

As a matter of United States policy it has been decided that United States Army and Air Force Missions should be maintained in Guatemala, even though the present Guatemalan Government is strongly influenced by Communists. Guatemalan Armed Forces apparently have not been infiltrated by the Communists and appear to be the most significant element in Guatemala capable of influencing the present undesirable political situation. United States Missions could perform the useful role of promoting pro-United States attitudes among Guatemalan military personnel. Although the Agreements with Guatemala have expired, the Guatemalan Government continues to observe their provisions and there are indications that Guatemala desires to retain the Missions.

Training in United States Service Schools: A substantial number of Latin Americans continued to receive training in Service Schools either in the United States or in the Canal Zone. During fiscal year 1953 the three Armed Services gave training to over 2700 Latin Americans as follows: Army, 797; Navy, 1382 and Air Force, 563.

Contributions to United Nations Action in Korea: Although the Dominican Government had indicated an interest in contributing a battalion of infantry for service in Korea, the signing of the armistice in Korea caused it to condition the offer on the breakdown of the truce and a resumption of fighting.

Colombia continues to be the only Latin American country with forces in Korea. There was renewed pressure from Colombia to obtain an early settlement of its reimbursement bill, now over $10 millions, after a statement by Colombian President Rojas in a press conference that Colombia owed this amount to the United States for logistic support furnished Colombian forces in Korea and would pay it if asked to do so. Pending a legal decision by the Attorney General [39] on a new reimbursement policy and at the request of the President, no active efforts are being made to effect collection of the reimbursement bill now owed by Colombia.

United States Air Force Good Will Jet Aircraft Tour of Latin America: The United States Air Force has decided to make a tour of Latin American countries to demonstrate United States jet aircraft with the object of persuading Latin American countries desiring jet aircraft to buy them from the United States rather than from European countries. While the tour may achieve some success in this respect it is expected that it will also probably (1) create good will in Latin America for the United States by demonstrating United States interest in Latin America, (2) enhance the prestige of the United States Air Force Missions in Latin America, and (3) train United States Air Force personnel assigned to the tour.

Sale of Military Equipment to Latin America: During the period under review there has been a sharp increase in the value and amount of military equipment being purchased by Latin American countries.

[39] Herbert Brownell, Jr.

Significant purchases or procurement requests include: Venezuela, $7,000,000 worth of M–41 tanks and spare parts; Argentina, $500,000 worth of tank motors; Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, the Dominican Republic and Ecuador, a total of 200 T–6D aircraft worth approximately $3,000,000. The first of two submarines built for Peru was launched at Groton, Connecticut on October 27, 1953.

El Salvador's ambitious program for the procurement of military equipment, as a result of increased pressures from Guatemala, appears to have been dropped or at least deferred. No action was taken on an offer of the Department of the Army on July 24, 1953 to sell some $2.3 millions worth of equipment. Instead El Salvador is purchasing a relatively small quantity of military equipment.

Cuba is planning to buy a rather substantial quantity of arms from the Department of Defense, mostly as a result of recommendations made from time to time by the United States Army Mission to Cuba. These arms will materially improve Cuba's ability to participate in hemisphere defense but, at the same time, it is fairly apparent that Cuba has chosen this time to procure arms from limited financial resources for domestic political reasons.

Guatemala, possibly as a result of an inability to obtain military equipment elsewhere as well as a desire to have United States military equipment, has continued its pressure on the United States Government to permit Guatemala to purchase military equipment in the United States. This was probably the foremost problem in the minds of Guatemalan military officials when the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs visited Guatemala. The assignment of a new Guatemalan Military Attaché [40] to the United States in October furnished an opportunity to raise the problem again with the Department of the Army. The Military Attaché was told that Guatemala was not eligible by public law to purchase military equipment from the Department of Defense. Guatemala has been denied export licenses for commercial arms purchases because these arms might be the means of keeping a government in power which is strongly influenced by the Communists.

Procurement by Latin American Governments of Military Equipment from Non-United States Sources: A review of data on procurement by Latin American Governments of military equipment from non-United States sources indicates that the Latin American Governments are purchasing fairly substantial quantities of military equipment from commercial firms in Canada and the following European countries: Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, Italy, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom has supplied only jet aircraft and a limited quantity of ships. There have also been sales by Argentina, Brazil, the Dominican Republic and Mexico to other Latin American countries. It appears to be confirmed that Latin American Governments have purchased from other sources because the United States Government could not make the desired equipment available or the price and terms of purchase offered by the United States were not as attractive as those offered by other suppliers.

[40] Col. Enrique Peralta Azurdia.

Most of these purchases have been on a cash basis. The only significant barter deal was for jet aircraft between the Cotton Council in the United Kingdom and the Brazilian Government. Indications are however that more barter arrangements may be in the offing. The prices paid have been, in the case of jet aircraft and vessels, substantially lower than United States prices. In a few cases availability rather than price has been the primary consideration, e.g., Venezuela.

With the possible exception of the use of Dominican manufactured carbines by an MDAP unit in Colombia, and the procurement by Brazil of equipment for an MDAP naval unit, none of the non-standard military equipment purchased by Latin American Governments was destined for MDAP unit.

The procurement of non-United States equipment does not present a serious threat to United States Service Missions but does pose a serious threat to standardization objectives of our national policy. Continued and increased purchases will lessen the influence of such missions and might result in a decision by some Latin American Governments not to continue the missions. This appears most immediate in Guatemala. Some of the purchases have resulted in the training of Latin Americans in Europe and the assignment to the purchasing country for temporary periods of civilian technicians to train personnel and advise on the use of equipment. In general, however, a decision by a Latin American Government not to keep a United States military mission would probably be based more on other considerations that the ability to obtain military equipment from the United States.

PART II

No evaluation of the policy stated in NSC 144/1 is attempted at this time pending issuance of Dr. Milton Eisenhower's report [41] and because NSC 144/1 was just recently adopted.

WALTER B. SMITH

[41] Dr. Eisenhower's report on the results of his factfinding mission to South America, submitted to President Eisenhower under date of Nov. 18, 1953, was published as United States-Latin American Relations: Report to the President (Department of State Publication 5290, Washington, 1953); it is also printed in the Department of State Bulletin, Nov. 23, 1953, pp. 695–717. See also the editorial note, p. 196.

Editorial Note

The National Security Council at its 174th meeting on December 10, 1953, discussed United States objectives and courses of action with respect to Latin America in light of the second progress report on NSC 144/1 (NSC Action No. 980–a) and noted the President's statement that he had sent communications to appropriate departments and agencies of the Executive branch regarding implementation of Dr. Milton Eisenhower's report on United States–Latin American relations (NSC Action No. 980–b). The Council also noted President Eisenhower's desire that the Department of Defense investigate the feasibility of accelerating deliveries of military equipment to the Latin American republics (NSC Action No. 980–c). A memorandum of discussion at the 174th NSC meeting, dated December 11, 1953, is in the Eisenhower Library, Whitman file, NSC records.

On February 4, 1954, the NSC's Executive Secretary, James S. Lay, Jr., circulated to the NSC a memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs, H. Struve Hensel, to the President's Special Assistant for National Security Affairs, Robert Cutler, dated February 2, 1954, p. 169, detailing the steps taken to accelerate deliveries of military equipment to the Latin American republics. At its 184th meeting on February 11, 1954, the NSC noted the action taken to accelerate deliveries (NSC Action No. 1038).

Editorial Note

In a memorandum to the National Security Council, dated April 28, 1954, Mr. Lay stated the following: "In response to a request from the Operations Coordinating Board the President has this date designated the OCB as the coordinating agency for the current NSC policy on Latin America contained in NSC 144/1." (S/P–NSC files, lot 62 D 1, NSC 144/1)

The OCB was established on September 2, 1953, in pursuance of Executive Order 10483, for the purpose of strengthening the national security machinery by providing for the coordinated interdepartmental implementation of national security policies approved by the President after consideration in the National Security Council. The Board originally consisted of the Under Secretary of State, who served as chairman, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, the Director of Central Intelligence, and the Special Assistant to the President. The Director of the United States Information Agency and the Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs acted as advisers to the OCB. The Board met once a week on Wednesdays; meeting sites rotated among the offices of the designated members. Progress Report Prepared in the Department of State for the Operations Coordinating Board [1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 25, 1954.[2]

THIRD PROGRESS REPORT ON NSC 144/1, UNITED STATES OBJECTIVES AND COURSES OF ACTION WITH RESPECT TO LATIN AMERICA

A. SUMMARY

1. Major actions

This report covers the period November 15, 1953–May 1, 1954.

The United States participated in the Tenth Inter-American Conference held at Caracas, Venezuela from March 1–28, 1954. The United States achieved its primary objective of obtaining a clear-cut policy statement [3] against communism and laid the ground-work for subsequent multilateral action against communism in Guatemala. A decision was taken at the Conference to hold an economic conference at Rio de Jahneiro in the fall.[4]

Preliminary action has been taken to implement the Eisenhower Report through recommended increases in appropriations for certain Drafted by Mr. Sayre; cleared with the Offices of Regional American Affairs, Middle American Affairs, and South American Affairs, the Bureau of Economic Affairs, the Policy Planning Staff, the Office of the Deputy Under Secretary of State, the United States Information Agency, and the Department of Defense. The report was prepared for the Operations Coordinating Board; it was transmitted to the OCB under cover of a memorandum by Mr. Radius to Mr. Elmer Staats, Executive Secretary of the OCB, dated May 25, 1954, not printed. programs now being carried out in Latin America. Comments on the Report have been received by the Department of State and are under study.

Grant economic aid to Bolivia was increased. A decision has been made to purchase 100,000 short tons of copper from Chile. Negotiations with Panama with respect to the Canal Zone are continuing.

In pursuance of the anti-communist resolution approved at Caracas, the United States is consulting with all Latin American countries except Guatemala regarding control of travel in the interests of communism.

There has been no significant change in the outlook for private investment in Latin America except some improvement in Argentina and Panama and a deterioration in Costa Rica and the Dominican Republic.

No significant changes are noted in the information and military assistance programs but there is continued concern over repeated setbacks on arms standardization and our seeming inability to provide classified information to the Inter-American Defense Board so that it will be in a position to do realistic military planning.

2. Policy considerations

The existing policy appears to be satisfactory.

3. Extent of agency interests

The following agencies have an interest in this report: State, Treasury, Defense, FOA, USIA, Commerce, CIA, ODM and the Export-Import Bank.

4. Emerging problems and future actions

The economic situation in Bolivia and Chile continue to be serious with a further deterioration in Chile. Communism continues a threat to the hemisphere with the most serious problem in Guatemala which affects the whole Central American area and a lesser but growing problem in Brazil. The forthcoming economic conference in Rio de Janeiro will call for a series of decisions on our economic policy.

B. DETAILED DEVELOPMENTS OF MAJOR ACTION

Political

5*(a) Greater Utilization of the Organization of American States (OAS)*—The principal event in our inter-American relations during the period under review was the Tenth Inter-American Conference which met during the month of March in Caracas, Venezuela. This Conference, the supreme organ of the OAS which convenes every five years, dealt with the whole range of Inter-American relations—juridical-political, economic, social, cultural and organizational matters. A brief summary of the action taken at Caracas is attached (Tab A).[5] Communism and economic problems, being the issues of principal concern at the Conference, are discussed in the pertinent sections of this report.

Primary objectives of the United States at Caracas were to quicken Latin American awareness of the dangers of communist penetration in this hemisphere, to obtain agreement on measures to combat it, and to achieve further isolation of Guatemala, as the most significant center of communist influence in the Americas, laying the groundwork for subsequent positive action against Communism in that country through the OAS. The Conference approved a resolution embodying: (1) a clear-cut policy determination that the activities of the international communist movement constitute intervention in American affairs; (2) a recommendation on measures for exposing, and exchanging information on the activities of persons serving the international communist movement; and (3) a declaration that the domination or control of the political institutions of any American State by the international communist movement would call for a meeting of consultation to consider the adoption of appropriate action under existing inter-American treaties. Seventeen of the countries represented at Caracas supported this resolution, Argentina and Mexico abstained, and Guatemala voted against, at the same time denouncing Guatemala's adherence to the anti-communist resolutions adopted at the Bogota (1948) [6] and Washington (1951) Conferences.[7]

The consideration on the resolution, during which the Guatemalan situation loomed in the background but was not brought into the open, except by the Guatemalan delegation's own aggressive attitude, revealed the ambivalent nature of the viewpoints of a considerable number of Latin American delegations toward the communist menace. As a general proposition, a substantial majority were willing to condemn the intervention of international communism and agree that collective action to combat it would be warranted when it gained domination or control over an American State. This disposition was not transferable in the case of every delegation, however, to the specific threat inherent in the Guatemalan situation. It appears from the views expressed that the number of Latin American states (particularly the more influential ones) which at this time regard the growth of communist influence in the Guatemalan Government as a serious threat to their peace and security is not sufficient to bring about OAS action.

In its capacity as member of the Inter-American Peace Committee and as one of the guarantor powers of the Peru–Ecuador boundary, the United States assisted in the establishment of an atmosphere which led to a settlement of two disputes between American states during the period under review. Consideration by the Peace Committee of the Haya de la Torre asylum case,[8] which had been a constant source of friction between Colombia and Peru for the past five years, preceded the conclusion of an agreement between the parties under which Haya de la Torre was permitted to leave Peru. A dispute arising from a frontier violation, involving the trespassing and capture of Peruvian soldiers on Ecuadorian territory, was successfuly terminated through the intervention of the guarantor powers.

5*(b) Consultation with Latin American States*—During the period under review the United States consulted with the Latin American countries, for the purpose of enlisting their support, on several issues before the Eighth Regular Session of the United Nations General Assembly[9] and the Tenth Inter-American Conference which were of major importance to the United States. In the United Nations these involved the items relating to Puerto Rico,[10] Morocco and Tunisia[11] and the Administrative Tribunal Awards.[12] The success of the United States position on each of these matters was attributable in considerable measure to the support received from a substantial number of Latin American states. In preparation for the Tenth Inter-American Conference, United States missions in Latin America were supplied in so far as possible with a general outline of our views on the items on the agenda and instructed to communicate them to the Foreign Office as considered appropriate. Special consultations were held with certain Latin American states regarding our anti-communist resolution. These consultations served to clarify the motives and purpose of the United States proposal and undoubtedly contributed to the size of the affirmative vote which the resolution received.

5*(c) High-Level Consideration of Latin American Problems*—The composition of the United States Delegation to the Tenth Inter-American Conference[13]—which included the Secretary of State, two Senators and six other persons holding top echelon positions in various departments of the Government—marked a further instance of high-level sympathetic attention to Latin American problems. Secretary Dulles spent two weeks in Caracas, during which time he participated fully in the work of the Conference as well as the protocolary activities connected therewith. He also held private talks with a majority of the Foreign Ministers attending the Conference in order to afford them an opportunity to discuss special bilateral problems not directly related to the work of the Conference.

Dr. Milton Eisenhower rendered on November 18 his report to the President on United States-Latin American Relations based on his study trip to the ten countries of South America, during the period June 23–July 29, 1953. This report was referred by the President to all government agencies concerned for comments and suggestions on its implementation. It has been approved in principle by the President. The comments have been received by the Department of State and are now being studied. In anticipation of the Tenth Inter-American Conference at Caracas, and in line with recommendations of the Eisenhower report, however, the Department of State recommended to the Bureau of the Budget that consideration be given to increasing by some $17,000,000 existing programs in Latin America. Aside from continuation of existing programs at the current rate, increases were recommended for the bilateral and OAS technical cooperation programs, the Inter-American Highway and the Rama Road in Nicaragua, a development program in Panama, OAS organizations, the exchange of persons program, American schools in Latin America and the information program. All of these recommendations have not yet been acted on favorably but increased authorizations for the Inter-American Highway and Rama Road have been approved by the Congress, and increased appropriations for the exchange of persons program is now being considered.

During the period under review the acute economic problems confronting Bolivia, Brazil and Chile continued to receive consideration at the highest levels of government. On March 15, 1954 President Eisenhower approved a recommendation, concurred in by the Secretaries of State and Agriculture,[14] the Director of Foreign Operations [15] and the Director of the Budget,[16] that the amount of agricultural commodities being made available to Bolivia be increased by $3 million. This increase was intended to assure that at least minimum supplies of wheat are available during the critical months of the Bolivian winter. The decision was taken in accordance with a basic postulate of our Latin American policy, that in determining the extent of United States assistance, consideration by given to the willingness and ability of the recipient state to cooperate with the United States in achieving common objectives. In recent months the moderate elements have gained increasing strength in the Bolivian government. This trend has manifested itself in the stronger anti-communist stand taken by the President and Foreign Minister, exemplified by Bolivian support for the anti-communist resolution presented by the United States at the Caracas Conference.

Following several months of consideration and negotiation, the United States on March 26, 1954 notified the Chilean Government of its decision to buy 100,000 short tons of Chilean copper. This action provided the Chilean Government with a much-needed breathing spell in a rapidly deteriorating economic situation. Throughout the negotiations the United States sought, in accordance with the postulate stated in the previous paragraph, to couple its offer to purchase copper with promises from Chile to reform the prevailing tax, exchange and sales system relating to copper production in order to place its copper in a competitive position in the world market and to adopt measures to prevent sales to the Soviet bloc. The decision to purchase the copper was taken after a bill, embodying most of the principles favored by the United States, had been submitted to the Chilean Congress and renewed assurances had been obtained, orally and in writing, that Chile would sell copper "from whatever source," and "in all forms," only for shipment and use in the Western world.

An urgent request by Brazil for wheat was met by agreement to negotiate the sale of 100,000 tons of surplus wheat for proceeds derived from the sale to the U.S. of an equivalent value of strategic materials from Brazil. The Department considered it inadvisable at this time to approve a Brazilian proposal to establish a new Cabinet level joint economic commission, but invited Brazil to hold bilateral talks with us on economic problems prior to the forthcoming Rio Conference this fall.

Negotiations with Panama covering the special relationsip arising from the construction and operation of the Panama Canal (discussed in previous progress report [17]) are continuing. The United States has completed its comments on the original Panamanian proposals. The talks are expected to recess shortly for several weeks while the Panamanian delegation returns to Panama for consultations. The Panamanian Delegation professes to find the United States position "too negative." Many of the Panamanian Government's requests were of such a nature that the United States had no alternative but to reject them since they would have impaired our basic jurisdictional rights in the Canal Zone or would have involved the expenditure of large sums of money in Panama's behalf for which no satisfactory justification and/or commitment could be perceived. However, the overall adjustment which the United States Government has told the Panamanian Government that it is prepared to make would be favorable to Panama.

Further gestures of interest and good-will toward Latin America are evidenced by (1) the generally favorable report issued by the Senate

Banking and Currency Committee [18] on the findings of and recommendations reached by the Capehart Mission following its tour through Central and South America; (2) the special missions to the installation of Jose Figueres as President of Costa Rica and the 50th Anniversary celebrations of the founding of the Republic of Panama,[19] headed in each instance by Governor Lodge [20] of Connecticut, as personal representative of the President; and (3) the attendance of Vice-President Nixon at the special session of the Council of the OAS in observance of Pan American Day.

Similar high-level attention in the military field continued during the period under review with the visit of the Minister of War of Colombia [21] to the United States at the invitation of the Department of the Army, a good-will tour of a squadron of U.S. jet military aircraft through Central and South America, and the visit of the aircraft carrier U.S.S. Roosevelt to Brazil, Uruguay, Argentina and Peru.

6*(a) Control of Subversive Activities*—In November and December, 1953 Cuba and Panama, respectively, outlawed communist activities within their jurisdictions.

United States efforts to further the objective of encouraging individual and collective action against communist activities centered on proposing action by the Tenth Inter-American Conference on specific measures which the governments might take in this respect, and on follow-up action to implement this recommendation. In adopting the anti-communist resolution submitted by the United States, the Caracas Conference recommended to the American republics that they give special consideration to the following steps:

1. Measures to require disclosure of the identity, activities and sources of funds, of those who are spreading propaganda of the international communist movement or who travel in the interests of that movement, and of those who act as its agents or in its behalf; and
2. The exchange of information among governments to assist in fulfilling the purpose of the resolutions adopted by the Inter-American Conferences and Meetings of Foreign Ministers regarding international communism.

Following the Conference, United States Missions in all the American republics, except Guatemala, were instructed, in their discretion, to provide the local government with copies of a study,[22] prepared by the Department of State on the attendance of Latin Americans at communist-sponsored conferences, pointing out that the study was being made available in accordance with the Caracas resolution. At the same time the missions were requested to bring to the attention of local governments copies of the United States passport and visa regulations and to encourage them to adopt similar regulations.

6(c) Control of Shipment of Strategic Materials—A shortage of copper in Soviet bloc countries has brought renewed efforts by East–West traders to obtain supplies from Mexico and Chile either directly or by transshipment. Informal arrangements with Mexico's principal copper exporters for screening all questionable transactions have continued effective. Controls in Chile promise to become more effective with the adoption by the Chilean Government of the Import-Certificate-Delivery Verification system. In connection with the recent U.S. agreement to purchase 100,000 short tons of copper for the U.S. stockpile, Chile renewed its promise to restrict sales to the free world by means of a confidential note [23] promising not to sell copper, in any form or from any source, except for shipment to and use in western countries. Chile also agreed to require delivery verification on all shipments in order to prevent transshipments or fraudulent use of documents.

An increasing interest in trade with the Soviet bloc is apparent throughout Latin America, and a number of trade agreements have been negotiated with curtain countries. The commodities covered by agreements concluded so far are not, however, of strategic significance.

Economic

7(a) Encouragement of Private Investment—The outlook for private investment has improved in Argentina and Panama and deteriorated in Costa Rica and the Dominican Republic. Elsewhere there has been little change.

The Argentine Government, and President Peron himself in both confidential and public utterances, has indicated acceptance of the idea that attraction of foreign private capital is essential to Argentine economic development. Argentina had previously enacted an investment law designed to attract foreign private capital. American businessmen, both in Argentina and in the U.S., have expressed reservations as to the overall attractiveness of this legislation, and these reservations have reached the ears of the Argentine Government. As a result, the Argentines have under study modifications designed to satisfy expressed objections, and some changes in the implementing regulations have already been made.

The Panamanian Government is increasingly aware of the need for encouraging private investment. Contracts were signed recently by the municipalities of Colon and Panama City with the American-owned power and light company, ending a long and bitter period of litigation which has had an adverse effect on U.S. investments in Panama. These contracts provide for a moderate lump sum payment to the municipalities by the company in return for exemption from municipal taxation for twenty-five years.

American firms operating in the Dominican Republic have been subjected to increasing harassment and discriminatory treatment in recent months. An official protest was made to the Dominican Government early this year. It was pointed out that the policy would inevitably discourage further investments. Following these representations the position of the American companies concerned has improved somewhat, but the outlook is not encouraging.

Since the inauguration of President Figueres in November 1953 the climate for private investment in Costa Rica has deteriorated. A growing nationalism is evident in new legislation to raise import taxes and in the extreme terms which the Government is trying to force on the United Fruit Company in the renegotiation of its contracts.

The Caracas Conference focused attention on the problem of facilitating the flow of private capital into underdeveloped areas, and the ways in which countries seeking new investments can encourage them. Taxation treaties, in particular, received attention.

Shipping, Aviation and Telecommunication—The outlook for United States shipping lines operating to Latin America continues to improve. Legislation in the United States and Brazilian congresses is now in the final stages looking toward the completion of the major aspects of the U.S.-Brazilian shipping program, which should eliminate the basis for discrimination against U.S. shipping lines. The problem regarding the discrimination, by the Chilean Government, on cargoes moving from the west coast of the U.S. continues. It is believed that negotiations now under way will assist in correcting this situation.

The civil aviation agreement with the Government of Venezuela has been ratified, and the services envisaged under this agreement have been put into operation. However, the United States still has some outstanding problems in the aviation field in Brazil, Colombia and Mexico.

In the field of telecommunications, the North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement, which was signed in 1950,[24] is still before the U.S. Senate for consent to ratification. A meeting with representatives of the Government of Mexico looking toward the working out of an interim agreement on telecommunication matters closed on April 2,[25] after a week's discussion, without arriving at any agreement. Another meeting is scheduled in Mexico City in October 1954.

The second meeting of the Interim Committee of the Pan American Highway Congress, which is working on the plans and agenda for the 6th Pan American Highway Congress to be held in Caracas in July,[26] is completing its work. The U.S. was able to secure acceptance of the major portion of its proposals for this meeting.

7*(b) International Bank and Export-Import Bank Loans*—Loans authorized by the International Bank and the Export-Import Bank for the five month period November 15, 1953–April 15, 1954 totaled $69.926 million, with an additional $18 million pending. This is roughly equivalent to the quarterly rate of lending throughout the period 1949–52, $63.7 million, and indicates a slowing down of loan activities of the Export-Import Bank.

Loans authorized by the IBRD totaled about $51.5 millions, distributed as follows: [27]

		$ millions
Brazil	Railway construction	$12.5
	Electric power	28.8
Ecuador	Highways	8.5
Peru	Agricultural machinery	1.7
		$51.5

The following credit is under negotiation by the Bank and the NAC has advised the US Executive Director [28] that it has no objection to its favorable consideration:

		$ millions
		$18.0

[26] The sixth Pan American Highway Congress convened at Caracas, July 11–23, 1954; the final report of the U.S. Delegation, dated Sept. 1, 1954, is filed under 398.2612 IA/9–1454. For text of the final act of the Congress, see Sexta Congreso Panamericana de Carreteras: Acta Final (Caracas, 1954).

[27] For additional information on the following loans, see the documentation concerning U.S. relations with Brazil, Ecuador, and Peru.

[28] Andrew N. Overby.

Loans made by the Export Import Bank, listed below, are principally small exporters credits: [29]

		$ millions
Argentine*	Locomotives	$2.520
Brazil	Textile machinery	.705
Chile	Railway equipment	.072
Cuba	Power	12.000
Colombia*	Textile machinery	1.000
Mexico	Textile machinery	.054
Uruguay†	Steel mill expansion	2.475
		$18.426

The Export-Import Bank has also allocated $2.5 million out of previously authorized credits for the improvement of airports in Ecuador.

7(c) Economic Assistance to Latin America—The Executive Branch has requested the Congress to appropriate $23.5 millions for bilateral technical cooperation programs in Latin America and $1.5 millions for the program of the OAS for fiscal year 1955. Funds in the amount of $9 millions to continue the economic grant program to Bolivia have also been requested.

The Congress is considering the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the Inter-American Highway and $1,000,000 for the Rama Road in the regular appropriation for fiscal year 1955, and a request will also be made to the Congress for the supplemental appropriation of $5,000,000 for the Inter-American Highway. In April the Congress, in the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1954,[30] authorized a total of $40,000,000 in addition to the sums heretofore authorized for the Inter-American Highway. Likewise an additional $4,000,000 was authorized by the Congress to be appropriated to complete the Rama Road.

7(d) Improving Trade Outlook for Latin American Export Commodities—The United States has done little during the period under review to facilitate sales of Latin American products in the U.S. Our overall relations with Argentina have definitely suffered as a result of U.S. trade restrictions and U.S. agricultural surplus disposal programs.

Chile's copper export problem was relieved materially by the U.S. agreement to purchase 100,000 short tons of copper at current world prices. Stocks of about 80,000 tons remain unsold, however.

Uruguay's wool tops may now enter the U.S. under a countervailing duty of only 6% in place of 18% as a result of a recent Department of the Treasury decision to reduce the duty. Imports of tops have been very small since the duty was first imposed last year, and it is doubtful that the duty adjustment will provide any great stimulus.

Bolivia has been informed that barring Congressional action to extend the operations of the Texas City Smelter, the U.S. is not interested in purchasing additional tin ores from Bolivia at the present time.

Argentina has suffered from the imposition by the U.S. in December of an import quota on oats which bore most heavily on Argentina and required cancelation of existing contracts. Imposition of a quota on imports of tung nuts and oil, now under consideration, would also be a matter of serious concern to Argentina and Paraguay. Contemplated restrictions on the importation of rye would also limit Argentina's markets.

Argentina, and other Latin American exporters of grain and dairy products, have expressed grave concern lest the expanded U.S. surplus disposal program [31] now under consideration endanger their export markets.

One favorable development in the Latin American export picture is the increase in coffee prices, which may net the coffee exporting countries a billion dollars or more in excess of their returns from that product last year. About two-thirds of this will be dollar exchange. Latin America's exports to the U.S. in 1953 were valued at $3.4 billions of which about $1.5 billions represented sales of coffee. An increase of a billion dollars, distributed among sixteen countries, would bring material improvement in Latin America's capacity to finance its own economic development.

8. Monetary Stabilization and Fiscal Reforms—Early in 1954 Peru requested a loan from the United States Treasury for the purpose of halting the decline of the sol. Heavy government investment in development projects, declining prices for its exports, and undiminished demand for imports resulted in pronounced weakness in the exchange value of the sol during the last six months of 1953 and early 1954. The Peruvian Government, in the belief that the sol had declined beyond its true value as the result of speculation and undue pessimism, sought financial aid from the U.S. Government, the International Monetary Fund and private institutions to restore confidence in the sol.

Recognizing that Peru's basic economy was sound, that anti-inflationary measures had been introduced in recent months, and that the decline of the sol had fostered strong internal criticism of Peru's liberal trade and monetary policies, the United States Treasury made a $12½ millions stabilization loan to Peru.[32] The IMF granted Peru a like amount, while Chase National Bank provided $5 millions. As a result of these loans Peru announced its determination not to reestablish exchange and trade controls, and to continue its liberal trade and monetary policies as the best means to foster foreign private investment and economic development.

Chile, in October 1953, declared to the IMF a new par value of 110 pesos to the dollar in place of the former par rate of 31 pesos which was accepted by the IMF. Chile applied late in 1953 for a drawing of $25 million from the IMF but was granted only $12.5 million. In addition the Government borrowed $12.5 million in December 1953 from the National City Bank to meet Government year-end obligations. In spite of this the financial situation is deteriorating rapidly. Through 1953 living costs increased at the rate of about 4½% a month, and the free market rate for the peso continues to deteriorate. Partly to strengthen the Chilean economy and to obtain improved treatment of U.S. copper companies operating in Chile, the U.S. agreed to purchase 100,000 short tons of Chilean copper at the market price for the strategic stockpile. The Chilean Government, on its part, has introduced legislation providing more favorable tax rates for the American copper companies and authorizing them to use the free bank rate of 110 pesos per dollar instead of the present rate of 19.37 pesos for conversion of dollars spent in Chile to cover costs of producing copper. The measure would also return to the companies a greater degree of control over sales, which would help us prevent diversion to the Soviet bloc.

At Costa Rica's request FOA sent a tax consultant to that country temporarily to assist in a proposed revision of the tax system and plans to furnish one on a permanent basis at a later date.

Argentina is not a member of the International Bank (IBRD) or the International Monetary Fund. The President of the Bank [33] and several assistants recently made an informal visit to Argentina,[34] and conversations with Argentine officials left the impression that Argentina had some interest in joining the Bank but had reservations about subjecting itself to the control of the International Monetary Fund.

The IBRD has assigned a permanent representative to Panama to assist that Government in carrying out fiscal and economic reforms which the Bank has recommended.

On April 17, the Mexican Government announced a change in its monetary exchange rate from 8.65 to 12.50 pesos to the dollar. The International Monetary Fund concurred in the action. The United States Stabilization agreement with Mexico remains in force.

Information and Related Activities

9. In view of the reduction in funds available for the information program in Latin American reported in the Second Progress Report, programs in the smaller countries have been reduced to the minimum while those in the larger countries are now operating on a more restricted basis. Reprogramming is taking place to direct the limited resources available at only the most critical psychological problems and to selective groups for maximum impact.

Steps are well advanced toward instituting effective information and educational exchange programs in dependent areas in the Caribbean, particularly British Guiana and British Honduras.

Continued attention to the Bolivian problem in conjunction with the aid program discussed above appears to have achieved positive results in the form of recognition of communist danger to Bolivia and the gradual change in position of the Bolivian Government, with the backing of reputable information media in the country, to a stronger public anti-communist position.

Increased anti-American sentiment in Brazil, the deteriorating political situation, coupled with increasingly effective communist activities, have been the occasion for making increased information facilities available in that country and work is under way to provide materials especially designed to promote a better understanding of the U.S. economic policy vis-à-vis Brazil.

The Soviet effort to purchase Chilean copper, and delay in reaching an agreement for the purchase of 100,000 tons of that copper, created a serious psychological problem not only in Chile but in other countries of Latin America where the Soviets are playing heavily and effectively on the theme of increased trade with Iron Curtain countries. Our ability to deal with this problem was limited because of delicate negotiations which made it impossible to present the facts and state our position to the Chilean people without a serious clash with high officials of the Chilean Government. As a result the U.S. position was widely misunderstood.

Efforts are being made through the information program and diplomatic channels to discredit and possibly force cancellation of forthcoming communist sponsored youth festivals in Chile [35] and Guatemala [36] and the Conference of American Women in Rio de Janeiro.[37]

Some effective work was done in connection with staving off attempted communist infiltration of the Second Congress of Latin American Universities.[38] Because of budgetary limitations the exchange of persons program was able to bring to the United States only about 158 persons from the Latin American area which compared to approximately 1,000 who went to Iron Curtain countries under the auspices of communists in 1953.

Beyond normal anti-communist activities carried on in all countries, special attention was given to the situation in Guatemala and its effects in other countries of the hemisphere. With the "discovery" by the Guatemalan Government of the alleged "plot" to overthrow that Government in January, and the expulsion of journalists and radio commentators from the country, effective work was accomplished in identifying the Government with communist objectives. Senator Wiley's [39] speech given on January 14,[40] was particularly effective in forming opinion among responsible people in Latin America. Despite these and other efforts, however, Guatemalan propaganda efforts played on old alleged wrongs and raised doubt in the minds of Latin American officials and private citizens as to United States motives regarding Guatemala. Many believe that the U.S. (1) is interested principally in pushing claims of the United Fruit Company and (2) is overly concerned with communism in Latin America despite efforts of the information program to meet these two problems. Communist-front "Friends of Guatemala Societies" were established in a number of countries and little headway was made in discrediting these organizations.

Plans are under way to create among the people of Latin America a better understanding of the U.S. economic system particularly in view of the forthcoming economic conference in Rio de Janeiro, because a lack of understanding of U.S. economic policy is one of the most serious causes for lack of improvement in U.S.-Latin American relations.

The Eisenhower Report was given heavy attention throughout the area with reaction uniformly good but anticipation continued regarding its implementation.

A number of cultural events in the U.S. were heavily exploited for the purpose of emphasizing our continued interest in Latin America and the cultural maturity of the U.S.

Action was taken during and after the Caracas Conference, to make the U.S. position better known in Latin America and to create an atmosphere favorable to the adoption and implementation of an anti-communist resolution with some evidence of effectiveness.

Military

Military Assistance Program: The Executive Branch has requested the Congress to appropriate an additional $13 millions for grant military assistance to Latin America for fiscal year 1955. In addition, unexpended balances from appropriations which for fiscal years 1952–54 totaled approximately $101.9 millions would be continued available, if the request is approved.

A military assistance agreement was signed with Nicaragua on April 23, 1954 [41] making a total of nine Latin American countries with which the United States has such agreements. Negotiations with Honduras for a similar agreement were planned for early May.[42] El Salvador has indicated some interest in an agreement but is reluctant to consider negotiations until after the May national elections.[43]

Cuba and Uruguay have not made local currency available to establish MAAGs in those countries. Equipment is being sent to Cuba, however, where United States Armed Services missions are handling the program. Only Air Force equipment is being sent to Uruguay, where an Air Force mission is maintained. Navy equipment will be sent when United States naval personnel are on hand to receive it. Shipments valued at $24.6 millions, as of January 31, 1954, have been made to the countries participating in the program, except Nicaragua.

The Department of Defense proposed, and the Department of State concurred on February 16 in a recommendation, that Haiti be included in the program, but the recommendation has not been sent to the President for the necessary finding of eligibility under the Mutual Security Act [44] pending formal approval by the Department of Defense.

16. In pursuance of the policy of assisting "in the protection of sources and processing facilities of strategic materials" military staff discussions with Venezuela are still under consideration. Prospects for successful military staff discussions with Venezuela have dimmed again with a decision by that country to purchase French rather than United States tanks for its Army. It appears likely that this decision was as much the result of graft as pique over United States prices, delivery and credit terms.

18*a*. United States participation and leadership in the activities of the Inter-American Defense Board have been impaired as a result of the inability of the United States to furnish classified information to an international organization whose membership includes Guatemala. The most recent instance of this was a decision by the State–Defense Military Information Control Committee which declined to approve the release of classified information which was to be used by the Board for a defense estimate of the situation. Such an estimate is considered essential prior to consideration of a revision of the general military plan.

Haiti and Nicaragua have approved the General Military Plan for the Defense of the American Continent. Other countries which have approved the plan are Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Honduras, Peru, United States and Uruguay.

The Chairman of the Board, Lieutenant General Howard A. Craig (USAF) has completed a series of visits [45] to each Latin American country to discuss with local defense officials activities of the Board and to encourage more active support of the Board and its work.

A new Combined Board on Defense, Brazil–United States is to be established as soon as a decision is made by the United States as to whether foreign office representatives of the two governments are to be members of the Board. The Board would meet annually, alternating between Washington and Rio de Janeiro. It would make recommendations on defense plans of concern to the two governments and coordinate the work of the Joint Brazil–United States Military Commission in Rio de Janeiro and the Joint Brazil–United States Defense Commission in Washington.

[45] Between Nov. 17 and Dec. 5, 1953, Lieutenant General Craig visited Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay, Peru, and Uruguay; pertinent documents are in file 397.5 IA.

Between Feb. 15 and Mar. 2, 1954, he visited Colombia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panamá, and Venezuela; pertinent documents are in file 711.5820.

Salvador, Air Force;[46] Honduras, Army and Air Force. An Army Mission Agreement was signed with Nicaragua and a Mission established in that country.

Extensions of the following Agreements are being negotiated: Bolivia, Air Force; Brazil, Navy; Colombia, Army, Navy and Air Force; Ecuador, Army and Air Force; Mexico, Air Force; Paraguay, Army and Air Force and Peru, Army.

Extensions of the Army and Navy Mission Agreements with Bolivia and Venezuela, respectively, are being considered by the appropriate Armed Service. The status of Army and Air Force Missions in Guatemala is under review but for the present remains the same.

18*d.* Colombia continues to be the only Latin American country participating "in the United Nations action in Korea." Legislation which would permit the President to settle at less than full reimbursement logistical support bills of countries with forces in Korea, including Colombia's bill which is now approximately $11.5 millions has been prepared but has not been submitted to the Congress because the Department of Defense has not concurred and there is some doubt as to the advisability of submitting the legislation at this time. In the meantime, no action is being taken to settle Colombia's bill which remains unpaid.

18*e.* In pursuance of the policy of "ultimate standardization" of military equipment in Latin America along United States lines, fifteen jet and six support aircraft of the United States Air Force visited the following Latin American countries during the period January 16–February 14, 1954: Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Uruguay and Venezuela. Defense officials of countries not visited attended the demonstrations in the Canal Zone.

The tour was warmly received, was highly successful and appears to have created a greater respect for United States defense capabilities and our leadership in the free world. Reports have all been laudatory of the jet demonstrations and the conduct of the Air Force personnel making the tour indicating that it materially enhanced the prestige of the United States Air Force Missions and other personnel of the Air Force in Latin America and created a favorable impression in Latin America of the United States Air Force. An estimated 2,500,000 Latin Americans witnessed the demonstrations which were staged in all countries visited by the jets. Latin American newspaper coverage was extensive and favorable, evidencing a genuine friendship for the United States and the effectiveness of United States Information Agency operations in Latin America. Communist efforts to discredit the tour were singularly unsuccessful.

[46] For text of the exchange of notes, signed at San Salvador, Dec. 2, 1953, and Mar. 11, 1954, and entered into force on the latter date (operative retroactively to Dec. 31, 1953), extending the agreement of Aug. 19, 1947, providing for the services of a U.S. military aviation mission to El Salvador, see TIAS No. 2933 or 5 UST 416.

As a result of the tour Colombia has purchased six T–33 jet trainer aircraft and other Latin American countries have expressed an interest in purchasing United States jet aircraft. But as a general matter efforts to further standardization have met with further setbacks, significant instances being the purchase of French tanks by Venezuela and British jets by Chile. Approval of pending legislation should help solve the problem of better credit terms and consideration is being given to revising procedures for processing reimbursable assistance requests because existing procedures appear to be a contributing factor to the present unsatisfactory situation.

C. POLICY CONSIDERATIONS

The existing policy appears to be satisfactory and to require no revisions at this time. The Department of Defense is, however, concerned over the implementation of the policy with respect to the Inter-American Defense Board (paragraph 18*a.*) and standardization (paragraph 18*e*). That Department believes United States leadership in the Inter-American Defense Board is impaired as a result of our inability to furnish classified information to the Board while Guatemala is a member. The Department of Defense is also concerned over continued substantial purchases of military equipment from non-United States sources which adversely affect efforts to standardize military equipment in Latin America. A study of these two problems is suggested by the Department of Defense.

D. EXTENT OF AGENCY INTERESTS

The following agencies are informed of national policy on Latin America by having copies of NSC 144/1 furnished to them:

> State, Defense, Foreign Operations Administration, Treasury, Office of Defense Mobilization, Central Intelligence Agency, and Bureau of the Budget.

The following agencies participated in the preparations for the Tenth Inter-American Conference and/or were represented on the United States Delegation to the Conference:

> State; Treasury; Defense; Justice; Interior; Commerce; Agriculture; Labor; Health, Education and Welfare; United States Information Agency; Foreign Operations Administration; Export–Import Bank; Housing and Home Finance Agency; Tariff Commission and Federal Reserve Board.

The decision to purchase copper from Chile was made by the Office of Defense Mobilization.

Action on control of subversive activities is based in part on information furnished by the Central Intelligence Agency.

Action on control of the shipment of strategic materials is the responsibility of the Foreign Operations Administration which also administers the bilateral and technical cooperation program.

Shipping, aviation and communication matters are of interest to the Department of Commerce, Civil Aeronautics Authority and Federal Communications Commission, respectively.

Any financial matter reported on is of concern to those agencies which are members of the National Advisory Council.

The section in this report on information and related activities has been discussed with the United States Information Agency.

The military section of this report was made available in draft to the Department of Defense and through it to the three Armed Services. Their comments were taken into consideration in the report.

E. EMERGING PROBLEMS AND FUTURE ACTIONS

The principle emerging problems or those which may require future action are receiving consideration by the appropriate agencies.

The serious economic situation in Bolivia appears to be somewhat ameliorated but is by no means solved and requires very careful watching. While our purchase of Chilean copper should give Chile a breathing spell, heroic measures are required to correct the deteriorating economic situation in that country and it is doubtful that the present administration there will cope effectively with the problem.

Communism continues to be a threat to the security of the hemisphere. While it constitutes a problem in most of the countries of the hemisphere it is particularly serious in Guatemala and the focus of communism in that country, if not actually responsible for is at least materially contributing to, the unsettled political situation in Central America. The political situation in Brazil continues to be uneasy because of a not too satisfactory economic situation which is being capitalized on by the communists in their current strong bid for official status in that country.

The forthcoming economic conference at Rio de Janeiro in the fall will require a series of decisions on our economic policy.

F. SPECIAL ANNEXES

There is attached as an annex to this report a "Brief Report on the Tenth Inter-American Conference." [47]

Editorial Note

In a memorandum to Mr. Bowie, dated June 15, 1954, not printed, Mr. Halle stated that shortly after the Tenth Inter-American Conference at Caracas in March 1954, the National Security Council had raised the question with the Department of State whether a revision of NSC 144/1 was in order, and that the Department, on the recommendation of the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, had at the time advised that a revision was unnecessary. Mr. Halle further stated that a revision would now be "desirable" because it could take into account Dr. Milton Eisenhower's report to President Eisenhower on United States-Latin American relations and studies concerning Latin America prepared in the Department since the adoption of NSC 144/1. (S/P–NSC files, lot 61 D 167, NSC 144/1)

At a meeting on June 15, 1954, the NSC Planning Board discussed the possible preparation of a revision of NSC 144/1, and agreement was reached that such revision should be undertaken during late July or August, on the basis of draft recommendations to be submitted by the Department of State. Drafts of proposed revisions were considered at NSC Planning Board meetings on August 9, 12, and 16, 1954. On the latter date, the Planning Board adopted a draft of amendments to NSC 144/1, and approved its submission, as revised, to the National Security Council for consideration. The amendments were incorporated into NSC 144/1, and subsequently submitted to the Council as NSC 5432, not printed, under date of August 18, 1954. (S/P–NSC files, lot 62 D 1, Records of NSC Planning Board meetings) For the text of NSC 144/1, see page 6.

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 31, 1954.

Subject: Briefing for Council Meeting on NSC 5432 "United States Policy Toward Latin America",[2] Thursday, September 2, 1954

There are three main points at issue in this paper to which I would like to call your attention.

1. Trade Policy—The paper as now proposed states that the U.S. should adopt stable, long-term trading policies with respect to Latin American countries including gradual selective reduction of U.S. barriers and tariffs on trade. There is some possibility that the Treasury representative may wish to change this to gradual selective "revision", that being the word used in the President's message to Congress on foreign economic policy. The whole context of the President's message establishes that by "revision" he meant "reduction" and not simply change upward or downward. Maintenance of stable trade relations is the most important single factor in our total relations with Latin America. It was Dr. Eisenhower's No. 1 recommendation regarding economic cooperation.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Cale and Norman M. Pearson of the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs.

2. Loan Policy—The paper as now proposed would state that the U.S. should be prepared to assure the financing of all sound economic development projects, for which private capital or IBRD financing is not available, through Export-Import Bank loans, subject to certain specified conditions. The Treasury representative is likely to urge that this be changed to "assist in the financing of" such projects. I hope that you will vigorously oppose the Treasury viewpoint, especially since this is the one instance in which it may be possible for us to make any significant advance of position at Rio over that which we took at Caracas. It is estimated that loans meeting the very strict criteria, which are enumerated on page 1 and also in paragraph 9*b* on page 8 of the document, will not amount to more than $200 million per year, on the average. In my judgment it is imperative to the success of the Rio Conference that we positively assure either that (1) we will finance all loans meeting those standards, or (2) that we will do so up to some such figure as $1 billion over the next five years.

3. Stockpile Policy—FOA and ODM have proposed an addition to the statement which would broaden the present stockpile policy to permit acquisition of non-deteriorating reserves beyond the present strategic reserves for strictly defense uses. In view of the importance of minerals production to the Latin American countries and of the adverse effect which decreased stockpile purchases will have on them, we believe that NSC should study this matter in all of its ramifications, but do not recommend approval of the ODM–FOA proposal in its present form.

Our positions relating to the other parts of the proposed paper are outlined in Tab A.[3] The EUR position relating to Canada is stated in Tab B.[3]

Memorandum of Discussion at the 212th Meeting of the National Security Council on Thursday, September 2, 1954 [1]

TOP SECRET EYES ONLY

Present at this meeting were the Vice President of the United States,[2] presiding; the Acting Secretary of State; the Acting Secretary of Defense; the Director, Foreign Operations Administration; and the Director, Office of Defense Mobilization. Also present were the Acting Secretary of the Treasury; the Acting Attorney General (for Item 1); Assistant Secretary Anderson for the Secretary of Commerce (for Item 3); the Director, Bureau of the Budget; Assistant Secretary of State Holland (for Items 2 and 3); Assistant Attorney General Tompkins (for Item 1); the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff; the Acting Director of Central Intelligence; Robert Cutler, Special Assistant to the President; Robert R. Bowie, Department of State; the NSC Representative on Internal Security (for Item 1); the Acting Executive Secretary, NSC; and the Coordinator, NSC Planning Board Assistants.

There follows a summary of the discussion at the meeting and the main points taken.

[Here follows discussion concerning organizational arrangements for internal security and also significant world developments affecting United States security.]

3. U.S. policy toward Latin America (NSC 5432; [3] NSC 5419/1; [4] NSC 144/1; Annex to NSC 144)

Mr. Cutler briefed the Council on the background and content of NSC 5432. He pointed out that the Planning Board had intensively reviewed a March 1953 statement of policy toward Latin America (NSC 144/1) in the light of recent developments. In this review the Planning Board had had two basic objectives in mind: (1) to recommend the additional U.S. efforts needed to strengthen the hemisphere against extra-hemisphere infiltration and to reverse those trends which offer opportunities for Communist penetration, and (2) to recommend decisions which should be taken in order that the U.S. might have an effective position at the economic conference in Rio on November 22.

[3] The text of the draft statement of policy designated NSC 5432, dated Aug. 18, 1954, is identical to that of NSC 5432/1, dated Sept. 3, 1954, p. 81, with the exception of the amendments adopted as a result of this meeting, and additional amendments to paragraph 9, sections (b), (c), and (g) adopted subsequently at the 224th meeting of the National Security Council, held Nov. 15, 1954. The additional amendments are explicated in footnote 2, p. 83.

[4] NSC 5419/1, titled "United States Policy in the Event of Guatemalan Aggression in Latin America", dated May 28, 1954, is printed on p. 1135.

Mr. Cutler asked the Council to look first at a provisional draft of the Financial Appendix [5] on Latin America circulated at the meeting (copy filed in the minutes of the meeting). He read the totals in Table I, and called attention to some of the principal items of expenditure, such as technical assistance and military assistance.

The Vice President, referring to page 9 of the Financial Appendix, noted that under the educational exchange program only 165 grants were made in FY 1954. He asked whether this was the total for all of Latin America. Mr. Cutler replied in the affirmative, but called attention to the fact that the State Department provides grant-in-aid to the American Council on Education to help American-sponsored schools in Latin America. The Vice President said he felt it was important to do a great deal more in the educational exchange field.

Mr. Cutler then read the "Major Points in Proposed Revision of NSC 144/1" (pages 1–3 of NSC 5432).[6] He noted that Assistant Secretary of State Holland was present at the meeting as Chairman of the Interdepartmental Cabinet Committee preparing for the Rio conference. Mr. Cutler said he had also received the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (copy [7] filed in the minutes of the meeting), who were in general agreement with NSC 5432 subject to certain suggested changes which could be taken up during the Council's paragraph-by-paragraph consideration of the paper.

Finally, Mr. Cutler said he had requested and had just received Dr. Milton Eisenhower's comments (copy [8] filed in the minutes of the meeting), which he read to the Council.

Secretary Smith said he would like to start the discussion by relating an Army experience. He once knew a Colonel who issued a great many detailed orders, and who always ended with a paragraph which said "This order will be obeyed." Secretary Smith felt that NSC 5432 contained an adequate U.S. program toward Latin America provided it is carried out. In other words, it is a good order, but the order must be obeyed. In the past our performance in Latin America, particularly in economic matters, has been largely verbal. The Rio conference will be an economic conference pure and simple, and we must follow it up with adequate performance.

The Vice President asked who would represent us at Rio. Secretary Smith said we would be represented by a strong contingent, and he would be glad to give the Vice President a complete roster of the delegation.[9] He said that trade, government credit, and price stabilization would be the principal topics at Rio, and that if we handled these matters properly we had an opportunity to improve our relationships with the countries of Latin America. Secretary Smith said that Mexico was a case in point. Our relations with Mexico had been very bad until recently, but were now improving as a result of four developments: (1) Mexican public opinion had reacted strongly against the Mexican Government's stand on the anti-Communist resolution at Caracas; (2) Mexican public opinion had reacted strongly against currency devaluation; (3) the International Bank had recently made loans to Mexico which were interpreted in that country as indicating a friendly U.S. attitude; and (4) the President had decided to reject an increase in the tariff on lead and zinc.[10] Secretary Smith said he had talked about Mexico to show that a relatively small number of actions by the U.S. could produce a change in our relations with another country. He felt that if NSC 5432 were adopted and implemented it would produce favorable reactions throughout the hemisphere. But, he added, the paper must be implemented; that is, the order must be obeyed.

Turning to paragraph 4–b,[11] Secretary Smith noted that there was a difference of opinion as to whether economic development in Latin America should be "accelerated". He regarded the word "accelerated" as misleading, because Latin America had gone through an enormous acceleration of its economic development since the war, and it might be impossible to accelerate this development any more.

Governor Stassen said that FOA had joined with ODM in proposing the word "accelerated". He would not insist upon any particular word in this paragraph, but he did want to state at this point his general views on economic development in Latin America. FOA, he continued, is in the position of being more directly concerned than some other departments with the economic outlook in Latin America. He considered the Latin American situation serious and our program to meet it inadequate. He cited the following as factors which led him to conclude that the situation is serious:

1. The population in Latin America is growing at the rate of 2½% per year (one of the highest rates in the world), but gross national product is increasing at a rate of only 1% per year in an area where the standard of living has always been very low.

[9] A list of the members of the U.S. Delegation to the Rio Conference is printed in the Department of State Bulletin, Nov. 29, 1954, pp. 837–838.

[10] Documentation on this subject is included in volume I.

[11] The text of the referenced paragraph reads as follows: "An orderly political, military, and [an orderly, accelerated] economic development in Latin America so that the states in the area will be more effective members of the hemisphere system and increasingly important participants in the affairs of the free world." The text indicates that the bracketed alternative language was an "FOA and ODM proposal".

2. The rate of capital investment in Latin America is too low; indeed, there has been a net outflow of capital from the area in the past year, a development which has multiplied inflationary pressures.

On the basis of these factors Governor Stassen concluded that an explosive situation was developing in Latin America. He thought we were in a rut with respect to that area; that is, we never seem to make any dramatic moves there. We had greatly improved the situation in Iran by the expenditure of a modest sum of money,[12] and Governor Stassen thought similar action was urgently needed in Latin America to check inflation, attract capital, and build confidence in the future. The courses of action in NSC 5432 were good, but inadequate. Governor Stassen wished to refer particularly to Export–Import Bank loans and International Bank loans to Latin America. He said that from February 1953 to the present, Export–Import Bank loans to all of Latin America had totalled only $35 million. The tragic inadequacy of such loans indicated to him that we must shake off our lethargy and really do something. He felt the Rio conference would be the time to act.

The Vice President asked how the $35 million in loans to Latin America compared with other areas of the world. Governor Stassen replied that this total was below that for other areas, both absolutely and relatively. He added that the argument was sometimes made that capital would be invested in Latin America if a "favorable climate for investment" existed. He agreed that a favorable climate was necessary, but thought it could only be created by U.S. governmental action. Although such action would cost money, it would be a good investment in terms of realizing our objectives in Latin America. Governor Stassen said he was willing to drop the FOA proposal in paragraph 4–b, but wished to emphasize again that U.S. economic policy toward Latin America must be reversed.

Secretary Smith said his views in general were in accord with those of Governor Stassen. However, he was compelled to differ with Governor Stassen on several points, including the question of procedure. For example, he felt the tactics which had been successful in Iran could not be applied to Latin America. Moreover, he felt Congress would not appropriate enough funds for a large economic aid program. Governor Stassen was inclined to think that Congress would appropriate funds for Latin America more readily than for any other area in the world. Mr. Hughes said he was convinced that the U.S. could not afford to substitute government aid and capital for private investment. He was sure the recent flight of capital from Latin America was due to restrictions and fear in that area. He felt that private investment would flow into Latin America if a favorable climate for investment could be created. Governor Stassen said it would be impossible, in his view, to change the present "climate" in Latin America without U.S. Government action. He agreed that if the climate were changed as a result of U.S. public funds, then private capital would be attracted to the area.

Dr. Flemming called attention to the serious economic situation which might be created in Latin America by a cessation of stockpile purchases.[13] He recalled that a year ago the Council had been very much disturbed by the situation in Bolivia when we found that we could not buy any more tin. Bolivia was now the only country in Latin America receiving economic assistance, but other countries might be in the same position when the U.S. reached its stockpile objectives. He suggested that we should prepare now for the time when Latin American countries will lose their stockpile market in the United States. Otherwise we would be under heavy pressure for economic aid or continued stockpile purchases beyond our needs.

The Vice President asked what issues at the Rio conference required U.S. decisions at the present time. Secretary Smith said that NSC 5432, if approved, would provide an adequate basis for the U.S. position at Rio. He then summarized the issues expected to arise at the Rio conference, as follows:

1. The problem of trade barriers is most important. If we can convince Latin America that our policy is gradual selective reduction of trade barriers, Latin America will be satisfied.

2. Latin Americans are very much concerned about our loan policy, and we must convince them that we will adopt a more liberal policy than we have followed in the past. There is no great demand for a grant-aid or soft-loan [14] program, but the State Department would like to have authority to make soft loans in case the need for them arose. The Vice President asked whether State would also like authority to provide grant aid. Secretary Smith said yes, in small amounts to meet emergencies.

3. Price stabilization—that is, the establishment of minimum prices for Latin American exports—might be demanded at Rio. However, we would not incur much ill will by refusing to agree to price stabilization, since our probable refusal to agree is already well understood in Latin America.

4. Latin Americans want continued technical assistance, and we should be able to satisfy them on this point.

Secretary Smith then called attention to paragraph 5–i,[15] which provided for encouraging the incorporation of Canada into the Organization of American States. He felt that Canadian membership would not be an unmixed blessing. Consequently, he proposed that the paragraph be deleted or, alternatively, be revised to indicate that we would have a receptive attitude toward a Canadian desire to join the OAS. The Vice President suggested that if we didn't want Canada in the OAS it would be preferable to delete the paragraph.

Secretary Overby expressed great concern with respect to paragraph 9-a,[16] which provided for gradual selective reduction of U.S. barriers and tariffs on trade. He said this was the first policy statement which came out flatly for gradual and selective reduction without any qualification. The President's message [17] on the Randall Report [18] had used the word "revision", not "reduction", and had asked for authority to reduce tariffs in accordance with the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act.[19] In the light of the President's message, Secretary Overby felt that we should qualify gradual selective reduction by the phrase "pursuant to the trade agreement program and established practice."

Secretary Smith said he favored paragraph 9-a as written because gradual selective reduction was what we wanted. He felt the President wanted a reduction of tariff barriers, and he was reluctant to add qualifications to the policy of reduction.

In response to an inquiry from Mr. Cutler, Secretary Holland said that the Interdepartmental Cabinet Committee had studied trade barriers for a long time, and had reached the conclusion that the U.S. could not carry out its policies in Latin America unless the countries of the area believed we would permit them to trade with us. He felt that the reduction of barriers to hemisphere trade was the single most important point in our policy.

Secretary Overby said that paragraph 9-a went farther than the President's message, and that his amendment was designed to include by implication the qualifications of the President's message.

The Vice President said we should shake ourselves out of our lethargy and make a bold statement. He added that of course we would follow established practices and the statutes, but he preferred paragraph 9-a as written. Mr. Cutler said the Planning Board deliberately made the paragraph blunt in order to raise the issue. The Vice President suggested that the Council might adopt paragraph 9–a as written and then call the President's attention to any differences between it and his message.

Assistant Secretary of Commerce Anderson expressed some anxiety about the broad language in paragraph 9–a. For example, he felt it might be interpreted as a mandate for raising the Peruvian sugar quotas, a problem which would soon come up. The Vice President said the paragraph had built-in escape clauses, such as "selective" and "gradual". We talk a good game, he added, but we don't do much, and if we make errors we should make them on the side of vigorous action.

Secretary Smith said he favored the paragraph as written because he needed all the ammunition he could get when he started discussions with the Bureau of the Budget and the Treasury Department.

Mr. Cutler summarized the decision of the Council by saying that paragraph 9–a would remain unchanged but would be brought to the President's attention as suggested by the Vice President.

Mr. Cutler then called attention to the alternative versions of paragraph 9–b.[20] He said the majority of the Planning Board wished to "assure the financing of all sound economic development projects", while Treasury wished to "assist in the financing of" such projects. Secretary Overby said that under the statutes and established practice, the Export–Import Bank could only participate in financing such projects. He felt the paragraph went far beyond Export–Import Bank practice and policy, and he had taken the liberty of speaking to General Edgerton, who would prefer that the paragraph read "assure participation in the financing".

Secretary Holland said the discussions in his committee had identified three levels of Government financing for Latin America: (1) a very restricted policy of Export–Import Bank loans; (2) a middle-of-the-road approach along the lines of NSC 5432, an approach which would, in his view, assure the success of the Rio meeting; and (3) the liberal policy described earlier in the meeting by Governor Stassen. Secretary Holland added that he would agree 100% with Governor Stassen on the need for a more vigorous program, but he believed that vigorous implementation of NSC 5432 would result in a realization of U.S. objectives in Latin America.

The Vice President noted that this paragraph also had some built-in qualifications. For instance, each loan must be within the Export–

[20] The text of the referenced paragraph reads as follows: "Be prepared to assure the financing of all [to assist in the financing of] sound economic development projects, for which private capital or IBRD financing is not available, through Export–Import Bank loans; subject to each loan being:

"(1) in the interest of both the United States and the borrowing country,

"(2) within the borrower's capacity to repay,

"(3) within the Bank's lending capacity."

The text indicates that the bracketed alternative language was a "Treasury proposal."

Import Bank's lending capacity. Secretary Overby felt the qualification should be the practice, not the capacity, of the Bank. The Vice President asked exactly what was meant—the Bank's rules, the Bank's policy, the statutes governing the Bank, or what? Secretary Overby said he meant the Bank's practice. Mr. Cutler said that one of the purposes of NSC 5432 was to change the practices of the Export-Import Bank.

Secretary Smith agreed that the policy of the Export-Import Bank in the past had been far too restrictive in Latin America. He would go even further than the Planning Board paper, and say that sound economic projects in Latin America should be financed "through a liberalized policy of Export-Import Bank loans". Mr. Hughes felt that the word "assure" did not mean 100% underwriting of loans by the Export-Import Bank. The Vice President agreed, and added that there were other qualifications, such as the word "sound". He suggested that paragraph 9-b as written should be recommended to the President. He detected a general feeling around the table, with Treasury dissenting, that the loan policy of the Bank should be liberalized. Secretary Overby felt that at the very least the paragraph should read "assure the financing of all necessary dollar costs", in order to avoid a policy of underwriting foreign currency costs. Secretary Smith and Governor Stassen could not agree with this proposal. Secretary Smith added that he still liked his suggestion for inserting "a liberalized loan policy" in the paper, but he wouldn't press it. The Vice President said that Secretary Smith's views were part of the legislative history of this paper. He added that the Planning Board apparently wanted to "goose" the Bank. He suggested that any difficulty arising from the laws or the Bank's charter might be avoided by adding at the end of subparagraph 9-b-(3) the words "and charter powers", so that each loan would have to be within the charter powers of the Bank.

Governor Stassen said that paragraph 9-c [21] had been proposed by FOA and ODM as a means of financing projects which could not be financed under the paragraph just discussed (9-b). He said paragraph 9-c did not involve an automatic spending procedure, but did make it possible to move decisively toward accelerated economic development in Latin America. Secretary Smith said his very competent advisers, some of whom were present, viewed this paragraph with misgivings. They wanted sound loans or grants, and were against uneconomic loans. Secretary Smith, however, personally felt that if the language of the paragraph meant what it seemed to mean, there was no reason for alarm.

[21] The referenced paragraph proposed by FOA and ODM reads as follows:

"c. Finance through development assistance loans the initiation or acceleration of projects or activities which are in the basic U.S. interest and which, in the absence of such additional assistance, would not be undertaken or, if undertaken, would not be carried forward at the rate required by U.S. foreign policy objectives."

Consequently, he would not oppose inclusion of this paragraph in the paper.

Secretary Overby was opposed to the paragraph. He said this policy might discourage trade, private investment and private enterprise; it might impair the lending standards of our lending institutions; and it was not something Latin America was demanding. Secretary Smith said the paragraph had hidden assets. He would like the Export-Import Bank to know that if it turned down loans to Latin America they could be made in some other say. Secretary Overby said that if we started making fuzzy loans, all Latin American countries would want them rather than sound loans. Acting Secretary of Defense Anderson suggested that these loans might be made for projects which were in the basic U.S. interest "as determined by the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury". Secretary Smith objected to this formula.

Dr. Flemming said that his representative on the Planning Board had not been instructed by him to propose this paragraph. He added that the Defense Production Act [22] contained a provision for a revolving loan fund which the Director of ODM, with the concurrence of the Special Committee, could use to make non-bankable loans if a loan application had been turned down as not bankable. Dr. Flemming then asked whether the proposed paragraph 9-c did not give the State Department a useful tool in economic warfare; if so, he was inclined to favor the paragraph.

Governor Stassen felt the paragraph would be a very useful policy tool and would be implemented under proper financial safeguards. Mr. Hughes said he had understood Secretary Holland to say that this paragraph was not necessary. Secretary Smith called attention to the fact that he and he alone was representing the State Department. Secretary Smith then wondered whether this paragraph should not be the subject of further study. The Vice President felt the paragraph should not be deleted, since this would rule out the possibility of development assistance loans. As an alternative to deletion he suggested that the paragraph should be revised to say that if the policies in 9-a and 9-b were inadequate, then we would fall back on development assistance loans as described in paragraph 9-c. Governor Stassen agreed with this suggestion.

Dr. Flemming said he would not press the ODM suggestion for paragraph 9-f.[23]

[23] Reference is to paragraph 9-f, subparagraph (1) the text of which reads as follows: "Reasonable and non-discriminatory laws and regulations affecting business, [including legislation providing opportunity to domestic capital to acquire a reasonable share in new enterprises.]" The bracketed language indicates the ODM proposal.

Governor Stassen called attention to paragraph 9–g,[24] proposed by FOA. He said he felt the U.S. could not reasonably oppose Latin American initiative in regional economic actions. If Latin American countries would devise an economic mechanism of their own choosing to couter inflation and promote the growth of the area, we might have to use fewer dollars in Latin America. Mr. Cutler said the Planning Board had not endorsed this paragraph because it was felt that regional economic groupings might tend to break down the Organization of American States. Secretary Smith said this Government had usually opposed the Latin American tariff unions. However, he would prefer to study any proposed regional economic action or grouping on its merits rather than undertake a blanket commitment not to oppose any regional grouping. He therefore suggested that paragraph 9–g begin as follows: "Consider sympathetically, but on their individual merits, any proposals on Latin American initiative to create . . .".

Dr. Flemming explained paragraph 9–h,[25] proposed by ODM and FOA. He said that the Agricultural Trade and Adjustment Act permitted a start in the direction of building up large-scale non-deteriorating assets in place of strategic stockpiles. However, this Act was fuzzy. (Note: The above-mentioned Act is correctly titled "Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954";[26] the original action has been revised to reflect this.)

Secretary Smith said that State did not object to the proposed paragraph, which could be a tool of tremendous value. However, he saw one objection to the paragraph, in that it might create in Latin America industries whose sole purpose was to exploit our stockpile laws.

Dr. Flemming said this paragraph might become an effective weapon in economic warfare. He added that the President had recently remarked that in the cold war the side with the corner on strategic commodities would have the advantage.

Secretary Overby referred to paragraph 26 of NSC 5422/2,[27] which provided that the U.S. stockpiling program should not normally be used to help stabilize international markets for the exports of under-developed countries. He felt that the proposed paragraph 9-h of NSC 5432 was inconsistent with the approved policy in NSC 5422/2. He asked whether the proposed paragraph 9-h reflected an aid program or a stockpiling program. Mr. Cutler said the proposed paragraph 9-h had nothing to do with the stockpiling program. The Vice President remarked that in any case the words "seek legislation" in the proposed paragraph allowed four to five months for study of the question.

[25] The text of the referenced paragraph proposed by FOA and ODM reads as follows:

"h. Seek legislation, outside the scope of the present Stock Piling Act, which will sanction the building of large-scale non-deteriorating assets valuable to the future of the United States rather than acquisitions limited as at present to strategic reserves for strictly defense uses."

Dr. Flemming said that paragraph 26 of NSC 5422/2 referred to the defense stockpile, which was entirely separate from the present question. He felt that a supplementary stockpile would help in disposing of agricultural surpluses and would also help allay any domestic political misgivings which might arise if we started purchasing from abroad for the defense stockpile, goods which were domestically available.

Secretary Overby wondered whether the proposed paragraph 9-h would help in disposing of agricultural surpluses. He thought the paragraph was a purchase, not a barter, provision. Dr. Flemming said the new law contained barter authority. Mr. Hughes said the proposed paragraph had tremendous budgetary implications. He felt the policy should be decided on a separate over-all basis rather than as part of a Latin American paper. Governor Stassen agreed that the implications of the proposed policy were world-wide. Secretary Smith said he would strongly support the policy contained in the proposed paragraph 9-h if it were presented to the Council as a separate world-wide problem.

Mr. Cutler inquired whether the Council wished to delete paragraph 9-h from NSC 5432 and consider the proposed policy when NSC 162/2 was reviewed. Governor Stassen said he had no objection to including the policy in paragraph 9-h in a future revision of NSC 162/2, but he thought this policy should also be included in the Latin American paper. He suggested it could be directly related to Latin America by beginning the paragraph with the words "Utilize, in relation to Latin America, the authority in the Act, etc.".

Mr. Cutler noted, with reference to paragraph 11,[28] that the Planning Board was split on whether information, cultural, education and exchange programs for Latin America should be "expanded" or "developed". He observed that the word "develop" was used in the Far East paper.[29] The Vice President felt that the word ought to be "expanded" both in this paper and in the Far East paper.

[28] The text of paragraph 11 reads as follows:

"The United States should expand [develop] and make more effective, information, cultural, education and exchange programs for the countries concerned. The U.S. Information and Cultural Programs for Latin American States should be specifically directed to the problems and psychology of specific states in the area, with the objective of alerting them to the dangers of Soviet imperialism and communist and other anti-U.S. subversion, and convincing them that their own self-interest requires an orientation of Latin American policies to our objectives." The text indicates that the bracketed alternative word was a "Treasury and Budget proposal." In their memorandum of Aug. 31, 1954, to the Secretary of Defense, cited in footnote 7, p. 68, the Joint Chiefs of Staff expressed a preference for the original wording of the paragraph.

Mr. Cutler said that the Joint Chiefs of Staff wished to delete paragraph 20–c [30] and substitute the following:

"Continue to provide training in the United States for selected Latin American personnel."

The Acting Secretary of Defense said that the Army had had difficulty with overcrowding at West Point. However, he personally felt that the quotas for foreign students should be increased, as proposed by the Planning Board, rather than decreased. The establishment of an Air Force Academy [31] ought to relieve some of the overcrowding at West Point.

Admiral Radford said the Armed Services had objected to increasing quotas for foreign students at the Service Academies. However, even though he had signed the memorandum transmitting the Joint Chiefs of Staff views [32] (filed in the minutes of the meeting), he personally felt that the quotas for foreign students should be increased. If the Council wished to adopt paragraph 20–c as recommended by the Planning Board, he would put the necessary heat on the Services.

Mr. Cutler noted that the Joint Chiefs of Staff proposed the omission of the bracketed phrase in paragraph 20–e,[33] "if necessary by higher priorities". Acting Secretary of Defense Anderson felt that priorities for

"Increase the quotas of qualified Latin American personnel for training in U.S. Armed Forces schools and training centers; encourage Latin American countries to fill their authorized quotas for the U.S. Military and Naval Academies; and provide and encourage Latin American countries to fill a similar quota for the Air Force Academy."

[32] Reference is to the JCS memorandum of Aug. 31, 1954, to the Secretary of Defense.

"Seek ultimate military standardization, along U.S. lines, of the organization, training, doctrine, and equipment of Latin American armed forces; countering trends toward the establishment of European military missions in Latin America; and facilitating the purchase of U.S. equipment by offering Latin American countries competitive prices, more rapid delivery [if necessary by higher priorities] and credit terms, including long-term payments, pre-delivery financing of long lead-time items, and, if feasible, use of foreign currency and, in exceptional cases, barter arrangements." The text indicates that the bracketed alternative language was a "State and FOA proposal." The Joint Chiefs of Staff in their memorandum of Aug. 31, 1954, to the Secretary of Defense, gave the following reason for their desire to have the bracketed phrase omitted: "Priorities governing the allocation of military equipment to United States forces and to the forces of friendly countries are established in accordance with criteria designed to correlate the supplying of such equipment with world-wide strategic requirements. Changes in the order of precedence should be responsive to changes in these strategic requirements and should neither be considered in isolation nor be resorted to as a device to accelerate deliveries to a particular country or group of countries." (JCS files, 381–Western Hemisphere)

the delivery of military equipment should not be established in an NSC policy paper. Secretary Smith remarked that the Defense position was theoretically correct. However, in practice Latin America was at the bottom of the heap as far as military priorities were concerned. As a result, we make it impossible for Latin American countries to obtain U.S. military equipment, so they buy such equipment in Europe.

Admiral Radford felt that any priorities for the delivery of military equipment should be determined on a case-by-case basis. Secretary Smith said he would agree to omit the bracketed phrase from paragraph 20–e if it were clearly understood that we really wanted Latin American countries to use our military equipment.

Secretary Overby was concerned about the suggestion in paragraph 20–e that we might accept foreign currency to facilitate Latin American purchase of U.S. military equipment. He felt it would be preferable to give Latin American countries this equipment rather than accept unusable soft currencies. Admiral Radford remarked that if we accepted soft currency from Latin America, other countries would also want to pay us in soft currency. Secretary Smith said we were merely granting most-favored-nation treatment to Latin America in the purchase of military equipment.

Mr. Cutler pointed out that the Planning Board recommended that the approved version of NSC 5432 should supersede NSC 5419/1, "U.S. Policy in the Event of Guatemalan Aggression in Latin America". The Planning Board felt that NSC 5419/1 was no longer applicable, particularly in view of the incorporation in NSC 5432 of paragraph 6, relating to action against anti-U.S. subversion or intervention in Latin America and to the application of sanctions in the event of domination of a Latin American country by Communism.

The National Security Council: [34]

a. Discussed the subject on the basis of the statement of policy in NSC 5432; in the light of the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff presented orally at the meeting; and the views of Dr. Milton Eisenhower as read at the meeting by Mr. Cutler.

b. Adopted the statement of policy contained in NSC 5432, subject to the following amendments:

(1) Paragraph 4–b: Delete the bracketed phrase and the footnote referring thereto.

(2) Paragraph 5–i: Delete.

(3) Paragraph 9–b: Delete the bracketed phrase and the footnote referring thereto, and add the words "and charter powers" at the end of subparagraph 9–b–(3).

(4) Paragraph 9–c: Revise to read as follows:

"c. Only if a and b above prove to be inadequate, finance through development assistance loans the initiation or acceleration

(5) Subparagraph 9–f–(1): Delete the bracketed phrase and the footnote referring thereto.

(6) Paragraph 9–g: Revise to read as follows:

"g. Consider sympathetically, but only on individual merit, any proposal by Latin American initiative to create regional economic actions and groupings to promote increased trade, technical co-operation and investment, and to concert sound development plans."

(7) Paragraph 9–h: Delete, and substitute therefor the following:

"h. Utilize, in reference to Latin America, the authority in the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 to build non-deteriorating assets valuable to the future of the United States."

(8) Paragraph 11: Delete the bracketed word "develop" and the footnote referring thereto.

(9) Paragraph 20–e: Revise to read as follows:

"e. Seek ultimate military standardization along U.S. lines, of the organization, training, doctrine and equipment of Latin American armed forces; countering trends toward the establishment of European military missions in Latin America, or agencies or individuals with a similar function, other than those of the United States; and facilitating the purchase of U.S. equipment by offering Latin American countries competitive prices, more rapid delivery, and credit terms, including long-term payments, pre-delivery financing of long lead time items, and, if feasible, use of foreign currency and, in exceptional cases, barter arrangements."

c. Discussed the preliminary draft financial appendix for NSC 5432 circulated at the meeting, and noted that a final revised version would be circulated with the policy as approved.

d. Agreed that the statement of policy contained in NSC 5419/1 should be terminated as no longer applicable.

Note: NSC 5432, as amended, approved by the President; referred to the Operations Coordinating Board as the coordinating agency designated by the President; and circulated as NSC 5432/1. The action in d-above approved by the President and transmitted to the Operations Coordinating Board and to all holders of NSC 5419/1.

TOP SECRET

[WASHINGTON,] September 3, 1954.

UNITED STATES OBJECTIVES AND COURSES OF ACTION WITH RESPECT TO LATIN AMERICA

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

1. There is a trend in Latin America toward nationalistic regimes maintained in large part by appeals to the masses of the population. Concurrently, there is an increasing popular demand for immediate improvement in the low living standards of the masses, with the result that most Latin American governments are under intense domestic political pressures to increase production and to diversify their economics.

2. A realistic and constructive approach to this need which recognizes the importance of bettering conditions for the general population, is essential to arrest the drift in the area toward radical and nationalistic regimes. The growth of nationalism is facilitated by historic anti-U.S. prejudices and exploited by Communists.

3. Latin America needs U.S. assistance for the solution of these problems and will become increasingly subject to Communist intervention and subversion unless such assistance is forthcoming. Realizing the increasing importance of helping Latin America to reverse those trends which offer opportunities for Communist penetration, the U.S. should give greater emphasis than heretofore to its Latin American programs in order to safeguard and strengthen the security of the Hemisphere. The limited purpose of this paper is to define our objectives and courses of action concerning these and other important problems common to the area.

OBJECTIVES

4. The objectives of the United States with respect to Latin America are:

a. Hemisphere solidarity in support of our world policies, particularly in the UN and other international organizations.

b. An orderly political, military, and economic development in Latin America so that the states in the area will be more effective members of the hemisphere system and increasingly important participants in the affairs of the free world.

[1] Acting NSC Executive Secretary Gleason, in a covering note dated Sept. 3, 1954, not printed, informed the NSC that the President had that date approved the statement of policy in NSC 5432 as amended by NSC Action No. 1209-b and adopted at the Council's meeting on Sept. 2, transmitted as NSC 5432/1, and directed its implementation by all appropriate Executive departments and agencies. The President designated the Operations Coordinating Board as the coordinating agency. See the memorandum of discussion at the NSC meeting, supra.

c. The safeguarding of the hemisphere, including sea and air approaches, by individual and collective defense measures against external aggression through the development of indigenous military forces and local bases necessary for hemisphere defense.

d. The reduction and elimination of the menace of internal Communist or other anti-U.S. subversion.

e. Adequate production in Latin America of, and access by the United States to, raw materials essential to U.S. security.

f. Support by Latin America of collective action in defense of other areas of the free world.

g. The ultimate standardization of Latin American military organization, training, doctrine and equipment along U.S. lines.

COURSES OF ACTION

Political

5. Hemisphere Solidarity. The United States should achieve a greater degree of hemisphere solidarity by:

a. A greater utilization of the Organization of American States as a means of achieving our objectives, which will avoid the appearance of unilateral action and identify our interests with those of the other American states.

b. Being prepared to increase, and encouraging other members to increse proportionately, financial support for the activities of the Organization of American States, particularly constructive technical programs carried on through the Pan American Union and specialized agencies, in order to increase their relative role in the handling of multilateral contributions.

c. Consulting with the Latin American states, whenever possible, before taking actions which will affect them or for which we wish their support, explaining as fully as security permits the reasons for our decisions and actions.

d. Evidencing greater consideration of Latin American problems at the highest levels of government by according sympathetic attention to representatives of Latin America, by exercising care in public statements relating to the area, and through such methods as visits by high officials and distinguished private citizens to Latin American states.

e. Refraining from overt unilateral intervention in the internal political affairs of the other American states, in accordance with existing treaty obligations. This does not preclude multilateral action through the inter-American system. . . .

f. Taking into consideration, in determining the extent of U.S. assistance and support to particular American states, their willingness and ability to cooperate with the United States in achieving common objectives.

g. Trying, in extending aid and advice of all kinds, to make it of a type and extend it in a way, which will preserve a relationship of equality and avoid the semblance of patronizing Latin America.

h. Assisting through the Organization of American States, or by such other means as may be available, those American states which are resisting pressures from their neighbors, whenever such pressures are inimical to U.S. interests and the inter-American system.

6. Increased Action Against Communist Penetration.

a. The U.S. should encourage through consultation, prudent exchange of information, and other available means, individual and collective action against Communist or other anti-U.S. subversion or intervention in any American state.

b. In the event of threatened or actual domination of any American state by Communism, the U.S. should, pursuant to Resolution 93 of the 10th Inter-American Conference, promote and cooperate in application of the sanctions, including military, provided for in the Rio Treaty to the extent necessary to remove the threat to the security of the Hemisphere, all sanctions being applied in collaboration with other OAS members to the extent feasible, and unilateral action being taken only as a last resort.

a. The United States should encourage acceptance and implementation by interested states of the principle that dependent and colonial peoples in this Hemisphere should progress by orderly processes toward a self-governing status to be achieved when they are ready for it.

b. When disputes between American and non-American states over dependent territories cannot be settled by direct negotiations, the United States should encourage peaceful settlements by other methods available to the parties.

8. Other measures. The United States should also:

a. Assist and encourage the formation and development of responsible organized labor movements and leadership in Latin American countries such as the Inter-American Organization of Workers (ORIT) as presently oriented.

b. Encourage Latin American governments to continue to prevent direct shipments of strategic materials to the Soviet bloc and to adopt an import certificate and delivery verification system to facilitate the prevention of indirect shipments.

9. Increased Stability and Economic Development.[2] The U.S. should:

a. Adopt stable, long term trading policies with respect to Latin American countries, including gradual selective reduction of U.S. barriers and tariffs on trade.

b. Through Export–Import Bank loans, provided each such loan is (1) in the interests of both the United States and the borrowing country, (2) within the borrower's capacity to repay, and (3) within the Bank's lending capacity and charter powers, be prepared to assure such financing of all sound economic development projects, for which private capital or IBRD financing is not available.

[2] At the 224th meeting of the National Security Council, held Nov. 15, 1954, the Council adopted Action No. 1270–b authorizing the amendment of NSC 5432/1, paragraph 9, sections (b), (c), and (g). President Eisenhower approved the NSC action on Nov. 16. The amendments were incorporated into revised pages for NSC 5432/1, which were transmitted to all holders of that document under cover of a memorandum by Mr. Lay, dated Nov. 16, 1954. (S/P–NSC files, lot 62 D 1)

c. Only if action under a and b above over a period of time demonstrates that these courses of action are inadequate, and then only with Presidential approval in each case, finance through development assistance loans the initiation or acceleration of projects or activities which are in the basic U.S. interest and which, in the absence of such additional assistance, would not be undertaken or, if undertaken, would not be carried forward at the rate required by U.S. foreign policy objectives.

d. Strengthen, and program on a longer term basis, technical cooperation, with particular attention to the willingness and ability of each country to use such aid effectively: and increase specialized training in the U.S. of Latin Americans in finance, labor, management, agriculture, business and other specialized fields.

e. Preserve the necessary authority to continue or undertake limited economic grant programs such as the Inter-American Highway and the Rama Road, and the emergency program now being carried out in Bolivia.

f. While recognizing the sovereign right of Latin American countries to undertake such economic measures as they may conclude are best adapted to their own conditions, encourage them by economic assistance and other means to base their economies on a system of private enterprise and, as essential thereto, to create a political and economic climate conducive to private investment, of both domestic and foreign capital, including:

(1) Reasonable and non-discriminatory laws and regulations affecting business,

(2) Opportunity to earn and in the case of foreign capital to repatriate a reasonable return,

(3) Reasonable rate-making policies in government regulated enterprises,

(4) Sound fiscal and monetary policies, and

(5) Respect for contract and property rights, including assurance of prompt, adequate, and effective compensation in the event of expropriation.

g. Consider sympathetically, but only on individual merit, any proposal by Latin American initiative to create regional economic actions and groupings to promote increased trade, technical cooperation and investment, and to concert sound development plans; with the understanding that any such proposal would not involve discrimination against U.S. trade and that no additional U.S. financial commitments would be involved hereunder without further consideration by the National Security Council.

h. Utilize, in reference to Latin America, the authority in the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 to build non-deteriorating assets valuable to the future of the United States.

i. Where appropriate encourage diversification of Latin American economies on a sound basis.

10. The United States should encourage the institution of necessary Latin American government fiscal, budgetary and other measures which are indispensable to economic progress in the area through utilization of the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank, the Export–Import Bank, and other appropriate means.

Information and Related Activities

11. The United States should expand and make more effective, information, cultural, education and exchange programs for the countries concerned. The U.S. Information and Cultural Programs for Latin American states should be specifically directed to the problems and psychology of specific states in the area, with the objective of alerting them to the dangers of Soviet imperialism and communist and other anti-U.S. subversion, and convincing them that their own self-interest requires an orientation of Latin American policies to our objectives.

12. . . .

Military

13. The United States should encourage acceptance of the concept that each of the Latin American states is responsible for maximizing its contribution, by military and mobilization measures, to:

a. The internal security of its own territory.

b. The defense of its own territory, including land communication, coastal waters, ports and approaches thereto, bases located within its area of responsibility and air lanes of communication associated therewith.

c. The allied defense effort, including participation in combined operations within the hemisphere and support of collective actions in other theaters by forces beyond the requirements of hemisphere security.

14. In support of the course of action in paragraph 13, the United States should provide military assistance to Latin America consistent with the agreed plans of the Inter-American Defense Board and other bilateral or multilateral military agreements to which the United States is a party. U.S. military assistance should be designed to reduce to a minimum the diversion of U.S. forces for the maintenance of hemisphere security; and in determining the type of military assistance to be provided each nation, consideration should be given to its role in hemisphere defense.

15. The United States should assume primary responsibility for military operations in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans and the Caribbean Sea, including sea and air approaches to the Panama Canal, and at the appropriate time should seek from other American states acceptance of U.S. military control of the defense of these areas.

16. To the extent that military bases other than U.S. bases in Latin America are required to further joint defense efforts, the United States should technically guide and assist the Latin American countries in their development and maintenance and seek agreements providing for their reciprocal use, rights of air transit and technical stops, and availability for common defense purposes.

17. . . .

18. Where necessary the United States should assist in the protection of sources and processing facilities of strategic materials and land transportation related thereto. However, each of the Latin American countries should organize its own civil defense.

19. In providing military aid and seeking military commitments the United States should not encourage Latin American nations to contribute to the military effort to an extent which would jeopardize their economic stability.

20. In addition, the United States should:

a. Continue the planning of the Inter-American Defense Board and the Military Commissions on which we are jointly members with Brazil and Mexico.

b. Continue and establish where appropriate, military training missions in Latin American nations.

c. Increase the quotas of qualified Latin American personnel for training in U.S. Armed Forces schools and training centers; encourage Latin American countries to fill their authorized quotas for the U.S. Military and Naval Academies; and provide and encourage Latin American countries to fill a similar quota for the Air Force Academy.

d. Foster closer relations between Latin American and U.S. military personnel in order to increase the understanding of, and orientation toward, U.S. objectives on the part of the Latin American military, recognizing that the military establishments of most Latin American states play an influential role in government.

e. Seek ultimate military standardization, along U.S. lines, of the organization, training, doctrine, and equipment of Latin American armed forces; countering trends toward the establishment of European military missions in Latin America, or agencies or individuals with a similar function, other than those of the United States; and facilitating the purchase of U.S. equipment by offering Latin American countries competitive prices, more rapid delivery and credit terms, including long-term payments, pre-delivery financing of long lead-time items, and, if feasible, use of foreign currency and, in exceptional cases, barter arrangements.

Note on Loans: The above projections do not include loans. (1) Possible development assistance loans, under paragraph 9–c might during this period average $50 million a year. (2) Loans from the International Bank or the Export–Import Bank under para. 9–b of this policy are estimated to total as follows:

[3] A draft of this financial appendix, dated Sept. 1, 1954, was submitted to the NSC on Sept. 2, and subsequently revised at a meeting of the NSC Planning Board on Sept. 7. The revised version was transmitted to all holders of NSC 5432/1 under cover of a memorandum by Mr. Lay, dated Sept. 8, 1954. (S/P–NSC files, lot 61 D 167)

*Value of matériel shipments (including the value of "excess stocks"), plus expenditures for training, and packing, handling and crating, and transportation, and the cost of rehabilitating "excess stocks." Figures do not include purchases under the Reimbursable Aid provisions of the Mutual Security Laws. Shipments of Reimbursable Aid to 16 Latin American countries totaled $34.8 million through 30 June 1954. While long-term credits and loans are authorized by the Mutual Security Act of 1954 (under which the provisions relating to credit terms in paragraph 20–e of the proposed policy would be implemented), the method of financing and the amounts involved have not been determined. The figures also do not reflect the cost of subsidies which would be required if Latin American countries are to be offered "competitive prices" under paragraph 20–e on the type of U.S.

military equipment now in production. It is estimated that a price reduction of from 15 to 25 percent would be required to make U.S. military equipment competitive with that offered for sale by other countries. Since new legislation would be required to accomplish this policy, expenditures for this purpose would not start until FY 1956. [Footnote in the source text.]

† Para. 9–e: In addition to the $9.1 million in FY 1955 and $1.9 million in FY 1956, for carrying out the current emergency program in Bolivia, the estimated expenditures include $10 million per year for FY 1956–58. FOA would justify these expenditures as grants to accelerate technical assistance projects and partially to cover possible emergency aid. State would justify them as emergency aid alone.

The above projections do not include possible programs for disposal of surplus commodities under the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954. The local currency generated from the sale of such surplus commodities might serve in some instances to reduce the dollar amounts of aid projected. [Footnote in the source text.]

§ Para. 9–e: It is estimated that the expenditures planned for FY 1956 will complete the Rama Road. The $8.0 million in expenditures thereafter are for the Inter-American Highway. [Footnote in the source text.]

‖ Para. 9–d: Figures supplied by FOA, which include the U.S. contribution to the technical assistance program of the O.A.S. The Department of State estimates expenditures for technical assistance, including the U.S. contribution to the O.A.S. program, as follows: FY 1956, $31.5 million; FY 1957, $32.0 million; FY 1958, $32.5 million. The Bureau of the Budget notes that the policy calls for "strengthening" the program and therefore believes State estimates more accurate.

Figures do not include U.S. contributions to UN expenditures in Latin America (calendar year programs), which were $2.8 million in FY 1953 and $2.5 million in FY 1954. Recent Congressional action prohibits pledges beyond 1954. [Footnote in the source text.]

¶ Para. 11: These figures do not reflect in FY 1955 the expansion of the information program called for by para. 11 of NSC 5432/1. The Department of State estimates that under paragraph 11 expenditures should be increased from $4.6 million to $5.9 million in FY 1955. The USIA does not believe that expenditures can be substantially increased in FY 1955 within available and recently reprogrammed funds. The figures represent estimated expenditures in Latin America and European Dependencies in the Caribbean for local operating costs and Agency support in the form of supplies, materials and services provided the missions for carrying out their program responsibilities. [Footnote in the source text.]

 Para. 5–b: Activities of O.A.S. other than technical assistance. In accordance with paragraph 5–b of the policy, expenditures for these activities have been estimated to increase. [Footnote in the source text.]

Progress Report by the Operations Coordinating Board to the National Security Council [1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 19, 1955.

PROGRESS REPORT ON NSC 5432/1 UNITED STATES OBJECTIVES AND COURSES OF ACTION WITH RESPECT TO LATIN AMERICA

(Policy Approved by the President, September 3, 1954)
(Period Covered: April 30–December 1, 1954)

A. SUMMARY OF MAJOR ACTIONS

1. A communist-dominated government in Guatemala was overthrown and a government favorable to the U.S. came into power. The U.S. is supporting this new government with relatively substantial military and economic assistance.

2. The U.S. demonstrated increased support and use of the OAS and is increasing its financial support of that organization. Despite several incidents of friction in Central and South America, the U.S. has been instrumental in averting any breach of the peace.

3. Criticism of U.S. economic policy which reached a climax prior to the Rio Economic Conference has somewhat subsided. Criticism at the conclusion of the conference was less severe than might have been anticipated due in part to the sympathetic but firm attitude demonstrated by our Delegation and the assurances given by the Delegation of our determination to help Latin America solve its economic problems on a sound basis. Announcement of our support of an International Finance Corporation; [2] liberalization of, and announcement of, loans under our development loan policy, and decisions not to impose additional duties on lead and zinc were major factors in reducing Latin American criticism.

4. The U.S. responded promptly and effectively to urgent appeals from Haiti and Honduras to meet major flood disasters in those countries, and subsequently extended substantial economic aid.

As a result of the meeting, a revised draft was prepared, under date of Jan. 10, not printed, and forwarded to the OCB. On Jan. 19, the OCB approved the report for transmittal to the NSC, all agencies represented on the OCB concurring in the report as submitted. (Memorandum by Mr. Sparks to Secretary Dulles, dated Feb. 14, 1955, S/P–NSC files, lot 61 D 167, NSC 5432/1) The report was transmitted to the OCB on Feb. 3. Records of the OCB meetings and the Board Assistants' record of actions are contained in S/S–OCB files, lot 62 D 430.

[2] Apparent reference to an announcement by the Treasury Department on Nov. 11, 1954; for text, see Department of State Bulletin, Nov. 29, 1954, p. 814.

5. A decision to pay transportation, per diem and course costs for military trainees from MDAP countries in Latin America resulted in a substantial increase in the number of such trainees scheduled for attendance at Service schools in the U.S. and in the Canal Zone.

6. New Military Assistance Agreements with Honduras and Nicaragua are being implemented and the military grant program for Colombia was increased by one battalion; but, in general, the U.S. has been unable to accede to requests for increased grant military assistance.

7. The information program during this period was reoriented so as to deliver more impact in the priority countries such as Brazil, Chile, Bolivia and Guatemala. The President's "Atoms for Peace" proposal,[3] the Rio Economic Conference, pertinent recommendations of the Milton Eisenhower report, and activities exposing Communism received continuing emphasis in both planning and output.

B. OPERATIONAL CONSIDERATIONS BEARING ON POLICY

8. The Working Group sees no need for any change at this time in the policy enunciated in NSC 5432/1. However, the Working Group has not had the opportunity to assess the impact of the Rio Economic Conference on policy.

C. EMERGING PROBLEMS AND FUTURE ACTIONS

9. The coming six months will in all probability be marked by a continuation of present problems in the political and economic fields. In the political field, the principal problem will be to find the means of associating the United States with the aspirations of the peoples of Latin America, thus counteracting communist propaganda which consistently and often effectively portrays the United States as the defender of "so-called exploiters" in opposition to the interests of the common people. To win the support of the peoples as well as the governments for our major policy objectives is a task of enormous and long-range proportions.

10. In the economic field, the United States will continue to be concerned with maintaining economic stability and accelerating economic development in Latin America. The United States will also have to face the desire of Latin Americans to have the U.S. assume a larger share of the financial burden involved in solving their economic problems than the U.S. is willing to bear. To meet this situation, the United States should continue its efforts to encourage and strengthen the will and ability of Latin America to take necessary self-help actions and at the same time, as required by U.S. interest, should furnish assistance needed to support and accelerate economic development in Latin America, and by this and other appropriate means demonstrate U.S. desire to aid Latin American efforts to achieve economic progress.

11. Specifically, the following emerging problems and possible future actions require attention:

a. Latin America will be greatly concerned with the results of the U.S. policy announced at Rio of assuring the financing of all sound Latin American economic development projects. It is important that this policy be implemented promptly and vigorously.

b. The Latin American press, since the Rio Conference, has generally not supported the U.S. position at that conference. It is important to take action to gain maximum support for our announced economic policy.

c. The U.S. should strengthen its effort to increase the use of private investment funds, both domestic and foreign, for economic development in Latin America. In this connection, a renewed effort is planned to secure Latin American participation in the Investment Guaranty Program,[4] and steps should be taken to obtain necessary Congressional action on the Rio Economic Conference resolution on tax reduction.[5]

d. The Soviet Union will continue its vigorous program indoctrinating Latin American labor with communist ideals. The U.S. should continue to develop its labor program for Latin America to meet this threat.

e. Implementation of the policy of extending credit for the sale of military equipment to Latin America has been severely handicapped. These sales have been carried out to date only through the use of regular Department of Defense funds. Solution of the problem apparently requires simplified procedures for the utilization of MDAP program funds for credit purposes and/or new legislation to provide a more flexible means of financing.

f. Efforts of some Latin American countries to enforce their claims to sovereignty over wide areas of the high seas beyond the three-mile limit recognized by the U.S., the general enthusiasm among the Latin governments over holding an OAS Conference on the Continental Shelf and related matters in 1955 or early 1956 and the important role of Latin American delegations in UN consideration of the subject, require careful review of the U.S. policy and strategy in this regard.

g. In view of the U.S. economic policy as outlined at the Rio Economic Conference, attention should be given to the need for maintaining continuity in the technical cooperation and economic assistance programs in Latin America.

h. The probable introduction of legislation to limit imports of petroleum as a measure to protect domestic fuel producers, primarily at the expense of Venezuela, will require serious attention from the Executive Branch.

i. The reintroduction of legislation in Congress to increase the domestic sugar industry's share of the U.S. market is to be expected. If adopted, it would result in a proportionate reduction of foreign suppliers and would adversely affect the economy of Cuba.

j. Brazil is in the course of striving to level off an inflationary trend, and Chile is faced with a continuation of rapid inflation. Decisions will be required regarding the appropriate actions which the United States should take to support these countries.

k. Efforts to secure the base facilities in Brazil [6] requested by Defense may cause the Brazilians to press their request for increased military assistance or other concessions. A decision will be required on these requests.

l. The question of opening negotiations with Argentina for a Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement has been raised and will require special consideration in the light of our relations with Argentina and her neighbors, and of public opinion in this country.

m. There are likely to be continuing efforts to overthrow the Figueres Government in Costa Rica, and Costa Rica may in consequence call for our assistance under the Rio Treaty.

n. In light of significant requests for assistance and limited appropriations for military assistance in Latin America, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have undertaken a general reappraisal of military objectives and programs in Latin America.

D. EXTENT OF AGENCY INTERESTS

12. The Department of Commerce and the Treasury Department fully participated in the deliberations of the Working Group, including the preparation of this report.

Annex A

ANNEX "A"—DETAILED DEVELOPMENT OF MAJOR ACTIONS

STATEMENT OF ACTIONS BY PARAGRAPHS OF NSC 5432/1

Para. 5a. Greater Utilization of Organization of American States

The Organization of American States was used as a means of achieving our objectives in the case of communist intervention in Guatemala. After the arrival from Poland on May 15 in Guatemala of a substantial shipment of arms, the United States initiated consultations with all Latin American Governments, except Guatemala. Following these consultations, the Council of the Organization of American States voted almost unanimously (Ecuador voted against; Uruguay abstained) to convoke a Meeting of Ministers of Foreign Affairs. The Council of the OAS postponed the meeting sine die because the revolution in Guatemala overthrew the communist-controlled Government.

The revolution in Guatemala caused the communist-controlled Arbenz Government to appeal to the United Nations Security Council and to the Inter-American Peace Committee of the OAS alleging aggression on the part of Honduras and Nicaragua, supported by other foreign nations. The United States took the position that the Organization of American States was ready, willing and competent to respond to the appeal. The Security Council voted (Soviet Union against), in effect, to leave the matter to the OAS. The Inter-American Peace Committee prepared to investigate, but before the Committee arrived in Guatemala, the new government of that country indicated that the controversy requiring the investigation had ceased to exist.

Para. 5b. Increasing Financial Support of Inter-American Organizations

Funds for increased contributions to inter-American organizations of approximately $250,000 have been included in the Fiscal Year 1956 budget. Larger increases which had been proposed were reduced when it became apparent that the Latin American governments could not match in Fiscal Year 1956 increased contributions from the United States.

The United States has supported increased utilization of the OAS for technical cooperation and obtained funds to increase our contribution to the OAS Technical Cooperation Program from $1 million to $1.5 million.

Para. 5c. Prior Consultation with Latin American Governments

The United States Delegation to the sessions of the UN General Assembly continues to consult with Latin American delegates on issues before the United Nations. Argentina and Uruguay have urged consultation concerning disposal of U.S. agricultural surpluses because of the effect such disposal has on their major export commodities. The U.S. has agreed to consultations but not to the extent these exporting countries desire.

Consultation with Latin American Governments on the Guatemala situation is discussed under Paragraph 5*a*.

Para. 5d. Consideration of Latin American Problems at Highest Government Levels

A Sub-Cabinet Committee was created for the purpose of studying our economic relations with Latin America and recommending the position which the U.S. should take with respect to the agenda and proposals likely to be considered at the Rio Economic Conference. The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs [7] visited the heads of all governments in South America and Mexico [8] for the purpose of explaining and gaining acceptance for the policies which had been developed by this Committee. While the U.S. Delegation found it necessary to abstain on a number of the resolutions adopted by the Rio Economic Conference, abstention was explained in terms which were sympathetically received and understood by other delegations. The composition of the United States Delegation to the Rio Economic Conference included more ranking government officials than have attended previous conferences of this nature. It was headed by the Secretary of the Treasury [9] and included the Under Secretary of State [10] and a number of other officials of sub-cabinet rank.

Our relations with the Latin American countries continued to be generally favorable although there was increasing criticism of United States economic policy which reached a climax just prior to the Rio Economic Conference. Developments in relations with individual countries worthy of comment included the following:

(1) Relations with Argentina continued favorable during the period, but our Ambassador [11] reports that it is becoming increasingly necessary for the United States to reciprocate Argentine cooperation by meeting some of Argentina's economic desires or offering tangible assistance, e.g., a military assistance program. The Export-Import Bank has sent a survey mission to Argentina [12] to look into projects proposed by Argentina and has approved in principal a credit for a steel mill blast furnace. But other actions by the U.S. have so far been adverse to Argentina's desires, i.e., a quota has been imposed on the importation of oats and a quota on tung oil and tung nuts was avoided only by the voluntary agreement of Argentina and Paraguay to limit shipments to the U.S.

(2) During the period November 8–17, we reviewed with a Cuban Delegation our economic relations with Cuba. We were unable to accede to certain of Cuba's requests because they would require Congressional action, e.g., an increase in Cuba's sugar quota and tariff reductions on Cuban products. We made no commitments on other requests to purchase Cuban minerals for the stockpile and include Cuba in the offshore procurement program. Further discussions are to be held on the rice agreement and a possible double taxation treaty. Cuba agreed to seek early solutions to several pending U.S. problems pending in Cuba, e.g., GATT violations, debts owed by Cuba to private U.S. citizens. The Cubans were afforded a sympathetic hearing, however, and the discussions ended in an atmosphere of cordiality.

(3) The President of El Salvador [13] received through his Ambassador [14] in Washington a personal letter from the President on November 10 [15] commending him for his role in bringing a peaceful settlement among Guatemalan leaders after the collapse of the communist-controlled Guatemalan Government. This exchange of letters between the two Presidents made a highly favorable impression in El Salvador.

(4) There was a marked improvement in our relations with Guatemala as a result of the change in Government in that country. Arrangements were made to permit Guatemala to purchase military equipment in the United States; credit terms are being granted on individual cases. A grant military assistance program is being considered. An economic program of over $6 million was offered which includes funds to implement an agreement looking toward the completion of the Inter-American Highway in Guatemala.

(5) From September 1953 to August 1954, representatives of the United States and Panama were engaged in a full-scale review of problems in United States–Panama relations. Based on these negotiations, a new treaty with Panama has been drafted [16] and is to be signed in January.[17] In the course of these negotiations, representatives of Panama have been received by both the President and the Secretary of State.

(6) Our relations with Venezuela had deteriorated because of our support of Costa Rica and our action in granting Betancourt, ex-President of Venezuela, a visa to the U.S. The Assistant Secretary of State for inter-American Affairs reviewed our relations with Venezuela's President [18] in October and particularly our attitude with respect to Costa Rica. At that time the President of Venezuela was advised of the plans of the Department of the Army to award him the Legion of Merit.[19] The discussions and the award had the desired effect because U.S. relations with Venezuela promptly took a turn for the better.

A Delegation of United States officials—including the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, the United States Representative to the Inter-American Economic and Social Council,[20] Senator Bourke Hickenlooper, representing the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and Representative Clifford B. McIntire, representing the House Committee on Agriculture, participated in the inauguration of the Cochabamba–Santa Cruz Highway in Bolivia which was financed in part by the Export–Import Bank and built by a United States firm.

The Joint Mexico–United States Defense Commission visited Continental Air Defense Command at Colorado Springs for extensive briefing and demonstrations on common air defense problems and procedures.

The Secretary of Defense [21] has accepted an invitation of the President of Colombia [22] to visit that country in January of 1955.

The President of Haiti [23] has accepted an official invitation to visit the U.S. in January, 1955.

Para. 5e. Refraining from Unilateral Action

As noted under 5*a.* above, the United States sought a solution of the Guatemalan problem through the Organization of American States. The United States has also resisted efforts of local factions to seek United States approval of proposed solutions of the indecisive Presidential elections in Honduras [24] in which none of the three presidential candidates received the required majority to be elected.

Para. 5f. Support of U.S. as Criterion for Aid

The outstanding example of taking account of the willingness and ability of a Latin American country to cooperate with the U.S. in determining the extent of U.S. assistance is Guatemala. The extent of assistance to the new Guatemalan Government is outlined under 5*d.* above and is in sharp contrast to the extremely limited assistance given the previous government. This criterion continues to be applied in Bolivia where it has met with a good degree of success.

Para. 5h. Assistance to Countries Resisting Pressure from Neighbors

The United States has assisted Costa Rica in resisting pressures from the neighboring country of Nicaragua, as well as from Venezuela and the Dominican Republic. Because of outspoken denunciation of Venezuela, the Dominican Republic and Nicaragua, by the President of Costa Rica,[25] the latter has gained the animosity of the Presidents of those countries,[26] which has resulted in encouragement by them to dissident elements in Costa Rica to remove him from office. The United States continues to urge a peaceful solution to the dispute and encourage its submission to the OAS if necessary.

Para. 6. Increased Action Against Communist Penetration

The United States has continued to provide information on communist activities to the Latin American governments with a view to encouraging action to control such activity. Information supplied on a communist-sponsored Latin American Women's Conference held in the latter part of August in Rio de Janeiro was instrumental in exposing the Conference as communist-inspired and discouraging attendance with the result that it was a failure.

Similar action was taken with respect to a Youth Festival that was to be held in Guatemala and communist meetings scheduled in Santiago, Chile, and Vienna. Information on communist meetings and conferences is being made available to Latin American governments on a continuing basis.

As a result of discussions with the Latin American governments on the control of communist travel, Cuba has adopted new passport and visa regulations and Colombia is tightening up on its regulations. Chile has also taken a decision to prevent travel of its nationals to communist-sponsored meetings. The Department of Justice is considering what action the United States can take to carry out its obligation to exchange information on United States communists using tourist cards for international travel. Although these actions constitute some measure of success, communists and communist sympathizers continue to travel within and outside the Hemisphere with relative freedom.

There is an increasing awareness by the Latin American governments of the threat that communism poses to their security and the security of the Free World. Argentina and Chile have stepped up their efforts to control communist activity. Bolivia continues to take an increasingly strong stand against communism; and in Brazil, although communism has made gains, and the Communist Party claims to have held its first Party Congress since 1929, indications are that the new government will deal more strongly with communism than the previous Vargas Government. In Mexico, where the government has tended to side with the communist-controlled Arbenz Government in Guatemala, there is evidence of a new awareness of the dangers of communism.

Para. 7. Colonialism

No action was taken by the United States, during the period, on this course of action. The British Government conferred with British Honduras officials on increased self-government, decided to continue its control over affairs of British Guiana, and proceeded with plans to federate its other territories in the Caribbean. The Dutch Government also proceeded with federation plans for its territories.

Para. 8a. Development of Responsible Organized Labor Movements

The U.S. increased the number of State Department labor officers in Latin America from 5 full-time and 4 part-time employees on May 1st to 6 full-time and 6 part-time employees on December 1st. The number of FOA labor personnel assigned to the region remained at 6 throughout the period. The U.S. also urged the Government of Guatemala to establish conditions for the development of free labor unions; and expanded programs for training of Latin American labor leaders in Puerto Rico and the U.S.

Para. 8b. Control of Shipment of Strategic Materials [27]

The Soviet bloc has shown interest in obtaining from Latin American countries certain strategic list goods and other important raw materials, e.g., copper, sulfur, lead, antimony and mica. Despite efforts by the Bloc to obtain strategic materials, the foreign trade of the Latin American countries in strategic items has continued to be almost entirely confined to the free world. During the period of this report, all countries of Latin America (except Argentina to which the Battle Act sanctions do not apply because Argentina is receiving no aid) reiterated earlier assurances of cooperation in the control of strategic material exports to the Soviet bloc. Chile and Peru are participating in a limited application of the IC/DV system as of November 30, 1954, and informal arrangements with copper-producing firms in Mexico remain in effect. No approach has been made to other countries for the adoption of IC/DV systems. Latin American cooperation in the Transit Authorization Certificate scheme is being considered.

In regard to trade in general between the Latin American Republics and the Soviet bloc, the Soviet Union and its satellites have been playing on Latin American concern over the future stability of markets in the U.S. and criticism of U.S. economic policies. Since the end of the Korean war, the Soviet Union and its satellites have been carrying out a so-called trade offensive in Latin America for both economic and propaganda purposes. The total value of Latin American-Soviet bloc trade is quantitatively small, amounting to about one-half of one percent of all Latin American trade in 1953. Nevertheless, the Soviet bloc has been making significant efforts to augment the importance of this trade in selected countries, especially in Argentina and Uruguay, which have exportable surpluses of agricultural products. Increased Soviet bloc interest is shown most clearly by the USSR and most prominently in the Argentina–USSR trade agreement of 1953 which was renewed in August, 1954. Czechoslovakia and Poland are the principal trading partners for the Soviet bloc although other satellites have become increasingly active.

The communists attempt to maximize the propaganda value of their trade efforts to show how the communist world tries to promote trade and assist in economic development as compared with alleged U.S. efforts to restrict trade. These trade activities also provide a cover for subversive activities and an excuse for requesting establishment or strengthening of diplomatic relations. No Latin American country has re-established diplomatic relations with bloc countries because of these efforts. While the Latin American countries occasionally use the threat of possible increased trade with the Soviet bloc as a bargaining point, e.g., the rumor that Chile, during the copper negotiations, would sell to the Soviet bloc, Latin American countries have concentrated their main efforts on increasing trade with the Free World and urging, particularly in connection with the Rio Economic Conference, more liberal United States trade practices and policies.

Para. 9a. Long-Term Trading Policies

Latin America has been apprehensive regarding the future stability of their markets in the U.S. The U.S. Delegation to the Rio Economic Conference assured the delegates that the U.S. is determined to maintain a strong, healthy economy in the U.S., insuring by this means a growing volume of trade. The U.S. was also able to demonstrate interest in avoiding serious injury to their trade by the following actions:

(1) The President's decision not to accept a recommendation for tariff increases on lead and zinc [28] which would have adversely affected Bolivia, Peru and Mexico, and to assist the domestic industry instead by increasing purchases for stockpile;
(2) The President's decision not to take unilateral action with respect to imposition of a quota on tung oil but instead to negotiate with the countries affected (Argentina and Paraguay) for a voluntary cutback in exports to this market;
(3) The refusal of the Executive Departments to support the domestic sugar industry's request for reopening the Sugar Act [29] with a view to increasing the domestic quotas and proportionately reducing those of foreign suppliers;
(4) U.S. support for resolutions [30] at the Rio Economic Conference calling for a study of the problems affecting coffee and bananas and assurances that the U.S. is prepared to discuss individual commodity problems at any time, with the countries affected.
(5) U.S. announcement at the Rio Economic Conference that it expected to follow a policy of gradual selective reduction of trade barriers.

Para. 9b. Financing Economic Development Projects

The policy stated in this sub-paragraph was announced at the Rio Economic Conference. An Export–Import Bank loan of $100 million for development of the Toquepala Mine in Peru prior to the Conference gave substance to the policy.

Loans by the Export–Import Bank for development purposes were as follows:

Twelve additional loans totaling nearly $6 million were extended.

Export-Import Bank disbursements on all credits outstanding to Latin America including development and other credits, were $36 million for the period January 1 through June 30, 1954. Repayments on all out-standing credits during the same period amounted to $26 million.

During the period under consideration the International Bank authorized $77 million in new loans to Latin American countries as follows:

International Bank Loan Authorizations for Latin America—May 1–December 1, 1954

On November 11, the Chairman of the NAC [31] announced an Administration decision to ask Congressional approval for U.S. participation in a proposed International Finance Corporation with a contemplated capital of $100 million, about one-third to be supplied by the U.S., which would be organized as an affiliate of the International Bank. The time for submitting the proposal to Congress will depend on discussions with the IBRD and its members. The purpose of the Corporation would be to stimulate private investment in under-developed countries throughout the world by making loans without guarantee of member governments as is now required in loans by the International Bank.

On November 12, the Export–Import Bank announced the first authorization under a new program for exporter "lines of credits," [32] designed to eliminate the need for an exporter to arrange a new loan to cover each individual sale. Export–Import Bank is discussing participation with the Chase National Bank in a new multi-million dollar export financing corporation.

Effective October 11, 1954, the lending authority of the Export–Import Bank was increased from $4.5 billion to $5 billion. As of November 30, 1954, the uncommitted lending authority of the Bank was $1,713 million.

Para. 9c. Development Assistance Loans

Since the period of time in which to evaluate the effects of courses of action 9*a* and 9*b* has not passed, no steps have been taken during the reporting period to implement the alternative course of action possible under this section.

Para. 9d. Strengthening Technical Cooperation Program

The Technical Cooperation Program has been strengthened and diversified as is evident from the table below. Appropriations for the program have been steadily increased, and these funds are being spent on more diversified activities. Appropriations for fiscal year 1952 were $17.9 million; 1953, $20.4 million; 1954, $22.3 million; and 1955, $26.0 million. During the period July 1–November 1 the number of technicians in the field increased from 589 to 614.

Greater consideration is being given as long-term considerations are consistent with a system of annual appropriations. An indication of this is the increased number of three-year contracts with U.S. universities to assist in developing Latin American universities: In FY 1953, $700,000 was obligated for this purpose; in 1954, $4,300,000; in 1955, $1,700,000; and in 1956, it is planned to obligate $6,200,000.

Responsible Latin American officials publicly support the program, and the Latin American governments have increased their requests for assistance and contributions to the program. Contributions to program funds in FY 1953 were $38,200,000; in 1954, $55,200,000, and in 1955, $61,100,000.

Training in the United States of Latin Americans has been steadily increased and diversified. In Fiscal Year 1953, 560 Latin Americans received training, in Fiscal Year 1954, 1,108; and in Fiscal Year 1955, 1,456. Training grants for Fiscal Year 1955 will include grants as follows: health, 144; agriculture, 254; industry, 664; education, 210; public administration, 155; and community development, 38.

Para. 9e. Grant Economic Assistance

Congressional authorization was obtained for funds to be expended over the next five years to cover the United States' obligation under cooperative agreements for construction of the Inter-American Highway in Central America. Under this authorization, an appropriation of $5,750,000 was obtained for Fiscal Year 1955, and nearly all of this sum has been allocated for specific project agreements with Panama, Costa Rica, Nicaragua and Guatemala. Cooperation with Guatemala was resumed on the Selegua Gap section which will eventually permit travel to San Jose, Costa Rica. In addition to previous authorizations, $4 million was authorized, and $1 million appropriated, for completion of the Rama Road in Nicaragua.

The emergency economic grant program in Bolivia was continued with the ultimate objective of increasing agricultural production and otherwise diversifying the country's economy to decrease its dependence on tin exports. At the same time the program provides food, primarily from United States surplus stocks, which is required because Bolivia lacks the foreign exchange necessary to continue normal food imports. Emergency economic aid was extended to Guatemala after the revolution and to Haiti and Honduras after the recent hurricanes. These programs involved a total of $7,632,000 of Mutual Security funds and $3,430,000 in surplus agricultural products under PL 480.[33] An additional $700,000 of Mutual Security funds is being spent for Christmas parcels delivered in Latin America by CARE and other voluntary agencies.

Para. 9f. Improvement of Investment Climate

Efforts to encourage the Latin American countries in these directions are continuing. For example, (1) Haiti was dissuaded from establishing an oil refinery with monopoly privileges; (2) in Chile a plan of economic "rectification" has been presented to the Congress in response to constant prodding from the U.S.; (3) in Argentina, progress has been made toward extension of certain of the provisions for repatriation of capital and dividends on new investments to cover old investments; (4) in Panama the United Fruit Company took the initiative in negotiating with the Panamanian Government a 32-year contract which provides increased benefits to the Government; (5) Peru, in November, signed a lend-lease agreement [34] covering the balance of $2.8 million owed to the U.S., thus acknowledging a contractual obligation of long standing and eliminating an obstacle to receiving credit from the U.S.

Activities of U.S. agencies, designed to advance the accomplishment of this objective, include: (1) reporting on foreign private investment in Latin America; (2) providing information on investment opportunities including the issuance of investment handbooks; and (3) planning for a major private investment conference in New Orleans next February to be attended by U.S. and Latin American firms and institutions.

Negotiations with Honduras on a double taxation treaty were virtually completed although the political situation there has held up its signature.[35] Preliminary discussions on such a treaty were undertaken with Nicaragua.

Para. 9g. Regional Economic Actions and Groupings

Latin American proposals for the creation of regional economic actions and groupings were given detailed consideration by the Sub-Cabinet Committee in formulating the U.S. position for the Rio Economic Conference:

[33] The Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 was popularly referred to as PL 480.

[34] The exchange of notes constituting the agreement, signed at Lima, Nov. 25, 1954, were transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 266, from Lima, dated Nov. 29, 1954, not printed. (723.56/11–2954)

[35] A convention for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on income was signed by the United States and Honduras at Washington, June 25, 1956, and it entered into force, Feb. 6, 1957 (operative retroactively to Jan. 1, 1957); for text, see TIAS No. 3766 or 8 UST 219.

(1) One proposal related to establishment of an Inter-American financial institution which the U.S. believed would duplicate existing facilities. The U.S. did not feel it could join the proposed institution but offered to assist through consultation and furnishing technical information.

(2) With respect to an international entity to promote Inter-American cooperation in industrial and technological productivity, the U.S. declined to participate because it considered a new institute unnecessary. The U.S. offered to provide technical advice and consultation.

(3) Proposals were made for consultations among the central banks of the American republics to determine the feasibility of financial arrangements to deal with temporary difficulties in balance of payments and also of revising the quotas of Latin American countries in the International Monetary Fund. The U.S. abstained, partly because it was not prepared to increase its quota to the Fund but indicated that the studies which might result from the resolution would have our good will and technical cooperation.

(4) The Rio Economic Conference (including U.S. approval) recommended a study of the possibility of intensifying regional trade through special customs arrangements in harmony with existing bilateral and multilateral agreements including future revisions thereof.

Para. 9h. Use of Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance to Obtain Non-Deteriorating Assets

No agreements have been made with any Latin American country under the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954. However, authorization has been given to proceed with negotiations with Brazil, Chile and Peru for programs amounting to approximately $30, $8 and $6 million, respectively, and it is anticipated that repayment will be made, in part, in strategic and critical materials.

Para. 9i. Diversification of Latin American Economies

Considerable diversification has been achieved in the agricultural field. Programs for industrial diversification are being prepared, especially as regards small industry, for countries where it is appropriate.

In fields requiring large capital investments, principal reliance for increased diversification falls upon private investors. The following represent new industries in the countries referred to and are typical of such activities in Latin America: (1) in the Dominican Republic new drydock facilities are being erected by a Florida company. The National Gypsum Company and the U.S. Gypsum Company are erecting a large plant. The South Puerto Rico Sugar Company is erecting a large plant to make furfural from sugar cane bagasse; [36] (2) in Haiti, the Reynolds Metals Company has opened a road to its bauxite deposits in preparation for mining operations in the near future; [37] (3) in Peru, American Smelting and Refining will soon begin the development of its copper properties in the south, which will assist materially in the development of the surrounding area; (4) a new paper box plant is being constructed in Mexico.

Para. 10. Encouragement of Fiscal, Budgetary and Other Measures

The U.S. has continued bilateral discussions with Brazil and Chile on their budgetary and fiscal problems. Chile has sought advice from the International Monetary Fund on reforming its exchange control system and, as a preliminary step, altered the peso dollar rate from 110 to 1 to 200 to 1 on November 10.

The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund continue to advise various Latin American countries, including Costa Rica, Honduras, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Panama and Peru, on budget, fiscal and other measures essential to economic progress. Guatemalan requests of the U.S. for such assistance are being considered.

Treasury officials have consulted with financial representatives from Brazil, Mexico and Peru concerning their internal and foreign payments situations, including visiting each of these countries for discussions. The Secretary of the Treasury, at the Annual Meetings of the Fund and International Bank and at the Rio Economic Conference, also urged the adoption of policies which would contribute to economic stability.

The United States is considering a Mexican request to convert the existing Stabilization Agreement into a direct, long-term loan of $75 million for the purpose of supporting the peso at its present rate.

The Technical Cooperation Program has increased training in the general field of public administration, thereby encouraging improvements in fiscal and budgetary operations.

During this period, the only drawings by Latin American countries on the International Monetary Fund have been $22.5 million drawn by Mexico shortly after a standby arrangement for $50 million was made with the Fund on April 16, 1954. A possible drawing by Chile is now being discussed. At the end of September 1954 (latest data available), cumulative net drawings on the Fund by Latin American countries were as follows:

Country	Millions of Dollars
Bolivia	2.5
Brazil	65.5
Chile	8.8
Mexico	22.5
	100.2

The standby agreement with Mexico, originally authorized for a six months' period, was extended on October 16 for an additional 12 months. There is also in effect a one-year standby agreement with Peru for $12.5 million, established February 17, 1954.

Para. 11. Information Program and Related Activities

The U.S. Information Agency total dollar support for its programs in Latin America over the period 1954–56 is as follows:

1956	7,490,000	(est.)

The 1955 program, while showing only a minor increase in funds over 1954, has during the first six months of the fiscal year been reoriented so as to deliver more impact in the priority countries such as Brazil, Chile, Bolivia and Guatemala. The President's "Atoms for Peace" proposal, the Rio Economic Conference, and the pertinent recommendations of the Milton Eisenhower report on Latin America, have all received continuing emphasis in Agency planning and output. Specific plans for a cooperative information project with Puerto Rico were set in motion.

The FY 1955 program is concentrated on three basic tasks: (a) expounding the free enterprise system and inter-American economic interdependence; (b) exposing the threat of Communism and its influence in the area; and (c) demonstrating the positive values of democracy as exemplified by American life and culture. Among the specific projects which have been put in motion during the past six months to support these three themes are the following:

(1) Economic Interdependence. A definable Latin American Economic Information Project was established in July, involving both field and media production of materials. Production has been undertaken on six pamphlets in Spanish and Portuguese dealing with the role of private investment in the development of the Americas, with provision for 200,000 copies of each for distribution in Latin America. Production has commenced on six economic posters paralleling the subject matter of these pamphlets and will be produced in quantities permitting widespread distribution. Writer-photographer teams are now completing their assignments throughout Latin America of collecting material on which USIS field output will be based in support of exploitable aspects of FOA activities. Production of a series of 14 half-hour dramatic programs is being completed with the current delivery of the first two scripts. Production of two films entitled "New Horizons" and "Latin American Economic Highlights for 1954" is about 50% completed. An economic bookshelf has been selected, demonstration sets sent to the field for presentation, and selected titles will be translated and published under contracts now being negotiated in Mexico. One illustrated book on the U.S. geography and growth, produced by IPS, has been translated into Spanish and Portuguese and will be distributed in volume. A second illustrated book on the U.S. economy has been contracted for and preliminary draft text prepared. Two new films on hemisphere economic interdependence are about 50% completed; seven short films relating to development of underdeveloped areas, made by the Puerto Rican government, are being purchased for distribution to the field; a series of films on FOA activities in Brazil, Chile, Bolivia, Peru and Ecuador is about 40% completed; a film on FOA in Haiti has been completed and is ready for the field; a film on a visit to the U.S. by directors of Brazilian agricultural schools to the U.S. has been completed; a film on establishment of labor unions in Honduras has been completed. At the Rio Economic Conference, intensive news coverage was provided at the Conference by a five-man team from the Agency, assisted by USIS Rio; tapes of interviews, photos, newsreel footage and special film footage, and press features were prepared on the spot and sent to the Agency as well as forwarded direct to other posts in the area for fast coverage. Seven of thirteen monthly newsreels produced locally by USIS Brazil have been released for theatrical distribution in that country; contracts are being negotiated in Mexico for the translation and publication of books especially selected to meet objectives under the theme of economic interdependency.

(2) Exposing Communism. Production of six anti-Communist posters and six new anti-Communist pamphlets is under way. USIS Mexico produced a basically anti-Communist cartoon book for Central American posts to the number of 90,000 copies, and kept this area supplied with political cartoons by Latin American artists. Two anti-Communist cartoon strips are produced and appear in from 300 to 350 Latin American newspapers. Scripts for a series of 26 anti-Communist dramatic radio shows were furnished Cuba. Ten similar scripts were furnished Guatemala. The "Fall of the Titan" appeared in a recorded four-part series. A 14 part packaged dramatic anti-Communist show and a complete 13 part show were also sent to the field for broadcasts. The PAO in Panama recorded a series of 18 interviews in Spanish with a Polish ex-slave laborer and also made arrangements for the Caribbean Forces Network to record a similar series in English. Over 800 books on anti-Communism were recently sent to Latin America. Four anti-Communist books were translated into Spanish and six into Portuguese. One anti-Communist film on Guatemala was produced and another was acquired and circulated; six from other areas were distributed.

(3) Positive Values of Democracy. The Binational Center program has been strengthened by reorganizing the grantee personnel system, basing salary scales and allowances on those of the Foreign Service Staff, in order to give more security to employees and enable the Agency to retain and recruit outstanding center personnel. Approximately ten major exhibits on various phases of American life were shipped to the field as well as a number of smaller special requests. At least 96,000 books and publications were sent to the field for Center and presentation use (including economic and anti-Communist). Five of the "Our Times" film series were furnished. An historical film "Coast to Coast" is being processed for distribution. "Report to Youth" is nearing completion. Nine books on positive themes were translated into Spanish and six into Portuguese. From 75 to 100 radio "Special Events" were furnished the field, including interviews, special programs and musical transcriptions or special musical events.

(4) Other projects. In support of the President's "Atoms for Peace" proposal, USIA has conducted an intense effort, utilizing its press, radio, motion picture and book programs. Of special significance is the exhibit entitled "Atoms for the Benefit of Mankind" which has been showing in Sao Paulo since August in participation with the 400th anniversary celebration of the city. By December the total attendance at this exhibit had reached 300,000, including visitors from throughout the world. A color film on this exhibit has been completed and is being readied for film distribution. Also, a panel exhibit entitled "Atoms for Peace" has been sent to each post in Latin America.

Special "short term" assistance has been given to USIS Chile to support the U.S. position in relation to the critical economic situation existing in that country. Similar support was given to USIS Brazil before and during the recent elections, including the production and use of a study of the ties existing between the Brazilian Communists and Soviet Russia.

The Wireless File has been converted to a Spanish language news service and other steps have been taken to expedite its local distribution to newspapers and radio stations.

An agreement was reached with the government of Puerto Rico providing for the cooperation of USIA in distributing films, pamphlets and other materials support U.S. objectives produced under the Puerto Rican Information program. Such materials are already being used overseas by USIA and are particularly effective in Latin America.

The Agency cooperated with a task force during the Guatemalan crisis in selecting documentary material, through the cooperation of the new anti-communist government, which was used in the output of the Agency. At the time of, and subsequent to the Guatemalan Revolution, the Agency sent guidances, books, pamphlets, press and radio commentaries and stories to the field to enable field personnel to understand and then publicize the extent of Moscow ties to the Arbenz regime and elsewhere in Latin America.

As a result of provision written into the Exchange of Persons program appropriation by the Congress, an increase in the Latin American program was required. The total allocation to Latin America was increased to $1,818,534 (FY 1955) from $1,027,714 (FY 1954). Allocation under this appropriation for the American Schools in Latin American areas went to $175,000 (FY 1955) from $128,250 (FY 1954). Particular emphasis is being placed on leader awards and grants in educational and informational fields.

Overt activities are described under paragraphs 6 and 11 above.

Para. 13. Encourage acceptance of concept that each Latin American Government is responsible for maximum contribution to (1) internal security, (2) self-defense, and (3) the allied defense effort

All progress reported on all military courses of action constitutes progress with respect to this specific course of action.

Colombia has continued to maintain one frigate in support of the United Nations' defense effort in the Far East.

No progress has been made with respect to the U.S. desire for resumption of military staff talks with Venezuela.

Para. 14. Provision of military assistance consistent with agreed defense plans

The Department of State and Defense are exploring the possibility of extending grant military assistance to Guatemala. To this end a survey of the capabilities of Guatemala to absorb, utilize and maintain U.S. military equipment that might be offered under the provisions of Section 105, Public Law 665,[38] was conducted. The results of the survey are being studied by the Department of Defense.

Bilateral Military Assistance Agreements were signed with Nicaragua and Honduras in April and May respectively. Each country has received U.S. equipment for one infantry battalion.

Negotiations for a bilateral Military Assistance Agreement with Haiti will begin in January.

Following the decision of the Colombian Government to withdraw its infantry battalion from Korea, it was decided to permit the battalion to retain its equipment provided the Colombian Government would agree to maintain the battalion as a unit under the MDAP program. The Colombian Government agreed, and the bilateral military plan[39] has been amended accordingly. Because the unit retained its equipment, it is a militarily effective unit immediately able to perform its mission.

MDA programs are continuing in Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Peru, and Uruguay.

Army MDA programs have been initiated in Honduras and Nicaragua. A naval MDA program was commenced in Uruguay.

In summary, the combined force goals for which the U.S. has furnished military equipment through MDAP as of 1 December 1954 are:

Army	—1 Regimental Combat Team
	—8 Anti-aircraft Battalions
	—3 Infantry Battalions
	—1 Recon. Sq. (Mecz)
Navy	—19 Warships
	—44 Other Vessels
	—1 Composite Recon. Squadron

[38] Mutual Security Act of 1954, approved Aug. 26, 1954; for text, see 68 Stat. 832.

[39] For documentation on the military plan, see pp. 766 ff.

Air Force —20 Combat Squadrons
—1 Transport Squadron

The value of military grant aid shipments to Latin America during the period 1 May 1954–30 September 1954 was $15.6 millions.

Value of grant aid obligated since the program began, by country, are as follows: (as of 30 September 1954)

Country	In Millions of Dollars
Chile	10.5
Colombia	7.5
Cuba	1.2
Dominican Republic	.1
Ecuador	4.8
Honduras	.4
Nicaragua	.4
Peru	7.0
Total	$110.4

The Department of Defense is studying requests for increased support of Brazilian and Cuban Forces.

Para. 15. Assumption by the U.S. of responsibility for military operations and acceptance of U.S. military control by other nations

Recognition of U.S. responsibility by Latin American Governments is realized upon consummation of bilateral military assistance agreements, and in the approval by Latin American countries of the IADB General Military Plan for Defense of the American Continent. To date all countries except Mexico, Venezuela, and Guatemala have approved this Plan.

The United States and Netherlands military negotiators reached an agreement on 11 November [40] whereby the United States would have sole responsibility for protecting the sea communications in the Caribbean, and the Netherlands Government would have responsibility for the local defense of its territory in that area.

*Includes $52.6 millions of W.W. II lend-lease ships the title to which was transferred to Brazil. [Footnote in the source text.]

Para. 16. Reciprocal Use of Bases Established with U.S. Aid

The Department of Defense has forwarded to the Department of State, for negotiation with Brazil, a new base rights agreement [41] which would guarantee continued use of existing facilities and acquire a guided missile observation station and a communication relay facility.

Para. 18. Protection of Sources and Processing Facilities (Strategic Materials)

No progress to report.

Para. 19. Impact of Military Effort on Economic Stability

All U.S. agencies continue to consider the economic conditions existing in those countries seeking grant and reimbursable assistance. However, the Latin appetite for military equipment remains an obstacle to effective U.S. efforts to keep purchases of military equipment within their economic capacity. U.S. denial of military equipment in consonance with this course of action, along with other reasons, has often resulted in acquisition from sources other than U.S. to the distinct detriment of U.S. standardization objectives as set forth in para. 20*e*. Examples:

(1) Substantial purchases by Ecuador including jets from Great Britain.
(2) Colombia's contract with Sweden for two ships.
(3) Chile's barter with Great Britain—copper for jets.

Para. 20a. Continued Planning within Multilateral and Bilateral Military Agencies

Bolivia, El Salvador, Nicaragua, and Paraguay approved the IADB general military plan. Guatemala announced intent to do so.

U.S. intelligence on Soviet capabilities was provided the IADB for planning purposes.

A new mapping and charting agreement between the United States and Mexico is under consideration by JMUSDC.

Brazil and the U.S. are considering the formation of a Combined Board on Defense, Brazil-United States (CBD-BUS).

Para. 20b. Military Training Missions

A new Army Mission Agreement was signed with El Salvador on September 23.[42] The Army Mission Agreement with Colombia was extended indefinitely [43] or until such time as it is superseded by an Agreement being negotiated. Negotiations are still proceeding with Bolivia, Ecuador, Guatemala, Paraguay and Peru [44] for the extension of existing agreements or signing of new ones.

The Navy Mission Agreements with Brazil,[45] Colombia, and Ecuador [46] were extended indefinitely but a new agreement is being negotiated with Colombia which, when signed, will supersede the existing agreement.

The Air Force Agreement with Colombia was recently extended indefinitely but negotiations are continuing on a new agreement which, when signed, will supersede the existing agreement. Negotiations are continuing on new agreements or extension of existing agreements with Bolivia,[47] Ecuador, Guatemala and Paraguay.

Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Honduras, Nicaragua and Venezuela requested the assignment of additional personnel to Army Missions. Manpower limitations have, to date, prevented fulfillment of all requests.

An additional officer has been assigned to the U.S. Naval Advisory Group in Argentina.

Colombia has requested augmentation of the U.S. Naval Mission to include Marine Corps personnel with a view to development of a Colombian Marine Corps.

The U.S. Navy is endeavoring to fulfill an Ecuadoran request for additional mission personnel.

Para. 20c. Military Training in U.S. Service Schools and Training Centers

U.S. policy with respect to training under the grant aid program was broadened to permit payment of transportation, per diem and course costs for all Latin American trainees.

The Army provided training in the U.S. for 136 Latin Americans during FY 1954. The quota for FY 1955 has been increased 75%. Additionally, 714 Latin Americans received training in the U.S. Army Caribbean School located in the Canal Zone, during FY 1954. The quota for FY 1955 has been increased 30%.

The U.S. Navy allotted quotas for 505 Latin American students to attend Naval Schools in the U.S. during FY 1955.

The USAF provided specialized training in the U.S. for 173 Latin American students during the period of this report. Additionally, 500 Latin American students received training in the USAF school at Albrook AFB, Canal Zone.

Six Latin American students are enrolled in the U.S. Military Academy, and eleven are attending the U.S. Naval Academy. A quota of 20 is authorized at each Academy.

Spaces for Latin American students are authorized by law at the Air Force Academy and applications for admission will be accepted the first year after a full four-year student body is present.

U.S. Ambassadors in Latin America have been requested to advise their host governments concerning the availability of quotas at the Military and Naval Academies.

Para. 20d. Foster closer relations between Latin American and U.S. military personnel

During the period of this report, the military departments were hosts to the following Latin American military dignitaries who accepted official invitations to visit the U.S:

(1) Army
Ecuador—Minister of Defense [48]

(2) Navy
Argentina—Secretary of the Navy [49]
Mexico—Secretary of the Navy [50]
Venezuela—Chief of Naval Operations

(3) Air Force
Chile—Chief of Staff, Air Force
Peru—Air Minister
Venezuela—Chief of Staff, Air Force

The USAF was host for a three-week tour of the United States of 90 Argentine Air Force officers and cadets.

[48] Maj. Reinaldo Varea Dónoso.
[49] Rear Adm. Aníbal Osvaldo Olivieri.
[50] Gen. Rodolfo Sanchez Taboada.

U.S. military forces in cooperation with the Red Cross participated in disaster relief operations in Costa Rica, Guatemala, and Haiti, and on two occasions each in Panama and Honduras.

The Department of the Army presented, or approved for presentation, ten U.S. military decorations to members of Latin American armed forces in recognition of services rendered to inter-American military collaboration as follows: Brazil, 2; Chile, 1; Colombia, 3; Ecuador, 1; Haiti, 1; Venezuela, 2.

The Commanding General, U.S. Army, Caribbean,[51] representing the U.S. and the UN Command, with a thirty one-man honor guard, participated in the official homecoming ceremonies of the Colombian Battalion from Korea; presented two U.S. military decorations to officers of the battalion; and awarded the Presidential Unit Citation to the battalion for combat actions while serving with the United Nations Command in Korea.

In October the Vice Chief of Staff, U.S. Army,[52] accompanied by the Senior U.S. Army Delegate to the Inter-American Defense Board, visited Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, Peru and Venezuela. They were received by highest government officials in all countries visited.

The Department of the Army sponsored an Inter-American Defense Board visit to Army installations. Troop demonstrations were observed at Fort Jackson, South Carolina, and Fort Bragg, North Carolina.

Para. 20e. Standardization—Facilitating Purchase of U.S. Equipment

The Mutual Security Act of 1954 permits the sale of military equipment on credit, but made no provision for financing such credit. This problem has been temporarily solved by financing such sales with Defense Department funds. The Air Force, in the case of a sale to Peru, and the Army, in the case of a sale to Guatemala, financed the credit from its own funds. In addition to a permanent solution to the financing problem, criteria for granting credit are required. While no particular problem exists with respect to Peru and Venezuela, whose credit standings are good, such countries as Chile, Brazil, Ecuador, etc., which have very unsatisfactory economic situations, pose a real problem.

The Department of Defense has been unable to accede to requests from Latin American countries for the purchase of naval vessels because of the unavailability of the ships that they require. However, in view of the historically close collaboration between the U.S. and Brazil and the significance of contributions desired from Brazil in the way of base facilities (see para. 17 above) the Department of Defense is considering the loan of an escort carrier to Brazil but will not be prepared to supplement such loan with aircraft for carrier employment.

As of 30 April, Army matériel valued at approximately $16.4 million had been delivered to Latin America under the reimbursable provisions of MDAP. As of 30 September an additional $3.1 million worth had been shipped.

Under the reimbursable provisions of the Mutual Security Act, Colombia purchased six T-33's; Cuba received two T-33's. Three F-51's were delivered to Guatemala and fifty AT-6's were delivered to Brazil.

U.S. Army, Caribbean Demonstration Teams visited Bolivia, Colombia, Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Peru and Venezuela, demonstrating U.S. matériel.

In order to expedite delivery of spare parts, the Army established a procedure whereby emergency requirements for spare parts can be met from Army stocks in the U.S. Caribbean Command.

A U.S. destroyer visited Venezuela during the period 5-10 April 1954 and conducted a series of orientation visits for Venezuelan naval personnel.

A destroyer division exercised with ASW ships and other units of the Brazilian Navy off Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, during the period 21-22 July 1954.

The U.S. military forces are sponsoring a translation program that will supply Spanish speaking military forces in Latin America with selected training publications.

UNITED STATES POLICY REGARDING HEMISPHERE DEFENSE; PROVISION OF ARMAMENTS AND MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO THE OTHER AMERICAN REPUBLICS [1]

720.5 MSP/2-1952 : Circular airgram

SECRET WASHINGTON, February 19, 1952.

Careful note has been taken in the Department of Embassy Lima's informative and thoughtful secret despatch No. 801 of January 29, 1952 [3] reporting the interest demonstrated by the Argentine and Chilean Ambassadors in Lima in finding out the nature and amount of prospective U.S. military grant aid to Peru, and also pointing out certain of the difficulties likely to be encountered in administering this program so as to avoid accentuation of intergovernmental distrust and jealousy resulting from concern lest one country be strengthened militarily to the disadvantage of its neighbors. In addition to the Embassy's very appropriate comments to the Ambassador of Chile [4] regarding the basic purposes of the program and the overriding importance of strengthening collective defense against the existing threat to the free world, and references to the manner in which European countries appear to have overcome fears that US aid would lead to imbalances of power disadvantageous to their own security, the following may be helpful as background for discussions of these questions with officials of other American governments: (In view of the general interest in these questions, this message is being repeated to all missions in the other American republics.)

It is important to impress upon those who express concern that US aid will strengthen neighbor against neighbor, that a fundamental assumption upon which the program has been developed is that the fortunate condition of peace which has been established in the hemisphere through the faithful observance of inter-American commitments to settle disputes by peaceful means makes it possible, as stated in Resolution IV of the Washington Meeting of Consultation,[5] "for each of the Republics to concentrate the development of its capabilities upon the tasks best adapted to the role each is best qualified to assume in the collective defense against aggression." The US military aid program is not directed at strengthening any American republic against another American republic, but toward the defense of the community of American republics against aggression. We believe, in the first place, that the danger of aggression among members of the inter-American community does not exist, but that if by any chance such danger or threat should develop it will be overcome by the effective application of the measures of collective defense established within the inter-American system. While it must be realistically recognized that long-held and time-worn antipathies continue to exist, and the era of distrust and recrimination between certain of the American republics has by no means ended, the fact of the matter is that, as Assistant Secretary Miller stated during the presentation of the Military Assistance Program to Congress, "One of the most conspicuous triumphs of Hemisphere cooperation has been and continues to be the extent to which the threat or use of force in the international relations of the American States has been eliminated." Mr. Miller went on to say, "I believe that we have reached the point where no American state has reason to apprehend the danger of aggression from any other American state."

With reference to questions regarding the nature and amount of assistance to any one government it should be noted that, under present plans, it is not anticipated that information regarding the dollar value of US military assistance to any one Latin American country will be made public, nor will this information be made available to the country receiving aid. Actual assistance will be given in the form of end items of equipment, and services and training aimed at making up deficiencies in units of the armed forces of the recipient which are to be prepared for the performance of missions important to hemisphere defense. The principal basis for comparison of assistance from country to country, therefore, will be with respect to the units of forces being so prepared; variations will be related to the size and importance of the missions the respective governments prepare forces to perform.

For your information only, the bilateral military plans being negotiated along with the Military Assistance Agreements provide that armed forces units which receive US assistance in the form of equipment, training or services will be designated as "Western Hemisphere defense task units" which will participate in missions important to the defense of the Western Hemisphere. Although no definite plans for publicity regarding such units have been made, consideration is being given to the question of whether there are suitable ways in which appropriate information regarding such units can be released, by mutual agreement, in a manner best caculated to insure that the constructive purposes of the program and the objective of strengthening collective defense will be emphasized. Comments of Embassies receiving this airgram on this matter will be appreciated.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, March 4, 1952.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In his letter of 10 October 1951,[1] the Under Secretary of State [2] sought the concurrence of the Department of Defense in a specific formulation of the reimbursement policy in its application to negotiations with Brazil and other Latin American Governments for troops for Korea. He also recommended that the proposed formulation apply to the Government of Colombia, if that Government were to indicate its inability to maintain, on a current basis, full dollar reimbursement or some other form of settlement for logistic support furnished by the United States.

The proposal put forward by the Under Secretary of State has been given careful consideration both within the Military Departments and the Department of Defense. Early in the consideration of this question, however, it became apparent that a complete review of past experience and practices in the application of the reimbursement policy was essential, if the proposed formulation was to be considered in its proper relationship to the broader aspects of the concept of reimbursement. The outcome of this review established that:

(1) The formulation proposed by the Under Secretary of State is within the terms of the reimbursement policy established by the Defense Department directive of 1 September 1950; [3] but in those cases where the transfer cannot be brought within the terms of Section 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act,[4] because it is determined that prompt payment in U.S. dollars cannot be made, or payment offered in foreign currency is not readily convertible into dollars, the matter should be referred to the National Security Council for decision; and

(2) The United States, in its capacity as the Unified Command, should be guided hereafter by the following procedure in considering offers of military assistance for Korea:

(a) Upon the receipt of an offer of military assistance, it should be submitted by the Department of State to the Department of Defense for recommendation as to its military acceptability.

(b) Simultaneously with (a), the Department of State, in cooperation with the Department of the Treasury, Bureau of the Budget and appropriate representatives of the Department of Defense and Military Department concerned, should reach a determination with the offering government as to the basis on which payment will be made. If it is determined that payment will be made on the basis of prompt reimbursement in U.S. dollars or readily convertible foreign currency, the Department of Defense should be informed accordingly. If, on the other hand, it is determined that payment will be made on a basis other than prompt payment in U.S. dollars or readily convertible foreign currency, assuming the military acceptability of the offer, the matter should then be referred by the Department of State to the National Security Council for decision.

It is the view of the Department of Defense that the negotiation of master agreements relating to the participation of foreign contingents in Korea, including the specific question of whether reimbursement will be in U.S. dollars, readily convertible currency or on some other basis, is primarily a political function and should be a responsibility of the Department of State. Accordingly, all cases wherein the negotiation of master agreements either has not been commenced and/or concluded with governments whose forces are receiving U.S. logistic support in Korea, would be transferred to, and be made a responsibility of, the Department of State. Under this arrangement, the Department of State would undertake the necessary negotiations with the Government of Colombia.

It is not intended by the preceding paragraph to affect the responsibility of the Department of Defense, either in the case of presently accepted or future offers of military assistance, for the negotiation of technical and administrative arrangements subsidiary to, and contingent upon, the effecting of master agreements. The appropriate Military Departments should retain responsibility for negotiating the collection and payment of U.S. dollars or readily convertible currency wherever the master agreement negotiated by the Department of State provides for such type of reimbursement.

The foregoing procedure accordingly is submitted to the Department of State for its consideration and concurrence. Similar letters have been addressed to the Secretary of Treasury and Director of the Bureau of the Budget. Appropriate modification in the language of the reimbursement policy will be undertaken by this Department when interdepartmental agreement to the procedures set forth above has been achieved.

Sincerely yours, WILLIAM C. FOSTER

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller) to the Chairman of the United States Delegation to the Inter-American Defense Board (Walsh) [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 13, 1952.

MY DEAR GENERAL WALSH: Reference is made to Lt. Colonel Sharkey's [2] memorandum of February 14, 1952 [3] requesting that the United States Delegation, Inter-American Defense Board, be given comments on the General Military Plan for the Defense of the American Continent [4] which was prepared pursuant to Resolution III [5] of the Fourth Meeting of Consultation of Ministers of Foreign Affairs of American States. In view of the fact that, as the Secretary of State was informed in a letter from Colonel K. R. Kreps [6] dated February 14, 1952,[7] the Joint Chiefs of Staff have indicated to the Chairman, U.S. Delegation, IADB, that he may inform the Chairman, IADB,[8] that the United States Government has approved the Plan, the following comments of the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs on certain political aspects of the document are forwarded on an informal basis.

It is deemed politically important that the Plan, in providing the general framework for defense planning by the American Republics, should offer adequate sanction or authorization for the development by the United States Government and the Latin American governments concerned of bilateral defense plans of the kind now being negotiated with certain of the Latin American governments in connection with the U.S. military grant aid program. It is assumed that the definition of maritime sectors and the indication of "responsibility for planning and coordination of operations" in the Caribbean–Panama–Galapagos sector (Section V C 2*a* and 2*b*) and the "Detailed Plans of Action" in Section VII are regarded as being adequate to provide such authorization. If this assumption is correct, it would be helpful for this Bureau to be in a position to so explain the matter to representatives of other governments who may raise questions as to this point.

It is also believed desirable that it be clearly understood that whatever commitments the United States Government may assume in connection with this Plan are those which have to do with planning of a purely military character. It has been noted, for example, that Section IV B, "Basic Defense Aims", includes a statement to the effect that "to achieve the necessary military defensive capacity it is indispensable . . . to tend toward dispersion throughout the Continent of the present industrial concentrations . . ." and that "this industrial development would be accomplished by stimulating, through mutual, technical and material aid, the creation of new centers and the development of those already existing." However accurate such an estimate may be from a military point of view, it would be politically and economically undesirable for other American States to conclude from the Plan that the United States Government is committed to aid in the accomplishment of such dispersion or industrial decentralization as the other American Republics might desire. Similarly, question is raised with respect to that portion of Section VI, "Basic Objectives" dealing with "Internal Security." Although the footnote to this section makes it appear that it is related exclusively to certain military aspects of the problem, several of the activities suggested, such as "strict inspection of passports," and "planning, organizing, and training for civil defense" would appear to go beyond the strictly military field.

As indicated above, these comments are directed at certain of the aspects of the Plan which might have political importance, and which you may wish to take into consideration in expressing approval of the document.[9]

Sincerely yours, EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

[9] In his reply to Assistant Secretary Miller, dated Mar. 20, 1952, Major General Walsh stated in part the following: "The points which you make are pertinent. I think it would be best not to bring them up specifically in transmitting the U.S. Government approval of the Plan to the Board, but rather to indicate that we are accepting the Plan on a military basis only." Memorandum by the Deputy Under Secretary of State (Matthews) to the Executive Secretary of the National Security Council (Lay) [1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 18, 1952.

Subject: Sixth Progress Report on NSC 56/2, "United States Policy Toward Inter-American Military Collaboration." [2]

NSC 56/2 was approved as governmental policy on May 19, 1950. It is requested that this Progress Report as of March 7, 1952 be circulated to the members of the Council for their information.

1. The Mutual Security Act of 1951 [3] authorized, and the Congress later made, an appropriation of $38,150,000 to furnish grant military assistance to the other American Republics. This assistance, according to a provision of the Act is to be furnished "only in accordance with defense plans which are found by the President to require the recipient country to participate in missions important to the defense of the Western Hemisphere." The President on December 14 made the finding necessary to authorize the inclusion of eight countries in the military grant aid program for Latin America, paving the way for an approach to be made to the governments of Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, Mexico, Peru and Uruguay to enter into (a) negotiation of a Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement required by the Act; and (b) to secure their agreement to bilateral military plans related to their performance of missions important to the defense of the hemisphere (generally outside their national territory), and the provision of U.S. assistance in preparation of specific units of their armed forces for that purpose. Bolivia and the Dominican Republic were included in the finding as alternates, while Argentina and Venezuela were included pending the resolution of certain circumstances as indicated below.

The agreements which will be or are being negotiated are similar to those concluded with the NATO countries; and the defense tasks, which are the subject of separate bilateral secret military plans also being negotiated, would, in most cases, involve missions similar to those which the U.S. had to perform in World War II, and which we otherwise would have to perform in the event of aggression against the Western Hemisphere.

Bilateral negotiations to carry out the military grant aid provisions of the Mutual Security Act of 1951 were initiated with Brazil (January 4), Peru (January 7), Ecuador (January 15), Chile and Colombia (January 22), Cuba (January 30), and with Mexico (February 6). Uruguay is the only one of the eight countries approached which has not yet agreed to negotiate, although there is some prospect of initiating negotiations with this country before March 15.

Military Assistance Agreements have now been signed with Ecuador (February 20) [4] and Peru (February 22).[5] In each case a Secret Bilateral Military Plan concerning the defense tasks to be performed and the forces which will be readied with U.S. assistance was initiated [initialed].[6] Negotiations with Mexico were suspended (February 23), and there is no prospect that they will be reopened in the foreseeable future. Although the Mexican Government entered into negotiations after their nature had been fully explained, it soon became apparent that their officials had no intention or desire of actually coming to an agreement which would be acceptable under our statutory requirements. Negotiations are continuing with Brazil, Chile, Colombia and Cuba.

Two important Latin American governments, Argentina and Venezuela, were included tentatively in the President's finding, but approaches in each case will not be made, pending the clarification of certain circumstances. Based primarily on military considerations, Argentina was included in the finding, but the political situation in Argentina was of such a nature that negotiations with the country on this subject were delayed until a more appropriate time. Venezuela was included tentatively in the list of countries proposed as recipients of grant military aid, pending verification, when the bilateral military staff conversations with Venezuela are resumed, of the ability and willingness of the Venezuelan Government to pay its own way in procuring the equipment required by those forces which it should support in order to carry out vital hemisphere defense missions.

While the specific missions which all these countries will be asked to agree to undertake are based on a current U.S. war plan, the general concept of this plan is reflected in the Common Defense Scheme for the American Continent,[7] outlined in NSC 56/2, which was developed multilaterally in the Inter-American Defense Board, and is also reflected in the General Military Plan for the Defense of the American Continent. Formal approval of the Common Defense Scheme or of the General Military Plan by each of the countries involved, will be a prerequisite to receipt of military grant aid under this program.

2. The General Military Plan for the Defense of the American Continent which was prepared by the Inter-American Defense Board pursuant to Resolution III of the Fourth Meeting of Consultation of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs was approved by the Inter-American Defense Board on November 15, 1951, and has been submitted to the member governments for their consideration and acceptance. To date the following governments have approved the General Military Plan, which was submitted to the member nations of the Inter-American Defense Board on December 12, 1951; other approvals will undoubtedly follow when sufficient time for study has elapsed: Argentina, Honduras and Uruguay.

3. Some of the requirements of Latin American countries for equipment, training and services which are met from U.S. sources will continue to be furnished on a reimbursable basis. The high cost of available equipment and the low priority assigned to Latin America for its allocation continues to make it difficult for the U.S. at present to allow the Latin American nations to procure the many major items of new equipment which are needed, or spare parts and maintenance items necessary for equipment previously received from the U.S. While it is anticipated that the receipt of military grant aid will ameliorate this situation to a certain extent in some countries, a number of Latin American governments show an increasing interest in purchasing substantial amounts of low-cost arms from NATO surplus, and, in some cases, notably Ecuador and Bolivia, from countries behind the Iron Curtain. The Department of Defense has at present under consideration a paper [8] to consider what action if any should be taken by the U.S. with respect to exports of military equipment by NATO countries to the other American Republics.

The continued purchase, in any large scale, of equipment, either from NATO sources or Iron Curtain countries, would, of course, affect the long-range policy of arms standardization, interfere with the usefulness of the U.S. Service Missions in Latin America, and make it increasingly difficult to achieve effective collective military action in this hemisphere. While under the terms of the Battle Act,[9] the U.S. is not at present in a position to object to the purchase of arms from behind the Iron Curtain by Latin American countries, if the transaction is based purely on currency payments, it must consider carefully the eligibility of any foreign government to receive further military, economic or fi-

Subject: Meeting with Deputy Representatives on US Delegation to the Inter-American Defense Board

The meeting was held by mutual agreement to discuss various matters of current concern in connection with military co-operation with Latin America, including proposed items for inclusion in the next progress report to the National Security Council on NSC 56/2.

(1) Information Re Grant Aid Deliveries etc.—Colonel Crawford read a telegram [7] which had been received from Major General Mullins (JBUSDC) in Rio inquiring what General Goes Monteiro could be told in response to the latter's request for information on the deliveries which would be made under the MSP to any of the other Latin American countries during 1952. General Goes Monteiro, it was presumed, desired this information in connection with securing ratification of the MSP Agreement in the Brazilian Congress. Colonel Crawford read a proposed reply [8] outlining certain general information regarding shipments of this material planned for eligible countries and publicity related thereto, but indicating that any more detailed information on amounts and types of equipment for specific units could not be divulged because agreement had been reached with the recipient countries that this information would remain confidential. Mr. Horton agreed that this was consistent with MSP policy on the non-disclosure of detailed information on grant aid to any third MSP country. Mr. Jamison suggested that it would be important in this case to try to avoid antagonizing General Goes because of his strong U.S. orientation and the important influence which he would have in securing Brazilian ratification of the MSP Agreement. It was agreed that Colonel Crawford would consult with Mr. Horton who would ascertain the extent to which General Monteiro could be furnished information within existing directives, and that the reply would be checked with Mr. Spencer.

During the discussion of General Mullins' request, the general question whether specific units being prepared with U.S. grant-aid could or should be identified publicly was raised. The Defense representatives present pointed to the fact that the only mention of the specific "designated" hemisphere defense units is made in the Secret Military Plans and they indicated that they knew of no plans to change that classification. It was pointed out that it would be extremely difficult, once the equipment started rolling, for the fact that identifiable units are receiving U.S. assistance to be kept secret. The suggestion was made that it might, therefore, be desirable to take the initiative and claim whatever propaganda advantage there might be in emphasizing the collective defense nature of the roles which such units would assume in time of emergency. It was also suggested that the IADB might be the appropriate body to receive more detailed information as to the nature and extent of the grant-aid program, but the difficulties implicit in the fact that grant-aid countries are only a few of the total number represented on the Board, and in the general nature of the Board's operations were advanced as arguments against such a course. It was agreed that this problem should be considered further both in Defense and State.

(2) Possible Revision of NSC 56/2.—Colonel O'Connor stated that General Walsh had for some time felt that consideration should be given to a revision of this document to take into account certain of the objectives which had already been achieved, and to include other developments which had not been brought up-to-date. For instance, the detailed policy regarding military grant program is not included in this document, nor is there reference to the method and manner of its implementation. Mr. Jamison indicated that there had also been some need felt in the State Department for such a revision. It was agreed that the possible need for revision of NSC 56/2 and changes which might be required would form the subject of a future meeting of the group.

(3) Inclusion of Training Aircraft in Grant Aid Program.—Mr. Horton explained, in response to inquiry, that while training aircraft as such were not contemplated in the grant program for 1953, there were spare parts and maintenance equipment to be included for countries which already had this type of aircraft. The recent requests of Colombia and Peru for this training aircraft were discussed in this connection.

(4) Netherlands East [West] Indies, JCS Paper.—Mr. Jamison referred to a recent meeting in the State Department in which officers of State were given an opportunity to comment on a draft JCS paper [9] dealing with certain outstanding points related to the Defense of Curacao and Aruba. The paper is to serve as the basis for reaching agreement with the Dutch on certain principles affecting forces which might be used in the Netherlands Indies in time of war or emergency and the command relationships involved; a principal concern of the Dutch being that it might be contemplated that Latin American forces would be stationed in the NEI [NWI]. The Defense representatives indicated that the IADB group in Defense had been given an opportunity to comment on this paper and that it had been changed considerably. It was generally agreed, however, that there was no change in the basic policy that the Dutch could be informed that no utilization of Latin American forces in the NEI [NWI] is contemplated. Since this policy had been reported earlier, it was agreed that it would not be necessary to carry an item on this matter in the report being prepared.

(5) Status of Approval of IADB Military Plan and Annexes to the Plan.—It was agreed that approval of the IADB General Military Plan by the U.S. should be included in the Report on NSC 56/2. Annex 1 of the Plan (Strategic Areas) [10] has been approved by the Council of Delegates, but has not been sent to the Governments. Annex 2 (Intelligence) and Counter Intelligence) [11] has been approved and distributed to the Governments and the JCS have indicated its acceptability to the U.S. In this connection, Mr. Jamison stated that State had not been receiving copies of these IADB documents. Colonel Hall stated that there had been changes of procedures and personnel in the IADB, and he would see to it that a complete set of copies were sent to State from the U.S. Delegation rather than directly from the IADB.

(6) Program of Sale of Jets.—The development of a long range program for sale of jet aircraft to Latin American countries in relation to hemisphere defense requirements was discussed in the light of Defense's disapproval of a Mexican request for jet aircraft, and reports of the interest of the French and the British, in selling jet aircraft in Latin America.

(7) Latin American Procurement from NATO Sources.—The draft policy position paper [12] drafted six months ago in the Department was reported to be still under discussion in Defense. It was stated that this question is being considered as a global problem in the disposal of obsolete NATO equipment to non-NATO areas rather than solely in relation to the effects on our Latin American military policy.

(8) Relationship of Commercial Procurement to Latin American Planning.—The difficulties presented by the probable increased ability of Latin American military representatives to purchase military equipment in the commercial market in the U.S. was discussed in relation to the problem of equipment procurement planning for these countries under the MDAP. It was agreed that this problem should be considered further in connection with possible revision of NSC 56/2.

(9) General Jenkins' letter [13] on Streamlining Present Procedures in the Replacement of Mission Personnel.—Mr. Jamison stated that State's views of the feasibility of the proposal outlined in General Jenkins' letter was still being explored in the Department. It would appear however that if generally acceptable, the new procedure should be applied to Missions of all three Services. General Jenkins' proposal was discussed in some detail, and certain variations were suggested.

(10) Coordination of Visits of US Military Personnel to Latin America and of Latin Americans to the US.—Certain instances of difficulties which have arisen through a lack of coordination between the Services and with State on this problem were discussed. It was agreed that a greater effort should be made to effect the necessary coordination between the interested Departments in the future, and that a summary of recent visits would be furnished by each Service.

(11) Implementation of FY 1953 Grant-aid Program.—Mr. Horton of General Olmsted's [14] office, asked whether any thought was being given in State to the question of whether additional governments should be approved for initiation of military grant-aid negotiations. It was pointed out that, by mutual agreement, between State and Defense, the entire situation was to be reviewed and the necessary decisions made when legislative action on the FY 1953 appropriation was completed. Three of the specific questions were (1) whether an approach should be made to the Dominican Republic; (2) whether any effort should be made to renew negotiations with Mexico; and (3) whether there has been any change in the Argentine situation which would warrant at least reserving the tasks and units being considered for that country. Mr. Horton indicated that it was quite possible that General Olmsted would reopen this question with State in the near future, even though it appeared that legislative action on the appropriation may not be made final until after the political conventions.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 25, 1952.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On June 23 Mr. Foster requested guidance from the Department of State on initiation or renewal of negotiations with certain Latin American countries [2] which the President, on December 14, 1951, found eligible to participate in the military grant-aid program under the Mutual Security Act of 1951.

The Department of State believes that the Dominican Republic should be approached at this time to determine its willingness to conclude a Military Assistance Agreement and a bilateral Military Plan. Accordingly, I suggest that the appropriate officials of our two Departments consult in the near future to determine the best method of carrying out such an approach.

Under present circumstances, an approach to Argentina would have little if any prospect of success in obtaining its agreement to participate in the Latin American program under conditions required by existing policy and legislation. It is therefore considered inadvisable to approach the Argentine Government on this matter. There is also little possibility that the attitude taken by Mexico which caused the suspension of negotiations early this year will become more tractable now that the national elections are over.[3] However, should the Mexican Government desire to renew negotiations upon a basis which would ensure their successful conclusion, its request should be given careful consideration as a step toward closer cooperation in hemisphere defense. In view of

[2] These countries were Argentina, the Dominican Republic, and Mexico, or, alternatively, Bolivia. In the referenced letter of June 23, addressed to the Secretary of State, Deputy Secretary of Defense Foster also stated in part that inasmuch as Venezuela was ready and willing to pay for equipment to meet its military requirements, "unless it appears from a political point of view that Venezuela's omission may threaten the defense and continued flow of Venezuela's materials, Venezuela should not be approached during FY 1953 as a recipient of grant aid." (720.5 MSP/6-2352) recent political disturbances in Bolivia,[4] and uncertainties regarding the policies of the new government of that country, it is recommended that the United States not approach Bolivia as an alternate under the program.

The Department of State believes that this government's attitude toward an approach to Venezuela should not be influenced solely by Venezuela's apparent willingness to pay for military equipment. As you know, delay has been encountered in renewing staff talks which were first begun in 1951 with Venezuelan military officials for the purpose of securing cooperation in protecting installations of great importance to hemisphere defense. This delay, and the resulting failure to achieve a satisfactory basis of military cooperation, appears to be caused primarily by the inability of Venezuela to obtain deliveries of military equipment which it desires to purchase. If it should develop that conclusion of a Military Assistance Agreement and Military Plan under the Mutual Security Act would substantially facilitate Venezuela's agreement on hemisphere defense problems, the State Department would favor initiating the necessary negotiations. I recommend therefore that steps be taken immediately to explore and determine the basis upon which Venezuela's full cooperation in hemisphere defense can be achieved.

The Department of State agrees that final planning of Title IV FY 1953 refined programs for Latin American countries which have qualified or may become eligible to receive grant-aid should proceed as rapidly as possible. It also believes that it would be desirable to retain until the end of the calendar year sufficient flexibility in the program to permit an agreement to be negotiated with Venezuela, and perhaps, with Mexico.

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

720.5 MSP/7-2252 : Circular airgram

SECRET WASHINGTON, July 22, 1952.

The Department of Defense has recommended that a share of the funds appropriated for the FY 1952 grant-aid military assistance program for Latin America be used to assist Brazil, Chile, Colombia and Peru in strengthening existing naval training centers or in establishing new centers. Under the plan outlined by the Department of Defense, each of these centers would provide instruction in the use of U.S. naval equipment. Instructors would be supplied by local naval authorities, who would be expected to appoint personnel which had received training in U.S. Navy schools in the United States.

The U.S. contribution to such training centers would consist primarily of initial equipment, such as training aids, and of guidance which U.S. naval training missions and mobile training teams from the United States would provide local naval authorities in establishing the centers. After the training centers had been established, it would be expected that they would continue in operation on a permanent and locally-sustained basis. The type of training provided by each center would be more or less specialized, depending on the training requirements of the particular country and its capability for making available specialized instructors. For example, the Department of Defense has recommended the following types of training for each of the designated countries: Brazil, engineering, basic electronics; Chile, gunnery and fire control, basic electronics, information training; Colombia, engineering, gunnery, damage control; Peru, anti-submarine warfare, submarine attack, basic electronics.

The Department is informed that, in addition to utilization of such centers for the training of naval personnel of the host countries, the Department of the Navy contemplates that they might also be used, with the consent of the governments concerned, to train naval personnel of other Latin American countries. It is their view that such utilization would encourage Latin American countries to assume a greater share of responsibility for training for hemisphere defense, would promote cooperation among Latin American naval establishments, and would help to overcome the language barrier confronting most Latin American students receiving such training in the United States. The Department has been assured, however, that the provisions of U.S. assistance to the training centers mentioned above would not be contingent upon the prior agreement of the government in which the center exists or is established to provide such training to naval personnel of other countries. While the basis of U.S. assistance in the improvement or establishment of training centers will be arranged through the MAAG, any arrangements for training of foreign students in these centers would be matters for the Governments concerned to work out, and U.S. action would be confined to suggestion and advice. On the basis of informal discussions between U.S. Naval officers and representatives of the Navies of the respective countries, however, the Naval Department believes that suggestions which might be made to this effect would be favorably received.

The Department of Defense is providing the MAAG in each country with more detailed information regarding the naval training program. It is suggested that the Embassy discuss the project with the appropriate MAAG personnel and provide the Department with comments, particularly with reference to that portion of the plan which contemplates the utilization of centers for the training of naval personnel of countries other than that in which the center is located.

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 14, 1952.

Subject: Seventh Progress Report on NSC 56/2, "United States Policy Toward Inter-American Military Collaboration."

NSC 56/2 was approved as governmental policy on May 19, 1950. It is requested that this Progress Report as of September 25, 1952, be circulated to the members of the Council for their information.

1. Grant Aid Military Assistance Program. The Congress appropriated $51,695,750, or the total amount authorized by the Mutual Security Act of 1952,[2] to carry out the grant aid military assistance program for Latin American countries during Fiscal Year 1953. In addition, the Congress has authorized that the unexpended balance of the Fiscal Year 1952 appropriation, which totaled $38,150,000, may be expended during Fiscal Year 1953. The total amount appropriated, $89,835,750, is $10,165,250 less than the amount originally estimated to be required for the two-year program.

Military Assistance Agreements are now fully in effect with Chile,[3] Colombia,[4] Cuba,[5] Ecuador and Peru. Ratification of the Brazilian and Uruguayan Agreements is still pending in the legislatures of both countries.[6] The Brazilian Foreign Minister has informed our Embassy that ratification by the Bazilian Senate probably may take place by the end of October. Some opposition to ratification of the Agreement with Uruguay has been encountered by the Uruguayan Parliament, and the Uruguayan Foreign Minister [7] has requested a clarification of certain Uruguayan obligations under the Agreement.

The Departments of State and Defense agreed that the Dominican Republic should be approached with regard to the initiation of negotiations looking toward the conclusion of a Military Assistance Agreement with that country. By agreement with the Dominican Government, negotiations were begun on September 22.

It is intended that sufficient flexibility should be retained in the program, at least until the end of the present calendar year, to permit a Military Assistance Agreement to be negotiated with Venezuela, and perhaps with Mexico and Argentina, if it should become possible or desirable to include those countries in the grant aid program. At the request of Venezuela, defense talks between U.S. and Venezuelan military representatives have been suspended, without agreement on the types and quantities of U.S. military equipment required by Venezuela to protect the oil fields and meet other Venezuelan defense requirements. Although the talks are expected to be resumed, it would be unrealistic to discount entirely the possibility that Venezuela may not agree to buy, for cash, the equipment required for the protection of the oil fields, and take other security measures necessary for their protection. In view of the important security interest of the United States in the oil fields, it may be desirable to consider the advisability of negotiating a Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement with Venezuela, with a view to providing a part of the equipment required for the protection of the oil fields. While the mutual security negotiations with Mexico were broken off during the heat of the Mexican election campaign, it does not appear likely that the new Mexican administration intends to seek a renewal of these negotiations; however, should such a request be received from the Mexican Government, it would be given careful consideration.

Plans for expanding Brazil's Army mission in hemisphere defense and for providing Brazil with equipment required to perform the expanded mission are now under consideration. If finally approved, these plans would require a revision of the Military Plan between the United States and Brazil, but the negotiations would not be initiated until Brazil has ratified the Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement.

Initial shipments of military equipment under the grant aid program have been made to Cuba, Ecuador, Colombia and Peru. Preparation of a consolidated shipment of Army, Navy and Air Force equipment to Chile has been suspended, pending clarification of the attitude of the newly elected President [8] of that country toward continuance of the Agreement.

Interim Military Assistance Advisory Groups have now been established in those countries where Agreements are fully in effect. In each case, the Chief of one of the U.S. military missions already in the country has been designated acting Chief of the MAAG, for an interim period. Military missions are now performing MAAG functions, except in the case of Chile, where it will be necessary to assign a small complement of Army personnel because there is no Army mission in that country. Consideration is being given to the continued use of existing military missions to assist in carrying out the MAAG functions. This is believed desirable in Latin America in view of the small size of the countries and programs, the background of cooperation existing between missions and the armed forces of the other Governments, the familitarity of the missions with the military problems of the other Governments and the economies which would accrue to the United States and the Latin American countries by such use of mission personnel.

2. Proposed Establishment of Permanent Joint Board on Defense with Brazil.

Successful joint military talks with Brazilian Defense officials in Rio de Janeiro during September [9] led to recommendations to the respective Chiefs of Staff of the two Governments for a reorganization of our cooperative activities with Brazil in the military field along the lines established for U.S.-Canadian military cooperation, through the establishment of a top-level joint board to be known as the Permanent Joint

3. SHORAN Base Negotiations in Haiti.

Arrangements are being finalized by our Embassy in Haiti for an exchange of notes [10] with the Haitian Government on the temporary establishment in Haiti by the U.S. Air Force of a SHORAN control station for ninety days during the conduct of experiments in connection with the tracking of guided missiles.

4. Status of Approval of Inter-American Defense Board "General Military Plan for the Defense of the American Continent", (IADB C-019), and the "Common Defense Scheme for the American Continent", (IADB C-04).

Eight nations, Argentina, Brazil, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Honduras, United States and Uruguay, have approved the "General Military Plan for the Defense of the American Continent", (IADB C-019).

Eleven nations, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Paraguay, Peru, Venezuela and the United States have approved the "Common Defense Scheme for the American Continent", (IADB C-04).

b. Procurement of Arms by Latin American Nations from Sources Other Than the United States.

Mr. Sayre said that as far as it had been possible to determine, the United States had not been consulted on or had prior knowledge of the reported sale by Britain of 70 jets to Brazil in exchange for cotton.

Mr. Jamison referred to the policy paper now pending on requesting NATO countries to consult with the United States before selling military equipment in Latin America and stated that the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs would not be likely to agree to a policy which would preclude Latin American countries from acquiring military equipment from non-U.S. sources until the United States was in a better position to supply Latin American requirements for military equipment.

Colonel Hill commented that while it might not be possible or advisable to attempt to discourage sales of military equipment to Latin American countries by NATO countries, he thought it might be possible to prevent NATO countries from sending missions to Latin America because the latter was usually a source of friction. He also suggested, as a possibility, that some system of consultation might be devised so that in those cases in which the United States could not supply the requirements, the Latin American Governments might be directed to a NATO country that supplied the same or similar equipment as that obtainable in the United States.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 23, 1952.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I believe you should be advised of this Department's concern regarding certain proposals of the Defense Department respecting implementation of the grant-aid military assistance program now being conducted under the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended, for certain Latin American countries. As you are aware, each Latin American Government with whom we have concluded a Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement has agreed to make available for United States administrative expenses such amounts of local currency as may be agreed during subsequent negotiations between the United States and the other Government. The Department of State is prepared to commence these negotiations at the earliest practicable date. However, it is essential, if we are to promote Latin American good-will, rather than ill-will, toward the program, that United States administrative costs to be met out of local currency be reduced to the minimum.

Strict economy of costs to be borne by the Governments participating in the Latin American program is essential for a number of reasons. First, the relatively poor economic condition of some countries, such as Ecuador, may make it difficult for them to bear even the cost of minimum United States administrative requirements. Secondly, some Governments may need to obtain appropriations of funds to meet United States requirements from their legislatures, in which case, United States requirements for implementing the program will be exposed to full public scrutiny and become the subject of heated parliamentary and public debate. Thirdly, communist and nationalist elements in Latin America already have made political capital by attacking the Bilateral Military Assistance Agreements, and these elements may be expected to make an issue of large local currency payments in an effort to promote further ill-feeling toward the United States. Finally, if we are to make progress toward the goal of assuring maximum military, economic and political cooperation from Latin American countries during global war, it is essential that all of our Latin American programs and relationships be carried out in a manner best calculated to promote maximum goodwill toward the United States.

The Department of State is particularly concerned regarding the size of Military Assistance Advisory Groups proposed by the Department of Defense and regarding the high cost to the other Governments of mobile training teams planned for the program. Sizeable United States military training missions, which are maintained at the expense of the other Governments, have been operating in most Latin American countries for a number of years. They would appear to be ideally suited to discharge most, if not all, of the responsibilities of the Defense Department under the program, particularly the training of Latin American armed forces in the use of programmed equipment. It would seem possible, by effectively using existing mission personnel, to reduce the number of MAAG personnel and the number of mobile training teams proposed by the Defense Department, and thus to effect a considerable economy on behalf of the other Governments without jeopardizing U.S. interests in the program. Accordingly, this Department suggests consideration of the formula set forth in the following numbered paragraphs as a practicable line of approach to the other Governments during forthcoming negotiations for local currency.

1. The other Government would be requested to receive a Chief of MAAG and one clerical or administrative assistant and to provide local currency required for the maintenance of these personnel during the current fiscal year.
2. The other Government would be informed that United States military training missions will provide training in the use of programmed equipment, whenever possible. When necessary and practicable, non-specialists now assigned to the training missions would be replaced by specialists competent to train in the use of programmed equipment. The other Government would be informed that it might be necessary to increase mission complements slightly, but that the assignment of additional personnel would be kept to a minimum.
3. The other Government would be informed that additional mission personnel would be assigned only with the consent of the other Government. Local currency required for the maintenance of additional personnel would be obtained in the customary manner by means of an exchange of notes with the other Government prior to the assignment of individual personnel.
4. The other Government would be informed that failure to permit the assignment of required personnel, or failure to provide local currency for the maintenance of such personnel, would raise the question of whether the other Government was fulfilling its commitment under the Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement.
5. In countries where a Service Department is contributing to the program, but where that Service Department maintains no training mission, personnel required by that Service Department would be assigned to the Office of the Chief of MAAG.

This formula would: (a) permit effective use of existing training mission personnel; (b) in most countries, obviate the need for sizeable MAAGs and expensive mobile training teams; (c) minimize the amount of local currency initially requested from the other Governments and permit them to provide any additional currency required by the U.S., at the time the need arose for additional U.S. personnel in the other countries; (d) reduce the amount of local currency required by the State Department for administrative support to MAAGs.

If the foregoing formula is acceptable to the Defense Department, the Department of State would appreciate receiving precise local currency requirements of the Defense Department, determined in accordance with this line of approach, so that negotiations with the other Governments for local currency may be commenced at the earliest possible date.

Sincerely yours, DAVID BRUCE

SECRET WASHINGTON, January 16, 1953.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The Department of Defense has reviewed with great interest your letter [1] expressing concern regarding the Department of Defense proposed Military Assistance Advisory Group complements and local currency requirements to implement the grant-aid military assistance program for certain Latin American countries. The Department of Defense, in determining the number of personnel and local currency requirements for the Latin American program, considered in detail all the views expressed by the Department of State.

In a positive effort to satisfy the Department of State request for reconsideration of this problem, the Department of Defense, working in close coordination with the Departments of the Army, Navy and Air Force, has made a complete study to determine the minimum number of personnel for the Military Assistance Advisory Groups in Latin America and to fix a minimum local currency requirement. The figures are contained in an enclosure [2] to this letter. You will note that there has been no reduction in the Military Assistance Advisory Group personnel from the original request submitted to the Department of State on 15 September 1952. The review has shown that these personnel are the bare minimum to implement the program effectively. There has been, however, an appreciable reduction in local currency requirements, especially in currency for the mobile training teams. This has been accomplished either by making a planned deviation in the end-item program or lowering of the training standards to a point barely acceptable.

[2] Enclosure 1, a list titled "Proposed Basic MAAG Complements for Latin American Countries," indicated, inter alia, the number of army, navy, and air force personnel proposed for assignment to the respective Latin American countries included in the grant military assistance program. The total complement recommended for each country was as follows: Chile (10), Colombia (10), Cuba (7), Dominican Republic (9), Ecuador (8), Peru (8), and Uruguay (12). The list further indicated that for Brazil the personnel of the Joint Brazil-United States Military Commission would implement the necessary MAAG.

In general, it is not feasible to replace the supposedly non-specialists now in the Military Missions with specialists to train the host government in the use of programmed equipment. All personnel in the Military Missions are now considered specialists and any change as recommended would deprive the host country of one activity for another, with no material gain. In a few cases, the Services hope to replace personnel in the Military Missions with personnel more suitable under the present concept. This procedure is a very slow process since it must be borne in mind that abrupt changes in military personnel in the Military Missions would result in a large expenditure of United States dollars. When a member of a Military Mission does not complete his contractual term of approximately two (2) years, the entire cost of making any change is borne by the United States Government.

Augmentation of the Military Missions places the individual either in an accredited or non-accredited status. If augmentation is based on an accredited status, it would cost the other country considerably more than it would if the individual were assigned as a member of the Military Assistance Advisory Group. If augmentation is based on a non-accredited status, the United States Government would pay all expenses and the Departments of the Army, Navy and Air Force cannot undertake this additional financial burden nor can administrative funds appropriated under the Mutual Security legislation be made available.

The Department of Defense, as the operating agency, is indeed sympathetic with the views expressed by the Department of State and in no way desires to jeopardize United States interests in the program nor create ill-feeling with the Latin American governments. However, the Department of Defense, which is charged by the Congress with implementation of the Military Assistance Program, must have the means and personnel required to ensure proper performance of necessary functions. If, in the opinion of the Department of State, these provisions for personnel would jeopardize United States interests in any of the recipient Latin American countries, the Department of Defense currently sees no solution except to review the situation to determine whether it might not be in the best interests of the United States to eliminate the program in such countries.

The urgency of a decision in this matter is of paramount interest to the Department of Defense. The Department of Defense, at the request of the Department of the Army, has already suspended a shipment of matériel to Chile due to the lack of qualified personnel in that country to receive the shipment. Since other shipments to the Latin American countries are planned in the near future, it is imperative that a positive course of action be selected in order that the Department of Defense can plan accordingly.

Sincerely yours, WILLIAM C. FOSTER

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 2, 1953.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In Secretary Lovett's letter of May 9, 1952 [2] concerning the possible reestablishment of military bases in the Galapagos Islands, it was indicated that the Department of Defense considered that an adequate basis for obtaining military rights in Ecuador, when needed, is to be found in the provisions of the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance [3] and the Ecuador–United States Military Plan of February 20, 1952.[4] Secretary Lovett's communication concluded that an additional agreement is neither necessary nor desirable at this time.

In the course of consideration of this matter in the Department of State and consultation with our Embassy in Quito, considerable doubt has been expressed that the provisions of either of these agreements are sufficiently precise to warrant an assumption that military rights so comprehensive as those defined in the annex [5] to Secretary Lovett's letter of May 9 could, in fact, be obtained without difficulty from Ecuador in the event of global war or other extreme emergency. Neither the Rio Treaty nor the Bilateral Military Plan contains a specific commitment on Ecuador's part to make available base rights of the nature of those contemplated. In the absence of an understanding with the Ecuadoran Government more specific than any embodied in agreements now in force, there would appear to be considerable risk that delay or other difficulties would be encountered in effecting necessary arrangements after an emergency calling for urgent use of such rights by this Government had arisen. It would appear, therefore, that if we wish to ensure that Ecuadoran military cooperation with the United States would include that Government's making available military rights in the Galapagos Islands for purposes of hemispheric security, further conversations with the Ecuadoran Government will be necessary with a view to reaching an agreement or firm understanding on this subject.

In this connection the Department of the Navy has informed this Department of its concern caused by the salvaging of defense installations on Baltra Island of the Galapagos group; and has suggested that representations be made to the Ecuadoran Government designed to forestall further removal of such facilities. It seems to me that before making formal representations to Ecuador on this subject we should have clearly in mind the main outlines of such general agreement, if any, as it may be desirable to work out with Ecuador pertaining to the Galapagos Islands. The preservation of existing facilities could be part of such general agreement. In the absence of such an agreement, or of a clear understanding with the Ecuadoran Government of the need for maintaining these installations for use in the event of an emergency, an approach to that Government solely on the question of the removal of equipment from the installations would seem to lack adequate justification. The Ecuadoran Congress has in fact, already enacted legislation authorizing the grant of a considerable quantity of salvaged pipe to two communities suffering from chronic water shortages.

If the Department of Defense believes that an approach should be made to the Government of Ecuador on this broader question, i.e., the possible use of the Galapagos Islands in the event of an emergency, then perhaps our proposals might be submitted to the Government of Ecuador in the form of an amendment to the secret Bilateral Military Plan between Ecuador and the United States. Such amendment might provide for the maintenance of existing installations, guaranteed by Ecuador, as well as arrangements for the use of the Galapagos Islands for hemispheric defense during an emergency. If the general question of the Galapagos Islands is to be taken up further with the Government of Ecuador, there would seem to be obvious advantages in associating that subject with the Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement and the secret Military Plan pursuant thereto.

I should appreciate being informed of the views of the Department of Defense in regard to the foregoing, and suggest that as a preliminary step the entire subject be discussed by representatives of our two Departments. If you concur in this suggestion, Mr. Maurice M. Bernbaum is prepared to discuss the matter further with such representatives of the Department of Defense as may be designated.[6]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 9, 1953.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to a letter of November 9, 1951[2] from the Acting Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense, which concurred in a proposal of the Department of Defense that the President be asked to approve the initiation, under the Mutual Security Act of 1951, of grant-aid military assistance programs for Latin American countries specified by the Department of Defense. The President subsequently approved the initiation of programs for the following Latin American countries by finding that United States defense plans established a need for their participation in military missions important to the defense of the Western Hemisphere: Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Mexico, Peru and Uruguay. Bilateral Military Assistance Agreements have been negotiated with all of the countries named, except Argentina, Bolivia and Mexico. Programs are not, at present, contemplated for the latter three countries.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Spencer and Mr. Jamison on Apr. 2; cleared with the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, the Office of Middle American Affairs, and the Office of the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs.

[2] Printed in Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. II, p. 1027.

The Department of State is making every practicable effort at the diplomatic level to diminish the strength of communist elements in Central America, particularly in Guatemala, and to increase the willingness and ability of Central American States to resist communist subversion and pressure from whatever source. In these circumstances, the Department of State believes that an offer by the United States of military grant-aid to El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua would be regarded by those countries as tangible evidence of this Government's intentions, under the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, to help them repel any unprovoked invasion of their territory. The Department of State believes that the implicit emphasis of Guatemala's ineligibility to receive grant assistance, in the face of tangible United States assistance to neighboring states, would help establish a political climate in Guatemala of benefit to anti-communist Guatemalan elements, including elements in the Guatemalan armed forces disposed to combat communist domination of the present Guatemalan Government.

For the reasons stated, it is clear that the attainment of political and psychological objectives of this Government in relation to communist activities in Central America would be furthered by making available relatively small amounts of military grant assistance to El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua, in the event that those Governments should agree to conclude the required Bilateral Agreements with the United States. As a first step in establishing the eligibility of the three countries for United States grant assistance, I therefore recommend that the Department of Defense determine the specific hemisphere defense missions which each of these countries could effectively perform with limited United States grant assistance, taking into account the present military and economic capabilities of each country. It is possible, of course, that the Department of Defense may find that the capabilities of El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua would be insufficient, even after the provision of United States grant assistance, to enable them to contribute military units comparable in type and strength to those units which are being prepared for hemisphere defense by other Latin American countries. However, even if the Department of Defense should find it possible to develop only relatively minor roles in hemisphere defense for each of the three countries, I believe that the provision by the United States of grant assistance for the performance of such roles would be justified, in view of the important considerations referred to above.

The Department of State believes that the cost of any programs which may be finally approved for El Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua should be met out of existing appropriations, if possible. However, in the event additional appropriations should be required, the Department of State is prepared to support the Department of Defense in a request to the Congress for necessary funds.

In view of the importance of our being in a position to provide grant-aid military assistance to El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua at the earliest possible date, I recommend that this matter be accorded a high and urgent priority by the Department of Defense and that the Department of State be informed as soon as possible whether the Department of Defense concurs in the proposals made herein.[3]

Sincerely yours, JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Memorandum of Discussion at the 141st Meeting of the National Security Council on Tuesday, April 28, 1954 [1]

TOP SECRET EYES ONLY

Present at the 141st meeting of the National Security Council were the President of the United States, Presiding; the Vice Pesident of the United States; the Secretary of State; the Acting Secretary of Defense; and the Director for Mutual Security. Also present were the Secretary of the Treasury; the Director of Defense Mobilization; General Vandenberg for the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff; the Director of Central Intelligence; Mr. Robert Cutler, Special Assistant to the President; Mr. C. D. Jackson, Special Assistant to the President; Major General Wilton B. Persons, USA (Ret.), Special Assistant to the President; Colonel Paul T. Carroll, Military Liaison Officer; the Executive Secretary, NSC; and the Deputy Executive Secretary, NSC.

There follows a general account of the main positions taken and the chief points made at this meeting.

[Here follows discussion of matters relating to NATO, the situation in Indochina, and United States policy with respect to Formosa and the Nationalist Government of China.]

4. Sale of modern aircraft to Latin American nations

Secretary Kyes said that he wanted General Vandenberg to inform the Council of another matter which was of concern to the Defense Department.

General Vandenberg stated that the British were currently sending greatly increased quantities of modern aircraft to several Latin American countries, whereas the United States, in accordance with its policy and its desire that these nations not use military matériel to engage in hostilities with one another, was sending very little. If the present situation continued we must anticipate that the British will take over our military missions in the Latin American republics. If, on the other hand, it is a U.S. objective to maintain our missions in this area, we would be obliged to sell a larger number of modern aircraft to these governments.

The President answered that he had never wholly sympathized with the State Department view that munitions sent to Latin America would be used by the republics for hostilities against each other. He inquired as to whether the State Department still maintained this position, and directed General Vandenberg to take up his problem directly with the State Department.

Mr. Cutler suggested that the Secretary of State report back to the Council on this subject at its next regular meeting.

The National Security Council:

a. Noted an oral report by General Vandenberg for the Chairman, JCS, of increased British sales of modern aircraft to Latin American nations, and the adverse effect upon the position of U.S. military advisory and assistance groups.

b. Noted that the President directed the Departments of State and Defense to study this problem and be prepared to make recommendations thereon at the Council meeting on May 6.

Note: The action [2] in b above subsequently transmitted to the Secretaries of State and Defense for implementation.

Briefing Paper Prepared in the Department of State [1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON, April 29, 1953.[2]]

Problem:

To draw up set of principles to guide US-Dutch military talks on joint defense of Caribbean.

[1] Prepared for the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs James C. H. Bonbright. Drafted by Keld Christensen of the Office of Western European Affairs; cleared with the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, the Office of Regional American Affairs, and the Department of Defense.

[2] The source text bears no indication of a drafting date; the date supplied is that of the covering memorandum, not printed.

Background:

In 1948 the U.S. indicated its desire to have the U.S. Commander in Chief Caribbean begin talks with his Netherlands opposite number with a view to concluding joint defense arrangements. Such talks commenced, but were broken off late in 1951 as it was apparent that the Dutch then wanted the initial talks at the Government level. Since then, there have been numerous exchanges of notes with the aim of drawing up a set of agreed principles to guide the two field commanders in working out the details.

The two governments have reached agreement that the only non-Netherlands forces to be stationed in the Netherlands West Indies will be U.S. forces and only with the consent of the Netherlands.

The latest note from the Dutch (October 3) [3] indicates that they wish to be responsible for not only local defense but also for the defense of a subarea of the Caribbean. This proposed subarea would include the sea approaches to the Netherlands Antilles and be contiguous to Venezuela and Colombia. The Dutch also proposed that U.S. forces stationed on the islands be under the command of an Antilles subarea commander of Dutch nationality.

The U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff have rejected these proposals and have prepared a new set of proposals.[4] These proposals envisaged a U.S. commander as being responsible for the protection of sea communications, and a Netherlands commander as being responsible for local defense. A new proposal on our part is that in time of war U.S. forces stationed on the Islands for local defense, at Dutch invitiation, will initially come under the command of a Dutch officer responsible to the U.S. Commander in Chief Caribbean. If U.S. forces be needed in such numbers as to change the relative strength of the two national forces the nationality of the local commander will be subject to review.

Recommendations:

When handing the Ambassador [5] the Department's note,[6] it is suggested that you say that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff have carefully studied the Embassy's note of October 3, 1952, and while they find that [4] These proposals are contained in an undated paper, titled "Proposed Guidance for the Military Discussions Between the United States Commander in Chief, Caribbean, (CINCARIB) and the Netherlands Antilles Military Authorities," and appended to a letter from Secretary of Defense Wilson to Secretary Dulles, dated Apr. 8, 1953, not printed. The aide-mémoire contained, inter alia, a restatement of principles, based on Secretary of Defense Wilson's letter of Apr. 8 to Secretary Dulles, to guide discussion between United States and Netherlands military authorities concerning defense of the Caribbean area. they are unable to accept the subarea idea they have tried to meet the suggestions of the Netherlands Government with certain modifications which we hope will be acceptable. You may say that we believe proposed subarea would not only not provide sufficient flexibility necessary for naval operations, but being so close to Venezuela and Colombia might raise political difficulties with those two countries. In this connection, you might mention that our two governments have agreed that, in the event of emergency, the only non-Netherlands forces to be stationed in the Antilles will be U.S. forces.

While we agree that a Dutch officer should be in command of local defense in time of war we believe that the nationality of that commander should be subject to review if U.S. forces are needed in such numbers so as to change substantially the relative strength of the two forces.[7]

[7] On June 9, 1954, in response to the Department of State's aide-mémoire of May 8, 1953, the Netherlands Government proposed that oral discussions between United States and Dutch military authorities be initiated at Washington in order to formulate command relationships and to define defense tasks for the Caribbean area (Netherlands Embassy aide-mémoire, dated June 9, 1954, 756B.5/6–954). In an aide-mémoire, dated Sept. 14, 1954, the Department expressed agreement with the general idea, but indicated that it preferred to have the proposed discussions take place at Caribbean Command Headquarters, Quarry Heights, Canal Zone. (756B.5/6–954) On Oct. 7, 1954, the Netherlands Government informed the Department that it was prepared to open discussions in the Canal Zone on Nov. 9. Memorandum of Discussion at the 143d Meeting of the National Security Council on Wednesday, May 6, 1953 [1]

TOP SECRET EYES ONLY

Present at the 143rd meeting of the National Security Council were the President of the United States, Presiding; the Vice President of the United States; the Under Secretary of State; the Secretary of Defense; the Deputy Director for Mutual Security. Also present were the Secretary of the Treasury; the Director of Defense Mobilization; the Director, Bureau of the Budget; the Acting Chairman, Atomic Energy Commission; Commissioner Thomas E. Murray, AEC; the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff; the Director of Central Intelligence; Mr. Robert Cutler, Special Assistant to the President; Mr. Lewis L. Strauss, Special Assistant to the President; Mr. C. D. Jackson, Special Assistant to the President; Colonel Paul T. Carroll, Military Liaison Officer; the Executive Secretary, NSC; and the Deputy Executive Secretary, NSC.

[1] This memorandum was drawn up by Deputy Executive Secretary Gleason on May 7.

There follows a general account of the main positions taken and the chief points made at this meeting.

[Here follows discussion of matters relating to the large ship reactor and aircraft nuclear propulsion programs, the situation in Indochina and Thailand, and possible courses of action in Korea.]

5. Sale of modern aircraft to Latin American nations (NSC Action No. 775 [2])

At Mr. Cutler's request, Secretary Smith spoke first as to the State Department's position with regard to this problem. Secretary Smith expressed full understanding of the desirability, from a military standpoint, of the standardization of weapons in Latin America and the desire of the military that these nations use United States aircraft. On the other hand, from the point of view of trade policy, Secretary Smith said that the State Department sympathized with the desire and need of the British to sell their own aircraft to Latin America. There were, therefore, these two points of view. Perhaps on the whole, thought Secretary Smith, the hemisphere defense argument was the stronger. In any case, he was prepared to go along with whatever view the Defense Department took.

The President expressed the thought that, for the moment at least, this issue was too insignificant to consume the Council's time. If, later on, it appeared that very large number of British aircraft were being sold in Latin America, it would be simple to resume consideration of the matter.

Agreed that under present circumstances the sale of British aircraft to Latin American nations was not of sufficient significance to require action by the Council.

Memorandum on Substance of Discussions at a Department of State–Joint Chiefs of Staff Meeting, Held in the Pentagon, 11 a.m., May 22, 1953 [1]

[Here follow a list of those present (21) and discussion of matters relating to Indochina and Yugoslavia.]

[1] Generals Bradley and Collins and Admiral Fechteler were present; General White attended for General Vandenberg. Mr. Matthews headed the Department of State group.

Military Assistance for Central American States

General Bradley: We understand that you want to discuss the question of military assistance to Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua. We have been talking this over and what has worried us was how we could justify such assistance from a military point of view. It might be possible to present a reasonable military justification in the case of Nicaragua since that could be done in terms of anti-aircraft for the defense of the Panama Canal or defense against sabotage and infiltration, but for the countries other than Nicaragua we thought we would have great difficulties in testifying on the Hill as to the military justification for assistance.

Mr. Cabot: We have a serious situation in Guatemala with the Communists infiltrating and influencing the Government. Our first task is to keep this Communist nucleus from spreading and our second task is to eliminate it. My understanding is that the neighboring countries do not at present have sufficient forces to meet a military intervention. Nicaragua has asked us for a military assistance agreement. Salvador has stated its willingness to buy a certain amount of military equipment, but for political reasons would like to have any military assistance agreement in part kept secret. Honduras has so far not asked us for military assistance. For frankly political reasons it would help us as against Guatemala to be able to undertake military assistance to these countries. In terms of money or quantity of equipment there would not be a great deal involved.

General Collins: We could be on sound military grounds in justifying assistance to Nicaragua. The main threat against the Canal in case of war is basically the threat of guerrilla type infiltration and sabotage. Since we can honestly certify that military assistance to Nicaragua is justifiable, could we undertake an agreement with Nicaragua and let the other two countries purchase equipment?

Mr. Cabot: I would be prepared to settle for a certification for Nicaragua. The three Governments work very closely together in any case, and I am sure the other two would be glad to have a friendly country strengthened in a military way.

General White: Can't we do something about Guatemala? It seems to me that we shouldn't tolerate a Communist Country in Latin America.

Mr. Cabot: It isn't Communist yet but the Communists are infiltrating the government. This proposal for military assistance to neighboring states is, we think, a first step in doing something about Guatemala.

Representatives were also present from the National Security Council, the Central Intelligence Agency, and the Department of Defense.

A note on the source text reads as follows: "(Draft. Not cleared with any of participants.)"

Mr. Nash: I have shared your anxieties about Guatemala but I have grave doubts that to grant military assistance to the neighboring countries is the way to cope with the situation. It might conceivably do more harm than good. The question I have about it is not related to the amount of money or equipment involved but really as to whether a political problem like this is solvable by the approach of military assistance.

Mr. Cabot: We agree that the problem cannot be solved by purely military means, but the first thing we want to do is to develop some military strength on the Guatemala borders and in the second place in doing this it might be useful in pointing out to the Guatemalan Army the kind of help they are losing because they have the misfortune of operating under a Communist-influenced government.

Admiral Fechteler: Our people in the Navy share some of Nash's reservations.

Mr. Cabot: We naturally can't be assured that this will work out as a significantly successful approach, but our feeling is that it might do some good and we should at least make a try. We should demonstrate our willingness to help in Latin America in difficult situations like this and should as a minimum not be in the position of not having tried to do anything.

General Collins: I would like to say that from the Army's point of view I think it would be helpful for us to have closer relations with the Nicaragua military. It would assist us in gaining better intelligence and the closer staff connections would, it seems to me, lead to a good political effect. The Latin American officers who work with us and some of whom come to this country and see what we have and what we can do are frequently our most useful friends in those countries. I think that by and large our military assistance programs for Latin America is money well spent and I believe that programs of this type and specifically the suggested program for Nicaragua would add to the security of the United States.

Mr. Cabot: I am glad to hear you say that, General, and I must say that I thoroughly agree with you.

General Bradley: Doesn't the problem really boil down to a political question? From the military point of view, the JCS think that it is sound military justification for assistance to Nicaragua.

Mr. Nash: I agree that the question is primarily political.

Mr. Cabot: We think from our point of view that it is politically advantageous to undertake an assistance program.

General Collins: Since the Chiefs agree that assistance to Nicaragua is militarily justified, isn't the question primarily between State and Defense?

Mr. Nash: Is State willing to have an agreement with Nicaragua and not with Salvador and Honduras?

Mr. Cabot: Yes, we would be willing to go ahead on that basis. We would like, however, to reserve the possibility that we might make a proposal for similar agreements with Salvador and Honduras at a later date if that should then seem desirable.

Mr. Nash: Then I would suggest that the JCS send their recommendation to the Secretary of Defense and we can work it out with State.[2]

[Here follows discussion of matters related to Korea.]

[2] In a letter to Secretary Dulles, dated June 18, 1953, not printed, Assistant Secretary of Defense Nash stated that the Department of Defense supported the Department of State's efforts to weaken Communist elements in Central America, and that Defense was prepared to recommend the inclusion of Nicaragua, but not of El Salvador or Honduras, in the grant military assistance program. (716.5 MSP/6–1853)

In a letter to Secretary Wilson, dated July 23, 1953, not printed, Mr. Matthews indicated the Department of State's concurrence with Defense's recommendation concerning Nicaragua, and he stated that the eventual participation of El Salvador and Honduras in the military assistance program should not be precluded, because this might become necessary to the accomplishment of the Department of State's political and psychological objectives in Central America. Memorandum by the Deputy Director of the Office of Regional American Affairs (Jamison) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot) [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 4, 1953.

The principal purpose of my visits to our Embassies in several South American countries following the Jurists' Meeting in Buenos Aires [2] was to discuss with the members of the respective Embassy staffs military relationships with the governments concerned, and particularly the military grant-aid program and its implementation. Having been involved in the development of the grant-aid program since Defense first proposed it early in 1951, and having watched it grow during the period when most of the basic agreements were negotiated, I was anxious to get as much information as possible to attempt an evaluation of the present state of its effectiveness, as well as to endeavor to find out what kinds of new headaches might develop for us during the subsequent stages of implementation. We are giving careful attention to certain of the specific problems which appeared, but I should like to summarize a few of the general impressions obtained during the course of visits to six countries involved in the program, varying from Uruguay,

[1] Addressed also to Mr. Woodward.

[2] Reference is to the second meeting of the Inter-American Council of Jurists, which was held in Buenos Aires, Apr. 20–May 9, 1953; for documentation concerning the meeting, see Annals of the Organization of American States, 1953 (Washington, 1953), pp. 148–174.

where the Agreement has not yet been ratified, to Peru, where greatest progress has been made in implementing the Agreement:

(1) Now that we are at the stage of implementation of the program, the most important immediate question is whether the countries concerned demonstrate that they are able to create and maintain the specific units of their armed forces specified in the military plans, utilizing the training and equipment received from the United States in a way which will insure that the units are in a position to make a contribution to hemisphere defense if war should come. Much of the equipment consists of types which are relatively complex and which challenge the ability of relatively poorly trained and otherwise ill-prepared personnel. In practically all of the Embassies I discussed this question with either the attachés or with the chiefs of our training missions. Except in Ecuador, where the Chief of our Army Mission still feels that anti-aircraft equipment offers a greater challenge to the Ecuadoran soldier than he should be required to meet, I found no disposition to hold that the Latin American military personnel would not be capable of developing the techniques needed to handle the equipment. In Lima, Carl Breuer [3] and I attended a dress rehearsal held for the benefit of General Elmore [4] and other U.S. officers by an anti-aircraft unit, which has already received a considerable amount of U.S. equipment. Although I was not able to judge the fine points of the performance, it seemed to me that it was pretty uneven and that the battery would probably have been destroyed before the guns got into operation. However, Colonel Hill of Army G–3 in the Pentagon, for whose judgment I have great respect, said that, given the period of training, he believed that the unit had made considerable progress. In any event, there can be no question that it will be necessary for our MAAG and mission groups in these countries to continue to maintain constant vigilance to see to it that the equipment provided, and the men to use it, are utilized in a way which will insure that the matériel is not allowed to repose in a state of disrepair or disintegration.

(2) It will also be necessary to maintain a constant follow-up to insure that the other governments take steps required of them to keep these units in good shape. This involves such things as recruitment and training of additional personnel required, provision of storage facilities for equipment, development of adequate housing for personnel, and maintenance, where possible, of supporting units. For example, in Lima the Peruvian Army has undertaken to enlarge the cuartel now housing the anti-aircraft unit mentioned above, (which, incidentally, is named "Coronel O'Donovan") so that it will be adequate to take care of a unit of full battalion size. I was told that although our Mission Chief had been informed that this would be done quickly, no actual progress had been made. Again, the Air Force program contemplates the creation and maintenance of fighter and light bomber squadrons in certain countries. In some cases this means utilizing existing aircraft, while in others most of the planes will be furnished by the United States. In either case, ground crews and other supporting units are necessary. It was the view of the Air Attaché in Bogotá [5] that the Colombian government was as yet showing no disposition to take the steps necessary to create these supporting units. In Ecuador there may be grave question of the ability of the Ecuadorian government to provide adequate storage and housing facilities. Although none of these problems appeared to have reached a stage of crisis, I am sure that the missions and the MAAGs will have plenty of work to do, and I believe we may anticipate that problems will develop which will be brought to our attention either by the Pentagon or by the other governments for action at the diplomatic level.

[4] Brig. Gen. John A. Elmore, USA.
[5] Lt. Col. Rex. T. Barber.

(3) Although we have consistently maintained, with the support of our Embassies, that the major part of the work normally performed by the MAAGs can and should be done by existing or enlarged Training Missions, there is one aspect of the resulting situation which may cause difficulty. Since the Training Missions are technically at the service of the Defense Ministry of the local government, and are at least partially paid for by that government, they may be called upon to perform functions which will limit their usefulness in implementing that grant-aid program. For example, the Colombian Navy now has a program under way for building and sending naval boats up the Orinoco River to supply the Army and to assist it in subduing the guerrillas in the llanos. This has required a considerable diversion of funds by the Colombian Defense Ministry from the creation of a training center to be used as part of the Naval grant-aid program. Furthermore, the Colombian Navy has requested our Naval Mission to lend its assistance to the development of this program, which is unrelated to the tasks involved in the grant-aid program. Since the Naval Mission cannot serve two masters, I understand that it has proceeded as requested by the Colombians, and the development of the Training Center has been postponed. (Incidentally, I was told that it is anticipated that the Training Center in Colombia will be used not only for training Colombians, but also for Ecuadorans and Venezuelans, and that this has been agreed to in principle by all three governments. If so, I believe this will make a new stage in inter-American military collaboration, but I doubt that we shall very soon get to the place where Ecuadorans will be training in Peru and vice-versa.)

(4) Political Impact of the program. Negotiation of military assistance agreements involving preparation for possible participation in collective defense of the hemisphere, undertaken at the instance of the United States, in which military equipment given by the United States plays an important part, was seized upon by the communists and the extreme nationalists as an issue which they used and perverted on every possible occasion. I believe this danger was anticipated when the program was launched, but some of us have had moments of doubt as to whether the military and political gains would be sufficiently great to counteract this fact. In general, I did not find any disposition to view with alarm the political repercussions of the program. In Chile, the country where local opposition was perhaps loudest and where the Military Agreement figured as an issue in the presidential campaign, I discussed this specific question at some length with Mr. Stewart,[6] Public Affairs Officer. It was his view that this was only one of many issues which the communists and nationalists were prepared to use, and that if we were to be guided in our policy by not taking positions on the grounds of possible opposition from those sources, we would be foreclosed from undertaking any positive programs whatsoever. In Uruguay, another country where opposition has been virulent, I had an opportunity to discuss the program with Ambassador Mora and, very briefly, with the member of the Colorado faction who is shepherding the Agreement in the Chamber of Deputies. I did not find them disposed to view the program in any other light than as a positive effort on our part to strengthen the system of continental defense. In Ecuador, where the press still belabors the governments despite recent repressive measures, and where I believe the type of our equipment assistance is most open to question, the Minister of Defense was working hard to insure that the required Ecuadoran contribution for local currency would be immediately forthcoming.

Although communist and nationalist propaganda has had some effect in delaying legislative approval of the agreements in certain countries, the degree of success in obtaining such approval in all but Uruguay has also demonstrated the ineffectiveness of such efforts to turn the issue against the United States. On a number of occasions highly advertised "mass demonstrations" have fizzled completely, and even in Uruguay the Colorado majority voted to press for ratification in the face of determined efforts to tie the question to the "wool tops" issue.[7]

In the long run, I believe that the question of whether the program will result in political gains outweighing the disadvantages of intensified anti-American propaganda will depend upon whether practical military results are forthcoming. If it could be assumed that there will be no requirement for a Latin American military contribution in the event of war, or that the Latin American countries are incapable, even with our assistance, of making a manpower contribution to collective hemisphere defense, then it would seem to have been disadvantageous and unwise to have offered hostile elements an opportunity to stoke the fires of Yankeephobia. I do not believe either of these assumptions is warranted. Furthermore, it seems to me that, from the political and psychological viewpoint, we have made considerable progress in creating greater awareness, at least among political and military leaders, of the collective responsibility for continental defense. Whether this takes effect and is extended depends to a very large extent upon whether the military potential for participation is actually developed to the place where it can be used effectively. On the basis of my discussions and relatively brief observations, I believe that, although there are many obstacles yet to be overcome, the prospects for constructive gain are good.

In Venezuela, which is not participating in the grant-aid program, there are special problems revolving principally around the necessity for insuring that a country which is prepared to pay for military equipment and whose strategic importance is paramount, is not given a priority position behind that of the grant-aid countries.

Major General F. A. Allen (USA)
Rear Admiral Milton E. Miles (Navy)
Colonel William Massello (USA)
Captain Joseph W. Leverton (Navy)
Colonel Willis F. Lewis (AF)
Colonel Edward W. Durant (MC)
Major George Williamson (USAF)

State ARA—Mr. John M. Cabot, Assistant Secretary
ARA—Mr. Robert F. Woodward
ARA—Ambassador John C. Dreier
AR—Mr. Edward A. Jamison
AR—Mr. George O. Spencer
AR—Mr. Robert M. Sayre

Subject: First State–Defense Meeting on Latin American Military Relations

Mr. Cabot mentioned first the interest of both the Departments of State and Defense in holding regularly scheduled meetings on Latin American military relations between the U.S. Delegation to the Inter-American Defense Board and top officials in the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs of the Department of State. General Webster stated that the U.S. Delegation to the Inter-American Defense Board thought that such meetings would be helpful. It was suggested that the most appropriate time to hold these regularly scheduled meetings would be just prior to submission of the progress report on the Latin American policy statement. It was the consensus that this would be an appropriate time for such high-level meetings and the second meeting was therefore scheduled for October 19* at the Pentagon.

[1] The meeting was apparently held in the Department of State. The minutes were drafted by Mr. Sayre on Aug. 18.

*This date was changed from September 21 to October 19 because progress reports are submitted every four instead of every three months. The next report would be due on or about November 1. [Footnote in the source text. The second meeting was held Nov. 5; see p. 164.]

Caracas Conference.

Mr. Cabot referred to the forthcoming Tenth Inter-American Conference to be held in Caracas in March, 1954 [2] and emphasized the importance of the Conference in policy formulation. He said that the Department of State desired to have any comments or suggestions that the Department of Defense might wish to make with respect to the agenda for this Conference. Amb. Dreier interposed that the Department of State had received an interim reply [3] from General Webster and went on to say that the Department of State would appreciate receiving any specific suggestions by September 15.[4] Mr. Cabot remarked that it was not clear what the Tenth Conference would concern itself with primarily but he thought that it would be principally problems of an economic nature. He said our policy at the Conference would depend largely upon the report [5] presented by Dr. Milton Eisenhower as a result of his recent fact-finding mission to South America.[6] He expected that the Conference might consider such specific problems as the Peru–Ecuador Boundary Dispute, the Haya de la Torre case,[7] and the communist situation in Guatemala.

Dominican Proposal for Conference on Communism.

Mr. Cabot referred briefly to the proposal of the Foreign Minister [8] of the Dominican Republic to hold a meeting of foreign ministers of the American republics on the subject of communist subversion in the Western Hemisphere. He said that the proposal confronted this Government with certain problems. On the one hand we are very anxious to do everything possible to control communism in the hemisphere but at the same time it was difficult for us to act on this proposal because it

[3] Apparent reference to an undated letter to Ambassador Dreier, not printed, in which Major General Webster stated that inasmuch as the draft agenda for the Tenth Inter-American Conference contained no matters of military concern, the Department of Defense had no constructive comment to offer. (OAS files, lot 60 D 665, "Pre-Conference–1. Agenda, General")

[4] In a letter to Ambassador Dreier, dated Sept. 28, 1953, Colonel Lewis stated in part that the Department of Defense recommended that when representatives of the Department of State participated in meetings pertaining to the agenda for the Tenth Inter-American Conference, they should "resist the inclusion of military topics that may result in imposition of any special demands on the United States." (362/9–2853)

[6] Dr. Eisenhower visited the ten countries in South America during the period June 23–July 29, 1953; regarding his mission, see the editorial note, p. 196.

[7] Reference is to the controversy between Colombia and Peru concerning the status of Víctor Raúl Haya de la Torre, the Peruvian political leader who sought asylum in the Colombian Embassy at Lima in January 1949, and was unable to obtain safe conduct to leave until March 1954, when the Peruvian Government allowed him to proceed to Mexico.

had been made by Generalissimo Trujillo, who is not regarded favorably by a number of Latin American countries. A foreign ministers meeting as proposed would also interfere with the scheduled Tenth Inter-American Conference which is the supreme organ in the inter-American system and would therefore appear to be the most appropriate forum to consider this problem. Mr. Cabot said that, while the reply to the Dominican proposal would stress our interest in controlling communist activities in the hemisphere, it would probably be negative.

Visit of Dr. Milton Eisenhower to Latin America.

Turning next to Dr. Eisenhower's trip to Latin America, Mr. Cabot said it had three principal purposes:

1. It was intended as an expression of good-will toward South America on the part of the U.S. From this standpoint, the visit was eminently successful.
2. It gave the new Administration an opportunity to study the situation in Latin America. This aspect of the visit was not as successful as Dr. Eisenhower would have liked because a great deal of time that might have been spent on fact-finding was consumed by required social functions and other similar activities.
3. An important purpose of the visit was to provide the Administration with the essential facts required to revitalize our Latin American policy and to develop a program for Latin America. Mr. Cabot said that of course this was the real purpose of the visit and that the new Administration was just getting a start on developing a new program for Latin America.

He said certain problems would have to be considered in any such program such as the very serious economic situation in Bolivia, and the difficult economic problems facing Chile.

He mentioned briefly the fact that Dr. Eisenhower's party was somewhat surprised at the very genuinely cordial reception they received in Argentina. He said that of course the U.S. has no desire to feud with any country in Latin America including Argentina, and, although we were still skeptical that it would prove possible, we would welcome cooperation with Argentina. Mr. Cabot referred to the visits of naval vessels to Latin American countries and thought that it would be desirable if Argentina could be included in a forthcoming visit which would also include the other two countries on the east coast of South America (Brazil and Uruguay). Admiral Miles recalled the recent visit of an aircraft carrier to Rio de Janeiro, Santiago and Lima enroute to the Pacific. He said that he had suggested to the Department of State that Buenos Aires be included in the itinerary but this suggestion had not been received favorably and for that reason it was also believed desirable to drop Montevideo from the itinerary. Mr. Cabot recommended that Argentina be included in a future naval visit to the countries on the east coast of Latin America.

One of the problems raised with the Eisenhower party was the dissatisfaction of the Venezuelan Government over the assistance it has received in purchasing military equipment from the U.S. Government. Mr. Cabot mentioned in particular the fact that Venezuela had apparently been unable to obtain new naval vessels and aircraft. Admiral Miles said that it was true that the Navy did not have any excess destroyer-type vessels to sell to Venezuela. He said that the Navy had however, in response to a Venezuelan request, offered to construct destroyers for Venezuela for $22,000,000 each. Some time later, Commander Moreno [9] of the Venezuelan Navy visited the Department of the Navy and complained that no reply had been received to their request. Subsequent investigation disclosed that the Naval Attaché of the Venezuelan Embassy had failed to forward the information to Caracas. At the same time this delegation from Venezuela was in Washington, another Venezuelan delegation was signing a contract in England to purchase three destroyers from an English ship building firm for $21,000,000. Adm. Miles said that the U.S. could not compete with British prices on naval vessels but that the Department of the Navy had offered to train Venezuelan crews of these vessels when they are received.

Colonel Lewis commented on the availability of jet aircraft. He said that in response to a request from the Commanding General, Caribbean Air Command,[10] information on the availability of jet aircraft had been furnished to him and it was expected that he in turn would make it available to Latin American countries through the Air Mission Chiefs or the Air Attachés. He said that Venezuela had purchased and received 20 vampire jets from Great Britain, that they had contracted for and are receiving six Canberra bombers and may have contracted for six more. He doubted that Venezuela would be interested in any further purchases of jet aircraft. He went on to say that Venezuela was purchasing from the U.S. substantial quantities of spare parts for conventional aircraft. The Air Force, he said, had the same difficulty as the Navy in being unable to compete with British prices. His information was the British are able to make available the Gloster Meteor, which is a second-line jet aircraft, for something like $65,000. Our first-line jet trainer, the T–33, could be made available for about $124,000 and our second-line F–80 jet fighter for about $94,000. Our first-line F–86 would cost approximately $422,000. These estimates did not include spare parts or ground handling equipment.

In Ecuador, the problems of a military nature which were considered by the Eisenhower party concerned the interest of the U.S. Naval Mission to Ecuador in providing Ecuador with suitable naval patrol craft under the military grant-aid program and the reimbursable provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, and the creation by Ecuador of an anti-aircraft battalion under the bilateral Military Assistance Agreement. Adm. Miles said that he was aware of the proposal to provide Ecuador with patrol craft and that he supported it.

Nicaraguan Participation in Military Assistance Program.

Mr. Cabot asked what progress was being made within the Department of Defense on the proposal to include Nicaragua in the military assistance program. General Allen understood that the matter was progressing satisfactorily within the Department of Defense and that a letter [11] would be sent to the Department of State in the near future stating that the participation of Nicaragua in the program had been found necessary in accordance with hemisphere defense plans and recommending that the President be requested to make the finding required by Mutual Security legislation. Mr. Cabot said he hoped this matter could be taken care of as soon as possible because the Department of State believed such an arrangement with Nicaragua would be a stabilizing influence in Central America. Adm. Miles expressed disagreement with this point of view. He thought an agreement with Nicaragua and not with the other Central American countries would serve only to drive them further from us and Guatemala in particular further into the arms of the communists. Mr. Cabot replied that El Salvador was purchasing arms from the United States and was apparently not very anxious to sign a military assistance agreement unless it could be kept confidential, which would be difficult. Honduras does not appear to be too anxious to participate either. Mr. Cabot thought that there might be some dissatisfaction on the part of Costa Rica but Costa Rica did not appear to have any military potential to warrant considering an agreement with that country. As regards Guatemala, he did not think that concluding an agreement with Nicaragua would in itself make the situation any worse in Guatemala and would have the advantage of making it very clear to that Government where the U.S. stood.

Navy Shipping Control Stations in Latin America.

Admiral Miles said that the Department of the Navy was now working on plans to establish shipping control stations in Latin America. This responsibility had been assigned to the United States by NATO. Arrangements to establish such stations would be made between the United States Navy and the countries concerned. He thought it would be necessary, however, to precede such arrangements with an agreement on the diplomatic level. Two problems were now holding up finalization of the plans: (1) it is expected that the quid pro quo for agreeing to the establishment of such stations will be a request by the Latin American countries for equipment to operate the stations for which the Navy is now trying to arrange and (2) it is essential that all such stations throughout the world use common signals, etc., and the Navy is meeting rather strong resistance from the British in making NATO classified documents on signals, etc., available to Latin American countries.

Mr. Cabot said that the Department of State would like to be kept informed on the progress of these plans and would of course render all appropriate assistance.

Regular Staff Level Meetings Between State and Defense.

General Webster said that he understood there was a desire, both in State and Defense, to hold regular meetings on Latin American military problems at the staff level. Mr. Jamison said that he thought some arrangement for a regular exchange of the views on Latin American military problems at the staff level would be very useful. It was agreed that arrangements would be made at the staff level in Defense and State to hold such meetings, probably as frequently as monthly.

Participation of Haiti in the Military Assistance Program.

Admiral Miles inquired concerning action within the Department of State on a request from Haiti to be included in the military assistance program. Mr. Spencer replied that a memorandum [12] had been sent (on June 15, 1953) to Major General Stewart requesting information on whether the Department of Defense believes an agreement with Haiti would be desirable from the military point of view and whether the Department of Defense is prepared to develop a hemisphere defense role for Haiti.

Mr. Cabot closed the meeting by urging that continuing and careful attention be given to the relative amounts of attention and assistance that might be given to Brazil and Agrentina. He said that Brazil is our best friend in the hemisphere and that the United States had to be very careful that it did not offend either Brazil or Argentina.

[12]No copy of the referenced memorandum to Maj. Gen. George C. Stewart, Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense, drafted by Mr. Spencer and signed by Edwin M. Martin, was found in Department of State files; a memorandum by Mr. Sayre to Mr. Spencer, dated June 28, 1953, indicates that the memorandum of June 15 was misplaced. (738.5 MSP/6–2853)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 30, 1953.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to a letter from your Department dated 4 August 1953 [1] signed by the Deputy Under Secretary of State, Mr. H. Freeman Matthews, concerning the United States Mapping Program in Latin America.

The continued concern and support of the Mapping Program by the Department of State and its various embassies is greatly appreciated. This program is under constant surveillance within the Department of Defense, and every practicable effort consistent with Defense requirements, other world-wide obligations and budgetary limitations have and will be made to fulfill our obligations to each of the Latin American countries with whom bilateral mapping and charting agreements exist. It is also the desire of the Department of Defense to faithfully fulfill these bilateral commitments.

Analysis of the Mapping Program progress reports reveals that excellent progress in all ground phases of the program has been made since 1950. While some aerial photography has been accomplished and practically all that has been taken delivered since 1950, this phase of the program and the dependent topographic mapping program have suffered due to other high priority projects throughout the world. The demands of the Korean War precluded accomplishment of mapping projects in Latin America that had otherwise been planned.

The limited aerial photography equipment available to the Air Force has precluded aerial photography of low priority projects since 1949. You may be assured, however, that every effort will be made to provide aerial photography for the United States-Latin American Mapping Program consistent with equipment availability and priority of the project.

A similar situation has also existed with regard to Department of Navy capability in the areas. However, during the first three months of 1953, a naval photographic detachment operated in various parts of Central and South America, and it is planned to continue this operation during the period of January–March 1954 in Central America, the Dutch West Indies and the Lesser Antilles.

[1] In the referenced letter, Mr. Matthews stated in part that the completion of the bilateral mapping program cooperatively developed with 17 of the Latin American countries "is important to western hemisphere defense planning for which it was undertaken, as well as to economic development programs in Latin America in which the United States is participating and to our political relations with Latin American countries." Mr. Matthews further stated that the fulfillment of U.S. commitments under the mapping agreements would help to demonstrate to the Latin American countries "the importance which the United States attaches to them and to their continuing cooperation with and assistance to the other nations of the free world." (720.022/8–453)

To supplement the capabilities of the Air Force and Navy, the Department of the Army has budgeted funds for commercial air photography and is now in the process of contracting for aerial mapping of northern Venezuela and the northern and western portions of Colombia.

This Department concurs with your position that the existing agreements should not be renegotiated at this time.[2]

Sincerely yours, C. E. WILSON

[2]In a memorandum to Norman M. Pearson, dated Nov. 9, 1953, Mr. Sayre stated in part that this letter from the Department of Defense "is somewhat of an assurance that a little more will be done than before. I do not think we need do anything in the nature of a reply but we may have to 'go to bat' again if the Latin Americans continue to be dissatisfied about the long delay in fulfilling these commitments." Subject: Second State–Defense Meeting on Latin American Military Relations

General Webster opened the meeting by reminding those present that the primary objective was to review and collaborate in the preparation of the military portions of the Second Progress Report on NSC 144/1.[1]

General Webster then stated that the U.S. Del. had reviewed the second draft [2] prepared by Department of State and desired to offer certain suggestions. He pointed out that the narrative style was susceptible to debatable expressions of opinion and lacked the concise, factual type of statements that could be easily read and understood.

A U.S. Del. re-draft [3] of the State Department second draft was then examined. This re-draft contained only minor deletions and additions and Mr. Cabot after a cursory review stated he thought there would be no objections to the proposed amendments.

Admiral Miles asked that the portion of the re-draft dealing with the proposed Permanent Joint Board Defense Brazil–U.S. be further amended to clearly indicate that any delay in the establishment of this Board was on the U.S. side and that the Brazilians had not in any way impeded progress. It was agreed to incorporate appropriate wording in the final draft to cover this point.

The reference in the report to renewal of mission agreements with Guatemala was then discussed. Adm. Miles asked if it was a fact that the USAF desired renewal. Mr. Sayre stated that both the Army and Air Force had concurred in extension of the Missions and Embassy Guatemala had been instructed to take an opportune moment to bring the matter up with the foreign office but that there had been no positive action to date. Mr. Cabot said he had some misgivings regarding this course of action, pointing out the mixed reaction that the people in the U.S. and our anti-communist friends in Latin America could have upon learning that we were taking steps to extend this type of military collaboration with a government so completely dominated by antagonistic elements.

Colonel Lewis expressed the opinion that those military persons who would receive the training the U.S. proposed were not Communists. Mr. Cabot agreed that this was probably true and that this cold logic supported the action but that his misgivings had been in the psychological and propaganda area.

General Webster then made reference to a draft statement of policy and staff study that had been prepared by the Department of State for consideration by the NSC planning board. This document deals with U.S. objectives and courses of action with respect to Venezuela.[4] It was pointed out that this 46 page document had been received by the U.S. Del. only that morning and that comment and recommendations had been requested within two working days. It was suggested that in the future the U.S. Delegation be permitted to collaborate in the drafting of the military portions of such studies in the early or formative stages; or that in any event, a copy of the drafts be expeditiously transmitted to the U.S. Delegation simultaneously with those going to NSC.

Mr. Cabot stated that he was not informed with respect to the document under consideration but that he was in agreement that better coordination should be effected and that he would see if arrangements couldn't be made to provide the Department of Defense with a draft of these papers before they were submitted to the NSC.

Colonel Lewis said that while he had not had an opportunity to study the Venezuelan paper, he had noted that the subject of higher priorities for equipment requested by Venezuela was discussed. He pointed out that the priority question would pose a very difficult problem. Adm. Miles in discussing priorities pointed up the need for a priority criteria explaining that the terms "high priority" had no real meaning for those responsible for implementation. He suggested that it might be desirable to establish a degree of priority by relative rank. Thus the priority granted Venezuela might be stated as after Denmark, and before Brazil, etc.

Colonel Lewis stated that by JCS decision, all priorities for Venezuela were on a case by case basis and that no other country in Latin America enjoyed even that distinction. No further discussion of this problem was had because those present had not had an opportunity to study the draft.

General Webster then stated he understood Mr. Cabot wanted to discuss grant aid for Nicaragua. Mr. Cabot asked if a decision on this subject had been reached and was told that JCS had made recommendations to the Secretary of Defense [5] that would perhaps be reflected in a letter from the Secretary of Defense to the Secretary of State in the next few days.[6]

Mr. Cabot then turned to a discussion of aid to El Salvador explaining that in some official circles the Salvadorans seemed to think we had let them down. El Salvador had requested price and delivery information on a rather substantial amount of equipment. After the requested data was furnished actual orders were placed for a very insignificant quantity. Col. Massello stated that the U.S. Army has agreed to furnish all equipment ordered by El Salvador and suggested that El Salvador simply did not have the money to purchase as much as it desired.

It was agreed that El Salvador probably expected a grant of the equipment on their list which they had not offered to buy. Mr. Cabot observed that the Salvadorans had some time ago made inquiry about grant aid and indicated they would not be agreeable to a bilateral military pact except on a secret basis which is not in accord with U.S. legal requirements.

Mr. Cabot expressed concern regarding the publication of a historical report [7] pertaining to Latin America during World War II. He expressed the thought that the U.S. would experience difficulty obtaining bases and facilities in the Latin America area if we talked too much with respect to our past relationships with the various governments. Mr. Jamison said that he had first seen a draft of the proposed document with a restricted classification about a year ago and that he had at that time advised that the document contained much that would be politically embarrassing to the Latin American governments if published. Specific reference for example was made to the secret agreement with Brazil dated 1942.[8] Adm. Miles suggested that the Department of State refuse to coordinate until such time as a decision by the JCS had been made. Col. Hall said he had recently talked with Col. O'Connor [9] of the Historical Branch about this document. Col. O'Connor had stated that the comments they then had from Col. Hill, former Chief of the Latin American Branch, G–3, Department of the Army, and from the State Department were being used to prepare a "sanitized" draft. Col. Hall had suggested to Col. O'Connor that this "sanitized" version be referred to the U.S. Delegation for its consideration.

Mr. Jamison then asked if there had been any further developments with respect to the establishment of shipping control stations in Latin America. Adm. Miles reported there had been no substantive progress. The present problem still appeared to be equipment and he felt in all probability those nations participating in the plan would expect grant of the required radio transmitters. He thought such an expectation would be reasonable but that he had been unable to obtain from within the Department of Navy necessary funds.

Mr. Jamison then raised the problem of providing personnel required by the Venezuelan Air Force for training in operations and maintenance of Canberra aircraft recently purchased from England. It developed that the Venezuelans who now have 6 aircraft of this type have, in accord with the provisions of the mission agreement now in force, requested permission to employ British military technicians to accomplish this training. It was agreed that the encroachment by the British into this area was generally not desirable. Col. Lewis pointed out that as of this date, the U.S. only has one Canberra and that furthermore, the one aircraft we have is substantially different in all respects except configuration from the Canberras that have been delivered to the Venezuelans. Col. Lewis suggested that it might be possible to augment our present mission strength with personnel who have had experience in operation and maintenance of USAF twin-jet type such as the B–45. No decision was reached in this area.

Adm. Miles then asked if the Department of State had any knowledge of recent procurement by Brazil of transport type vessels manufactured in Japan. He described recent activities of an agent for the Japanese shipping interests who has a rather unsavory reputation. Adm. Miles stated that he had no objection to Brazil buying this type of equipment from Japan, as a matter of fact, thought it might be a good move on their part. He was afraid however that Brazil might be dealing with an individual who was unscrupulous and that this relationship might eventually result in difficulties for Brazil.

Mr. Sayre said that he would make an attempt to get further information on this story and give it to Adm. Miles direct.

There being no further business, the meeting was adjourned.[10]

Editorial Note

In a letter to Secretary Dulles, dated November 17, 1953, not printed, Acting Secretary of Defense Kyes stated that the Department of Defense recommended the initiation of a program of grant military assistance to Nicaragua and proposed that President Eisenhower be requested to make the necessary finding required by the provisions of section 401 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended. The Acting Secretary further stated that although the Department of Defense continued to believe that neither El Salvador nor Honduras was in a position to make substantial contributions to hemispheric defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff recognized that the interests of the United States would be served by their inclusion in the grant military assistance program. (717.5 MSP/11–1753) In a letter to Mr. Stassen, dated November 24, 1953, Secretary Dulles indicated his concurrence with the Department of Defense's recommendation concerning Nicaragua. (717.5 MSP/11–1753)

In a letter to Secretary Dulles, dated November 25, 1953, not printed, Assistant Secretary of Defense Nash informed the Department of State that the Joint Chiefs of Staff recommended that El Salvador and Honduras be included in the grant military assistance program, and proposed that the Department of State initiate a request to the President to make the necessary finding. (716.5 MSP/11-2553) In a letter to Mr. Stassen, dated December 2, 1953, not printed, Acting Secretary of State Smith indicated the Department's concurrence in Defense's recommendation concerning El Salvador and Honduras. (716.5 MSP/11-2553)

In a memorandum for the President, dated December 8, 1953, not printed, Mr. Stassen concurred in and transmitted the recommendations of the Departments of State and Defense requesting the President to make the findings required by law as a prerequisite to the furnishing of limited military assistance to Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Honduras. (717.5 MSP/12-1453) On December 9, 1953, the President authorized the initiation of negotiations for the purpose of concluding bilateral military assistance agreements with Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Honduras.

Estimates of Deliveries to Latin America Under the MDA Program

1. The Department of the Army estimates that all items in the FY 1952–53 MDA Programs scheduled for Latin American countries will be shipped by June 30, 1954 with the following exceptions:

a. 144 Mounts, Trailer, Multi, Cal .50 MG, M55. (Will be shipped by September 1954)
b. 24 Howitzers, 105mm, M2A1, with Carriage. (Will be shipped by December 1954)
c. 5 Directors, AA, British No. 11, or similar type. (Will be shipped by June 1955)
d. 5 Radars, British No. 3 MK VII. (Will be shipped by June 1955)

This latest forecast indicates that the shipment of items to Latin American countries will be completed six months earlier than had formerly been estimated.

2. The Department of the Air Force formerly estimated that the shipment of all items in the FY 1952–53 MDA Programs to Latin American countries would be completed by December 1954. The shipment of Air Force items is being accelerated and it is now estimated that all items except those listed below will be shipped by June 1954:

a. 5 PBY–5A Aircraft for Chile. (Will be shipped by September 1954)
b. 35 Radio Compasses, AN/ARN–6 for Brazil. (Will be shipped by September 1955)

3. The current Navy MDA Matériel Programs for Latin America do not include any major items (i.e. ships or aircraft), other than those vessels furnished under Lend Lease for which title has already been transferred under authority of MDA legislation. The matériel programmed consists of a large number of small items and for this reason itemized information on shipment forecasts is not readily available. Naval supply activities processing MDA matériel have been directed to review all supply requisitions in process and to take aggressive follow-up action in any case in which it appeared that the desired delivery dates might not be met.

4. The items listed in paragraphs 1–a through d and 2–a and b above, based on the best current estimates of availabilities, will not be delivered by June 1954 for the reason that MDA requirements for these items in other geographical areas have a higher priority.

5. The value of the FY 1952–54 MDA Programs for Latin American countries is $67.8 million. As of November 30, 1953, $18.7 million or 27% of the programs had been shipped.[3]

[3] A memorandum to Acting Secretary of State Smith from Mr. Cabot, dated Feb. 9, 1954, reads in part as follows: [Paragraph 5 of this report] "appears to be in error in stating the value of the program as $67.8 millions for FY 1952–54 inclusive. (This error has been called to Defense's attention, and Defense will make the correction.) Some $101.9 millions have been appropriated for those 3 fiscal years, and it is our understanding $93.3 millions of this is for end-items, etc. As of Nov. 30, 1953, therefore, the value of equipment shipped ($18.7 millions) was less than half of the $38,150,000 appropriated for FY 1952 alone." Paper Prepared in the Department of Defense [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] 23 June 1954.

DEFENSE COMMENTS ON U.S. MILITARY STANDARDIZATION IN LATIN AMERICA (NSC 144/1)

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

1. One of the objectives of the United States with respect to Latin America, set forth in NSC 144/1, is as follows:

"g. The ultimate standardization of Latin American military organization, training, doctrine and equipment along U.S. lines."

2. A trend away from this objective is taking place and is highlighted by the increasing number of purchases of European military equipment by Latin American countries. This is caused, in large measure, by the inability of these countries to purchase military equipment from the U.S. on the terms and delivery schedules desired. Although there are no European military training missions in Latin America at the present time, there are European technical advisers in the area, and this in addition to the trend towards use of European military equipment may lead to the introduction of such missions. Such a development would adversely affect the U.S. objective quoted above.

3. U.S. military aid to Latin America is of two types, grant aid and "reimbursable aid." Under the latter category Latin American countries may purchase equipment from the U.S. Government under Section 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended. The flexibility of U.S. Government action in making sales under Section 408(e), however, is considerably restricted at the present. European countries, on the contrary, are offering low prices, rapid delivery, and easy payment terms, including long-term credits, purchase by soft currency, and barter deals. To achieve fully U.S. military standardization objectives, the U.S. should be in a position to offer competitive terms and deliveries.

4. The purchase of European military equipment is most pronounced with regard to Latin American air forces. The major Latin American countries now appear anxious to augment U.S. World War II types which they have obtained in the past. Within the past two years Venezuela has purchased 25 British jet aircraft, and Brazil has bartered 15,000 tons of cotton for 70 British jet trainers and fighters. Chile has recently acquired 5 British jets, reportedly under a barter arrangement for Chilean nitrates. In the last few weeks it has been reported that Ecuador, after failing to make satisfactory terms with the U.S. for the purchase of F–86 jet fighters, is about to sign a contract with the U.K. for an unspecified number of jet bombers and fighters. Over 60% of Argentina's aircraft are of non-U.S. origin. (See Annex [2] for further details regarding European aircraft in Latin America.)

5. U.S. Navy objectives in Latin America with respect to standardization of equipment have, likewise, not been fully successful. Colombia, Brazil, Chile, and Venezuela have recently entered into contracts for the purchase of significant quantities of naval vessels and equipment of non-U.S. origin. (See Annex)

6. Standardization of U.S. Army equipment is proceeding in a generally satisfactory way, except for Guatemala. Most of the heavy army equipment in all the Latin American countries is of U.S. manufacture, although the greater percentage of small arms is of European origin. (See Annex)

7. The legislative provision under which the U.S. can sell military equipment to its allies is Section 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended. Under this Section, new equipment must be paid for in dollars prior to delivery. In the case of used equipment or of equipment already in stock, payment must be made before delivery, or, exceptionally, within 60 days thereafter if the President makes a determination that it is in the best interests of the U.S. to extend such credit.

8. Section 107 of the draft of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, now before the Congress, would liberalize Section 408(e) to some extent by authorizing the President to extend credit terms of up to three years on equipment or materials sold from stocks, provided that this is determined to be in the best interests of the U.S. There would be, however, no available Department of Defense funds for the financing of such three-year credit sales even if this moderate liberalization of 408(e) is enacted. The need for a source of funds would be considerably greater if the credit provisions of Section 107 were further liberalized to the extent necessary to permit full implementation of our policy objective.

9. One avenue through which funds for carrying such credit might be obtained is the Export–Import Bank. Although the Bank has not traditionally financed the sale of military equipment, this function would appear to be within the terms of its very broad charter. An important factor to be considered before helping to finance Latin American purchases is the general economic capacity of the country concerned to support the military forces being equipped.

10. The acceptance by the U.S. of local currency or barter arrangements for military equipment is contrary to the general foreign economic policies of the U.S. Nevertheless, it is believed that there may be cases where such arrangements are both feasible and desirable. For example, it may be possible for the U.S. to accept local currency in exchange for military equipment in cases in which the U.S. itself plans expenditures in a particular Latin American country. Also, it may be possible to arrange barter deals for materials which could be utilized in our strategic stockpiles. To achieve our objectives, it should be possible to carry out such transactions whenever they will not upset the normal flow of trade and investment. Rather than soft currency or barter deals, the better long-run solution to the problem of financing the sale of U.S. military equipment to Latin American countries would involve an expansion of trade and investments in Latin America on the part of the United States.

11. The problem of speeding up delivery of reimbursable aid to the Latin American countries is difficult because of their low position on the priority list for the delivery of U.S. military equipment. However, existing criteria permit exceptions to be made, and these might be used to meet particular Latin American requests where this can be done without a seriously adverse effect on higher priority claimants, especially where quantities desired are not great. Generally, speed of delivery can be regarded as merely another factor of U.S. competition with other suppliers, and desired progress toward the U.S. standardization objective in Latin America can be weighed against requirements of other areas.

RECOMMENDATION

12. It is recommended that paragraph 18(e) of NSC 144/1 be amended [3] along the following lines:

[3] For documentation relating to the amendment of NSC 144/1, see pp. 65 ff.

"Seek the ultimate standardization along U.S. lines of the organization, training, doctrine, and equipment of Latin American armed forces, facilitating the purchase of U.S. equipment by offering the countries of this area credit terms, including long-term payments, use of soft currency, barter arrangements, and more rapid delivery."

The Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs (Hensel) to the Managing Director of the Export-Import Bank (Edgerton)

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, July 6, 1954.

DEAR GENERAL EDGERTON: I am writing with reference to the question of the extent to which the Export-Import Bank would be willing and able to finance the sale on credit of military equipment to certain Latin American countries. This letter is intended to amplify our recent telephone discussion on the same subject.

It is the policy of the United States, reflected in NSC 144/1, to encourage Latin American countries to standardize their military equipment along the lines of United States equipment. This policy is essential to the development of an effective defense force within this hemisphere. Obviously, it would place great strains on our resources in time of war to supply Latin American countries with adequate military equipment for their defense if their existing equipment did not correlate with ours. The Defense Department is having considerable difficulty in achieving this standardization for reasons set out in a memorandum which is attached as an enclosure to this letter.[1] As you will see from the enclosure, our basic difficulty comes in meeting the competition being offered by European nations. One deterrent to meeting that competition is the generous credit terms which European countries are offering on the sale of military equipment to South American countries.

As you know, under existing law, no more than sixty days' credit can be offered by the United States on the sale of military equipment to our allies. We have proposed in the draft Mutual Security bill now before Congress that maximum credit be extended to three years in those cases where the President determines that it is in the best interests of the United States to extend credit of this duration.

Unfortunately, this legislative amelioration of present credit authority will do very little substantive good, for the simple reason that for practical purposes there are no available funds through which credit sales can be financed. The funds which will be authorized under the draft Mutual Security bill are limited, and are programmed very closely, both on the economic and on the military side. Section 505 of the draft bill, which was introduced against the wishes of the Administration, will require that 10% of all funds made available under the Mutual Security bill be used for loans rather than aid. This in and of itself will seriously dislocate the grant aid program schedules. Further invasions of these funds for the purpose of financing long-term credit sales will simply not be possible, and the possibility of obtaining additional funds under the aid bill are nil. Nor are military department appropriations available for this purpose, except perhaps in rare and limited circumstances.

The Department of Defense recognizes that the Export–Import Bank has not traditionally financed sales of military equipment. It would seem, however, that this would be within the purview of the Bank charter. We would hope that in light of the very considerable national interest which is involved, it would be possible for the Export–Import Bank to provide a certain amount of financing of military equipment sales, where the risks seem to the Bank to be reasonable under all the circumstances involved. I am informed by technical experts within the Department that $100 million would be the top figure which we would request the Bank to finance within the first year from the date on which an understanding between us in this regard might be reached. We could subsequently discuss what further financing could be carried out by the Bank on our behalf. During the year in which the Bank financed certain of our sales of military equipment, the Defense Department would seek to develop alternative sources of financing, for use in subsequent years.

For your information, this entire problem was discussed recently in the Planning Board of the National Security Council. While General Cutler took a personal interest in the matter, he did not believe that the sources through which financing might be obtained ought to be decided at the National Security Council level. Since I expect to be in Europe for the next several weeks, I have asked Mr. DuVal,[2] the Assistant General Counsel (International Matters), Department of Defense, to represent me in discussing the matter with you.

I am sending copies of this letter to the Departments of State and Treasury, to the Bureau of the Budget, and to the Foreign Operations Administration.[3]

Sincerely yours,

H. STRUVE HENSEL

[2]Clive L. DuVal, II.

[3]In a reply to the Department of Defense, dated July 28, 1954, concurred in by the Department of State, General Edgerton stated that under the Export–Import Bank Act of 1945 as amended it was not intended that the Bank's funds be used to finance military sales on credit terms. (103 XMB/7–2854) For text of the act (Public Law 173), approved July 31, 1945, see 59 Stat. 526.

A memorandum by Phil R. Atterberry of the Office of Financial and Development Policy, dated Aug. 17, 1954, reads in part as follows:

"While ARA desires to see the standardization of military equipment in the Latin American countries carried out, it believes that funds for financing the program should come from some source other than the Eximbank and that perhaps little, if any, attempt had been made to seek out other possible sources. The Department's position, as established by E and ARA, was made known informally to Eximbank on July 28, 1954." (103 XMB/7–654)

The Deputy Under Secretary of State (Murphy) to the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs (Hensel) [1]

DEAR MR. HENSEL: The Department of State understands that the grant military assistance program being conducted for certain Latin American countries under the provisions of the Mutual Security Act of 1954 is now being reappraised by the Department of Defense, with a view to determining what specific United States military objectives should be established for the program during Fiscal Year 1956 and what amount of funds would be required from the next Congress for the furtherance of such objectives. In connection with this reappraisal, the Department of State desires to raise the following questions.

(1) The Secretary of Defense, in a letter of October 31, 1951,[2] included Argentina among Latin American countries with which programs of United States grant military assistance should be initiated. In view of the then current political situation in Argentina, however, it was agreed between the State and Defense Departments that no attempt would be made at that time to negotiate with Argentina an agreement under which that country would utilize United States grant assistance to prepare units of its armed forces for hemisphere defense missions. The Department of State would appreciate being informed whether, from the United States military point of view, Argentine participation in this program of hemisphere defense continues to be desirable. If the Department of Defense continues to have an interest in an Argentine program, the Department of State requests information regarding the approximate size of the program proposed for Argentina, as compared with the size of programs now being conducted for Brazil, Uruguay and other Latin American countries.

(2) The Secretary of State was informed in a letter of October 27, 1954,[3] from the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense,[4] that there is an urgent United States military requirement for the installation of important United States military facilities on Brazilian territory. It is the view of this Department that the successful outcome of any approach to Brazil on the subject of United States base requirements will depend, in large part, on the extent to which the United States is prepared to comply with the standing Brazilian request for additional grant military assistance which was endorsed by United States military representatives in Brazil and submitted to the Defense Department for consideration early this year. The Department of State would therefore appreciate being informed whether the Defense Department is prepared to approve all or part of the Brazilian request for additional grant military assistance and to recommend that funds be requested from the next Congress for that purpose.

(3) The Department of State desires to know whether the Defense Department believes that it would be in the United States military interest to broaden Colombia's present mission in hemisphere defense, as set forth in the secret bilateral military plan with Colombia, and to provide Colombia with additional grant military assistance for that purpose. In view of the fact that Colombia was the only Latin American country which contributed troops for the United Nations action in Korea, the Department of State would support a recommendation by the Defense Department that the Congress be requested to appropriate funds necessary to increase the Colombian program, provided it is determined in the United States military interest to increase the program.

(4) United States military representatives in several Latin American countries now receiving grant military assistance, such as Cuba, Ecuador, and Peru, have recommended larger hemisphere defense roles and additional grant assistance for those countries. In most cases, the other Governments have themselves submitted requests for additional assistance. The Department of State assumes that the present Defense Department appraisal of the Latin American program will take these recommendations and requests into account, with a view to determining whether their approval, in whole or in part, would be in the United States military interest.

In view of the significant political implications of the decisions referred to above, it would be extremely helpful to the Department of State if the information requested above could be received at an early date.[5]

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT MURPHY

Memorandum by the Commander in Chief, Caribbean (Harrison) to the Army Chief of Staff (Ridgway) [1]

TOP SECRET QUARRY HEIGHTS, CANAL ZONE, 19 November 1954.

Subject: Planning Talks between the United States and Netherlands Military Representatives

1. Reference Department of the Army message 221843Z [October 1954], DA 969808,[2] top secret.

2. As directed by referenced message, military discussions between the United States Commander in Chief, Caribbean, and the Commander in Chief, Netherlands Antilles, were conducted at Quarry Heights, Canal Zone, on 10–11 November 1954. Agreements were reached on the major points under discussion and are contained in the paper attached as Inclosure 1.*

3. Discussions were limited to defining tasks and formulating command relationships in the Caribbean. The agreement, as signed, differs only slightly from the guidance proposed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The reasons for the differences as they appear in the agreement are:

a. Defense Tasks

(1) It was mutually agreed that local defense and local combined defense were both defining the same task. Therefore, a single definition of the task has been written that includes both.

(2) The Netherlands delegation requested that the definition of local defense be expanded to include "local air and surface patrols." This was considered to be in consonance with United States concepts and has been included in the definition of local defense in the agreement.

(3) It was mutually agreed that the definition of protection of sea communications in the proposed guidance was too voluminous and included statements concerning command relationships. Therefore, the definition has been revised.

(4) It was mutually agreed that the definition of area defense included statements concerning command relationships. Therefore, the definition has been revised.

[1] The Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs, Vice Adm. A. C. Davis, transmitted this memorandum by the Commander in Chief, Caribbean, and its Appendix A to Secretary of State Dulles under cover of a letter dated Mar. 8, 1955. (756B.5/3-855) In the letter, Admiral Davis referred to Deputy Under Secretary of State Murphy's letter to Deputy Secretary of Defense Anderson, dated Oct. 12, 1954, not printed, regarding the Netherlands Embassy's aide-mémoire of Oct. 7, 1954 (see footnote 7, p. 149). He advised that the Department of Defense had reviewed the results of the discussions, found them consonant, in principle, with the guidance furnished the U.S. representative, and recommended that the Netherlands Government be informed of U.S. concurrence in the agreement. Admiral Davis also stated that the results of the planning talks were acceptable and, with the concurrence of the Netherlands Government, would be used as a basis for further detailed planning for the defense of the Caribbean area.

b. Command Relationships

(1) The Netherlands delegation objected to the United States proposal that in time of war the Netherlands local defense commander might be under an intermediate commander designated by the United States Commander in Chief, Caribbean. They desired that the intermediate commander be specified as United States intermediate commander and for local prestige and political reasons he not be stationed in the island group of the Netherlands Antilles. The United States delegation concurred with the objections and agreed to specifying that the intermediate commander be a United States officer not based within the Netherlands Antilles. This change appears in the agreement.

(2) The Netherlands delegation proposed the establishment of a subarea around Aruba–Curacao or, in lieu of that, delegation of responsibility for the protection of the Lake Maracaibo–Aruba–Curacao tanker route to the Netherlands commander in the area. As neither of these were acceptable, a counterproposal was made to include in the agreement a statement recognizing the great importance of the lake-tanker route and that preference should be given by the Commander in Chief, United States Atlantic Fleet, to the employment of Netherlands escort units, if available, for its protection. This was agreed to by the Netherlands delegation, and the statement was included in the agreement.

4. For more detailed information regarding the conduct of the discussions, a brief summary of the major points discussed is attached as Inclosure 2.†

5. Discussions were conducted in a cordial and friendly atmosphere, and in all cases points of disagreement were resolved without unpleasantness. The Netherlands delegation appeared to be satisfied with the results of the discussion and expressed a desire that the detailed planning talks be initiated in the near future. The agreement, as signed, does not deviate from United States policy and concept for emergency operations, nor does the agreement differ in principle from the guidance provided by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

RESULTS OF PLANNING TALKS BETWEEN THE COMMANDER IN CHIEF, NETHERLANDS ANTILLES, AND THE UNITED STATES COMMANDER IN CHIEF, CARIBBEAN, 10–11 NOVEMBER 1954

TOP SECRET QUARRY HEIGHTS, CANAL ZONE, 11 November 1954.

In accordance with agreements of the respective governments, all discussions were limited to definition of defense tasks and formulation of command relationships in the Caribbean.

1. Defense Tasks

The defense tasks in the Caribbean area which are under consideration are defined as follows:

a. Local defense. All local measures taken to insure the security of the territory of the Netherlands Antilles and the important oil installations thereon, to include internal security, prevention of sabotage, and defense against hostile military action within the area, including local air and surface patrols and the protection of local inter-island traffic. In the event Netherlands and United States forces act in concert under a single commander, the term "combined local defense" will be used.

b. Protection of sea communications. All measures taken for the protection and control of shipping, including escort, convoy, and antisubmarine warfare operations.

c. Area defense. All measures taken to insure the over-all defense of the Caribbean area.

2. Command Relationships

It is agreed that command relationships shall be as follows:

a. Local defense.

(1) Under normal conditions of peace, local defense shall be the sole responsibility of the Commander in Chief, Netherlands Antilles, who will employ for this purpose Netherlands' forces exclusively.

(2) In war or emergency, local defense initially will be the responsibility of the Commander in Chief, Netherlands Antilles, who then shall be under the command of the United States Commander in Chief, Caribbean, or a United States subordinate commander not based within the Netherlands Antilles. Should the United States, pursuant to the request of the Netherland authorities, furnish United States forces for purposes of local defense in such numbers as to substantially change the relative strength of United States and Netherlands forces, the nationality of the combined local defense commander will be subject to review.

(3) The maintenance of internal law and order and control of the civilian population shall at all times be the sole responsibility of the Netherlands authorities, and any military forces employed for this purpose shall exclusively be Netherlands' forces.

b. Protection of sea communications. In the Caribbean area, protection of sea communications is the sole responsibility of the United States Commander in Chief, Atlantic. Netherlands forces whose primary assignment or capability is that of supporting the protection of shipping, may, at the discretion of the Netherlands authorities, be placed under the operational control of the United States Commander in Chief, Atlantic. The great importance of the Lake Maracaibo–Aruba–Curacao tanker route is recognized. Providing Netherlands Naval units are available in the Curacao area under emergency or war conditions, it is agreed that preference should be given by the Commander in Chief, United States Atlantic Fleet, to the employment of Netherlands escort units for the protection of shipping along this tanker route. In the event of global war or an emergency in which the security of the Caribbean area is threatened, the United States forces, combat or otherwise, which would be primarily concerned with the protection of sea communications, may be stationed in the Netherlands Antilles by consent of the Netherlands authorities. These forces shall normally remain under United States command. Under emergency conditions such forces may render service to the Commander in Chief, Netherlands Antilles, and may be temporarily placed under his operational control.

c. Area defense. The defense of the Caribbean area is the responsibility of the United States Commander in Chief, Caribbean. Netherlands forces whose primary assignment or capability is that of supporting area defense may, at the discretion of the Netherlands authorities, be placed under the operational control of the United States Commander in Chief, Caribbean. In the event of global war or an emergency in which the security of the Caribbean area is threatened, United States forces, combat or otherwise, which would be primarily concerned with the over-all defense of the Caribbean area, may be stationed in the Netherlands Antilles by consent of the Netherlands authorities. These forces shall normally remain under United States command. Under emergency conditions, such forces may render service to the Commander in Chief, Netherlands Antilles, and may be temporarily placed under his operational control.

3. Recommendation

It is recommended that the points of agreement contained herein be approved by the Netherlands and the United States authorities.

SECTION VIII—LATIN AMERICA

NSC POLICY STATEMENTS DEALING WITH MDAP FOR LATIN AMERICA

MILITARY OBJECTIVES

The general U.S. military objectives in the Latin American area are to insure the integrity of Latin America and the availability of raw materials therefrom with the minimum of U.S. forces.

MDAP OBJECTIVES*

Within the framework of the general U.S. military objectives, to provide assistance in the form of military equipment and training essential for those forces committed to the Inter-American Defense Plan.

VALUE OF MDA PROGRAMS AND PERFORMANCE

The revalidated FY 1950–54 program provides for $154.8 million of end-items and spares. Of this amount $122.5 million had been delivered by 31 December 1954, with $19.4 million delivered in the period July through December 1954. This does not include the value of packing, crating, handling and transportation which are reported only on an area level but approximate 8 to 10 percent of the value of total deliveries.

[1] The report, titled "Status of United States Programs for National Security as of December 31, 1954," consists of a series of eight parts and an annex, separately dated and prepared by the following agencies: Department of Defense (Part 1—The Military Program), Department of Defense and the Foreign Operations Administration (Part 2—The Mutual Security Program), Atomic Energy Commission (Part 3—The Atomic Energy Program), Office of Defense Mobilization (Part 4—The Mobilization Program), Federal Civil Defense Administration (Part 5—The Civil Defense Program), United States Information Agency (Part 6—The USIA Program), Central Intelligence Agency (Part 7—The Foreign Intelligence Program and Related Activities), Interdepartmental Intelligence Conference and the Interdepartmental Committee on Internal Security (Part 8—The Internal Security Program), and Operations Coordinating Board (Annex A—Activities of the Operations Coordinating Board). The over-all report is undated; it was distributed to the members of the NSC on Mar. 2, 1955.

The approved FY 1950–55 training program provides a total of $7.5 million for training activities. As of 31 December 1954, $1.7 million had been utilized for formal and other training.

The following Latin American countries are eligible to participate in the reimbursable assistance program:

Argentina	Colombia	Ecuador	Honduras	Paraguay
Bolivia	Costa Rica	El Salvador	Mexico	Peru
Brazil	Cuba	Guatemala	Nicaragua	Uruguay
Chile	Dominican Republic	Haiti	Panama	Venezuela

As of 31 December 1954 they had purchased $45.4 million of end-items and spares of which $39.7 million had been delivered.

EFFECT OF MDAP ON AREA

The United States is actively participating militarily with the Latin American countries through the Inter-American Defense Board. The diplomatic military negotiations leading to Latin American countries participating in MDAP were conducted through that Board.

The Latin American countries receiving aid are expected to assume a part of the burden of hemispheric defense, not only in the form of preservation of internal security, but also in the defense of their own territories and by participation in combined operations, in defense of the Hemisphere or elsewhere.

The purpose of the Mutual Defense Assistance Program to Latin America is to provide equipment and training required by selected units of certain Latin American Republics to enable them to discharge specific military roles and missions assumed by such countries. MDAP is directed in part to counter trends toward establishment of European Military Missions or other groups with similar functions in Latin America. The United States now has Grant Military Assistance Programs in force with the following Latin American countries: Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Peru, Honduras, Nicaragua and Uruguay.

Prior to the inception of the program the armed forces of the American Republics were hampered by lack of adequate facilities and obsolete military equipment. The Army forces supported in each country are extremely small, consisting generally of one battalion per country. In the Navy, the program is largely restricted to placing modern equipment on a small number of existing vessels. In the Air Force, the grant aid program to date is entirely for propeller-driven aircraft suitable for patrol purposes. The several countries have demonstrated their ability to utilize and maintain the equipment delivered to them. The program is helping to standardize, along U.S. lines, not only the equipment but also the organization, training and doctrine in selected units.

JCS COMMENTS FOR NSC REPORT—LATIN AMERICA

"The Joint Chiefs of Staff have noted a trend toward increased purchases of European military equipment by Latin American countries. They consider the introduction of large quantities of non-U.S. military equipment will eventually defeat the important U.S. objectives of standardization for Latin American armed forces and of countering trends toward establishment of European military missions in Latin America. To check these developments, it will be necessary to improve the competitive position of U.S. equipment. It has been recommended that, if necessary, new legislation be sought to insure that procedures and methods are adopted that will enhance the U.S. competitive position."

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE AND RELATED POLICY TOWARD THE OTHER AMERICAN REPUBLICS AS A GROUP [1]

420.119/4–1652 : Circular airgram

The Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic Offices [2]

SECRET WASHINGTON, April 16, 1952.

THE EXPORT CONTROL OF CERTAIN STRATEGIC COMMODITIES [3]

The Department desires that negotiations be started immediately with the government to which you are accredited for the adoption and implementation of the "Import Certificate and Delivery Verification System" to a selected list of commodities that are, or may be, exported, re-exported or transshipped to a selected list of countries from that country.

The governments of Norway, Denmark, the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, Germany, France, Italy, the United Kingdom, Canada, and the United States have extended the Import Certificate and Delivery Verification System to cover exports, re-exports and transshipments from Latin America to these countries of copper, tungsten, lead, nickel, bismuth, molybdenum, vanadium, and mica.

The purpose of extending the ICDV system to the Latin American countries is to assist them in controlling unauthorized diversions of strategic exports to the Soviet Bloc. The system is designed to assure that commodities approved for export to a country are received by that country. The ICDV operates generally as follows:

1. The exporting government requires, prior to releasing the export, that the exporter present an "Import Certificate" furnished by the consignee in the importing country. This certificate is issued by the government of the importing country to the importer and states that the goods concerned are for importation or for re-export or for transshipment only with the approval of the importing country.

[1] For previous documentation, see Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. II, pp. 1038 ff.

[2] Drafted by Thomas S. Strong of the Office of Economic Defense and Trade Policy; cleared with the Offices of Regional American Affairs and European Regional Affairs. Sent to Asunción, Bogotá, Buenos Aires, Caracas, Ciudad Trujillo, Habana, Lima, Managua, Mexico City, Montevideo, Panamá, Port-au-Prince, Quito, Rio de Janeiro, Santiago, San José, San Salvador, Tegucigalpa, and Guatemala City; sent to La Paz for information only.

[3] For documentation on this subject, see volume I.

2. The Department desires to emphasize the importance of the exporting country requiring "Delivery Verification" for all exports that are covered by an "Import Certificate" since the "Verification" is assurance that the export has been received by the importing country. This verification, which states that the goods have been brought under the control of the importing country, is issued to the importer by Customs officials at the time the goods are landed and must be transmitted to the exporting government. If the export is not received within a stipulated period of time, an investigation is made by the importing country to determine the reason for the delay. Penalties are imposed against those who are found guilty of violating the terms of the certificate.

The purpose of the system is thus not to prevent legitimate transshipments and re-exports but rather to assure that these transactions take place only with the approval of the consignee country.

For the Embassy's information, the COCOM [4] countries (previously listed) do not propose, in the immediate future at least, to require ICDV's for strategic commodities that they approve for export to Latin American countries. (COCOM is an informal secret organization and its existence should not be divulged to the Foreign Office.)

The Department would appreciate being informed promptly of the local government's reaction to this proposal.[5]

ACHESON

[4] Reference is to the Coordinating Committee of the Paris Consultative Group (COCOM), an informal international organization established in 1950 by a group of non-Communist nations for the purpose of controlling the export of strategic commodities to Communist countries; the senior body within the committee was known as the Consultative Group (CG). For documentation concerning the formation of COCOM, see Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. IV, pp. 67 ff.

[5] The Department's circular airgram, dated May 9, 1952, drafted by Mr. Strong and cleared with the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, reads in part as follows: "It was not the Department's intention in its Circular Airgram of April 16 that the Embassy should attempt to negotiate a formal agreement with the local government for the adoption of the limited Import Certificate and Delivery Verification system. The intention was that the Embassy should inform the local government that the countries listed are prepared to issue ICDV's for their imports of the commodities listed. You should also strongly urge that the local government take advantage of the system." (420.119/5-952) It was sent to Asunción, Bogotá, Caracas, Guatemala City, Habana, Managua, Mexico City, Montevideo, Panamá, Port-au-Prince, Rio de Janeiro, Santiago, and Tegucigalpa; it was sent to La Paz for information only.

820.00 TA/3-1353

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 13, 1953.

Subject: A More Positive Policy of Assistance

Over the past two years there has been a rather active controversy between ARA and the IIAA regarding the extent to which technical assistance should be "promoted" in Latin America. The Institute, perhaps without saying so, believes that we should not base technical assistance solely on self-generated requests for projects. They think we should go further and (1) develop plans for each country showing the fields in which they need assistance and (2) encourage countries to request needed projects even if they don't take the initiative. ARA, on the other hand, has been inclined, though not consistently, to hold that we should consider projects only on the basis of bona fide self-generated government requests, and that we should avoid promoting or selling projects even if they are badly needed. The moderately expanding program thus far evolved tends to be a compromise between these two positions since the former leads to an expanding program and the other to a more restricted activity. (I hold no brief whatever for a number of ill-advised and clumsy actions on projects and personnel which the Institute has taken and to which ARA has objected. My comments are directed to general attitude or policy.)

One striking departure from the ARA policy has been the Joint Commission approach to Brazil. It will be alleged that the Brazilians "desired" the aid, but the actual "projects" put forth for loan purposes are the product of joint efforts by Brazilian and American technical experts. All of the Latin American countries have the general desires for economic development and technical assistance, but they frequently need help in crystallizing these desires into specific workable projects. If we look back to the state of Brazilian frustrations before the Abbink Mission [1] and the period after that but before the Joint Comission,[2] we have a better perspective for assessing the importance of our very intimate participation in the technical development of loan projects.

If we maintain, as we do, that Latin America is vital to us in the free world struggle against the Soviet bloc, we must also recognize that that vitality of Latin America is proportionate to its economic and political strength. In cooperation with them, we must do everything in our power to help them to become strong. Since the world struggle is tremendously urgent, we cannot truly afford an approach which relies completely upon the initiative of our Latin American friends. We are the leaders of the free world and must carry leadership responsibilities. We have abundant evidence that the Latin Americans do not realize the urgency of the world struggle (many Americans also do not), and their "relaxed" attitude in this respect is understandable. Fortunately, they have a driving urge toward economic development, quite apart from the world struggle, with which we can cooperate to achieve our common ends.

[1] Reference is to the mission of John Abbink, who was appointed Chairman of the United States Section and Cochairman of the Joint Brazil–United States Technical Commission by President Truman in July 1948; for documentation on the subject, see Foreign Relations, 1948, vol. IX, pp. 364–375.

[2] Apparent reference to the Joint Brazil–United States Economic Development Commission, which initiated its activities on July 19, 1951. For documentation concerning the work of the commission, see pp. 570 ff.

The suggestion I make below is more one of method and approach than substance. Yet, I think it makes considerable difference in the achievement of our objectives and the time required to achieve them. Other forces are working against us in Latin America and time may not be in our favor.

Recommendation:

1. I would urge, therefore, that, in the interest of our own basic objective of a strong free world, we look beyond the requests of Latin American governments to us for technical or other assistance and judiciously encourage and even promote those projects which will strengthen them.

2. In stating this recommendation I hasten to add that

(a) obviously we should not force aid upon them,
(b) all aid should be applied in accordance with the many criteria which will ensure lasting success.

would play along with Communist propaganda by affirming their claim that the U.S. Government is sponsoring private companies in Latin America. In addition, Mr. Miller pointed out that the timing for moving ahead on investments guarantees, if we must do this, is unfortunate. He said, however, that he is about to give up on this issue because others in the Department and in the Executive Branch appear to be against his position. The present issue with respect to Brazil is the convertibility of Brazilian currency. Mr. Miller felt that we should hold up the granting of investment guarantees until after the Brazilian congress acts on convertibility of its currency. We could apply the guarantees in Peru, but if this were done it would cause confusion within Brazil prior to action by the Brazilian congress. Mr. Miller urged that we ask Lafer what effect the granting of investment guarantees would have on Brazil with respect to the planned program with the congress.

8. Mr. Bruce explained that he is not an advocate of this program, but Mr. Ty Wood [3] of MSA has felt very strongly that the problem should be settled by going ahead with what he interprets as a mandate from the Congress. Our next step in working with MSA is to consider the possibility of moving ahead on a country-by-country basis within Latin America. Mr. Miller pointed out that this could be done, but he felt that it was unwise in this case because of the present Brazilian situation. Mr. Bruce emphasized that MSA is pressuring the State Department to comply with the mandate of Congress on establishment of such a guarantees program in Latin America.

9. Mr. Tate [4] explained that arguments for and against an investment guarantees program in Latin America were given before the last session of Congress. Congress approved this program, and members of the Congress have exercised considerable pressure for moving ahead on such a program. Mr. Tate felt that there were no legal difficulties on moving ahead on a country-by-country basis. Mr. Miller pointed out that the problem is not a legal one, but mainly one of Congressional relations. Mr. Thorp stated that the guarantees program applies only to new investments and thus would proceed slowly. Many in the Congress feel that such a program might ease the burden of public assistance to various areas of the world. Mr. Thorp felt that the Administration is in a spot not to comply, because we advocated such a program about two years ago but it was not granted by the Congress. In addition, we now operate such a program in other parts of the world, and it would appear inconsistent if such a program is not applied in Latin America.

10. Mr. Miller again explained his objections to the program itself and especially to the timing as it related to Brazil. He indicated, however, that he was prepared to move ahead on a country-by-country basis, but he would urge that we talk to Lafer before this is done. Mr. Bruce stated that he would tell Mr. Wood that we would be unable to give him our view on this matter until next week.[5]

[Here follows discussion of matters relating to Lebanon and publications by former government employees.]

[5] No record of the Department's view concerning extension of the investment guaranty program to Latin America as conveyed to Mr. Wood was found in the Department of State files. For documentation relating to the investment guaranty program, see volume I.

Report Prepared by the National Security Council Planning Board [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 1, 1953.

EFFECT ON NATIONAL SECURITY INTERESTS IN LATIN AMERICA OF POSSIBLE ANTI-TRUST PROCEEDINGS

1. To determine the national security interest involved in the proposed anti-trust action against the United Fruit Company, with a view to recommending the action to be taken.

ANALYSIS

2. The Department of Justice has completed an investigation disclosing evidence of violations of United States anti-trust laws by the United Fruit Company, which is engaged in widespread business activities in Central America and parts of South America. In the absence of foreign policy and national security considerations, the Department of Justice would proceed to file a civil complaint charging the Company with such violations and asking broad remedies, including divestiture by the Company of certain of its overseas assets.

[1] Transmitted to the National Security Council under cover of a memorandum by Mr. Lay, dated June 1, 1953, not printed.

This report was based on a Department of State draft, dated May 29, 1953, not printed. The NSC Planning Board reviewed the Department's draft at its meeting on May 29, where representatives from the Department of Justice participated in the discussion, and referred it to the NSC Staff Assistants for revision. At its meeting of June 1, the Planning Board considered the subsequent revised draft, dated June 1, and approved its submission, as amended, to the NSC for consideration. Records of the NSC Planning Board meetings are contained in the S/P–NSC files, lot 62 D 1. For documentation concerning the establishment of the NSC Planning Board, see volume II.

In a memorandum to Mr. Cabot, dated June 1, 1953, Raymond G. Leddy stated in part that the final version of the report on the anti-trust suit "is fully consonant with our own estimate of the effects of the suit, and it also adopts ARA's recommendation that filing of the suit be postponed in order that the Department of Justice negotiate with the United Fruit Company toward the elimination of any unlawful practices charged against it." (811.054/6–153)

3. The Department of Justice, as long ago as 1908, commenced an investigation of the activities of the United Fruit Company in relation to the anti-trust laws. In 1913, a staff recommendation in the Anti-Trust Division called for civil and criminal action against the United Fruit Company; however, no action was taken. Again in 1937, a staff recommendation called for the institution of proceedings against the Company, but no action was taken. In 1946, following a Federal Trade Commission investigation, the Justice Department investigation was renewed, but action was again postponed. The present investigation, renewed in 1951, has now been completed, and a civil suit against the United Fruit Company is ready to be instituted. The Justice Department states that the violations of law by the Company are pervasive, including price-fixing, allocation of domestic markets, dumping in order to decrease prices to injure competitors, and reservation of unused shipping space by the Company in order that competitors may not transport their bananas. The remedies sought would be broad, including divestiture by the Company of certain of its assets abroad.

4. The institution of anti-trust action against the United Fruit Company at this time, regardless of the merits of the action under U.S. law, would adversely affect our national security interests in the following respects:

a. It would tend substantially to consolidate the position of the Communist-dominated Arbenz government of Guatemala, a major center of anti-U.S. influence in Latin America. The Arbenz government within the past year has seized three quarters of the Company's land under the guise of agrarian reform, and has made its struggle against the Company the central point in its appeal to the people. For the U.S. Government to brand the Company as an offender against U.S. law would, under these circumstances, appear to justify Arbenz' position completely, and would thus greatly strengthen his hand.

b. Elsewhere in Central America, institution of the action would greatly stimulate movements to nationalize the properties of the Company. Such nationalization is now threatened to some degree in all countries in which the Company operates, particularly in Costa Rica through the possible accession to the presidency of Jose Figueres, who is not a Communist but is openly speaking of nationalization. To the extent such nationalization is achieved, it would not only affect a private company, but would have direct and far-reaching repercussions on our strategic position. Among these must be counted:

(1) Loss of United States control of the largest communications and transport network in the area, represented by the United Fruit Company's freight and passenger ships, ownership and management of ports, docking facilities and warehouses; its 43 percent participation in the International Railways of Central America, the only railroad system in these countries; and its direct ownership of the Tropical Radio Company, the only commercial wireless communication service. These essential facilities, in friendly American hands, constitute a strategic interest in time of war which, if lost to the United States through withdrawal of this American enterprise, could not be counted on with the same security as in the direct control of American citizens.

(2) Jeopardy to that part of our supply of abaca (a strategic cordage commonly known as Manila hemp) now grown by the United Fruit Company under contract with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Loss of Far Eastern sources of supply would make the United States almost completely dependent on Central America as a source of supply to supplement our strategic stockpile. The United Fruit Company is the only concern which has in existence the organization and facilities for supplying our needs.

(3) . . . .

c. Institution of the action would provide a propaganda weapon generally to Communists and leftists in Central America. Moreover, to the degree that it would promote governmental seizure, it would assure the placement of extremists in charge of the former Company properties, and would thus increase the power of elements opposed to the United States in Central America, possibly including Panama, and make uncertain the cooperation of the governments of the area with the United States. Finally, it might contribute to the spread of the Guatemalan example and to the eventual overthrow of four Central American governments now friendly to the United States, which would transform our present security in the Caribbean into a dangerous threat at our backdoor.

d. In Latin America generally, nationalization of the United Fruit Company properties would further stimulate the already serious movement for similar action against the U.S. companies, which have properties with an established value of $5 billion in Latin America, including strategic industries in the fields of mining and petroleum. This effect would be increased to the extent that the Guatemalan and other governments were able to avoid the payment of just compensation to the Company. Action by one branch of the U.S. Government against one private company, as a monopoly, would make most difficult the successful defense of that company's legitimate interests by the Department of State, and weaken very seriously the ability of that Department to oppose the tide of nationalization of other American properties in the entire area and elsewhere. Increased nationalization of U.S. properties would not only deprive the United States and U.S. nationals of a degree of control of strategic resources, but would be contrary to the policy decared in NSC 144,[2] of encouraging Latin American countries to take measures to attract private investment.

CONCLUSION

5. In view of these circumstances, the filing of an anti-trust suit at this time would affect adversely the national security, particularly the conduct of the foreign relations of the United States.

ALTERNATIVE COURSES OF ACTION

6. Two courses of action which are feasible in view of these circumstances are:

a. Postponement of the anti-trust suit until the political and strategic situation in the central and northern South American area is improved to a point where the bringing of an action would not jeopardize the broader national interest.

b. Postponement of the suit for the present, because of the political and strategic situation in the area, with a review by the National Security Council after six months. The Department of Justice during that period will endeavor to negotiate with the Company for elimination of practices deemed to be inconsistent with the anti-trust laws.

7. Because following Course a. would probably mean an indefinite postponement of the suit, Course b. is preferable.

RECOMMENDATIONS

8. The proposed anti-trust proceedings against the United Fruit Company should be postponed without prejudice for the present, and the situation should be reviewed by the National Security Council within six months.

9. During this six-months postponement, the Department of Justice should negotiate with the Company for elimination of practices deemed to be inconsistent with U.S. anti-trust laws.

There follows a summary of the discussion at the meeting and the chief points taken.

[Here follows discussion of matters related to Korea and the atomic energy capabilities of the USSR.]

3. Effect on national security interests in Latin America of possible anti-trust proceedings (Memo for NSC from Executive Secretary, same subject, dated June 1, 1953 [2])

As the Council turned to consideration of the reference memorandum, Mr. Cutler explained that, owing to the connections between the Old Colony Trust Company, of which he had formerly been President, and the United Fruit Company, he thought it inappropriate for him to be present at the Council's discussion of this item. He accordingly left the Cabinet Room

Thereupon the Attorney General [3] reemphasized the dilemma confronting the Department of Justice as set forth in the reference memorandum.

After this brief statement the President noted the recommendations of the report, but suggested that a year be allowed the Justice Department for its efforts to convince the United Fruit Company of the desirability of abandoning practices which were inconsistent with the anti-trust laws. Not only would this longer time be useful in negotiating with the Fruit Company; it would give us an opportunity to strengthen our position in Central America in the event that the negotiations failed and it proved necessary to proceed with a civil suit.

The Attorney General replied that the Justice Department had selected the shorter period in order to instill a greater sense of urgency in its negotiations with the Fruit Company.

The President observed that he saw no reason to tell the United Fruit Company of the interval of time which was to be agreed upon.

[2] This memorandum transmitted the NSC Planning Board report, supra.

[3] Herbert Brownell, Jr.

Secretary Dulles expressed his appreciation of the interest and concern of the Department of Justice in the international implications of this action, and reiterated the view expressed earlier, with respect to the oil cartel, that we must review the whole legal position of United States companies operating abroad with respect to the anti-trust laws.

The Attorney General reminded Secretary Dulles that the Council had already directed the Department of Justice to review this problem.

Secretary Dulles said that he recalled this, but felt that he must again emphasize the terrible repercussions which suits like this [4] had on our foreign policy objectives.

The President inquired whether it would not be possible to have the Anti-trust Division and the Department of State review this problem jointly in order to come up with a sensible proposal for revising the anti-trust laws as they related to cases such as this.

The Attorney General again pointed out that the Department of Justice was well along in its report on the problem, and expected to be able to present its results to the Council by the end of the month.

The National Security Council:

Agreed that, in view of the adverse effects on national security interests in Latin America of the proposed anti-trust proceedings, as stated in the enclosure to the reference memorandum:

a. The proposed anti-trust proceedings should be postponed, without prejudice to the Government, for one year.

b. The Attorney General should be directed to negotiate with the company, as a matter of urgency, for the elimination of practices deemed to be inconsistent with U.S. anti-trust laws, reporting back to the National Security Council on the results of these negotiations.

Note: The above action,[5] as approved by the President, subsequently transmitted to the Attorney General for implementation.

Editorial Note

Between June 23 and July 29, 1953, Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, who was appointed Personal Representative of President Eisenhower with the rank of Special Ambassador, visited the ten countries of South America (Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay, and Venezuela) to conduct a factfinding mission. The purpose of the trip was in part to obtain current information about the economic and social situation in the South American countries. Extensive documentation relating to the mission is contained in Department of State files 120.220 and 611.20. Additional information may be found in Dr. Eisenhower's book, The Wine is Bitter: The United States and Latin America (New York, 1963), pages 187–201, and in President Eisenhower's memoirs, Mandate for Change (New York, 1963), pages 140–141.

Dr. Eisenhower's report on the results of his mission, submitted to the President under date of November 18, 1953, was published as United States-Latin American Relations: Report to the President (Department of State Publication 5290, Washington, 1953); it is also printed in the Department of State Bulletin, November 23, 1953, pages 695–717.

At the 174th meeting of the National Security Council, held on December 10, 1953, President Eisenhower stated that he had communicated with the appropriate agencies of the Executive branch respecting the implementation of the recommendations contained in Dr. Eisenhower's report. (Memorandum of discussion at the 174th meeting of the NSC, dated December 11, 1953, Eisenhower Library, papers as President, Whitman file, NSC records)

On January 11, 1954, Dr. Eisenhower submitted to the President a supplement to his report which contained an analysis of certain specific economic problems of the respective countries he had visited and related recommendations. (120.220/1–1354) In a memorandum to Secretary Dulles, dated January 12, 1954, President Eisenhower requested the Secretary to take the lead in having the supplementary report studied by the Departments of Defense and Treasury, the Export-Import Bank, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and the Office of Defense Mobilization. (120.220/1–1254) Regarding the implementation of the report, see Mr. Woodward's memorandum, March 2, 1954, page 217. Portions of the supplementary report and agency responses thereto were incorporated into Mr. Bennett's memorandum, August 20, 1954, page 229.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 2, 1953.

Subject: Foreign Aid for Latin America for Fiscal Year 1955

Participants: The Secretary
S/MSA—Mr. Nolting
ARA—Mr. Cabot
E—Mr. Kalijarvi
AR—Mr. Cale

Mr. Cabot expressed the view that we should not extend grant aid to Latin America except under very exceptional circumstances. He said that he considered that assuring an adequate flow of governmental funds into sound economic development projects in Latin America to be perhaps our biggest problem in Latin America at the present time.

The Secretary indicated that a memorandum [1] of his recent conversation with Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey on the future role of the Export–Import Bank is on the way to ARA and E. He said that in this conversation Mr. Humphrey took the line that if the Latin American countries behaved properly they could obtain adequate amounts of capital from private sources for their development. Mr. Dulles said that he had dissented from this view and had pointed out to Secretary Humphrey that in the absence of adequate assistance from us the Latin American countries might well go Communist. Secretary Humphrey took the view, however, that the Export–Import Bank should limit itself to making relatively short-term loans to be used for financing United States foreign trade.

The Secretary also indicated that in his conversation with Mr. Humphrey consideration was given to the possibility of asking Congressional approval for establishing a lending institution to make "soft" loans.[2] Mr. Cabot pointed out that there have been very few defaults on loans made by the Export–Import Bank and that the record of the Bank, as a lending institution, is therefore good. He referred in this connection to a memorandum which he recently addressed to the Secretary on this subject. (Copy attached) [3]

Mr. Cabot also said that he believes that it would be possible for the Export–Import Bank to expand its operations in Latin America without necessarily having an adverse effect on the national debt. He mentioned in this connection the possibility that the Export–Import Bank might guarantee loans, might rediscount its paper or that the Export–Import Bank might utilize various means of obtaining private funds as a basis for additional loans. He said that in the Latin American area he would recommend "soft" loans only as a last resort.

Mr. Kalijarvi inquired whether the suggestion was that the institution to make "soft" loans would be a substitute for the Export–Import Bank or a supplement to the Export–Import Bank. The Secretary said the "soft" loan institution would be in addition to the Export–Import Bank, the Export–Import Bank being limited to short-term loans (5 years or under) which would be used for financing United States exports. The Secretary went on to point out that one of the problems in the loan field is the fact that while a project may be sound from the domestic viewpoint of the would-be borrowing country, the country might not be able to earn the dollar exchange required for servicing the loan.

[2] Loans repayable in local currency rather than in dollars.

[3] Reference is to Mr. Cabot's memorandum, dated Sept. 29, 1953, not printed, in which he discussed the repayment record on Export–Import Bank loans.

Mr. Cabot expressed the view that loans for basic utilities in Latin America would actually help rather than harm private investment. In this connection he pointed out that the absence of transportation and power facilities may often prevent the development of private industry which would utilize such facilities. The Secretary expressed the view that lending in Latin America might at times not be a sound proposition. Mr. Cabot repeated his earlier statement that all he was recommending was adequate loan authority to handle sound economic development loans. The Secretary said that in Mr. Humphrey's view, if the loan were sound, there would be adequate lending facilities in the International Bank. Mr. Cabot pointed out that a Latin American country might not be able to obtain a loan from the International Bank if any member country with influence in the Bank opposed it, even though the loan might be perfectly sound and desirable from the viewpoint of the United States. Mr. Kalijarvi said that members of his staff were of the view that there was a justifiable need for economic development funds over and above the lending capacity of the International Bank.

The Secretary then asked Mr. Cabot to summarize the economic aid program for Latin America that he would recommend for Fiscal Year 1955. Mr. Cabot said that in addition to an increased level of lending, he would recommend the following:

1. Continuation of the technical assistance program at a level no lower than at present ($24.3 million) and if possible at a slightly higher rate.
2. Continuation of the present $1 million United States contribution to the OAS technical assistance program.
3. $15 million for the military aid program.

The Secretary inquired concerning the importance of the military aid program in Latin America and asked whether it would be possible to eliminate it or to get the Defense Department to include the program in its own budget. Mr. Cabot replied that from a political viewpoint it would be desirable to avoid anything that would involve falling down on commitments that we have made to the Latin American countries.

Mr. Kalijarvi indicated that he felt that we ought to examine the military aid program for Latin America from the viewpoint of whether or not we have effectively utilized the funds that we have already requested. He said that if the funds have not been effectively utilized, we might consider not asking for additional money for the program.

Mr. Cale pointed out that the military program has been set up to do a specific job, that the Congress has already appropriated enough money substantially to complete supplying the equipment required of us under the program and that discontinuance of the program would mean giving up benefits which the money we have already invested would enable us to obtain, if we were prepared to continue to appropriate the small amount of funds that would be required to assure that the equipment is effectively utilized. He also pointed out that he regards the military aid program as a small step in the direction of increased military cooperation between the United States and the Latin American countries.

Mr. Nolting said that it was his view, on the basis of conversations which he has had with Defense Department personnel, that the Defense Department would support continuation of the military aid program in Latin America.

The Secretary indicated that, in general, he hopes to throw to the Defense Department the responsibility for justifying funds for foreign military aid. He expressed the view that it would be easier to obtain the necessary appropriations from Congress, if the Defense Department is prepared to justify the expenditure of military aid funds for foreign countries on the same basis that it justifies expenditures for our own national defense.

Mr. Cabot referred to problems with which we are now faced in several countries in Latin America, mentioning particularly Bolivia, Brazil and Chile. The Secretary stated that Mr. Dodge has just raised an objection to the proposal of supplying aid to Bolivia.[4] Mr. Kalijarvi inquired whether Mr. Dodge is objecting to supplying of aid per se or to the way in which it should be supplied. The Secretary answered that Mr. Dodge objected to justifying the aid on the basis of famine or other urgent need. The Secretary stated that he had urged that Mr. Dodge go ahead and approve the proposals made by Mr. Stassen for Bolivia. Mr. Kalijarvi indicated that he thought that Mr. Dodge should do this as an expediency but that he should indicate that this case does not set a precedent.

Mr. Cabot said that he hoped that the aid contemplated for Bolivia this year might considerably reduce Bolivian dependence on imported food. Mr. Cale expressed the view that with the present price of tin, Bolivia, even with the best management, is not likely during the course of one year to be able to make sufficient progress in lessening its dependence on imported food to permit us to get by on any smaller aid program next year than that contemplated for the present year.

Mr. Cabot remarked that economic conditions in Chile seem to be getting constantly worse and that our negotiations looking toward the purchase of their copper are getting stickier because the Chileans are indicating reluctance to do the domestic housecleaning which we think is necessary as a condition to the purchase.

Mr. Cabot pointed out that in addition to the various types of aid mentioned earlier there are certain miscellaneous items that should be taken into account. In this connection he referred to hoof and mouth disease control, saying that we were thinking in terms of $1 million for this but that if the disease spreads the figure may rise to $10 to $15 million.

Mr. Cabot also indicated that he considered it highly important that we make substantially greater progress than we are now making in completing the Inter-American Highway and the Rama Road. He said that the appropriation of $1 million for the Inter-American Highway this year is so small in relation to the work to be done that it raises the question whether the money can be used economically. Mr. Cabot expressed the view that we should request at least $4 million for the Inter-American Highway for Fiscal Year 1955 and $2 million for the Rama Road. The items for hoof and mouth disease control and for construction of the two highways have in the past been carried, respectively, in the budgets of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Commerce.

In summary, the economic assistance program for Latin America for Fiscal Year 1955 recommended by ARA is as follows:

1. An expansion of Export-Import Bank and International Bank lending.
2. The following mutual security program:[5]

   a. Bilateral technical assistance—$24.3 million.
   b. OAS technical assistance—$1 million.
   c. Military aid—$15 million.

3. Miscellaneous aid items:

   a. Hoof and mouth disease control (previously in the Department of Agriculture budget)—$1 million.
   b. Inter-American Highway (previously in the Department of Commerce budget)—$4 million.
   c. Rama Road (previously in the Department of Commerce budget)—$2 million.
   d. Food aid for Bolivia—$15 million.

[5] Definitive appropriations under the mutual security program for FY 1955 are contained in the Mutual Security Appropriation Act of 1955 (Public Law 778), approved Sept. 3, 1954; for text, see 68 Stat. 1219.

810.2612/11-553

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot) to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget (Dodge) [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 5, 1953.

MY DEAR MR. DODGE: It has been my privilege today to appear before members of your Bureau to discuss the appropriation of funds for the Inter-American Highway and the Rama Road. I should like to call your attention to the great importance which the Department of State attaches to these projects.

As you know, Public Law 413–82nd Congress (the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1952),[2] authorized the appropriation of $8,000,000 a year for each of two fiscal years for the Inter-American Highway, and $2,000,000 a year for each of two fiscal years for the Rama Road in Nicaragua. These funds would remain available until expended. In Public Law 195,[3] 83rd Congress, the Congress appropriated for the current fiscal year only $1,000,000 for the Inter-American Highway, and only $1,000,000 for the Rama Road. The funds are now being allocated, and only a minimum amount will remain at the end of this fiscal year.

The first authorization of funds for the actual construction of the highway was made by the Congress in 1941,[4] and frequently since then the Congress has reaffirmed its intent to complete the highway. The United States has spent more than $42,000,000 on its share of the Inter-American Highway thus far, and in total, the other countries have spent almost as much. Thus, there is a long record of close cooperation on the road. The momentum of construction should not be allowed to falter.

This cooperation, moreover, is a very important factor in the political relations of the United States with its neighbors in Central America. Our financial aid is matched with contributions by the other governments (one-half of the United States share), and this mutual approach to a necessary and highly useful developmental activity has added to the reservoir of good will for the United States in the area. Guatemala, it should be noted, currently does not receive any financial aid for highway construction, and the Department is anxious to emphasize the close and effective cooperation it offers to Guatemala's neighbors.

The highway will benefit the United States as well as the cooperating countries of Central America. It will promote economic progress and political stability in those relatively underdeveloped countries. It has in the past, and should increasingly in the future, add to the imports from the United States, especially automotive and highway equipment, as the economies of the nations prosper because of the increased transportation facilities within their borders. Also, with the bettered standard of living, political conditions in the countries are bound to improve, and the spread of Communist ideas can be deterred.

The Department of State considers that at least $4,000,000 should be requested for the Inter-American Highway because the funds are intended for use in three cooperating countries, namely, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Panama. With only $1,000,000, such as was appropriated by the last Congress, the unit costs rise, and it is difficult to proceed with new projects in all of the countries. Moreover, the economic situations in those countries now are relatively good, and they are far better prepared now to provide their full share to match the United States contribution.

With respect to the Rama Road, the Department of State firmly supports the appropriation of $2,000,000 for the next fiscal year. The Rama Road in Nicaragua should have equal priority with the Inter-American Highway in the appropriation of funds so that this road building commitment of the Executive Branch of the United States, now recognized by the Congress, can be met in the shortest practicable time. There is only a brief period in which the construction work on the remaining section of the Rama Road can be carried out, and the appropriation of $2,000,000 would provide the funds necessary for an intensive construction period. Nicaragua is a country whose Government and people are particularly friendly to the United States, offering consistent and valuable support in all international matters.

I sincerely hope that it will be possible for the Bureau of the Budget to approve this request to the Congress for the additional appropriation of funds for the Inter-American Highway and the Rama Road in Nicaragua. Both of these projects are of substantial importance in the foreign relations of the United States with its neighbors in Central America.

Sincerely yours, JOHN M. CABOT

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 20, 1954.

Subject: Briefing Memo for Meeting at White House, Thursday, January 21.

The most fundamental problem we have in our relations with the Latin American republics is that of their economic development. Trade and private investment, both native and foreign, can greatly stimulate this development but cannot carry the entire burden. It is essential that public financing at reasonable interest rates be available for the development of basic facilities such as roads, airports, harbor works, irrigation, railways, utilities, etc. (which are essential to increased private investment), if we are to convince our Latin American friends that our protestations of friendship are more than pious platitudes, that cooperation with us does benefit them and does raise their living standards, and that our democratic capitalism is far better for them than Communism with its rosy promises.

During the next five years some three-quarters of a billion dollars worth of loans must be repaid by Latin America to the International and Export–Import Banks. This in itself will mean a heavy drain on the economies of the Latin American republics unless it is replaced by new lending.

The Export–Import Bank has established an enviable record in the Latin American field. It has maintained friendly relations with governments throughout the area, developed many basic facilities, sustained only microscopic defaults, already collected almost 40 percent of the principal it has lent, and made a handsome profit for the United States above all interest and other charges. It has in part been superseded in this work by the International Bank. This Bank has also done creditable work in the development field and has been particularly effective in its basic economic studies. The International Bank is relatively new in the Latin American field and has in some cases been subject to criticism (not always warranted) in the development of its policies. The International Bank is, moreover, not responsible to the United States Government alone, but also to the governments of all its other member states. It does not, and should not, act as an instrument of our policy since it must bear in mind the interests of other members when making a loan. For example, Peru has been unable until very recently to obtain loans from the International Bank despite its sound economic policies and financial condition because it was unable to reach a debt settlement with the British acceptable to both American and British bondholders.

It is universally agreed that the main burden of development in Latin America should be borne by the International Bank. There are, however, cases in which the Bank will not, or cannot, make development loans which we wish to see made in our national interest, as in the Peruvian case above, in the case of the development of strategic resources, or in any case where the development is in our national interest but the guarantee of the local government (which the International Bank requires) is undesirable. We believe that the Export–Import Bank should be permitted to make loans under such circumstances; that it should be authorized to act as an instrument of national policy. Care should, of course, be taken to ensure that the two Banks between them do not overload any country with debt. We believe that the Export–Import Bank should not, as a matter of policy and existing law, make any loans unless it expects that the loan will be repaid. It is a fact, however, that the Latin American republics are seriously perturbed at the narrowing of the Export–Import Bank's activities, and it should be given sufficient liberty of action to reassure them.

Mr. Humphrey's reply[1] to Dr. Eisenhower states that "while the Export–Import Bank is not authorized to raise money through selling its own security issues in the market, its broad powers of guarantying notes of borrowers permit it to use this device for raising funds from the private capital market. The use of guaranties by the Export–Import Bank appears justified because they are a charge against the Bank's authorized lending authority. They are not a charge against the Government's cash budget except in case of default by the borrowers. It is our belief that by the use of guaranties, together with carefully worked out provisions for requiring the applicant for loans to put some of his own money at risk, the Export–Import Bank can go a long way in meeting legitimate needs."

We believe that this statement indicates that Mr. Humphrey is prepared to permit the Export–Import Bank to operate on a somewhat wider scope in the future than it has during the past year. We understand, moreover, that there are means permissible under the existing Export–Import Bank Charter by which private capital sources could be tapped by the Export–Import Bank without even increasing the Federal debt. We hope, therefore, that while recognizing the primary responsibility of the International Bank in the development field, the Export–Import Bank will be permitted to make loans in those cases in which the International Bank is unwilling to make them and this Government, taking all considerations into account, considers that it is important in the national interest that these loans be made. We feel that we should be in a position before or at Caracas [2] to give the other American republics public assurances that their needs for sound loans in an amount of, say, one billion dollars for the next five years will be satisfied by the Export–Import Bank in cases where they can be properly made and the International Bank is unwilling, or unable, to make them, and they should be told that the Export–Import Bank operations will not be confined exclusively to the granting of short-term credits strictly in the import-export field.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 21, 1954.

Subject: Summary of meeting at White House on January 21, 1954.

Participants: The President, Dr. Milton Eisenhower

State: General Smith
Mr. Waugh
Mr. Cabot

Treasury: Secretary Humphrey
Assistant Secretary Overby

Commerce: Secretary Weeks
Assistant Secretary Anderson

Eximbank: General Edgerton

General Smith outlined the concern of State at the restrictions on the operations of the Eximbank. Mr. Waugh then followed this by a more detailed statement. Dr. Eisenhower mentioned the desirability of putting through the Toquepala project.[1] Mr. Humphrey then explained his strong oppostion to loaning money to one American company to compete commercially against another. He was firmly opposed to Toquepala on this ground. He would, however, be glad to see the Eximbank used for short and intermediate-term export credits provided the exporters assumed a part of the risk.

Quite an argument followed regarding the quality of Eximbank loans. Secretary Humphrey pointed out that the Bank had loaned $1,200 million to France [2] and that payment of this sum was doubtful. Mr. Waugh pointed out that the International Bank had loaned $250 million to France later. In answer to a question of Mr. Cabot, General Edgerton said that they did not anticipate any defaults on any of their Latin American loans now outstanding. Secretary Humphrey argued at considerable length against soft loans and it was difficult to divert him from this by pointing out that none of State's representatives were recommending soft loans in the Latin American area in any case.

The President's position, as shown by various comments in the course of the discussion, was clearly in favor of a more liberal loan policy toward Latin America. He also commented that when we were spending $36 billion a year on defense it did not seem a great risk to put an extra $17 million into Latin America in the interests of our security.

The conversation was decidedly disjointed, with no clear decisions reached in the course of it other than that it would be further discussed at the NAC meeting the following day.[3]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 5, 1954.

MY DEAR MR. STASSEN: Reference is made to your memorandum of December 9, 1953 [2] in which you request comments from this and other Departments on the recommendation of the Foreign Operations Administration that the Latin American rubber research program be terminated in so far as FOA is concerned as of June 30, 1954. Your memorandum further suggests the possibility that the program be taken over by the Latin American governments concerned, by the American rubber industry, or by other United States Government Departments.

Careful consideration of this question in this Department has led to the following conclusions:

1. This research program affords a continuing opportunity to accumulate experience and knowledge in fighting leaf blight that might prove invaluable if the leaf blight should somehow be transmitted to the Far Eastern rubber holdings.

2. A research program would seem to be a logical complement of any program of agricultural diversification in Latin America which may include rubber planting. The possibility of producing rubber economically as a cash crop in Latin America would seem to depend on the development of a high-yielding blight resistant plant.

3. If the Foreign Operations Administration does not believe that it can continue the inclusion of an appropriation of $300,000 in its budget for the 1954–55 fiscal year, this Department would endorse a transfer of the program to another appropriate agency of the Government. Alternatively the program might be supported by the rubber manufacturing industry, by a private foundation, or by the Latin American governments concerned. It would not be within the functions of this Department to take jurisdiction over this program. The Department would be

[1] Drafted by A. J. Macone and Stanley Nehmer of the Office of International Materials Policy; cleared with that Office and the Office of Middle American Affairs.

[2] In the referenced memorandum, Mr. Stassen stated that the reasons for recommending the termination of the rubber research program in Latin America were: (1) the project was of marginal importance to U.S. military security interests, (2) it had not contributed effectively to the U.S. objective of promoting balanced economic development, and (3) there was at present a world surplus of natural rubber. (820.2395/12–953) willing, however, to use its good offices with other governments to investigate the possibility of their taking over the program if it should be decided to adopt that alternative.

4. An abrupt announcement that the research program will be terminated at the end of June 1954 might create repercussions in the Latin American countries involved. This Department, therefore, would wish to be kept advised as to further action by the Foreign Operations Administration in this matter in order to allow time for adequate consultation with the governments concerned. In this connection FOA might wish to consider extending the research program through a portion of the next fiscal year to allow more time for a suitable disposal of the program.

Sincerely yours,

For the Acting Secretary of State:
SAMUEL C. WAUGH
Assistant Secretary

NSC 5407

LATIN AMERICA

A. U.S. OBJECTIVES AND COURSES OF ACTION

The Milton Eisenhower visit was a major political and economic event of the year in Latin America. It has contributed to a new spirit of optimism and franker understanding of mutual problems.

[1] The report, titled "Status of United States Programs for National Security as of December 31, 1953," consists of a series of nine parts and two annexes, separately dated and prepared by the following agencies: Department of State (Part 1—Our Relations with the Free World), Department of Defense (Part 2—The Military Program), Foreign Operations Administration (Part 3—The Mutual Security Program), Atomic Energy Commission (Part 4—The Atomic Energy Program), Office of Defense Mobilization (Part 5—The Mobilization Program), Federal Civil Defense Administration (Part 6—The Civil Defense Program), United States Information Agency (Part 7—The USIA Program), Central Intelligence Agency with concurrence by the Intelligence Advisory Committee (Part 8—The Foreign Intelligence Program and Related Activities), Inderdepartmental Intelligence Conference and Interdepartmental Committee on Internal Security (Part 9—The Internal Security Program), Central Intelligence Agency (Annex A—Some Comparable Data on the Soviet Bloc), and Operations Coordinating Board (Annex B—Activities of the Operations Coordinating Board). The overall report is undated; Parts 4 and 6, and Annex A were distributed to the members of the NSC on Feb. 17, 1954, and the remaining parts were transmitted upon their receipt by the Executive Secretary of the NSC.

[2] This extract is from Part 3, dated Mar. 11, 1954.

U.S. economic objectives and courses of action with respect to Latin America as stated in NSC 144/1,[3] have been confirmed and further articulated in Dr. Eisenhower's recommendations.

In several areas the Eisenhower recommendations go beyond previously documented policy. The principal recommendations involving either change in policy or substantial shift in emphasis are the following:

1. A long-range basic materials policy permitting purchases for enlarged stockpiles when prices are declining. (Present stockpiling policy does not envisage stockpiling procurement beyond the calculated goals for the subsidiary purpose of international commodity market stabilization.)
2. Maintenance of a national lending institution to make sound development loans which are in our national interest, but which might not be made by an international agency. (This would require changing the present policy under which the Export–Import Bank operates or establishment of a new U.S. lending agency.)
3. Expansion of the technical cooperation problem in Latin America. (Present NSC policy calls for "Continuing the program of technical assistance to the area, but designing individual projects within the capability of the particular country concerned".)
4. Assigning the consultative part of the technical cooperation task, whenever possible to American universities. (Now done in only a few cases.)
5. Withdrawal of U.S. personnel when a particular project is well established. Dr. Eisenhower states that this is the present policy but that it is not always followed.

The President has expressed his general approval of the Milton Eisenhower report and has asked FOA to implement those recommendations which are within present policy and to give thorough consideration to those recommendations which would require new policy decisions. Development of specific steps to implement the Milton Eisenhower recommendations was the main work of the Lima Conference of USOM Directors of January 13–19.[4]

B. ECONOMIC TRENDS

Latin America's remarkable postwar economic growth is evident in the average annual increase of 5.6% in the area's gross national product at constant prices from 1946 through 1951. The period of rapid progress ended abruptly, however, with overall GNP actually declining in real terms during 1952 and barely recovering to the 1951 level in 1953.

In the absence of production expansion, the persistent annual population increase of 2.5% led to reductions in the average Latin American standard of living as measured by per capita income in both 1952 and 1953. The declines generally took the form of reduced availability of food. FOA estimates average Latin American per capita GNP of $318 in 1953.

The recent slackening of economic progress relates in part to imbalances generated by the development efforts of the Latin American countries themselves and in part to changes in external factors such as international commodity markets.

1. Problems of Balanced Expansion

The numerous recent evidences of imbalance in Latin American development include payments crises, inflation, food and power shortages, and reduced petroleum production.

Although Latin America's aggregate holdings of gold and dollars increased by an estimated $252 million during 1953, critical payments situations developed in several countries, notably Brazil and Bolivia. Moreover, the overall rise in reserves would not have occurred without the Export–Import Bank's loan of $300 million to Brazil necessitated by a pressing backlog of commercial debts. In Peru, unfavorable year-end trends brought the sol-dollar exchange rate from 17.85 in October to 21.89 on January 26th. The President of Peru has requested a short term stabilization loan from the U.S. Treasury, particularly with a view to improving psychological attitudes on the exchange market.

Inflation is a problem of serious proportions in Bolivia and Paraguay. The cost of living has risen by 135% in La Paz and 72% in Asuncion during the past year. Inflationary pressures are continuing to a lesser, but still critical, extent in Brazil and Chile.

Food supply has become a major problem owing to population growth and under-emphasis on agricultural development. Food output per capita in 1952–53 was only 96% of the prewar quantity. Chronic food deficits exist in some countries, e.g. Haiti, and famine conditions have occasionally developed in various regions, e.g., the food shortage in early 1952 causing the migration of some 300,000 persons from northeastern Brazil.

Electric power rationing is a common necessity in Latin American cities. In view of the great need for rapid expansion in this sector, the rise of 8.7% in production during 1953 appears small in comparison with the increase of 11.5% achieved in the U.S.

Latin American production of crude oil declined about 2% in 1953 as compared with average annual increases of 11% from 1949 through 1952. Reduced levels of output were recorded not only by the major producer, Venezuela, but also in Bolivia, Mexico, and Peru. Latin American heavy crudes were facing soft markets with Middle East production substantially increased and U.S. imports reduced. The reversal of the production trend represents a foreign exchange loss and also aggravates fuel and energy shortages.

2. Trade and Commodity Problems

Although strengthened and diversified by post war programs for domestic development, most Latin American economies are still dominated by international commodity markets. Exports of primary goods are the principal source of income to finance imports for current consumption and equipment required in implementation of development projects.

Substantial improvement in terms of trade was a major dynamic factor in Latin America's wartime and postwar economic growth. In October 1953 the area's terms of trade were still 64% more favorable than in 1938, following a decline of about 10% from the average in the peak year 1951. Post Korean price developments have had little impact on the aggregate Latin American terms of trade, but the effects in individual countries have ranged from crisis in tin-exporting Bolivia to general prosperity in the coffee-exporting countries.

The Latin American countries are aware of U.S. policy directed toward liberalization of trade and are disturbed by recent actual or proposed increases in U.S. import restrictions on lead, zinc, fuel oil, wool and oats.. A number of individual trade and commodity problems continue to irritate economic relations between the U.S. and some of the Latin American countries. Uruguay, for example, has objected strongly to the U.S. decision that the preferential treatment by Uruguay of wool top exports was tantamount to a subsidy and that a compensatory duty on such imports was mandatory. Chile complained formally to the State Department regarding the alleged loss of her nitrate market in Greece due to unfair competition from U.S. exports of ammonium sulphate produced in plants which were purchased by present owners from the U.S. Government at 20% of cost. The Chilean Government has also felt that we should buy for stockpile in return for their promise to solve the internal copper problem and not to sell to Russia.

C. THE FUNDAMENTAL PROBLEM—ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The promotion of rapid and balanced economic development on the basis of sound policy and planning is the principal objective of FOA in Latin America.

Latin America's potential for development has been demonstrated by postwar progress. The need for even more rapid development is evident in all of the available indicators of living standards. The insistent demands of the population for immediate economic improvement have an important bearing on internal politics and are of great importance in U.S. relations with the Latin American countries.

Development progress depends on three principal factors, all of which may be affected by internal political considerations in the Latin American countries: (1) realistic country development plans, (2) availability of investment capital, and (3) technical progress.

1. Country Development Plans

A majority of the Latin American countries now have economic development plans and agencies charged with coordinating their implementation.

Experience of Latin American governments in the development field has led to a new awareness of the need for balanced growth of industry, food supply, fuel and energy sources, and transport facilities. One major error in past planning has been corrected by new emphasis on food production in some countries, e.g. Mexico, Argentina, and Chile. Regional planning efforts by the Central American republics, by Brazil, Peru, Chile, and Argentina may or may not be another constructive step, depending on the nature of the results.

FOA has sought to improve country planning, particularly through provision of the technical knowledge on which country government decisions could be based and by advising governments on means of organizing effectively for development planning. U.S. responsibility for actual planning decisions has usually been avoided, however, except in response to specific invitation as in the case of the Joint Development Commission in Brazil. International organizations have a unique opportunity in this field because their advice is likely to be more acceptable than that of any one government.

2. The Need for Capital

Realization of Latin America's potential for economic development will require a huge investment of private and public capital from both domestic and foreign sources over an extended period. Since World War II total domestic and foreign investment in Latin America has averaged about $7 billion annually, with domestic investment accounting for over 90% of the total.

a. Domestic Investment

Over 90% of total investment in Latin America since World War II has been provided by domestic capital. From 1946 through 1952 the Latin American countries invested an average of some 16% of their GNP annually. Private investment accounts for the major portion of domestic capital formation, although in recent years government investment has increased in quantitative and qualitative importance. A substantial share of domestic investment has taken the form of relatively unproductive types of construction, speculative commercial ventures, and investments in consumer goods industries not directly serving development purposes.

b. Foreign Investment

The low ratio of foreign to total investment in Latin America obscures the importance of foreign capital, which brings with it technical skills and has usually entered fields of particular importance to economic development. Foreign capital has also encouraged the flow of domestic captial into jointly financed development projects.

(1) Public Loans

Until 1948 the U.S. Export-Import Bank was the principal source of foreign public loans to Latin American countries for economic development. Since then the IBRD has assumed gradually increasing importance in this field and is currently making development loans in Latin America on a substantially larger scale than the Export-Import Bank. Present U.S. policy requires the Export-Import Bank to refer applicants for development loans to IBRD. Dr. Eisenhower's recommendations, however, point out the need for a U.S. lending agency to make development loans in the U.S. national interest which might not be made by IBRD.

(a) International Bank

IBRD loans to Latin American countries through December 31, 1953, totaled $446.8 million, of which $76.6 million was granted during 1953. Nearly 70% of the total investment is in electric power development with the balance spread out over railroads, highways, industry, agriculture, and ports.

(b) Export-Import Bank

Net active credit authorizations of the Export-Import Bank to Latin America as of December 31, 1953 amounted to $1,348 million, of which less than 10% was for electric power. Latin American industry has received loans totaling $244.2 million, with major emphasis on steel in Brazil, Chile, and Mexico. With the exception of a $300 million loan for Brazil, the Export-Import Bank's new authorizations in Latin America were extremely limited during 1953—$17.3 million—as compared with the annual average of $126.7 million from 1946 through 1952.

(2) U.S. Grant Aid for Basic Public Works

During World War II, with a view to effecting essential highway construction in the U.S. national interest, the U.S. undertook to contribute grant funds toward the financing of the Rama Road in Nicaragua and the Inter-American Highway. Total U.S. investment to date is $5 million in the Rama Road and $47 million in the Inter-American Highway. Estimated further cost to the U.S. before completion is $3 million for the former and $56 million for the latter.

(3) Private Investment

Latin America shared in the accelerated growth of U.S. private direct investment abroad during 1950-52, but to lesser extent than other areas (i.e. up 25% as compared with 48% elsewhere). The total book value is now about $6 billion with Venezuela and Brazil each accounting for over $1 billion. The Brazilian total rose from $588 million at end of 1949 to $1,013 million at end of 1952. Petroleum is still the principal sector (over one-fourth of the Latin American total), but investments in manufacturing and in mining have been gaining rapidly in recent years.

During 1952 U.S. private direct investment in Latin America amounted to $582 million, of which $278 million represented net inflow of new capital and $304 million undistributed subsidiary earnings. In 1953 estimated net inflow of new capital dropped to $113 million, with undistributed earnings staying at $304 million. Recent changes in the private investment climate appear to be generally unfavorable. An intense spirit of economic nationalism continues to operate against the desire and the need for development.

Although the main responsibility for improving the private investment climate must rest with the country governments, there are a number of important U.S. measures in effect or being developed to increase the incentive of U.S. investors. Since the fundamental incentive for private investment is the anticipation of favorable markets, the major potential U.S. contribution in this field lies in fuller implementation of the established policy of encouraging Latin American exports to the U.S. The MSP investment guarantee program, thus far in Latin America limited to a contract with Haiti,[5] will be given a further trial with coverage extended to risks of war, revolution, and insurrection (as recommended by the Randall Commission),[6] in addition to the present coverage for risks of expropriation and inconvertibility. Another possibility for U.S. action is through tax incentive measures as recommended by Dr. Eisenhower and the Randall Commission. Finally, opportunities frequently arise for private investment directly related to U.S. technical assistance programs, e.g. the du Pont plant for insecticides in Peru, Bethlehem's investment in the manganese mines of Amapa in Brazil.

3. The Technical Base

U.S. assistance programs in Latin America have been directed primarily toward meeting the need for adequately trained technicians and to improve techniques in production and other fields. During the past twelve years some 20,000 Latin Americans have been trained on the job and more than 3,000 trainees have been brought to the U.S. for

The recommendations of the commission are contained in its Report to the President and the Congress (Washington, 1954). study. The impact of the programs has been magnified many times by trainees passing on new techniques within their own countries and by inter-country technical exchanges which have been effected under U.S. programs and also at the initiative of the countries themselves. These programs have sought to increase productivity through projects relating to food supply, health, housing, and education; and to increase over-all production through projects in agriculture, industry, natural resources, power, and transportation. Congress appropriated $22.3 million for technical cooperation programs in the Latin American countries during FY 1954 and the countries themselves are making available the equivalent of $44.6 million.

Principal developments from June–December, 1953, were:

a. Dr. Eisenhower's recommendation that the technical assistance program be expanded. The USOM's are reevaluating their programs and budget requests submitted for FY 1955 and are making appropriate program modifications to carry out the Eisenhower recommendations.

b. A broadened FOA approach to the development problem, with greater attention to the impact of foreign exchange problems, trade and commodity fluctuations, and other current economic realities.

c. Continuation of the Servicio as the principal operational device of the technical cooperation program in accordance with the recommendation of Dr. Eisenhower. The Servicios provide a mechanism for true partnership and an effective device for smooth transfer of activities from U.S. to country government direction.

d. New attention to means for assuring that activities initiated by Servicios are transferred to agencies of the host country as soon as the latter are able to assume the responsibility. Dr. Eisenhower observed that this established policy has not always been followed in practice.

e. Expanding the consultative role of American universities in the technical assistance program in the course of normal operations and in specific response to Dr. Eisenhower's recommendation.

f. Continued vigorous support of the operations of international agencies by FOA and other U.S. agencies in Latin America in accordance with existing policy and the recommendations of Dr. Eisenhower. A major goal is to assure that programs are complementary, e.g. recent IBRD loans in Brazil have been given to projects of top priority in the plan of the Joint Development Commission.

As in earlier years, the U.S. has pledged $1 million in support of 1954 OAS regional projects, provided that the U.S. contribution does not exceed 70% of the total. The U.S. also covers 60% of the financing of UNTA programs throughout the world. Total UNTA expenditures in Latin America during calendar 1953 are estimated at $4.7 million.

1. Bolivia

The midsummer Bolivian payments crisis developed essentially because of uncertainties regarding tin marketing and the decline of about 25 percent in tin prices during the second quarter of 1953. Recognizing the crisis proportions of the Bolivian economic situation, the U.S. announced on July 6 that the RFC would purchase 10,000 tons of Bolivian tin and that the technical assistance program would be more than doubled. The RFC purchase was contracted for on September 23rd and all but 600 tons have now been delivered. The RFC contract, however, was not in itself intended to be a solution of the Bolivian crisis. The U.S. in October decided to provide economic aid to Bolivia with the immediate objective of covering the country's current food deficit and the longer run objective of aiding the Bolivians to become self-supporting through diversification of their economy. U.S. aid programs in Bolivia for FY 1954 amount to a total of $12.5 million and include the following: (a) $1.5 million of regular TA; (b) $2 million of expanded TA for emergency food development; (c) $5 million of CCC surplus wheat and flour under PL 216 ("Famine Relief"); and (d) $4 million of FOA program funds.

U.S. political observers in the field and in the State Department are convinced that the present FOA emergency programs have been successful in terms of averting immediate economic crisis, improving relations with the U.S., and reducing Communist influence in government and labor. The longer run outlook, however, is doubtful. In view of Bolivia's poor competitive position and the general deterioration of world tin markets, Bolivia faces further reductions in her capacity to finance imports of development goods.

2. Guatemala

In Guatemala, Communism has made its most serious penetration in Latin America. The Government of Guatemala, though not itself Communist, has welcomed Communist support and has assisted Communists to gain key positions in the pro-Government parties, organized labor, the Congress, and the Government bureaucracy. The Communists have been operating chiefly through the land reform program, seeking to obtain control over the large estates by exploiting differences between the landholders and the poor Ladinos and Indians.

From July 1, 1950 through September 30, 1953, Guatemala was allotted $743,000 of U.S. Technical Cooperation Program funds, almost entirely for agriculture and health. Program emphasis is continuing on these two activities in FY 1954. These minimum operations are being maintained in order to preserve contact with non-Communists in and out of government and to avoid loss of our previous investment in projects which may be useful after the Communist influence in the country is eliminated.

3. Argentina

Argentina, continuing her campaign for closer economic ties with her neighbors, has negotiated "economic union" agreements with Chile, Paraguay, and Ecuador, and has offered agricultural technical aid to Paraguay. An agreement for economic union with Colombia is also expected shortly. The agreements thus far are nothing more than declarations of intent, with detailed protocols still to be negotiated. The U.S. attitude has been one of watchful friendliness; welcoming action to improve Latin American economies, but recognizing the danger of economic penetration as well as duplication of activities now in progress.

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Woodward) to the Acting Secretary of State [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 2, 1954.

Subject: Presidential and Cabinet Support of Eisenhower Report Recommendations for Strengthening Latin American Relations.

In response to your request to Mr. Cabot, I believe the Secretary would be in a firmer position to state at Caracas that the Administration is taking steps to carry out Dr. Milton Eisenhower's recommendations if the President were to request Cabinet cooperation now on the following points:

1. That in considering projects in Latin American relations the Cabinet follow the general guidance of the President's comment in a memorandum of January 12 (Tab A) [2] concerning Dr. Eisenhower's supplementary recommendations in which the President said "I am struck by the fact that a very small loan investment or grant on our part might reap very definite and extensive advantages to us." [3]

2. That the policy of the Export–Import Bank on economic development loans agreed on February 26 (Tab B) [4] between the Secretary of State and Secretary Humphrey be carried out in a way that will yield the maximum benefit from the Eximbank as an instrument of national policy.

[2] The referenced memorandum, transmitting a copy of Dr. Eisenhower's supplementary report to Secretary Dulles, was not found with the source text; however, a copy is in file 120.220/1–1254.

[3] The statement quoted from President Eisenhower's memorandum actually reads as follows: "In reading over the specific problems pertaining respectively to the several countries, I am struck by the fact that, in a number of cases, a very small loan investment or grant on our part might reap very definite and extensive advantages for us."

[4] The statement contained in the attachment (designated "Attachment A" on the source text), not printed, appears as item 5 in Secretary Dulles' address delivered to the Second Plenary Session of the Tenth Inter-American Conference on Mar. 4, 1954; for text of the address, see Tenth Inter-American Conference: Report of the Delegation of the United States of America With Related Documents (Department of State Publication 5692, Washington, 1955), pp. 43–51.

3. That, on specific current items on which the State Department has just initiated action, the Bureau of the Budget

(a) cooperate with State in requesting a 1955 supplemental appropriation of about $975,000 for "Exchange of Persons" and $40,000 for Aid to American Schools, and (b) cooperate with Commerce and State in requesting a 1955 supplemental appropriation of $7 million for the Inter-American Highway (to give more assistance to countries near Guatemala).

4. Although Panama was not mentioned by Dr. Eisenhower, since he did not visit there, it should be very valuable if the President were to ask all agencies concerned (principally Defense) to redouble efforts to give as much satisfaction and assistance to Panama as possible in matters which do not affect our fundamental rights—e.g.

(a) more equitable treatment of Panamanian employees by U.S. agencies in the Canal Zone,

(b) reduction of non-essential commercial competition by U.S. agencies, and

(c) obtaining legislation and appopriations to provide a $2 million annual economic development fund for 10 years in lieu of amending the annual Treaty stipend of $430,000.

5. Several of the recommendations made by Dr. Eisenhower will require continued or increased appropriations in 1956 and it would be valuable to have even at this time a general assurance of Administration support for

(a) a possible increase of $2 million or more in technical assistance by FOA (the present 1955 request of $23 million is considered ample for current expansion because of elasticity within the total appropriation;

(b) $8 million for the Inter-American Highway (which could be completed in about 7 years from now at this rate);

(c) $2 million for the Rama Road in Nicaragua (at this rate, this road given to Nicaragua because of our treaty option to build an interoceanic canal, could be finished in three or four years);

(d) About $2 million additional for the USIA in Latin America (the 1955 request is about $2.8 million);

(e) About $900,000 additional for U.S. contributions to Inter-American organizations (these have been cut down from 30 to 13 organizations in 6 years, and our contribution is about $3.6 million); and

A schedule of comparative budget items from 1953 to 1956 is attached. (Tab C) [5]

The Director of the Foreign Operations Administration (Stassen) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Waugh)

SECRET WASHINGTON, March 13, 1954.

DEAR MR. WAUGH: Thank you very much for your letter of February 5, 1954,[1] commenting on my memorandum of December 9, 1953, regarding the continuation of financial support by FOA of the Latin American rubber research project.

Our recommendation contained in that memorandum was based on conclusions arrived at from a survey of the facts—including the opinions of the Departments primarily concerned regarding the security importance to the United States of the continuation of the Latin American rubber research project. At that time, the opinion of the Departments primarily concerned ranged from State's opinion that no appreciable security interest was at stake and Defense's that the project could not be justified as a real security need to Office of Defense Mobilization's that the project was necessary as a further precaution and would enhance our security interests. FOA concluded from this survey that the project was of marginal—not major—importance to the military security interests of the United States. Since then, the replies to my memorandum from the Departments mentioned have not conflicted with their previously stated opinions. However, Defense now states that while it agrees that the project is of marginal importance to present military security interests, it believes that a continuation would considerably enhance future security interests in the area of natural rubber.

FOA does not determine for the United States Government what the security interest of the United States is. If the Departments primarily concerned with United States security now conclude that this project is of major or significant security interest to the United States, FOA naturally would change its previous conclusion that it is of marginal security interest.

Security interest, while of central importance to a decision as to whether the project should be continued by the United States Government, was only one of the reasons why FOA concluded that FOA intended to discontinue financing the project after the fiscal year and after an orderly transition to another agency—private or public, foreign or domestic—had been attempted. Another important reason referred to was the fact that, thus far, no Latin American country has shown an interest in providing funds for the project. Unless such funds are provided by host governments and the program becomes a cooperative program, FOA would prefer not to continue to support such a research project. In effect, FOA believes that the project has been an extension of the work of our U.S. Department of Agriculture—not part of a cooperative program—and that, if it is to be continued, a suggestion would be that it might be taken over by the Department of Agriculture.

In pursuance of my December 9 memorandum, FOA has sent a dispatch to each USOM Director in the Latin American countries concerned requesting him to determine by March 15 whether his country is interested in making a financial contribution to this project. As yet, no replies have been received.

If the Departments primarily concerned with U.S. security interests are now of the opinion that the project must be continued because of its significant importance to U.S. security, and if the Latin American countries concerned indicate that they will contribute to a fair share of the cost, FOA will then consider continuing the financing of the project in FY 1955. At this time, however, FOA's position remains that it does not intend to finance the project after June 30, 1954 and that, in the meantime, it will continue to seek for an orderly transition of its present responsibility—FOA's view being that the Department of Agriculture's interest—as in the past with this same project—is paramount.

Finally, I should like to note that FOA is continuing in FY 1955 to participate with other interested Latin American governments in rubber research and development on a cooperative basis. Such projects—provided they are sound from an economic and technical standpoint—will be continued in Peru, Brazil, Colombia, Bolivia, Haiti, and Guatemala.

Any further comment you care to make would be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely yours, HAROLD E. STASSEN

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Regional American Affairs (Cale)

[Subject:] The Question of Changing the Nature of the Technical Assistance Program in Latin America

[Participants:] IIAA—Messrs. Hardesty,[1] Hill,[2] Floyd,[3] Burnett [4] and Couse [5]
USIA—Mr. Johnson [6]
ARA—Mr. Holland
EDT—Mr. Frank
AR—Mr. Cale

Mr. Hardesty produced an agenda (copy attached) [7] which he said had been drawn up to facilitate discussion of the matters which he thought should be considered.

[Here follows discussion by Mr. Hardesty concerning the terms of reference within which FOA/IIAA considered itself to be operating.]

At Mr. Hardesty's suggestion, Mr. Hill reviewed the history of the Institute's programs since they were begun in 1942. He concluded by saying that he believed that in some cases the technical assistance which the Institute is now furnishing is in excess of the financial capacity of some of the countries to utilize. He illustrated by saying that it is of doubtful benefit to teach a poor farmer how to use a steel plow unless he has the ability to purchase such a plow. Mr. Hill also said that he believes that serious consideration should be given by the United States to finding some means whereby credit can be provided in cases such as these to permit the farmer to make the needed purchase and that further thought should be given to providing credit to stimulate the local manufacture of such items as plows where this would further the utilization of the "know how" now being provided under the technical cooperation program. He added that he did not believe that we should make any material expansion in the level of grant aid that we are extending to Latin America. Mr. Hill also pointed out that technical assistance activities might themselves be expanded so that in addition to the emphasis now being given to technical assistance in agriculture, education and health and sanitation more would be done in providing technical assistance to industry, in improving government services, etc.

Mr. Burnett then discussed the legal aspects of development assistance in Latin America. This boiled down to the following:

There is authority in the present Mutual Security legislation for engaging in the following types of activity in Latin America:

1. Providing technical assistance.
2. Providing economic development assistance.
3. Disposing of United States agricultural surpluses under conditions such that the local proceeds obtained from the sale of the surpluses in a foreign country can be utilized for economic development purposes.

The principal, if not exclusive reason, why the economic development authority exists, insofar as the Latin American area is concerned, is the fact that it was needed in order to permit the carrying out of a program of this nature in other areas of the world. Some slight use of the economic development assistance authority was nevertheless made this year in connection with the economic aid program for Bolivia. Furthermore, the Mutual Security legislation for Fiscal Year 1955 which has recently been introduced into the Congress contains all of the aforementioned authorities. It also contains, as does the present legislation, a provision permitting the transfer (up to 15 per cent this year) of funds as between areas of the world. Given the size of the funds being requested for some of the other areas of the world and, assuming that there will be funds that can be transferred from these areas, FOA could carry out a materially larger program in Latin America than it is now conducting.

In view of the time that had been taken up by the foregoing discussion, the report on the 1955 budget of the IIAA by Mr. Floyd was omitted, at Mr. Hardesty's suggestion.

Mr. Hardesty then requested that Mr. Johnson repeat for the benefit of the State Department representatives a statement which he had made to Mr. Hardesty before the meeting. Mr. Johnson pointed out that personnel in the United States information program had at one time all been in the Department of State but that following the change of administration after the last elections a decision had been made which separated operations and policy formulation in this field, with operations personnel leaving the Department and policy making personnel and responsibility being kept in the Department. Mr. Johnson then said that the Department of State drafts policy papers for USIA, that in general these are good policy papers but that they often arrive late and furthermore do not always fully take into account certain operating problems that are encountered in putting them into effect. He expressed the view, therefore, that personnel of USIA should participate in the drafting of the policies in this area.

Mr. Hardesty then stated that IIAA believed that it would also be helpful if it could help participate in the formulation of policy with respect to the technical cooperation and economic development programs. He mentioned in this connection the committee within FOA which Mr. Stassen has recently established to coordinate FOA's views as to United States policy for the Rio economic conference.[8]

Mr. Hardesty said that he believed that the policies which have heretofore been followed by the United States in respect to economic cooperation with the Latin American countries will not be good enough for the Rio meeting. He expressed the view that there is a need for a restatement of United States objectives toward Latin America, with special emphasis on economic matters. He also said that he had just been informed that he was expected to appear on Monday, April 12, before the House Foreign Affairs Committee in support of the Mutual Security Program for Latin America for Fiscal Year 1955. He then inquired whether it would be possible for the Department to supply him with the general framework within which he might make his comments before the Committee. He indicated that he believed it only fair to the Congress that he inform the Congressional committees of any changes that might be contemplated in United States economic policy toward Latin America insofar as they might affect the Mutual Security Program.

Mr. Cale pointed out that the regional justification which has already been prepared for the Mutual Security Program for Latin America for Fiscal Year 1955 did appear to set the framework within which Mr. Hardesty might make his statements, unless a change in policy was contemplated. He also expressed the view that any statement made by Mr. Hardesty should be drafted in such a way as not to arouse Latin American expectations beyond our ability to meet them. Mr. Cale also suggested that it might be preferable, even if any change is contemplated, [8] Reference is to the Meeting of Ministers of Finance or Economy of the American Republics as the Fourth Extraordinary Meeting of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council (IA-ECOSOC), popularly referred to as the Rio Economic Conference, held at Quitandinha, Brazil, Nov. 22–Dec. 2, 1954; for documentation relating to the conference, see pp. 313 ff.

to discuss such a change with the appropriate committees, off the record, and to wait to announce it until the Rio conference. Mr. Hardesty again indicated that he believed that a change of policy was needed and that he should be able to make some statement concerning it.

Mr. Holland agreed to provide Mr. Hardesty with a statement that should establish the general framework of Mr. Hardesty's comments before such time as Mr. Hardesty might need to appear before the Foreign Affairs Committee.

3. Effect on national security interests in Latin America of possible anti-trust proceedings (NSC Action No. 805; [2] Memo for NSC from Executive Secretary, same subject, dated June 1, 1953 [3])

Mr. Cutler reminded the Council that by its action a year previously the Department of Justice had refrained from instituting its anti-trust suit against the United Fruit Company, on the grounds of national security. The year had now elapsed, and as the Council had directed, the Attorney General was again raising the problem. Mr. Cutler called on the Attorney General to give his views, and then asked to be excused from participation in the Council's consideration of this subject in view of the connections of the Old Colony Trust Company with the United Fruit Company.

The Attorney General then asked Judge Stanley Barnes to read to the Council a letter [4] on this subject addressed to it through Mr. Cutler (copy filed in the minutes [5] of the meeting). This letter described in some detail a series of conferences between representatives of the Department of Justice and representatives of the United Fruit Company. The letter also set forth the terms of a proposed settlement of the issue by a consent decree. The United Fruit Company, however, still insisted that it was not guilty of any violations of the anti-trust laws, and had refused to consider a solution by consent decree unless the Government revealed in advance the evidence it possessed of violations by the United Fruit Company of the anti-trust laws. The letter ended by raising the question whether the Department of Justice should or should not now proceed to institute proceedings against the United Fruit Company. The Attorney General added that the Department of Justice wished to go ahead with the suit if the Council had no objections on grounds of national security.

Secretary Dulles said that the Department of State saw no reason why the Department of Justice should not proceed forthwith to institute the suit. Secretary Wilson questioned Judge Barnes as to the precise violations of the law allegedly committed by the United Fruit Company, and Judge Barnes provided several illustrations. While Secretary Wilson still doubted the advisability of proceeding with the suit at the present time, the President expressed the opinion that the suit should be instituted if, as seemed to be the case, the United Fruit Company had violated the law. Secretary Dulles repeated his similar view, and added that on balance it might be positively advantageous to U.S. policy in Latin America if the suit were instituted. Many of the Central American countries were convinced that the sole objective of United States foreign policy was to protect the fruit company. It might be a good idea to go ahead and show them that this was not the case, by instituting the suit. . . .

Mr. Allen Dulles said that given a little more time, the Central American states would do Justice's job for it. While he feared that if the Department of Justice announced the suit in the next few days the results might tend to support the position which President Arbenz had taken in Guatemala, this would probably not be so a month from now, by which time the situation in Guatemala would have been clarified.

The National Security Council:

a. Discussed the subject on the basis of a report by the Attorney General pursuant to NSC Action No. 805-b on the results of his negotiations for the elimination of practices deemed inconsistent with U.S. anti-trust laws.

b. Agreed that considerations of national security do not justify further postponement of the proposed anti-trust proceedings beyond the period (estimated at about a month) required to prepare the actual filing of this suit.

Note: The action [6] in b above, as approved by the President, subsequently transmitted to the Attorney General.[7]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 20, 1954.

Subject: Work of FOA and the Department of Commerce on Investment Opportunities in Latin America

Participants: Governor Harold E. Stassen, Director of Foreign Operations Administration
Assistant Secretary Henry F. Holland

I suggested that the Governor let me summarize my views on his proposal of an extensive program to achieve two ends in Latin America.

1. Discovery of investment opportunities and securing U.S. investors for them.

2. Analysis of obstacles to an increased influx of U.S. capital into Latin America.

The objections I stated were:

1. His efforts would be cumulative of programs conducted by the Department of Commerce and the Department of State.

(a) Commerce has published an excellent work on obstacles to private investment in Latin America. They should be better prepared than any other agency to keep that study up to date.

(b) Commerce has long offered a service of bringing investment opportunities in Latin America to the attention of the U.S. public.

2. The program in many capitals of Latin America would duplicate services available on investment opportunities through well prepared private sources such as investment houses, banks, chambers of commerce, and similar organizations.

3. The program would be affirmatively prejudicial to our foreign policy in Latin America at this time because:

(a) Private capital is not entering Latin America today extensively because prospective investors are not accorded the protection of contract and property rights, assurances of sound monetary policies and of opportunities to earn a reasonable return on their investments which are conditions precedent to the entry of a reasonable prudent investor. If, while these conditions prevail, we persuade a large number of small U.S. investors to go into Latin America we will create problems that will severely strain our relations. Latin America today is a place where a well informed investor who can give adequate attention personally or by a trusted proxy to his business can make a good profit. On the other hand, there are a number of areas where the small investor who relies on absentee management will almost surely find himself in substantial difficulty.

(b) We are trying hard to persuade Latin American Governments to institute those policies and local conditions that will cause private capital, particularly their own, to invest itself in projects that will strengthen their economies. Generally, in each of the countries there is enough domestic private capital to meet the development needs of the countries. Because of lack of the basic assurances required by private investors, this domestic capital is either sent out of the country or invested in real estate. If we now start a program to encourage small U.S. investors to enter Latin America in large numbers our efforts to solve the basic problem mentioned above will be largely nullified.

In other words, Latin Americans are reluctant to invest their capital in productive enterprises in their own countries. They are reluctant to do so because they know that local conditions are such that their investment might be lost. Often they are entirely right. We are trying to get the local governments to see that until they improve local conditions they cannot expect private investors to risk their capital. We cannot very well at the same time be conducting a campaign to persuade numerous small U.S. investors to enter the same investment markets.

(c) The accusation is made against us in Latin America that the United States must find homes abroad for large amounts of capital which cannot be invested here. It is said that our interest in creating conditions in Latin America favorable to the investment of private capital are motivated by this selfish purpose, and not by any desire to strengthen their economies. The proposed FOA program would lend credibility to this argument.

When I concluded the statement outlined above, Governor Stassen asked me whether I thought the tendency in Latin America was toward or away from private enterprise, I replied that the trend was toward private enterprise. I pointed out the situation in Peru, the growing belief in Brazil that its oil industry will never prosper until private enterprise is admitted; the spectacular results of private enterprise in Venezuela, and the new trend in Mexico.

He asked me if I was satisfied with the labor situation in Latin America. I replied that I was not; that I felt that we needed more labor reporting officers in the embassies, men who had the language ability and other capacities necessary for them to exert influence on the local leaders.

Governor Stassen then said that he felt our conference had pointed out fundamental differences of opinion on basic policy concepts which made it easy to understand how we could disagree on the wisdom of a particular program. He went forward to enumerate four basic differences of opinion which he felt existed between us:

1. He felt that I was well satisfied with wages and living conditions generally in Latin America whereas he felt that they should be considerably improved.

I stated that he must have misunderstood me—that I shared his view that both wages generally and living conditions should be improved throughout Latin America.

2. He felt that, contrary to my belief, this was the time to encourage a large number of small investors to go to Latin America. He recognized that a good many of them might "lose their shirts," but felt that the net result of their entry would be beneficial.

I stated that on this point we did disagree.

3. He felt that I opposed the establishment of organized labor unions in Latin America, whereas he felt that it would be a good thing.

I stated that he must have misunderstood; that it was my personal belief and the policy of the Department that extension of the organized labor movement to Latin America would be beneficial to this country as well as to the Latin American countries.

4. He felt that I opposed treatment of economic problems in the hemisphere on a multilateral basis. He said that the policy of the Department of State and of the Treasury was to insist on a modern day colonial approach, under which we insisted that the various Latin American countries deal bilaterally with the United States but without any extensive trade or economic relations among themselves. He drew parallels from English and Spanish history regarding such a policy.

I stated that I felt he misunderstood the Department's policy; that we favored such multilateral relations between the Latin American countries.

Mr. Stassen gave me the impression when I left that he still felt there were basic and fundamental differences of opinion between us. Despite this, the meeting was cordial and I was happy to have the chance to explain our views.[1]

[1] Assistant Secretary Holland forwarded a copy of this memorandum of conversation to Secretary Dulles under cover of a memorandum dated July 23, 1954. In the July 23 memorandum, Holland requested the Secretary to sign an attached draft letter to Governor Stassen asking that he continue to hold up the proposed FOA program to stimulate U.S. investments in Latin America. (811.05120/7–2354) The Secretary signed the letter on July 28, and it went out on that date. (811.05120/7–2854)

Memorandum by the Deputy Director of the Office of South American Affairs (Bennett) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 20, 1954.

Subject: Implementation of the Eisenhower Report

It has seemed to me that it might be useful as I depart for the National War College to prepare a review of the progress on implementation of the Report and recommendations made by Dr. Milton Eisenhower following his South American tour of June and July 1953. It is now just over a year since the return of the Eisenhower mission from South America, and the Congress is now completing its session during which consideration was given to a number of the matters raised in the Report. This seems a good time to take stock.

The Eisenhower Report to the President was dated November 18, 1953 and released by the White House on November 20. Shortly thereafter, the President indicated to members of the Cabinet and heads of certain other agencies his "general approval" of the Report and his request that action be taken promptly to implement its recommendations which were within present policy and that thorough consideration be given promptly to those recommendations which would require new policy decisions. The Secretary was requested to receive the comments of other Departments and agencies and to correlate plans for implementation of the recommendations. Dr. Eisenhower submitted to the President on January 11 of this year a confidential supplement to his Report with recommendations on certain specific problems in individual countries. In transmitting this supplemental report to the Secretary of State, the President commented, in part, "I am struck by the fact that, in a number of cases, a very small loan investment or grant on our part might reap very definite and extensive advantages for us."

There is set forth below in some detail the action taken on the various recommendations of the Report (Tabs I and II). There are included pertinent comments on the Report and its recommendations from other members of the Cabinet and heads of agencies.

There is attached a copy of the telegram [1] which was sent by General Smith to the Secretary during his attendance at the Inter-American Conference at Caracas in March. This telegram reported that on March 5 the Cabinet approved in principle a memorandum (also attached)[2] presented by General Smith as indicative of the Administration's determination to implement the Eisenhower Report. The program outlined in the memorandum included several items not actually mentioned by Dr. Eisenhower, but all were in the spirit of his Report.

Throughout this paper I have sought to check carefully with officers of the Department and elsewhere in the interests of accuracy as to facts and figures. The opinions and conclusions stated are my own.

Summary Conclusions

In sum, I believe that substantial progress has been made in implementing the Eisenhower Report. There has been no dramatic directive sweeping all previous policies before it but that was never contemplated. Aside from a general policy statement, foreign policies in practice are made up of the minutiae of practical decisions, particularly when budgetary problems and Congressional appropriations are involved in the procedure. With respect to the impact of the Eisenhower Report, the general policy has been laid down, and day-to-day decisions have proceeded during recent months to fill out that framework.

There is a generally excellent record with respect to going forward on the recommendations concerning specific problems discussed in the supplemental report. There has been improvement in appropriations for projects and programs along the lines recommended by Dr. Eisenhower in his section on strengthening understanding and mutual respect. Additional efforts need to be made, and still greater advances could be made with larger appropriations, especially in aid to American schools in Latin America and in the program for the exchange of students and leaders. We spend so little on these things in Latin America that increases which would be ridiculously small percentage-wise in comparison with expenditures in other areas and for other programs would loom very large indeed in this Hemisphere. In fact, the very smallness of some of these appropriations has made added difficulties in obtaining them. It is actually harder to get $135,000 for aid to American schools—and more detailed attention and scrutiny is given to it simply because it stands as a separate item in the budget—than to obtain a sum of several million dollars in much larger aid programs.

Some progress has been made with respect to the recommendations for strengthening economic cooperation. The record is poorest here, however, and this is the area commonly agreed, and specifically underlined by Dr. Eisenhower, to be of primary importance at the present time and "the key to better relations" between the United States and the other American Republics. There are three economic issues which are paramount in Latin American thinking today:

(1) Our trade policy
(2) Our loan policy, and
(3) Our price policy.

Of these the third issue is, in my opinion, the least important just now since the Latin Americans themselves realize that their clamor, no matter how loud on this issue, is something less than realistic and since we have a good sound position to stand on even though it may not meet Latin American desires.

In my opinion, the United States trade and loan policies are the two matters on which our continuing lack of definite and clear-cut positions cause deep pre-occupation among our Latin American friends. These uncertainties contribute to increasing doubts and lack of confidence regarding our intentions and play into the hands of demagogic and communist elements who wish to destroy good relations between the nations of this Hemisphere.

In the loan field some progress has been made and the picture is brighter than a year ago; but the carefully worded and qualified statement on the Export–Import Bank policy which was made at Caracas—and how difficult it was to get agreement in Washington even on that—was decidedly not enough to meet the situation.

In the field of trade policy we are not better off than we were a year ago, before Dr. Eisenhower's clear and unequivocal presentation of the outstanding importance in our relations with Latin America of stable trade arrangements, with a minimum of mechanisms to permit quotas or increased duties. Indeed, in some ways the situation appears to have deteriorated. Domestic considerations must be given due weight, of course, but I am convinced that the maximum effort has not yet been made to convince American public opinion and the Congress on the vital significance of foreign trade to our welfare and that of our allies in the free world. We must intensify our efforts to find some methods, be it the subsidy route or whatever, through which we can take care of situations which affect usually defined and local industry problems in this country but which can play such havoc with the economy of a less diversified country depending on trade with us for the very basis of its existence. Peril points and escape clauses, no matter how "realistic" their acceptance may be in terms of domestic politics, simply provide a built-in mechanism to open up and nullify any trade agreement at any time. They mean that there can be no real stability in trade arrangements. To fall back on increased duties and restrictions is to walk open-eyed into the pit.

These two policies—trade and lending—are absolutely basic in our relations with Latin America today, and we need not expect other actions or programs or propaganda to compensate for the lack of them or to be able to do their work.

(Note: Since this paper is intended as a personal report for you and Dr. Eisenhower, I would suggest that it not be given distribution outside of ARA. If you should desire, I would, of course, be glad to prepare a report based on this paper more suitable for general distribution.)

[Extracts]

I. Recommendations of the Public Report

A. Strengthening Understanding and Mutual Respect

. . . . . .

B. Strengthening Economic Cooperation

Recommendation 1. "That the United States adopt and adhere to trade policies with Latin America which possess stability and with a minimum of mechanisms permitting the imposition of increased tariffs or quotas. I consider this matter of stability and consistency to be the outstanding requirement."

a. There is no question but that the President agrees wholeheartedly with this recommendation of his brother. The Randall Commission report was in general agreement with it. One cannot overstress, however, the extreme pressures brought on the philosophy underlying this recommendation by domestic political situations. The President's original recommendation for a three-year extension of the Reciprocal Trade Act has been compromised with Congress on the basis of a one-year extension, which will leave our trade policies still in doubt at the time of the Rio Economic Conference, which is of such importance in our relations with Latin America.

b. The line has been held thus far against oil restrictions, and the rejection by the President of the Tariff Commission's recommendations for increased duties on lead and zinc will have excellent effects everywhere. A threat of increased duties on raw wool was averted through the plan (approved by Congress) to apply present duty receipts to relief of the domestic industry; however, because of the domestic political situation, numerous decisions made regarding agricultural commodities have gone against the Department's views.

c. The cases of products on which decisions adverse to good relations with one or more of the Latin American republics have been made in the past two years or are threatened include wool tops, long staple cotton, canned meat, wheat, linseed oil, tung oil, flaxseed, cheese and dairy products and oats.

d. The handling of our agricultural surpluses is a matter of major concern and preoccupation to such countries as Argentina and Uruguay.

Recommendation 2. "That the United States adopt a long-range basic-material policy which will permit it to purchase for an enlarged national stockpile certain imperishable materials when prices of such materials are declining. . . . Such a policy would . . . be of immense benefit in protecting the long-term economic future of the United States, and would provide at least some degree of stability in world market prices of raw materials.

"I recognize that the implementation of such a policy would presumably have to await the time when United States fiscal resources are not severely strained by defense expenditures."

Action

a. Other than the stockpiling program, it appears that we do not have any long-range raw materials policy in this Government. The goals for stockpiling have recently been raised in some respects, and this may help us to meet urgent problems on specific commodities. A cabinet committee is studying the minerals situation.

b. We have continued to purchase Bolivian tin for the stockpile; this has been of vital assistance to Bolivia in her critical economic situation.

c. The decision was made in March to purchase 100,000 tons of Chilean copper for the stockpile; this relieved a critical situation in Chile.

. . . . . .

Recommendation 3. "That the United States carefully examine whether or not it would be appropriate to amend the present tax laws to remove existing obstacles to private investment abroad."

Action

a. That portion of the President's budget message [3] dealing with removal of tax obstacles to private investment abroad would have been of less benefit to Latin America, which already has the Western Hemisphere Trading Act, than to other areas of the world, but it would have been helpful to some United States corporations operating in Latin America. Customs simplification would also have been a matter of relief to many United States corporations operating abroad, including Latin America. Both these measures were lost in the Congress. Other incentive provisions in the trade and investment field have also failed of adoption. In sum, except for certain technical improvements, little has been accomplished in the tax field.

Recommendation 4. "Public loans for the foreign-currency costs of sound economic development projects . . . it seems essential that the United States maintain a national lending institution to make sound development loans which are in our national interest, but which might not be made by an international agency." . . . The Eximbank should consider raising more of its funds from private capital market.

a. Language regarding a rejuvenated role for the Eximbank was worked out for use by the Secretary at the Caracas Conference. That position received Cabinet approval. The Executive's action and the passage of the Capehart bill [4] to reorganize the Bank with a view to its greater autonomy and to increase its lending authority by $500 million have reassured Latin Americans to some extent that the Eximbank will have a proper role. However, the proof of the pudding is in the eating, and since the Secretary's statement at Caracas in early March only $25.2 million have been loaned ($15 million was to Brazil to finance purchases of U.S. wheat). Actually, there is still vigorous pulling and hauling mong the departments and agencies regarding the Eximbank, and opinions differ as to whether the position being worked out by the Sub-cabinet committee preparing for the Rio Economic Conference will offer sufficient reassurances to the Latin Americans regarding our genuine interest in their economic development.

[4] Reference is to Senate bill 3589, introduced on June 11, 1954, by Senators Homer E. Capehart (R.–Ind.) and Burnet R. Maybank (D.–S.C.). The bill was approved on Aug. 9, 1954, as the Export–Import Bank Management Act (Public Law 570); for text of the act, see 68 Stat. 677.

b. Comment of the Secretary of the Treasury: [5] "Development loans should be made by the Export-Import Bank only in special cases of overriding national interest . . . The use of guaranties by the Export-Import Bank appears justified because they are charged against the Bank's authorized lending authority. They are not a charge against the Government's cash budget except in case of default by the borrowers. It is our belief that by the use of guaranties, together with carefully worked out provisions for requiring the applicant for loans to put some of his own money at risk, the Export-Import Bank can go a long way in meeting legitimate needs."

c. Comment from the Secretary of Commerce: [6] "Dr. Eisenhower's statement of recommendations with respect to public lending by International Bank and the Export-Import Bank are sound, in my judgment."

Recommendation 5. "That the United States stand ready to give appropriate technical help to the Latin American countries that express a desire to work out more orderly ways of determining how their resources, including their borrowing capacity, can make the greatest contribution to their economic development . . . The purpose of technical assistance in this area should be to establish priorities of need, to develop project plans in ways that satisfy lending institutions, and to do this within the credit worthiness of each nation."

Action

a. This recommendation by Dr. Eisenhower developed from his view that use might be made of a device similar to the United States Joint Commission with Brazil, but organized with proper safeguards. In view of the Brazilian experience, the Department has been quite leery of going into this type of project again, although certain types of technical assistance in this field could undoubtedly be made available and would be needed along the usual lines if Eximbank operations were expanded. In connection with planning for Rio, however, this device has been recognized as useful in exceptional cases, where both the United States and other countries fully understand and accept the financial implications involved.

[6] Extracted from a letter from Secretary Weeks to Secretary Dulles, dated Jan. 15, 1954; a copy is attached to file 120.220/1-1654.

Recommendation 6. "That, in very unusual circumstances, the President of the United States be in a position to make grants of food from our surplus stocks . . . appropriate to require the government receiving the grants to set aside counterpart funds."

Action

a. Food grants were made to Bolivia in FY 1954 in the amount of $5,000,000. Other grants will presumably be made during the current fiscal year.

b. Food grants have been discussed in connection with the Chilean problem and that matter is under study now.

c. Brazil's urgent need for 300,000 tons of wheat was accommodated by arranging an Eximbank credit to cover 200,000 tons and accepting strategic materials in exchange for 100,000.

d. Dried milk and butter oil are being made available to Peru at a price greatly reduced from the domestic level. This will enable an increase in milk production in Peru.

. . . . . .

Recommendation 7. "That the technical cooperation program in Latin America be expanded. . . . "We should continue the 'servicio' type of administration . . . "The consultative part of the task should, wherever possible, be assigned to an American university . . . "In each 'servicio' project, the policy of the United States should be to withdraw . . . when the local government is able to carry on." The technical cooperation program in Latin America should not be submerged under other vast emergency programs being carried out by FOA but should retain its separate identity.

Action

a. The budget request for technical cooperation programs in Latin America for FY 1955 was $23,500,000, approximately the same as last year. Although allocation among areas has not yet been made (the total request of $112 million on a world-wide basis was reduced by Congress to $105 million), this figure for Latin America appears to be safe. An additional $5 million for Latin America was appropriated on the initiative of Senator Smathers.[7] In addition, a $9,000,000 program for grant aid for Bolivia was approved.

---

[7]George A. Smathers (D.–Fla.).

b. Funds were appropriated for the Inter-American Highway and the Rama Road, although these projects did not figure in the Eisenhower Report.

c. A special FOA meeting, with Mr. Stassen presiding, was held at Lima in January to develop detailed plans for strengthening Latin American programs along the lines recommended by Dr. Eisenhower.

d. Comment of the Secretary of Commerce: "I emphatically agree with this . . . about the most effective long term assistance which the United States can render . . . deficiency of know-how and experience is one of the most severe bottlenecks. I believe that a considerably wider approach to this problem can be a part of our policy toward Latin America. . . . push technical cooperation as far and as fast as the facts in each case will properly support."

e. Comment of the Secretary of Agriculture: [8] "The report gives particular recognition to the 'servicio' . . . experience of the Department of Agriculture, however, has shown that the method for rendering technical assistance varies greatly as between countries . . . careful judgment should be exercised by administrators in the choice of the proper techniques for each particular project." (Note: Agriculture has always been rather cool to the "servicio" technique, since it in many cases superseded or absorbed Agriculture's own bilateral arrangements.)

f. Comment of the Director of FOA: [9] "Plans for expanding the use of United States universities and colleges are in final form."[10] This program has been going ahead in recent months.

Recommendation 8. "That we continue our vigorous support of the various technical agencies operating as an integral part of our activities in the Organization of American States" particularly IA–ECOSOC.

Action

a. This is being done and a build-up of the IA–ECOSOC is in process.

b. An additional $500,000 (present rate $1 million) has been approved by Congress for the United States contribution to the technical cooperation program of the Organization of American States.

Recommendation 9. "That our Government also continue to support the work of the International Monetary Fund . . . United Nations agencies such as the Economic Commission for Latin America."

[8] Extracted from a letter to President Eisenhower from Secretary Benson, dated Jan. 15, 1954; a copy is attached to file 120.220/1–1654.

[10] The statement by Mr. Stassen actually reads as follows: "I am pleased to be able to report that plans for expanding the use of United States universities and colleges are in final form and that this, too, will be a major topic for discussion at Lima."

Action

a. This is being done.

II. Recommendations With Respect to Specific Country Problems

A. VENEZUELA

Recommendation

"Perhaps the most serious irritant in United States relations with Venezuela we found was Venezuelan dissatisfaction over its inability to purchase military equipment for its armed forces from the United States in the amounts or under the terms desired . . . preferred to pay outright . . . than to be the recipient of grant assistance . . . quantity quite insignificant . . . European countries have consistently offered equipment to Venezuela at prices cheaper than the United States . . . with more rapid delivery and better payment terms. Growing resentment in Venezuelan Government circles . . . threatening continued existence of our military missions.

"It should not require a great effort to take the small steps necessary . . . the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense should give consideration to this situation with a devising expeditious purchase and delivery arrangements.

"The Administration should continue vigorously its opposition to measures which would change the present basis on which Venezuelan oil enters the United States."

Comment of the Defense Department on March 22, 1954: [11]

"The chief Venezuelan complaint has been the cash upon delivery terms required by the law (MDAA). As a result of a finding by the Director of Foreign Operations on 27 January 1954, Venezuela now has the same status as Canada, and the three military departments are permitted to deliver stock items to Venezuela with payment due sixty days after delivery . . . Priority of delivery and availability . . . is based on policy that military assistance should go first to nations that are fighting or are liable to be the first to fight . . . However, effort is being made within the priorities assigned to make available and expedite the delivery of equipment to Venezuela and other Latin American countries."

It is believed that there has been improvement over the situation of a year ago with respect to purchase and delivery arrangements, as well as better understanding on the part of Venezuelans concerning unavoidable delays in the delivery process. The circumstances of the transfer of certain Venezuelan arms purchases (tanks) to Europe primarily for reasons of top-echelon graft, after the transaction had been virtually completed here, have become widely known and much criticized in Venezuelan military circles. This should serve to reduce abuses in purchasing procedures in the future, and should redound to our benefit.

Efforts to change the basis of oil imports by Congressional action, which would violate the trade agreement with Venezuela, one of our largest customers, have been unsuccessful thus far. The pressure from coal, independent oil producers and other domestic interests continues heavy, however. An inter-departmental committee is currently studying the problem.

B. COLOMBIA

Recommendation

"The Secretaries of State and Defense should work out an equitable and sympathetic formula for the settlement of the Colombian reimbursement problem (for expenses in Korea) so that this matter can be negotiated with the Colombians and this source of potential trouble removed."

Action

The Cabinet on March 5, 1954 agreed that the charges for Colombian expenses in Korea should be held in abeyance until the outcome of the proposed legislation to implement an NSC decision to permit the waiver of all or part of reimbursement obligations.[12]

C. ECUADOR

Recommendation

That the Export–Import Bank act favorably on Ecuador's long-pending application for an Eximbank loan for $2.5 million for improvement of the Quito and Guayaquil airports. "The personal safety and the defense security of our citizens would obviously be served through adequate loan assistance to Ecuador in the improvement of her airports. . . . A shift of the project to the World Bank with the attendant delays will cause harm to United States-Ecuadoran relations."

Action

On January 8, 1954 the Eximbank authorized a credit of $2.5 million to assist in financing the development of the two airports. After insisting for months that it handle the airport loans and threatening that action by the Eximbank would imperil, if not kill, Ecuador's chances for larger loans for highway construction, the World Bank on February 10 made a loan of $8.5 million for a road construction program in Ecuador to aid agricultural development. This was the full amount that had been requested for that project, although another application for a port project has been rejected for the present.

D. PERU

Recommendation

Discussed Peru's friendship for the United States and sound economic policies of recent years, and Peruvian feelings of neglect over small amount of United States loan assistance to country's economic development. Pointed out that decline of non-ferrous metals prices and possibility of United States restrictions on lead and zinc gave Peru much concern over possibly heavy pressures on her free economy. Recommended the Toquepala project as a good business proposition, a highly desirable development from the strategic point of view and as in the interest of good United States relations with Peru.

Action

When Peru's economy did come under pressure in late 1953 and early 1954, causing a sharp decline in the value of the sol, action was taken quickly in Washington to alleviate the situation. The International Monetary Fund, in a tribute to Peru's essential soundness, took action and authorized a standby credit to Peru of $12.5 million,[13] 50% of her quota, a percentage rate exceeded only once in IMF history. The United States Treasury signed a bilateral stabilization agreement[14] for the same amount, and the Chase Bank contributed to the solution with a loan of $5 million to Peru. These actions so strengthened the sol that to date Peru has not found it necessary to draw down any of the funds.

Settlement has been reached between Peru and the British on defaulted sterling bonds, which makes Peru eligible for World Bank loans.

Comment from the Defense Department on the original Toquepala project:

"appears to be a sound business proposition and desirable from a strategic point of view . . . need for the development of new copper sources."

[13] For additional information on this subject, see the International Monetary Fund, Annual Report of the Executive Directors for the Fiscal Year Ended April 30, 1954 (Washington, 1954), pp. 90, 107.

[14] For text of an announcement by Secretary Humphrey, dated Feb. 18, 1954, concerning the signing of a stabilization agreement between the United States and Peru, see Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the State of the Finances for the Fiscal Year Ended June 30, 1954 (Washington, 1955), p. 289.

No final action has been taken by this Government on the Toquepala project. The Peruvian Government and American Smelting & Refining have not yet reached agreement on terms of a concession contract. In Washington the Eximbank, while ready to lend $60 million to match an equal amount to be made available from defense procurement funds, felt that it could not take on the full $120 million when the Defense Materials Board cancelled its earlier certification of the project. The Treasury Department has been opposed to public loans for Toquepala.

After several months of relative inactivity, however, the project is stirring vigorously again. AS&R now states it expects shortly to arrive at satisfactory terms with the Peruvians; and on August 5 AS&R submitted to the Department a revised proposal which provided for a larger total project of $196 million, with private interests prepared to put up 50% of this amount. This calls for a scaling down of the Eximbank participation to $98 million. The Department favors this proposition and hopes for Eximbank's approval before the Rio Economic Conference. Treasury's attitude on this revised project is not yet known.

The President's decision to reject the Tariff Commission's recommendation for increased duties on lead and zinc is a matter of first-rate importance to Mexico and Peru in view of the large dollar earnings received by those countries for those products. Bolivia will also welcome the decision.

E. BOLIVIA

Recommendation

"Our extension of aid to Bolivia had immediate success . . . through the strengthening of moderate members of the Government . . . We should continue our emergency efforts in our own national interest to help Bolivia strengthen and diversify her internal economy . . . necessity for a minimum of $15 million in aid for the coming fiscal year.

"Now that we have begun this program, we must not abandon it in midstream . . . avoid a situation which runs the very real risk of bringing the Communists into political ascendency. . . . If the price of tin does not improve, Bolivia will need some aid for five years while she is expanding her farm production."

Action

Decision to extend to Bolivia an emergency economic aid program under the Mutual Security Act, the only one in Latin America, was made in September 1953, after Dr. Eisenhower's visit there and with his strong support, but before the publication of his Report. The total program for fiscal year 1954 came to $14.5 million and included food grants from surplus stocks and the more than doubling of the technical cooperation program in agriculture.

Consistent with the Eisenhower recommendation, the Department recommended in the draft foreign aid program for FY 1955 [15] a $15 million dollar grant, $11 million of which would be used primarily for purchase of goods to meet current consumption needs and $4 million for equipment and supplies to assist in diversifying and increasing Bolivia's agricultural production. Governor Stassen considered it advisable to reduce the program to $9 million for submission to Congress but agreed that, should the Bolivian situation so warrant, additional assistance would be made available under the proposed surplus agricultural disposal program. The $9 million figure was approved by the Congress in the foreign aid appropriation bill.

The Department has given considerable thought to the possibility that, unless the price of tin improves, Bolivia will need some aid for perhaps five years. The exact amount will depend on whether or not Bolivia is able to obtain loans for development purposes. Development loans would enable Bolivia to apply foreign exchange, now being used to purchase capital goods, to import minimum needs for current consumption. By FY 1956 the need for food imports is expected to decrease somewhat. Aid to finance the economic development program, however, will be required for several years. The Bolivians have indicated a preference for loan financing of their development programs.

Comment from the Eximbank:

"The circumstances in Bolivia which led to the decision to extend aid in the form of grants limit the capacity of Bolivia to undertake the obligations of large additional loans."

Since the issuance of the Report, the Eximbank has authorized a credit of $2.4 million,[16] in addition to loans over recent years totalling around $27 million, to finance the completion of the Cochabamba–Santa Cruz highway and the repair of equipment for use in maintenance and in building tributary roads. The main highway is already carrying traffic and is scheduled to be formally inaugurated in September of this year.

Comment from the Department of Defense:

"I agree with the necessity of providing emergency aid to Bolivia; however, I believe that such aid should not be continued on an indefinite basis . . . It is suggested that the United States assist in the development of a broader base for the Bolivian economy with particular emphasis upon foodstuffs production."

[15] For documentation on this subject, see volume I.

[16] Reference is to an increase in a credit previously established in the amount of $16 million in favor of the Corporación Boliviana de Fomento; for information, see Export–Import Bank of Washington, Seventeenth Semiannual Report to Congress for the Period July–December 1953 (Washington, 1954), p. 9.

Comment from the Treasury Department: [17]

"It is questionable that our emergency aid program should continue as long as five years while Bolivia expands her farm production. Realistic price incentives for their exchange reform and a halting of the inflation are the basic requirements."

F. CHILE

Recommendation

"Chile's rampant inflation and serious economic conditions have been brought on by gross mismanagement . . . culmination of inept and misguided policies came with the accumulation of 130,000 tons of unsold copper. . . . While not essential to our needs this copper can be a useful addition to our stockpile, and we should be prepared to purchase it only under conditions which would contribute to a basic improvement in Chilean economic policies. We should not submit to political or economic blackmail."

Action

In March of this year, after lengthy negotiations with Chile, a cabinet decision was made to buy 100,000 tons of Chilean copper at the then market price, 30 cents a pound, for our national stockpile. The purchase was made on the strength of a renewal of Chile's promise not to sell copper to the Soviet Bloc, and to enact legislation providing for a single tax on copper in lieu of the present multiple system, return control over sales to the companies (this is considered an additional safeguard in preventing shipments to the Soviet Bloc), elimination of price fixing, and the establishment of a non-discriminatory exchange rate for copper. The promise to refrain from selling to the Soviet Bloc has been carried out. The other assurances were embodied in a bill presented by the Chilean Executive to the Congress on March 2 as an urgent measure. At this date the "urgent measure" is still being considered by the Chilean Congress, with the outcome unpredictable.

In the meantime, the Chilean Government has faltered from one crisis to another, and the national economy has continued to decline. The cost-of-living increased from May 1953 to May 1954 by more than 80%. No solution to Chile's grave problems appears in prospect, and there is no indication that Chileans themselves, despite brave words and innumerable promises, have yet determined to grasp the nettle involved in the hard decisions that must be made if Chile is to be put back on the road to sound policies. In the meantime, irresponsible demagogues and Communists make hay in Congress and before the public, and the Government becomes more and more a prisoner of its own political cowardice and general policy drift.

Comment from the Treasury Department:

"Although the danger of large sales to the Soviets seems lessened, the United States should in any agreement to buy copper at the market, require assurances on this as well as on fair treatment of the companies."

G. URUGUAY

Recommendation

"Uruguay considers herself our loyal and tried friend in the political councils of the Hemisphere and the world . . . of late they have developed something of a fixation of being neglected by the United States. Uruguayans tend to overlook the fact that they have not treated United States private economic interests particularly well in recent years, and they are greatly preoccupied over the possibility of United States tariff quota restrictions or other methods of trade control which would diminish the export to the United States of Uruguayan wool. They are also concerned lest our agricultural surpluses be used in such a way as to harm their markets . . .

"Uruguay's example of political democracy is one which it is in our interest to encourage in Latin America. While we should not fail to protect United States private interests . . . we should make every effort to assuage Uruguayan feelings of neglect and to work out methods of handling agricultural problems which would show adequate understanding of Uruguay's vital interests."

Action

Uruguay has recently taken to wearing a self-fitted halo, which makes cooperation with her difficult. Relations at the Caracas Conference were not particularly satisfactory in either the political or economic fields. Despite continued informal representations on our part, the Uruguayan Congress earlier this year, aroused over chronic meat shortages and fearful of domestic political consequences passed a law to regulate the meat packing industry which discriminates markedly against the United States-owned packing houses.

On the United States side of the ledger the countervailing duties imposed in 1953 to United States imports over Uruguayan wool tops (justified on the grounds of Uruguayan use of multiple exchange rates) remain in effect. They have, however, been substantially reduced, from 18% to 6% following a reduction in the Uruguayan exchange rate. Early in 1954 this Government decided that it could not carry out its obligations under GATT [18] to reduce certain duties on meat products because of our domestic beef situation. This decision was, of course, very disappointing to Uruguay and was regarded as a renege on a commitment by the United States.

United States agricultural surplus disposal policy, as reflected both in the present legislation and in plans for future legislation, embraces the principle that the disposal of United States surpluses will be carried out in such a way as not to displace exports of friendly countries. However, the Uruguayans have formally protested the United States sales of linseed oil from CCC stocks and have regarded it as dumping. (The United States price is approximately 16 cents and we recently disposed abroad at 6 cents.) Uruguayan concern over our surplus disposal program remains great.

H. ARGENTINA

Recommendation

"It is in our national interest to maintain and broaden the improvement in relations which has occurred . . . our primary aim should be to counter the Argentine tendency toward neutralism . . . and to align Argentina firmly on the side of the West. If we can develop in the Argentine Government a sense of understanding and trust . . . we may at some future time be able to exert influence which would lead to an improvement in Argentine attitudes with respect to the fundamental freedoms.

"We should not deceive ourselves as to the nature of the Government . . . or as to Peron's personalist and emotional type of leadership. We should seek to carry on relations with the Peron Government in an atmosphere of frankness and we should display a sympathetic attitude toward Argentine aspirations for economic development through the aid of United States private enterprise. We should seek to handle such domestic problems as the disposal of our agricultural surpluses and possible tariff increases on wool in such ways as to cause the least strain on our relations."

Action

Real progress has been made in improving relations between this Government and the Peron administration. Ambassador Nufer holds a position which has not been equalled by any United States representative since the beginning of the Peron regime; and the personal relationship established with Peron by Dr. Eisenhower has contributed immeasurably to a growth of confidence and trust in us on the part of the [18] Reference is to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), concluded at Geneva, Oct. 30, 1947, and entered into force for the United States, Jan. 1, 1948; for text, see TIAS No. 1700 or 61 Stat. (pts. 5 and 6).

Argentine President. Fortified by these personal relationships, Peron has up to now not permitted the serious problems which remain between us, such as United States public dislike for Argentine internal policies and Argentine concern over United States agricultural policies, to interfere with his overall policy of rapprochement with the United States. The dangers in the basically personalist quality of Argentine policy under his leadership must not be disregarded, however, for we know that many influential Argentines in and out of the Government are less willing than Peron to submerge their traditional Argentine feelings of antagonism toward the United States or to overlook our numerous fundamentally divergent views on political and economic policies.

Beneficial results of improved relations with Argentina have included outstanding improvement in Argentine press treatment of the United States, cessation of official propaganda attacks on the United States in Argentina and the other Latin American countries, and a generally more sympathetic approach to United States policies and motivations (although they do not hesitate to be critical in the press and elsewhere of specific policies or actions). Peron has moved steadily toward a more positive identification with the West and has shown himself increasingly aware of the dangers of communist infiltration in Argentina and elsewhere in the Hemisphere. He seems anxious now to embark on a policy of broad, hemispheric action against communism, and Ambassador Nufer has recently proposed that we increase our cooperation with Peron, particularly with regard to communist and Hemisphere security matters. His recommendations are currently under study.

Sincere efforts are being made by Argentina to improve the atmosphere for foreign private investment; as a result there has been a marked resurgence of interest on the part of United States investors in Argentina. United States investments in Argentina, however, still face dollar remittance problems, due basically to the lack of dollar exchange.

The Argentines have been greatly pleased over their success in purchasing at Government auction in this country a steel mill originally constructed for Czechoslovakia; it will form an important component in their plans for an integrated steel industry. In June of this year the Eximbank approved an application (subject to the raising by the industry of certain additional financing by the company) for the financing of the purchase of a blast furnace by the Argentines for this project. An Eximbank mission has just returned from Buenos Aires after a survey of various economic development projects which United States firms are interested in undertaking.

President Eisenhower's call for further study of the proposal of the Tariff Commission to raise wool duties provided comfort to the Argentines, although the final decision is obviously of great concern to them. They were encouraged by his decision not to impose immediate restrictions on tung oil imports; nevertheless they are still greatly preoccupied over future United States policies with respect to United States import restrictions on these and other items. Argentina has vigorously protested certain United States actions in disposal of agricultural surpluses, particularly with respect to our sales of linseed oil for export at far below domestic prices, and has asked for consultation with us on the general problem of agricultural surplus disposal.

Comment from the Defense Department:

"This Department is in agreement with Dr. Eisenhower's conclusions."

I. PARAGUAY

Recommendation

"We should continue our programs of technical assistance . . . the United States would obviously derive great political benefit in Paraguay if the Eximbank were to lend the relatively small amount of $2.5 million necessary to give the capital of Paraguay a water system."

Action

The amount allocated for the United States contribution to the technical assistance program in Paraguay was substantially greater in FY 1954 than in 1953. Future contributions to the program will depend on Paraguay's ability to assimilate them, as well as on actions taken by our Congress with respect to appropriations.

After lengthy consideration, it now appears that the Eximbank is ready to go forward with a loan to Paraguay for the waterworks system at Asunción.[19] This project has, of course, had the strong support of the Department.

Comment from the Treasury Department:

"The proposed water system for Asunción is within the purview of the World Bank. The economic case for it is weaker than for other projects that would create or save more foreign exchange."

Comment from the Defense Department:

"This Department believes the United States should continue Point IV and modest economic development aid."

Comment from the Eximbank:

"As long ago as 1938 officials of the Paraguayan Government discussed with the Bank the possibility of a credit to assist in constructing a potable water system for Asunción . . . broached from time to time but Paraguay has usually given higher priority to other projects. It is our opinion that a potable water system would probably cost considerably more than the $2.5 million presently given as the Paraguayan estimate. The proposal presents a number of technical and financial problems."

J. BRAZIL

Recommendation

"The President (Vargas) would wish to send a small mission to the United States to confer with officials of our Government regarding a plan of economic cooperation between our two Governments . . . We should be prepared to sit down with Brazil on her request and review sympathetically her problems. . . . In such talks it is anticipated that Brazil would seek financial assistance for economic projects which would not be of interest to private firms. If the United States is not in a position to provide such assistance, it will probably be very difficult to reach agreement with Brazil on significant plans for economic cooperation.

"We should continue to urge upon Brazil recognition of the benefits of private investment . . . We should also continue to urge the International Bank to expedite sound loans to Brazil in connection with the recommendations made by the Joint Brazil–United States Economic Development Commission . . .[20]

"Careful consideration should be given in our Government as to methods by which Brazil can be encouraged to modify its present restrictive petroleum legislation and find constructive solutions which will permit sound development of Brazil's petroleum resources."

Action

The small mission mentioned above has never been sent to the United States, although various individuals holding high positions in the Brazilian Government have visited Washington during the past year. In accordance with this recommendation to consult and in preparation for the Rio Economic Conference, the Department some time ago formally invited the Brazilian Government to send a delegation to Washington to discuss bilateral economic matters. The Brazilians received this invitation with considerable satisfaction, but decided to delay the talks until the arrival in Brazil of Assistant Secretary Holland, who is now scheduled to visit Rio in mid-September.[21] The Vice President of Brazil, Cafe

[20] The final report of the Joint Brazil–United States Economic Development Commission, containing the Commission's recommendations for the economic development of Brazil, was published as The Development of Brazil: Report of the Joint Brazil–United States Economic Development Commission with Appendixes (Washington, 1954).

[21] Between Sept. 5 and Oct. 10, 1954, Assistant Secretary Holland visited the ten countries of South America and Mexico in order to discuss with the respective heads of state matters pertaining to the forthcoming Rio Economic Conference; extensive documentation relating to his trip is in file 110.15 HO for 1954.

Filho, has been invited for an official two weeks visit in the United States commencing October 18.[22]

With respect to loans, a sympathetic reception was given to a visiting Brazilian delegation which came to the United States in May of this year for discussions relative to modifying the $300,000,000 loan repayment schedule. A satisfactory adjustment was made, and general loan policies were discussed. Several Eximbank loans [23] have been granted since January of this year for Brazilian development projects.

With respect to World Bank loan activities in Brazil, a special resident representative of the Bank has recently established an office at Rio de Janeiro to work closely with the Brazilian Government. The President of the World Bank, Mr. Eugene Black, and members of his staff visited Brazil and reached an understanding with Finance Minister Aranha concerning development loan applications now on file with the Bank. It was agreed to provide a "breather" of several months while World Bank and Brazilian officials completed studies of Brazil's financial position. It is anticipated that further loans will be forthcoming as Brazil's financial situation improves.

The Petrobras Government Petroleum Corporation has been organized, but no attempt has yet been made to modify existing legislation which prevents foreign investment in Brazil's petroleum development on a reasonable basis. However, Brazil's exchange shortage and the inability of the Brazilian Government to provide dollars to Petrobras exert pressures on Brazil to modify somewhat its present restrictive policy, as against the extreme nationalism which would continue to deny foreign participation altogether. The Department is now examining the possibilities of approach to the Brazilian Government on this subject.

Despite progress in certain aspects of our relations, Brazil still entertains exaggerated feelings of neglect by the United States. This situation makes our relations disturbed and delicate.

Comment from the Treasury Department:

"The World Bank is the normal source for development financing . . . that Bank will remain in close contact with Brazil's efforts to qualify for further loans. We agree with Dr. Eisenhower that a solution to Brazil's fuel problem is fundamental to the country's sound development and that the inflation and other financial problems need urgently to be tackled by Brazil."

Comment from the Defense Department:

"It is believed that the expansion of Brazil's production capacity would be mutually beneficial to our two countries."

[22] Documentation relating to Vice President Cafe Filho's visit is in file 033.3211 for 1954.

[23] For documentation on these loans, see pp. 584 ff.

Comment from the Eximbank:

"Although the Eximbank is not mentioned, there is a suggestion that the United States should be in a position to assist in its desire to seek financing for economic projects. The Eximbank has extended valuable assistance to Brazil which we believe has been of great benefit to both countries. As indicated above, the Bank could do so in the future in such cases in which the interests of the United States would be served."

Minutes of the 214th Meeting of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems, Held at Washington, September 22, 1954 [1]

CONFIDENTIAL

[Here follows a list of those present (13).]

The Chairman stated that he had called the meeting for an informal discussion of lending policy of the Export–Import Bank, particularly with reference to Latin America. He thought it desirable at this time for the Council to review the recent activities of the Bank and to reach a meeting of minds on the broad lines of future policy. He indicated that there was general understanding on the area of operations of the International Bank as a lender to governments and the role of the Export–Import Bank in facilitating U.S. exports and imports.

Secretary Humphrey suggested that it might be helpful to begin the discussion by referring to the purposes of the Bank as set forth in its basic legislation [2] as follows:

(1) "aid in financing and to facilitate [3] exports and imports and the exchange of commodities between the United States or any of its Territories or insular possessions and any foreign country or the agencies or nationals thereof"

(2) "supplement and encourage and not compete with private capital"

(3) "that loans . . . shall generally be for specific purposes"

(4) "that loans . . . offer reasonable assurance of repayment."

[1] The National Advisory Council, established in 1945, had responsibility for coordinating the policies and operations of U.S representatives to the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and all other agencies of the government involved in making foreign loans or engaging in foreign financial, exchange, or monetary transactions. The Council consisted of the Secretary of the Treasury as Chairman; the Secretaries of State and Commerce; the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System; the Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Export–Import Bank; and, originally, the Administrator of the Economic Cooperation Administration (followed by the successive administrators of U.S. agencies for foreign aid).

At this meeting, Under Secretary Smith represented the Department of State; he was accompanied by Messrs. Hoover, Waugh, and Woodward.

[2] Apparent reference to the Export–Import Bank Act of 1945 (Public Law 173), approved July 31, 1945; for text, see 59 Stat. 526.

[3] The initial words quoted in these minutes actually read as follows: "aiding in the financing and facilitating of. . . ."

Mr. Bedell Smith stated that he thought that the provisions of the Act which Secretary Humphrey had read were subject to quite a wide range of interpretation and application. For example, he referred to the provision which stated that loans should generally be for specific purposes in relation to the action taken in the $300 million loan to Brazil for commercial arrearages.[4] He suggested that it was necessary to take into consideration the indirect as well as direct effects of loans on U.S. exports and imports. Secretary Humphrey agreed that the Brazilian loan was an exception but felt that the Act was clear in indicating that loans by the Bank should generally have a direct relation to U.S. exports rather than a vague indirect connection.

Governor Stassen stated that he thought the language was subject to a variety of interpretations and suggested that the Attorney General might be asked for an opinion. Secretary Humphrey commented that the Attorney General would not likely give an opinion on the Act except in relation to a specific case.

Secretary Humphrey summarized the figures on Export-Import Bank and International Bank lending in Latin America (see table [5] entitled "Eximbank and International Bank: Total Loans Outstanding to Latin America as of June 30, 1954") and then referred to the list of credits which the Export-Import Bank had established in the period from January 1, 1953 to September 20, 1954 (see table [5] entitled "Export-Import Bank of Washington—Credits Established During the Period January 1, 1953 to September 20, 1954"). He suggested that perhaps the best way to examine general policies was to look at the specific cases which had been before the Bank.

Secretary Humphrey noted that there had been approximately $¾ billion of loans by the Export-Import Bank from January 1, 1953 to September 20, 1954. Mr. Waugh pointed to the fact that of the $387 million credits established in the period January 1, 1953 to June 30, 1953, $300 million had been the loan to Brazil for commercial arrearages. He also noted that the amounts in subsequent six months' periods had declined. He also noted that of the credits of $103 million from July 1, 1954 to September 20, 1954, $60 million had been for cotton to Japan and $34 million had gone to South Africa in connection with the atomic energy program. Thus he felt that the volume of lending in Latin America had been relatively small.

Governor Stassen commented that there was a fairly widespread impression that the Bank had stopped lending in Latin America since the Brazilian loan.

[4] Reference is to Export-Import Bank credit no. 541, authorized in favor of the Banco do Brasil, S. A., on Feb. 21,1953; see Mr. Mann's memorandum, Feb. 20, 1953, p. 607.
[5] Attached to source text, but not printed.

Secretary Humphrey suggested that the Council turn to the list of those applications which the Export–Import Bank had rejected during this period (see table [6] entitled "Applications Rejected During the Period January 1, 1953 to September 20, 1954"). He noted that the Bank could only make loans where it had appropriate applications.

Governor Stassen inquired concerning the list of items on page 3 involving exporter credits to Argentina. General Edgerton indicated that these had not been considered because of foreign policy considerations. Mr. Bedell Smith said the State Department did not favor consideration of these loans because of the discriminatory policies which Argentina was pursuing at that time.

Inquiry was made concerning the financing of locomotives to Uruguay, Israel, and Belgium (page 2). General Edgerton indicated that these were credits to government-owned systems and it was felt at the time that they were more appropriate for the IBRD. In the case of Uruguay, the International Bank had undertaken commitments to assist in the financing of railway equipment.

In the financing of the chemical plant in Mexico (page 2) the Bank believed private financing should be available.

Regarding the financing of electrical equipment in Colombia (page 2), General Edgerton indicated that this was a group of miscellaneous items and the Bank believed it reasonable to participate in the financing of some individual items, but preferable not to finance the entire group.

With reference to credits for the Consolidated Railroads of Cuba (page 2), General Edgerton indicated that the railroad's credit was not good. Mr. Hoover commented that in the case of many of these foreign public utilities, the local governments fixed rates so low that operations were unprofitable. Mr. Bedell Smith said he thought that the State Department could do a great deal in this field through negotiation with foreign governments for equitable treatment of utilities and other investment. In this connection, he referred to the work which had been done to obtain Mexican action on railway rates, facilitating recent lending by the International Bank. Secretary Humphrey commented that it was important for the Export–Import Bank to work closely with State on these matters.

Reference was made to the financing of tractors and spare parts for Argentina (page 5). On this credit, General Edgerton commented that the Bank was informed that Argentina would not grant the necessary licenses for the importation of the equipment.

Attention was then directed to the financing of the Chilean State Railways (page 4). It was noted that the State Railways had an International Bank loan. General Edgerton commented that the railroad was not in a sound financial position at this time. Secretary Weeks inquired whether it would be possible to influence the Chilean Government to adjust railroad rates to reflect current price conditions. Mr. Bedell Smith indicated that he thought State might be able to do so.

Secretary Humphrey then suggested that the Council turn to the list of large projects which might be coming to the Bank's Board, submitted by General Edgerton, as a basis for appraising general policy for the future (paper attached).[7]

Secretary Weeks referred to the Senate Committee Report [8] accompanying the recent Export-Import Bank legislation and inquired as to the implications of the legislation for NAC review of Export-Import Bank policy. Mr. Overby noted that the legislation gave the NAC the same relationship to the Export-Import Bank as it had prior to Reorganization Plan No. 5. Secretary Humphrey stated that the role of the NAC was to deal with coordination of general policy rather than a review of individual loans. He thought, however, that it was useful to look at the individual cases in the paper submitted by the Bank in terms of the policy issues raised.

General Edgerton then summarized the information contained in the Bank's paper on a possible credit for the Compania Argentina de Electricidad, noting particularly the problems of power rates in Argentina and the questions associated with the expropriation of American and Foreign Power facilities.

Mr. Burgess commented that if a loan were granted to Argentina prior to a clear change of attitude toward treatment of foreign investors, other countries in Latin America would regard our action as inconsistent with the principles we had laid down. Mr. Marshall Smith [9] suggested that we should make compensation to American and Foreign Power as a condition of the loan. In this connection, Mr. Hoover read a letter [10] from Mr. Robertson of American and Foreign Power asking withholding of U.S. credits until the company received a just settlement in Argentina.

Mr. Bedell Smith stated that the problem in this case would be to work out appropriate understandings with Argentine Government as a condition for the credit. Secretary Humphrey agreed.

The Chairman then turned to the cases of possible financing for steel mills in Argentina, Brazil and Colombia.

General Edgerton stated that Argentina was placing the highest priority on the establishment of an integrated steel mill and would go ahead with foreign financing from elsewhere if they did not get it from the Export-Import Bank. In this connection both Secretary Weeks and Secretary Humphrey noted that some of the equipment desired by the Argentine would have to come from this country.

Secretary Humphrey reviewed the factors in this and similar cases which made steel production high cost and uneconomic. He referred to the fact that our steel industry felt disturbed at U.S. financing of foreign competitive industry. It was his view, however, that the industry would have to have recourse to the Congress inasmuch as he believed the law required us to finance export of U.S. equipment, assuming reasonable assurance of repayment.

Secretary Weeks said that he did not believe the law required the Bank to extend exporter credits if other considerations of policy were more important than the export of a particular piece of equipment.

Governor Stassen suggested that it might be desirable to have an interdepartmental committee study the problem of financing competitive industry abroad, taking into consideration both short and long term implications for U.S. exports and imports.

Mr. Martin [11] stated that his experience in the Export-Import Bank and since suggested a somewhat broader interpretation of the Bank's legislation than had been indicated by the Chairman. He felt there was no mandatory requirement to finance any project simply because it contributed to some immediate exports of U.S. goods. He suggested that each project had to be examined in terms of economic soundness and its longer term implications for U.S. trade relations. Regarding the specific case of Brazil, he said the initial financing of Volta Redonda had been undertaken in circumstances peculiar to the war. He did not feel we were bound to finance the expansion of the Brazilian steel industry if we believed it not sound economics to do so.

The Chairman next raised the question of financing the Toquepala copper project. He stated that in his judgment the issue posed by this case was quite clear. The Export-Import Bank should supplement, not compete with, private capital. If this project were sound, there was no doubt in his mind that additional private money could be obtained. He thought the Bank might appropriately assist in the financing of the major U.S. equipment required for the project through exporter credits, but should not provide general capital for the operation.

Mr. Bedell Smith said the State Department thought this was a sound project and was most anxious that it move forward. He agreed that it was desirable to obtain as much private financing as possible, but indicated concern at long delay or abandonment of the project if such financing were not forthcoming. Mr. Hoover commented in looking at the data on the project that it appeared to be a very profitable venture. On the basis of these estimates, he believed further private financing should be possible.

At the close of the meeting the Chairman said the conclusions of the meeting should be regarded as tentative and opportunity would be given for further exploration of these issues.[12]

[12]The implications of Export-Import Bank loans to Latin America for the general lending policy of the United States was further and inconclusively discussed at the 217th meeting of the NAC, Oct. 26, 1954; the minutes of the meeting are in NAC files, lot 60 D 137. For documentation concerning the general lending policy of the United States, see volume I.

103 XMB/10-2854

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, October 28, 1954.

Subject: Policies With Respect to the Export-Import Bank.

Problem:

Areas of difference between the Treasury Department and the State Department with respect to the policies and operations of the Export-Import Bank.

Background:

While the operations of the Export-Import Bank have not formed a major part of our overseas financial assistance in the last five or six years, the transactions of the Bank have been significant in our relations with Latin America and with certain other countries. After the extension of the $300 million loan to Brazil in early 1953, Reorganization Plan No. 5 was submitted to Congress and came into effect in early August. The principal effect of this Plan was to abolish the Board of Directors of the Bank and thereby remove the Secretary of State from his ex officio position as Director. In addition, it removed the Bank's principal officer from membership in the NAC.

Senator Capehart, in September, commenced hearings upon the operations and organization of the Bank to determine what might be done to reactivate this Organization. At the opening session of Senator Capehart's Committee on this subject, Secretary Humphrey stated that "The Export-Import Bank implies the aid to exports and imports and to current trade by loans of much more rapid turnover and shorter duration." He further stated, "However, as Secretary of the Treasury I do want to make clear to everyone that the Government must question both its right and its financial ability to continue to use taxpayers' money to finance investments abroad on a large scale in the development of competitive enterprise." (Tab A)[2]

Following extensive investigations and hearings the Senate Banking and Currency Committee reported as follows:

"Your committee finds no legislative limitation upon the loan authority of the Export–Import Bank that would exclude it properly from making long-term, medium-term, or development loans.

"Any distinction between long-term and short-term credits or between exporter credits, as such, and loans to facilitate the purchase by United States private investors abroad of capital goods and equipment in the United States is a highly artificial one, and quite undesirable from the standpoint of the interests of our country. The bank should sympathetically consider kinds and types of proper loan applications irrespective of term which would aid in facilitating the exports of the United States, maintain our industrial potential, and provide continuing employment in our country."

The House Banking and Currency Committee expressed similar views. The Bill reorganizing the Bank was passed in August 1954. On January 22, the NAC took action with respect to the Export–Import Bank lending policy and this action has been widely interpreted as restricting the operations and field of activity of the Export–Import Bank. (Tab B)

Bank Areas of Difference

1. The Bank as an Instrument of Foreign Policy

The Department has long regarded the Bank as an instrument of foreign policy and in this regard was supported by the Randall Commisson Report which reads as follows:

"The Export–Import Bank is essentially an instrument of United States foreign policy. The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, on the other hand, promotes the interests of the United States broadly in the field of foreign economic development. The record does not indicate that there has been harmful competition or duplication in the operations of the two banks."

The removal of the State Department from the Board of the Bank eliminated the statutory expression of this point of view. The Treasury was in full accord with this reorganization of the Bank. The Bank is the only permanent financial organization operating in the foreign field. The Department has and must continue to place a great emphasis on the effective operation of the Bank.

[2] No tabs were found with the source text.

2. Types of Loans.

The attitude of the Treasury towards the types of loans that the Export–Import Bank should properly make is mentioned above. In considerable measure this view was reiterated at a recent NAC meeting upon the subject. (Tab C)

The Department, both from the point of view of the conduct of foreign relations and foreign economic policy, holds the view that the Bank should not be so limited in its lending policy. The Bank's lending policies should be more than the simple promotion of U.S. exports and should look towards participating in a healthy development of the economies of friendly countries, principally in Latin America. This objective cannot be served by severe limitations on the types of loans to be made and upon the terms of such loans.

3. Legal Authority

There is attached a copy of the memorandum by the Legal Adviser on this point. It demonstrates, and in this it is supported by the Bank's own officials as well as by legislative history, that this point of view substantially contradicts that expressed by Secretary Humphrey at the recent NAC meeting. (Tab D)

4. Volume of Lending

No detailed discussions have taken place between the Department and the Treasury concerning the volume of prospective lending operations by the Bank. However, it is clear that unless a substantial intensification takes place repayment to the Bank will exceed disbursements. Indeed, the Bank's officials have estimated that the Export–Import Bank can lend over $5 billion in the next ten years with no drain on the Treasury cash budget. (Tab E)

5. Loans vs Aid

Unless the Bank's lending operations are substantially accelerated we will be under real and increasing pressure to seek appropriated funds to assist economic development in Latin America. A more vigorous Export–Import Bank policy will do much to avoid this eventuality and at the same time will give the U.S. a reasonable prospect of repayment with interest of such loans.

Clarification of the foregoing points would do much to give substance to the policy decisions with respect to Latin America taken by the NSC. (Tab F) While this policy envisages increased activity for the Bank, it does not deal with some of the areas of misunderstanding which have so sharply reduced the Bank's activity in Latin America.

MSA–FOA Director's files, FRC 56 A 632, "Latin America–1954"

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, November 15, 1954.

Subject: Need for a Clear Understanding Between FOA and State on Program Development in Latin America.

Differences between FOA and State on program development in the fields of industry, labor and private investment were highlighted in the views expressed at the Board Meeting [1] of the Institute of Inter-American Affairs on Wednesday, November 10.

While this memorandum is submitted in specific response to your directive (at the November 3 meeting [1] on FOA World-Wide Financial Status) that I prepare a brief memorandum on FOA and State differences concerning the development of the Technical Cooperation Program in Latin America, it may also serve as a basis for your discussion with Dr. FitzGerald this afternoon.[2]

FOA's Position on Program Development

It is my understanding that FOA believes that in extending technical assistance to host countries we should be free to discuss with them their overall problems of economic development, to assist them in identifying weaknesses and sources of potential strength in their economy, and to join with them in developing the plans and means through which to eliminate such weaknesses and to realize such potential strengths. One of these means is, of course, the provision of technical assistance through the FOA program.

As a natural outgrowth of the above, FOA believes that USOM staffs should be provided with properly qualified specialists to make such discussions meaningful, to identify problems correctly and to develop plans realistically. Examples of such specialized personnel include advisors in the fields of general resources management, labor, industry, private investment, finance and economic development. In many instances, advisory assistance in these fields should be viewed as being of a program development and support nature as distinguished from technicians assigned to implement specific programs. The use of such program development and support personnel is necessary to determine the advisability of carrying out a program in the particular field involved, and where it appears advisable to carry out a program in the particular field, such advisory assistance is essential to the proper determination of the nature, size and direction of such a program.

Our Experience with State on Program Development

Understanding and cooperation between FOA and State in the development of programs in the so called traditional fields of activity in Latin America—agriculture, health and sanitation, and education—continues to be excellent. However, in certain of the so called new fields of activity, as measured by their recency of introduction into our program in Latin America, experience has shown that State disagrees with several aspects of the FOA position on program development. For example, State does not agree that FOA should assign a labor advisor or labor economist to any USOM staff. Furthermore, OLA understands that State policy will not permit FOA to join with Latin American countries in identifying their economic problems or the planning for their solution if such problems are outside the scope of current FOA operations, except in such cases where the host country makes an official request for such discussion or planning and obtains acceptance from the United States. In net effect, this policy prevents assignment to USOMs of certain types of specialists who are needed: (1) to analyze certain of the host country's basic economic problems and potentials and advise the USOM Director in planning, guiding and evaluating the FOA program; and (2) to advise the host country, when it so desires, on that country's economic development requirements.

Specific illustration of State's viewpoint concerning the assignment of personnel in the fields of industry, labor and private investment are shown in draft comments which were submitted informally by State concerning the FY–1955 Program Plan for Technical Cooperation in Latin America. These comments were prepared for the Board Meeting last Wednesday and pertinent extracts applying to the fields of industry, labor and private investment are attached.[3]

As you will note from the attached comments, State appears vigorously opposed to the utilization of any program development or support personnel such as labor advisors or labor economists, and seems strongly opposed to the use of trade and investment types of personnel. In the case of industry, the lack of an official request by the host government for a specialist in this field is emphasized. The position is taken that an official request is a necessary precondition to the assignment of any personnel in the industry field.

In regard to this requirement for an "official request from the host government", I might state that our programs in the so called traditional fields of activity did not develop purely on the basis of official host country requests but were often preceded by our sending a specialist in that field to the host country to work with officials of the host country government. This later resulted in the development of a realistic program and an official request for assistance. An excellent case in point is the agriculture program in Colombia in which case we had an agriculture specialist in our Mission for some six months preceding an official request for assistance in that field. Frankly, I strongly doubt that we would have a technical cooperation program in Latin America of even its presently limited diversity had we awaited official requests by host country governments before sending program development personnel to the field.

In general State considers that the assignment of specialists in the so called newer fields of activity is a matter of "whetting the host country's appetite" and that such specialists may be categorized as "salesmen".

Recommendations

It is recommended that a high level agreement be reached between FOA and the Department of State:

(a) To clarify the program development responsibilities of FOA; and
(b) To resolve the present conflict of views concerning the inclusion in our Technical Cooperation Program in Latin America of activities in the fields other than those currently forming the major components of our program there.

It is further recommended that FOA and State jointly inform all officials concerned in Washington and the field of the understandings reached.[4] A clear and definite statement will assist in avoiding future misunderstandings.

[4] Department of State files for 1954 contain no record of an understanding between the Department of State and FOA along the lines recommended by Mr. Hardesty.

Memorandum by the Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Sparks) to the Deputy Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs (Murphy)

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, November 30, 1954.

Subject: Technical Cooperation and Development Assistance Programs in Latin America.

We have just been told informally that, after considering your letter to him of November 24 stating that the Department of State believes the Technical Cooperation Program Plan for Latin America should be implemented at an early date except for those activities to which the Department has objected,[1] Mr. Stassen has reiterated his instructions to his staff that the Program shall continue to be held up until after Mr.

Stassen meets with Secretary Dulles, which he hopes to do on December 1. In your conversation with Mr. Stassen, it is recommended that you discuss with him both the Technical Cooperation and the Development Assistance Programs in Latin America along the following lines:

1. It is our understanding that except for funds required to maintain the FOA personnel who are already in Latin America and who are continuing to work on activities for which financing is still available from funds contributed in previous years, the $26 million appropriated and allocated for the Technical Cooperation Program for FY 1955 has not been released for obligation even though almost five months of the fiscal year have passed. Although the activities in operation at the end of FY 1954 (which constitute the major portion of the FY 1955 Program) are still in operation, most of these are operating at reduced levels and many are actually running out of funds. In addition, activities authorized for the first time in FY 1955 Program are not being initiated. For example: (a) the expanded program for Guatemala (including technical cooperation and development assistance), which was developed because of urgent political considerations, is not going forward. The Director of the USOM to Guatemala and Guatemalan officials are in Washington to press for action on this program, in particular the highway program; (b) hundreds of trainees scheduled to be brought to the United States under the FY 1955 Program are not being processed. (c) The proposed contract with the Inter-American Institute of Agricultural Sciences of the OAS (Turrialba) under which the Institute would furnish assistance in cacao and coffee production, has not been signed. (d) Proposed contracts with various United States educational institutions for carrying out segments of the Technical Cooperation Program are not being executed.

2. With regard to Development Assistance: (a) it is our understanding that FOA is withholding action to make available to Bolivia promptly the $16 million in grant aid as requested in your letter of November 23 to Mr. Stassen; and (b) the $3.7 million for Guatemala is being held up as mentioned above.

3. Failure to implement the basic Technical Cooperation Program and the Development Assistance grants in Guatemala and Bolivia would give grounds to the Latin American countries to consider the United States in default of commitments made to them. This would cause serious damage to the position of the United States in Latin America.

After you make the foregoing statements, Mr. Stassen may counter that the Department of State has caused the delay in implementing the programs and that he still wishes to resolve with Secretary Dulles the points at issue between FOA and the Department. If so, I recommend that you make the following points:

1. The activities to which the Department has objected represent a relatively small portion of the total FY 1955 Plan. (These fall principally in the Industry, Investment and Labor fields, where the views of ARA continue to be those set forth in Mr. Holland's memorandum of November 13 to the Secretary (Tab A).[2])

2. The Department continues to be prepared to give consideration to the possible implementation of certain of the activities in question. For instance, our objection in some instances would be removed if the other Government makes a request for the technical assistance which would be rendered. In this connection it is important that you read the memorandum to the Secretary of November 13, 1954 (Tab A).

Subject: United States Anti-Trust Suit Against United Fruit Company

Discussion:

An anti-trust civil suit was commenced by the Attorney General against the United Fruit Company by filing a complaint in the United States District Court at New Orleans, Louisiana on July 2, 1954. The suit alleges monopolistic practices by UFCO and, more broadly, that the defendant constitutes a monopoly of the banana industry; the relief prayed for included, among many other things, divestiture of foreign holdings making up the monopoly and termination of exclusive contracts for purchase of bananas from independent growers. On November 9, Assistant Attorney General Barnes notified the United Fruit Company that such divestiture is essential to settlement and therefore rejected the defendant's draft of a consent decree. It is understood that the suit has been under study since 1937, and the complaint in fact refers to acts committed as long as 25 years ago; filing of the suit was twice withheld since 1946, principally on representations of the Department of State. State interposed no objection when the Attorney General indicated his intention to file suit in June 1954.

United Fruit Company has informed the Department that it cannot and will not consent to divestiture of its foreign holdings, claiming them essential to the integrated successful operations of the banana business. Mr. T. J. Coolidge, Chairman of the Board of Directors, outlined the company's position generally to Deputy Under Secretary Murphy on November 18, 1954 (Tab A). More complete background is given in my memorandum to Mr. Murphy of November 18 (Tab B).[2]

UFCO has continuously sought the assistance of the Department of State, originally to prevent filing the suit and later to exert influence toward its settlement. Most recently the company has asserted that it cannot undertake large expenditures to improve and expand its properties in Guatemala and Honduras as long as title to these properties remains under threat of the anti-trust action. We of course indicated that renewed investments by UFCO are most desirable in Guatemala and Honduras as a very substantial contribution to their economies.

ARA believes that continuous difficulties will probably result from this kind of suit, even if successful, inasmuch as the power to enforce an anti-trust decree is largely limited to our jurisdiction, and inasmuch as foreign jurisdictions may not be willing to recognize any such decree. The National Security Council is awaiting the Attorney General's recommendations, probably in January 1955, on restudy of the anti-trust laws relating to foreign operations by Americans. The Department has not formulated any definite position on the United Fruit anti-trust action. ARA believes that such position should be formulated as recommended below:

Recommendation:

(1) That the Department urge on the Attorney General the desirability of settlement rather than trial, which would have tangible repercussions on this company's business and possibly other American investments in Latin America; and (2) that the Attorney General be asked to reconsider his insistence on divestiture in settlement.[3]

THE TENTH INTER-AMERICAN CONFERENCE, HELD AT CARACAS, VENEZUELA, MARCH 1–28, 1954 [1]

Memorandum by the United States Representative on the Council of the Organization of American States (Dreier) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)

[Subject:] Report on Outlook for Caracas Conference

As of the first week of January, I should like to submit the following report taking stock of where we stand with reference to the Caracas Conference, as I see it.

Work at the technical level in preparing position papers [2] on the various agenda [3] items is proceeding pretty much on schedule. I have every reason to believe that the large majority of position papers, based upon current policy, will be ready for consideration by the higher offices of the Department on or about January 15. We aim to have them all approved in final form by February 1, except for a few which are necessarily delayed because of external circumstances.

Arrangements for the Delegation [4] are going forward. Budget limitations will inevitably force us to have a delegation somewhat smaller than we would like for the manifold list of subjects to be discussed. Arrangements for housing and offices of the delegation are also under way. Housing at the new hotel should be pleasant and convenient.

[4] For a complete list of the delegations to the Tenth Inter-American Conference, see USDel Report, pp. 191–206.

Office space may be expected to be cramped due to physical limitations at the Conference site, as well as budgetary restrictions.

From the standpoint of intra-Latin American relations, prospects for the Conference seem somewhat brighter with the recent announcement of the release of a substantial number of political prisoners in Venezuela. There now appears to be no reasonable grounds for doubting that all the 21 republics will be represented at the Conference, although the position of Guatemala remains uncertain. On the other hand, the condition of the dispute between Colombia and Peru over the asylum of Haya de la Torre [5] remains touch and go. If the Peruvian Government remains intransigent in its position, it is very likely that the Conference will be disrupted by the discussion of this case and the possible walkout of either Colombia or Peru. Moreover, some Latin Americans, notably the Venezuelan Government, as reported recently by Ambassador Warren, feel that rifts between Latin American Governments, such as that between dictatorships and advocates of democracy, will exert a divisive influence, obstructing positive achievement at the Conference.

This Government, as of this date, remains without any new policy in the major field of Latin American interest, namely, economic affairs. The major interest of the Latin Americans lies in seeking assurances from us on prices of raw materials and terms of trade, access to U.S. markets, and capital for economic development. The only subject on which any positive proposal by the U.S. is now feasible is that of public lending. A proposal on this subject is being sent to the Secretary. It has not yet been possible to clarify the administration's program based upon the report [6] of Dr. Milton Eisenhower. (Recommendations on this are due January 15.) The U.S. will, therefore, be in an essentially defensive position in regard to the subject on which the success or failure of this Conference depends. At the same time, the U.S. is seeking one or more anti-Communist resolutions which are not of major interest to many of the Latin American countries. The clarification of our positive economic program for this Conference therefore remains the largest and most important business to be accomplished if this Conference is not in fact to mark a considerable decline in the vitality of our inter-American relations.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 13, 1954.

Subject: Program for the Tenth Inter-American Conference

Discussion:

Prospects for constructive results at the Tenth Inter-American Conference at Caracas are not good. It is inevitable that the Latin American countries will principally seek commitments from the United States on such matters as tariff policies and prices for their exports, which this Government will not be in a position to give. Moreover, various intra-Latin American tensions, such as those between Colombia and Peru, and Venezuela and Costa Rica, will contribute a divisive influence. In an effort to develop the best possible position for the United States in the circumstances, I have drawn up the following proposals:

1. The President should be asked to send a special message to Congress on Latin America at about February 15, recommending a program of cooperation based largely on Dr. Milton Eisenhower's report. The suggested program is summarized in Tab A.[2] It involves total appropriations of about eighty million dollars, including all present programs, and would require only about seventeen million dollars in excess of amounts already included in the 1955 budget requests. This proposed message should do much to create a favorable background for our delegation at Caracas.

2. Point 1 in the proposed program is a statement that the U.S. will insure that a gross level of public lending (through IBRD and the Export-Import Bank) of $1 billion will be available over the next five years for sound economic projects within the capacity of the Latin American countries to finance. This proposal would be the principal measure of cooperation toward economic development which the U.S. would put forward at the Conference. It would form the core of a three-point program which is discussed in Tab B.[3]

Recommendations:

1. That the proposed program referred to in Point 1 above be recommended to the President as soon as it is possible to draw it up in final form, taking into account the reports expected from other Departments on January 15 regarding Dr. Eisenhower's recommendations.

[1] Addressed also to the Under Secretary.

[2] Not printed; a slightly different version of the suggested program is printed as an annex to Mr. Cabot's memorandum of Feb. 12, 1954, p. 293.

[3] Not printed.

2. That the policy described in paragraph no. 2 above be proposed and supported in the National Advisory Council as the main feature of our position on economic questions at Caracas.[4]

[4] This memorandum was returned to Mr. Cabot under cover of a memorandum by Roderic L. O'Connor, dated Jan. 18, 1954, which reads in part as follows: "The Secretary felt that he did not have time to get into these matters on the eve of his departure for Berlin and requested that henceforward questions in connection with this Conference be handled by General Smith, unless of course the General feels that it is desirable for the Secretary to be personally consulted." CA-3670. In transmitting a copy of the agenda for the Tenth Inter-American Conference to the Embassy (CA-2692, dated November 17, 1953),[1] the Department indicated that it proposed to provide the Embassy with the U.S. position on the various items of the agenda as they were developed. There follows a brief résumé of the positions on the items included in Chapter I. Juridical-Political Matters of the Agenda. Similar résumés covering the remaining four chapters will be transmitted within a few days. The Embassy is authorized to use this material in its discretion in discussing Tenth Conference matters with government officials. The portions in parentheses are intended for the information of the Embassy only. The Department may in the near future wish to instruct consultation with other governments on specific projects or issues arising under various topics, in which case the Embassy will be provided with a more comprehensive statement thereon. The Embassy is requested to transmit immediately to the Department any information gathered in the course of discussions with government officials indicating the current government thinking on any of the topics on the agenda.

[1] Not printed. (362/1-1753)

I. JURIDICAL-POLITICAL MATTERS

(1) Peaceful Relations

a. Possibility of Revising the American Treaty of Pacific Settlement (Pact of Bogotá)[2]

The Department is now studying the question of whether the possibilities of achieving satisfactory revision of this treaty, in the light of the numerous reservations and its having been ratified by only 8 countries, are such as to warrant what amounts to renegotiation of the Treaty at the Conference. Should it be determined that the U.S. can usefully participate in such reconsideration, it is certain that our principal objectives would be to eliminate the features to which our reservations were principally addressed: i.e., the compulsory requirement in certain of its provisions and the relinquishment of diplomatic protection of nationals in one of its articles. In addition, we would probably favor inclusion in the Treaty of reference to the Inter-American Peace Committee as an appropriate instrument for carrying out the procedures of "Good Offices" and "Mediation".

b. Inter-American Peace Committee

The U.S. strongly supports the IAPC, of which it is a member and has taken an active part in the preparation by the Committee of a proposal that the Conference approve the revision of its organization and procedures. The resolution drafted by the Committee would preserve the practical advantages, such as the Committee's small size and the informality of its procedures, while at the same time opening the door to the possibility of changes in membership which would permit countries other than the present five[3] to become members. It is also our view that the Conference should not approve any effort to reopen cases reported on by the Committee which have been settled in a manner satisfactory to the parties. (In view of the submission by Colombia of its dispute with Peru stemming from the asylum of Haya de la Torre, and Peru's apparent unwillingness at this date to accept the Committee's good offices in this case, it is possible that Colombia will seek to use this agenda item to place the Haya case before the Conference. The position of the U.S. on such a matter will depend upon developments in this case between now and the time the Conference opens.)

For documentation concerning the unwillingness of the United States to ratify the treaty, see Foreign Relations, 1949, vol. II, pp. 419 ff.

[3] Argentina, Brazil, Cuba, Mexico, and the United States.

c. Inter-American Court of Justice.

The U.S. opposed inclusion of this item on the agenda and does not expect to participate in the drafting of a statute for such a court, the principal reason being that its creation would involve unnecessary and unwarranted duplication of the International Court of Justice, which is an entirely adequate body for the judicial settlement of intergovernmental legal questions and to the statute of which all the American Republics are parties. (Since the proposal has considerable sentimental appeal to a number of Latin American States, especially El Salvador,[4] it will be necessary to use considerable discretion in any discussion of this matter prior to the Conference, although there should be no encouragement to any Latin American government to believe that the U.S. position will change, or that this Government would become a party to such a court even if it is established by the votes of others.)

d. Other Pertinent Instruments Relating to Pacific Settlement

The inclusion of this item resulted from an Uruguayan initiative which was not supported by any clear-cut specification of what, if any, proposal might be contemplated by the Uruguayan Government. No specific projects have been submitted to date. If the question should be raised of the possibilities for action under this item on the agenda, it would be desirable to find out what, if any, specific proposal any government may have in mind.

(2) Colonies and Occupied Territories in America and Report[5] of the American Committee on Dependent Territories

This item resulted from proposals by Argentina and Guatemala, and was approved in its present form by a considerable majority, with the U.S. abstaining as it did on Bogotá Resolution XXXIII[6] and on inter-American action on the "colonial" issue since the Ninth Conference. The principal reasons for our continued abstention on this issue are: (a) that the status of the dependent territories is a subject which involves the interests of both American and non-American states and would therefore more properly fall within the competence of the UN, in which all the interested States are represented; and (b) that the so-called "occupied" territories aspect of the item involves disputes which should either be taken up on a bilateral basis or submitted to procedures for peaceful settlement available to all of the parties. (In the absence of instructions to the contrary, any discussion of this matter in the period before the Conference should be limited to the above two points with a further indication that we are carefully considering all aspects and implications of the proposed item.)

(3) Regimen of Political Asylees, Exiles and Refugees

It is not expected that we will take part in any detailed consideration of either of the draft conventions [7] proposed under this item, since that on so-called "Territorial Asylum" treats of a subject which we consider is adequately covered by the Habana Convention of 1928 on Duties and Rights of States in the Event of Civil Strife [8] and the Protocol [9] to be considered under item (4), while that on "Diplomatic Asylum" involves a doctrine which we do not recognize as part of international law and do not practice except in a very limited sense.

(4) Protocol to the Convention on Duties and Rights of States in the Event of Civil Strife

The U.S. has participated in the lengthy and detailed preparation of this draft protocol, intended to clarify and strengthen the principal inter-American treaty defining obligations to prevent the preparation of international revolutionary activities. It is expected that we shall support a draft along the lines of that presented, except for an article proscribing "systematic and hostile" radio propaganda which appears to us to involve a considerable risk of endangering basic principles of freedom of information. (It is believed that the most useful result of consultation on this item will be to call the respective governments' attention to this important project and to determine what problems the draft raises for them.)

(5) Intervention of International Communism in the American Republics

This item was proposed by the U.S. for the agenda on the basis of the points specified in the letter of Oct. 6, 1953 [10] of the U.S. Representative [11] on the COAS. (See 8th Report [12] of Tenth Conference Preparatory Committee, Annex 4, page 26.) Specific projects to be introduced are still under consideration. (Pending receipt of further instructions, it is believed that discussions with Foreign Offices should be confined to: (1) indicating that we attach great importance to steps which will emphasize the danger to all independent governments arising from the intervention of the international communist conspiracy in their affairs and the need for effective steps to counteract this intervention; and (2) obtaining discreetly information regarding the general viewpoints of the respective governments as to what the Conference might accomplish under this item.)

CA-3903. Reference is made to the Department's circular instruction No. 3670 dated January 15, 1954,[1] giving a brief résumé of the U.S. position on the items included under Chapter I. Juridicial-Political Matters of the agenda for the Tenth Inter-American Conference. There follows a similar résumé with respect to the items under Chapter III. Social Matters, IV. Cultural Matters and V. Organization Matters of the agenda. The Embassy is authorized to use this information subject to the same stipulations set forth in the opening paragraph of the instruction under reference.

III. SOCIAL MATTERS

12. Social Aspects of Economic Development.

The U.S. proposes to stress the importance of governments giving careful attention to the direct relation to the success of economic development of social factors such as health, education, labor standards, and housing. It is also planned to propose that the OAS and its specialized agencies give appropriate emphasis to social aspects of economic development in relation to their work programs and the IA-ECOSOC consider whether additional measures need to be taken to assist governments in this regard.

13. Human Rights: Measures for Promoting Human Rights Without Impairing National Sovereignty and the Principle of Non-Intervention.

The Department has received no indication from Mexico, which proposed the item, or any other of the principal advocates of action in this field, such as Uruguay, regarding any specific projects which they plan to submit. We are prepared to support practical, constructive proposals for resolutions or declarations which will contribute to the desired objectives of promoting the dissemination of information on, or the observance of, human rights, but are opposed to the preparation and approval of a convention on the subject or a statute of an Inter-American Court of Human Rights. (FYI, we do not plan to take the initiative with any proposals, principally because we do not want to be in the vanguard of any movement which may precipitate a sharp cleavage at the conference between governments having varying degrees of political control. The Department would be especially interested in having any information which the Embassy is able to obtain as to the attitudes of other governments on what might be done at the Conference under this item and any specific proposals which it may be planning to make. Any inquiries made should avoid, however, stimulating action on this item.)

14. Development of the Cooperative Movement in America.

It is our view that since cooperatives provide one of the practical means through which both social and economic conditions in the Americas may be improved, governments and the OAS should consider measures for assisting in their further development. On the basis of U.S. knowledge and experience, we plan to present suggestions as to steps which governments can appropriately take in this field.

15. Problems of Housing of Social Interest.

The U.S. will in general support the recommendation in the Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Low Cost Housing [2] relating to domestic measures designed to improve housing conditions. With regard to the financing of housing, we believe that this is largely a domestic problem involving local labor and materials. The establishment of an Inter-American Bank for Housing would not afford, in our opinion, a practical solution to the problem. (FYI, a further reason for opposing the idea of an Inter-American Bank is that it would tend to divert attention from more realistic solutions and shift to the U.S. the task of providing financial support.)

16. Causes and Effects of the Rural Exodus.

Our current thinking is to propose that the country studies already initiated on this subject by the PAU be continued and that governments, as well as the PAU and specialized organizations of the OAS, concentrate efforts on measures which will contribute to raising standards of living, particularly in rural areas.

---

[2] The referenced report was published by the Pan American Union under the title Problems of Housing of Social Interest (Washington, 1954).

17. Social Welfare Work.

It is believed that substantial progress has been made in this field since the Bogota Conference and that discussion at the Tenth Conference should center upon new trends and needs, particularly the need for better trained personnel for social welfare planning and administration for social work in rural areas. We will be prepared to discuss at the Conference effective measure which governments can take to meet these needs.

IV. CULTURAL MATTERS

18. Cultural Cooperation.

We are reviewing the broad field encompassed by this general topic to determine what aspects of the current program we believe should be emphasized and whether there are new activities we may wish to recommend to the governments or to the appropriate organs of the OAS. In all likelihood we will have some proposals of our own to present, and will, of course, give careful consideration to such as are presented by other delegations.

19. Revision of the Convention for the Promotion of Inter-American Cultural Relations.[3]

Having originally sponsored the Convention, the U.S. maintains a keen interest in its successful operation. Experience has demonstrated that the intricate machinery which it establishes for the selection and support of grantees has obstructed full implementation of the Convention rather than insured its effectiveness as intended. From our standpoint, revision of the Convention should be confined to a simplification of these cumbersome administrative procedures, such details to be left to the participants to work out among themselves. This would have the practical effect of permitting an expansion of current activities within the limits of the established program. We are not prepared, however, to extend the scope or scale of the program for which the Convention provides, as proposed by the Pan American Union in its working paper [4] on this item.[5] 20*a*. Cultural Charter of America.

In the preparation of the agenda the U.S. took the position that it would be advisable not to include this item since it was not likely that the Committee for Cultural Action (CCA) would have completed its work on the Charter in time for the Caracas Conference and, in any event, it was felt that a project as comprehensive as the one contemplated should first receive full consideration in the Inter-American Cultural Council. The CCA has not prepared a draft Charter and we hope that the Conference will not attempt to formulate the instrument, but entrust the task to the Cultural Council. With respect to the form in which the project should be cast, the U.S. is strongly opposed to the treaty approach.

20*b. Inter-American Congress of Ministers and Directors of Education . . .*[6]

(The U.S. Position on this item remains to be determined.)

21. Affirmation of the Historical Interest in the Island of San Salvador.

The U.S. is prepared to take part in an appropriate act reaffirming the interest of the American Republics in the Island of San Salvador which is now generally recognized as the point of Columbus' first landing in the New World, provided that such a step meets with the support of the majority of the other governments, and that provision is made for obtaining prior agreement of Great Britain, which exercises jurisdiction over the island, and that whatever is decided on can be financed within the limits of the funds available to the Pan American Union.

V. Organizational and Functional Matters

22. Inter-American Juridical Committee. (a) Functioning:

A committee of the Council of the OAS has completed a study of the functioning of the Juridical Committee. We consider the suggestions of this committee and the recommendation of the Inter-American Council of Jurists (No. X, Second meeting)[7] that the Committee establish a fixed period of continuous work (it is now theoretically in continuous session) to be the most effective measure which might be taken in present circumstances to achieve much needed improvement in the Committee's functioning. The length of the fixed period, in our opinion, should not exceed 2½ months a year.

(b) Selection of the Countries to be Members Thereof:

The U.S. position as to which countries it will support for election to the Committee has not been determined, but we will give careful consideration to the candidacies of any countries. (FYI, of special interest is whether the present Latin American members—Argentina, Brazil, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Mexico, Peru, Venezuela—wish to continue or discontinue this membership. We have been informed of the desire of the Dominican Republic to be chosen for membership.)

23. Committee for Cultural Action:

(a) Functioning.

Our tentative views are that the Committee could function more effectively if: (1) it were brought into closer working relations with the organs of the OAS working in the cultural field, particularly the Department of Cultural Affairs of the Pan American Union, (2) it were to convene for a fixed period during the course of each year, as has been recommended for the Inter-American Juridical Committee.

(b) Selection of Countries to be Members Thereof.

As in the case of the slate for the Juridical Committee, the Department has not yet arrived at any firm decision as to which countries we shall support for membership on the Committee. (FYI, in the original selection of members to the Committee by the Council of the OAS (1951) the criterion was followed that the four languages should be represented. This policy will probably continue to be observed, in which case the seats held by Mexico and Uruguay would be the only ones open to change. In view of this fact, we do not want to stimulate candidacies but leave this matter up to the Spanish-speaking countries.)

24. Report [8] Submitted by the Pan American Union, etc.

This report has not as yet been completed. It should furnish a basis for appraising the work of the OAS since the preceding Conference and a basis for giving general guidance for the future. (FYI, should any special problems arise in connection therewith, the Embassy will be informed.)

25. Inter-American Commission of Women.

Under this item we expect four separate reports to be presented: (1) a general summary of Commission activities and recommendations since 1948,[9] (2) an analysis of laws affecting women's civil and political rights,[10] (3) a report on the economic status of working women,[11] pursuant to Resolution XXIII [12] of the Ninth Conference in Bogota, and (4) proposals from the IACW for amendments to its Organic Statutes.[13]

[13] For text of the Organic Statute of the Inter-American Commission of Women, approved as Resolution XXI by the Ninth International Conference of American States, see ibid., p. 243.

On (1) and (2), we expect to support continued work by the IACW along present lines to remove discriminations against women and encourage equal opportunities, taking note of recent progress on equal suffrage, women in public office, professional opportunities, and other matters. We understand that the report to be presented under (3) is a technical study which was completed so recently that the Commission has not had time to review the final text. We believe, therefore, that substantive discussion of the report would be premature, and Conference action should be limited to noting it and referring it back to the Commission for appropriate recommendations, with the understanding that it will first be circulated to governments and interested international agencies, including the ILO, for comment. On (4) we are prepared to support minor amendments which will aid in efficient functioning of the Commission provided these do not alter its basic organization and objectives, and may offer some additional suggestions along this line. We also will be prepared to favor referral of the problem back to the Commission itself, recognizing that it would be appropriate for the Commission, as an inter-American Specialized Organization, to modify its statutes.

26. Inter-American Specialized Conferences . . . : [14] Standards With Reference Thereto: [15]

The "Standards" to be considered by the Conference were adopted by the Council of the OAS in 1949 to guide it in carrying out its responsibilities, under Articles 93 and 94 of the Charter, with regard to the planning and coordination of inter-American technical meetings. The "Standards" have been submitted to the Tenth Conference so that they may be adopted for the OAS as a whole. In the belief that inter-American cooperation through conferences may be made both more effective and, in some cases, more economical, the United States has strongly supported the Council's efforts to carry out these responsibilities and considers the present "Standards" generally satisfactory. The U.S. may propose certain modifications for greater clarity and to insure that the provisions of the Charter will actually be applied in each case before it is decided that a forthcoming meeting is to be a "Specialized Conference" as defined in the Charter.

27. Administrative and Fiscal Policy of the OAS.

In introducing this topic, Brazil indicated that the Conference might consider: (1) new basis for financing; (2) possibilities of payment of quotas in national currencies; and (3) decentralization of certain administrative services of the PAU. It has, however, submitted no specific proposals. As the host government and largest contributor to the PAU budget (66%) the U.S. has a vital interest in this subject. As a general policy in these matters and without wishing to prejudge what the Brazilians propose, the U.S. believes that fiscal and administrative issues can be more adequately dealt with by the Council of the OAS. The Council, whose competence under the Charter encompasses such matters, is in a position to devote the time and effort which these highly technical and complex issues require. (FYI, we had serious misgivings regarding inclusion of this item on the agenda and abstained in the vote. It is feared that without adequate preparation the Conference may take hasty, ill-advised action which would seriously undermine the functioning of the OAS, particularly with respect to proposals for decentralizing the Pan American Union in various other American republics, and as a corollary, permitting payment of quotas in national currencies, which would have a special appeal to the Latin Americans. In an effort to minimize this risk, the U.S. succeeded in getting the Council of the OAS to request the Secretary General to prepare a special study for presentation to the Tenth Conference covering these two points. Despite repeated inquiries, the Brazilians have given us no indication as to what they intend to propose. The Embassy, is, therefore, requested to be particularly alert for any information regarding any proposals to be made under this subject.)

28. Designation of the Place of the Eleventh Inter-American Conference.[16]

Before arriving at any decision the U.S. would like to know the wishes of the other American republics with respect to this matter. Two countries have expressed an interest in the hostship, and we have indicated that we would be glad to take their request into consideration in determining our position. (FYI, in the selection of sites of inter-American meetings the U.S. generally follows the lead of the majority of the other American republics. The two countries which have indicated their interest in sponsoring the Eleventh Conference are the Dominican Republic and Ecuador. There has been some indication that Costa Rica might also have an interest. Since with the Caracas Conference, inter-American conferences will have been held in all the major capitals, the selection of the site for the Eleventh Conference may turn on whether to begin a second round with the major capitals or move on to the smaller ones, few, if any, of which have adequate facilities for a conference of this size.)

OAS files, lot 60 D 665, "Military matters—Agenda"

Memorandum by the United States Representative to the Council of the Organization of American States (Dreier) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 28, 1954.

The Defense Department, speaking through General Webster, who is designated their spokesman for Tenth Inter-American Conference matters, has repeatedly taken the position that it wishes to have no military subjects discussed at the Tenth Inter-American Conference.

After Amb. Zuleta had recommended to us that some resolution be adopted at the Conference, confirming and possibly improving upon the resolutions on military cooperation approved at the Fourth Meeting of Foreign Ministers in 1951,[1] we went back to the Defense Department and called to their attention the arguments advanced by Amb. Zuleta. We informed the Defense Department that we shared in some measure the feeling of Amb. Zuleta that a failure by the Conference to adopt any resolution supporting the previous ones on military policy would be interpreted by the Latin Americans as reflecting a drop in our interest in inter-American military cooperation along those lines. Nevertheless, the Defense Department has come back with a very firm statement that it would be undesirable in their viewpoint to have any such subjects brought up.

The attached letter [2] to General Webster replies to his last communication [3] on this subject, and is drafted with the intention of making very clear that we place full responsibility on the Defense Department for this decision.

Incidentally, it seems to me that in view of the position taken by the Defense Department, and the fact that we should be able to make it stick with the Conference, there is absolutely no need to include any representative of that Department on the U.S. delegation.

I recommend your approval of the letter and of the position expressed above regarding the delegation.[4]

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot) to the Acting Secretary of State [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 10, 1954.

Subject: Position on Communism for the Tenth Inter-American Conference.

Discussion: There is attached a copy of the position paper (Tab A)[2] for our Delegation to the Tenth Inter-American Conference on the subject "Intervention of International Communism in the American Republics". This paper has been prepared by a Working Group representing ARA, L, SCA, and R in the Department, and the Departments of Defense, Justice and CIA. It is being submitted to you for review and approval.[3] I hope it will be possible to meet with you sometime this Friday to discuss this paper.

The U.S. position envisages three principal objectives: (1) to emphasize and dramatize through a political declaration (Tab B)[4] the fact that the communist movement is international in scope and directed from Moscow, that as such it constitutes intervention in the affairs of the Americas, and that a situation in which there is effective intervention controlling the government of an American State would constitute grounds for invoking the consultative procedure under the Rio Treaty;[5] (2) to focus attention on certain specific problems regarding communist subversive activities in the Hemisphere through resolutions (Tab C)[4] calling upon the American governments to take appropriate measures to control the free movement of communist agents, expose the sources of communist propaganda, and exchange information on communist activities to facilitate the carrying out of these measures; and (3) to lay the groundwork for positive action by the OAS against Communist penetration in the Hemisphere, such as that taking place in Guatemala.

There is also enclosed a guidance memorandum (Tab D)[6] prepared in ARA setting forth the course of action the Delegation should follow in the event that Guatemala precipitates a discussion of the situation there by attacking the U.S. with charges of intervention. The tactic outlined is for the Delegation to move promptly and vigorously to the counter-attack, encouraging other like-minded countries to join with the U.S. The object of this counter-offensive would be to make clear the extent of communist infiltration and influence in Guatemala. The annexes referred to in the memorandum are in preparation.

Recommendation: That you review the attached paper (Tab A) prior to meeting [7] with me to discuss them.

CONFIDENTIAL
XIA D-5/4 [8]

TENTH INTER-AMERICAN CONFERENCE, MARCH 1954

Intervention of International Communism in the American Republics

PROBLEM

What action should the United States propose or support at the Tenth Inter-American Conference under the agenda item "Intervention of International Communism in the American Republics", which was included on the agenda at the initiative of the United States.

UNITED STATES POSITION

A. Substance

The United States should seek action by the Conference under the above-mentioned agenda item to counteract and oppose the intervention of international communism in the American republics, and to that end seek the adoption of a resolution or resolutions covering the following:

1. Call attention to the international character of the Communist movement and the control from Moscow of its activities everywhere.

2. Declare the activities of international Communism to constitute intervention in American affairs.

3. Condemn such intervention as contrary to OAS principles.

[7] No record of the referenced meeting was found in Department of State files.

[8] Official documents prepared for the Tenth Inter-American Conference bore series indicators. Position papers were designated XIA (Tenth Inter-American), D–1 through 28, corresponding exactly to numbered agenda items. This paper is revision number 4 of the U.S. position concerning agenda item 5 ("Intervention of International Communism in the American Republics"). Four annexes to this paper, A–D, are not printed.

4. Express the firm intent of the American Governments to take the necessary steps to prevent the intervention in American affairs of the international Communist movement.

5. Declare that in the event of effective intervention by the international communist movement, dominating or controlling the political institutions of an American State, such a situation would constitute grounds for invoking the procedure of consultation under the Treaty of Rio de Janeiro.

6. Reiterate the adherence of the American republics to democratic principles and

7. Recommend specific steps with regard to the following individual problems:

a. Travel Controls—With a view to preventing the movement of individuals traveling in the interests of international communism or its instrumentalities, the Conference should recommend that the American republics take the necessary steps, by means of:

(i) Visa Controls—to prevent the entry of such individuals into their respective jurisdictions.

(ii) Passports Controls—to prevent the voluntary departure of such individuals who are their nationals from their respective jurisdiction.

(iii) Control of illicit travel—to prevent the clandestine or illegal travel, including the abuse and misuse of travel documents of such individuals into and out of their respective jurisdictions.

In carrying out the foregoing, the Conference should support the principle of freedom of transit, while recommending that abuse of this freedom by communists be prevented.

b. Communist Propaganda—The Conference should recommend that the American republics take the necessary measures to force disclosure of the identity of the communist conspirators or their instrumentalities who are responsible for spreading false propaganda, the sources of their funds, and the nature of their activities, and that the American republics cooperate with one another to the end that this false propaganda, regardless of its place of origin, may be known for what it is by all the peoples of the hemisphere.

c. Exchange of Information—The Conference should call attention to the importance of implementing Resolution 32,[9] paragraph 4, of the Ninth Inter-American Conference held at Bogotá, and in approximately the same language as Resolution 32, paragraph 4, recommend the exchange of information among the American republics which can help them in carrying out the measures recommended by the Tenth Conference with regard to international communism.

[9] For the text of the referenced resolution, see Ninth International Conference of American States, p. 266.

B. Tactics

1. Sponsoring and Co-Sponsoring—The United States should sponsor a resolution or resolutions to accomplish the foregoing. Whether the United States should invite other countries to co-sponsor would depend on which governments would be willing to co-sponsor. Our policy requires us to steer a middle course between extremists to whom any change or progress not advocated by the regime in power is communism and democratic groups who do not have a sufficient appreciation for the danger of communism. It would be better for the U.S. to avoid any co-sponsors if we could not get as co-sponsors anyone other than some of the entrenched, authoritarian governments. The United States should discuss our position on this agenda topic with other governments, as appropriate, and decide on the basis of these discussions whether to invite other countries to co-sponsor. If it does not appear likely that a well balanced group of co-sponsors can be obtained it would be better to sponsor the resolutions by ourselves.

The foregoing concerning sponsoring and co-sponsoring would not preclude our suggesting that another government or governments sponsor a resolution without United States co-sponsorship, should this appear desirable.

2. The Pan American Union Study—The PAU study on "Strengthening of Internal Security" [10] pursuant to Resolution VIII of the Fourth Meeting of Ministers of Foreign Affairs at Washington in 1951 may prove useful during the discussions before and during the Conference. Care should be used, however, not to imply an endorsement of all its conclusions. We should seek to avoid a situation where we must vote on the acceptance or rejection of the conclusions of the study.

C. Draft Resolutions

Resolutions along the lines of the attached draft resolutions (Annexes A–D) would achieve the U.S. position. These are not intended to be hard and fast texts, since the delegation will obviously need a certain latitude in order to accomplish the U.S. objectives.

DISCUSSION

The United States proposed this item for the agenda and all of the American republics, except Guatemala, approved the proposal.

In proposing the inclusion of this topic the United States suggested that under this item the Tenth Conference should:

1. Examine and call attention to the intervention of international communism in American affairs, including efforts to weaken the fabric of inter-American solidarity and to subvert genuine national social and political movements to its own ends.

2. Reaffirm the faith of the peoples of the Hemisphere in the ideal and reality of true democracy as the avenue of effective social and political progress of the peoples of the Americas.

3. Reaffirm the strong stand previously taken by the Organization of American States against the intervention of international communism in the affairs of the American republics.

4. Consider appropriate recommendations for further effective steps to counteract the intervention of international communism in the American republics.

The first three of these points would be covered by a general political declaration.

A. Political Declaration

The political declaration should accomplish the following (these correspond to paragraphs numbered 1 through 5 of the "U.S. Position" section):

1. Call attention to the international character of the Communist movement and the control from Moscow of its activities everywhere.

The following are examples of the activities to which attention should be called:

a. Subversion of genuine national, social, and political movements.
b. Subversion of constitutional order and the legal processes of government.
c. Distortion and exploitation of legitimate differences between friendly governments.
d. Dissemination of false propaganda direced at spreading suspicion, fear, and animosities among the peoples of the American republics.
e. Abuse of freedom of transit, including clandestine and illicit travel and the misuse of travel documents.

Sabotage and espionage are not included in this list. Resolution VIII of the Fourth Meeting of Foreign Ministers called for a study by the PAU of these subjects among others. We would have difficulty in accepting the conclusions of the PAU Study on these subjects. See Discussion section on PAU Study under "Tactics", page 12. We will therefore have to exercise care in the emphasis which we give to the subjects. It would, however, be useful to mention sabotage and espionage as specific types of subversive activities in the preamble or elsewhere in one ore more of our resolutions.

The declaration should recognize that the foregoing activities are influenced or directed by a foreign power.

2. Declare the activities of international communism to constitute intervention in American affairs.

The activities of international communism within the American republics should be declared to be intervention in the internal and regional affairs of the American republics, threatening the personality of each state and the liberties enjoyed by its citizens and interfering with the constructive development of inter-American relations. Cf. Article 15 of the OAS Charter.[11]

3. Condemn such intervention as contrary to OAS principles.

After the activities of international communism have been declared to constitute intervention, it is logical for the American republics to condemn them, since as intervention, they are contrary to Article 15 of the OAS Charter on non-intervention, and other inter-American principles—such as sovereignty, solidarity, and independence.

4. Express the firm intent of the American Governments to take the necessary steps to prevent the intervention in American affairs of the international communist movement.

Such a general expression of intent would have value in itself as a notice to the world of the intentions of the American republics. It would also provide a basis for future suggestions to the American republics for specific kinds of action which might not have been recommended specifically by the Tenth Conference.

5. Declare that in the event of effective intervention by the international communist movement, dominating or controlling the political institutions of an American state, such a situation would constitute grounds for invoking the procedure of consultation under the Treaty of Rio de Janeiro.

The inclusion of such a provision in the resolution would lay the groundwork for the calling of a meeting of Consultation should the situation in any country at a later date make such action, in our view, desirable. This provision, therefore, must be considered as part of the educational, preparatory work which is necessary to pave the way for stronger action through the OAS in regard to Communism. At the same time it would constitute a warning, indicating the concern which all of the other American states felt about the communist problem. In proposing or supporting this provision the United States delegation should avoid any implication that the conditions described therein particularly the phrase "dominating or controlling the political institutions of an American State", constitute the only test of communist intervention justifying consultation under Article 6 of the Rio Treaty, which reads as follows:

"If the inviolability or the integrity of the territory or the sovereignty or political independence of any American State should be affected by an aggression which is not an armed attack or by an extra-continental or intra-continental conflict, or by any other fact or situation that might endanger the peace of America, the Organ of Consultation shall meet immediately in order to agree on the measures which must be taken in case of aggression to assist the victim of the aggression or, in any case, the measures which should be taken for the common defense and for the maintenance of the peace and security of the Continent."

The position outlined in this paper does not envisage any explicit reference to Guatemala by the U.S. Delegation. It is felt that it would not be useful or desirable for the U.S. to take the initiative in attacking Guatemala in an inter-American gathering because of the charges of intervention which would result. On the other hand it is probable that Guatemala herself may promote a discussion of her controversy with her Central American neighbors and the United States along the lines of the "white paper" issued on January 29, 1954.[12] A memorandum[13] discussing the possible moves Guatemala may make at the Conference and our position in regard thereto, will be available for the use of the Delegation at the Conference.

6. Reiterate the adherence of the American republics to democratic principles.

The declaration should also contain a positive statement in support of principles of American democracy. This could be in the form of simple reaffirmation along lines of point 2 of the suggestions made by the United States when submitting the agenda item. It might also include an assertion by the American republics that they will continue to strengthen their democratic institutions. While there may be a separate resolution on Human Rights under item No. 13 of the Agenda, it would be well to include a brief statement here in order to make clear that what is being attacked is communism and not true democracy. Even if we were not to include a section in support of democracy, some other delegation is almost sure to do so, since the point was covered in Resolution VIII of Washington and Resolution 32 of Bototá. By including it at the outset we would have more control over its content.

[Here follows discussion of how the proposed United States position concerning Communism differed from that contained in Resolution 32 adopted by the Ninth International Conference of American States.]

B. Recommendations for Specific Steps with Regard to Individual Problems

1. Travel Controls—International communism operates through agents who must be able to impart intelligence and receive instructions in order to organize and carry out their activities. Much of communist activity in the Hemisphere is carried on by local communists. If the communist agents were deprived of freedom to travel they would be hampered in developing new local leaders; their contacts with existing leaders would be greatly hampered; and their ability to carry out the party-line would be greatly reduced.

[Here follows further discussion concerning travel controls.]

The Fourth Meeting of Foreign Ministers (Resolution VIII) recommended to the Governments of the American states that they regulate "transit across international boundaries of those foreigners who there is reason to expect will attempt to carry out subversive acts against the defense of the American Continent".

The U.S. position outlined above goes further in that it asks the American republics not merely to regulate but to prevent travel. It also goes further in that Resolution VIII of Washington relates to transit of persons "who there is reason to expect will attempt to carry out subversive acts against the defense of the American Continent". Whereas the U.S. position would simply require that the individuals were traveling in the interests of international communism.

The PAU study "Strengthening of Internal Security" stresses the value of the principle of freedom of transit and states that it should not be limited except by measures the object of which is to prevent "abuse" by real agents of subversive action. The study interprets the provisions of Resolution VIII with regard to travel to apply only to persons with respect to whom it has been proved, or real evidence exists, that they are acting as agents of international communism (PAU Study, paragraphs 133 and 134). The U.S. should not accept this interpretation of Resolution VIII. The U.S. position is somewhat broader than the conclusion of the Pan American Union Study in that it does not require proof or existence of evidence that persons are acting as agents of international communism but simply that they are traveling in the interests of international communism. It is our position that anyone traveling in the interests of communism is in fact part of the whole subversive program of international communism. The U.S. position is also a bit more positive on actual prevention of travel, although the PAU study does come fairly close to this position (PAU Study, paragraph 137).

2. Communist Propaganda—One of the methods whereby the international communist conspiracy imposes itself upon free peoples is the subversion of men's minds by false propaganda. International communism today employs all of the methods and patterns of subversive propaganda, including falsehood, the poisoning of public opinion with half-truths, and irresponsible slander, relying on the fact that even subsequent refutation does not destroy entirely the harm done by doubts previously aroused.

An effective way of dealing with communist propaganda is to make a public disclosure of the activities of the communist propagandists and an identification of the propaganda as communist. Such disclosure is entirely consistent with the democratic idea of freedom of the press. The PAU Study contemplates identification of communist propaganda (PAU Study, paragraph 122), suppression (paragraph 123), and punishment (paragraph 124). The U.S. position treats only of the first of these, viz. identification, since U.S. laws do not permit suppression and punishment unless there is a violation of the laws requiring registration and identification. If U.S. laws were to go further they would run the risk of violating one of the basic concepts of our Government as embodied in the Bill of Rights of the Constitution, viz. freedom of speech and of the press.

3. Exchange of Information—In Resolution 32, paragraph 4, of the Bogotá Conference the American republics resolved to proceed with a full exchange of information concerning any of the subversive activities mentioned in the resolution that are carried on within their respective jurisdictions.

Resolution VIII of Washington does not call for exchange of information, but a "whereas" clause of that resolution indicates that since subversive action recognizes no boundaries a high degree of cooperation is necessary among the American republics to eradicate the threat of subversive activity.

An essential element in the adequate enforcement of the extended travel controls contemplated above is the continued exchange of information among the American republics concerning the identity and movement of individuals who there is reason to believe are traveling in the interests of international communism. Similarly, the identification of the sources of communist propaganda may be promoted by exchange of information concerning the identity of the communist conspirators or their instrumentalities who are responsible for spreading the false propaganda.

The U.S. should therefore propose that the Conference call attention to the importance of implementing Resolution 32, paragraph 4, of the Final Act of Bogotá and in approximately the same language as Resolution 32, paragraph 4, recommend the exchange of information among the American republics which can help them in carrying out the measures recommended by the Tenth Conference with regard to international communism. It is important to follow as closely as possible the wording of that resolution so that our obligations are not materially broadened on this score. However, it would seem that the information to be exchanged should not be limited to information concerning activities that are carried on within their respective jurisdiction, as was the case in Resolution 32. If a government has information concerning subversive activities going on or contemplated in another country it might be mutually useful for the information to be given to the government of that country. The PAU Study formulates conclusions with regard to various forms of subversive activities and points out, whenever this seemed proper to the authors of the Study, the appropriateness of exchange of information (PAU Study, paragraph 112). Thus exchange of information is recommended with regard to communist propaganda (paragraph 123) and abuse of freedom of travel (paragraph 137). The U.S. position has about the same emphasis as the PAU Study on exchange of information.

4. Outlawing Communist Party—At the present time the Communist Party is not outlawed in the United States, and therefore the United States should not propose or favor action by the Conference recommending the outlawing of the Party. Should there be a change in policy with regard to the outlawing of the Party in the United States prior to action by the Conference, the position to be taken by the United States at the Conference should be reviewed.

C. Tactics

1. Sponsoring and Co-sponsoring—The U.S. should be one of the sponsors because we introduced the agenda item and because it will give us greater control of the substance of the resolutions.

Whether we should invite others to co-sponsor depends on whether discussions with other governments indicate a likelihood that a well-balanced group of sponsors could be achieved. We have reason to believe that the Dominican Government, which is representative of the authoritarian tendency in the hemisphere, would like to co-sponsor a resolution with us, and we do not know whether some of the more democratic countries, such as Chile, Costa Rica, and Uruguay, would be willing to do so. The action taken by the Conference would lose in effectiveness if it were to become identified too closely with the more authoritarian of the American republics, since the support of prodemocratic governments and public groups would be prejudiced. On the other hand, if certain democratic groups who do not have a sufficient appreciation for the danger of communism were to control the situation the Conference might not take sufficiently decisive action. We will have to stress a middle course between these two tendencies in the hemisphere and this may mean that it will be more advisable to sponsor the resolution alone.

2. PAU Study—Resolution VIII of Washington requests the PAU to make technical studies concerning:

a. The definition, prevention, and punishment, as crimes, of sabotage and espionage.

b. General measures to protect and defend human rights and the democratic system against treason and other subversive acts.

c. Measures to prevent abuse of freedom of transit.

On August 10, 1953, the PAU issued its study. Its first 81 pages contain the substantive portion of the report, including the conclusions (pages 69–87) while more than 300 pages reproduce the texts of various inter-American resolutions and laws of individual governments which relate to the matter of internal security. The study constitutes a highly useful compilation of data and conclusions which each of the American governments should find it desirable to study carefully. The study should also prove useful at the Tenth Conference. It can be used to emphasize the seriousness of the communist threat and the importance of each government dealing effectively with that threat. At the same time, the U.S. cannot give unqualified endorsement to the substance of the report since we might have difficulties in accepting some of its conclusions on technical and legal matters, e.g. we might have difficulty accepting:

a. The conclusion in paragraph 116 that the protection against extradition, which normally is available to the person accused of a political crime, should not be available in the case of sabotage and espionage. Such matters are governed by the provisions of extradition treaties.
b. The conclusion in paragraph 119 that sabotage or espionage includes not only acts against the state but also criminal action that affects the security of another state or the defense of the continent.
c. That sabotage or espionage by a national should be punished as treason (paragraph 119).
d. The suggestions offered with regard to such things as communist diplomatic and consular officers (paragraph 132), controlling communist propaganda (paragraphs 122–124), subversive organizations (paragraphs 125–128), etc.

Accordingly, while we can use the study where it will support our proposals, we should be careful to avoid endorsement of all its conclusions. We should also seek to avoid a situation where we must vote on acceptance of all its conclusions since this might necessitate explanations, reservations, or possibly even negative votes, when obviously it would be much better psychologically to be affirmative under this item than to appear reticent or negative.

Paper Prepared in the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs

Subject: Guatemala and the Discussion of Communism at the Tenth Inter-American Conference

The paper outlining the United States position on the agenda item "Intervention of International Communism in the American Republics" does not call for the United States delegation itself to introduce discussion of the specific Communist situation in Guatemala. This decision is based on both legal and political grounds. It would be difficult for the United States, the most powerful country in the hemisphere, convincingly to maintain that Guatemala constituted a threat to its political independence or territorial integrity, and to invoke the Rio Treaty on those grounds. Politically, the United States should avoid appearing as leading a movement against any one of its small neighbors. Such appearance would inevitably cause opposition from a number of Latin American countries. However, it seems clear that as a result of Guatemala's own action at the Conference, or through other developments, a specific discussion of Communist penetration in Guatemala will take place.

The minimum United States objective at Caracas with respect to the Communist item is to achieve adoption of a resolution which will lay ground work for subsequent positive action against Guatemala by the Organization of American States. Our maximum objective would be the adoption, should conditions permit, of effective multilateral measures against Guatemala at Caracas.

It is clear that Guatemala will attend the Caracas Conference not in the role of defendant but with aggressive intent to disrupt constructive discussion of the Communist problem by making charges of intervention against the United States. The basic Guatemalan theme has already been made clear by statements of Guatemalan officials, including former Ambassador to the United States Guillermo Toriello, who as Foreign Minister is expected to head the Guatemalan delegation to Caracas, and to present the Guatemalan case there with cleverness and determination. The basic Guatemalan premise is that the United States is engaged in "imperialist" aggression against Guatemala in order to protect the interests of American companies, principally the United Fruit Company which have extensive operations in Guatemala and which are allegedly opposing Guatemala's efforts to carry out social and economic reforms. This oft-repeated charge has more recently been embellished by unfounded accusations of Guatemalan officials that Secretary Dulles and Assistant Secretary Cabot are among officials of the Department of State who have private vested interests in the United Fruit Company, and who are using their official positions in this Government to attack Guatemala; and that the United States has "acquiesced" in a huge plot financed by the United Fruit Company and supported by various Guatemalan nationals in exile and Governments of neighboring countries to overthrow the Guatemalan Government.

The United States must exercise leadership at Caracas to insure: (1) that Guatemala does not divert the Conference from constructive discussion of agenda item five; (2) that Guatemala does not achieve prolonged discussion of alleged United States imperialism under any Conference agenda item; and (3) that a Guatemalan attempt to wrest the initiative is countered by full exposure of Communist penetration of that country. Such exposure should be made by a delegation or delegations other than ours, preferably of countries not on the extreme right wing.

In considering the possible tactics of the Guatemalan delegation at the Conference, attention must be paid to the following possibilities: (1) the Guatemalan delegate may enter the discussion of agenda item five by impugning the motives of this Government in sponsoring such item; (2) the Guatemalan delegate may, in an opening speech, make a simple accusation against the United States along the lines indicated above without calling for any other action; (3) the Guatemalan delegation may attempt to inject their complaint against the United States into the discussion of some other agenda item, such as that on "Peaceful Relations Among Governments"; (4) the Guatemalan delegate may seek the convocation of a meeting of consultation of Foreign Ministers at Caracas to consider charges of United States intervention. (As noted above, the Guatemalan Government on January 29, 1954, issued a press release carrying charges of an invasion plot by certain elements in Guatemala and neighboring countries, accompanied by alleged documentary evidence in support thereof, including an allusion that the United States Government acquiesced to the conspiracy. The Guatemalan Government may intend to produce further alleged evidence in this connection at Caracas.)

From the United States viewpoint, the injection by Guatemala of its charges into the discussion of item five would be more advantageous than elsewhere in the Conference proceedings since this would constitute an invitation by Guatemala itself to discuss and expose the extent of Communist influence in that country. If the Guatemalan charges are released in plenary session or in connection with an item other than item five, it should be made clear by the United States delegation that the United States considers these obviously false charges irrelevant to any item on the agenda of the Conference, except insofar as they reveal an attempt on the part of the international Communist conspiracy to prevent constructive action under item five. If any further consideration is to be given the charges, they should be given under item five. The United States should oppose introduction of a new agenda item on this subject by Guatemala and should raise a point of order if an attempt is made to consider the Guatemalan charges under any item other than item five. If the question goes to the Steering Committee, the United States should take the position that the only item under which it can correctly be discussed is item five.

United States Position

In seeking to achieve our minimum objective, it is intended to press for adoption of a resolution which, without mentioning Guatemala by name, could be supported by every nation but Guatemala. Adoption of our proposed resolution, especially the paragraph covering point number five on page one of the position paper on Guatemala,[14] would in effect express the serious concern of the OAS over the penetration of Communism in Guatemala and would lay the necessary ground work for subsequent positive multilateral action. Furthermore, the United States delegation should encourage a friendly delegation to propose that the United States draft resolution be expanded so as to authorize the COAS, in event of a request by any American State for convocation of the Organ of Consultation under the Rio Treaty, to carry out an investigation of the extent to which Communist penetration of any given country, (e.g. Guatemala), constitutes basis for application of Article VI of the Treaty.

The United States should seek to prevent the discussion of alleged American intervention at the Conference. However, if and when Guatemala introduces the subject, the United States should immediately cause it to be linked with the subject of Communist penetration of Guatemala. Having established the link, the United States should seek to confine discussion to Communist penetration, and prevent return to the topic of alleged intervention. The United States should make it clear that the two questions of Communist penetration of the hemisphere and treatment of American commercial interests abroad are entirely separate; and that the United States Government would continue to regard the Communist growth in Guatemala as potentially dangerous to the hemisphere even if the Guatemalan Government were to make, through the available normal methods, a complete and satisfactory settlement of its differences with American companies.

Annex A [15] contains for the information of the delegation several of the more evident points which the Guatemalan delegation is expected to make concerning alleged United States intervention, together with the United States positions thereon.

Annex B [15] to this paper contains a summary of information concerning Communist penetration of Guatemala which can be made available for the use of other delegations in the debate on Communism at Caracas.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot) to the Acting Secretary of State

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 12, 1954.

Subject: Latin American Policy [1]

In accordance with your instructions of this morning, there is attached a memorandum outlining major problems in our relations with the other American republics to be used as the basis for your meeting [2] with the President next week.

[Annex]

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 15, 1954.

A. Pending Latin American matters on which I have not been able to get adequate favorable action despite every effort:

1. The "package deal" [3] (draft letter to Mr. Dodge attached, Tab A).[4] Some of the items in this were included in our regular budget request but ran into unyielding opposition at relatively low levels at which our total Latin American policy was clearly not taken into account. I have consequently come to feel that the only way to get a Latin American program through is to present an integrated program showing how little is required to carry out the Eisenhower Report recommendations and fulfill Republican pledges.

In a meeting on February 11 [2] in Mr. Lourie's office, attended by Mr. Ralph Burton and Mr. Hart Perry of the Bureau of the Budget, as well as Mr. Wailes [5] and Mr. Nolting, Budget's position was to tear the program item from item, say that any increases should come through readjusting appropriations in the presently-recommended budget, and

[1] In a memorandum to Acting Secretary of State Smith, dated Feb. 11, 1954, Mr. Cabot stated in part that although the Tenth Inter-American Conference would soon convene, the United States was "still without a program which will be in any way satisfying to the other American republics", that the major obstacle to the development of an effective program for Latin America was that "it almost invariably cuts across other policies" which are "generally considered overriding", and he recommended that "the question of Latin American policy be urgently considered at the highest level." (362/2-1154)

[3] Reference is to the revised budget request recommended by ARA in implementation of the Milton Eisenhower report totaling approximately $85 million, which represented an increase of about $17 million over the amount already included in the 1955 budget request for Latin America. For additional documentation on this subject, see pp. 196 ff.

point to trivial increases already embodied in a few items as a possible talking point at Caracas. They did agree to go ahead with the authorization for the Panama facilities, for which appropriations will perhaps not be necessary until a future budget. They did hold out a very slight hope for an increased appropriation for the Inter-American Highway. At best, however, their position would wreck the program and the possibility of our asserting that we have done anything effective to implement the Eisenhower Report. Virtually the only steps we have taken to carry its recommendations into effect (trade, tax incentives) have been taken on a world wide basis.

2. Since our meeting at the White House on January 21,[6] the matter of drafting a position regarding loan policy for Caracas has been referred to a subcommittee of Assistant Secretaries Overby, Anderson and myself; Mr. Corbett of State and Mr. deBeers[7] of Treasury have also participated. We are still unable to agree on any statement about the Export-Import Bank which I consider adequately reassuring to the other American republics, and it is clear that Mr. Overby will not go beyond a very strict interpretation of the agreement[8] between the International Bank and the Export-Import Bank approved by the NAC on January 22. He is now doing a redraft in an effort to meet our objections. The position of Treasury in this entire matter is clearly inconsistent with the Latin American policy statement adopted at the NSC meeting on March 18, 1953,[9] the pertinent paragraph of which reads as follows:

. . . . . .

"b. Continuing the present level of International Bank loans and Export-Import Bank loans and, where appropriate, accelerating and increasing them, as a necessary supplement to foreign private investment."

3. On February 10 at the staff meeting,[11] you took a favorable view of my suggestion that the President issue a statement regarding the coffee situation which would be reassuring to the coffee-producing countries. Finding that the President was having a press conference at 10:30,[12] I telephoned Dr. Hauge at the White House and emphasized to him the desirability of having the President issue a statement. Dr. Hauge was rather dubious about this. He pointed out that any such statement might be resented by the American public or by Congress, or considered as prejudging the FTC and other investigations.[13] He finally agreed to suggest to the President that he make some general statement indicating that the coffee situation should not be permitted to disturb our relations with our sister republics. I gather that, because no question was asked at the conference, no statement was made. Latin American public opinion is becoming more and more aroused regarding this issue and several of the republics which are most friendly to us (Brazil, Colombia) are particularly bitter. A good presidential statement should help materially at Caracas.[14]

4. Although we have been trying since June to obtain an acceptable position statement from the Pentagon regarding labor policy, we are still unable to do so despite the President's statement at his meeting with President Remón [15] (later reiterated in the Joint Statement [16]) that our international commitment in note of March 2, 1936 [17] would be fulfilled. We feel that the minimum that should be done in the Zone today to ease this most vexatious single irritant in United States–Panama relations is:

a. To merge the present dual-wage systems into a single-wage scale and uniformity in treatment of labor;

b. To have this new single scale and uniformity in treatment apply to all U.S. Government agencies operating in the Canal Zone; and

c. To have whatever retirement system finally adopted applied uniformly to non-American employees of all Government agencies in the Zone.

A number of other matters have been only less delayed. For example, no reply has yet been received to comments submitted to the Pentagon for clearance as early as December 21, 1953 on the following items: Panamanian Document "A":[18] Par. 1–4, Panamanian participation in Canal Zone market; Par. 4, Buy American Act;[19] Par. 5, 6, Contraband control; Par. 6, Commissary location; Par. 8, Alcoholic beverage imports; Par. 9, Sales of surplus property; Par. 10, Manufacturing activities in Zone; Par. 12, Repairs to ships; and Par. 13, Sales to ships.

B. We have the following particular problems which continue to cause resentment in the other American republics:

1. We have imposed an 18 percent countervailing duty on Uruguayan wool tops on the basis that Urguay was subsidizing the exports through a multiple exchange rate.[20]

2. We have broken our GATT commitment to Uruguay to lower our meat tariffs.

3. We dumped surplus linseed oil on the market, undercutting Argentina's markets.

4. We have imposed a quota of 2,500,000 bushels of oats, thereby cutting off Argentine importations and leaving several million bushels already under contract with no place to go.

5. After a great deal of publicity regarding the great copper development project at Toquepala (Peru), for which the DMB was to put up $60 million on the basis of a certificate of national necessity, the Export–Import Bank $60 million as a loan, and the American Smelting to supply $48 million of its own funds, the DMB withdrew its certificate and the project is now completely stalled, to Peru's irritation. The development is commercially sound and will be needed to supply the estimated world demand for copper by the time it can be opened.

6. The NSC recently decided that we should not enter the International Tin Agreement.[21] I believe that the Department has just decided to request a reversal of this decision, but as it stands it will cause resentment not only in Bolivia, but also in other countries which believe in price stabilization agreements for primary products.

[21] For documentation relating to the decision of the United States not to adhere to the International Tin Agreement, see volume I.

7. We have been unable to reach an agreement with Mexico with regard to migrant labor and on January 15 started operating unilaterally. This had ARA's concurrence because the old agreement [22] did not work in practice, but it has caused some resentment.

8. In August, the Chileans asked us to buy 100,000 tons of accumulated copper. The negotiations are in abeyance with ARA's concurrence because we felt that we should not buy this copper before Chile gave American copper companies fairer treatment and took measures to clean house economically, but it has again caused resentment.

9. There are numerous reports that the Guatemalans plan to raise the issue of intervention at Caracas and it is obvious from reports reaching us from the field that the other American republics are not prepared, even if the problems listed above are satisfactorily adjusted, to take multilateral action against Guatemala at this stage. We are nevertheless being harassed by such items as Senator Margaret Smith's bill [23] connecting Guatemalan Communism with high coffee prices (which would play squarely into the hands of the Guatemalan Communists at Caracas) and Walter Winchell's broadcast calling for a boycott on Guatemalan coffee.

The significance of the above in connection with our position at Caracas is not merely that we will be incapable of meeting, even to a limited extent, the aspirations which Latin America will expect to see fulfilled in Caracas as a result of the various statements which have been made by this Government throughout the past year, but that our efforts to achieve a strong resolution on Communism will be frustrated and weakened by Latin America's feeling that our position does not respond to their needs.

C. Among the steps which the President might still take if he wishes us to go to Caracas with a reasonable minimum Latin American program are the following:

1. Direct Treasury to prepare within a week a statement regarding loan policy which would assure the other American republics of credit facilities not less ample than those which were available to them on January 20, 1953 (or March 18, 1953) and would emphasize the role of the Export-Import Bank, with particular reference to the prospective new use by it of powers available to it, such as guaranties, techniques for tapping private credit, etc. (Tab E).[24]

[24] Not printed.

2. Direct Budget to draft within a week, in concurrence with State, a program for the appropriations necessary for the implementation of our Latin American policy, with particular reference to the Eisenhower Report. Consult with Congressional leaders regarding this program, emphasizing to the Republicans that it represents a party pledge and to the Democrats that in no area of our bipartisan foreign policy is there so little disagreement.

3. Issue at his next press conference as reassuring a statement as possible for the coffee-producing nations, with due regard to Congressional and public opinion. A draft of such a statement is attached (Tab B).[25]

4. Direct State and other interested agencies to formulate urgently a program for the restricted sale under bilateral agreement of surplus foodstuffs in the other American republics, and for the use of local currency so obtained for cultural purposes (Tab C).[25]

5. Direct the Postmaster General[26] to announce, on March 1, a plan to issue within a year a set of twenty commemorative stamps honoring the other American republics. (I have been unable since last March to get an answer to this proposal.) (Tab D)[25]

6. Instruct the pertinent agencies of the Government to give due weight to foreign policy considerations in connection with any proposed commodity stabilization agreement, and not to reject them on the basis of unessential considerations of domestic policy when (as in the tin agreement) foreign policy considerations seem clearly paramount.

[Here follow a list of those present (24) and discussion of matters unrelated to the Tenth Inter-American Conference.]

[1] During the period 1952–1960, the Secretary's staff meeting met twice a week. The meetings were attended by the Under Secretary of State, Assistant Secretary of State, certain members of the Executive Secretariat, and certain office directors. A broad range of matters was discussed; the Secretary normally presided.

Caracas Conference

2. The Acting Secretary directed Mr. Cabot, if approached by Treasury officials, to take the line that what is wanted is a positive statement as to what the Export-Import Bank can do for Latin America on a "yes" rather than "no" basis.

The Acting Secretary further instructed Mr. Nolting to attempt to obtain an assurance from Budget that we would be able to make a statement before or at a Caracas conference in connection with the Eisenhower "package proposal." [2] The Acting Secretary added that he felt Budget would be cooperative.

[Here follows discussion of additional matters unrelated to the Tenth Inter-American Conference.]

[2] The Secretary's Mar. 4 address at Caracas contained a reference to the "package proposal" and a statement concerning Export-Import Bank policy. See footnote 14, p. 295.

The Acting Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic Offices in the American Republics [1]

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, February 18, 1954.

Subject: Communist Item on Agenda of Tenth Inter-American Conference

CA-4452. In any further conversations you may have regarding the Communist issue and its possible relationship to the items on the agenda of the Tenth Inter-American Conference, you should bear in mind the importance of preventing the development in Latin American thinking of the idea that their approving a strong resolution against Communism would constitute a concession to the U.S. which could only be justified by concessions on our part to Latin America in the economic field. The fact is that the political-security phase of the OAS relationship can and must stand on its own feet. The U.S., as the most powerful American nation in the OAS, has limited its freedom of action by subscribing to the non-intervention principle. It has also, by subscribing to the principle of collective action based on consultation, given to the relatively weak Latin American states an important voice in determining steps for the protection of U.S. security interests. The issue of Communism in the hemisphere provides a test case to show whether that relationship is a useful and effective one. Obviously if the OAS does not take a reasonably strong stand on a matter of major importance to the U.S. (as well as to the other republics) from the security standpoint, some question must be raised regarding the soundness of the OAS relationship. There is, in principle, no room for bargaining with the political-security field as against the economic field. In the latter, as in the former, the U.S. will continue to attempt to work out with the other republics an increasingly satisfactory and constructive relationship that will stand on its own feet on the basis of realistic considerations, and contribute thereby to broadening the scope of inter-American cooperation.

The foregoing statement is for your background rather than for communication to other governments. However, it is believed that the viewpoint set forth therein should be of interest in connection with any informal conversations which you may have with persons who may advance the theory of bargaining economic versus political-security interests in the OAS.

Inter-American Conference at Caracas—Secretary Dulles stated that the major interest of the Latin American countries at this conference would concern economics whereas the chief U.S. interest is to secure a strong anti-Communist resolution which would recognize Communism as an international conspiracy instead of regarding it merely as an indigenous movement. With this objective Secretary Dulles hoped he might give them certain economic reassurances, and he suggested in this respect that no action be taken with regard to wool imports until Congress acts on the pending Presidential proposal and that no attempt would be made to establish controls over the price of coffee. He was reassured on these two points.

Ambassador Lodge called attention to the continued strong support given by our Latin American allies in the United Nations, particularly when European allies have vacillated on important questions such as the Korean Resolution last fall.

Secretary Dulles called attention to pending legislation concerning loans to Latin American countries and he emphasized the desirability of effective action to halt the growth of Communism in South America at this time rather than delay until a situation develops similar to that in China in the 1940's when American aid was too late.

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, March 6, 1954.

Tedul 25. To give you maximum support the cabinet, March 5 approved in principle a memorandum [1] I presented as basis for announcement by you of administration determination to implement Milton Eisenhower report. Memorandum requested:

(1) That cabinet follow general guidance of President's comment to you in memo January 12 [2] that "I am struck by the fact that a very small loan investment or grant on our part might reap very definite and extensive advantages to US." [3]

(2) That agreed statement policy Export Import Bank be carried out to yield maximum benefit Export Import Bank as instrument national policy;

(3) That support be given specific requests supplemental appropriations exchange persons (strategy on this will be first to attempt restoration house cuts of regular budget request), said American schools, and Inter-American highway ($7 million supplemental request); and

(4) That there be general advance assurance cabinet support such 1956 budget requests as (a) increase $2 million or more for technical assistance, (b) $8 million total for Inter-American highway, (c) $2 million total Rama road Nicaragua, (d) increase $2 million USIA, and (e) increase $900,000 for Inter-American organizations.

The minute of cabinet meeting [4] indicates State, Commerce, FOA and Budget will determine specific steps to be taken for financing the measures set forth in the memorandum.

Also particular attention cabinet was called to need for redoubling efforts to satisfy Panama on matters which do not affect fundamental rights, e.g. more equitable treatment Panamanian employees in Canal Zone, reduction non-essential commercial competition by US agencies Canal Zone, and legislation and appropriations for economic development fund in lieu change in treaty annuity.

If you consider it especially desirable Milton Eisenhower could come to Caracas at such time as you may indicate. He is inclined to doubt wisdom of his coming particularly view recent comments Drew Pearson column.

There follows a summary of the discussion at the meeting and the chief points taken.

[Here follows discussion relating to East–West trade controls.]

1. The Caracas Conference

Secretary Dulles first outlined to the Council the conception of the Monroe Doctrine which he had in mind when he departed for Caracas, as forming the background for the anti-Communist resolution which it had been his chief objective to see adopted by the Foreign Ministers. This was an extension of the Monroe Doctrine to include the concept of outlawing foreign ideologies in the American Republics. Secretary Dulles had believed that if he secured general acceptance of the resolution the United States could operate more effectively to meet Communist subversion in the American Republics and at the same time avoid the charge of interference in the affairs of any other sovereign state. In short, he argued that Communist subversion and subsequent control of any of the American Republics was tantamount to external aggression against such a Republic. Efforts, therefore, to counter such Communist subversion could not rightfully be described as American intervention.

Secretary Dulles admitted that it had not been easy to secure general acceptance of the anti-Communist resolution. There was much in the climate of opinion which militated against quick success. First of all, he had encountered much unhappiness and anxiety with respect to the commercial and financial policies which the Administration was following in Latin America. Beyond that, there were always those who insisted that the anti-Communist resolution was nothing but a pretext to permit American intervention in the internal affairs of the other republics of the hemisphere. It had therefore required two weeks of very intensive work and almost daily meetings with the other Foreign Ministers [2] to change this atmosphere and to secure general agreement to the resolution. Even so, the resolution was certainly not adopted with genuine enthusiasm. Among the complications was the very wide gulf between the Latin American democracies and the nations which were governed by dictatorship. Democratic Uruguay entertained feelings of hostility for dictatorships like Venezuela at least as strong as those it felt for Communism. In any event, the resolution had finally passed by a vote of 17 to 1, with Mexico and Argentina abstaining. Mexico's attitude had, of course, been unfortunate. It could have been worse, however, if the Mexican Foreign Minister, Padilla Nervo, had really thrown himself into the fight against the resolution. His prestige was so very great that if he had chosen to exploit it the results might have been serious. It was fortunate, therefore, that he did not put his heart into opposing us. The real explanation of the Mexican position was the domestic political situation. The Mexican people were still acutely sensitive to any possibility of U.S. interference in Mexican affairs. Argentine abstention, on the other hard, was largely dictated by that country's concern over economic and social matters. We finally agreed, said Secretary Dulles, to the convening of a later conference [3] to deal with these matters, and the Argentinians seemed to be encouraged by our willingness at least to sit down and talk about these issues.

All in all, a quite favorable atmosphere pervaded the conference when Secretary Dulles left, and he felt that he had come to know most of the Latin American Foreign Ministers fairly well.

The Vice President commented that the Congressional reaction to the report which Secretary Dulles had made on the conference had been generally very favorable. Indeed, some of the most outspoken critics of the Administration's foreign policy had made flattering comments on Secretary Dulles' performance.

Mr. Cutler then inquired about the resolution against colonialism [4] which had been accepted by all the Latin American Republics but not by the United States, which had abstained. Secretary Dulles described this resolution as a "paper" resolution rather than a document forming the basis for action, as in the case of the anti-Communist resolution. There was no question about widespread bitter feelings in Latin America with respect to the European colonies there. Significantly, however, the United States was not linked with the colonial powers, and this resolution had not been motivated by sentiments unfriendly to the United States.

Report Prepared in the Department of State [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 1954.

INTRODUCTION

COMMITTEE II—(ECONOMIC MATTERS)

The United States Delegation went to Caracas with the primary objective of obtaining a ringing hemispheric declaration against encroachments of Soviet communism.

Most of the Latin American Delegations went to Caracas chiefly interested in economic problems.

The Conference produced the desired anti-communist resolution, but the Latin American countries fell short of their full objectives of firm commitments by the United States on key economic issues.

The Latin Americans evidently realized before the Conference that the United States would be unwilling at Caracas or at least not ready, to accede to their full economic desires. The lead-off speaker in the general economic debate, Prat of Chile, proposed a special meeting of [1] Cover sheet and table of contents are not printed.

Ministers of Finance or Economy at which "concrete" solutions of Latin American economic problems would be achieved. This idea was generally supported, and the subsequent tactics by a number of delegations were to obtain the maximum possible at Caracas and still have a commitment for another meeting which would offer a further opportunity to press for additional and, it was hoped, more firm concessions by the U.S. The possibility existed, near the beginning of the Conference, of adopting a few perfunctory economic resolutions and postponing to the special economic meeting, action on the issues of major concern to most of the Latin American countries. This opening was not exploited, however, and in retrospect it was probably as well that the issues in dispute were debated and brought into clearer focus than ever before.

It may be anticipated that at Rio there will be additional pressure for specific and concrete commitments by the U.S., based on the premise—which is not new—that if there is unity in the Western Hemisphere militarily and politically, this should also extend to the economic field.

In its preparations for the Conference, the U.S. had anticipated all proposals of any importance which were eventually presented. What was not fully anticipated, however, was the extent to which some of the Latin American Delegations would go in pressing certain of their proposals to points which could not be accepted by the U.S.

At no previous Inter-American Conference did the Latin American Delegations come so well prepared with statements of economic problems and aspirations of their countries. Delegate after delegate presented lengthy and in many cases well-prepared documents; in fact, the beginning of subcommittee work was delayed for several days beyond the normal period of "general debate" in order to permit the delegates to conclude their presentations. In much of this was evident the work during the past three years of the secretariat of the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America, under the direction of Raul Prebisch. The various Latin American countries had available from ECLA a very considerable number of studies of their economic problems on which they could draw for material, and in many cases the delegates had picked up technical economic jargon learned from Prebisch.

Latin American Positions

From their prepared statements, from the resolutions introduced and from the debates in Committee II and its subcommittees, it was clear that most of the Latin American Delegations had come to Caracas with the intention of getting the United States committed as far as possible at that meeting, to action in their favor on three main issues and several related or subsidiary issues. The three main issues were: more "favorable" terms of trade, through the guaranteeing in some unspecified way of high and stable prices for Latin American exports of raw materials to the United States; unilateral lowering of U.S. tariffs on Latin American products and no other form of trade restriction; and greater liberality in the granting of loans of public funds for economic development in Latin America, both as to amounts and methods of making the loans.

At the same time, it was recognized that on certain matters of importance to a few or many of the Latin American nations, the U.S. was not yet prepared to state a definitive position, e.g., disposal of agricultural surpluses. Combined with the drive at Caracas for resolutions at the Conference itself, which in some cases the United States could not support or had to vote against, therefore, there was the move—supported by the U.S.—for a special economic meeting in the last quarter of 1954 in Rio de Janeiro at which issues unresolved, or only partially resolved, at Caracas, could be further discussed. Support by the U.S., it should be noted, was partially related to our concern as to the outcome of the US-sponsored declaration against communism, which at the time of the discussion of the proposed special economic meeting, had not yet been voted upon in Committee I.

Several common themes ran through many of the Latin American statements and were reflected in the resolutions [2] introduced: higher and more stable prices for raw material exports; the need for assurances that prices for such exports would bear a favorable relationship to prices of imported manufactures; the need for unilateral action by the U.S. to lower duties on imports of Latin American products; the need for a more liberal policy in loans of public funds for economic development; the preference for the Export-Import Bank over the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development as a source for credits for development; strengthening and expansion, on a permanent basis, of the technical cooperation programs; improving and strengthening the operations of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council and coordinating its work more effectively with that of the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America.

Individual country representatives, of course, had particular objectives: the Chileans wanted a special conference to pin down the U.S. on economic commitments; and compensation for alleged losses because their copper was not being sold behind the Iron Curtain. The Guatemalans wanted a resolution which under the misnomer of "agrarian reform" would serve them as a springboard for further land expropriation action against the United Fruit Company. The Bolivians also had a proposal on that subject. The Mexicans, Chileans and Bolivians wanted a special inter-American agency to concern itself with problems of tin, lead, zinc, copper and tungsten. The Dominicans wanted something which could be used as a basis for a larger quota in the U.S. sugar market. The Ecuadorans wanted a resolution which would give them the right to expand their claims to sovereignty over their non-existent Continental Shelf and the waters above it to a distance of 200 miles offshore. The Panamanians wanted a resolution in favor of abolishing the tax presently imposed by the U.S. on air, maritime and land passages in Central America and the Caribbean. The Argentines and Uruguayans particularly wanted assurances against disposal of U.S. agricultural surpluses in a manner harmful to their export markets. The Brazilians and Peruvians wanted prior inter-American economic resolutions to be codified, with the former desiring that the resulting document be considered at a special conference. The Peruvians wanted resolutions in favor of private enterprise (also the Panamanians) and the encouragement of private foreign investments. The Guatemalans wanted private foreign investments "regulated", and in general limited to less than 50 percent of the ownership of an enterprise. The Uruguayans (and the Dominicans in a less ambitious way) wanted a regional preferential trading system even within the GATT structure.[3]

Venezuela and Cuba and later Chile, tried to obtain acceptance of the thesis that income from private foreign investments should be taxed only in the country in which the income was created. Venezuela also wanted assurances that foreign capital would not displace existing national capital. Ecuador proposed a study of the possible creation of an Inter-American Institute of Technological Research, and Chile had a somewhat similar idea. Guatemala introduced resolutions against economic boycotts and monopolies, aimed at the United States or U.S. companies.

United States Position

The official U.S. position on economic matters at Caracas was set forth in one part of the Secretary's address on March 4 before a Plenary Session; in a statement by the Secretary before the Economic Committee on March 10; and in the main economic statement on the same day before that Committee by Assistant Secretary Waugh.[4]

Where applicable, the position outlined in those statements was of course maintained in the debates in the Economic Committee and its subcommittees.

The U.S. position was such that an area of complete agreement with the other countries could be found in such subjects as technical cooperation; the future work of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council and its relations with the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America; and a measure of agreement on economic development, including private investments, public credits and economic diversification.

It was in that part of the agenda headed "commercial cooperation" that it was not possible to find an accommodation on two issues of importance. Thus, for the first time at an inter-American conference, the U.S. was forced to vote against a resolution bearing the title "Reduction of Barriers to Inter-American Trade".[5] The problem in the case of this resolution, however, was that it was entirely unilateral, calling upon the U.S. (not identified by name) to reduce or eliminate trade barriers against Latin American raw materials or semi-manufactures, without any reciprocal action by the Latin American countries.

In the same way, such a vigorous case was made by many of the Latin American countries for practically guaranteed assurances of favorable terms of trade, that the language adopted to express this in a resolution ("Terms of Trade and Prices"),[6] even though considerably watered down, could not be accepted by the U.S. because of its implications.

In the case of three economic resolutions, the U.S. Delegation found it necessary to abstain. One of these was on "Agricultural Surpluses",[7] and although the U.S. group was entirely sympathetic with the concern expressed particularly by Argentina and Uruguay—that U.S. agricultural surpluses might be disposed of in a manner harmful to normal marketings by those countries—and even though the delegations of those countries had attempted to frame their resolutions in a way which would prove acceptable to the U.S., it was decided that in view of the fluid nature of the problem at the present time and the fact that it was under study in both the Executive and Congress in Washington, it would be necessary to abstain.

In another resolution,[8] offered by Panama and proposing the removal of the tax imposed by the U.S. on tickets for travel to Central America and the Caribbean, it was recognized by the U.S. group that the tax did in fact discriminate against a particular area, but as the Delegation had no authority to vote in favor of the removal of the tax, and tax matters were at the moment under consideration in the Congress, it was again necessary to abstain.

On the subject of agrarian reform both Guatemala and Bolivia had introduced resolutions which, however, had not been discussed until the last meeting of Committee II. As the work of the Committee was about to be concluded, there was presented a Guatemalan-Bolivian combined draft which had not been seen by any of the other Delegations. Placed in discussion, it immediately produced numerous oral proposals for amendment, and the U.S. Delegation, by way of amendment, introduced an entirely new draft. After some three hours of debate, the Chairman finally asked the delegates to consider a proposal which attempted to combine the Guatemalan and U.S. drafts, with the elimination of a number of the more obnoxious phrases from the Guatemalan. This was eventually approved,[9] with not too many of the delegates exactly sure of the text on which they were voting. When a clean text became available, it was seen that the Guatemalan had been able to maintain his central idea of land distribution as the sole basis for agrarian reform. In the Plenary Session, dealing with economic resolutions, therefore, the U.S. Delegate announced his abstention and read a statement explaining that although the U.S. would support proposals for agrarian reform in its broad sense, it could not support a resolution based on the single and narrow concept of land distribution. Peru joined in this abstention, with all other votes cast in favor of the resolution.

Beyond the issues described above, the only other coming before the full Economic Committee which gave rise to any extended debate was that of conservation of natural resources: the continental shelf. This grew out of a resolution introduced by Ecuador, and was debated in the full Committee and a working group. There were wide differences between the Ecuadoran proposal and the position of the U.S. [10] and several other Delegations, with the result finally an agreement that the issues should be discussed at a special conference in 1955.

[Here follows discussion of the deliberations in the economic subcommittees.]

MEETING OF MINISTERS OF FINANCE OR ECONOMY OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLICS AS THE FOURTH EXTRAORDINARY MEETING OF THE INTER-AMERICAN ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL (RIO ECONOMIC CONFERENCE), HELD AT QUITANDINHA, BRAZIL, NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 2, 1954 [1]

Editorial Note

On April 9, 1954, President Eisenhower named a Sub-Cabinet Committee to review United States economic relations with Latin America and to formulate the basic policy framework for United States positions at the forthcoming Rio Economic Conference. Chaired by Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs Holland, the committee was comprised of representatives at the Assistant Secretary level from the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, Interior, Labor, State, and Treasury, and also from the Office of Defense Mobilization, the Foreign Operations Administration, and the Export–Import Bank. Between May 24 and November 16, 1954, the committee held 24 meetings; the policy statements adopted were subsequently referred to the Interdepartmental Committee on Latin American Economic Affairs (EA).

The Interdepartmental Committee was established in July 1954 under the chairmanship of Ambassador Merwin L. Bohan, United States Representative to the Inter-American Economic and Social Council. It consisted of representatives from the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Labor, State, and Treasury, and also from the Foreign Operations Administration and the Federal Reserve Board. On the basis of the policy statements approved by the Sub-Cabinet Committee, the Interdepartmental Committee prepared position papers on specific issues scheduled for deliberation, and others which the Department of State expected would arise, at the conference.

2. The Report also includes some general recommendations on our economic relations with Latin America and a section on trade and commodity problems. These sections are weak and contribute little to our preparations for Rio, probably because FOA does not in these fields have the familiarity that comes with operating responsibility. We will have to look to other papers to serve as a basis for Committee discussions of such subjects as stockpiling, terms of trade, commodity agreements, agricultural surpluses, etc.

3. I believe you should say some words of praise for the enthusiasm with which FOA has approached the problem of preparing a program for Rio in the economic development field. While a number of the proposals in the paper are open to serious question, FOA has obviously given good deal of thought to the problem.

4. FOA talks about "an urgent need for dramatic new lines of action". I would question whether dramatic new approaches are necessary or desirable. The dramatic quality can seldom be sustained over a period of time, and frustration often sets in when the initial enthusiasm wears away. What we need are programs which are solid, steady and constructive over the long-term.

5. Although our programs should be developed for the long pull, I would question whether we should decide now that "the main punch should be an announcement that the United States intends to get behind Latin American economic development for the 'long haul' ". Regardless of how we qualify such an announcement, it will be construed in Latin America as a financial commitment. If we are willing to make a long-term financial commitment, such an announcement would have a salutary effect, but this cannot be determined until we have discussed the substance of our policy and know what we have with which to back the announcement up.

6. The last 15 pages of the FOA Report consist of an Appendix containing recommendations on individual resolutions adopted at Caracas.[3] This is not a particularly useful exercise. Those few Caracas resolutions which call for specific action on our part are already being followed up. The balance of the Caracas resolutions are expressions of general policy. They are not likely to come up in precisely the same form at Rio. What we will need are general position papers on the subjects which came up at Caracas and are likely to come up at Rio, rather than positions on specific resolutions that have already been adopted. The purpose of the meetings of the Sub-Cabinet Committee is precisely to develop such general positions.

Economic Development

Ten of the eleven main lines of action proposed in the FOA paper deal with problems of economic development. These ten proposals are [3] Reference is to the Tenth Inter-American Conference, held at Caracas, Mar. 1–28, 1954. For text of the resolutions adopted by the conference, see Tenth Inter-American Conference: Report of the Delegation of the United States of America With Related Documents (Department of State Publication 5692, Washington, 1955), pp. 81–175. listed and commented on below under the three headings, Programming, Financing and Technical Cooperation.

I. Programming

1. Urge Latin American governments to devote greater attention to development planning.

Comment:
This proposal was in effect made at the Caracas conference which adopted a resolution recommending that the Latin American countries consider the establishment of development planning.

2. Urge that the Latin American governments and the United States make joint effort in finding ways to increase Latin American production at a rate faster than population growth.

Comment:
Increasing production in Latin America is a generally desirable objective. The objective of this proposal, however, has already been attained, and indeed exceeded considerably. For the past decade or so output has increased faster than population, a fact reflected in the 3 per cent annual increase in per capita production in Latin America, which is somewhat higher than the long time United States average.

3. Urge Latin American governments to seek a more equitable distribution of income.

Comment:
A positive statement on more equitable distribution of income would probably be desirable at Rio. FOA, however, has in mind increasing emphasis on production of consumer goods, housing, minimum wage legislation, etc. There is a serious question as to whether we could appropriately push the Latin American governments to take such specific measures while urging them to mobilize more of their capital resources for economic development. Instead of specifying the measures they should take toward this objective, we should limit ourselves to a general statement somewhat along the following lines: In order to increase the standard of living of the population, it is essential that the benefits of increased production be shared equitably.

4. (a) Latin American countries should be fully responsible for their own development planning; recommended that they set up planning agencies as resolved at Caracas (Resolution No. 72).

Comment:
Agree that the countries themselves should be responsible for their development planning. As there is already a resolution (Caracas) recommending the setting up of planning agencies, no further action along these lines seems to be called for.

(b) Recommend establishment of Joint Development Commissions to coordinate United States financing and United States technical cooperation with Latin American development goals.

Comment:

In the minds of Latin American governments and peoples, plans prepared by a joint body including official United States participation imply a United States commitment to provide for the necessary financing of such plans. We have had experience with two Joint Commissions in Latin America, in Brazil and Paraguay. Our activities in Paraguay have not been of sufficient scope to make effective use of such an organization, and after a period of rather innocuous performance, several months ago it was terminated. In Brazil we made an aggressive effort to carry on joint planning, but after about two years we felt it advisable to terminate it [4] following some strained moments in our relations with that country as a result of her disappointment in not getting the necessary financing for the plans formulated by this Commission. We should not, however, exclude the possibly that with improvement in this device, and under more favorable conditions, it could become a useful tool for guiding and stimulating economic development in some countries.

(c) Assign full-time FOA industrial or economic advisers to appraise each country's potential for development.

Comment:

It seems to us that this is a matter to be resolved by the United States and the countries individually, depending on the nature of the program we carry on in a particular country. It is doubtful that any useful purpose would be served by a United States pronouncement on this matter at Rio.

5. Recommend setting up a mechanism for regional review of country plans.

Comment:

This proposal envisages the possible application of the Colombo Plan [5] to Latin America, assigning the review and coordinating functions involved, however, to IA-ECOSOC rather than to an ad hoc group. (In the Colombo Plan, review and coordination, if any, are performed at the annual meeting of the Consultative Committee, which has no permanent secretariat. It is essentially an occasion for the representatives of the member countries to exchange ideas regarding their development programs.) While on its face, regional review of country programs might seem useful, it would require a stronger case than there is in the FOA paper to merit its inclusion in our program for Rio.

II. Financing.

6. (a) Emphasize that private investment, whether domestic or foreign, must be the main source of development capital in Latin America and that Latin America take appropriate measures to encourage this investment.

---

[4] For documentation relating to the termination of the Joint Brazil–United States Economic Development Commission, see pp. 609 ff.

[5] Reference is to the Colombo Plan for Economic Development in South and Southeast Asia, which comprised a number of related long-term national development plans officially initiated in 1951 by the nations of the British Commonwealth; for documentation concerning U.S. interest in the plan, see volume XII.

(b) Recommended establishment of bilateral and multilateral banks to help finance domestic investment in Latin America, or Alternatively that FOA foster the establishment of national development financing agencies. These should be domestically capitalized, but supplemented by IBRD, Export–Import Bank loans, private investment, grants and local currency counter-part funds.

Comments:

(a) We are in wholehearted accord with the substance of this proposal. It should be implicit in our discussions with the Latin American countries that we look primarily to American private investment to assist them in pursuing their economic development goals. It would appear advisable, however, to soft-pedal our public statements in this regard, as we have made the point time and time again and it leaves the impression that the United States must invest abroad for its own benefit.

(b) We also agree with the objective of this proposal. We should encourage devices to stimulate local savings and channel such savings into more productive kinds of investment. At the time we cannot help having some doubt about the advisability of our entering into the ownership and administration of bilateral development banks. Our participation in such activities might have unfortunate public relations repercussions. Our experience with such institutions in Bolivia, Ecuador and Haiti during the last war and the immediate post-war years should make us wary of such ventures.

We also have doubts about the advisability of our participating in a multilateral bank for Latin America. It may be assumed that all of the Latin American countries would wish to employ at home such resources as they have available for economic development. There is no indication that an Inter-American Bank would be able to attract the necessary capital from private sources in the United States, and in the absence of private United States capital the financing of this institution would fall almost entirely on the United States Government.

Our efforts might better be directed toward the other suggested alternative of encouraging national development banks organized primarily with domestic capital to be supplemented, where desirable, by IBRD, Export–Import Bank and other loans. There are institutions of this nature in Latin America, and in many cases the need is primarily to improve existing institutions. United States participation in the management of such banks, to the extent necessary, could be achieved, as IBRD has done, through a technical advisor or his equivalent.

7. Encourage United States private foreign investment by improved investment climate, more favorable United States tax laws and greater use of investment guaranties.

Comment:

The FOA paper proposes calling the Latin American governments' attention to Contact Clearing House Service in FOA's Office of Small Business. This seems to be a desirable adjunct to encouraging private investment abroad, but its importance seems to be over-emphasized. It would be helpful if we could have an appraisal of the effectiveness of this Service to date. In this connection, recognition should be given to the older, more far-reaching (and probably, more effective) services of the Department of Commerce.

Tax Laws. We have always rejected, as the paper rightly recommends, the contention that the United States has no right to tax income earned abroad by its citizens and corporations.

Since the Administration's tax proposals are now in the legislative mill, the Committee's consideration of tax measures would seem to be more appropriate at a future date. It would be more appropriate to discuss the subject of taxes on the basis of a Treasury paper.

Investment Guaranty. The extension of the FOA Investment Guaranty Program [6] to Latin America has been unsuccessful for several reasons, among which are:

(a) The feeling among Latin American countries that guaranties have little incentive effect and

(b) the reaction that the proposed guaranty agreements, particularly as regards expropriation, are a reflection both on the country's good faith and its sovereignty. There is some feeling that if the guaranty program were limited in Latin America to the transfer risk, it might be more palatable.

Export Credit Facilities. There is some feeling that additional export credit facilities are needed (1) to equalize the position of United States exporters in Latin American markets with that of foreign exporters who are able to offer better credit terms and (2) to enable Latin American importers to purchase goods on the basis of price rather than credit terms. A study of the possibilities of an export credit guaranty would be desirable.

8. Public Lending. Expand IBRD and Eximbank development loans, announce the general magnitude of such possible expansion, and coordinate these loans with the objectives of country plans through Bank representation on proposed joint Commissions.

Comment:

The IBRD should certainly be encouraged to increase activity in Latin America, but the most useful effort toward this end would be for the Latin American countries to prepare sound development projects and submit them to that Bank. With regard to expansion by the Export-Import Bank, the new Administration proposal is a move in that direction. In regard to the recommendation on announcing the general magnitude of possible loan expansion, it may be recalled that some months ago in preparing for Caracas the Department was in favor of some general 5-year target along these lines, and that due to Treasury's objection, the idea was dropped. Any application of this proposal would, of course, be feasible only in terms of regional and not country magnitude.

[6] Under the investment guaranty program, initiated in 1948, the U.S. Government provided, for a fee, insurance protection for American investors abroad against the risks of loss through confiscation or expropriation and currency inconvertibility. For documentation concerning the initiation of the program, see Foreign Relations, 1949, vol. I, pp. 631 ff. For additional information, see Staff Papers Presented to the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy (Washington, 1954), pp. 126–134.

9. Increase United States grant and soft loan assistance.

Comment:
We should be prepared to meet unusual situations, such as exist in Bolivia, where temporarily grant financing may be appropriate. No case has, however, been made for a general use of economic aid either in the form of soft loans or grants.

III. Technical Cooperation.

10. Expand technical cooperation programs, and reorientate these programs to focus more directly on economic development objectives.

Comment:
The proposal is that instead of concentrating on agriculture, health and education, as FOA and its predecessors have done in Latin America, the future emphasis should be on activities more directly contributing to economic development such as industrial technology and public administration. We assume that the new program would still include agriculture.

Actually, FOA has provided some technical assistance in industry and public administration in Latin America on a modest scale. The stepping up of activity in these fields would, it seems to us, be a valuable contribution to development effort in Latin America. Serious consideration should, however, be given to the question as to whether we should really capitalize on this proposal in Rio without having some assurance beforehand that the United States will actually be in a position to make good on this offer to Latin America. Under existing agreements we have undertaken to staff a number of projects for which we have been unable to provide the necessary technicians.

Some caution will be required in our activities in the public administration field. This is a sensitive area, and many countries prefer to receive such assistance through the UN—even though the technicians employed may be United States nationals.

Purpose of the Meeting

Mr. Stassen called this special meeting of FOA personnel to discuss the guidelines needed for the Rio Conference and some of the issues that will probably be raised there. He explained that one of the reasons for analyzing the situation at this meeting was to consider whether it is appropriate to have the policy guidelines developed at a lower level, with all the preconceived limitations that exist, or whether it is necessary to have some early, Cabinet-level attention given to the need for broad guidelines on our Latin American policy.

Conclusions

(1) We need early reference to the Cabinet level, to get some very important guidelines for the Rio Conference established.

(2) FOA representatives should not consent, in working groups or in the Sub-Cabinet Committee, to any inadequate recommendations or measures; if necessary, FOA representatives should reserve their position so that there may be an appeal later.

(3) FOA believes that the U.S. economic policy toward Latin America is inadequate and that from that inadequacy are coming and will continue to come very serious political and security problems; therefore it is very important that the U.S. develop a new, adequate policy.

(4) Some regional economic approaches in this hemisphere are past due; and we will not get a correct psychological attitude in Latin America unless there is evolved a method for multilateral work on economic problems and financial considerations.

Discussion

Mr. Hardesty said that the first five meetings of the Sub-Cabinet Committee were devoted almost exclusively to a general discussion of the broad philosophy of what could be done at the conference and the position the U.S. should take. The Committee is now considering the FOA staff report which is considered the basic document from which a position will be developed.

Mr. Stassen asked Mr. Hardesty what three things the Latin American governments want from the conference. Mr. Hardesty said the first is psychological—they want the U.S. to give them treatment in development financing that is equal to that given to other areas of the world; second, the formation of a Pan American Bank, and third a floor under prices paid for their commodities.

Mr. Hardesty expressed concern that it appears to be the viewpoint of many members of the Sub-Cabinet Committee that we should be ready with a defense at Rio, anticipating how we can throw back the Latin American requests, rather than to have a positive approach as to what we have to offer. Mr. Buck said that rather than being on the defensive at the conference we should take the offensive by pointing out to the Latin American countries the steps which they should or must take to improve their economies and stating that after those steps are taken we are prepared to cooperate with them in certain stated ways.

1. Financing Economic Development

Dr. FitzGerald said that the central question is whether and to what extent the U.S. will commit itself to arrangements which look toward larger developmental resources for Latin America. Unless there are compelling reasons for establishing U.S. institutions in addition to IBRD and the EXIM Bank, our effort should be concentrated on developing, prior to the Rio Conference, a more liberal policy toward EXIM loans to Latin America. There will be procedural difficulties in preparing a statement that the U.S. will assist in further economic development in Latin America in return for the Latin American countries' taking a number of steps which will be difficult politically and for which in many instances they do not have the necessary administrative competence. Basically the question that must be decided before the Rio Conference is whether the U.S. is going to make any additional loans, primarily loans for developmental assistance, and under what conditions.

Mr. Buck said there has been considerable pressure for a more liberal EXIM Bank policy with respect to loans, particularly export loans, but he felt it would be very difficult to get the Bank to state a maximum amount that they would be willing to put into Latin America without knowing in advance the conditions of the loans. He said he thought there were great possibilities in S/TIM's proposal that the EXIM Bank utilize the South American branch offices of U.S. banks to make development loans and that this proposal should be put forward at the Rio Conference. (Note: This proposal is mentioned briefly on page 14 of the FOA Staff Report [2] and is expected to be discussed this week [3] with the Export-Import Bank.)

Mr. Stassen said there are some who feel that governmental loans or credits are a substitute for and a block to private investment for developmental undertakings and that he did not believe this was necessarily so.

Action: He asked Mr. Doggett to have RS&R prepare a list [4] showing the Latin American countries which have received EXIM Bank or IBRD credits over a period of years and which countries have received private foreign investment, indicating the volume of each type of financing; and to analyze these data to see if there is any indication whether governmental credit for development facilities expanded or contracted private investment.

2. The Regional Approach

Mr. Stassen said he believed the Latin American countries want to move in a regional direction and to have more regional relationships of an economic nature and that our government has had a firm position against such a move. He added that he felt we have been and are in grave danger of continuing to be totally inadequate in our approach to Latin American economic problems and that a new approach could only be achieved at the Cabinet level, with the President.

We will not get the psychological attitude we want to have in Latin America unless there comes out of the Rio Conference some sort of regional arrangement that has developed as a result of Latin American desires and U.S. interest in them. Our discouraging such a development would create an unfavorable attitude because they know of the successful regional development in Europe on an economic basis.

Mr. Roseman pointed out that the creation of regional institutions presents related problems such as the availability of private and public capital for investment and the possibility of developing a mutual self-encouraging and self-policing review of economic development planning.

Mr. Russell [5] said that if there exists any master analysis of what is needed to reorganize and advance the economies of Latin America it should be possible to pick out long-term as well as shorter-term objectives; and if there were some pieces of a long-term program that could be rather easily effected we might concentrate on them.

[3] No record of this discussion was found in Department of State files.

[4] Not found in Department of State files; for information concerning the total amount of loans to Latin American countries by the Export-Import Bank and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, see the minutes of the 214th meeting of the National Advisory Council, Sept. 22, 1954, p. 250.

[5] Presumably William F. Russell, Acting Deputy Director for Technical Services.

Mr. Hardesty said that the Sub-Cabinet Committee group has brought out the point that our dealings with Latin American countries should be on a bilateral basis. Mr. Stassen said that probably one of their objections to the development of a regional or continental approach is the view that such an arrangement would impose a handicap on the facilitation of worldwide trade and payments; but the strength we built in Europe has facilitated a broader worldwide flow of goods rather than handicapped it.

Mr. Stassen then raised the question of the United States indicating a social conscience in relationship to the people of Latin America by supporting a progressive approach to an advance in the standard of living of the people as a whole, supporting such things as minimum wages and opposing current semi-slave labor conditions. If we do not help an evolution of this type, the impetus of social justice will be seized by the Communists and used to promote their system.

3. Position on Materials and Commodities

Mr. Stassen said another problem to consider is U.S. policy on raw materials and commodities.[6] The discussion in the Sub-Cabinet Committee appears to have been far more limited than Dr. Eisenhower's position. There is a question of basic policy involved as to whether we should have more than a stockpile approach, whether we should bring into it such elements as other countries' foreign exchange requirements, their need for some stability in their prices, and the world balance of payments situation. We must go into the Rio Conference with more than a statement of sympathetic consideration because in the past they have not had sympathetic consideration. Of course this problem goes beyond the matter of Latin American policy; it is a matter of U.S. raw materials policy.

Mr. Trisko said we have been limited in what we could say on this subject by the general U.S. policy with regard to commodity stabilization measures, which is a conservative approach. In ECOSOC we are preparing again to take a negative stand on this subject. Mr. Stassen said the Administration may want to review its commodity policy again, in the light of the Latin American problem, and that we should not feel completely tied by the pre-existing commodity policy.

Mr. Stassen suggested the possibility of developing consultative bodies on basic raw materials. The groups would consist of representatives of major producers and major consumers who, without commodity agreements to limit production or agreements to purchase, would try to narrow the chart fluctuations. He had in mind that these bodies would be under government auspices and would consist of private individuals representing producers and consumers, with government representatives participating. Mr. Hardesty pointed out that Latin America is interested basically in a hemispheric approach rather than a world-wide approach. Mr. Stassen said there could not be a hemispheric approach on such basic materials as tin or copper. Mr. Trisko said that we should try to deflect the Latin American countries from concentrating on this particular aspect of their problem as a solution to all problems.

4. NSC-144/1 [7]

General Porter [8] said that Mr. Holland (State) has indicated that he was not certain the NSC document on Latin America needs to be revised at this time; but General Porter has been putting forward the FOA view that it should be revised. Mr. Stassen asked if any of the attendees felt that the U.S. now has an adequate economic policy in relationship to Latin America. None did. General Porter said that this subject might well be raised in the NSC meeting on June 24,[9] when there will be a discussion on stockpile materials and their influence on commodity prices, and on regional economic arrangements.

The meeting adjourned at 12:25 p.m.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 19, 1954.

Subject: The Sub-Cabinet Committee for the Rio Economic Conference

1. The following information pertaining to the Sub-Cabinet Committee for the Rio Economic Conference may be of interest to you as background for your luncheon tomorrow with Mr. Holland.

2. After 10 meetings of the Sub-Cabinet Committee, I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that the results of its work will prove inadequate. Only a few additional meetings are scheduled and I believe that when the final policy decisions are related to the needs of the situation, the Committee's work will remain almost fruitless unless it is given the benefit of higher level directives.

3. Only two policy statements [1] have been finalized: the first recognizes the need on the part of most Latin American countries to improve their economic development planning and programming, and affirms the role of technical cooperation in such planning and programming, subject to numerous qualifying and inhibiting conditions; the second recognizes that "development banks" may serve useful functions, but again, the qualifications would make effective implementation difficult.

4. I have been pressing for two over-all policy objectives which have found practically no recognition by the Committee:

a. U.S. national interest requires a faster rate of economic development throughout Latin America. Accordingly, there is the need to give new direction and amplification to technical assistance programs, on a planned country basis, toward the achievement of improved living standards by means of greatly accelerated economic development.

b. It should be an objective of the United States to undertake to strengthen the present system of economic development financing by providing the missing component in essential capital needs through expansion of IBRD and Eximbank lending as a necessary stimulant or supplement to private investment. Also, consideration should be given to FOA development assistance advances.

5. So far, there has been little disposition to relate the recommendations of Dr. Milton Eisenhower [2] (the basis of FOA's position) to the formulation of our economic policy toward Latin America. Both Commerce and Treasury representatives on the Committee accompanied Dr. Eisenhower on his trip. However, his recommendations, I understand, represented his own conclusions rather than those of his party.

6. With respect to financing economic development, FOA and State support a level of public loans up to $1 billion over the next few years for essential projects which do not attract private capital, the idea being that IBRD would be the first bank or recourse for such lending but that Eximbank and FOA would make up the difference for sound projects to the extent to which IBRD did not lend. The proposal is most vigorously opposed by Commerce and Treasury representatives on these grounds:

a. Any mention of a figure is tantamount to a commitment.

b. It is impossible to forecast the creditworthiness of Latin America.

[1] Neither printed.

[2] Reference is to the set of recommendations contained in Dr. Eisenhower's report submitted to President Eisenhower under date of Nov. 18, 1953, which resulted from the factfinding tour to South America that he conducted for the President between June 23 and July 29, 1953. Regarding Dr. Eisenhower's trip and his report, see the editorial note, p. 196, and Mr. Bennett's memorandum, Aug. 20, 1954, p. 229.

c. Latin America knows that there is an unlimited source of financing in the United States, including IBRD and Eximbank; the inference is that the banks will look at such projects as are brought forward and relate them to the extent to which Latin American countries put their financial houses in order to enhance creditworthiness.

7. I feel a directive is needed which will say, not "how little can we do to appease Latin American desires for economic cooperation with the United States?", but "how much must we do to insure the security of the United States?", as both the time and opportunity to do this are running out.

8. There is a clear indication that the technical agencies participating in the Technical Cooperation Program are working toward independence from FOA in their operations. This cumulative self-interest could eventually eliminate FOA.

MSA–FOA Director's files, FRC 56 A 632, "Rio Economic Conference"

Memorandum by John C. Cady of the Office of Latin American Operations to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration (Stassen)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 27, 1954.

Subject: Policies Developed by the Sub-Cabinet Committee on the Rio Economic Conference

At its nineteenth meeting on August 20, the subject Committee adjourned until sometime in October, when it will consider the individual position papers on Rio agenda items which are to be prepared by the Interdepartmental Committee on Latin American Economic Affairs (EA), pursuant to the policies developed by the Committee. The EA Committee, which includes FOA representation, will have its first meeting today—August 27.

The policies developed by the Sub-Cabinet Committee may be summarized as follows:

A. Programming of Economic Development and Role of Technical Cooperation

1. Favors the establishment of national agencies, where lacking, to prepare economic development programs, fix priorities and coordinate public and private investment. Endorses technical assistance in this type of activity (including the very limited use of joint commissions).

2. Adopted the position that United States should take the initiative at Rio in proposing that discussion of development programming and related problems of member countries be placed on the agenda for the 1955 annual meeting of IA–ECOSOC. The hope is that a realistic exchange of views on common problems will result in more effective development planning and programming.

3. Accepted the principle that technical cooperation has reached a stage of development in Latin America which requires broadening and more long-range planning. Endorsed the concept that it is the United States' intention to proceed, subject to the interest and participation of the other country and availability of personnel and funds, with actual planning of activities for that period of years appropriate to the particular program from the viewpoint of the contribution it can make to balanced economic development.

B. Financing of Economic Development

1. Adopted the position that the economic development of Latin American countries will be best served by adherence to the principles of the private enterprise system; that the United States should exert constant but discreet practical pressure in favor of private initiative. Measures toward that end would include expanded use of Eximbank to assist private enterprise; technical assistance, preferably through private channels, and encouragement to private United States firms and business associations (also IBRD) to develop more productive programs for promoting private enterprise.

2. Proposes the announcement that (a) the United States is prepared to conclude as promptly as possible appropriate agreements for the avoidance of international double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion, urging the Latin American States to be more receptive to the United States' proposal to negotiate such agreements, and (b) the United States will continue to explore measures that will progressively reduce and eliminate international double taxation and avoid discriminatory or unduly burdensome taxation and thereby encourage the flow of private capital to countries which by their own tax regimes and other policies are attractive to United States capital.

3. Endorses the position that IBRD is the primary source of development financing for projects not attractive to private capital. Proposes the annoucement at Rio that Eximbank, within its prudent lending capacity, will supplement IBRD lending to the extent necessary to satisfy all applications for the financing of sound development projects which are in our common interest and which are not being financed by IBRD. This lending will depend to a very considerable extent upon the degree to which the other country desires to obtain private and public capital and takes "house-in-order" actions to attract it. (The Committee, with FOA reserving its position, considered that the foregoing, plus the flow of private capital, would satisfy all development financing needs, and it did not therefore accept the proposal of utilizing FOA development advances as loans or grants, nor did it accept the concept of United States loan assistance to create a Latin American Development Bank to finance small industries and a Latin American Clearing House to facilitate convertibility.)

4. Recognizes, subject to limiting qualifications, that a useful function can be performed in some cases by "national development banks" in mobilizing domestic capital and promoting economic development, and that in such cases United States assistance may be appropriate through loans and other means as circumstances may warrant in each case.

C. International Trade and Price Stabilization

1. Considers that special measures are not needed to maintain an equitable relationship between the prices of primary products and those of manufactures, nor that an international price parity system is a practical possibility. Normal market prices can be relied upon to achieve fair and equitable price relationships.

2. Places more reliance upon normal corrective forces through the market price mechanism than on special measures such as buffer stocks and commodity agreements which would be made use of only in exceptional cases, the burden of the proof of feasibility and effectiveness to rest with the proponents of the measure.

3. Adopted the position that the long-term stockpiling policy should not be presented at Rio as a significant solution to the price stabilization problem and that the delegation should confine itself to the statement that a stockpiling program is being developed which is likely to have some tendency in the direction of greater stability of world prices.

4. Supports GATT,[1] hopes that countries which are not members will join, and endorses the aims to change the organizational provisions and trade rules of the GATT to make it a simpler and stronger instrument for international cooperation and the expansion of international trade.

5. Considers participation in COCOM [2] and CG by Latin American Governments as unwarranted since the problems of concern to participants are those of highly industrialized economies heavily engaged in exporting advanced technological items. (In accordance with Caracas Resolution LXXV [3] recommending ample exchange of views on restrictions on trade in strategic raw materials, discussions are under way with certain of the Latin American governments regarding controls over exports to the Soviet Bloc.)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 1, 1954.

Subject: "Talking Paper" for NSC Meeting [2]

For several years in policy papers, in meetings and in public announcements the United States has been talking about how important its relations with Latin America are and about how we are going to start doing something to demonstrate our interest in the area.

It is my impression that when we get around to economics our performance has been largely verbal. I ask myself when we are going to start doing something about our relations in these countries and how long we are going to expect them to be satisfied with fine phrases.

The very narrow escape that we had in the Guatemala crisis has centered public and congressional attention on Latin America. The public and the Congress feel strongly that this Government has got to do whatever is necessary to bring these countries closer to us. In the economic field those policies are going to be weighed and measured at the forthcoming conference beginning in Rio de Janeiro on November 22.

I believe that we can go to Rio with policies that will make that meeting a success.

The subject that interests the Latins more than any other one is the question of trade barriers.

The people of Latin America are obsessed with a determination to strengthen their economies and improve living standards. The insistence of the governments on stronger economies is simply a reflection of this very strong feeling among the people.

The government leaders fully understand the obvious fact that Latin America cannot achieve much economic progress unless she trades with the United States. Therefore, the No. 1 problem at Rio is going to be the question of trade barriers. If we convince the Latins that the policy of this Administration will be to avoid tariff increases, quotas, and other trade barriers which would reduce existing levels of inter-

American trade and that our policy would be one of gradual, selective reduction of trade barriers, they will be fully satisfied on this score. That happens to be the policy the President set out in his message to Congress on foreign economic policy of March 30.[3]

The next most important subject will be that of government finance. If we convince the Latins that there will actually be a more liberal policy on the part of the Export-Import Bank; that we are going to make loans available under the conditions outlined in the Planning Board recommendation, we believe that the Latin Americans will be satisfied on this point. In other words, if they are assured of a liberal Export-Import Bank policy I do not feel that grant aid or so-called "soft loans" [4] are going to be necessary. To be effective this policy is going to have to be stated very positively. I think within the limits of the Planning Board paper which are pretty strict and include that of the lending capacity of the Bank we should say that we are prepared to meet the entire demand.

The important thing about our policies on these two points, trade and government credit, is going to be the subjective intent of the men who are implementing those policies. I think we should determine here and now whether we do in fact intend to try to prevent any increase in trade barriers which will reduce existing volumes of trade, and whether it is in fact the intention of this Government that the Export-Import Bank will pursue a substantially more liberal policy. If so, then I believe that these policies can be so stated to the Latin Americans as to satisfy them at Rio.

Another point that will be important at Rio is whether the United States Government is going to engage in any sort of a price stabilization program to assure minimum prices for the principal products of Latin America. I believe that the Latin Americans understand that we cannot undertake such a program, and that our failure to do so will not jeopardize the success of the Rio Conference.

The Latin Americans are going to be interested in our continuing our programs of technical aid, and I believe that our policies on this are sound.

A concrete example of the sufficiency of these policies to make a success of the Rio meeting is the case of Mexico. Until early this year our relations with Mexico were decidedly unsatisfactory. Today they are better than they have been in several years. There are four reasons for this. First, the Mexican Government was startled at the strong unfavorable reaction of its own people regarding Mexico's stand on the anti-Communist resolution at Caracas. Second, the Government was startled at the very strong adverse public reaction to its devaluation of the peso. Third, the granting of an International Bank loan to rehabilitate the Southern Pacific Railroad of Mexico is interpreted as evidencing a favorable lending policy on behalf of this Government even if it was the International Bank. Fourth, the President's decision to refuse to raise the tariffs on lead and zinc [5] has been accepted in Mexico as proof that the President's stated policy on expanding foreign trade will in fact be followed in this hemisphere.

I believe that the policies which have produced this result in Mexico will be adequate generally in the hemisphere if Latin America is convinced that we will follow them in good faith.

These points obviously don't add up to a complete foreign policy for Latin America, but they are the most important features of an economic policy.

110.15 HO/9–1954

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Woodward) [1]

SECRET BUENOS AIRES, September 19, 1954.

DEAR BOB: In every country I am, of course, trying to take up and achieve approval of our policies outlined for the Rio conference. In general my approach is along more or less the following lines:

Throughout the Hemisphere there is intense popular interest in the improvement of living standards as regards income, housing, education, nutrition, and so forth. Our governments must coordinate their efforts to convince the American peoples that within the free enterprise system they can hope to satisfy this aspiration.

The basic problem that we must study are the means to achieve this purpose.

The overwhelming majority of the burden of this task [sic] must rest upon the people and government of each state. However, each state should make a determined effort to contribute in accordance with its own capacity to the efforts of the other American States in this regard.

[1] Between Sept. 5 and Oct. 10, 1954, Mr. Holland visited Mexico and all of the countries of South America for the purpose of explaining to and gaining acceptance among the leaders of the respective governments for the policies developed by the Sub-Cabinet Committee in preparation for the Rio Economic Conference.

Since the Caracas conference we have given intense study to the contribution which our own Government can make. In general, we feel that it falls in three categories:

1. Commerce

We feel that through intensified inter-American trade more than by any other means the nations can help strengthen their economies in order to achieve the basic goal indicated above. It will be our own policy to seek the expansion and stabilization of inter-American trade. To that end we shall seek the gradual, selective reduction of such barriers as tariffs and quotas.

In this connection I always point out that there are very strong sectors within our own people and Government who are sincerely opposed to general specific efforts in this field; that, therefore, our performance may not be uniformly consistent with those announced policies, but that it will be the basic guide to our actions.

I cite as instances of the application of this policy the President's decisions with respect to tung oil and the lead and zinc case. In this latter case I emphasize his statement to the effect that he would not achieve the obvious benefits to our local industry at the cost of substantial prejudice to friendly suppliers of lead and zinc.

2. Government Finance

I state that we believe in the private enterprise system. Not because of any peculiar sanctity, but because it has demonstrated itself to be the best vehicle for efficient production of goods and services yet known. I argue that the bulk of the capital needed for economic development should come from private sources, particularly those within the countries. The United States Government recognizes, however, that private capital is not available for many desirable economic development projects. The International Bank, an excellent institution, was created to meet this need and it would be short-sighted not to utilize its services to the utmost. Accordingly, it should be the first source of governmental finance for projects in which private capital is not interested. We recognize that there will be many sound projects which lie beyond the scope of the normal activity of the IBRD.[2] With respect to these the policy of our Government will be through the Export–Import Bank to satisfy all applications for economic development loans which satisfy the following requirements:

a. Projects for which neither private capital nor local governmental capital [3] is not available and which lie without the scope of activity of the IBRD,

[2] The words "Export–Import Bank" were crossed out here and IBRD added by hand.
[3] The words "neither" and "nor local governmental capital" were added by hand.

b. Projects which are economically sound and are within the interest of both Governments, and

c. Projects whose amount exceeds neither the sound borrowing capacity of the applicant nor the lending capacity of the Bank.

It is our judgment that the lending capacity of the Ex-Im Bank is and will continue to be adequate to assure implementation of this policy.

The United States recognizes that there are sincere factors [sic] in Latin America who urge broad grant-aid programs or the granting of unsound loans. We feel that such programs of aid would demoralize our private institutions and businesses. Our experiences in Italy and in certain other areas of the world have satisfied us that such aid programs are not the best means either to strengthen local economies or to combat Communism.

3. Technical Aid

It will be our policy to expand and diversify technical aid, always respecting the wishes of the Governments affected both as regards the amount and the nature of our aid.

In Venezuela both the President [4] and Foreign Minister [5] assured me they would take the position that in these policies the United States has fully fulfilled the expectations of that Government. In Brazil the Ministers of Foreign Affairs [6] and of Finance [7] both gave us the same assurances. There, there were a number of officials including Roberto Campos, the Brazilian Consul General in Los Angeles and certain others in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs who state that this policy would provoke wide resentment as falling short of the value of aid generally expected. However, the two Ministers mentioned and assured us that by direct personal contacts they will undertake to convince the heads of other delegations that these policies are sound and reflect the most that should be expected of the United States.

In Uruguay the Minister of Finance [8] assured us that these policies satisfy the expectations of his Government and that their delegation will support us. We were given the same assurances by the President [9] and the Minister of Finance [10] in Paraguay. In a conference this morning with President Perón he stated emphatically that these policies were fully adequate, and that any policy of extensive grant-aid would be positively harmful to our prestige and relations in the Hemisphere.

"I believe you will agree that the approach taken by Mr. Holland is very sound and clear. However, I wonder if you share my apprehension concerning the possibility that he may be too sanguine that the NSC policy on loans by the Export-Import Bank will actually be carried out. I am afraid that we will never have a clearly established policy with respect to the use of the Export-Import Bank for economic development until we obtain clear-cut Congressional sanction for this purpose. Under the authorizing law, the purpose of the Bank is to facilitate exports and imports. We have had recurring struggles in order to use the Bank as an instrument of foreign policy and economic development, because there is no clear-cut Congressional sanction for these purposes." An undated note initialed by Mr. Hoover is attached to Mr. Woodward's memorandum and it reads as follows: "Return to ARA. Thanks, it looks encouraging."

Paper Prepared by the Latin American Working Group of the Operations Coordinating Board [1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 11, 1954.

SPECIAL REPORT ON PROPOSED U.S. POSITIONS FOR THE RIO CONFERENCE

A subcabinet committee is now preparing proposed U.S. position papers for the conference on U.S.-Latin American economic relations to be held at Rio de Janeiro starting November 22, 1954. While the papers are still undergoing revision, it is understood that the committee has decided upon the general policies which they reflect. The Working Group has studied the proposed position papers in the light of NSC 5432/1.[2] The purpose of this report is to call to the attention of the OCB cases in which the Working Group believes the proposed positions fall short of carrying out adequately the objectives and policies of NSC 5432/1.

I. General Need to Reflect a Broadened and More Constructive Policy

The Working Group understands NSC 5432/1 to envisage a broadened, more constructive and more affirmative U.S. economic policy toward Latin America as an essential measure for achieving basic U.S. objectives in that region. It is the opinion of the Working Group that, in the over-all, the presently proposed subcabinet position papers do not provide such an affirmative economic policy. The considerations which we have relied on in forming this judgment are these:

a. If the policies enumerated at Rio are to be successful in promoting basic U.S. objectives, as set forth in NSC 5432/1, they must: (1) actually make an effective and substantial contribution to the improvement of economic conditions in Latin America; (2) convince the predominant, reasonable elements in Latin America that the U.S. is genuinely interested in promoting the welfare and progress of that region.

b. Hemisphere solidarity may be jeopardized if the U.S. evades or procrastinates. Latin America will press for, and U.S. should try as far as possible to give forthright answers to Latin American proposals either by accepting them, rejecting them or offering realistic alternatives.

c. While Latin America may propose many changes in U.S. policy, the predominant, reasonable elements in Latin America will not expect the U.S. to accept all of those new policies. These elements, however, will not be satisfied with what they would consider simply a reaffirmation of present U.S. policies. To convince those elements that the U.S. is genuinely interested in promoting the welfare and progress of that region, the U.S. must broaden and clarify some of its present policies.

The Working Group believes that the U.S. position for the Rio Conference should be made more effective by taking a more positive stand regarding U.S. assistance to national and regional efforts for economic development.

In particular, the Working Group believes that the present position papers do not adequately carry out specific courses of action outlined in NSC 5432/1 which would serve this end. Examples are listed in Section II of this memorandum.

II. Need to Carry out Specific Courses of Action Outlined in NSC 5432/1

a. Paragraph 9*c.* of NSC 5432/1 states that, only if stable, long-term trading policies by the U.S. and financing of sound economic development projects by private capital, IBRD and EXIM Bank prove inadequate, the U.S. should finance through development assistance loans the initiation or acceleration of projects in the U.S. interest.

The presently proposed subcabinet position is that the U.S. will give no indication of the possibility of U.S. development loans outside the EXIM Bank at the Rio Conference, but will simply reaffirm its present policy that the U.S., through the EXIM Bank, will supplement the lending of the International Bank to the extent necessary to fulfill all applications meeting the criteria enumerated by Secretary Dulles at Caracas.

FOA, for example, plans to propose the following to the subcabinet committee as a substitute position:

"The United States, through the Export-Import Bank, will supplement the lending of the International Bank for economic development purposes to the extent necessary to satisfy all applications for loans meeting the criteria enumerated by Secretary Dulles at Caracas. In addition the U.S. should offer to match funds up to $100,000,000 for the establishment of a Latin America Bank for economic development which would be under Latin American management and would make loans for projects not eligible for IBRD or Export-Import Bank financing."

There is an apparent difference as to interpretation of paragraph 9*c.* which is important to the position to be taken at Rio. Under one view, it can now be said that the other sources are inadequate—particularly since the EXIM Bank charter apparently permits financing only projects involving the export of U.S. capital—and that, under paragraph 9*c.*, the U.S. should now undertake to finance development projects in the U.S. interest which are not financed by EXIM Bank or other sources. The other view is that paragraph 9*c.* contemplates a substantial test period in which to determine the adequacy of the other sources before the U.S. considers providing development loans outside present EXIM Bank policies.

The Working Group believes that U.S. economic policy toward Latin America would be made more constructive and effective, as envisaged by NSC 5432/1, if an interpretation were made that the U.S. is now prepared, under specified conditions, to provide development loans for projects not eligible for EXIM Bank financing, and if this position were announced at Rio.

b. Paragraph 9*g.* of NSC 5432/1 states that the U.S. should:

"g. Consider sympathetically, but only on individual merit, any proposal by Latin American initiative to create regional economic actions and groupings to promote increased trade, technical cooperation and investment, and to concert sound development plans."

It is anticipated that the Latin American nations will offer at Rio a number of proposals for regional economic actions and groupings to promote trade and development. The Working Group questions whether the positions recommended by the subcabinet committee regarding such anticipated proposals, or similar proposals suggested by U.S. agencies, reflect the "sympathetic consideration" which paragraph 9*c.* contemplates.

The committee, for example, rejected a proposed U.S. position favoring establishment of a Latin American Bank for Economic Development to which the U.S. would match up to $100 million of the original capital contributed by Latin American individuals or governments but would leave the management in Latin American hands. The committee also rejected a proposed U.S. position favoring the establishment of a regional Payments Union to which the U.S. would loan $50,000,000 for the initial swing account.

The two regional actions which the subcabinet committee has decided to favor are: (1) annual regional discussions of development programs and (2) discussions of possible hemisphere preferential trade arrangements.

The Working Group questions whether the predetermined positions on regional actions to promote trade and development, which appear largely to be negative, are adequate to meet the intent of paragraph 9*g.* of NSC 5432/1.

c. Subsequent to the preparation of the position papers by the subcabinet committee, NSC 5432/1 was approved by the President. Courses of action enumerated therein included paragraphs 9*d.* and 9*h.*, the contents of which were not found in the older policy paper on this area (NSC 144/1). It is, of course, anticipated that the subcabinet committee will take under consideration the utilization of the authority in the Agriculture Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 [3] (paragraph 9*h.*). Along these same lines, the delegation should be provided with concrete proposals for increased specialized training of Latin Americans in the U.S. in the fields of finance, labor, management, agriculture, business and other specialized fields as a means of achieving economic development in the area (paragraph 9*d.*).

Recommendation: The Working Group recommends that the OCB consider whether the proposed U.S. positions for the Rio Conference fall short of the objectives and policies enumerated in NSC 5432/1, and that it advise the subcabinet committee of any shortcomings of the presently proposed positions.

MSA–FOA Director's files, FRC 56 A 632, "Rio Economic Conference"

Memorandum by the Acting Regional Director of the Office of Latin American Operations (Hardesty) to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration (Stassen)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 8, 1954.

Subject: FOA's Views Regarding the Proposed U.S. Positions for the Rio Conference

The Sub-Cabinet Committee on the Rio Economic Conference, so far as we can determine, has not yet completed its work of preparing proposed U.S. positions for the conference. Assistant Secretary Holland has, however, made public statements outlining in some detail the positions which the U.S. will take at the conference. These announced positions are in general agreement with the policies which, at this point, appear to be forthcoming from the Sub-Cabinet Committee. Mr. Hardesty has, in the Sub-Cabinet Committee, consistently noted FOA's dissent on a number of proposed positions, and as we understand it, other agencies (notably Defense and Labor) have also noted some dissents. The following are the main proposed positions on which FOA has dissented:

1. Development Financing

There is general agreement that, from the standpoint of

(1) the needs of Latin America for development capital in order to achieve the economic development which U.S. interests require in that region, and

(2) the views of the reasonable elements in Latin America as to the assistance which the U.S. should provide to that region in obtaining needed development capital, the U.S. position at Rio should indicate that the U.S. is prepared to give greater assistance to that region in obtaining needed development capital than it has provided up to now.

The proposed U.S. position on development financing is that the U.S., through the Eximbank exclusively, will make loans available for economic development projects where:

(a) funds are not available from private sources, from other governmental sources, or from the IBRD,

(b) the loan is economically sound,

(c) the project is in the mutual interest of the two governments and their peoples,

(d) the loan is within the lending capacity and charter powers of the Eximbank.

It is FOA's view that, for various reasons, the Eximbank will not find it possible to fulfill all of the financing requirements of Latin America which are not met from non-U.S. sources and which, from the standpoint of Latin America's needs and expectations, it is in the U.S. interest to meet. The established U.S. policy for the hemisphere is that, where trade and the development loans available from private sources, IBRD and the Eximbank are inadequate for the purpose (and only where these sources are inadequate), the U.S. will finance, through development assistance loans, the initiation or acceleration of projects which are in the basic U.S. interest and which would otherwise not be undertaken or would not be carried out at the rate required by U.S. foreign policy objectives. In accordance with its understanding of this established policy and basic U.S. objectives in Latin America, FOA believes that the U.S. should undertake the following program to supplement the other sources of development capital available to Latin America, and that the United States should announce this program as part of its position at the Rio Conference.

(a) Bilateral Development Assistance Financing.

FOA believes that the U.S. should undertake to provide bilateral development assistance financing to meet requirements of Latin American countries which come within the broad standards set out in the established policy described above. Such financing would normally be on a loan basis with the option of repayment in local currency, although provision should be made for grants as necessary to meet emergency situations such as were recently encountered in Guatemala and Bolivia.

(b) Assistance to a Latin American Regional Development Bank.

FOA believes that the U.S. position at Rio should be to respond favorably to the Latin American initiative for the establishment of a Latin American regional development bank by a counter-suggestion limiting it to a bank to which the U.S. would be prepared to provide $100 million of the original capital on a loan and matching basis. The primary function of the Bank would be to provide comparatively small loans to private Latin American businesses for the development of industrial and related productive enterprises.

The Sub-Cabinet Committee has rejected the FOA proposal, and Secretary Holland has publicly announced that the United States will oppose proposals for the establishment of a new Latin American or Inter-American development bank.

FOA believes that a regional development bank such as it has proposed would go far toward fulfilling Latin America's acknowledged need for increased assistance from the United States in obtaining development capital. This proposal promotes the announced general U.S. objective of orderly economic development in Latin America, and in addition, furthers the established U.S. policy of evidencing sympathetic consideration for Latin American regional economic actions to concert sound development plans.

2. Financing Expanded Intra-Regional Trade.

In order to further the announced U.S. objective of orderly economic development in Latin America by helping to expand intra-regional trade, and to carry out the established U.S. policy of evidencing sympathetic consideration for proposals for constructive Latin American regional economic actions to promote increased trade, FOA has proposed that the U.S. at Rio favor the establishment by the Latin American countries of a clearing union in which foreign exchange balances arising out of international transactions could be settled in sterling or in dollars, and that the U.S. announce its willingness to loan at least $50 million for the initial swing account of such a clearing union. The Sub-Cabinet Committee has rejected the FOA proposal. Secretary Holland has made no mention of this topic in his public statements and, so far as we know, the Sub-Cabinet Committee is not preparing any position on it for Rio.

The two topics just discussed are the main ones on which FOA has regularly registered a strong dissent in the Sub-Cabinet Committee against the tentative position proposals of that Committee. FOA has also pressed for expansion and clarification of other tentative Sub-Cabinet proposals, as follows:

1. Technical Cooperation

According to Secretary Holland, the U.S. at Rio will take the position that it will strengthen and diversify the technical cooperation program in Latin America, as may be desired and requested by the Governments of that region. The Sub-Cabinet Committee will undoubtedly propose the same position, perhaps suggesting also that the United States announce its intention to program technical cooperation on a longer term basis. This position is in accord with the established policy on technical cooperation.

FOA is in agreement with this proposed position, but believes that the position should be clarified and strengthened in the following two respects:

(a) The U.S. should be prepared to make clear at Rio that, to the extent that may be necessary to accomplish the desired strengthening and diversification of the technical cooperation program, the U.S. is prepared to seek moderate increases in the funds annually appropriated for this program.

(b) In addition, FOA believes that the U.S. position should expressly state that the U.S. intends to expand training in the U.S. for Latin Americans in specialized fields important to the economic development of Latin American countries. This is directly in line with established policy.

2. P.L. 480 Use in Latin America

Assistant Secretary Holland's statements have made no mention of the possible utilization of P.L. 480 (Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954) in Latin America, and so far as we know, no proposed position has been prepared by the Sub-Cabinet Committee.

FOA believes that the U.S. should make as encouraging a statement as is feasible on this subject at Rio.

3. Investment Guaranty Program

As we understand it, the proposed Sub-Cabinet Committee position is that the U.S. should simply be prepared to answer any questions which the Latin Americans may raise at Rio regarding the investment guaranty program.

FOA recommends that the U.S. make an affirmative statement on that program at Rio and that, furthermore, in informal discussions, the U.S. express a willingness to attempt to work out the problems which have, so far, held up the extension of that program in Latin America.

Congress has emphatically called for more vigorous action to get this program underway in Latin America.

4. Measures to Stabilize World Market Prices for Latin American Products

According to Secretary Holland's public statements, the U.S. position is that it does not favor any measures that have so far been proposed to help stabilize prices, but that it is "not unwilling to consider those proposed by other American states." The position, in effect, is that the U.S. will reluctantly acquiesce in discussions of this problem when Latin American countries insist. The FOA position is that the U.S. should express a willingness to discuss this problem.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Under Secretary of State (Hoover)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 10, 1954.

Subject: NSC Consideration of Position for Rio Economic Conference

There are indications that dissatisfaction with the positions we intend to take at Rio is broader than purely a State–FOA–Treasury matter.[1]

[1] In a memorandum to Acting Secretary Hoover, dated Oct. 13, 1954, Operations Coordinator Radius stated in part that "FOA is aggressively pushing particular proposals which go further than State feels it desirable to go while, on the other hand, the Treasury Department is unwilling to take even the minimum steps which the State Department considers desirable. The real problem is how to secure a middle-of-the-road program between the Treasury and the FOA positions." (S/S–OCB files, lot 62 D 430, "Rio Conference")

In a memorandum to Mr. Hoover, dated Nov. 9, 1954, the Special Assistant to the Under Secretary of State, Max W. Bishop, noted the strong feeling in FOA and the Department of Defense that the United States had not gone far enough to meet the desires of the Latin American countries for economic cooperation, and he stated in part the following: "I am informed that some of the 'heat' in Defense and FOA comes from the bu-

Defense has shown a great deal of interest in the Conference and has sided with FOA in their views on the positions for the Conference. CIA, to a more limited degree, has similar views.

In the meantime, Andy Overby has handed me a rough draft of the address Mr. Humphrey plans to make at one of the early Plenary sessions of the Conference (Tab A).[2] I understand from Mr. Overby that this draft was prepared by the Treasury staff and has not as yet been seen by Mr. Humphrey. Nevertheless, the tenor of the speech is not as forthcoming as our position and would not adequately reflect the views we wish to present at Rio.

In light of these factors, it seems to me very important that:

1. Treasury be put very clearly on the record regarding their approach to the Conference.
2. We allow the reactions of FOA, Defense and other agencies to have full play against the Treasury position.
3. We avoid getting this Department into a position where we are attacked from both sides.

I believe that the Department's spokesman should not open discussion of the Rio Conference in the NSC. If the presentation were made by Treasury the opposing agencies would direct their comments to Treasury. Our position would then be put in the most reasonable light as a follow up to the views of the extreme elements. We should utilize the forthcoming OCB and NSC meetings to get the positions for the Conference thoroughly discussed by the interested agencies and to bring into the open any centers of resistance in the Government, which, if allowed to exist, may later plague us at Rio.

You informed us in our meeting Saturday that you expect to represent the Department at the NSC meeting on Monday, November 15, when an oral report on the preparations for the Rio Conference is to be given. The OCB minute [3] indicates that "the Chief of the U.S. Delegation to the Rio Conference is scheduled to brief the NSC . . . on the position to be taken by the U.S. Government". I understand that the NSC has no preference as to which Department makes the presentation.

Recommendation

I recommend that you call Mr. Humphrey to suggest that he, as Chairman of the Delegation, make the presentation to the NSC in accordance with the OCB minute.

If you approve this course of action and are successful in having Mr. Humphrey make the presentation, Mr. Bowie will notify the NSC so that the agenda can be arranged accordingly.[4]

Memorandum of Discussion at the 224th Meeting of the National Security Council on Monday, November 15, 1954 [1]

TOP SECRET EYES ONLY

Present at the 224th Council meeting were the President of the United States, presiding; Under Secretary Hoover for the Secretary of State; the Secretary of Defense; the Director, Foreign Operations Administration; the Director, Office of Defense Mobilization. Also present were the Secretary of the Treasury; the Director, Bureau of the Budget; the Director, Selective Service System; General McLain for the Chairman, National Security Training Commission; the Director, U.S. Information Agency; the Deputy Secretary of Defense; the Secretary of the Army; Assistant Secretary Pratt for the Secretary of the Navy; the Secretary of the Air Force; Assistant Secretaries of Defense McNeil, Burgess, Seaton and Floete; Assistant Secretary of the Army Milton; the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Manpower & Personnel, Military); the Military Assistant to the Secretary of Defense; Capt. John R. Leeds, USN, and Col. James A. Norell, Department of Defense; James H. Taylor, Assistant Director for Manpower, FOA; the Acting Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff; Admiral Duncan for the Chief of Naval Operations; the Vice Chief of Staff, U.S. Air Force; the Commandant, U.S. Marine Corps; the Director of Central Intelligence; the Assistant to the President; Robert Cutler, Special Assistant to the President; the Deputy Assistant to the President; the White House Staff Secretary; Bryce Harlow, Administrative Assistant to the President; the Executive Secretary, NSC; the Deputy Executive Secretary, NSC; and George Weber, NSC Special Staff.

There follows a summary of the discussion at the meeting and the main points taken.

[1] This memorandum was drawn up by S. Everett Gleason, Deputy Executive Secretary of the NSC, on Nov. 16.

[Here follows discussion concerning reserve mobilization requirements.]

2. Position of the U.S. at the Rio Conference (NSC 5432/1)

Mr. Cutler briefed the Council, pointing out that the U.S. position to be taken at the Rio Conference had been based on NSC 5432/1, the policy report on Latin America, approved September 3, 1954. However, Mr. Cutler said he had been informed that questions of interpretation of this policy paper had arisen in the course of preparing the position for the Rio Conference. This was especially true of paragraphs 9-b, 9-c and 9-g of NSC 5432/1. Mr. Cutler then called on Secretary Humphrey, as head of the U.S. delegation to the Rio Conference, to outline the U.S. position.

Before reading his report, Secretary Humphrey said that he would be leaving this week for the Rio Conference, which would last, he expected, about two weeks. He would be in charge of the U.S. delegation for the first week, and Under Secretary of State Hoover would be in charge the remainder of the session. Secretary Humphrey then observed that Assistant Secretary Holland had been busily engaged throughout Latin America in doing the ground work for the forthcoming conference. In the course of this preparatory work Mr. Holland had encountered both criticism and approval—criticism for our failure to agree to unsound projects; approval for our agreement to go along with sound projects.

It would be the general purpose of the U.S. delegation to present the Rio Conference in the first instance with an outline of what the United States had already done—by way of sound enterprises—on behalf of the various Latin American countries. Secondly, we would indicate our intention to resist other projects which had been proposed, because such projects were deemed by us to be unsound. At the conclusion of these opening comments, Secretary Humphrey said that the entire U.S. delegation would meet the next afternoon,[2] Tuesday, to go over the draft of the final U.S. position.

Thereafter, Secretary Humphrey outlined the following five points as indicating the positive content of the U.S. position at the Rio Conference:

1. The United States would undertake to maintain, as absolutely basic, a high level of economic activity in America, because this was not only vital for the welfare of Latin America but for all the rest of the free world.

2. The United States would take further sound steps toward convertibility and the removal of restrictions and restraints on commerce and trade.

[2] No record of the referenced meeting was found in Department of State files.

3. The United States would do its utmost to encourage increased private investment as being of the essence of economic progress in the hemisphere.

4. The United States would show particular concern for increased local investment because it believed that investment of local capital in the various republics was far more significant than investment in them of foreign capital.

5. The United States would press for the extension of technical assistance programs and developmental programs.

Commenting on the above positive U.S. positions, Secretary Humphrey characterized them all as "constructive". They would include ways and means for the investment of public funds in sound projects, on the basis that this kind of investment would ultimately lead to the desirable increase in private investment. The United States would also undertake to negotiate new treaties with the Latin American republics dealing with taxation issues.

After thus summarizing the positive aspect of the U.S. position, Secretary Humphrey indicated various proposals and suggestions that the U.S. delegation had decided to oppose at Rio:

1. The UN proposal, which set up a goal of $1 billion which would have to be spent each year on some project or other. This proposal, complained Secretary Humphrey, was just like the Marshall Plan in philosophy, only not so big.

2. The United States would resist a variety of commodity price stabilization schemes which had been proposed by Latin American countries.

3. The United States would oppose such regional preferential arrangements among the Latin American nations as would require U.S. financial support for their operation.

4. The United States would oppose the project for a new Inter-American Bank. There were already three banks in a position to extend loans to Latin American countries, and there was no need for another.

At the conclusion of this list of negative positions, Secretary Humphrey reverted to Mr. Cutler's earlier point that differences of interpretation had arisen regarding paragraphs 9–b, 9–c and 9–g of NSC 5432/1. He confirmed Mr. Cutler's statement, and requested the National Security Council to provide clarification of the points at issue respecting the meaning of these paragraphs.

Secretary Humphrey turned first to paragraph 9–b, which read as follows:

"b. Be prepared to assure the financing of all sound economic development projects, for which private capital or IBRD financing is not available, through Export–Import Bank loans; subject to each loan being:

"(1) in the interest of both the United States and the borrowing country.

"(2) within the borrower's capacity to repay,
"(3) within the Bank's lending capacity and charter powers."

Secretary Humphrey said that it was his conviction that this language was too broad and the course of action too open-ended. He therefore recommended that the word "assure" in the first line be replaced by the word "assist", and that the word "all" in the first line be deleted.

Secretary Humphrey then read paragraph 9–c, as follows:

"c. Only if a and b above prove to be inadequate, finance through development assistance loans the initiation or acceleration of projects or activities which are in the basic U.S. interest and which, in the absence of such additional assistance, would not be undertaken or, if undertaken, would not be carried forward at the rate required by U.S. foreign policy objectives."

Secretary Humphrey observed that in effect this course of action called on the United States to make "fuzzy" loans to Latin American countries, not on economic grounds but because such fuzzy loans were in the interests of furthering our national security. In order to qualify somewhat the approval of fuzzy loans, Secretary Humphrey suggested the addition of the following phrase between the words "inadequate" and "finance" in the first line: "and only after further review of the particular case by the National Security Council".

The President said he thought this was the right idea, and inquired who would make such loans. Secretary Humphrey replied that he did not know, but supposed that it would be some Government agency or else one of the International Banks. The President then suggested that it might be a good idea to create a group of individuals who would be in a position to make recommendations for Council action when the Council did review particular cases, as called for by Secretary Humphrey's proposed addition to paragraph 9–c.

Mr. Cutler indicated concern over the apparent intention of Secretary Humphrey to amend NSC 5432/1. He recalled the discussion of paragraph 9–b at the Council meeting when the report was approved.[3] The deliberation had been lengthy and detailed, and Mr. Cutler warned against hasty changes in paragraph 9 without adequate staffing by the Planning Board and the interested departments. With respect to the proposals for a change in paragraph 9–c, Mr. Cutler insisted that the National Security Council had never intended paragraph 9–c to countenance resort to fuzzy loans and the like until the failure of the courses of action set forth in paragraph 9–b had been clearly demonstrated. Accordingly, if it was proposed to revise paragraph 9–c, Mr. Cutler suggested that it would be in clear consonance with the prior Council discussion and action if language were inserted to provide perhaps a year's time to see how the courses of action in a and b actually worked out. This would be preferable to the proposal for having a Council review on a case-by-case basis. Secretary Humphrey said that he would be delighted to go along with this suggestion, since that was all he wanted to achieve. The President suggested adding also that the courses of action in 9–c should not be carried out except with the express approval of the President. He turned to the Secretary of the Treasury, however, and asked him to remember that all these things we were doing or proposing to do in Latin America, we were doing in our own self-interest. This being the case, and if we were careful and cautious, he believed that perhaps the word "assure" rather than the proposed word "assist" was the right word for paragraph 9–b.

Secretary Humphrey continued to argue strongly against any course of action which would assure Latin Americans that we would agree to finance every project which they asked us to finance. Mr. Cutler observed that he thought this was somewhat unfair, since the paragraph as written contained three clearly stated qualifications on the freedom of the United States to finance all such proposals. Secretary Humphrey argued that the gist of the course of action in 9–b had been advertised throughout the length and breadth of Latin America, and there was very great danger that, as a result of such advertising by U.S. Government agencies, the Latin Americans would come to us and ask for assistance which we would be in no position to give them. Refusal to accord loans and other things they wanted would be bound to affect adversely our relationships with these countries.

Expressing surprise, the President inquired whether all the policies discussed in the National Security Council were thus advertised all over the world. It was pointed out that this was not the case, either in this or other areas.

Secretary Hoover then suggested that perhaps Secretary Humphrey's point regarding paragraph 9–c could be met if the sentence were recast so that it would begin rather than end with the three qualifications on our loan policy. This, at any rate, would give greater emphasis to these qualifications on our freedom of action. Secretary Humphrey professed that this would be very satisfactory to him.

Secretary Humphrey then turned to paragraph 9–g, which read as follows:

"g. Consider sympathetically, but only on individual merit, any proposal by Latin American initiative to create regional economic actions and groupings to promote increased trade, technical cooperation and investment, and to concert sound development plans."

He then suggested that he would like to revise this paragraph by omitting the word "sympathetically" in the first line. The President interrupted to say that he was in agreement with this proposal, and Secretary Humphrey went on to suggest further amendment by adding a caveat against any United States financial commitment to assist Latin American regional economic groupings which had as an objective any discrimination against U.S. trade and commerce.

Mr. Cutler explained the legislative history of this proposal, including the reasons why the Council had been inclined to accept regional groupings in Latin American countries, even though with some misgivings. Governor Stassen said that while he would not oppose Secretary Humphrey's proposed revision of paragraph 9-g, since Secretary Humphrey was chairman of the U.S. delegation, he nevertheless felt obliged to state, on behalf of the Foreign Operations Administration staff, that FOA regarded this and other aspects of our policy toward Latin America as very seriously inadequate to meet our needs. He also predicted that the proposed U.S. position at the Rio Conference would evoke a very negative reaction. It did not meet the obvious needs of Latin America from a number of points of view. In the first place, the Latin American countries plainly want to join together in some kind of regional economic grouping. Equally plainly, in the second place the Latin American republics want to sit down and talk over the serious problem of raw materials. We have opposed becoming involved in agencies to control prices of raw materials, but it would be at least useful to agree to discuss these commodities with the Latin Americans, even if we rightly refuse to join in any agreements on the subject. Thirdly, the level of investment in the Latin American republics had long been too low and still was. In conclusion, Governor Stassen reiterated that he was not proposing to argue in favor of his beliefs, but that "we in FOA want to flag" the serious inadequacy of this policy, even though it is the responsibility of others to make the decisions.

After Mr. Cutler had summarized the prior Council discussion of paragraph 9-g, the President stated his belief that the United States should certainly not use its funds to encourage regional economic groupings which would adversely affect the trade and commerce of the United States.

Secretary Humphrey noted the very considerable difference between regional groupings in Europe and in Latin America. In Europe a very high percentage of trade and commerce took place between the various European countries; whereas only about 10% of the total Latin American commerce was conducted among the Latin American countries themselves. If we could make them clearly understand that they must not expect us to finance their regional economic groupings or for us to support actions by such groupings which discriminate against the United States, that was all that he, Secretary Humphrey, would ask for.

The President pointed out to Secretary Humphrey that it was much more important for the United States to achieve a good climate of opinion in Latin America than to agree to the various specific items on this program for the U.S. position at Rio. You must think, said the President, of our policy in Latin America as chiefly designed to play a part in the cold war against our enemies. Russia, he warned, would shortly step into any vacuum if we allowed one to develop in Latin America. Apropos of the President's remarks, Mr. Allen Dulles noted the rapid increase in trade between the Soviet bloc and Latin America in the last year and a half. Much of this trade, said Mr. Dulles, was "political" rather than "natural" trade.

The President continued by pointing out to the Council that the United States was not merely "doing business" in Latin America, but was fighting a war there against Communism. Second, said the President, the Spanish-settled countries of Latin America have a simply incalculable pride. They still feel that we do not treat them equally with Europe and Asia, and our policies toward Latin America must be sure to meet this point of their great pride. Pay attention to this idea of equality and to the importance Latin Americans attach to personalities.

Secretary Humphrey said that he merely wanted to emphasize how important it was, prior to the Conference, that the interested Government agencies—State, Treasury and FOA—all go there with the same interpretation of paragraph 9–g. The President suggested that the pragmatic approach to 9–g might be the best. If any of the 9–g proposals or programs turn out to involve United States financial support, indicate that we cannot agree at once, but that the case must be taken up with the "head of the nation".

Governor Stassen then launched into a strong statement in support of the value of an Inter-American Bank. Secretary Humphrey opposed this proposal with equal vehemence. Secretary Hoover at least agreed with Secretary Humphrey's view of the necessity of agreement on the meaning of paragraph 9–g. With regard to it, to all other paragraphs, and indeed to all NSC papers of this type, the Council should remember that these papers become the Bible of U.S. officials both here and abroad. Accordingly, if any misunderstanding exists, such misunderstanding should promptly be removed.

Mr. Cutler reminded the Council that the President had approved the proposal for dropping the adverb "sympathetically" and of adding a caveat against U.S. support for Latin American economic regional groupings. Governor Stassen, however, argued for paragraph 9–g as it had originally been written, and indeed went on to suggest an even more sympathetic approach to such regional groupings. Mr. Cutler indicated his strong hostility to any proposal which amounted to revising rather than interpreting existing policy. If NSC 5432/1 needed to be revised, the revision should occur only after proper staffing.

The President again expressed the view that our policy ought to emphasize the objective of making the several Latin American republics more interdependent economically and less dependent on the Soviet Union. He reiterated his point that this was primarily a cold war problem. However, said the President, he was wholly on Governor Stassen's side in not desiring to see our delegation put in the position of having to refuse flatly to consider any request from a Latin American republic for something we turned down simply because it wasn't noted approvingly in our policy. There should be no such flat turn-downs, and on such cases the U.S. delegation should consult with Washington before reaching a decision.

Mr. Cutler returned to his position against hasty last-minute changes in agreed policy papers, and suggested that if Governor Stassen desired to propose amendments to NSC 5432/1 he should wait to do so until after the end of the Rio Conference.

The President said that he did not take kindly to the apparent ideas of Mr. Cutler that if any of these policies involved U.S. money it was at once kaput. Secretary Hoover suggested leaving in the adverb "sympathetically" in paragraph 9–g but adding the proposed financial caveat. Governor Stassen said he preferred language to the effect that "if it costs money you have to come back to Washington".

The President said he had come to hate these long drawn-out papers which lay down hard and fast rules for carrying out every detail of a program. He would much prefer to trust to our negotiator (looking at Secretary Humphrey) to meet any new conditions which might arise on the spot. He can always relay doubtful cases back to Washington.

Secretary Humphrey, however, still professed to be strongly opposed both to the regional groupings proposed in paragraph 9–g and, particularly, to the proposed new Inter-American Bank. Turning to Governor Stassen, he said, "Let's be specific. Are you going down there and advocate the Bank as you have been doing all over the place up to now?" Governor Stassen denied that he had advocated any Inter-American Bank outside the circles of the United States Government. While, said Governor Stassen, he would of course abide by the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury as head of the U.S. delegation, he nevertheless believed in the idea of a new Inter-American Bank.

The National Security Council:

a. Noted and discussed the oral presentation on the subject by the Secretary of the Treasury, the U.S. Delegate to the Conference.

b. Adopted [4] the following amendments to NSC 5432/1:

(1) Paragraph 9–b: Revise to read as follows:

"b. Through Export-Import Bank loans—provided each such loan is (1) in the interests of both the United States and the borrowing country, (2) within the borrower's capacity to repay, and (3) within the Bank's lending capacity and charter powers—be prepared to assure such financing of all sound economic development projects, for which private capital or IBRD financing is not available."

(2) Paragraph 9–c: Revise the first line to read as follows:

"c. Only if action under a and b above over a period of time demonstrates that these courses of action are inadequate, and then only with Presidential approval in each case, finance".

(3) Paragraph 9–g: Add at the end:

"; with the understanding that any such proposal would not involve discrimination against U.S. trade and that no additional U.S. financial commitments would be involved hereunder without further consideration by the National Security Council."

Note: The amendments to NSC 5432/1, as adopted in b above and approved by the President, subsequently circulated to all holders of NSC 5432/1 [5] and referred to the Operations Coordinating Board as the coordinating agency.

Memorandum of a Meeting of Certain Members of the United States Delegation [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [QUITANDINHA,] November 25, 1954.

Participants: Secretary Humphrey, Treasury
Under Secretary Hoover, State
Assistant Secretary Waugh, State
Assistant Secretary Overby, Treasury
Assistant Secretary Anderson, Commerce
Assistant Secretary Holland, State
Dr. FitzGerald, FOA
Dr. Hauge, White House
Mr. Cale, State
For only a portion of the meeting:
Isaiah Frank, State
George H. Willis, Treasury
Hawthorne Arey, Export–Import Bank

The above group met to discuss and to attempt to resolve a number of problems now faced by the delegation.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Cale.

1. Regional Trade Arrangements

There was considerable discussion of the recent amendment, made on the initiative of Treasury, of the portion of the NSC policy statement on Latin America dealing with regional arrangements. Mr. Overby maintained that the amendment meant that we would not approve regional trade arrangements if they involve discrimination against the US as compared with countries either inside or outside of the arrangements. In this position he was supported by Mr. Anderson. Mr. Holland stated that our position paper on regional arrangements [2] for the conference had contemplated that we would not oppose regional trade arrangements which discriminated against us as compared with countries in the trading area, provided we received nondiscriminatory treatment as compared with countries outside the area and that the arrangements met a number of other conditions. Mr. Humphrey took the position that the amendment to the NSC policy statement had to be interpreted in such a way as to permit arrangements of this nature, if it was to have any meaning at all. Mr. Hoover agreed with this position and recounted some of the legislative history on the development of the present NSC policy on Latin America, including the amendment in question. He also called attention to the fact that our position contemplates that the arrangements would be proposed on Latin American initiative, and that we would examine each on its individual merit.

The resolution [3] on which the Argentine Delegation has asked our comments regarding Latin American trade arrangements was then discussed. During a part of this discussion Mr. Frank was asked to participate. It was decided that Mr. Frank, without releasing the text to the Argentine Delegation, should suggest to the Argentine Delegation that if that delegation introduced a resolution along the following lines, the US would support it:

"Resolves:

To entrust to the IA-ECOSOC the preparation of a study analyzing the possibilities of regional trade arrangements as the basis for the expansion of trade and the promotion of economic development among the countries of the area which may be permissible under the provisions of the GATT as now constituted or as they may be amended." [4]

It was also agreed that a subcommittee of Mr. Waugh, Mr. Frank, Dr. Hauge and Mr. Atwood would constitute a working group on this matter and would make any further recommendations needed with respect to it. Since Mr. Waugh was leaving for Rio de Janeiro in a short time, it was decided that Dr. Hauge would act as Chairman of the group during the day.

At this point Secretary Humphrey had to leave for another appointment.

2. Inter-American Bank

Mr. Arey and Mr. Willis were invited to participate during the discussion of this item and remained for the rest of the meeting.

After rather full discussion of the Maschke Plan [5] for an Inter-American Bank it was agreed that we would, for the present, take no position. It was also agreed that if asked for our views we would state that we would like to know more about the position of Cuba and Venezuela before making up our minds. It was also agreed that we would indicate that it would also be desirable before reaching a decision to have the views of the IBRD, of which many of the Latin American countries are, of course, members.[6]

3. Economic Development Programs

The group approved the suggested position on economic development programming [7] which had been developed by Messrs. Holland, Willis and Cale, with suggested amendments that had been proposed by Mr. Atwood subject to the following further changes.

a. That the paragraph from Secretary Humphrey's address to the conference dealing with programming should be added to the paper.

b. That the following sentence should be added after the first sentence of paragraph 2(c). "Call attention to the availability of assistance in programming from the International Bank."

c. That the expression "in which the United States is included" should be inserted between the word "commission" and the word "should" in the last sentence of paragraph 2(c).

d. That the brackets should be removed from the final sentence on page 3.

Each country would deposit dollar reserves in the fund and would be able to borrow up to the amount of its deposit. The United States would agree to discount up to an amount equal to one-third of the capital deposited in the fund, and this would be protected by the amount of gold reserves.

4. US Participation in UN Advisory Committee on International Commodity Trade

Mr. Hoover, at Dr. FitzGerald's suggestion, informed the group of the contents of a telegram which he had just received from Washington indicating that the United States had been elected to membership in the above-mentioned commission and raising the question, in view of the relationship of this development to some of the items on the agenda for the conference, whether the United States should reverse an earlier decision and accept membership in the commission. Following a brief discussion during which it was pointed out that Secretary Humphrey might very well have a definite opinion on the subject, it was decided to defer consideration of this item until tomorrow.[9]

5. Tax on Transportation in the Caribbean

This item was mentioned but it was pointed out that no definite position could be taken on it until the precise views of Secretary Humphrey were known. Further consideration was, therefore, deferred until tomorrow.[10]

6. Consultation [11]

It was indicated that further consideration would have to be given to this question but it was agreed that the United States should always be willing to sit down and discuss outstanding problems with other countries which so request. Mr. Anderson said that he would like to have this item on the agenda for tomorrow morning's meeting since he believed that we should develop a definite position on it as soon as possible.[12]

7. Loans Falling Outside the Scope of Activities of the IBRD

Mr. Holland pointed out that various statements have been made by spokesmen for the U.S. Government indicating that the Eximbank would be prepared to make certain loans falling outside the normal

[9] In the memorandum of discussion at the meeting of the heads of the U.S. Delegation on Nov. 26, drafted by Mr. Cale, Mr. Humphrey is recorded as having indicated "that our aim should be to stay out of the commission entirely." (OAS files, lot 60 D 665)

[10] The memorandum of discussion on Nov. 26 also records Mr. Humphrey as having stated the following: "we should not support a resolution proposing amendment of the tax but . . . we could state in explaining our negative vote or abstention that we would give further study to the situation with a view toward removing the tax on transportation between points in the United States if some practicable way can be found of so doing and still enforce the tax uniformly within the United States."

[12] In the memorandum of discussion at the meeting of the heads of the U.S. Delegation on Nov. 27, drafted by Mr. Cale, Mr. Hoover is recorded as having stated, in part, that "our position for this conference be to point out that the matter is actively under consideration in Geneva [at the Ninth Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade] and that whatever is agreed to there on our part will apply to the Latin American countries that are not members of GATT." scope of activities of the International Bank. He said that as a result he had been asked the question by Mr. Eugene Black and by others as to just what were the types of loans that we considered as falling outside the normal scope of activities of the International Bank. Mr. Holland said that he believed that there was a need for a definite statement that we could make to persons asking this question. He then requested that Mr. Arey, Mr. Overby and Mr. Anderson prepare a paper [13] giving the best possible answer to this question for consideration at tomorrow's meeting. Mr. Overby said that the group would attempt to comply with the request.

8. Taxation and Tax Treaties

Mr. Overby reported that the US Delegation would introduce a resolution later during the day on this subject if the Conference Secretariat should decide that it is necessary, procedurally, to do so in order to have a working group set up on the subject of taxation and tax treaties at the conference.[14]

9. Resolution on Financing of Economic Development

Mr. Overby called attention to a resolution which the US Delegation had been authorized to present on the above subject. He said that Secretary Humphrey, after reading the resolution, thought it rather meaningless and that he himself did not intend to introduce it unless the group should decide otherwise. Mr. Anderson indicated that it was his view that the resolution should be introduced. Mr. Holland took a similar position and indicated that he would be glad to participate along with Mr. Overby in a discussion of the subject in Rio with Secretary Humphrey. It was agreed that Mr. Overby would telephone Mr. Willis from Rio, after discussion with Mr. Humphrey, before the closing time for submitting if the resolution is to be submitted.

10. Resolutions and Statements on Tourism and Transportation

Mr. Anderson indicated that he intended to authorize the transmission of our resolutions [15] on tourism and transportation to the Secretary of the conference this afternoon and to make statements [16] on the subject at the meeting of the subcommittee on transportation this afternoon.

11. Colombian Resolution [17] Regarding Consultation and Cooperation Among Central Banks

Mr. Overby called attention to the above mentioned resolution. Mr. Willis pointed out that the Federal Reserve System would probably not wish the US Delegation to agree to the consultation among Central Banks envisioned under the first paragraph of the operative part of the resolution. Mr. Overby called attention to the fact that the matter dealt with in the second operative paragraph of the resolution is one that should be handled directly between the International Monetary Fund and member countries.

Mr. Anderson called attention to Article 27 of the Charter of the Organization of American States [18] which provides that:

"If the economy of an American State is affected by serious conditions that cannot be satisfactorily remedied by its own unaided effort, such State may place its economic problems before the Inter-American Economic and Social Council to seek throught consultation the most appropriate solution for such problems."

He then pointed out that we might suggest to the conference that this article provides a means whereby the governments which choose to do so may ask for consideration of their exchange problems. It was Mr. Willis' view that the Federal Reserve System would not wish us to take such a position. Mr. Holland pointed out that this article is contained in a treaty which had been approved by the Senate of the United States and that it is, therefore, our obligation to respect it.

Mr. Holland then suggested that we abstain on the resolution, if it is brought to a vote and point out the possibility that the problem might be met under Article 27 of the Charter. Following further discussion, he suggested that the Treasury representatives develop a definitive position for consideration at tomorrow morning's meeting. Mr. Overby stated that he thought that this might be somewhat early since it was his opinion that the views of the Federal Reserve System authorities should be sought before we take a final position.[19]

CONFIDENTIAL [QUITANDINHA,] November 30, 1954.

Participants: Mr. Hoover
Mr. Holland
Mr. Overby
Mr. Waugh
Mr. Edgerton
Mr. FitzGerald
Mr. Parker [2]
Mr. Cale

The following subjects were discussed:

1. Sales of Agricultural Products to Latin American Countries Under PL 480

Mr. Holland indicated that he favored providing Brazil with 250,000 tons of wheat this fiscal year under PL 480 with no definite commitment as to the amount for future years. Dr. FitzGerald indicated that since we are thinking in terms of 400,000 tons of wheat for Brazil during the next calendar year, he would be in favor of discussing this figure with the Brazilians. Mr. Waugh spoke in favor of the 250,000 ton figure and Dr. FitzGerald said he would not press his position. It was the sense of the group that an effort should be made to settle as many as possible of the PL 480 programs for the Latin American countries during the course of this Conference. It was agreed that there would be a meeting at 11:00 a.m.[3] on the matter and that at this meeting an attempt would be made to come to some definite decisions.

2. Financing Economic Development

Mr. Overby stated that he had gotten the impression from conversations with Latin American representatives that their reaction to the statement [4] which he had made yesterday morning had been favorable. Other members of the group indicated that they had received a similar impression from their conversations.

[3] No record of the referenced meeting was found in Department of State files.
[4] Apparent reference to the statement made by Mr. Overby in Subcommittee B (Financing) of Committee II (Economic Development) on Nov. 29 and released to the press on the same date indicating why the United States must abstain on the resolution concerning a regional financing institution.

Mr. Overby then referred to the working group redraft [5] of Resolution 1 of the ECLA Secretariat.[6] He stated that he had indicated provisional approval of the redraft subject to being able to check it in its English version, that version at this time not being available, and subject to confirmation by his Delegation. Following the reading of the redraft, Mr. Hoover asked if there were any objections. There being none, it was agreed that Mr. Overby would confirm his approval.

Mr. Overby then read the working group's redraft [5] of Recommendation 2 of the ECLA Secretariat [7] which he had also provisionally accepted. There being no objection to this by the members of the group, Mr. Hoover indicated that Mr. Overby should go ahead and confirm his provisional acceptance of the resolution.

Mr. Overby next referred to the Ecuadoran resolution [8] which would have provided special preference for the Latin American countries in investment designed to encourage the production of primary products. Mr. Overby indicated that he was thinking of proposing that this be changed to indicate that careful consideration should be given to the effects on the Latin American countries of investments made in other foreign countries for the production of primary products produced in Latin America. He also stated that he thought that the resolution should be drafted in such a way as to refer to public investment.

Dr. FitzGerald asked about the possible reaction back home to a statement that might be interpreted as meaning that we would favor investment in raw material production abroad as compared with such investment in the United States. Mr. Cale inquired whether what was contemplated in the Ecuadoran resolution did not relate solely to foreign investment e.g. by the United States without any implication of a preference or special consideration for investment in the Latin American countries as compared with investment in the United States. He suggested that the resolution might be drafted to refer to foreign investment only. Mr. Hoover suggested that Mr. Overby ask that this be done.

Mr. Holland stated that the only thing that would give him concern regarding the resolution, with the changes that had been suggested, was not the language itself but its implications. He then inquired whether there was any chance of phrasing the resolution in universal terms so that it would provide that in making public foreign investment to encourage the production of raw materials, consideration should be given to "traditional sources of supply and marketing arrangements". He suggested that an attempt be made by Mr. Overby first to get approval of general language along these lines and that if this could not be done that he recede to the position which would provide that careful attention would be given to the effect on Latin American countries of public foreign investment in other foreign countries to increase the production of primary products which the Latin American countries produce.

Mr. Overby next referred to the working group redraft [9] of the Colombian resolution proposing consultation of central banks on temporary exchange difficulties and on the modification of IMF quotas. There was general agreement with his view that we could not approve the resolution in this form. Mr. Holland suggested that what is needed was a "warm abstention" based on our position that the resolution constitutes an invasion into the sphere of activities of international organizations of which we and most of the Latin American countries are all members.

3. Future Economic Conferences

Mr. Holland pointed out that there are certain representatives at this conference who favor the adoption of a resolution to hold meetings similar to the one in which we are now engaged every year. Others favor holding such meetings every two years. He also pointed out that there has long been a commitment to hold an economic conference in Argentina. He then suggested that we might try to avoid committing ourselves to any fixed schedule so far as future conferences are concerned by agreeing to a conference in Buenos Aires in 1956. This line of action was approved.

The Acting Chairman of the United States Delegation (Hoover) [1] to the Secretary of State

SECRET NIACT QUITANDINHA, December 1, 1954.

Secun 6. For the Secretary. Progress at Rio conference continues favorable.[2] Comment on US policies by majority Latin American delegations stresses particularly our cooperative and sympathetic approach to their problems. As we come to closing days of meeting, atmosphere is friendly, appreciative of our position, and has definitely improved throughout conference. We are fully aware of critical situations in Chile and Brazil, as outlined by Stassen at OCB, and have explored problems in detail with respective Finance Ministers.[3] I believe imperative we assure these Ministers, while we are all in Rio, we immediately prepared to negotiate terms for sale of wheat (and possibly other commodities) under PL 480. We have in mind 250,000 tons wheat to Brazil and 50,000 to 100,000 tons wheat plus edible oils to Chile for balance fiscal year 1955.

Discussions this problem have been going within USDel throughout past week, but FOA and Agriculture representatives have raised technical objections to proposed approach by State, citing numerous difficulties [4] which may arise in negotiations pursuant to PL 480.

Notwithstanding above objections, I believe situation sufficiently critical that we are justified in giving general assurances at once, stating clearly problems inherent in PL 480, and getting detailed negotiations underway immediately.

Holland and Department staff in full agreement and believe immediate action necessary.

Unsec 23. For Hoover from Secretary reur Secun 6. Assume you envisage Title one and not grant under Title two relating to famine conditions. On this assumption you could give indications of action for Brazil in terms of about $10,000,000 and Chile of about $6,000,000. If you advise emergency conditions exist in Chile, we would endeavor to get some very quick shipments there.

The larger figures you have in mind raise very serious and complicated problems involving Francis Committee [2] and several Departments and while I feel confident the President and all concerned will want to react sympathetically to your recommendations, nevertheless I doubt very much whether any high hopes for additional amounts should be raised pending your return and exploration of situation with other agencies.

members who might have to face the question that the US effort got off to a bad start by virtue of rumors that the Administration was seriously divided on being generous or restrictive, and by the extremist opinions expressed by Rep. Fulton and Sen. Smathers.[6] He believed that the situation had been corrected before the end of the Conference and that the agreements reached would be satisfactory to the Latin American countries.

The President inquired as to Latin American attitudes vis-à-vis Asia. Sec. Humphrey believed great jealousy would develop if the United States entered into lavish schemes in the rest of the world. The President asked as to the meaning of "lavish" and went on to emphasize that the United States had certain interests to protect in Asia and that protection of them would also serve the interests of Latin America. He believed the Joe Dodge organization[7] being set up could serve to keep a watchful eye on this situation. Sec. Wilson suggested, and Sec. Humphrey agreed, that the situation might well be saved by tying any economic program on to military aid programs, of which the Latin American countries were not jealous.

Sec. Humphrey also pointed out that the proposal made by representatives of the United Nations Economic and Social Council for Latin America were overly extensive and most upsetting to satisfactory progress of the conference.

The President emphasized the need for partnership which could never be obtained merely by making outright grants. He believed that there could be considerable accomplishment derived from smaller private meetings with foreign leaders for the purpose of encouraging the flow of private capital.

UNITED STATES POLICY REGARDING POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS IN THE CENTRAL AMERICAN AREA[1]

720.001/9–452

Memorandum by the Officer in Charge of Central America and Panama Affairs (Siracusa) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 4, 1952.

Subject: Indications of Apprehension Over Communism in the Middle American Area.

In addition to previous thoughts, I have brought to your attention about a growing awareness in Central America of the threat of communist penetration from Guatemala, I want to point out the following related matter:

You will recall that in a recent memorandum I informed you that our Embassy in Nicaragua reported a belief in Nicaragua that Somoza, while in the Dominican Republic, would attempt to negotiate some form of a Middle American anti-communist alliance. A certain degree of substantiation of this report came from El Salvador when the Chief of Protocol indicated that he had been assigned to the Salvadoran Delegation to the Dominican Republic because of President Osorio's belief that something of this nature, an anti-communist bloc, might be in the making.

Also as you will recall, Foreign Minister Canessa advised Ambassador Duke of the plan of El Salvador, Nicaragua, Venezuela and Panama to help finance the Echandi campaign in Costa Rica in opposition to Jose Figueres. The amount of money being spent by Echandi for newspaper ads alone certainly seems to suggest that he has adequate funds available to cover the costs of his protracted campaign.

More recently a despatch from Venezuela spoke of such an anti-communist bloc and also of the related intent to defeat Figueres.

In a despatch received from Costa Rica, No. 210 of August 28,[2] some information is given as to the purpose of the Colombian Mission

[1] For previous documentation related to this subject, see Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. II, pp. 970 ff.

[2] Despatch 210 from San José, not printed, stated that the Colombian mission visited other Central American countries ostensibly to work out an agreement to regulate the flow of coffee to the American market (720.00/8–2852).

to Central America headed by Eduardo Zuleta Angel. The Embassy comments that through a completely reliable source it has learned with Dr. Zuleta's permission that his real purpose of visiting these countries is the preoccupation of his government and of the Government of Venezuela with the activities of the communists and other political exile groups such as the Accion Democratica in this area. In Costa Rica he said he was particularly worried about the activities of Figueres and Betancourt. He also said that just as the communists around the world worked and organized together, his mission, at the personal request of President Urdaneta, "was to sound out the free governments of the Caribbean area to see if they could not also organize against communism and against revolutionary activities in this area which the communists support and foment openly or under cover."

Piecing the articles together from our various sources of information, it would seem that something definitely is under way in the area which is primarily concerned with the threat of communism and with doing something about people such as Figueres and the various politically exiled groups which may be used by the communists.

720.00/2–2053

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 20, 1953.

Subject: Political Situation in the Caribbean Area and in Latin America as a whole Participants: Dr. Eduardo Zuleta Angel, ex-Colombian Ambassador to Washington

ARA—Mr. Mann
OSA—Mr. Bernbaum

Dr. Zuleta Angel described at great length a one-hour conversation he had held with General Bedell Smith.[1] He was delighted with the results of the conversation, and expressed the opinion that General Smith had a most unusual grasp of the Latin American scene. Zuleta Angel stated he had expressed the opinion to General Smith that the economic development of Latin America was one of the more important problems facing the United States foreign policy. He felt that this might best be achieved by cooperation rather than unilateral action by the United States. An effective means of assuring such cooperation would be Congressional authorization for the Department to negotiate bilateral pacts providing for the elimination of double taxation—that is, the exemption from U.S. taxes of the profits of American firms operating in Latin America. He expressed the opinion that the implementation of such a policy would result in the signature of bilateral tax agreements with all Latin American countries within two years.

Dr. Zuleta Angel also described to General Smith the anxiety of Colombia and other Caribbean countries over the Communist problem in Latin America. He expressed particular apprehension of Guatemala which was described as a Soviet test of United States reaction to Communist penetration of the Western Hemisphere. Communist success in Guatemala would be followed by attempts in other countries to the point where Communism might acquire an extensive foothold in the Western Hemisphere from which it might be dislodged only with difficulty.

He then described the unsatisfactory situation which might prevail at the next Inter-American Congress to be held at Caracas[2] at the end of this year. Among the countries represented, the U.S. would be able to count only upon nine of the ten countries in the Caribbean area, Guatemala being the exception. The Argentine and its "growing number of satellites" could be expected to make trouble. Brazil also could not be counted upon for any great assistance. (No mention was made of Peru and Ecuador.) This, he stated, emphasized the need for solidifying the hard core of U.S. support in the Caribbean area by eliminating the Guatemalan cancer of Communism.

Zuleta Angel then confidentially and "off-the-record" stated that the Caribbean countries themselves were on the verge of taking matters into their own hands. Colonel Castillo Amaya [Armas?], the Guatemalan revolutionary, and ex-Costa Rican president Calderon Guardia[3] had departed from Miami only this afternoon for the Dominican Republic, presumably to consult with General Trujillo. They expected to be in Washington within four or five days to report on operational plans. Although Guatemala was naturally the primary target, Costa Rica had also to be taken into consideration because of the Communist menace represented by Figueres. Zuleta Angel said that Castillo Amaya enjoyed the complete confidence of Colonel Perez Jimenez of Venezuela and could count upon the support of the Colombian Government, Colonel Remon, General Somoza, Lt. Col. Osorio, [3] Former President of Costa Rica.

General Trujillo and Colonel Batista. He repeated these names a few times. Castillo Amaya was described as an unusually effective person who could be counted upon to do a good job and who enjoyed everybody's confidence. Calderon Guardia was stated to be completely in accord with Castillo Amaya with the objective of insuring that Figueres would not become the President of Costa Rica. Calderon Guardia allegedly had no personal ambition to become President.

Zuleta Angel described the Guatemalan Army as being very well trained. He stated that President Arbenz' position had been solidified by the placement in strategic positions of 32 young officers who owed everything to him and who could be counted upon to be loyal to him. This situation however, had contributed to a wide-spread feeling of resentment against the Government among the officers who felt that they had been discriminated against. This was described as an important element of weakness for President Arbenz. Zuleta Angel also expressed the opinion that the hold of the Government over the Guatemalan people was shaky. He stated that most of the upper and middle class elements in the country hated the Government fiercely and were willing to do anything to unseat it. Although the Government had gained some support from agrarian reform, it could not count greatly upon effective support from the peasants who were generally peaceful and passive. Government support outside the Army was, therefore, largely concentrated in the cities. Zuleta Angel was greatly encouraged by the fact that even in the city of Guatemala which represented the Government's stronghold, it had been possible to defeat one of the Communist candidates in recent elections.

He expressed some apprehension over Mexican reaction to an attempt to overthrow the Guatemalan Government. He stated that although the Mexican Government itself would presumably not take a hand in the matter, there were many influential Army men dating back to the days of President Cardenas who had strong bonds of sympathy with the Guatemalan Army. In view of the looseness of Mexican Government control over the Army, it was entirely possible that some such units might intervene in a conflict involving Guatemala. Zuleta Angel then jokingly remarked that it was always possible in non-interventionist Mexico to buy arms for revolutionary purposes. Although arms purchased for leftist movements were very rarely interfered with, rightist purchasers of arms often found that they had run afoul of Mexican law.

Dr. Zuleta Angel stated, upon leaving, that he would keep Mr. Mann informed of developments.

713.00/5–1253

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 12, 1953.

Subject: ODECA[1]

Participants: Sr. Don Guillermo Sevilla-Sacasa, Ambassador of Nicaragua
Mr. John M. Cabot, Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs
Mr. John L. Ohmans, Nicaraguan Desk Officer

After the usual pleasant preliminaries and reference to Mr. Cabot's recent visit to Nicaragua, the Ambassador launched into a discussion of ODECA developments. He said Nicaragua was considering calling a meeting of the Central American Foreign Ministers (except Guatemala) in Managua as soon as possible. Since Guatemala had been noncommittal in its reply to Costa Rica's invitation to rejoin ODECA, he felt that the other ODECA nations should meet to show Guatemala that the Organization could continue without it.

The Ambassador spoke in general terms about a strong, denunciatory "Declaration of Managua" which would outline the policies of the Central American countries against the menace of communism. However, it was apparent that the Ambassador was not optimistic about the possibility of getting Costa Rica to agree to any clear and strong statement against communism inferentially directed at Guatemala.

Mr. Cabot wanted the Ambassador to know that the U.S. was very deeply concerned about the spread of communism in Latin America, especially in Guatemala. He emphasized the importance of having any action against communism clearly based upon proof of the communist actions of Guatemala which represent a danger to the internal affairs of the other countries.

Ambassador Sevilla-Sacasa recognized that proof would be necessary in order to justify any measures taken by the other countries against Guatemala. However, in his view, it would be perfectly proper and sound for the Foreign Ministers to make a declaration of policy in general against communism without making a specific reference to Guatemala. Meanwhile, the countries were working to document their case against Guatemala.

Mr. Cabot declined to comment directly on the Ambassador's question as to his reaction to such a meeting in Managua. He told the

[1]The Organization of Central American States (ODECA) was established by the Governments of El Salvador, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Nicaragua, and Honduras on Oct. 14, 1951 for the purpose of maintaining mutually friendly relations and cooperating to solve common problems.

Ambassador that, naturally, the United States would not wish to intervene in any matter of direct political concern to the Central American nations, but he assured him that the U.S. was very interested in ways of combatting communism in the area. Mr. Cabot added the U.S. could not advise the countries as to what steps they should take to act against Guatemala. The Ambassador said he expected and understood Mr. Cabot's reply.

The Ambassador agreed that Nicaragua could not and should not intervene in the internal affairs of Guatemala. However, he said that he understood there were many Guatemalan exiles outside of Guatemala who were anxious to return to Guatemala to change the state of affairs within the country. He observed that equally so, it would be intervention for any of the countries to interfere with the actions of those exiles who were anxious to bring about such a change within Guatemala, he added.

The Ambassador concluded by saying that he was leaving on May 12 for New York to take the Queen Mary to England to attend the Coronation ceremonies. He plans to be back in Washington on June 9.

Memorandum by the Officer in Charge of Central America and Panama Affairs (Leddy) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 5, 1954.

Subject: Assurances to Central American Governments of United States Support in Event of Attack from Guatemala

Responsive to Mr. Jamison's suggestion for review of the Department's action in 1953, in assuring certain Central American Governments of United States support in event of attack from Guatemala, the following is set forth.

In February 1953, the Government of El Salvador sent to Washington a special mission, composed of the Minister of Commerce (Dr. Jorge Sol), the Minister of Labor (Dr. Mario Salazar), and the Chief of Staff (Colonel Molina); the mission came to solicit the urgent assistance of the United States Government in procurement of arms, to defend El Salvador against an attack from Guatemala, which the Salvadoran Government then considered imminent. Since the arms and equipment desired were estimated to cost in excess of $2,000,000, which the mission regarded as too costly, it was suggested to the mission that some facility in acquisition could be obtained by entering into a military assistance agreement with the United States. The Salvadorans were reluctant to consider this agreement, which they stated would be unpopular politically at home and would expose El Salvador to the danger of Guatemalan reprisal before any arms and equipment to be delivered under the agreement could be received. Thereupon, the visiting mission and the Salvadoran Ambassador, Dr. Castro, were assured by Assistant Secretary Cabot that the United States Government would, by promptly honoring its commitments under the Rio Treaty and the OAS and UN Charters, safeguard El Salvador by coming immediately to its defense in the event of Guatemalan attack. Since the Salvadoran mission did not accept this assurance as sufficient (Colonel Molina said "our dishes will be broken in a few minutes and you could not come for at least 24 hours"), Mr. Cabot spoke directly with the President and Foreign Minister of the Salvadoran Government, during his visit in April 1953.[1] He repeated the assurances previously given with reference to our commitments under the Rio Treaty and the OAS and UN Charters.

Further, in April 1953, the Governments of four Central American countries (El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica) were uncertain as to whether or not to continue the Organization of Central American States, after Guatemala's withdrawal on April 1; and the Department acted to assure these Governments of our friendly interest, and support of the purposes of ODECA, through direct statements to this effect by our four Ambassadors to the respective Presidents or Foreign Ministers; Acting Assistant Secretary Mann spoke in the same sense to the respective Ambassadors of these four countries in Washington. The lukewarm attitude of Honduras toward ODECA was based on fear of Guatemala's greater military power, and the opportunity was therefore taken by Mr. Mann to assure the Honduran Ambassador in the same sense that Mr. Cabot had spoken with the Salvadorans.

These assurances were, in both cases, oral and informal, and referred to defense against aggression in the form of an armed attack by Guatemalan military forces.[2]

Editorial Note

During the months of May and June 1954, while events in Guatemala absorbed the attention of the United States and most other Central American countries, an abortive attempt to assassinate President Somoza of Nicaragua on April 4, 1954, created another source of tension in the region. Evidence accumulated by President Somoza indicated that the conspirators had been launched from Costa Rica with the possible complicity of leading Costa Rican officials, including President Figueres. For further documentation on the circumstances surrounding the assassination attempt, see pages 1378 ff.

The Chargé in Venezuela (Bernbaum) to the Department of State

SECRET PRIORITY CARACAS, July 9, 1954—9 p.m.

11. For Holland. Saw Otanez and Estrada separately after your call.[1] Although denying Venezuelan participation any plans attack Costa Rica, both flatly refused consider doing anything to protect Figueres. Otanez conceded after lengthy discussion that Department's intentions laudable and beyond reproach but insisted that Figueres' conciliatory attitude based only on fear reprisals and would change with elimination danger.

Estrada went further with allegation Figueres still tolerating continued aid plans for uprising in Venezuela and assassination President.

Both discounted importance Betancourt departure Costa Rica as inevitable due internal political situation but felt it could be constructive if future host country could be relied upon to check continued subversive plotting. They definitely felt United States not such a country and that his admission therein would reinforce growing resentment in Venezuelan and other Caribbean countries against United States efforts protect Costa Rica and readiness to build up Betancourt prestige. Although Otanez amenable Betancourt admission on basis reliable guarantees against political activities and declarations, Estrada stated definitely even this unacceptable and certain convince Perez Jimenez that US willfully irritating Venezuela. He queried whether Betancourt important enough to US to risk Venezuelan friendship.

Both unimpressed by our apprehension attack on Costa Rica could lead to serious damage inter-American system. Otanez observed it might be healthy bring differences out into the open even if that should involve division American Republics into two camps. He felt this would have virtue of reinforcing the bonds linking the anti-Communist countries as against the theoretical and tenuous unit now existing. He warned in a friendly manner that our insistence upon protecting Costa Rica even in the name of hemisphere unity could result in serious damage relations with our real friends. He observed that in such case the US would find that it could no longer count upon them in future emergencies such as the one involving Guatemala. Estrada was even more outspoken regarding the strain being placed on our relations with most Caribbean countries with which he was in daily contact. He spoke at length about the President's resentment over the Department's appeal to Gonzalez and other Ambassadors help protect Costa Rica. He felt this implied belief complicity their countries in "non-existent" invasion plots.

Estrada then smilingly expressed the firm conviction that Somoza was far too clever to invade Costa Rica. He repeated this a few times as well as the statement that Figueres was fortunate in not bordering on Venezuela. He referred to the possibility of an uprising by the "enraged" Costa Rican populace, expressed the hope that this would take place and stated that he would be careful not to let us know if he knew it were going to take place. He also repeated the threat of instant retaliation at first sign Costa Rican-based attack against Venezuela.

It is difficult to appraise the extent to which our representatives here and in Washington will influence Venezuelan plans for Costa Rica. Present indications are that a Nicaraguan-based "internal" coup may be in the making with Venezuelan moral or financial support. It is also depressingly clear that our relations with the top level of Venezuelan Government have deteriorated badly. It would appear desirable to prevent further deterioration by arranging for a destination other than the US for Betancourt. Gonzalez arriving July 11 for consultation.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of South American Affairs (Atwood) and the Deputy Director of the Office of Middle American Affairs (Neal) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 22, 1954.

Subject: Relations between Venezuela, Costa Rica, and Nicaragua.

In general the problem is one of two strong military authoritarian governments aligned against a government now headed by a liberal, but anti-communist, internationalist with a hate for "dictators." The Guatemalan political situation was always of secondary importance to Venezuela at least, and now that it has been resolved, the militarist Venezuelan and Nicaraguan leaders have turned their attention and energies to the alleged danger posed by Figueres and his supporters in Costa Rica. There are also strictly bilateral complexities, which are set forth below:

Venezuela–Costa Rica

There is a firm friendship between Costa Rican President Figueres and Rómulo Betancourt, leader of the Venezuelan party from which Col. Pérez Jiménez seized power in 1948. Figueres has provided a haven for Betancourt in exile, not too far from Venezuela. Figueres has not prevented Betancourt from issuing clandestine propaganda and letters to the press attacking the Venezuelan regime and defending himself from counter-attacks. (The action, apparently by the Venezuelan Government, of dropping scurrilous leaflets by plane over San José, attacking both Betancourt and Figueres exceeded any act by either Betancourt or Figueres.)

Betancourt is believed by the Venezuelan leaders to be plotting his return to power and coordinating those plans while living in Costa Rica. The chance of assassination of Pérez Jiménez at the instigation of the Venezuelan exiles appears slight. However, the continuance of the Venezuelan Government's attempts to assassinate its own exiles abroad gives the Venezuelan officials reason to feel some concern.

Costa Rica did not attend the OAS Conference in Caracas, stating clearly its distaste for the military regime in Venezuela and criticizing Venezuela for holding such a large number of political prisoners. Figueres (directly or through Betancourt) actively sought the support of other American Republics (particularly Uruguay, Bolivia, and Chile) to have the conference held elsewhere than in Caracas, unless Venezuela would release a substantial number of its political prisoners.

Figueres, with his Messiah complex and volatile personality, believes himself to be the man to save the repressed peoples of Latin America and has spoken out clearly against the "dictator" governments of Venezuela and Nicaragua. Such propaganda continues, though not so intensively. He is well regarded by the liberal press and by labor in the U.S.

All of the preceding is made more dangerous by Figueres' great unpredictability and his past record for plotting with his liberal friends in the hemisphere and the so-called Caribbean Legion to bring about the downfall of the dictators in the area.

Diplomatic relations between the two countries are not in effect at present. Venezuela withdrew its only representative on March 12, 1954, and Costa Rica has no representative present in Caracas.

While Estrada (Chief of the Venezuelan Seguridad Nacional and one of the most powerful men in Venezuela) continues to deny Venezuelan plans for attacking Costa Rica, it seems probable that Venezuela is giving moral, financial, and possibly technical support to a plot to overthrow Figueres. Estrada, arguing that Figueres is really a communist at heart, has said frankly that he would be careful not to inform us if he knew that a Costa Rican uprising were about to occur. At the same time he has spoken of reacting strongly if there were any indication that the Costa Ricans were even tolerating revolutionary plans against Venezuela; and he has alleged that with Figueres' help, Betancourt has assembled a mercenary army and an invasion fleet to attack Venezuela. Estrada has talked of "countering" a Costa Rican attack on Venezuela by using Canberra bombers to obliterate San José and a new Venezuelan destroyer to land 2,000 troops on Costa Rican shores, and he stated that this would mean war, regardless of the consequences for the OAS.

In view of the foregoing, Venezuela reacted strongly to the token U.S. shipment of arms to Costa Rica, since it indicated that Venezuela could not successfully treat Figueres as another Arbenz.

Nicaragua–Costa Rica

Somoza believes that Figueres was intimately involved in the April plot of Nicaraguan exiles coming from Cosa Rica to overthrow his government and assassinate him.

Nicaragua—or more properly Somoza—is concerned over the number of Nicaraguan exiles being harbored in Costa Rica.

Costa Rica recently has given indications of deporting nearly all of the exiles desired by Nicaragua.

Because of Figueres' all too public position against dictators, and specifically against Somoza, there is naturally no love lost by Somoza for Figueres.

Moreover, Somoza regards Betancourt as a danger against his own security, but admittedly not as much as does Venezuela.

Venezuela–Nicaragua

These two countries share similar views on government; they emphasize the military aspects of their national life; and stability of the present regime is considered more important than the freedom or rights of the individual.

Nicaragua, perhaps, permits more freedom of the press but not to a degree which would seriously affect the security of the regime.

Nicaragua is proud of and attempts to exploit its firm friendship with the U.S. It attempts to be more anti-communist than anyone, and many of its enemies are labeled communist for convenience, a practice Venezuela also follows. Venezuela is basically friendly toward the U.S. but is quick to show its independence, being aware of its strategic importance to us and conscious of its growing strength as a military and economic power in the Caribbean.

Both are of the rightist group of governments in the hemisphere—Dominican Republic, Cuba, Argentina, Peru.

Remedies—Action taken by the U.S. and further action required.

(a) With Costa Rica—

We have urged Costa Rica to get rid of the exiles in the country whom Venezuela and Nicaragua consider a menace to its security.

We have informed Costa Rica that it is not eligible for a military grant aid agreement. We approved the purchase of arms by Costa Rica. Doing that, we also told Costa Rica we felt it appropriate to encourage it to take action on its own to bring political stability to the area.

We have asked Costa Rica not to publicize further the purchase of the arms, thus to contribute to the easing of tensions in the area.

Costa Rica has indicated its willingness to deport most of the exiles considered dangerous by Nicaragua. Rómulo Betancourt may leave Costa Rica soon on his own volition and would presumably be followed by other AD exiles.

Figueres faces substantial domestic political trouble because of his international political escapades. He needs a relatively long period of stability at home to recoup his own political fortunes.

If Betancourt and the other principal AD leaders do not leave within a short period, we should continue to encourage the departure of these people and of any important Nicaraguan exiles who remain.

(b) With Nicaragua—

We have quite frankly told Nicaragua that we do not want it to contribute in any way to political instability in Central America. Somoza has indicated his concern over Nicaraguan exiles in Costa Rica, and once they have been deported by Costa Rica, he probably will desist from further menacing actions.

We have explained the reason for the arms shipment to Costa Rica and the fact that Costa Rica paid for all shipments.

We should observe closely Nicaragua's future actions to be certain that it continues to do its share in maintaining peaceful relations with Costa Rica.

(c) With Venezuela—

We have made our position regarding Costa Rica clear to Ambassador González and he appears to understand the problems but is not able to convince the President.

We have also conveyed this information to the Foreign Minister, but he seems to carry relatively little weight with the President today and merely reflects the President's annoyance with us.

We have made repeated efforts to put our position across to Estrada, as the man who carries most weight with the President, but he is intent on his own objectives and refuses to be convinced by our line of reasoning.

We should make further efforts to put the following points across clearly to Estrada and to the President:

1–Real explanation of the agreement between the United Fruit Company and Costa Rica is (a) Figueres had a very generous proposition to accept or reject; (b) Figueres was worried about possible foreign attack or internal revolution and wanted a quick settlement of United Fruit Company problem; (c) the U.S. did not take any part in these negotiations.

2–Figueres is now badly worried about internal revolution. He scarcely has arms to handle this, to say nothing of attack against another country. Costa Rica has no offensive weapons (which Venezuela does have) and no trained men to speak of. Figueres knows from experience that he could not mount an attack against another country, since he would have neither the armed forces nor the support of his people for such an attack. (The Venezuelan Government's alleged fear of Betancourt's ability to overthrow it must be appraised in the light of repeated evaluations by our own Embassy as well as by Pérez Jiménez and Estrada themselves of their own strength and stability.)

3–In the event of an armed attack by any State on Costa Rica, the U.S. would be obligated, as would all parties to the Rio Treaty, to go immediately to the assistance of Costa Rica (Article 3 of the Rio Treaty). In the event of an external challenge to Costa Rica's security, not an armed attack by another State, we would co-operate in the OAS action required to prevent or remove the causes of any breach of the peace. We would, likewise, live up to our obligations if Venezuela were attacked in similar manner and it requested help.

4–For each country to maintain its own economy in the strongest possible condition requires the maintenance of peace in the Western Hemisphere. (Peace and stability are essential to the flow of capital needed for continuance of Venezuela's public works program and its economic development.)

5–The necessity for solidarity of non-communist nations, even of widely diverse views, makes peace and a strong inter-American system essential in the Western Hemisphere. Venezuela, as well as the U.S., has much to lose by weakening the OAS. Our mutual interests lie in conciliating inter-American difficulties rather than aggravating them.

611.13/8–1854

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 18, 1954.

Subject: United States Policy Toward Central American Countries

Participants: The Secretary of State
Ambassador Thomas Whelan
Assistant Secretary Henry F. Holland

The Secretary told Ambassador Whelan more or less the following:

If there is a renewal of violence of any kind in Central America at this time, it will create very serious problems for the United States. During the Guatemalan crisis we insisted that the problem be handled within the OAS rather than the United Nations. We were opposed by Russia and by a strong group of our allies, including the United Kingdom, France, Australia, and Denmark. When Eden visited the United States, the Secretary met him at the airport and, coming in from the airport to the White House, told him that we were deeply concerned at the news that the United Kingdom would vote with others against the United States to name an investigating group to look into the Guatemalan crisis. He told Eden that the United States considered it imperative that he countermand instructions under which the United Kingdom Delegation was acting in the United Nations. In view of the Secretary's very firm position, Eden told his Delegate to abstain. France followed suit and, as a result, the United Nations did not take jurisdiction of the problem, and it was handled within the OAS.

If a new crisis now arises in Central America, our own allies will agree with Russia that it was a mistake to let the last problem be handled in the OAS and they will side with Russia, thus damaging the prestige of the United States and weakening the OAS.

In view of the foregoing problems, it is essential from the United States point of view that there be a period of peace and quiet in Central America. We do not insist on public displays of friendships or reconciliation, but we do feel that a return to normalcy is essential.

By following an inconsistent policy, President Somoza is forcing us into two courses of action:

1. We are finding it necessary to satisfy the urgent request of Costa Rica for arms with the result that a military force is being built up in the country adjoining him, a fact which can only prejudice Somoza's interests.
2. We find ourselves taking measures to neutralize acts of President Somoza such as sending his troops to the border, sending planes over the border, all of which acts on our part would indicate unfriendliness to him and support for Figueres.[1]

Actually, we have no particular predilection for Figueres who has often followed trouble-making policies. On the other hand, we feel and traditionally have felt that President Somoza and the Government of Nicaragua are very close to us. It, therefore, causes us considerable concern to find ourselves in a position of opposition. Nevertheless, this is our policy and will continue to be our policy. The Secretary hopes that President Somoza would understand the reasons behind our policy and would work with us.

SECRET WASHINGTON, August 24, 1954.

NIE–80–54

THE CARIBBEAN REPUBLICS[2]

THE PROBLEM

To estimate the situation and probable developments in the Caribbean republics (Cuba, Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Guatemala, El

[1] National Intelligence Estimates (NIEs) were high-level interdepartmental reports presenting authoritative appraisals of vital foreign policy problems. NIEs were drafted by officers from those agencies represented on the Intelligence Advisory Committee (IAC), discussed and revised by interdepartmental working groups coordinated by the Office of National Estimates of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), approved by the IAC, and circulated under the aegis of the CIA to the President, appropriate officers of cabinet level, and the National Security Council. The Department of State provided all political and some economic sections of NIEs.

[2] A note on the source text indicates that the Central Intelligence Agency and the intelligence organizations of the Departments of State, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Joint Staff participated in the preparation of this estimate. The Intelligence Advisory Committee concurred in this estimate on Aug. 24, 1954.

Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Panama), with reference to their political stability and their relations with one another and with the United States.

CONCLUSIONS

1. The generally prevailing characteristics of the Caribbean republics are social immobility, economic underdevelopment, and political immaturity. The vast majority of their heterogeneous population is illiterate, poverty-stricken, and socially and politically inert. Traditionally, politics have revolved around persons rather than public issues; the continued or shifting favor of the army has been the decisive political factor; and rule by military "strong men" has been normal. The constant struggle for power has created a pattern of intrigue and conspiracy, often with international ramifications and implications, and of corresponding suspicion and repression. The transfer of political power is generally accomplished by revolution rather than by election, but really bloody civil conflicts are rare.

2. During recent years the traditional ruling elements have been faced by steadily increasing demands for social, economic, and political change, voiced by small but growing urban middle class elements with increasing popular support. The pressure for change has not been uniform throughout the area. In Guatemala, it was such as to shatter the traditional order in the Revolution of 1944. It has been less spectacularly effective in Cuba, Costa Rica, and Panama, but is only beginning to be felt in Haiti, El Salvador, and Honduras. It has been effectively contained by strongly entrenched authoritarian regimes in the Dominican Republic and Nicaragua.

3. The pressure for change will continue to grow. For the time being, however, the elements resisting change are in the ascendant. Whether eventual change is orderly will depend in large measure on whether the existing regimes can bring themselves to promote social, economic, and political progress, or whether, through static repression, they make virtually certain an eventual violent explosion. In any case, no substantial improvement in basic conditions is likely to occur for many years.

4. The overthrow of the Arbenz regime in Guatemala has removed the most immediate and dangerous threat to stability and order in the region. Elsewhere, Communist potentialities have been held reasonably well in check, though the situation is far from satisfactory in Cuba and Honduras. The strength of Communism throughout the region as measured by the number of Communists and self-conscious Communist sympathizers is small. Nevertheless, there is a real danger, growing out of the confused and unchanneled character of the slowly rising pressure for reform, that Communists will be able (as they were in Guatemala) partially to infiltrate or to influence economic groups, reform movements, reformist regimes, and politically ambitious individuals or groups, and thus to acquire in particular countries an influence wholly disproportionate to either their numbers or the popular acceptance of their doctrines. Throughout the region the Communists will continue to make the most of plentiful opportunities for agitation.

5. The prospects for stability and order in Guatemala depend on whether the new regime can and will adhere to the broad objectives of the Revolution of 1944 while eliminating Communism. Any other policy would be likely to precipitate further internal conflict.

6. The greatest present threat to stability and order in the region is the animosity of Presidents Somoza of Nicaragua and Perez Jimenez of Venezuela toward the Figueres regime in Costa Rica. Figueres' recent more conciliatory attitude has eased the situation somewhat, but neither Somoza nor Perez Jimenez is likely to become reconciled to the continued existence of the Figueres regime.

7. The October election in Honduras may precipitate armed violence in some degree. The outcome is unpredictable. President Batista will make sure of winning the November election in Cuba.

8. With the notable exception of Guatemala under Arbenz, the Caribbean republics have recognized that they must accommodate their policies to US security interests in the Caribbean area. In return for their cooperation, however, they expect from the United States protection, toleration of their peculiar domestic political processes, and a generous attitude toward their economic problems. They rely upon the sympathy and support of other Latin American republics to safeguard them against unacceptable US interference and domination.

9. In Caribbean and in other Latin American opinion, the issue of social and political reform versus traditional authoritarianism is of greater immediate importance than the question of Communism or anti-Communism. The reformists contend that the United States has a moral obligation to foster social and political development in the area. On the other hand, the Caribbean "strong men" resent any indication of US support for reformist regimes as a betrayal of the "true friends" of the United States. It is a primary Communist objective to identify the United States as the chief support of Caribbean dictatorship and the chief obstacle to social and political progress.

10. The armed forces of the Caribbean republics exist to defend their incumbent governments against internal subversion, filibustering expeditions, and armed intervention by antagonistic neighboring regimes. In Caribbean opinion, defense against any more formidable aggression is beyond the republics' limited capabilities and sure to be provided by the United States in its own interest. Under the concept of hemisphere defense, however, and with requisite US assistance, most of the Caribbean republics will probably maintain small units equipped and trained for modern combat and available to assist in an integrated defense of the Caribbean area.

DISCUSSION

I. Strategic Importance

11. The strategic importance of the Caribbean republics is a function of their proximity to the United States and the Panama Canal, to the routes between them, and to the sea and air routes between the United States and South America. It has long been a cardinal principle of US policy to ensure against a lodgment by any potentially hostile power anywhere within the Caribbean area. Conversely, US access to military base sites in the republics in case of need is a matter of considerable strategic interest. The only important existing military bases in the republics are the US installations in the Panama Canal Zone and at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

12. The armed forces of the Caribbean republics exist primarily for the maintenance of internal security and are not in all cases fully adequate even for that limited purpose. In the event of war, the republics could make no contribution to hemisphere defense of more than local significance.

13. The Caribbean republics supply the United States with important quantities of coffee, sugar, and bananas. They are not an important source of industrial raw materials, although small amounts of strategic minerals are obtained from Cuba.

14. The political cooperation of these nine small but sovereign states is of considerable importance to the United States in promoting the concept of hemisphere solidarity and in furthering its policies in the United Nations.

II. Basic Conditions and Trends

15. The Caribbean republics have not departed greatly from the colonial pattern of living: social immobility, economic underdevelopment, and political immaturity are their prevailing characteristics. The generally dominant socio-political element is the landed gentry in combination with the military and, to a varied extent, the Church. The vast majority of the population is socially and politically inert, illiterate, and poverty-stricken. Substantial segments of the population are virtually untouched by Western civilization. In recent years, however, a small but growing urban middle class has assumed increasing importance in the economic and political life of the area.

16. The 21,000,000 inhabitants of the Caribbean republics are of diverse racial stocks and admixtures (see Annex I[3]). The population is preponderantly white in Costa Rica, negro in Haiti, mulatto in Cuba and the Dominican Republic, Indian in Guatemala, and mestizo (mixed Indian and white) elsewhere. In every case, however, the white element has remained socially and politically dominant, except in Haiti, which is ruled by a largely mulatto elite.

17. Most of the people of the area derive their livelihood directly from the soil. Agricultural methods are generally primitive, except in the production of export crops. These crops, excepting coffee, have been developed largely by foreign enterprise. Economic development has been retarded by lack of capital and of technical skill and by the inadequacy of transportation and power facilities and of other basic services. Foreign direct private investments in the area are predominantly of US capital, including all major foreign economic enterprises.

18. Traditionally, political power has been monopolized by upper class groups related by blood, marriage, or economic interest. Even though some of the republics have a broad franchise, in none of them, except Costa Rica, is there the articulate popular participation required to give reality to democratic processes. Consequently politics have revolved around persons rather than public issues, the continued or shifting favor of the army has been the decisive political factor, and rule by military "strong men" has been normal. In an environment of such political immaturity, the constant struggle for power has created a pattern of intrigue and conspiracy, often with international ramifications and implications, and of corresponding suspicion and repression. The transfer of real political power from one group to another is generally accomplished by revolution rather than by election. Such revolutions are usually a matter of military pronunciamiento, with minimal public disturbance. Really bloody civil conflicts are rare.

19. During the last thirty years the traditional ruling elements in the Caribbean republics have been faced by steadily increasing demands for social, economic, and political change. These demands come, not from the peasant masses, but from urban elements: students and intellectuals, business and professional men, labor leaders, and junior army officers. These elements are motivated by their own frustrations and dissatisfactions and by a variety of foreign influences, US, Mexican, and Argentine as well as Communist. They have no common program, but all desire recognition and a share in political power. In seeking to arouse mass support, they have tended to adopt extremist doctrines and demagogic tactics.

[3] Not printed here.

20. Throughout the area, agitation against the traditional order of society has had strong nationalistic overtones. Frequently this nationalistic sentiment has been directed against the special privileges granted in former times to foreign economic enterprises.

21. Pressure for and resistance to change have not been uniform throughout the area. In Guatemala the tranditional order was shattered by the Revolution of 1944. In Cuba, Costa Rica, and Panama pressures for change have been effective to a considerable degree. Such pressures are only beginning to be felt in El Salvador, Honduras, and Haiti. They have been effectively contained by strongly entrenched authoritarian regimes in Nicaragua and the Dominican Republic.

III. The Existing Political Regimes

22. Cuba is ruled by a military "strong man," Fulgencio Batista, who emerged from obscurity as leader of the "Sergeants' Revolt" in 1933, when he gained control of the Cuban Army. After making and breaking several presidents in succession, Batista himself assumed the presidency in 1940. He found it expedient to retire quietly at the end of his term in 1944. In 1952 he again presented himself as a candidate, but then forestalled the election by seizing power in an Army coup. He proceeded to suspend the Congress, to dissolve the existing political parties, and to promulgate a new constitution by decree. General elections under a revised electoral law, repeatedly promised, have been repeatedly postponed. They are now scheduled for November 1954, with Batista an announced candidate.

23. The stability of the Batista regime depends upon the continued support of the Army, which seems assured. In addition, Batista has some popular following, primarily among lower class elements. He is seeking to broaden his political support by an extensive public works program and by middle-of-the-road policies calculated to appeal to conservative opinion. He operates politically through a coalition of four parties, of which two are new groups organized by personal adherents and two are small old-line rightist groups led by opportunist politicians.

24. Although the Batista regime is generally unpopular, political opposition to it is disorganized and ineffectual. The only registered opposition party, that led by ex-President Grau, has recently shown that it has considerable popular support, despite its lack of a positive program, but all efforts to form a united front of the many opposition elements have failed. Because of personal rivalries, fear of repression, and a widespread belief that the election will be rigged, it is unlikely that an effective political opposition can be developed.

25. There is another opposition in exile, composed of members of the Prio administration and other politicians ousted by Batista in 1952.

It also is disorganized and ineffective. There can be no doubt that some of the exiles are plotting a countercoup, but it is unlikely that such an attempt could succeed. Nevertheless, constant rumors of an impending coup have an unsettling effect in Cuba and have kept the Cuban armed forces in a quasi-alert status for over two years.

26. Haiti is ruled by another military "strong man," Paul Magloire, formerly commandant of the palace guard, who ousted his predecessor by coup in 1950. He acted with the support of the predominantly mulatto elite, who could not tolerate the former president's attempt to arouse the black masses in support of his own ambition to serve an unconstitutional second term. Magloire was subsequently elected by popular vote and rules as a constitutional president. He seems to have struck a nice balance in courting popularity while keeping the populace under firm control. By legislation providing for his continued control of the armed forces after the expiration of his term as president, Magloire has already arranged to retain real power indefinitely.

27. The Dominican Republic is ruled by the most durable "strong man" of the Caribbean, Generalissimo Dr. Rafael Leonidas Trujillo, "Benefactor of the Fatherland." He secured command of the Dominican armed forces shortly after the withdrawal of the US military occupation in 1924 and has been in effective control of the country ever since. He occupied the presidency himself during 1930–1938 and 1942–1952, and now maintains his brother, Hector, in that office. The Dominican Republic is a one-party state and is administered, in substantial effect, as the private estate of the Trujillo family.

28. Guatemala is under the provisional government of a military junta headed by Carlos Castillo Armas, leader of the June 1954 revolutionary attack on the Arbenz regime, but including Elfego Monzon, representative of the regular armed forces. As a follower of Francisco Arana, Castillo participated in the Revolution of 1944 and held several responsible Army positions under the Arevalo administration, but broke with the regime when Arana was assassinated in furtherance of Arbenz' political ambitions. Monzon remained in the Army and held the post of Minister without Portfolio under Arbenz, but gained a reputation as an outspoken critic of the Communistic tendencies of the regime. Although both are hostile to Communism, Castillo and Monzon manifestly represent different factions, and circumstances may make them personal rivals. For the short term at least, the stability and effectiveness of the new regime will depend on their ability to cooperate in the national interest.

29. In the longer view, the success of the new regime in Guatemala will depend on its ability to eliminate Communism without repudiating the objectives and achievements of the Revolution of 1944. The overthrow of Arbenz has been hailed with enthusiasm in Guatemala

City, which was always strongly anti-Communist in sentiment, but the urban reformist elements there would not welcome an attempt to re-establish the traditional social and political order. In the countryside, there are both reactionaries who would like to undo the Revolution of 1944 in the name of anti-Communism and aroused agrarian workers who fear that the Castillo regime will deprive them of their recent gains. A constructive and enduring solution of Guatemala's political problems thus requires great skill and discrimination on the part of the new government.

30. The President of El Salvador is Oscar Osorio. In 1948, as a junior army officer, he led a coup which overthrew his dictatorial predecessor and established a liberal and progressive, but not radical, regime. He was elected constitutional president in 1950, for a six-year term.

31. The President of Honduras is Dr. Juan Manuel Galvez, a lawyer put in office by Tiburcio Carias, the erstwhile "strong man" of that country. Carias gained control of Honduras in 1923, when he led the Conservatives to victory over the Liberals in a civil war. For a time his position was precarious, but his demonstrated ruthlessness eventually discouraged opposition. He occupied the presidency himself from 1933 to 1949, when he voluntarily retired in favor of Dr. Galvez. The Galvez administration, however, has displeased him: Galvez presumed to act as president in fact and to permit an unprecedented degree of liberalization in Honduras. Carias has therefore presented himself as a candidate for reelection in October 1954.

32. The prospective election of 1954 has created a situation of mounting tensions and involves a possibility of civil war. A three-party contest is in progress among the Nacionalistas (supporters of Carias), the Reformistas (supporters of Galvez, whose candidate is Abraham Williams), and the Liberals (whose candidate is Dr. Ramon Villeda Morales). The political situation is fluid, however. The fact that no one party can count on being able by itself to win and secure power favors the formation of party combinations, any one of which could probably be assured a victory. An alliance between the Nacionalistas and the Liberals is not very likely. In this situation the Reformistas would appear to hold the balance of power. If the Reformistas should combine with the Nacionalistas, the resultant regime probably would be secure against Liberal opposition, even in the unlikely event that such opposition should be armed. A Reformista alliance with the Liberals would eliminate Carias politically. Carias, might be tempted to resort to arms in order to forestall such an eventuality. He might also be tempted to do so even after such an alliance had been effected, but his chances of success in such circumstances would be smaller. In any such attempt Carias would have the support of a considerable number of private armed personal followers and probably also of at least a portion of the national army.

33. The "strong man" of Nicaragua is Anastasio Somoza, who was left in command of the Nicaraguan armed forces on the withdrawal of the US military occupation in 1932 and has been in effective control of the country ever since. Somoza has occupied the presidency himself since 1936, except for a brief interval (1947–1950) during which he nevertheless retained control of the armed forces.

34. In contrast to its neighbors, Costa Rica has a long tradition of orderly democratic government. However, the regime of President Rafael Calderon Guardia (1940–1944) and his handpicked successor, Teodoro Picado (1944–1948), was dictatorial. This regime was closely associated with President Somoza of Nicaragua, but, paradoxically, Picado was also dependent on the political support of a rapidly developing Communist movement in Costa Rica. In 1948 the regime attempted to nullify the election of Otilio Ulate, a conservative. It was promptly overthrown by a revolt led by Jose Figueres, a wealthy planter. Figueres headed a provisional government which held power for eighteen months before finally permitting Ulate to take office. In 1953, on the completion of Ulate's term, Figueres was duly elected constitutional president.

35. Figueres is the somewhat erratic leader of the young reformists in Costa Rica and a man of rather advanced socialistic ideas, but he and his administration are definitely anti-Communist. The Figueres regime is faced by an internal conservative opposition led by ex-President Ulate and an opposition in exile principally composed of elements expelled in 1948 and led by ex-President Calderon Guardia. The latter is the more dangerous inasmuch as it can count on the powerful support of Presidents Somoza of Nicaragua and Perez Jimenez of Venezuela.

36. The President of Panama is Jose Remon, formerly Commandant of the National Police (the only armed force), who was duly elected in 1952 for a four-year term. Remon is a self-made man and is responsive to reformist pressures, but, as a former police chief, he is also conscious of the requirements for order and security. Internal stability during his term seems assured.

IV. Communist Strength and Influence

37. Communist political parties are illegal in all the Caribbean republics, but Communist activities are carried on clandestinely and by a variety of front organizations. Total Communist party membership in these countries is estimated to be about 35,000, of whom some 25,000 are in Cuba. Communist strength in Guatemala was estimated to be about 4,000 before the anti-Communist revolution in June 1954. The Communist parties elsewhere are numerically negligible. Except in the special case of Guatemala, and perhaps Honduras, Communist party membership has generally declined during the past year, and it will now almost certainly decline in Guatemala also. The Communists have not penetrated the Caribbean armed forces to any appreciable extent. However, the experience in Guatemala indicates the extent to which a Communist dominated regime can neutralize the usual role of the Army.

38. Throughout the area the Communists exert an influence far out of proportion to their limited numerical strength through the skill with which they have identified themselves with progressive and nationalistic movements. Thus the rising non-Communist demand for social, economic, and political change has been exploited to serve Communist purposes: to discredit anti-Communist governments and to convert popular dissatisfactions into antagonism toward the US. Communist efforts to these ends have been greatly facilitated by the memory of US military interventions in the Caribbean republics, by the susceptibility of the intelligentsia to Marxist cliches, and by the ease with which the established economic pattern could be characterized as "feudal" and "colonial."

39. Guatemala is, of course, the prime example of the successful application of this Communist technique. There, through personal influence with President Arbenz, a small but zealous group of Communists was able to gain control of the implementation of the social reforms promised by the Revolution of 1944. The potential opposition was fragmented. The traditional ruling elements, landed gentry and senior army officers, had been discredited. Anti-Communist urban reformist elements were themselves antagonistic toward "feudal" landholders and foreign corporations and were therefore unwilling to make common cause with them against the Communists. Arbenz' control of the Army neutralized its anti-Communist tendencies and protected the regime against counter-revolutionary attempts. Under Arbenz' patronage, the Communists were able to infiltrate and dominate other political parties and to begin building up a mass following of their own through their control of labor organizations and of agrarian reform. Given a little more time, they might have made their position secure against any internal opposition through the development of an armed workers' and peasants' militia.

40. Possession of a secure base in Guatemala greatly enhanced Communist capabilities throughout the Caribbean area. The example of Guatemala was in itself infectious. Guatemalan propaganda against "feudalism" and "colonialism" appealed to the prejudices of a wide audience. Guatemala afforded not only a safe refuge for Communist fugitives from other countries, but also a base for international con-spiratorial action. Communist subversive activity based on Guatemala was apparent in the strike of Honduran plantation workers. That technique was capable of further extension.

41. The Guatemalan anti-Communist revolution of June 1954 has deprived the Communists of the advantages which they derived from the patronage and protection of President Arbenz, but the ensuing situation has aspects subject to Communist exploitation. For example, the revolution itself will continue to be represented in Communist propaganda as a US intervention in behalf of the United Fruit Company, an effective line with a Caribbean audience predisposed to believe the worst of the United States, the United Fruit Company, and Caribbean "reactionaries." The Communists may also have a capability to create disturbances in Guatemala through guerilla action by armed bands of agrarian workers.

42. Since the Communist reverse in Guatemala, the Popular Socialist Party in Cuba (PSP), the largest Communist party in the Caribbean, is also the most influential. The PSP has support in student, youth, and women's groups and among intellectuals, but its main following lies in the trade unions, especially in transportation, sugar mill, and tobacco workers' unions.

43. The PSP's effectiveness has been reduced by the anti-Communist measures of the Batista government, which have outlawed the party as such, suppressed its key publications, declared Communists ineligible to hold public and union offices, and restricted travel to Soviet Bloc countries. The PSP has also been hindered by its failure to form a united front with other opposition groups, and by dissension within its own ranks. Nevertheless, the Communist leadership in Cuba remains united and militant, and individual Communists have been successful in penetrating other political parties, labor unions, and the bureaucracy, particularly the Ministry of Labor. They have had conspicuous success in the two pro-Batista parties. This success is attributable in part to the fact that the influential non-Communist Cuban Labor Confederation has consistently belittled the importance of the relatively small pro-Batista elements in organized labor, with the result that the pro-Batista parties have turned to the Communists as a means of acquiring influence among the workers.

44. The attitude of President Batista himself toward the Cuban Communists has been equivocal. He has cooperated with them in the past, as have his political opponents. He now takes an anti-Communist line in international affairs and has outlawed the PSP, but he has also professed to believe that Communism is not an important factor in domestic affairs and that in any case it can be readily controlled.

45. Elsewhere in the area the development of Communist potentialities has been held well in check. In El Salvador in 1932 a Communist-inspired peasant uprising was ruthlessly suppressed. Since then the only serious Communist threat has been that of infection from Guatemala. The development of a Communist threat in Costa Rica was frustrated by the anti-Communist revolution of 1948. President Remon has sharply curtailed the once extensive Communist influence in Panama. The surprisingly well organized strike of plantation workers in northern Honduras was indicative of Communist underground activity, but the anti-Communist revolution in Guatemala has deprived the Honduran movement of valuable outside support. No appreciable Communist threat has developed in Nicaragua, Haiti, or the Dominican Republic.

46. Caribbean Communist international contacts are maintained through the Communist-controlled Latin American Confederation of Labor (CTAL), with headquarters at Mexico City, and through the travel of party leaders and selected sympathizers to Soviet Bloc countries and to Communist-sponsored international conferences. There has been a marked increase in such travel since 1950, the expense being borne for the most part by the USSR.

V. The Armed Forces

47. The armed forces of the Caribbean republics exist to defend their incumbent governments against internal subversion, filibustering expeditions from abroad, and the possibility of armed intervention by antagonistic neighboring regimes. In Caribbean opinion, defense against any more formidable aggression is both beyond the republics' limited capabilities and sure to be provided by the United States in its own interest. Under the concept of hemisphere defense, however, and with requisite provision of US assistance, most of the Caribbean republics will probably maintain small units equipped and trained for modern combat and available to assist in an integrated defense of the Caribbean area.

48. The ground forces of the Caribbean republics (see Annex II[4]) consist of both army units and militarized police. That distinction is generally without real significance. Both army and police forces are normally dispersed in small units, except for concentrations of both at the capital cities. Such concentrations of army strength generally amount to less than the numerical equivalent of one US infantry battalion. The ground forces of Haiti, the Dominican Republic, and Nicaragua were originally organized as constabularies during US military occupation and retain that essential character, despite changes in nomenclature. Costa Rica realistically describes its only armed force as the Civil Guard. Panama has recently redesignated its National Police as the National Guard, the term also used by Nicaragua. The Cuban

Army (20,000 men) is the only one worthy of consideration as an army.

49. Air forces are maintained by all the Caribbean republics except Costa Rica and Panama (see Annex II), but the Dominican and Cuban air forces are the only ones with appreciable strength in men, pilots, and aircraft. The others are minor auxiliary units with few qualified pilots and generally obsolete equipment. However, the effect achieved by Castillo Armas' minute air force is likely to intensify Caribbean interest in air capabilities.

50. Such Caribbean navies as exist are essentially coast guards. Cuba and the Dominican Republic have an additional special interest in maintaining naval capabilities for defense against filibusters. Their navies are the only ones worthy of consideration (see Annex II).

51. At present the armed forces of Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Guatemala, El Salvador, and Nicaragua are capable of maintaining internal security and defending against raids. Those of Haiti, Honduras, Costa Rica, and Panama are capable only of suppressing minor civil disturbances. In a major emergency most of the Caribbean republics would expect to augment their armed forces with hastily assembled volunteers.

52. The United States maintains army missions in all the Caribbean republics except Haiti and the Dominican Republic, air force missions in all except the Dominican Republic, Costa Rica, and Panama, and navy missions in Cuba and Haiti. In addition, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Nicaragua, and Honduras have entered into military assistance agreements with the United States, and a similar agreement is under negotiation with El Salvador. Under these agreements, Cuba and the Dominican Republic have undertaken to contribute naval and air units to hemisphere defense. Nicaragua and Honduras have undertaken to furnish one infantry battalion each for the same purpose, and the same commitment is being sought from El Salvador.

VI. General Economic Conditions

53. The nine Caribbean republics are similar in economic structure, though they vary widely in rate of economic growth and capacity for development. With the exception of Panama, which depends substantially on commercial activities, their economies are based primarily on agriculture, which provides nearly all of their food requirements and the bulk of their exports. Industrial output is confined largely to processed foodstuffs and nondurable consumers' goods. Except in the production of export crops, agricultural methods are technologically backward. The industrial plant, geared to limited national markets, is in general small and poorly equipped. Basic service industries are insufficiently developed to permit large scale and sustained economic development. The area's low economic capability is indicated by the low level of per capita national income, which ranges from $296 in Cuba to $40 in Haiti and is generally below $100 (see Annex I).

54. Inasmuch as the area's requirements for capital goods and for a very large proportion of consumers' goods must be procured from abroad, foreign trade is vital to the national economies and they are vulnerable to fluctuations in the terms of trade. The principal export commodities are coffee, sugar, and bananas (see Annex III[5]). The United States is the principal market and source of supply for each of the nine republics.

55. After an interval of readjustment in the immediate postwar years, the economic position of most of the Caribbean republics has generally improved. A sustained rise in the prices of their export commodities has notably improved their terms of trade and stimulated economic growth. The coffee producing countries are currently enjoying a special advantage in this respect. On the other hand, Cuba and the Dominican Republic have been adversely affected since 1952 by declining demand and prices for their sugar. The most difficult economic situation is that of Panama, the economy of which is largely dependent on the level of US activity in the Canal Zone. Panama's readjustment to the cessation of US wartime operations in the Zone has been prolonged and painful.

56. Throughout the area, production of foodstuffs and raw materials for local consumption has on the whole kept pace with population growth. Most countries have also made progress in expanding the industrial sectors of their economies through increased production of consumers' goods and construction materials. However, the relatively slow development of basic services has been an important limitation on economic growth.

57. Desire for economic development has stimulated government study of economic potential and the preparation of development programs. The governments of Cuba, Haiti, Guatemala, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica have been active in this respect. However, the implementation of such programs is hindered by lack of readily available capital resources and of technical skills.

58. In recent years, foreign private investment capital has generally been unwilling to enter the area on a large scale, partly for lack of confidence in political stability, partly also in view of the narrow limitations of local markets. Foreign investment has continued to expand, however, in those fields in which such investment was already large, notably in the banana and electric power industries. Moreover, several republics (Cuba, Haiti, El Salvador, Nicaragua, and Panama) have been able to obtain modest financial assistance from the Export-Import Bank or the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

VII. Internal Policies Affecting US Private Interests

59. Caribbean dissatisfaction with a "colonial" economic status finds expression in antagonism toward the large US corporations operating in the area, particularly toward those which enjoy special privileges granted in former times. The Communists exploit this dissatisfaction for their own purposes, but the sentiment is real and general. Various pressures have been brought to bear to compel such interests to relinquish their special privileges and to pay higher wages and taxes.

60. Aggregate US direct private investments are greatest in Cuba and Panama, on a lesser scale in the Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Honduras, and Costa Rica, and relatively slight in Haiti, El Salvador, and Nicaragua (see Annex III). They consist chiefly of plantations and public utilities (transportation, telecommunications, and electric power). The largest single US interest in the area is the United Fruit Company, which operates in all of the Caribbean republics except Haiti, but mainly in Guatemala, Honduras, Costa Rica, and Panama. It is the principal target of Caribbean economic nationalism and of Communist agitation.

61. The United Fruit Company, parent company to some sixty operating subsidiaries, has total assets estimated at $580,000,000. Its primary business is the production of a major part of the world's marketable supply of bananas, but it incidentally produces abaca, cacao, hardwoods, palm oil, and sugar as well. Its landholdings in the Caribbean republics, Jamaica, Colombia, and Ecuador amount to some 3,000,000 acres, and it provides employment for some 90,000 persons in those countries. In addition to its plantations, it operates 1,500 miles of railways, several ports, a fleet of 65 ships, and extensive telecommunications facilities. These services, provided for its own convenience, are also of vital importance to the economies of Guatemala, Honduras, Costa Rica, and Panama, as are also the company's payments to governments, private firms, and wage earners in those countries. At the same time, the company provides for its employees housing, commissaries, schools, hospitals, social services, and recreational facilities that would otherwise not be available to them.

62. The United Fruit Company has made and is making a most important contribution to the economic development of Central America, but there is in those countries a strong sense that, out of its profits, it could contribute more. The Company's over-all financial strength and its dominant position in several national economies are regarded as a threat to national sovereignty. This sense of an implicit threat is strengthened by the recollection of former times when the Company brought up venal politicians to facilitate the negotiation of favorable concessions and was commonly understood to have also procured revolutions whenever its interests would be furthered thereby. Nationalistic opinion discounts the benefits extended by the Company to its employees as grudging responses to pressure exerted by governments and labor organizations. In any case, the Company's paternalism is itself offensive to ardent nationalism. For example, in Costa Rica, which has long taken pride in its schools, the Company's separate school system has been an affront to the national dignity.

63. The United Fruit Company encountered its worst difficulties in Guatemala under the Arbenz regime. Whatever the merits of Guatemalan domestic legislation, the laws were undoubtedly applied with extreme prejudice toward the Company. In addition to constant harassment in labor courts with respect to wages and working conditions, it suffered the expropriation of a large proportion of its landholdings without regard for its operating requirements and without adequate compensation.

64. In contrast to its Guatemalan experience, the Company has been able to negotiate with Costa Rica a revision of the terms of its contract which may serve as a model for readjustments elsewhere. The Company has conceded to Costa Rica the right to take over the schools, hospitals, and dispensaries now operated by it, and has accepted an increase in its taxes up to 30 percent of the net profit of all its operations in that country.

65. US-owned sugar companies operating in the Dominican Republic have also experienced disciminatory pressures by the Dominican Government, but this seems to be a matter of private extortion rather than of public policy.

VIII. Intraregional Relationships

66. The relationships of the Caribbean republics with one another are conditioned in part by their historical origins and associations. Haiti is singular, as a former French colony and a Negro state. It was the first to achieve independence, in 1803, but for generations was ostracized as a menace to the peace and social order of the region. The Dominican Republic, which considers itself a white community in contrast to Haiti, was annexed by Haiti, 1822–1844, and for another thirty years was subject to repeated Haitian attempts to reconquer it. Haitian-Dominican relations remain embittered by this history and by color prejudice. Central America was a single Spanish colony which became an independent federal state in 1824. The Federation dissolved in 1838, but repeated attempts have been made to revive it, the latest effort in this direction being the Organization of Central American States (ODECA). Meanwhile the successor republics have freely interfered in one another's affairs. Cuba remained a Spanish colony until 1898; Panama, a part of Colombia until 1903.

67. The conspiratorial and revolutionary politics of the Caribbean normally extend across national boundaries. For over a century it has been customary for the leading adherents of a regime overthrown by revolution to take refuge in a sympathetic neighboring country, there to plot counterrevolution with the sufferance, and perhaps the active support, of the host government. Conversely, the security of a given regime is seen to depend in large part on the existence of friendly governments in neighboring countries, a consideration which may lead to the fomenting of revolution abroad in order to forestall revolution at home. Thus a successful revolution in one country is likely to lead to revolutionary attempts in others as well as to international counterrevolutionary conspiracy.

68. This tendency has been accentuated by the increasing tension between traditionalist and reformist elements in the Caribbean, which has resulted in shifting international alignments involving most, but not all, of the Caribbean republics. These alignments are commonly described as the "democracies" versus the "dictatorships," but these terms are not precisely descriptive in all cases. Actually, adherence to one group or another has been as much a matter of expedience as of ideological considerations. The initial alignment developed from a conspiratorial combination of Dominican and Nicaraguan exiles, with Cuban, Guatemalan, and Venezuelan cooperation and encouragement, to overthrow the Trujillo regime in the Dominican Republic and then the Somoza regime in Nicaragua. This original conspiracy was frustrated in 1947 by the belated decision of the Cuban Government to prevent the use of its territory as a base of operations against Trujillo, but the filibustering organization which had been formed, the "Caribbean Legion," gave important military support to Figueres in his 1948 revolution against a Costa Rican regime that was paradoxically affiliated with Somoza as well as with the Communists. In 1949 renewed plots, counterplots, and complaints led to an intervention by the Organization of American States which resulted in the dissolution of the "Caribbean Legion."

69. The revolutionary overthrow of the "democratic" regimes in Venezuela (1948) and Cuba (1952) brought about the realignment of those countries. Inasmuch as the new regime in Guatemala is beholden to Somoza, Costa Rica is now isolated as the last proselytizing "democracy." Since 1948 Costa Rica has been a refuge for "democractic" exiles, most notably Romulo Betancourt, the former president of Venezuela. There can be no doubt that exiles in Costa Rica have conspired against both Somoza and the Perez Jimenez regime in Venezuela; the Costa Rican Government was at least culpably negligent with respect to the recent plot to assassinate Somoza. Recently, in the face of a threatened revolutionary attempt by Calderon Guardia with Nicaraguan and Venezuelan support, Figueres has adopted a more correct attitude and Betancourt and other exiles have left Costa Rica. Nevertheless, it is an open secret that both Somoza and Perez Jimenez are out to get Figueres, with the cordial good wishes of Trujillo and Batista.

70. In Caribbean and in general Latin American opinion, this issue of "democracy" versus "dictatorship"—that is, of social and political change versus traditional authoritarianism—is a matter of far greater importance than the question of Communism or anti-Communism. The point is illustrated by Somoza's former support of the Communist-infiltrated Picado administration against Figueres and the "Caribbean Legion." Figueres' anti-Communist record and the fact that he has made his peace with the United Fruit Company will not stay the hands of Somoza and Perez Jimenez against him. Perez Jimenez has made it plain that, from his point of view, the elimination of Figueres is a matter of more urgent importance than was the elimination of Arbenz.

IX. Relations With the United States

71. With the notable exception of Guatemala under Arbenz, the governments of the Caribbean republics have recognized that, in view of the strategic importance of the Caribbean to the United States and of the overwhelming preponderance of US economic and military power in the area, they must accommodate their policies to US security interests, if only as a matter of practical expediency. However, popular suspicions of US motives make it necessary for governments to avoid the appearance of subservience to the US, and somewhat limits the ability of governments to cooperate with the US. Moreover, in return for their cooperation, governments of the area expect from the United States protection, toleration of their peculiar domestic political processes, and a generous attitude toward their economic problems. They strongly support the Organization of American States and the United Nations, in part as a means of obtaining a voice in international affairs out of proportion to their meager strength, but also as a means of invoking general Latin American support, if need be, as a safeguard against US domination.

72. All the Caribbean republics except Guatemala have ratified the Rio Treaty and all are disposed to cooperate with the United States in hemisphere defense.* In the OAS and the UN, all except Guatemala under Arbenz have consistently supported the United States on basic issues with the Soviet Bloc. On certain other issues involving "colonialism" and underdeveloped areas their record has been variable, as has that of the Latin American states generally. All except Guatemala (under Arbenz) supported the US-sponsored anti-Communist resolution adopted by the Caracas Conference. At the same time all except Costa Rica (which was absent) took occasion to emphasize their opposition to colonialism and their sense that the United States had discriminated against Latin America in matters of financial assistance and trade.

*On 25 March 1954 Guatemala withdrew the instrument of ratification of the Rio Treaty which had been previously deposited with a reservation unacceptable to various signatory states. The reservation concerned Belize, with respect to which Guatemala maintained that it might assert "its rights . . . by any means it may deem most advisable." [Footnote in the source text.]

73. The conflict between "democracy" and "dictatorship" in the Caribbean confronts the United States with a dilemma, for both sides feel entitled to active US support. The "dictators" present themselves as guarantors of stability and order and of cooperation with the United States. The reformists, by definition, are an unsettling influence, but they contend that the United States, as a progressive democracy dominant in the area, has a moral obligation to foster social and political development, and they attribute any denial of positive support to the sinister influence of the "dictators" and the United Fruit Company on US policy. Conversely, the "dictators" resent any indication of US support for reformist regimes as a betrayal of the "true friends" of the United States. It is a primary Communist objective to identify the United States as the chief support of the Caribbean dictators and the chief obstacle to social and political progress in the area.

74. US relations with Panama constitute a special problem because of US control of the Canal Zone in the heart of the Republic and because of the importance to the Panamanian economy of dollar earnings from the Zone. In these special circumstances, Panamanian governments have to strike a nice balance between popular sensitivity regarding the national sovereignty and dignity and a real necessity to maintain cooperative relations with the United States. Panamanians have long resented discrimination against them in the administration of the Zone, particularly on a racial basis, and the commercial competition of installations in the Zone established for the benefit of US personnel. These resentments have been intensified by the depression of the Panamanian economy resulting from the postwar curtailment of US activity in the Zone. President Remon has deprived his political opponents of this issue by committing himself to secure a substantial increase in the annuity paid by the United States for use of the Canal Zone, and also to secure the elimination of US commercial competition and of wage differentials in the Zone. Perhaps purposefully, Remon thereby put himself in such a position that a failure to obtain substantial satisfaction would be detrimental to the stability of his administration, on the calculation that the United States would not be willing to see his regime weakened. The matter is still under negotiation.

X. Relations With the Soviet Bloc

75. The Caribbean republics have virtually no relations with the Soviet Bloc other than the connections maintained by local Communist parties (see paragraph 46). Since Cuba severed diplomatic relations in 1952, no Bloc country has had direct diplomatic representation in any of the republics, not even in Guatemala under Arbenz. The Czech minister resident in Mexico is also accredited to Guatemala. The Polish minister in Mexico has presented his credentials in, and they are believed to have been accepted by, Panama, Costa Rica, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Haiti. Bloc trade representatives, mostly Czech, have visited the area from time to time, but Caribbean commercial relations with the Bloc are negligible.

XI. Attitudes of Other Latin American States

76. Recognizing US predominance in the Caribbean area and remembering US military and political interventions in various Caribbean countries, the other Latin American states tend to keep a close watch on US relations with the Caribbean republics as a test of US good faith in the implementation of the Good Neighbor Policy. Their sensitivity on the issue of intervention was amply demonstrated with respect to the Caracas anti-Communist resolution and in public and congressional reaction to the June 1954 revolution in Guatemala. From their point of view, a question of US intevention in the internal affairs of a Caribbean republic is a matter of far more urgent importance than that of an indirect and long-term Communist threat.

77. The other Latin American republics, themselves addicted to economic nationalism, are predisposed to sympathize with economic nationalism in the Caribbean republics and to support them in their relations with such an entity as the United Fruit Company.

78. In matters relating to the issue of "democracy" versus "dictatorship" in the Caribbean, the sympathies of the other Latin American republics tend to vary in accordance with their own character. Venezuela is already an active participant in the Caribbean alignment, but Colombia stands aloof from it. Other countries, such as Peru, in which the traditional order still prevails naturally sympathize with the traditional ruling elements in the Caribbean. On the other hand, Uruguay, as the professed champion of democracy in Latin America, is predisposed to take the opposing position. Mexico, which has had its own social revolution, but is now interested in preserving stability and order, is disposed to sympathize with Caribbean social reform, but to work to avert political and armed conflict. Brazil also favors conciliation.

XII. Probable Future Developments

79. The pressure for social, economic, and political change in the Caribbean will continue to grow. For the time being, however, the elements resisting change are in the ascendant. Whether eventual change is orderly will depend in large measure on whether the existing regimes can bring themselves to promote social, economic, and political progress, or whether, through static repression, they make virtually certain an eventual violent explosion. In any case, no substantial improvement in basic conditions is likely to occur for many years.

80. The overthrow of the Arbenz regime has removed the most immediate and dangerous threat to stability and order in the region, but, in Guatemala and throughout the Caribbean, the Communists will continue to make the most of plentiful opportunities for agitation.

81. The prospects for stability and order in Guatemala depend, immediately, on continued cooperation between Castillo and Monzon, and ultimately, on whether the new regime can and will adhere to the broad objectives of the Revolution of 1944 while rooting out Communism and normalizing Guatemala's relations with the rest of the American community. Any other policy would be likely to lead to further internal conflict.

82. The greatest present threat to stability and order in the region is the animosity of Somoza and Perez Jimenez toward Figueres. Figueres' recent more conciliatory attitude has eased the situation somewhat, but neither Somoza nor Perez Jimenez is likely to become reconciled to the continued existence of the Figueres regime.

83. Election periods are critical times in all the Caribbean republics. Presidential elections are now scheduled to be held in Honduras and Cuba during 1954, in El Salvador and Panama during 1956, and in Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica during 1957. None is scheduled for 1955. The October election in Honduras may precipitate armed violence in some degree. The issue cannot be predicted. President Batista will make sure of winning the November election in Cuba.

ARGENTINA

UNITED STATES RELATIONS WITH ARGENTINA[1]

611.35/6–2352

Memorandum by the Ambassador in Argentina (Bunker)[2]

SECRET [BUENOS AIRES,] March 11, 1952.

SUGGESTIONS FOR ARGENTINE POLICY

I. WHY A REVIEW OF U.S. POLICY TOWARD ARGENTINA

Recent changes in the orientation of Argentine domestic and international policy appear to make appropriate a review of U.S. policy toward Argentina. Official Argentine policy during the last year has shown evidence of a shift toward almost exclusive attacks on the U.S. in place of the traditional interpretation of Argentina's "Third Position" as equidistant between Capitalism and Communism. There are even some evidences of communist political influences in high government circles.

Argentine penetration in many levels of Latin American life under the guise of spreading Peronismo now appears to represent a more direct threat to hemispheric unity and democratic institutions than heretofore. This is particularly true because of the substantially increased program of Argentine propaganda in all of Latin America, a propaganda which often shows a striking parallel to that of communism. In addition, these activities are known to extend beyond Latin America and are particularly evident in the countries of the Middle East.

It now appears compelling to recognize that these efforts to extend Argentine influence are now fundamentally and aggressively anti-U.S.

[2] Drafted shortly before Ambassador Bunker's departure from Buenos Aires on Mar. 13, 1952, after his appointment as U.S. Ambassador to Italy. The memorandum was submitted to Mr. Miller, who had copies circulated to officials within the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs during April and May. No indication of the drafting officer is contained in the source text.

Ambassador Bunker was succeeded at Buenos Aires by Albert F. Nufer, who was appointed U.S. Ambassador to Argentina on May 29, 1952. Ambassador Nufer arrived in Buenos Aires on July 16, and presented his credentials on Aug. 14.

and represent a potential threat to the program of hemispheric unity. While it is not suggested that Argentina will succeed in establishing a large bloc of third position countries, it is evident that she has already been successful in building up small but vocal nuclei in almost all Latin American countries, willing and ready to support Argentine aims.

II. BASIC CONDITIONS AND ASSUMPTIONS SURROUNDING A REVIEW OF U.S. POLICY TOWARD ARGENTINA

Certain fundamentals must be agreed upon in discussing a review of Argentine policy, viz.:

1. Perón has the political support of the majority of the Argentine people.
2. There is no substantial evidence pointing toward a change in the character of the government in the near future.
3. Even in the event of a change, a new government would not necessarily be more favorably disposed toward the U.S., nor would its international objectives greatly differ from those of Perón.
4. Argentine attitudes are influenced by certain national characteristics. These include a deep-seated nationalism, a jealous regard for Argentine sovereignty, a feeling of superiority over other Latin American nations, and a traditional envy of the U.S.
5. From the viewpoint of Perón and his followers, communism does not threaten Argentine security.
6. Peronismo has been built up in Argentina as an answer to the ideological threat of communism, but, at the same time, is designed to combat what they consider a more immediate threat: that of U.S. "imperialism."
7. Argentina is traditionally isolationist. This arises, in part, from a sense of security due to geographical position and the fact that she has never participated in, or materially suffered from, a major war. Her attitude parallels the isolationism which had long existence in the U.S.
8. Perón's recent pronouncements against sending troops outside Argentina violate the spirit of the Rio Pact.[3]
9. Political relations with Argentina are complicated by economic conflicts arising from competition between U.S. and Argentine export agriculture, and by the absence of a sound trade structure so long as European currencies are not freely convertible.
10. Argentine strength internationally derives principally from its importance as a food exporter; conversely, its great weakness is its dependence on imported fuels, chemicals, machinery and transport equipment.

(pt. 2) 1681.

11. Argentine efforts to split Latin America will doubtless continue or be increased and may become more damaging to our interests.

12. If we take no action in the (Latin American) fields in which Argentina is attempting to undermine U.S. prestige and sow disunity, the Latin American countries in which this is taking place can rightfully assume a lack of interest on our part.

It is evident that Argentina finds herself in direct or indirect conflict with certain U.S. aims and is less amenable to ordinary diplomatic negotiation than other Latin American countries. At the same time, it has become increasingly difficult for the U.S. to find a common ground of understanding with Argentina without seriously compromising the principles which the U.S. supports.

III. WHAT SHOULD BE OUR POLICY OBJECTIVES TOWARD ARGENTINA

A. Political Cooperation

1. Argentine collaboration in the maintenance of peace and international security especially in the Western Hemisphere, including genuine adherence to the Bogotá [4] and Rio Pacts and the principle of hemispheric unity.

2. Creation and maintenance of a favorable climate of Argentine public opinion toward U.S. and its policy.

3. Obviate or counter that Argentine political penetration in many levels of Latin American life which is fundamentally anti-U.S. and furthers communist objectives.

4. Stronger Argentine support for the democracies in international bodies (UN, ECOSOC, ILO, etc.).

B. Economic Cooperation

1. Arrangements to encourage the production of and to make available strategic materials (such as tungsten and beryl) to the U.S. and perhaps other non-communist nations.

2. Cooperation in controlling exports of critical materials to the Soviet bloc.

3. Adoption of measures to encourage production and availability of agricultural products required by non-communist nations, at reasonable world prices.

4. Development of mutually sound economic relations, including the assurance of non-discriminatory treatment of U.S. enterprise operating in Argentina and the settlement of arrears in financial remittances.

C. Military Cooperation

1. Assurance that Argentina will carry out agreements of IADB and Rio Pact.

2. Provision of effective measures to avoid repetition of Argentine behaviour during World War II, when Argentina was the hemispheric center of our enemies' espionage and propaganda.

IV. WHAT IS IT THAT ARGENTINA SEEKS FROM US

Any discussion of accord with Argentina must take into consideration Argentina's objectives in relation to the U.S. regardless of how unrealistic some of them may seem to us. Among the more apparent of these are:

1. Recognition as a world power, and as the leader and dominant power of Latin America.
2. a. Personal recognition of Perón and Evita. b. Recognition of Perón as a world leader. c. Recognition of his program of Peronismo.
3. More favorable U.S. press on Argentina.
4. U.S. support in Falkland Islands and Antarctic issues.[5]
5. A statement by U.S. that the existence of European colonies in the Western Hemisphere is contrary to the principles of the hemisphere.
6. Recognition of Argentine CGT by democratic international labor bodies and as a leader of organized labor in Latin America.
7. "Fair" economic treatment, which may include:

a. Larger allocation of scarce products and materials.

b. Establishment of a ratio guaranteeing parity between prices of commodities exported and imported.

c. Acceptance by the U.S. of the principle of "just" wages to labor in Latin America as the basis for price-fixing in U.S. purchases.

d. Guarantees against declining purchasing power of Argentine dollar holdings.

e. Extension of non-governmental credits.

f. Cessation of alleged "intervention" of U.S. government in "manipulating" world commodity prices.

g. Membership in additional committees of the International Materials Conference.

---

[5]For documentation concerning U.S. policy with respect to the Antarctic, see volume I.

8. Military Aid[6] and equal participation in formulation of Western Hemispheric defense.

Note

It appears impossible for the U.S. to concede complete fulfillment of all or even most of such Argentine objectives. Nevertheless, possibilities exist for some accord. But any policy which contemplates direct negotiation leading toward agreement with Argentina should be based on hard quid pro quos.

V. LIMITATIONS AFFECTING OUR POLICY

Certain limitations of a generally tactical nature must be recognized in considering a policy toward Argentina:

1. Although it should not be allowed to influence long-range policy, U.S. public opinion is currently unsympathetic to Perón and Argentina. The Department could not successfully impose a policy which would ignore this.
2. The economic concessions which the U.S. could make to Argentina are minor and, moreover, are circumscribed by the Department's limits in influencing other agencies concerned.
3. Any psychological attack on Argentina or on the Argentine influences in those countries where she seeks to undermine the U.S. must necessarily be restricted by considerations of the U.S. policy of non-intervention and of the important requirement to preserve the inter-American system. Any activity which could result in dividing Latin American opinion, would further Argentine objectives.
4. Any obvious psychological attack within Argentina itself is strictly limited.
5. The countries surrounding Argentina, which are generally concerned at her interference and intentions, tend to support us and should have knowledge of our support of them. There are indications that, assured of our support, they would make important contributions to a psychological counterattack against Argentina.
6. Argentine strength for her propaganda offensive against us lies in certain advantages accompanying dictatorship: centralized control of the press and other media, of policy, etc.; but weakness is also present in the form of vulnerability to suspicion, to rumor, fears of plots and internecine war.

VI. SUGGESTIONS FOR A POLICY TOWARD ARGENTINA

A. Any recommendations for a policy toward Argentina must consider probable Argentine tactics, based on her probable aspirations. As

[6] In a memorandum of conversation with Col. Thomas W. Sharkey of the Department of Defense, dated Feb. 5, 1952, Henry Dearborn of the Office of South American Affairs stated that Colonel Sharkey had inquired whether, in view of Argentine interest in obtaining grant military aid from the United States, the Department of State might wish to reconsider its opposition to discussion of the matter with the Argentines. Mr. Dearborn further stated that he had informed Colonel Sharkey, in part, that "on the basis of information now available we would almost certainly not favor any change" in the U.S. position at the time. (735.5 MSP/2–552)

Argentina seeks to enlarge her world position and prestige; to establish herself as leader of a neutral bloc of countries not limited to Latin America, holding a Third Position between communism and "Capitalist-Imperialism;" and as a leader of Latin America with sufficient support to oppose U.S. influence, she will probably:

1. Use any means she can afford, and which are permitted her by U.S. passivity to:

   a. Undermine the U.S. position in Latin America
   b. Attract potential "neutrals" to her Third Position
   c. Establish a nuisance value to obtain favorable treatment.

2. Let more pretentious national aspirations await a time when the U.S. is otherwise occupied, the Inter-American system disrupted, and such balancing power as Brazil could be safely opposed.

B. Argentine aspirations constitute a positive and continuing threat to U.S. objectives and policies. It therefore appears necessary to undertake measures which will nullify Argentine activities insofar as they oppose our own.

C. While continuing a generally correct policy toward Argentina, it is suggested that:

1. We begin to use every profitable opportunity to counter strongly Argentine anti-U.S. propaganda and political penetration of Latin America. A successful tactic might well be to foster opposition to Argentine tactics by third countries, even including those outside the Western Hemisphere.

2. The interest of Latin American countries should be aroused to the danger to them and to Latin American unity. Each country should be encouraged to adopt its own measures to oppose Argentine penetration.

3. As a corollary, the U.S. should be more positive and aggressive in advocating improved living standards and welfare programs among the American Republics, through others' efforts as well as through our aid. Accomplishments rather than U.S. expenditures should be publicized in dealing with Point IV and other U.S. aid. Efforts should be made to prevent marking our assistance with a dollar sign, as has been frequently done, and which places us on the defensive when expenditures elsewhere are larger. Initiative in advocating welfare programs should more often be ours in hemispheric organizations, but not necessarily through the financing of projects. Our public relations should endeavor to seize credit which now redounds to Latin American oratory.

4. The Department should enlist the cooperation of the U.S. trade union movement and, through it, the ORIT, in a closely coordinated plan of counter measures in each individual country, designed to neutralize Argentine anti-U.S. activities.

5. Coincidentally with the counter measures suggested above, a more effective working relationship should be established between the U.S. mission and the Argentine government. The time seems to be approaching when such relations will be possible. The most fruitful would be between Perón and the ambassador. Personal characteristics which appear desirable for establishment of effective personal relationship with Perón include:

1. A personality which can win his friendship, personal admiration and respect.
2. Personal prestige.
3. If possible, a conversational knowledge of Spanish.

Ambassador Bunker possessed all three of these to a high degree, but for other reasons, including the disturbed period of Argentine elections and the prolonged illness of Sra. Perón, close personal relations with the President were not appropriate.

6. The primary points of which it is necessary to convince Perón, as a preliminary to further understanding include:

a. Sincerity of the U.S. purpose
b. Consistency of U.S. motives
c. U.S. willingness to be as friendly with Argentina as Argentina permits.

7. Through the Ambassador to Perón, through the Argentine Ambassador in Washington, and by every means opportunity affords, the importance should be stressed of shifting Argentina's propaganda attack on the U.S. to an attack against communism. The sizeable Argentine propaganda machine now used to attack the U.S. could be continually and profitably employed if directed against Moscow.

8. The more positive policy toward Argentina suggested here should not be limited to the Argentine Desk; it should be hemispheric (receive support of all ARA Desks and Missions), being coordinated from Washington both toward Argentina directly and toward all offices in the ARA area generally.

9. The final point of these suggestions is reserved for personal discussion by Ambassador Bunker, with proper Department personnel.

Report on Argentina

4. Ambassador Bunker reported that the situation in Argentina is baffling. The outstanding feature of U.S.-Argentine relations is the vituperative attacks in the local press on the U.S. and its "capitalistic imperialism." Also, there have been personal attacks on the President, Mr. Acheson, and Mr. Miller. In addition, there have been attacks on our conduct of the Korean war. In general, they have attacked what they consider aggression on our part in various parts of the world. Ambassador Bunker noted that Argentina has played up the so-called anti-U.S. features in other countries. It was pointed out that Argentine labor attachés in other countries have been strongly against us.

5. There is a pro-U.S. group in the Argentine Government, including the Minister of Defense,[2] the Foreign Minister,[3] and a few others. Usually the most friendly group toward the U.S. includes those who have been to the U.S. and know something about us. Ambassador Bunker stated that his relations with the Foreign Minister have been extremely friendly. He felt that the Foreign Minister was making some progress which would be helpful to us but this would come about very slowly.

6. Ambassador Bunker said that one of the most important factors in Argentine affairs is their current economic situation, which is extremely serious.[4] The present situation is caused by drought and government policy. They will have relatively little to export and their exchange earnings will be off about 30%. Government policy toward agriculture has caused food prices to stay down for the benefit of the workers,

[4] The notes of the Secretary's staff meeting, held at the Department of State on Jan. 29, 1952, read in part as follows:

"Argentine Grain and Meat Problem

"5. The Secretary asked for some details on the grain and meat situation in Argentina. Mr. Miller reported that there will be no Argentine wheat available for export and, in fact, Argentina may have to ration grain in its own country. With respect to meat, there possibly will be a little available for export. Mr. Miller felt that these difficulties are caused by a combination of price controls, increased consumption, draining off of labor from the farms, and an unusual drought last year. Mr. Thorp agreed and pointed out the recent history in Argentina of building up industry at the expense of the farmers, which is the basic cause of the present difficulties. The Secretary asked whether this current situation would develop problems in Argentina and elsewhere. Mr. Miller said it would put the burden on us to provide more wheat to various parts of the world which had at one time been dependent upon Argentine grain. In this connection, he pointed out that Brazil has asked for almost five times the amount of grain which we had originally agreed to provide under the International Wheat Agreement." (Secretary's Staff Meetings, lot 63 D 75)

For text of the International Wheat Agreement, opened for signature at Washington, Mar. 23, 1949, and entered into force for the United States, July 1, 1949, with respect to Parts 1, 3, 4, and 5, and Aug. 1, 1949, with respect to Part 2, see TIAS No. 1957, or 63 Stat. (pt. 2) 2173.

with no incentives for agriculture producers. In addition, the producers must sell at unattractive exchange rates. Argentina has been faced with the necessity for a change in policy and has come out with virtually an austerity program. The real test involved in this program is whether they can get away with it. They have instituted liberalized prices and two meatless days, and certain restrictions have been removed. Also, it is doubted that large wage increases will take place this year. Peron must be given credit for handling the present economic situation very cleverly.

7. Ambassador Bunker reported that another important factor is Evita's health.[5] She has not made a good recovery. Evita is extremely powerful in that she controls the CGT and the charity foundation monopoly. This foundation has done some extremely good work in housing, hospitals, schools, etc. Funds are provided liberally and there is no apparent accounting for the money. The question obviously arises as to the person who might succeed her in these enterprises.

8. Ambassador Bunker stated that many ask how firmly based is the present regime. He felt that the regime is strongly rooted and that free elections would produce virtually the same results as the last election. The army now is demoralized since its September revolt attempt.[6] The CGT has made important inroads in the non-commissioned officer ranks.

9. With respect to the problem of Communism in Argentina, Ambassador Bunker said that Peron claims there are practically no Communists in his country. There is an important dissident group which split from the Communist party. This group is pro-Peronista, is anti-U.S., does not attack the Soviet Union or Communist policies, but does not openly support the Soviet Union. Ambassador Bunker explained that we are attempting to watch this group very carefully in order to see what significant role it might play in the future. Mr. Bohlen felt that this was an interesting development especially since groups which split from the Communist party are usually vigorously attacked by the Communists.

10. Ambassador Bunker felt that our recent policy toward Argentina[7] has been effective. He also believed that there has been general approval of our policy by other Latin American countries, and he felt that the future would show some results in our favor. There have been efforts in Argentina to provoke us into anti-Argentine activities, but so far we have studiously avoided such traps.

11. Ambassador Bunker stated that he hoped the U.S. would not put on countervailing duties on wool, since it would have a very bad effect in Argentina. He explained that the anti-American feeling in Argentina did not originate with Peron but is a part of the Argentine "personality." It is not clear what elements would succeed Peron if he disappeared from the scene.

WASHINGTON, June 13, 1952.

PROBABLE DEVELOPMENTS IN ARGENTINA [2]

THE PROBLEM

To estimate the current situation and probable future developments in Argentina through 1953.

CONCLUSIONS

1. Despite serious economic difficulties and continuing plots to overthrow the regime, the Peron Administration will probably remain in power at least through 1952, and will probably not change its basic

---

[1] A cover sheet, dissemination notice, and title sheet are not printed.

[2] A note on the title sheet reads as follows:

"The intelligence organizations of the Departments of State, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Joint Staff participated with the Central Intelligence Agency in the preparation of this estimate. All members of the Intelligence Advisory Committee concurred in this estimate on 5 June 1952."

foreign policies: the "Third Position," one of non-alignment with either the US or the USSR, and the promotion of Argentine influence in Latin America in opposition to that of the US.

2. These economic difficulties are likely to persist, but a good grain crop in 1952–53 would probably permit the Peron Administration as presently constituted to remain in power through 1953. In these circumstances there might be a decline in the intensity of Argentine anti-US propaganda.

3. If the 1952–53 crop is no better than average and the economic situation continues to deteriorate, and if Senora de Peron dies, Peron will probably seek to retain power by broadening the base of his Administration to include moderate elements.* If Senora de Peron survives and economic conditions deteriorate, the regime will probably adopt more drastic domestic policies and will more readily utilize "dissident" Communist and pro-Communist groups, with a concomitant increase in anti-US propaganda.

4. Another serious drought in 1952–53 would so intensify current economic difficulties that the Peron Administration would be seriously threatened. If, in these circumstances, the Peron regime were overthrown, it would probably be replaced by the military, allied with moderate elements.* Any attempt by the extreme left wings of the CGT and of the Peronist Party to seize power would be countered by the armed forces. The latter would probably gain control of the country, but only after serious civil strife.

DISCUSSION

Background

5. The 1943 Revolution[3] by which Peron came to power followed a prolonged period of political and economic dislocation and readjustment in Argentina, dating back to 1930. In this period Argentina's lack of economic balance and flexibility—due largely to its relatively narrow foreign trade dependency upon the UK—was pointed up by the world depression and again by World War II. The resulting dislocation created a fertile field for appeals to economic nationalism and for the political use of hitherto neglected mass groups such as labor. But existing parties, beset by corruption and wed to certain vested interests,

---

* By "moderate elements" is meant those who are either actively or passively out of sympathy with the more extreme policies of the Peron regime, and who at the same time oppose the views both of the old ruling groups of Argentina and of the Communists. [Footnote in the source text.]

[3] For documentation relating to this subject, see Foreign Relations, 1943, vol. v, pp. 365 ff.

failed to meet the demands of economic nationalists and to carry out social reforms.

6. In this situation Peron's assumption of power, though accomplished by force with the aid of a small group of nationalist army officers, soon became more than just another military coup. Peron rapidly developed a mass following that offset the lack of support by traditional parties and eventually counterbalanced the weight of the military itself. In the 1946 elections a Peronist coalition won 55 percent of the popular vote and virtually shattered the traditional parties.

7. After 1946 Peron, acting in the name of "social justice, economic independence, and political sovereignty," consolidated his power through a vigorous program of political and labor organization supported by all the means of propaganda and police control. In this Peron was importantly aided by his wife, who assumed the leadership of the Argentine proletariat. The regime made a studied effort to shift the balance of political power by redistribution of income for the benefit of labor and by direct state assistance to industry and control of foreign trade. In the process, a body of doctrine, "Peronism," was developed to explain and popularize the new regime. Originally close to Fascism in its emphasis on ultranationalism and its efforts to industralize the country for "defense" purposes, Peronism, in appealing for mass support, later stressed also the importance of labor and advocated programs which were in line with certain Marxist precepts. The extent of the favor shown to labor began to alienate the armed forces and the nationalist groups that desired economic development but not social change.

8. Peron's foreign policy has been based on the concept of a "Third Position," the international analogy of domestic Peronism. In keeping with Peronist professions of antagonism toward both capitalism and Communism, the "Third Position" is one of non-alignment with either the US or the USSR in the East–West struggle. It is not, however, a position of passive neutrality. Peron aggressively seeks to induce other Latin American states to follow Argentine leadership in adopting the "Third Position" also. Since the USSR's interests in the region are limited to its influence in labor and intellectual circles, while US interests are omnipresent, particularly in tangible and vulnerable commercial activities, Peron's nominally impartial policy has been predominantly anti-US rather than anti-Soviet in targets and tactics. In pursuing this policy Peron has intensified and adapted to his own purposes traditional Argentine isolationism and rivalry with the US for leadership in Latin America.

204-260 O—83——29

9. By 1951 the Perons' control of Argentina had increased so that the regime received 63 percent of the popular vote. While opposition forces were systematically hampered and the opposition press finally suppressed, it is probable that Peron would have won a majority in any event at that time. However, since then a poor 1951–52 harvest has brought the still unsound economic situation to a head and precipitated the present economic crisis the political effects of which have not yet been measured.

Present Balance of Political Forces

10. Under the leadership of the Perons, the Peronist Revolution has inaugurated many far-reaching political, social, and economic changes. The Revolution is, in fact, larger and more permanent that either the Peronist Party or its leaders, and there is little possibility that it could be removed root and branch, even if the Perons were to fall. Even the opposition—except for politically unimportant die-hards—does not reject the goals of the Revolution, although it demands better management of the program and more respect for civil liberties.

11. The Peron regime organized its support through two interrelated agencies, the Peronist Party and the General Confederation of Workers (CGT). While labor is the principal source of Peron's political strength, the Party also draws support from some elements of the middle class and from industrialists who have profited from protective tariff policies and nationalist emphasis upon Argentine economic self-sufficiency. The armed forces, with whose support Peron came to power, have now become largely neutral or subservient. The Party has been held together largely by the personality of Peron; there have been internal conflicts, particularly over the activities of Senora de Peron. Several once-important Peron lieutenants have been removed from office, but have not abandoned the Peronist program and still have a strong potential for leadership in the Party.

12. The CGT, which has acquired a semi-governmental status under Peron, has increased union membership in Argentina from about half a million in 1943 to a claimed 5.5 million out of a present labor force of 7 million. The primary function of the CGT leaders, who are an integral part of the Peronist organization, has been to enforce the mandates of the regime. This became more apparent after 1949, when CGT leaders established close collaboration with the police to contain labor unrest. The inability of CGT leadership completely to control the rank and file under economic pressures was illustrated in railway strikes of 1950–1951, when the state had to resort to force. On the other hand, when a revolt occurred within the armed forces in September 1951, the CGT was able quickly to call some 50,000 demonstrators into the streets in support of Peron.

13. Labor owes to the Perons its present improved social status, including such benefits as low-cost housing, schools, clinics, and hospitals. Senora de Peron has not only functioned as party manager of labor, but has also assumed the role of inspirational leader of the labor movement, appealing especially to the depressed masses, the descamisados. Her incapacitation would probably precipitate a disruptive struggle for power within the CGT. It would also tend to dissipate the effectiveness of the descamisados as a political force. No alternative leader in sight could sustain the fervor which she has been able to arouse.

14. Even if Senora de Peron should survive, however, labor's consciousness of political power and the ambitions of labor leaders would render uncertain labor's faithful adherence to Peron in the face of a prolonged deterioration of the economy. Already Senora de Peron's control of the CGT is meeting some opposition from certain leaders of the CGT who are concerned more with appeasing the labor rank and file than with following Senora de Peron's directives. These leaders and insurgent elements, including Communists and Socialists, in major CGT unions, are driving for independent power and greater privileges for labor. Were the CGT freer of official control, Marxist influences would probably take the lead in a militant trade union policy and would represent a strong force for extremist solutions in general.

15. Politically, organized Communism comprises two groups: the official party (estimated to number 35,000) and a small group of dissident Communists under the leadership of Rodolfo Puiggros that split from the official party after 1946 believing that they could better secure their own objectives in cooperation with rather than in opposition to Peron. Peron is apparently trying to use the dissident group as a bait to oppositionists of the left, especially in the labor movement, to throw in their lot with Peronism. The "dissident" group in turn maintains advisory relations with Peron, although the precise extent of their influence cannot be determined with accuracy on the basis of existing evidence. There is also little information regarding the ultimate objectives of this group, nor are there conclusive indications of Moscow's attitude towards it. The official party, although still legal, has been subject to police surveillance and harassment since 1948 and has lost voting strength so that it polled only 2 percent of the total Argentine vote in 1951.[4] It has probably, nonetheless, maintained a hard core of membership among workers, students, and intellectuals. Communism's most important potential lies in the labor movement. It has retained influence with labor and its proposed "national liberation front" policy has many parallels with the Peronista program. This means that prolonged political and economic deterioration might permit the rapid growth of Communist strength and influence in Argentina.

16. The opposition to Peron comes mainly from the professional, commercial, industrial, and large landholding interests among the middle and upper classes that ruled Argentina before 1943. Its political effectiveness, however, has been sharply curtailed by disunity and by the Peron regime's extensive police and expropriation powers. The Conservative Party, for all practical purposes, no longer exists and the liberal Unión Cívica Radical (UCR) is almost hopelessly split into two factions. Although the UCR polled one-third of the total vote cast in 1951, this vote undoubtedly included a considerable number of protest votes against Peron's authoritarian controls and Senora de Peron rather than against other aspects of the Peronist Revolution. The Socialist Party is also rent by factionalism and is not represented in the national government. The old political parties are discredited by their past records and appear unable to challenge Peron's hold on his mass labor support under present conditions. Even if Peron's opposition were not legally forbidden to form a political alliance, it is extremely doubtful that it could unite against the Administration.

17. The Roman Catholic Church, as represented by its hierarchy, is an important political force whose position is approximately nonpartisan. This position contrasts with earlier evidences of an understanding with Peronism. It appears that cooperation between the Church and Peronism has declined, largely as a result of the divers activities of Senora de Peron and of her Social Aid Foundation. If the regime moves farther left, the influence of the Church may be turned against the Perons. An open break with the Administration, however, should not be expected except under the most extreme circumstances.

18. The armed forces of Argentina (the present strength of which is approximately 135,000 men, second only to Brazil in Latin America) played an active part in bringing Peron to power. Subsequently, however, the Peron's courting of labor groups aroused the opposition of many officers, who came principally from the middle class. In 1945 and again in 1951, elements of the armed forces openly opposed the government, but these efforts resulted only in purges and reorganizations reducing the armed forces' political influence. Plotting to overthrow the regime continues among purged officers and others as yet unpurged may be implicated, but these plots are unlikely to prove effective unless and until circumstances arise which would cause the armed forces to act in unison with substantial civilian political support.

19. Nevertheless, the armed forces probably retain sufficient strength and cohesion to be the decisive factor in any open struggle for power in Argentina. In such circumstances they would be most receptive to appeals from the middle class elements which have opposed Peron, but they might align themselves with the more moderate elements of the Peronist Party and some of the more independent labor leaders, particularly if Peron himself had been eliminated. If assured of some popular support the armed forces would probably put down by force any attempted coup by the extreme left wing of the CGT or by any group under pro-Communist leadership, but could probably do so only after serious civil strife.

20. In the balance of political forces, the lives of the Perons play an important part. The assassination of Peron is always a possibility and there are numerous reports of revolutionary plots with that objective. Moreover, Senora de Peron is seriously ill and may not survive to the end of 1952.

Present Argentine Foreign Policy and Influence

21. In pursuing Peron's "Third Position" foreign policy Argentina has engaged in intensive anti-US propaganda throughout Latin America, some of which parallels Communist themes. This propaganda is particularly sensitive to US actions. Its intensity seems also to vary generally with domestic pressures in Argentina. It has increased noticeably in recent months.

22. In the Organization of American States, Argentina has at times adopted positions antagonistic towards the US; in the UN Argentina has abstained with increasing frequency on East–West issues. Argentina has ratified the Rio Treaty, but Peron has declared that no Argentine soldier would be sent to fight outside of Argentina. Argentine propaganda, which originally supported US–UN action in Korea, has become highly critical of US–UN policies in that area. It has also applauded Mexico's refusal to sign a military assistance agreement with the US. Since the abortive armed forces revolt of September 1951 the regime has been markedly cool toward any form of military cooperation with the US, an attitude which it has enforced upon individual Argentine officers. Pursuant to this policy it has allowed the contract of the US Air Force mission[5] in Argentina to lapse without renewal, and has indicated informally that the US Army mission contract[6] will likewise be permitted to lapse on its expiration date in October 1952.

(pt. 2) 1068. The agreement expired on June 29, 1951.

23. The most conspicuous manifestation of Peron's efforts to project the influence of Peronism throughout Latin America is the activity of Argentine labor attachés, who have spent large sums of money in their endeavor to create a Peronist labor confederation to rival both the Communist Latin American Confederation of Labor (CTAL) and the anti-Communist Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT). These Argentine efforts extend throughout Latin America. They have not as yet produced significant results, but they have caused apprehension in certain Latin American governments.

24. Moreover, Peron has seized upon the dissatisfaction of Latin American governments and industrial interests with the prices obtainable from the US for strategic materials to agitate for the creation of a bloc to exact higher prices. This potentially effective line, although of general application, is addressed primarily to neighboring states, particularly Chile (copper) and Bolivia (tin).

25. In pursuance of Argentina's long-standing ambitions for preeminence in Latin America, Peron has capitalized upon recent unsettled political conditions in the area. He has given propaganda and diplomatic support to the National Revolutionary Movement (MNR) which recently came to power in Bolivia. As a political organization and movement the MNR antedates Peronism, but some of its policies and techniques are similar to Peron's and there have been personal ties between MNR members and members of the Peronist government ever since 1944. There are also evidences of Argentine support for Latin American presidential candidates such as Ibañez in Chile. Thus far, however, established national and labor leadership in Latin America has generally resisted Peronist influences and pressures.

Present Economic Situation

26. The principal immediate cause of political uncertainty in Argentina is an economic deterioration which stems largely from Peronist policies favoring forced industrialization and costly social welfare programs at the expense of agriculture. Although the relative role of industry in the Argentine economy has increased, productivity per worker has declined. The purchase of foreign-owned utilities and other enterprises has depleted government holdings of foreign exchange and has also saddled the government with a source of perennial deficits. The internal debt of Argentina has increased two and a half times since 1945, largely as a result of expenditures for industrialization. In contrast to Peron's goal of making Argentina for the first time a creditor nation, the year 1951 produced the largest trade deficit in Argentina's history. As a result gold and exchange reserves declined 30 percent during the year while the cost of living rose 50 percent.

27. This deteriorating situation has been brought to a head by severe droughts during the 1949–1950 and 1951–1952 crop seasons. As a result exports will be sharply reduced during 1952: no wheat will be available for shipment from the current crop as compared to the prewar annual average of 4 million tons; corn exports will probably be about one-sixth prewar averages, and meat export will probably be 40 percent of the 1934–1938 average.

28. The scarcity of consumer goods, caused by the shortage of locally produced foodstuffs and lack of exports to pay for imports, is of great political importance as it will be felt by the Argentine masses who are unaccustomed to austerity. The need for austerity was recognized by the announcement of an Economic Plan for 1952[7] curtailing domestic consumption and calling for increased production and saving. Subsidies on consumer goods were to be eliminated and increased prices given agricultural producers in a determined effort to increase the 1952–1953 harvest.

Probable Internal Developments

29. Until November, when the new grain crop can be accurately assessed, Peron will probably be able to cope with his economic difficulties. If crop prospects are then good, credit can be obtained and the pinch on consumer goods and foreign exchange relieved. Under these circumstances, the regime will probably continue in power, whether or not Senora de Peron survives.

30. If the prospects for the 1952–1953 grain crop are only average, Peron will probably resort to political maneuver. If Senora de Peron is alive and active, this maneuvering would probably consist of added concessions to labor. If Peron is alone, he might obtain new support among the moderates. In either case, the chances for the survival of the regime would be fairly good.

31. Another serious drought in 1952–1953 would so intensify the current economic deterioration and would impose such a strain on the Peronist labor organization that the regime would be seriously threatened. If Senora de Peron were no longer a factor in the situation, Peron himself would probably attempt to come to terms with the moderates in the armed forces and the Peronist Party and even in the opposition. If Senora de Peron were still active, however, her influence would probably lead him to seek to placate organized labor, hoping through its continued support to dominate the situation. A bitter-end struggle would then ensue, with the prospect of increasing pro-Communist influence in the government. At some indeterminate point in this development the armed forces and the moderates would be likely to attempt to overthrow the regime.

32. If, before this stage has been reached, both Perons were to be eliminated from the situation, a scramble for the succession would ensue. In these circumstances internal dissension would probably reduce the effectiveness of the CGT as a political force and the armed forces would almost certainly prove to be the best organized and most effective political force in Argentina. The armed forces might combine with the moderate Peronists or with the middle class opposition to form a government, or they might establish a military junta on a caretaker basis. It is possible that the left wing of the Peronist Party and the CGT, with pro-Communist leadership, might attempt to seize power. In that case the armed forces would almost certainly endeavor to suppress the attempt and probably would be able to do so, though perhaps only after a protracted struggle.

Effect of Probable Internal Developments on Argentine Foreign Policy and Orientation

33. The international attitude of Argentina in the period up to November 1952 is likely to be increasingly marked by jingoism to divert attention from domestic problems. Anti-US propaganda, especially through the activities of labor attachés, will be intensified with particular emphasis against US defense efforts. It is likely that Peron will seek closer economic ties with the USSR and its Satellites in an effort to fill some of the gaps in Argentine trade with Western Nations.

34. If Peron remains in power after November, his basic foreign policy will continue unchanged. If the economic situation improves, or if Peron seeks alliance with moderate elements, his anti-US propaganda may be toned down. On the other hand, if the economic situation continues to deteriorate and Peron comes to depend increasingly on the support of leftist labor and pro-Communist elements, there would be a concomitant increase in the intensity of his anti-US propaganda.

35. If Peron were eliminated, but the present Peronist groups remained in power under a more moderate leadership, the regime would be more amenable to conciliation with the US. The same tendency would be stronger under a government centered on the armed forces, and Peronism as an exportable ideology would certainly be deemphasized. However, in neither case would it be likely that Argentina would basically modify its "Third Position" policy or cease its efforts to promote Argentine influence in Latin America.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Henry Dearborn of the Office of South American Affairs

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 23, 1952.

Subject: US Policy toward Argentina

Participants: Assistant Secretary Miller
Ambassador Nufer
ARA—Mr. Mann
Mr. Spalding [1]
Mr. Fishburn [2]
OSA—Mr. Atwood
Mr. Bennett
Mr. Randolph [3]
Mr. Dearborn

A meeting comprised of the above persons was held in Mr. Miller's office today on the subject of US relations with Argentina. The purpose of the meeting was to discuss the points listed on pages 7 and 8 [4] of Ambassador Bunker's memorandum of March 11, 1952, entitled "Suggestions for Argentine Policy" so that Ambassador Nufer might have the benefit of the most recent views of ARA prior to his departure for Buenos Aires.

Point 1. The unanimous opinion of those present was that US officials should not engage in any attacks on the Peron regime. On the other hand they may and should take advantage of every opportunity to offset anti-US Peronista propaganda. In this connection, however, it was brought out that most Peronista charges are similar to charges made against the US by unfriendly elements in other LA countries and that the problem is one which the US has with all of these unfavorable groups and not with Argentina alone. Mr. Miller emphasized that we should not let the tail wag the dog: we should not allow our concern over Argentina to dominate our whole hemisphere policy. This would be like a parent permitting his every action to be determined by a naughty child. Mr. Mann suggested that the Bureau should initiate action toward getting the US view across to persons strategically situated in LA so that much of the misinformation circulating from Argentina and other sources might be counteracted. An example which Mr. Mann gave was that the Chileans were not informed that the US produces large quantities of copper and of other facts related to this important item. He recalled an opinion of the Ecuadoran Chargé d'Affaires, Dr. Moscoso,[5] that the US should make a special effort to establish working contacts with 50 important LA newspaper editors. Mr. Mann suggested that we should work at high and low diplomatic levels to correct misinformation about the US so that OAR would have a better understanding of our position. All present agreed and Mr. Miller asked Mr. Mann, together with MID and OSA, to work on a plan of implementation.

Point 2. Insofar as this point could be implemented within the framework of the commentary on Point 1, it was approved. There should be no overt activity toward inducing other countries to adopt measures to oppose Argentine penetration.

Point 3. There was agreement in general with this point but there was no detailed discussion of it.

Point 4. The unanimous opinion of those present was that there was not much that could be done through the US trade union movement and the ORIT that was not already being done.

Point 5. Point 5 received considerable discussion. All present agreed that under present conditions Ambassador Bunker's relationship with President Peron had been the proper attitude. It was not believed that the time had come for us to take the initiative in attempting to bring about closer relations between Peron and the Ambassador. Mr. Miller noted that every attempt at an understanding with Peron had failed and said that he was convinced that Peron would settle for nothing less than a price we would not pay—namely, US official public approval of his regime and all its trappings. Mr. Miller recalled that Peron had said as much to him in February 1950.[6] Mr. Mann believed that there was no likelihood of any understanding with Peron until such time as the latter might indicate on his own initiative that he desired to be cooperative—and Mr. Mann was not optimistic about this eventuality. It was the view of the meeting that the Ambassador should be prepared to see Peron when the latter desired it but should take no step on his own part to bring about a closer relationship than existed during Ambassador Bunker's tenure. On the other hand, friendly relations with officials of the Argentine Government would fall wholly within present policy and it would be perfectly proper to visit them and to invite them to the Embassy.

Point 6. This point was considered with Point 5.

Point 7. It was believed by those present that while it serves Peron's purpose to attack the US, there is little likelihood that we shall be able to shift his attack from the US to communism. Mr. Miller remarked that he thought we had little chance of changing the Third Position and that in his opinion Peron would continue to attack both us and the Commies.

Point 8. Mr. Miller suggested that an instruction be sent to the field to serve as guidance for our Missions on problems likely to arise regarding Argentina. Mr. Dearborn said that such an instruction[7] was circulating among officers in ARA and that it would probably reach his desk in a day or two.

Point 9. Ambassador Nufer has been briefed on this point.

Following the discussion of the nine points, Ambassador Nufer said he would like to know what decision had been made on whether certain economic sanctions should be secretly applied to Argentina. The prevailing opinion was that there should be no sanctions of this sort. It was agreed that the US would continue to give Argentina routine treatment on her requests and that no special consideration would be allowed in matters of priorities or export licenses.

In conclusion Mr. Miller emphasized that our policy was not frozen and that he would be pleased to review it at any time the Ambassador might wish to make a recommendation to this effect.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 15, 1952.

DEAR LES: I got your letter of June 19[1] just before I left for Rio[2] and just in time to show it to Al Nufer. I won't try to comment on it in detail except to say that this kind of correspondence is extremely useful to us all up here. I haven't seen Tuco Paz since I have gotten back but I hope to catch up with him shortly and will let you know anything that he spills.

[1] Attached to the source text, but not printed. In the letter Mr. Mallory commented on the recent intensification of the anti-American campaign in Argentina and the declining health of Evita Perón, and he speculated on possible political developments in Argentina in the event she should die.

[2] Mr. Miller met Secretary Acheson in Recife, Brazil, on July 2, 1952, and accompanied him to Rio de Janeiro for a state visit which lasted a week. The Secretary's trip to Brazil was part of a tour of several countries taken between June 22 and July 8. For additional documentation on the Secretary's trip to Brazil, see pp. 586 ff.

When Al gets to Buenos Aires, he can give you pretty much our thinking up here on the subject of U.S.-Argentine relations. We had numerous bull sessions with him before he left and I do not believe that we came up with anything startling at all. Incidentally we did not feel that Al should stay in Rio since it seemed to us to be conspicuous and also we felt that it was very risky to plan our relations with Argentina upon the uncertain contingency of Evita's death. If they wish to snub him they will do so whenever he arrives and whatever the circumstances are. However, I should think it extremely unlikely that Remorino being such a close personal friend of Al's should go in for this kind of petty dealing.

I believe the main difference between the thinking of the Embassy and ourselves about our aproach to Argentine relations is over the Embassy's feeling that we should make a direct approach to Peron. It seems to me that we have had it as far as these tactics are concerned and that they have not paid off. Rather it seems to me that the best approach would be for Al to cultivate quietly his already good relations with Remorino. Insofar as Peron is concerned, you will recall the completely fruitless mission of George Messersmith last year[3] who had every possible advantage, namely, previous friendship with Peron, an entirely unofficial mission, and the complete confidence of his Government. Yet though Uncle George was able to have many hours with Peron, he was unable to change him in the slightest. It would of course be nice to dissuade Peron of his erroneous views about the U.S. but I think that it is one thing to talk to him and another thing to change his thinking. I think the only way that there will ever be any improvement in our relations with Argentina is for the Argentines to come to the conclusion that they must take some responsibility for them themselves. When they wake up to the fact that their anti-American campaign, no matter how long sustained, is not going to make us lose our nerve, they may reconsider their position.

Unfortunately, as I wrote to Ellsworth Bunker some months ago, the basic difficulty is that what Peron wants from us is something that we are unable to deliver to them, namely, an expression of our approval of him, his wife, and all of their works including justicialismo, the CGT and even their anti-American propaganda. When he talks about "resolving all of his problems with the U.S." this is what he means. In other words, like the Russians he is perfectly prepared to be buddies with us on his terms.

Naturally there may be some change in the situation although I have given up speculating on what may happen if Evita dies. We must be prepared to re-examine our attitude towards Argentina at every point and we should be flexible enough to adjust to any change in the situation down there. However, things being as they now are it seems to me, exasperating and frustrating as it may be, our only course is the one that we have been pursuing. We must during this period avoid to the extent possible any hostile act and, as I told Tuco Paz in regard to the activities of his Labor Attaché, we must do everything possible to avoid getting into an inflexible position. We should exploit those personal friendships that any of us have, always of course in a dignified and prudent manner. It does seem to me though that it is up to them and not to us to take the lead in any change of attitude. We have done it too many times in the past without success.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely yours, EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

735.00/8–2652 : Instruction

The Department of State to Diplomatic Offices in the American Republics [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, August 26, 1952.

PROPAGANDA CAMPAIGN OF THE ARGENTINE GOVERNMENT

The Secretary of State informs the officers in charge that the problem posed by the hostile propaganda disseminated in Latin America and certain extra-hemisphere countries by official and semi-official Argentine information media is the subject of continuing study in the Department. One effect of the increasingly provocative character of this anti-United States campaign has been to rouse varying degrees of interest in third countries with regard to this Government's possible reaction. It may be useful, therefore, to outline in general terms the attitudes which we can constructively express towards Peronista propaganda, and some of the considerations that shape them.

For the past year and a half the Department has pursued a policy of strict correctness towards Argentina in the face of an ever increasing barrage of Peronista propaganda attacks. It was known that the Peron Government for its own political purposes desired the United States to counter attack, and it has been the Department's policy not to be drawn into a polemical exchange.

[1] Drafted by Katherine Keany of the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs; cleared with the Bureau and the Office of South American Affairs.

In the present conditions of political and economic strain that obtain in Argentina, there is a considerable likelihood that any form of open retaliation on the part of the United States would be seized upon as the excuse for action that might so affect relations between the United States and Argentina as to precipitate the major problem of a recognized intra-hemisphere schism. It is also likely that open retaliation on our part would strengthen the hand of Argentine extremists.

There is, of course, a possibility that the Peronistas may resort to such action without any outside stimulus, citing some wholly imaginary pretext. Nevertheless, it seems clear that the United States would have little to gain, and much to lose, in supplying an excuse.

Evidence from nearly every other Latin American country indicates that the literate, knowledgeable people know how to appraise Argentine propaganda. It is reasonable to hope that this will create a body of opinion which, if not in itself a satisfactory defense, will lay a foundation for whatever countermeasures might become expedient. The attitude of the United States and of its representatives abroad can help or hinder this development.

1. It should be our objective, in contact with the nationals of other Latin American countries, to: (a) Underline, by the marked contrast of our own demeanor, the gratuitous aggressiveness of Peronista propaganda; and (b) Promote consciousness of the areas of difference between the aims and interests of the Peron Government and those of the Continent as a whole.

2. We should focus attention on the phenomenon of Peronista propaganda rather than on the content of its attacks. As these, almost without exception are not peculiar to Peronista sources, they must be dealt with, not in this particular context, but as part of the larger problem of Communist-nationalist distortion.

3. We should neither be drawn into betraying anger over the Peronista campaign, nor should we scornfully dismiss the whole subject: the first of these reactions would place us in the eyes of observers in the position of a frustrated second party to a "cold war"; the second might encourage others to take the Peronista drive lightly. Rather, it should be our aim to disarm the half-malicious interest that sometimes underlies the condolences of onlookers, and to induce Latin Americans to go much farther than we can in repudiating Peronista methods and calumnies against the United States.

4. A long-standing resentment of Argentines predisposes many Latin Americans to criticism of Argentine policies. However, it would be unwise to play upon that resentment by joining in detraction of the Argentine people or of the country itself; first, because it is not our purpose to encourage cleavages among the peoples of the hemisphere, and secondly, because that resentment in many cases is complicated by an underlying admiration of Argentina which would assert itself in reaction to American criticism. Furthermore, there is a well-known tendency of the Latin American countries to go to the support of any one of them unfavorably treated by the United States.

5. We should be extremely cautious in imputing Communist orientation to the Peron Government on the evidence of its propaganda. While the content and apparent strategy of its anti-United States attacks are to us highly suggestive of Communist influence, it would not be good tactics for United States officials to make this charge. This does not mean that we should not on appropriate occasions comment privately on Peronista furtherance of the Communist line or the appeal to Communist sources by Peronista publications; but for the present we should not emphasize this theme or place any final interpretation on it.

We wish to avoid any overt or concerted response to anti-American propaganda by Argentina. However, as circumstances permit and particularly if other diplomatic officials should initiate a discussion of our attitude towards Argentina, our diplomatic representatives abroad should in private conversation develop any or all of the following points:

1. We have no fight with the people of Argentina. We have always esteemed the contribution that the Argentines could make to the progress and welfare of the American community, and hoped for more whole-hearted participation from them. Geographically Argentina is one of the most isolated countries in the world and its self-sufficiency in food has intensified the effect of its physical position. It has not, like most countries, been forced to learn how to live with others. Thus, for example, the Peron Government does not appear to value the concept of cooperation among equals or to be willing to accept a share of the common responsibility for safeguarding the Americas.

While the Peronistas usually object to any cooperative project undertaken by others, they never seem to have anything genuine to put in its place. Back in 1948 they talked of aiding other countries in economic development, sent Senator Molinari around the continent as a Special Ambassador for Trade Promotion, and announced plans for a Cuban-Argentine bank of commerce—but nothing has come of this. Recently they propagandized in favor of a Latin American trading bloc, to handle sales to the large consumer countries; but as they now have virtually no surpluses for export, that proposal cannot be serious—unless they think of marketing other peoples' products. Argentina is, in fact, much less important economically, politically and militarily than her ego permits her to believe, and it would be useful for this idea to have more general currency. Any comment on the subject should subtly point out the ridiculousness of some of Argentina's bombastic claims.

2. We believe that most Argentines are unaware of the external activities of Peron's propaganda machine, and we should be reluctant to see the entire nation penalized for the actions of a government that makes policy in so arbitrary a manner.

3. A very serious aspect of Peronista propaganda is its attack upon truth.

One phase of this attack is the constant effort to discredit journalists and the free press; the other is the attempt to poison the sources of information by such measures as subsidization of the unscrupulous news agency, Agencia Latina, falsification of datelines and misrepresentation of news sources in the Government-controlled press, and publication within Argentina of wholly false news which is then disseminated throughout the continent by press and radio. Such practices, which threaten to discredit and undermine the ethics of journalism, are a more radical threat to freedom of information than is censorship or persecution of newspapermen, and they reinforce upon our own shores the attack waged from behind the Iron Curtain upon the great Western institution of the free press. It behooves free men—and especially publishers and journalists, since their survival is directly involved—to defend the bases of freedom of information by repudiating falsified news and exposing its purveyors.

4. As to why the Peron Government should make a systematic practice of methods so out of keeping with the traditions and culture of the nation, that is of course a matter of speculation. However, as is common knowledge, the economic life of Argentina has deteriorated to an appalling extent and it obviously must be increasingly difficult to prevent the electorate from awakening to their real position.

Hence, to preserve the illusion of Peronista success, it becomes necessary to elaborate the machinery of fiction, carrying it beyond the confines of domestic press and radio. This explanation would also account, perhaps, for the hysterical tone of the propaganda and for the huge expenditure upon international meetings at Buenos Aires and shows of all sorts considered likely to give the people an impression of triumph and dynamism. The external policy of obfuscation may have the same motivation as the repeated "discovery" of "foreign plots", which—in theory at least—at once diverts public attention from genuine problems and provides the regime with a scapegoat.

5. The priority given the United States as the target of insult is apt to obscure the fact that Peronista propaganda is a problem for the countries it is penetrating. (It is not in the United States that Peron is setting himself up as the deliverer of the people, nor are American workers being organized by the Argentine labor attachés.) Reaction to the problem appears to be mounting in many parts of the continent: one government (Ecuador) recently declared the Argentine Ambassador persona non grata for intervening in internal affairs; another (Panama) has forced the withdrawal of the Labor Attaché; others have placed Argentine diplomats under surveillance; one of the unions that entered the new Peronista-sponsored labor confederation has withdrawn its affiliation because of interference in its local affairs. Editorial opinion in various countries indicates resentment over Peronista penetration through the CGT.

This instruction should be discussed with those officers who are most in contact with the public and, therefore, apt to encounter questions or comment on this subject.

It should be emphasized that the purpose of this instruction is to give the chiefs of mission, and such other officers as they may desire to indoctrinate, background material with which to deal with the Argentine problem in discussions on appropriate occasions with nationals of the country to which they are accredited and diplomatic colleagues. This instruction should, however, under no circumstances be construed as an incitement to our diplomatic establishments to take the initiative in any frontal attack on the Argentine Republic or his government. The matter should be treated as one of extreme delicacy where the utmost tact and discretion are required. Crusading fervor and heavyhandedness should be avoided at all costs. It would, for example, be far better if the subject could be discussed when others take the initiative in raising it. The judicious use of humor in dealing with the problem would probably contribute to the success of any efforts on our part.

SECRET
No. 1003

BUENOS AIRES, February 5, 1953.

Subject: Conversation With President Peron

There is attached a memorandum of a conversation which I had with President Peron on February 3, 1953 at his request.

Our discussion of one hour and thirty-five minutes touched on various subjects which, in Peron's opinion, had contributed to tensions in U.S.-Argentine relations during "the past ten years". The burden of the President's remarks was that those tensions should come to an end.

It is difficult to say what motivated the President in taking this initiative. Perhaps he felt that Argentina's anti-U.S. campaign had overreached itself, and that the new administration in the United States affords him an opportunity to embark on a policy of closer relations with us. Whatever his motives, he impressed me as being genuinely desirous of seeking rapprochement.

I realize there are many obstacles in the way of improved Argentine-U.S. relations. Among them are the probability that the critical attitude of the U.S. press toward Argentina would not readily be modified (even assuming that Peron continues to restrain his own press), and the probable restiveness of Peron in the event his approach, unprecedented in recent years, is ignored by us. In the latter event, it would probably be some time before a similar overture by the Argentine Government could be expected.

I therefore urge that this development be given careful consideration in formulating our Latin American policy. There can be no doubt that any appreciable improvement in U.S.-Argentine relations would contribute to hemispheric solidarity and strengthen the defense of the free world against communist aggression.

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION WITH PRESIDENT PERON

Late on Friday evening, January 30th, the Foreign Minister, Sr. Remorino, telephoned me to say that he had told the President of our talk on January 26 (see my memorandum of January 27, 1953[2]) and that the President had expressed a wish to see me on Tuesday, February 3. I told Remorino that I would be glad to call on the President and he said he had been asked to accompany me.

Peron received me Tuesday at 4 p.m. in his home on Avenida Libertador General San Martin. He was extremely affable, even more so than on the occasion of the presentation of my credentials. Our meeting, which lasted 95 minutes, was cordial throughout.

He reminded me that when I last saw him he had suggested that we get together for a heart-to-heart talk with "all our cards on the table". He had, he said, purposely delayed seeing me because he wanted me to have a chance to familiarize myself with the local scene, but he felt the time for the meeting had now come and he had, therefore, asked me to call.

I told the President that I welcomed the opportunity to have a chat with him inasmuch as over five months had elapsed since our last conversation. I said I felt it was especially opportune for me to have some indication of what was in his mind in view of the recent change of administration in the United States.

Peron thereupon launched into a lengthy dissertation on what he considered to be the main causes for the state of tension between our two countries which, he said, had now existed for about ten years.

He first dwelt upon Argentina's geographic position. He compared Argentina's position in the far south to that of Sweden in the far north which, he said, explained why both countries had for many years been traditionally neutral and isolationist. Being so far removed from the center of the conflict, the Argentine people had been inclined to view the two world wars with a certain detachment and had been strongly opposed to any participation therein. This explained Argentina's position with regard thereto and why it would be practically impossible, politically speaking, for Argentina to send troops to Korea. The United States itself, he added, had not entered World War I until after it had been in progress for three years, and its entry into World War II had been delayed for over two years even though the U.S. interests were deeply involved. He implied that it had taken us a long time to get away from isolationism, and that it would take Argentina even longer due to its remote geographic position.

As might have been expected, Peron then took up the subject of Ambassador Braden.[3] Braden, he said, was mainly responsible for the friction which had so long existed between Argentina and the United States. His attitude here had been more like a member of the opposition party than an Ambassador of a friendly country. Peron said that he, nevertheless, owed Braden a debt of gratitude because Braden's attacks on his candidacy served to unite behind him the Argentine electorate, many of whom deeply resented the interference of a foreign diplomat in Argentina's domestic affairs. Even though Mr. Messersmith and the other ambassadors who succeeded Braden were men of tact and discretion who scrupulously refrained from interfering in the country's internal affairs, the bad effects of Mr. Braden's actions were never entirely erased from the minds of the people and the government of Argentina.

Another cause of discontent in Argentina had been, Peron said, the blocking of Argentine exchange balances and gold in the United States during World War II which, together with Britain's suspension of sterling convertibility, had at the time caused Argentina serious economic difficulties. When Argentina was finally able to avail itself of its holdings in the United States, in 1946–47, their purchasing power had decreased by almost 50%. (Peron made a similar statement in November, 1951—see despatch 896 of December 4, 1951,[4] entitled "Peron's Statement to Visiting Congressmen".)

He also mentioned the assurances allegedly given him by former Ambassador Bruce[5] that Argentina had nothing to worry about, since purchases under the Marshall Plan would take care of all its exportable surpluses. Argentina, he said, went to the extent of cancelling sales that had already been made to Russia and other countries, but Mr. Bruce's assurances never materialized. Fortunately, he added, export prices rose at about that time so that Argentina suffered no economic losses.

As another reason for Argentina's attitude, Peron mentioned the Export-Import Bank's refusal last year to permit Argentina to apply the unused portion of the 125 million dollar credit (granted in 1950)[6] to the purchase in the United States of agricultural equipment and other capital goods.

I interrupted the President to say that I was familiar with this transaction having, as he knew, been a member of the Joint United States-Argentine Economic Commission which met in Washington during the latter part of 1949 and early part of 1950. I had also been in Washington when the Argentine request regarding the unused portion of the credit (about 28 million dollars) had been received and had discussed it with the Export-Import Bank. The bank's refusal, I said, did not reflect on Argentina's economic solvency, with regard to which the bank had a high regard. The fact was that under the terms of the agreement, the credit could be used only to cover dollar arrears owed U.S. exporters for shipments to Argentina made before the agreement was signed. It would not have been possible, therefore, to agree to Argentina's request without entering into an entirely new agreement and this, I said, was impracticable at the time in view of the state of public opinion in the United States as a result of the anti-U.S. propaganda which Argentina had unleashed.

The President also mentioned the visit to Argentina of Mr. Miller,[7] then Assistant Secretary for Latin American Affairs. He had hoped that Mr. Miller's visit would bring about an improvement in relations between the two countries, and in order to help bring this about he had granted a number of requests which Mr. Miller made. These included:

1) Settlement of the problems confronting the American meat packers in Argentina;

2) The transfer of the head office of Swift International (now known as International Packers) from Buenos Aires to the United States. He said this was against the advice of members of his Cabinet and had resulted in a loss to Argentina of "250 million dollars";

[7] Mr. Miller visited Buenos Aires, Feb. 19–24, 1950; for text of despatch 355, from Buenos Aires, dated Mar. 1, 1950, reporting on the results of his visit, see Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. II, p. 696.

3) Permission for the entry of Braniff International Airways into Argentina;

4) Permission for the American motion picture companies to resume importation of their films; and

5) An improvement in the situation of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey (ESSO).

All this, the President added, had been to no avail, inasmuch as the American press had continued attacking him, his wife and his government.

He then repeated all he had told me during our previous meeting[8] about how he refused for several years to permit Argentine newspapers to retaliate and that it was not until 1950, when pressure by Argentine newsmen became very strong that he authorized them to reply to attacks against him in the United States press. He admitted that Argentina had not limited itself to refuting anti-Argentine statements which appeared in the United States, but had taken the offensive on the theory that offense was often the best defense. In any event, he said, United States press attacks had shown no signs of abatement and this, together with Argentine attacks on the United States, had been largely responsible for maintaining the present unsatisfactory situation.*

At this point I told the President that I would like to speak very frankly. I showed him the article by Edward Tomlinson which appeared in the January 27 issue of Look, entitled "Peron's War on the United States". This article carried two of the more vicious anti-U.S. cartoons distributed throughout the Hemisphere by Argentine labor attachés. I told him that he could readily see why propaganda of the kind published in the local papers and distributed by Argentine labor attachés must inevitably lead to unfavorable articles in the United States press, including such articles as the one by Mr. Tomlinson.

I said one of the things about Argentine propaganda which had created considerable concern in the minds of the American people was its similarity to the communist line. As examples, I mentioned the articles by Josephine Baker which had been head-lined in all the local papers; the constant references to "Yankee Imperialism" and "Yankee Capitalism"; and the consistent efforts to drive a wedge between the United States and Latin America. Moreover, for every article in the local press attacking Communism there had been at least a dozen articles attacking the United States. It was only natural, therefore, that our people should wonder whether Argentina was really anti-Communist or whether it might not be playing Russia's game.

The President reacted strongly to this. He said I doubtless knew that Argentina was strongly anti-Communist. There were in Argentina relatively few Communists and all of them were well known to the Government and under constant police surveillance. As a matter of fact, his Government not only had full records of all Communists in Argentina but also of those in other countries, including the United States. These records were at our disposition should we wish to use them.

I ventured to remark that there were Communists who were very close to the Argentine Government and mentioned the names of Puiggros and Libenson[9] (so-called "dissident Communists" who have been closely identified with the Argentine Government). Peron replied that they were Comunistas domesticados. "We use them" he said "for our purpose", to which I replied that "leopards did not change their spots". Peron agreed but said that they would not dare to fall out of step with his government. There was, he added, no real threat of Communism in Argentina but Communism was a very real menace in other Latin American countries such as Guatemala, Bolivia, Brazil and even Cuba. "Those are the countries" he said "that are the Communist danger spots of the Hemisphere—not Argentina".

I next remarked that I had noticed with satisfaction a definite decline in anti-U.S. propaganda in the controlled Argentine press and that I had been gratified over the favorable press which President Eisenhower had received here.

Peron said that he had ordered the press to temper its attacks against the United States shortly after my arrival because he considered me to be a "man of good will". (As a matter of fact there was no substantial let-up in the anti-U.S. press campaign until after the elections at home.) He added that while the press was amenable to suggestions from him, he could not entirely control its editorial policy, as he was not a dictator. In any event he was glad that there had been such a marked improvement in its attitude; it was his considered judgment that the discontinuance of press attacks on both sides was a prerequisite to the establishment of the type of climate which would have to be created if our two countries were to forget the past and reach an understanding. He felt it was essential that the tension that had existed between our countries for a decade come to an end.

I suggested that if existing tensions could be eliminated it would help the cause of Hemispheric solidarity and added that I had seen the editorials in the January 30 issues of Critica and La Prensa which said that friction between our two countries had only helped the enemy (see Embtel 566, January 30, 1953[10]). I asked whether the "enemy" referred to was Communism, and the President said, "Naturally".

I asked the President whether Argentine labor attachés had also been instructed to discontinue anti-U.S. propaganda. These officials, as he knew, had been distributing such propaganda in Argentine Embassy envelopes and under diplomatic frank. He said, "Yes, we have put a stop to all that".

Remorino said at this point that Argentine labor attachés were really "laborers" with the mentality of "laborers", who had merely taken a course in a local school for labor attachés. Most of them were not particularly bright and had considered it their duty to circulate in the country to which they were accredited any and all propaganda material received from the Argentine General Confederation of Workers (CGT) regardless of its nature. He himself had been instrumental in bringing about the recall of several of them, including one in the United States. They had not acted under instructions from the Argentine Government. Peron interrupted to say that if his government had been responsible for the distribution of the propaganda, it would have used more subtle methods.

I said I was gratified to learn that Argentina had initiated action by instructing the press and the Argentine labor attachés to discontinue attacks on the United States. At this point Remorino said he hoped that the United States press would also cease its attacks on Argentina. I said that this would be up to the United States press over which, as he and the President knew only too well, our government had no control whatsoever. In fact, any attempt on its part to induce our newspapers to discontinue their attacks on Argentina might well have the opposite effect. I could only hope, I said, that the improvement in the press here would eventually be reflected in the press in the United States, and that they could not expect a change over night. The President said he realized this and that he would have to be patient.

Remorino interrupted to say that while he knew the press in the United States was free, it was also true that Tito,[11] a Communist dictator, and Franco,[12] a Fascist dictator, were receiving friendly treatment and that there was little or no adverse comment on the dictatorships of Somoza and Trujillo. He thought this indicated that our press was amenable to friendly suggestions and remarked that any action taken in this respect might be facilitated by the fact that the great majority of U.S. newspapers were well disposed toward President Eisenhower.

[11] Marshal Josip Broz Tito, President of Yugoslavia.
[12] Generalissimo Francisco Franco y Bahamonde, Chief of State of Spain.

I replied that if there had been a change in the attitude of the U.S. press toward Tito and Franco the change had doubtless been a very gradual one and that I thought his statement to the effect that Franco's treatment in the United States press was a friendly one, at best somewhat exaggerated.

As an example of positive acts which might produce a favorable reaction in the U.S. press I mentioned Peron's recent statement to local Jewish leaders deploring Soviet anti-Semitism. Peron seemed pleased at my mention of this and I enquired why the full statement had not appeared in the Argentine press. He said that it had been published by the Jewish language papers. I remarked that their circulation must be very limited; whereupon he said the story had been given to the wire services. (The official release issued by the Secretaria de Informaciones had considerably tempered the force of the anti-Soviet remarks Peron made in the presence of the Jewish community leaders.)

I said that I had also noticed with interest the recent statements by Ambassador Paz and by the President himself with regard to foreign investments. I said that there was an investment in Argentina of some 400 million dollars in U.S. capital and that I was sure he would agree that it had made a very substantial contribution to the economic progress of the country.

The President said he was, of course, interested in attracting foreign capital but on terms that were equitable both to Argentina and to the investors. He said that Argentina wanted no more investments like the Smithfield Packing House which was established in 1911 with a capital of 1 million pounds sterling. Up to the time that Argentina purchased the plant, it had sent annual profits to England equal to its entire initial capital. His government, he added, was working on new regulations governing foreign capital investments, which he thought would be equitable to all concerned and which he hoped would have a stimulating effect on its inflow into the country.

Remorino next called my attention to the statements made by Secretary Dulles before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and produced a copy of the Congressional Record. He said the President had been disturbed by the Secretary's remark that there was fascism in Argentina which was spreading its tentacles elsewhere, but that he was reserving judgment until he had had a better opportunity to observe developments in Washington.

Remorino said that he was a friend and admirer of Secretary Dulles and that he had written him a letter[13] in which he had refrained from any criticism of the Secretary's remark, but had asked him to look into the Argentine situation objectively and after doing so to "let his conscience be his guide".

Remorino also referred to statements against Argentina attributed to Mr. Braden at a recent forum at Tulane University which he claimed were unusually derogatory and inflammatory. He said that these statements had not been published here at the express instructions of the President who felt they would needlessly exacerbate Argentine public opinion and make an understanding more difficult.

As the meeting was drawing to a close I enquired whether they had anything else in mind I could tell my government. Remorino replied that they were not in a position to give me a bill of particulars. The President, however, interrupted to say very emphatically that Argentina wanted nothing whatsoever from the United States and that his only purpose in speaking so frankly to me was to express his desire that the friction which had so long existed between our two countries finally come to an end.

The meeting broke up at 5:35 p. m., and Peron escorted Remorino and me to my car. Remorino, whom I dropped off at the hotel, appeared highly pleased over the conversation. In repeatedly expressing his satisfaction over the President's attitude, he implied that it was now up to me accurately to convey that attitude to my government.

ALBERT F. NUFER

Addendum

The President said that he had reason to believe that the United States Government had itself contributed to a propaganda campaign against Argentina. He had, he said, copies of receipts and other documents showing payments by Cultural or Information Officers of our Embassy in Mexico to Mexican publishers and editors covering such propaganda. I interrupted to say that his information was completely erroneous, as the activities of our Cultural and Information officers were always conducted in an open, straightforward manner such as those of the USIE here in Argentina.

Some time ago, the President added, he had sent an emissary to Chateaubriand, who owns a chain of newspapers in Rio, with a view toward inducing him to adopt a more favorable attitude toward Argentina. Chateaubriand told his emissary that if Argentina would pay him more than the seven million pesos he was now receiving from the United States Government, he might talk business. When I questioned the veracity of this report, Peron admitted that he himself had not been inclined to attach too much weight to it and had suspected that it might be an attempt on the part of Chateaubriand to obtain a subsidy from him.

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in Argentina [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, March 3, 1953.

613. Department concurs your view that Peron's expression desire improve US relations, taken with his recent diminution propaganda attacks on US, creates situation more favorable for initiation of rapprochement than likely arise again for some time. Opportunity should not be lost by our failure to reply.

Following are immediate factors which in US view do impede friendlier relations between Argentina and US: 1) Peronista intensification Argentine neutralism through "third position"; 2) Peronista official and officially inspired propaganda attacks on US; 3) apprehension other Latin American countries (especially Argentina's neighbors) to degree which might affect their friendship US if US moved closer Argentina while Peron following present exaggerated policies; 4) Peronista actions against free press and radio; 5) official Government control Argentine labor.

Department believes no substantial degree rapprochement possible unlesss Peron willing and able make bona fide changes in points 1 and 2 above paragraph. Present implementation "third position" is aid to Soviets. Peron's attacks on US have been straight Commie line and even more helpful to Soviets than "third position". Modification these policies would proportionately diminish point 3 as obstacle. While points 4 and 5 are internal Argentine matters and US not in position insist changes as basis for official rapprochement, it is nevertheless foregone conclusion, while Peron pursues these policies, attacks from US press and labor to which he objects will continue. In this sense, cessation these attacks in Peron's hands.

Department shares your skepticism Peron's statement he wants nothing from US. Until we more aware his objectives, Department would prefer to keep discussions with him in realm generalities—welcoming his desire improve relations and emphasizing importance free world should not be weakened time of crisis by tensions and doubts among own members. gests you follow up your February 3 conversation Peron at earliest opportunity and address him along following line:

Government United States has welcomed your statement to me regarding your desire improvement in relations between our two countries. Essential that those of us with like interests and objectives should devote our utmost energies toward maintaining united front with which we may together face common dangers. Our common traditions of freedom and liberty and collective agreements we have ratified not only are insurance against our own eventual destruction but also offer less fortunate nations of world the strength and hope which they may need to survive. We cannot, however, deal effectively with our adversaries if among ourselves there is atmosphere tension and suspicion and unless each of our nations is inspired by ardent faith in rightness of our cause. Argentina and United States are both recognized leaders American community and nature their relationship each other has direct bearing on whether American republics shall be able fulfill their proper role defense free world. Is with these thoughts in mind, Mr. President, that my Government has noted with satisfaction your statement that you desire improved relations witht United States.

Having conveyed above message to Peron, Department desires you, if circumstances appear favorable, to seek on a strictly personal and informal basis to ascertain what specifically Peron has in mind respecting improvement in Argentine-American relations, and what steps he envisages to that end. In this connection you should of course bear in mind both the difficulties which will face us and him also in any effort to improve relations and importance of time element.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 5, 1953.

Subject: Current Status of U.S.-Argentine Relations

Through various channels, President Peron has sent messages to the effect that Argentina's difficulties with the United States were due to the personalities and attitudes of officials of the previous administration. He professes to have a high personal regard for you and suggests that the time is now ripe for improving relations. Substantially the same statements were made by Peron to Ambassador Nufer with the request that the Department be informed officially.

[1] The covering transmittal memorandum, which indicates that President Eisenhower requested this report concerning the current Argentine situation, is not printed. The report was drafted by Messrs. Smith, McWilliams, and Mann.

We want from Argentina: cessation of the Communist-line propaganda which, until modified recently, was being propagated throughout the hemisphere by the Argentine Government and labor elements which it controls; unequivocal opposition to Communism and the Soviet design. (Peron's announced policy is one of equal opposition to both US and USSR "imperialism".)

Peron probably wants from us: friendly and respectful attitude towards him and his regime by the press and organized labor in the US as well as military and economic aid. Unless he modifies his policies, it would be impossible for us to comply completely with his first desire, and substantial US aid would be opposed by elements in the United States and resented by Brazil, Peru, Uruguay and other Latin American countries which fear Argentina.

Peron may actually be willing to modify some of his policies to bring about an improvement in relations with the US. On the other hand, his professions of friendship may be simply a tactic in his plan to play off the US and the USSR against each other. Another possibility is that he may hope to obtain something from us without changing any of his policies. (A recent intelligence report[2] would support this last possibility.)

Peron's approach to us has been friendly, vague and general. We have instructed Ambassador Nufer to reply in the same friendly vein and to seek from Peron his opinion as to what the next step toward improving relations should be. Word has also reached him thru McCloy and others that the US is "willing" but that he must do something more to create a favorable atmosphere. He seems to like Nufer, and their next conversation may give a better lead.[3]

[2] Reference uncertain.

[3] On Mar. 13, 1953, pursuant to instructions contained in the Department's telegram 613, supra, Ambassador Nufer met with President Perón to discuss further United States-Argentine relations. Ambassador Nufer's memorandum of their conversation was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 1165, from Buenos Aires, dated Mar. 16, 1953. The despatch reads in part as follows:

"As I had feared, I was unable to elicit from Peron what exactly he may have in mind in allegedly seeking a closer understanding with the United States. The statement that his bid for closer relations carries no price tag notwithstanding, I still feel that his move is inspired by some motive which he is not yet prepared to reveal. On the other hand, his statement that the establishment of a better atmosphere was a prerequisite to closer relations and that other developments would naturally follow once a better atmosphere prevailed seemingly indicates that he takes a realistic view of the problem.

"The question with which we are now confronted is—Where do we go from here? Before we try to answer this question, we may have to let some time go by to see whether Peron carries through on his promise to keep the local press here effectively under control in so far as anti-U.S. propaganda is concerned. We shall watch this carefully and will also be on the alert for any indications of a firmer stand on his part against communism." (611.35/3–1653)

Editorial Note

During the spring and summer of 1953, Ambassador Nufer had several conversations with President Perón concerning United States-Argentine relations.

On May 14, Ambassador Nufer and President Perón met for 1 hour and 45 minutes. They discussed, inter alia, certain references critical of the United States contained in President Perón's speech to the opening session of the Argentine Congress on May 1 and the Argentine Government's suspension of the licenses of the UP, AP, and INS press services to use local communications facilities. Ambassador Nufer's memorandum of their conversation, dated May 14 (transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 1464, from Buenos Aires, dated May 18, 1953), records President Perón as having stated that his speech was designed for domestic consumption and also as having instructed Foreign Minister Remorino, who was present during the meeting, to have the restrictions against the news agencies rescinded. The despatch reads in part as follows:

"I find it difficult at this point to judge the sincerity of Peron's remarks and of his assurances of his continued desire to reach an agreement with the United States. His conciliatory attitude is, of course, encouraging. It might indicate that he feels he went too far in his May 1 speech. I believe, however, that we will have to have a little more time to watch the trend of developments before attempting to arrive at any conclusions. One test of his sincerity will be the attitude of the controlled press; another and more immediate test will be whether his order to have the restrictions on the news agencies rescinded is carried out." (611.35/5–1853)

On July 3, Ambassador Nufer met again with President Perón. In the Ambassador's memorandum of their conversation, dated July 3 (transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 13, from Buenos Aires, dated July 7, 1953), President Perón is recorded as having stated that he regretted the announcement that Ambassador Nufer would soon be replaced, and that he favored the entrance of "responsible" private investment capital into Argentina. He also promised that if the provincial administrations in Argentina would not pay for properties expropriated from the American and Foreign Power Company, the Federal Government would do so. (611.35/7–753)

On July 24, Ambassador Nufer and President Perón met a third time. In the Ambassador's memorandum of their conversation, dated July 24 (transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 93, from Buenos Aires, dated July 31, 1953), President Perón is recorded as having stated that he intended to take vigorous action against Communists in Argentina and that he would cooperate with the Embassy to solve outstanding problems between the two countries, including those affecting American business firms already in or seeking to enter Argentina. The despatch reads in part as follows:

"Over-all, I consider this interview with Perón to have been highly satisfactory and promising for future relations. However, I am sure the Department will readily perceive the need for the U.S. to make further gestures, following Dr. Eisenhower's visit here, to fortify the evidence of its willingness to meet Perón half-way and to reciprocate some of the actions taken by him so far as positive evidences of his desire for better relations." Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President[1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, June 18, 1953.

Subject: Inclusion of Argentina in Visit of Dr. Milton Eisenhower[2] to South America.

Since May 15 President Peron has lifted official restrictions on the operations of American news agencies and has markedly diminished anti-American propaganda.

There is reason to believe that the incidents between April 15 and May 15 were fomented and used by the extreme nationalists and crypto-Communists in Peron's entourage to stop the gradual improvement in our relations with Argentina which had been developing since you took office. The steps taken by Peron are clearly the outcome of representations made by Ambassador Nufer and the quiet work of those of Peron's entourage who desire better relations with the United States.

The situation is still not satisfactory in that the congressional investigation[3] of American news agencies and unofficial pressure against them continue. Nevertheless, it would scarcely be even in their interests not to make the visit, and numerous other American interests have emphatically urged that Dr. Eisenhower's visit be made. Even some prominent newsmen favor it. It is significant that Democracia, the noisy Peronista mouthpiece controlled by the anti-American clique, has now reverted to the line of "sympathetic expectancy" of better relations with the United States.

We feel that, from the viewpoint of our national interests, American interests in Argentina, and our relations both with Argentina and the other American republics, it is desirable that the visit to Argentina be made. While Peron may revert to anti-American diatribes, a visit, on the other hand, may afford a positive opportunity to clear up outstanding questions and thus may prove a definite step forward on the road to improved relations.[4]

The Ambassador in Argentina (Nufer) to the Department of State[1]

SECRET BUENOS AIRES, September 4, 1953.

No. 211

Subject: Conversation With President Perón

There is enclosed an account of my interview with President Perón on September 3, 1953. It will be noted that by far the most important part of this interview involves the presentation by President Perón of several matters with regard to which Argentina hopes it can have the assistance of the United States. We have, of course, during the entire process of contacts leading to an improvement of relations with Argentina, expected that at some time or other Perón would indicate certain concrete expectations of Argentina, in spite of his protestations to the contrary up to now. These have now been received, although not yet in detailed form so that the exact desires of Argentina are yet unclear.

Nevertheless, the subjects introduced by Perón appear to bear very careful scrutiny and analysis in the Department in terms of their potential advantage to us in Hemispheric defense, and in the opportunity to which they might lead us of developing the anti-communist disposition which Perón seems to reveal. It will be noted that some of these proposals have a marked potential for private capital attraction. Any government to government cooperation with respect to them, which presumably enters into Argentine thinking, might be utilized as a catalyst to this end. It might not be too much to imagine, in fact, that these proposals could lead to negotiations for the establishment of conditions here attractive for further private capital investment, coupled with agreements on military cooperation in defense against communism.

An interesting insight on the thinking that may now be going on in the Casa Rosada appears in a remark Ambassador Margueirat[2] (who was present at my interview with Peron) made to an officer of this Embassy: "Did you notice that all Peron's points were related to Hemispheric defense against Communism?"

While Perón's motivations may not be so completely altruistic as he himself presents them, they carry with them the possibility of aligning him formally with U.S. policy for defense against communist aggression.

MEETING OF AMBASSADOR NUFER WITH PRESIDENT PERÓN
SEPTEMBER 3, 1953[3]

I saw President Perón this morning at my request to present him with a personal letter[4] and a collection of trout flies from Dr. Milton Eisenhower and to take leave from him in view of my impending trip to Washington.[5] Our meeting, at which the Foreign Minister, Dr. Remorino, and the Chief of Ceremonial, Ambassador Margueirat, were present, lasted from 10:15 a.m. to 12 noon.

The President was delighted with the trout flies and asked me to translate Dr. Eisenhower's letter for him.

[4] No copy of the referenced letter was found in Department of State files. Subsequent to Dr. Eisenhower's visit to Buenos Aires, he exchanged a series of letters with President Perón; Dr. Eisenhower's letters, dated Aug. 3, 5, and Sept. 30, 1953, were transmitted to the Embassy at Buenos Aires for delivery to President Perón under cover, respectively, of instructions A–26, dated Aug. 6, 1953 (735.11/8–653), A–28, dated Aug. 11, 1953 (711.11 Ei/8–1153), and A–63, dated Oct. 1, 1953 (735.11/10–153). Copies of a later exchange of letters between the two men, dated June 27 and Aug. 4, 1954, are in Holland files, lot 52 D 295, "1954–1956."

[5] Ambassador Nufer departed Argentina on Sept. 10, 1953, for consultations in Washington and returned to Buenos Aires on Oct. 19.

He requested me to listen to a recording of an interview which he gave yesterday to the representative of the National Broadcasting Company, and which is to be televised in the United States. The President said that the interview had taken over twenty minutes and would have to be cut in order to bring it within the proposed ten minute limit. He asked for suggestions as to what parts of the interview might best be eliminated as of only marginal interest to the Amerian audience. After listening to the recording, he then offered to furnish me with a copy of the text so that I could go over it with my associates. He also instructed Sr. Apold,[6] Sub-Secretario de Informaciones to furnish me a copy and asked that we be good enough to let him have our ideas today if possible.

I then took up with the President certain items of interest to several local American enterprises. I requested a meeting with him on behalf of the American meat packers who are facing a difficult situation, and also discussed the American & Foreign Power Company's difficulties with the provincial authorities in Mendoza. The President agreed to see the meat packers on his return from Cordoba and promised to look into the problems of the American & Foreign Power Company; also to let me know whether the discussions looking toward the acquisition of the company's properties by the government—such negotiations having been suspended early in 1952 because of the then difficult local economic situation—might be resumed at this time.

I also mentioned the interest of Mr. Herman Metzger, head of the local ESSO branch, in meeting with him again to discuss further the possibility of ESSO cooperating in the development of Argentina's oil resources. The President agreed to see Mr. Metzger as soon as possible.[7]

I also mentioned the fact that several issues of the New York Times had been confiscated by the customs authorities during July and August, and Peron promised to take steps to prevent future incidents of this kind.

The desire of Panagra to invite six Argentine boys to visit the United States at its expense (as part of Panagra's twenty-fifth anniversary celebration) was also mentioned, and the President said he would designate the six youngsters before September 13, the date on which Panagra wishes to make the corresponding announcement.

[7] Documents pertaining to negotiations between Argentine officials and representatives of U.S. oil companies are in file 835.2553 for late 1953 and 1954.

The President referred to the hearings now being held in Washington with regard to a possible increase in U.S. wool import duties. He asked me to express to my government his grave concern over the possibility the increase might affect carpet wool; if so, he said, it would deprive Argentina of one of its few remaining sources of dollar exchange which Argentina urgently needed to acquire certain American products indispensable for its economic well-being. I said it was my impression that carpet wool was on the free list but that I would telegraph[8] the Department immediately.

The President said that he would like to enlist our assistance in several other matters of great interest to his government. He prefaced his remarks by saying that although many people did not believe that there would be a third world war, he personally was convinced that such a war was inevitable; it was therefore imperative that every effort be made by the countries of the Western Hemisphere to utilize to the utmost the present breathing spell to prepare for such an emergency.

He was deeply concerned over the fact that Argentina was producing only about 45 percent of its oil requirements. This was all the more serious because of Argentina's commitments under the Hemisphere Defense Plan.[9] It was, he thought, vitally important that Argentina become self-sufficient in so far as its oil requirements were concerned in order that it might contribute effectively to the defense of the South Atlantic. An emergency program to bring this about was therefore needed.

The President was not clear just how he thought the United States could assist him in expediting the development of Argentina's oil resources, but I got the impression that he thought it was mainly a job for private U.S. capital. He said the problem, as far as Argentina was concerned, was largely political because YPF, despite its evident shortcomings, was strongly entrenched. There were, moreover, certain laws which he could not ignore and which made it impossible for him to turn over Argentina's oil resources to foreign enterprises. He thought, however, that some way could be found for foreign companies to cooperate with the Argentine Government in their exploration and exploitation. The President was somewhat vague on this point; he did say that it would not be possible to give the foreign companies title to the land, but that they would presumably have to operate under what he described as a contrato de locación de obra (project lease), and to agree to turn over part of their production to YPF. In any event, the President said something had to be done in the immediate future in view of the strategic importance of the matter to Hemispheric defense.

[8] In telegram 138, from Buenos Aires, dated Sept. 3, 1953, Ambassador Nufer reported that President Perón had requested him to express the Argentine Government's "grave concern" with respect to the possibility of increased import duties on wool (411.356/9–353).

[9] Apparent reference to the General Military Plan for the Defense of the American Continent, approved by the Inter-American Defense Board, Nov. 15, 1951; for information, see the editorial note, Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. II, p. 1028.

The President then discussed the possibility of obtaining some assistance from us in connection with the proposed development of Argentina's shipyards and dry docks. The shipyards (astilleros) at Rio Santiago, he said, were already equipped for fairly large vessels, but additional equipment was needed not only for Rio Santiago but for the six dry docks now under construction in Tigre. These shipyards and dry docks, he said, would be of vital importance to the countries of the Western Hemisphere in the event of another world war. There were, he remarked, no other facilities in this part of the Hemisphere where large vessels could be overhauled and repaired. World War III, he said, would be characterized by an attempt on the part of our enemies to destroy the free world's industrial potential, and Argentina was outside of the range of Russian bombers.

The President then discussed the possibility of obtaining help from the United States in building a plant for the large-scale production of fighter planes, such as the Pulqui II which the Argentine Government has been constructing on an experimental basis. He said that such a plant would, as in the case of the shipyards and dry docks, be beyond the range of Russian bombers and would constitute an important contribution to Hemispheric defense. The plant he had in mind would be equipped to produce complete planes, including motors, etc., and in return for our assistance Argentina would agree to place the entire production thereof at our disposal in the event of an emergency.

The President also hoped the United States might find it possible to assist Argentina in the construction of a steel mill. Argentina was already producing ordnance and ammunition, including guided missiles, and was currently experimenting with guided torpedoes. It was likewise producing small amounts of recoilless guns. Production of all this material could be tremendously stepped up if Argentina had a modern integrated steel mill, and Argentina's contribution to the defense of the Hemisphere could thereby be immeasurably increased.

The President also discussed the need for greatly expediting the production of uranium ore and beryl. Argentina, he said, had large undeveloped uranium and beryl deposits but it needed technical help if large-scale production was to be forthcoming within any presently measurable period. Such production, he said, would be sold to the United States.

In connection with all projects he spoke of the need of assistance from the United States but at no time did he mention the possibility of public credits except indirectly when he remarked that if these projects could be carried out by private capital it would, of course, be preferable.

I told the President that while I was, of course, unable to venture an opinion on the questions he raised, I would be glad to make a memorandum of our conversation and submit it to my government for its consideration. I suggested, however, that it would be extremely helpful if he could let me have a brief memorandum on each of the subjects mentioned, giving me in more detailed form just what he had in mind and exactly what, in his opinion, the nature of our contribution to the several projects might consist of. The President promised that he would have his technical advisers furnish me with such memoranda before my departure for the United States.

When I took my leave Peron asked me to give President Eisenhower an "abrazo" from him. "Tell the President", he said, "that he is the senior General and that I will carry out his orders."

Memorandum of Conversation, by James F. O'Connor, Jr. of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 23, 1953.

Subject: Call on Secretary by Ambassador Nufer.

Participants: The Secretary
Ambassador Albert F. Nufer
OSA—James F. O'Connor, Jr.

The Secretary asked Ambassador Nufer about Argentine developments. Ambassador Nufer described briefly the recent improvement in US-Argentine relations following Dr. Milton Eisenhower's visit to Buenos Aires.

The Secretary asked what Argentina wanted from the US. Ambassador Nufer replied that during the course of his call on President Perón prior to departing for the US, Perón had referred in undetailed fashion to the desirability of some US assistance—placing the matter on the basis of strategic military considerations—in connection with such projects as construction of a steel plant, expansion of naval shipyard facilities, and development of petroleum resources. Perón had intimated that at least this last was, however, a project for private capital.

The Secretary said that the policy of the Administration was to encourage foreign nations to look to private capital sources than to US public funds for financial assistance, since the US taxpayer had to foot the bill in the latter case. He stated that Argentina had been developed initially by British and US private capital and that it should logically continue to look to these sources.

Ambassador Nufer said that the Argentine interest would be in loan rather than grant aid, to which the Secretary replied that this was all the same from the point of view of raising taxes. The Secretary commented that there was a possibility that a new semi-official lending agency—in which private as well as public capital would participate—might be formed, and that such an institution, which would be in a position to make some "soft loans",[1] could be approached to furnish certain foreign financial assistance.

Ambassador Nufer pointed out that it was important to keep Argentina on our side in the interest of promoting hemispheric solidarity and having her firmly aligned with us in the fight against Communism.

The Secretary complimented Ambassador Nufer on the job which he was doing in Buenos Aires.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Henry Dearborn of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 29, 1953.

Subject: Meeting on Argentina between Ambassador Nufer and Officials of the Export-Import Bank

Participants: Maj. General Glen E. Edgerton, Managing Director, Eximbank
Mr. Hawthorne Arey, Assistant Director
Mr. Lynn U. Stambaugh, Deputy Director
Ambassador Albert F. Nufer
Mr. Rollin S. Atwood, Director, Office of South American Affairs
Mr. Henry Dearborn, Office of South American Affairs

Ambassador Nufer called on General Edgerton, Mr. Arey, Mr. Stambaugh and other officials of the Export-Import Bank this morning to discuss Argentina. It was soon evident from the conversation that the Bank officials principally desired to hear what Ambassador Nufer had to say with regard to the situation in Argentina and with regard to the State Department's attitude toward loan applications received by the Bank for projects in Argentina. Ambassador Nufer's principal purpose was to learn what the Bank's attitude was toward applications for loans to finance projects in Argentina.

Ambassador Nufer outlined the political and economic situation in Argentina. He then referred to some of the conversations which he had had recently with American businessmen and to the interest of these businessmen in Argentine projects. He said that in his opinion if the Export-Import Bank or some other institution did not assist American exporters in holding their own in the Argentine market the Germans and other Europeans would increasingly crowd the Americans out of the picture. This was to some extent already taking place. The Ambassador made it clear that in his view, as a result of markedly improved US-Argentine relations since Dr. Milton Eisenhower's visit to Buenos Aires last July, favorable consideration by the Bank of applications for loans to finance sound projects in Argentina was desirable. Mr. Atwood generally agreed with this view. He added, however, that the State Department did not believe that it should take the initiative in urging American businessmen to direct their attentions toward Argentina. On the other hand if American businessmen showed a definite interest in Argentina and themselves took the initiative in increasing their operations there, the Department woud certainly have no political objection to this trend of events and no objection to favorable action by the Export-Import Bank on loans to assist US private business operations in Argentina. However, Mr. Atwood stated that he thought the Department would not look with favor at this time and might well object to any loan to Argentina on a government-to-government basis.

The Bank's position as expressed by General Edgerton and Mr. Arey was somewhat as follows: The Bank was prepared to consider relatively small loan applications from exporters. The Bank would probably not favor financing a loan for any such tremendous project as the $150,000,000 steel mill desired by the Argentines. General Edgerton pointed out that the Bank had a limited fund with which to work and that it followed a policy of diversification of its operations so that it would not have too much credit localized in any one place. This policy would probably prevent the Bank from becoming connected with any such large enterprise as the proposed Argentine steel mill. As examples of applications which might be considered favorably, Mr. Arey mentioned an application for $750,000 for road building equipment and a relatively small project in which Mathison Chemical Company was interested for the sale of fertilizer. Mr. Arey said he was rather doubtful about the Westinghouse International application for the improvement of the Buenos Aires electrical plant in view of the harsh treatment which the Argentine Federal and Provincial governments had given to American Foreign Power. Mr. Arey also mentioned that the Bank had been approached with regard to the proposed sale of 100 locomotives to Argentina by the Baldwin Locomotive Works. St. Joseph Lead Company was also interested in financial assistance. Finally, Mr. Arey said that only recently the Bank had been approached with regard to financial assistance for the development of coal fields in Argentina.

To supply the Bank with the necessary information for considering the increased number of applications which were coming in on Argentine projects, Mr. Arey said the Bank was conducting an over-all study [1] of the Argentine economic and financial picture. He said that as a result of this it might be determined that Argentina could not stand any further dollar indebtedness. On the other hand, the Bank might conclude that it would be desirable to go ahead on some relatively small projects up to a total of perhaps 30 to 50 million dollars. Any further action would have to await the conclusion of the over-all study. In any event, General Edgerton said that the Bank was glad to know the State Department would have no political objections to the favorable consideration of small loan applications if the Bank felt them to be economically desirable.[2]

[1] Representatives of the Export-Import Bank visited Argentina several times during late 1953 and 1954; pertinent documents are in file 103 XMB for those years.

[2] In despatch 807, from Buenos Aires, dated Feb. 19, 1954, Ambassador Nufer stated that the Export-Import Bank should consider large-scale loans for projects in Argentina. The Ambassador further stated that the Embassy was not "unduly concerned over the possibility of any Argentine default," but was "more concerned over the probability that our position and influence in this market will deteriorate seriously unless U.S. manufacturers receive assistance in competing for large-scale contracts." Memorandum by the President to the Secretary of State [1]

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, November 6, 1953.

In view of the conciliatory gestures that Peron seems to be making from time to time, I wonder if it would not be well for us to decide between ourselves (and to inform our Ambassador in Argentina) as to exactly what conditions would justify a real rapprochement between the two governments.

Even if you and I should become convinced that the man has really reformed and is conscientious in building up a real friendship with our country, we could not possibly, under present conditions, make a great deal of progress in that direction. Our people would necessarily have to be convinced of his honesty of intention.

It seems to me that there are several things that would have to be accomplished before we could really treat him officially as we would any other head of a friendly government. I think the newspapers that he took over in the Argentine would have to be restored to their rightful owners and allowed free operation. I think that unnecessary restrictions on the travel of our citizens in Argentina would have to be lifted. Another thing is that he would have to convince other countries in South America that he is operating on a friendly and honest basis. There may be other things of this same character that would have to be done.

In any event, I think this is a subject that you and I should have a talk about one of these days.

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 19, 1953.

Subject: Development of Rapprochement with Argentina

In response to your memorandum[2] on our relations with Argentina, it is my general feeling that if improvements continue at the present pace—and if we can avoid any setback—matters are developing about as favorably as we could reasonably expect. While the attached paper summarizes recent advances, if you should wish to discuss our Argentine relations further I should be glad to do so at your convenience. Despite Peron's present friendliness, we should not be altogether surprised if he should fly off on another anti-American tangent.

I agree that Peron's disinclination to restore the newspaper La Prensa to its former owner (whom he considers to symbolize the feudal economic and social structure which he has tried to reform), and the tenacious interest of the U.S. press in this matter will delay any real public acceptance of Peron in this country. The New York Times has been particularly critical and the United Press, partly because of its important financial connections with La Prensa's previous owner, has apparently spearheaded the drive for restoration of the paper. For his part, Peron's position, firmly and publicly stated, is that he will never return La Prensa. Since it now belongs to the Argentine General Confederation of Labor, which numbers 5 million members, he would probably find it difficult to reverse himself even if he wished to do so. I am hopeful that if Peron continues on his present conciliatory course, American public opinion will gradually become more friendly to him.

[2] Supra.

Peron's suspicion that the U.S. Government was secretly working against him and inspiring press attacks was apparently finally allayed only with the general clearing of the atmosphere which resulted from Dr. Eisenhower's visit to Argentina last summer. I fear that this new and, I hope, sincere confidence of Peron in our intentions would be undermined and possibly destroyed if we were to indicate in any way that we considered the La Prensa case a fit subject for official U.S. advice or discussions—particularly in view of our policy and commitments against intervention in the internal affairs of the other American nations.

To my knowledge, there are at present no significant restrictions on the travel of U.S. citizens within Argentina, although there are limitations on the travel to Uruguay of residents of Argentina, including U.S. citizens. Our Embassy in Buenos Aires has been able to secure exceptions to these controls in particular cases.

Paper Prepared in the Office of South American Affairs[3]

IMPROVEMENT IN RELATIONS WITH ARGENTINA

Perhaps the most important single improvement in our relations with Argentina has been the cessation of Argentine propaganda attacks which had undoubtedly had a very divisive effect on the attitude toward the US in Argentina and elsewhere in Latin America. The cessation of this propaganda is in itself very valuable to us.

Related to this has been the removal of restrictions on the operation of the US press services in Argentina. This has not only meant improved treatment for an important US enterprise, but has also aided full and fair news presentation of our actions and policies. In the same field, Peron has just told our Ambassador that he is taking steps to permit the free entry into Argentina of US periodicals which have heretofore been barred.

The Argentine authorities have also begun to take a much stronger stand against Communism in that country, in both statement and action.

Argentina has also removed discriminatory obstacles to the operation of some US business firms by issuing long delayed import permits for essential production materials. US film distributors have been given clearance on a long list of films whose importation had been held up. Legislation has been enacted designed to attract foreign private capital to Argentina by spelling out permissible profit remittances and capital repatriation. While the law is not entirely attractive in all provisions, it indicates a substantially improved attitude.

The Argentines have cooperated well with us at the present session of the UN General Assembly.

Most of this improvement in relations, which began with the election of President Eisenhower, and was given sharp impetus by the visit of Dr. Milton Eisenhower to Buenos Aires last summer, has consisted in the elimination of activities and situations distasteful to us. There is, however, virtually no possibility that Peron would or could consider eliminating the principal point of grievance in the eyes of the US press, the restoration of the newspaper La Prensa to its former owners. Goaded by New York Times editorial attacks on this matter, Peron recently reaffirmed his stand. This is essentially such an internal Argentine matter, even though it obviously has international and moral implications, that we have been most cautious about raising it with the Argentines in order not to be accused of "intervention."

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador in Argentina (Nufer)[1]

[Extract]

CONFIDENTIAL BUENOS AIRES, December 30, 1953.

. . . . . .

I then said I woud like to refer to a less agreeable subject, i.e., the Czechoslovakian steel mill.[2] I gave the President and Remorino[3] each a copy of a memorandum[4] which the Embassy had prepared explain-

---

[1] Transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 636, from Buenos Aires, dated Dec. 30, 1953, not printed (611.35/12–3053). The conversation reported in this memorandum took place on Dec. 29.

[2] Reference is to a rolling mill for the production of steel purchased in the United States by a Czechoslovakian firm in 1947 for approximately $17 million. In 1948, the U.S. Government denied application for a license to export the mill to Czechoslovakia, and in January 1952, the Treasury Department issued an order blocking the unlicensed transfer of the mill, pending settlement of U.S. claims against Czechoslovakia. The Argentine Government signed an agreement with the Czech Government in November 1953 to purchase the mill for the equivalent of $12.5 million in Czech currency, payable half in commodities and half in cancellation of an existing commercial debt. The United States disapproved this arrangement and refused to release the blocking order. A memorandum by Mr. Woodward to Secretary Dulles, dated Mar. 22, 1954, summarized developments to its date (835.33/3–2254). Additional pertinent documents are in file 835.33 for 1953 and 1954.

[3] Foreign Minister Remorino was also present during the discussion.

ing the exact status of the matter and suggested that they might like to read it at their leisure (see enclosed memorandum). I said there appeared to be no alternative to the sale of the mill at public auction to the highest bidder.

Perón said that Sosa Molina,[5] the Minister of Defense, who was constantly importuning him about the mill, had told him that he was trying to arrange for Westinghouse International to bid on the mill with a view to reselling it to the Argentine Government if its bid proved successful. Sosa Molina seemed to think that Westinghouse International might be willing to cooperate along these lines. He added that Colonel Sosthenes Behns of IT&T had mentioned the mill to him when he was in Buenos Aires a few weeks ago and that he intended to instruct Ambassador Paz to get in touch with the Colonel in order to find out if there was any way in which IT&T could be of assistance.

Perón inquired if there was any way in which Argentina itself could submit a bid without the immediate outlay of dollars should its bid prove successful. He asked specifically whether it would be possible to pay in installments or whether the necessary dollars could be advanced by the Export-Import bank. I replied that I was certain neither of these procedures would be possible. The Treasury, I felt, would probably insist on cash and the Export-Import bank could not, for political reasons, loan money to any country to pay for the mill because any unsuccessful U.S. bidders could then allege that a U.S. public lending institution had made it possible for a foreign country to outbid them. Perón seemed to understand this and told Remorino to keep in close touch with Ambassador Paz so that every possibility might be explored. I got the impression that Perón was obviously very much interested in securing the mill for Argentina but appreciated the situation in which we found ourselves and that he did not, at this stage at least, harbor any resentment against the United States over the turn of events.

I then said there was another problem which I wanted to mention, i.e., the recent establishment of a U.S. import quota on oats. Perón apparently had no previous knowledge of this but Remorino said this was a disturbing development and one on which he had been in close touch with Sr. Cafiero,[6] the Minister of Foreign Trade. I read to Perón and Remorino, and left with them copies of, a memorandum[7] on the subject which I told them was unofficial and perhaps not completely accurate as much of the information it contained was received yesterday over long distance telephone. The President seemed to understand our position. Remorino was apparently more disturbed and remarked that when he was Ambassador in Washington the State Department constantly complained about high IAPI prices and now he said we were complaining because its prices were too low. I said that even if Argentine oats were offered at the equivalent of the U.S. market price their unlimited importation would still constitute a serious problem in view of our large surplus and the difficulties which such importations would create for our price support program. Remorino inquired whether there was any assurance that the entire 2.5 million bushels set aside for countries other than Canada could be supplied by Argentina. I told him that it would not be possible to give any such assurance and that as I understood it, it was a matter of "first come, first served". I understood, however, that Argentina was the only potential supplier of important quantities of oats to the United States outside of Canada Remorino said he had instructed Cafiero to expedite shipments as much as possible with a view to insuring that Argentina would get the lion's share of the quota. He said that the sole purpose of these exports was to obtain dollar exchange for the purchase of essential U.S. products.

[5] José Humberto Sosa Molina.
[6] Antonio Francisco Cafiero.
[7] A copy of the referenced memorandum, in Spanish, dated Dec. 29, 1953, attached to the source text, is not printed.

SECRET WASHINGTON, March 9, 1954.

PROBABLE DEVELOPMENTS IN ARGENTINA[1]

THE PROBLEM

To assess the situation in Argentina and to estimate probable developments through 1955.

---

[1] A note on the cover sheet indicates that the Intelligence Advisory Committee concurred in the present estimate on Mar. 2, 1954, and that the FBI abstained, because the subject was outside of its jurisdiction.

CONCLUSIONS

1. Peron now dominates Argentina more completely than ever before. He has the active political support of a substantial majority of the population, including especially urban and rural labor, the numerous bureaucracy, and many industrialists. He has also secure control of the armed forces, the police, the principal labor organizations, the Peronist Party machine, the national Congress, and the provincial governments. Extensive decree and police powers enable him to interfere in any aspect of national life. He has in effect a monopoly of all media of public information. There exists no effective opposition to his regime.

2. For his own purposes, Peron has sometimes adopted policies advocated by the Communists, but we do not believe that they have had a determining influence on the basic objectives of his regime. The Argentine Communist Party has little popular support. It has had virtually no success in infiltrating the armed forces and little in the bureaucracy. It is currently critical of the regime and is being harassed by it. A small group of dissident Communists advocates collaboration with Peron and is tolerated by him.

3. Peron's most pressing problem is the solution of Argentina's economic difficulties. Barring a serious crop failure or a seriously adverse change in the terms of trade, Peron can probably achieve a slight and gradual improvement in the economic situation during the next several years. It is unlikely, however, that Argentine foreign exchange earnings will be sufficient to finance the major development projects envisioned in Peron's second Five-Year Plan (1953–1957). For this purpose, Peron seeks private foreign credits and investments, but he will probably be unable to attract sufficient foreign private capital to permit substantial fulfillment of these major projects.

4. Peron has abandoned his former anti-US foreign policy and propaganda line, and has sought a rapprochement with the United States, stressing the value of Argentina as an anti-Communist force in South America. He apparently hopes thereby: (a) to induce the United States to adopt a benevolent attitude toward the extension of Argentine political and economic influence in neighboring countries; (b) to facilitate the investment of US private capital in Argentine economic development; and (c) to secure US aid in the expansion of Argentine military facilities. It is to be expected, however, that Peron will continue to maintain diplomatic relations with the Soviet Bloc and will seek to increase Argentine non-strategic trade with the Bloc.

5. Peron will probably continue his policy of rapprochement with the United States as long as his internal political position remains secure and as long as collaboration with the United States appears on balance to favor the realization of Argentine national aspirations. In these circumstances, he will probably continue to curb Communist activities in Argentina.

6. If Peron should conclude that his rapprochement with the United States was proving unproductive, or if, for any reason, the Argentine economic situation should deteriorate to such a degree as to threaten the stability of the regime, Peron would probably revert to a demagogic internal policy and an antagonistic foreign policy. Such developments would probably result in some increase in Communist influence, but Peron would not be likely to permit the Communists or any other group to become serious competitors for his power.

7. The Argentine armed forces are more than adequate for the maintenance of internal security. In the event of general war, Argentina would be capable of providing one or two divisions for use outside the country, but they would lack modern and heavy equipment and training in modern warfare. The Navy and Air Force would require considerable outside material assistance and training before they would make a significant contribution.

8. In the event of general war, Peron would exploit the situation to obtain the maximum price for Argentine goods and services. He would probably seek to avoid belligerent participation as long as possible, and in any case would probably be reluctant to provide forces for service outside the Western Hemisphere.

9. In the event of Peron's demise the Army would probably have the predominant voice in the choice of his successor. In its early stages, any successor government would probably attempt to follow the same general internal and external policies as were being followed by Peron at the time of his death.

I. Political Situation

10. Peron now dominates Argentina more completely than ever before. His position has gradually been strengthened over the years to the point where it is virtually unchallenged. He has the support of large segments of the population. He has also succeeded in concentrating in his hands such political, economic, and military power that he can almost certainly prevent the emergence of any effective opposition.

11. The Peronist Revolution, in the name of "social justice, economic independence, and political sovereignty," has wrought many far-reaching political, social, and economic changes which will probably be more permanent than either the Peronist Party or its leaders. Peron has shifted the balance of political power by redistribut-ing income for the benefit of labor and by giving direct assistance to industry. The State has assumed a dominant role in the economic and political life of the nation. Peronism has borrowed from foreign ideologies, including Fascism and Marxism, and it emphasizes ultranationalism, industrialization, the political and social importance of labor, and state-supported welfare measures.

12. Peron's most important source of popular support is labor, which owes to Peron its improved social and political status as well as such material benefits as higher wages, low-cost housing, schools, clinics and hospitals. Peron also has the active support of: (a) tenant farmers, who benefited from Peronist tenant-landlord legislation; (b) government employees, who are dependent for their jobs on loyalty to Peron; (c) many industrialists who favor Peron's protectionist policies and his industrial expansion program; and (d) the country's principal ultranationalist organization, the Nationalist Liberating Alliance.

13. Since the death of Eva Peron, the influential Roman Catholic Church has adopted a friendlier attitude toward Peron. It is now lending its support to Peron's appeals for cooperation of all parties in solving Argentina's current problems. Although certain areas of friction in Argentine Church-State relations still remain, there is no indication that Peron is contemplating any action against the Church which would cause it to abandon its traditional policy of avoiding open conflict with the regime in power.

14. Peron's dominant position in Argentina does not depend solely on the popular support his regime commands. Peron has solidified his control over the government and the country through the following instrumentalities:

a. The Armed Forces: Since the abortive attempt by certain officers to seize power in 1951, Peron has strengthened his control over the armed forces. He has purged those suspected of disloyalty and appointed personal followers to positions of command. He has also opened the officer ranks to enlisted men, who are largely pro-Peron. In addition, he has improved morale by bettering the living conditions of service personnel.

b. The Police: The Federal Police, National Gendarmérie, and Maritime Police, technically under the Ministry of the Interior, are loyal to Peron personally and are effectively controlled by him. These forces have been strengthened and are believed capable of maintaining internal security, even without Army support, but could not prevent an Army coup.

c. Organized Labor: The General Confederation of Labor (CGT) is Peronist-dominated and represents the majority of Argentine organized labor. Its leaders are influential members of the Peronist Party and many are also members of Congress. Through them, Peron exercises considerable control over the laboring masses and can, when necessary, quickly organize mass demonstrations in support of his policies. Since 1948, however, Labor's economic position has deteriorated as a result of inflation and the Administration has followed a hold-the-line policy on wage increases since March 1952. As a result of some evidences of labor unrest, Peron has recently taken steps to widen his control over labor by sponsoring the Confederation of Professional Workers. By this means, Peron hopes not only to split organized labor into two groups, neither of which would be strong enough to threaten his position, but also to attract professional and skilled workers who were dissatisfied with or would not join the largely unskilled CGT.

d. The Peronist Party: The Peronist Party is well-organized and responsive to Peron's wishes. It occupies all 34 seats in the Senate and 141 out of 155 seats in the Chamber of Deputies. Peron also has a strong hold on the provinces through this Party, which has elected all the provincial governors and has large majorities in all the provincial legislatures. The national and provincial judiciaries are dominated by Peronist appointees.

e. Government Controls: A docile Congress has granted Peron extensive decree and police powers with which he can effectively interfere in almost every phase of national life. The government supervises, and in some cases owns and operates, the press, radio, television, and other public information media. The new Five-Year Plan gives Peron extensive powers over the economy, including strict regulation of imports, exports, credits, wages and prices, as well as the power to dissolve any political party which opposes the principles of Peronism. Peron also has the power to impose martial law, curtail civil liberties, and apply severe penalties against any who criticize government officials.

15. Opposition to Peron still exists, but it is divided and lacks a popular program. It consists primarily of large landowners, professional groups, some of the more highly skilled workers who belonged to the pro-Peron unions, and some industrial and commercial elements. Many of Peron's opponents have been mollified by his recent policy of moderation and amnesty called the "national conciliation" movement. Moreover, the opposition has been unable to develop leaders or issues to challenge Peron's popular support, the principal opposition groups either merely demanding greater civil liberties (which has little appeal to labor) or seeking to outbid Peron's appeal to nationalist and isolationist opinions. The principal opposition party—the Radical Civic Union (UCR)—holds only 14 seats out of 155 in the Chamber of Deputies. It represents primarily urban elements rather than landowners, and is itself split into two main factions. One faction advocates merely passive opposition to Peron; the other advocates and occasionally perpetrates acts of violence against the regime. All opposition parties are further handicapped by restrictions placed on their campaign activities, by legal prohibitions against forming coalitions, and by being denied use of press and radio.

16. The Argentine Communists have not consistently opposed Peron. They are divided into two factions. The official Argentine Communist Party (PCA) has an estimated strength of 35,000, composed chiefly of workers, students, and intellectuals. It has little popular support. It has had virtually no success in infiltrating the armed forces and little in the bureaucracy. Its penetration of the CGT has been limited to secondary positions in some unions. A small dissident Communist group (probably now numbering no more than a few thousand) split from the official party in 1946, although there is no evidence that it has abandoned its loyalty to Moscow. This group held that it could gain more by collaborating with Peron, and from time to time some of its members have had access to him as advisers.

17. Peron, for his own purposes, has sometimes followed policies advocated by the Communists, but we do not believe that either Communist group has had a determining influence on the basic objectives of the Peron regime. Peron accepted Communist advice and support while he was pursuing an anti-US policy. He has used the dissident group as a bait to oppositionists of the left, especially in the labor movement, to throw in their lot with Peronism. Now that Peron is seeking an accommodation with the US, he has stepped up police surveillance and harassment of the PCA. There are also indications that the CGT is taking steps to expel PCA members from union leadership. However, Peron apparently has not taken any steps against the dissident Communists. Although Peron's current stand against Communism is in part designed to impress the US, we believe that he is basically unsympathetic to Communism and would move promptly against the Communists if he felt they were becoming a threat to his position.

II. Economic Situation

18. Solution of Argentina's economic problems is the most pressing task facing Peron. The possibility of economic deterioration is the most important latent threat to Peron's ability to maintain himself in power.

19. Although a severe drought was the immediate cause of an economic crisis in 1951–1952, economic conditions had been deteriorating steadily under the strain imposed by Peronist economic policies and programs. Overambitious goals for rapid industrialization and expansion of social services, and faulty allocation of foreign exchange, were largely to blame. Nationalization of foreign-owned public utilities, repatriation of the foreign debt, and inefficient purchasing and utilization of imported equipment depleted the substantial gold and foreign exchange holdings which had accumulated during World War II. Meanwhile, the government's policy on land tenure and farm prices, combined with the movement of agricultural labor to the cities and the lack of compensating farm mechanization, had caused a progressive drop in agricultural production, and consequently in exports. Insufficient imports of essential raw materials and replacement parts led to a decline in industrial output. Total gross national product (GNP) declined in the period 1949–1952 at an average annual rate of 5.6 percent, the cost of living index more than doubled, and the government's internal and foreign commercial indebtedness increased three-fold.

20. Economic conditions have improved since the low point in 1952. The 1952–1953 harvest was excellent and the incoming 1953–1954 harvest is also good. The resulting rise in exports, combined with a sharp curtailment of imports, produced a favorable balance of trade in 1953 and permitted the government to increase its gold reserves and reduce its short-term foreign indebtedness. Inflation was checked by strict management of credit and by freezing prices and wages. However, Peron still faces many economic problems. Agricultural costs are inflated and productivity is low. Industrial production is hampered by obsolescence of plant and equipment, by tight credit restrictions, and by shortages of imported raw materials. Wage and price stability is threatened by strong pressure for another round of wage increases.

21. Peron's second Five-Year Plan (1953–1957) was passed by Congress in December 1952. It is an ambitious and exhaustive blueprint of the government's economic objectives and gives Peron virtually unlimited powers to regulate nearly every phase of Argentine economic life. The Plan calls for an annual growth of GNP of 3.6 percent and allows for a total expenditure by the national government over the five years of 33.5 billion pesos (6.7 billion dollars at the official rate of exchange). The bulk of government investment under this Plan is earmarked for transportation, fuel, and power. Peron could probably finance the domestic costs of the Plan without resort to inflationary deficit financing or credit expansion by such measures as using social security funds and reducing normal government expenditures. Peron is apparently first concentrating on the agricultural portion of the Plan. He is allocating a substantial portion of Argentina's foreign exchange earnings to the importing of tractors, fertilizers, etc. However, Argentina's foreign exchange earnings within the next two years are not likely to suffice for the large-scale importation of developmental equipment envisioned in the Plan.

III. Capabilities of the Armed Forces

22. Argentine manpower available for military service is of excellent quality. The Argentine armed forces have an estimated strength of 145,500 divided as follows:

a. Army: The Army has approximately 102,000 men, of whom about 75,000 are one-year conscripts. There are 6 infantry, 1 motorized infantry, 1 armored, and 3 cavalry divisions, and 2 infantry divisional-equivalent groupments (1 mountain, 1 motorized), supplemented by smaller combat units. The Army's morale and training are excellent by Latin American standards, but it is short of modern and heavy equipment and lacks training and experience in large-scale operations.

b. Navy: The Navy with personnel totalling approximately 28,500, maintains the largest fleet in Latin America. It consists of 2 old battleships, an old monitor, 2 heavy and 3 light cruisers, 6 destroyers and 9 old destroyers, and various minor combatant ships and amphibious and auxiliary vessels. The Naval Air Arm has approximately 190 aircraft, mainly in transport and reconnaissance categories, about 50 of which are assigned to tactical units, and 2,700 men, including some 150 pilots. Although basic seamanship, training, and morale are good by Latin American standards, the Navy's combat effectiveness is low because of aging ships, obsolete aircraft, prewar doctrine, and an almost complete lack of modern AA and ASW weapons and fire-control and electronic gear.

c. Air Force: The Air Force has 15,000 men, including 430 trained pilots. Approximately 375 of its 712 aircraft are in tactical units—the remainder being trainers or in storage. There are about 80 Gloster meteor jets and a few operational Lancaster and Lincoln bombers. The combat effectiveness of the Air Force is limited by the total lack of electronic early warning and intercept equipment and by critical shortages of fuel, spare parts, and armament.

23. The armed forces are supplemented by the Federal Police (47,000 men), the National Gendarmérie (15,000), and the Maritime Police (3,500). Their morale and training are excellent and they are believed capable of maintaining internal security.

24. The Argentine armed forces are more than adequate for internal security. Peron desires to strengthen and modernize the armed forces in order to: (a) enhance Argentina's prestige in Latin America, particularly vis-à-vis Brazil, and (b) increase his bargaining power in negotiations for US assistance by pointing to Argentina's capabilities for suppressing Communism and for contributing to Hemisphere defense. In the event of general war, Argentina would be capable of providing one or two divisions for use outside the country, but they would lack modern and heavy equipment and training in modern warfare. The Navy and Air Force would require considerable outside material assistance and training before they could make any significant contribution to coastal and antisubmarine patrol and convoy operations.

IV. International Policies

25. Under Peron, Argentina has been faced with the problem of adjusting to a new world-power pattern. At present, Argentina has no secure tie with any great power. The British connection no longer serves as a major support for Argentine economic progress and stability. Argentina has been unable to establish a friendly collaboration with the United States such as Brazil enjoys. Basic political, ideological, and economic considerations make it virtually impossible for Peron to align Argentina definitely with the USSR. Peron's "Third Position," which proclaimed Argentina's independence with respect to the opposing world camps, was developed as a rationalization of changes in the past decade superimposed upon Argentina's traditional isolationist tendencies.

26. Argentina's international aspirations include a dominant position in southern South America, a position of leadership in Latin America, and a place in the world corresponding to somewhat inflated views of national capabilities. To reach these goals, Peron requires internal economic expansion, a free hand to assert Argentine influence over neighboring countries, and foreign support for Argentine pretensions in world affairs. For such purposes, the cooperation of a major power is essential, but such cooperation has not been obtained. Consequently the foreign policy of the Peron regime has been unstable, responsive to the momentary requirements of domestic politics, and, in general, characterized by a high degree of opportunism.

27. Argentine policy toward the US, traditionally one of aloofness, has been conditioned by long-standing British ties, limitations on Argentine exports to the US, and US policy barriers to Argentine expansionism and leadership in the Hemisphere. Under Peron, Argentine foreign policy became increasingly aggressive, and its antagonism toward the US more pronounced. By 1951–1952, Peronist propaganda was lending volume and coverage to ultranationalist, Communist-line attacks on the US. This aggressively anti-US line reflected Argentine feelings of insecurity, was colored by the Peronist revolution's heavy emphasis on "anti-capitalist" and "anti-imperialist" political slogans, and was intensified by general economic deterioration.

28. By late 1952, however, Peron apparently calculated that this anti-US policy was unprofitable. It was having little effect in undermining US influence in Latin America, and Argentina was making little progress in strengthening its economy and achieving a dominant position in southern South America. Most important, Peron apparently concluded that substantial foreign economic support was essential to the achievement of his internal economic goals, which in turn was a prerequisite to his remaining in power and achieving his foreign policy objectives in Latin America. The timing of Peron's decision to seek an accommodation with the US was also in part determined by: (a) his strengthened internal political controls which made him less dependent on the support of anti-US elements, and (b) the change in administration in the US and the subsequent visit of Dr. Milton Eisenhower.

29. At present, Argentine anti-US propaganda has virtually ceased. The "Third Position" line has virtually disappeared, restrictions have been lifted on US press services and publications, and more favorable conditions are being created for US-owned business interests. There are also indications that Peron will give greater support to US objectives and proposals in the OAS and the UN.

30. Although thus seeking an accommodation with the US, Peron apparently feels he cannot alienate his nationalist supporters to the extent of seeking direct US loans or aid, or proposing a military assistance pact. Instead, Peron is apparently seeking to persuade the US: (a) to adopt a benevolent attitude toward Argentine political and economic objectives in Latin America; (b) to encourage US private business to invest in Argentina and to liberalize credit terms; and (c) to aid in the expansion of Argentine military facilities by making technical advice and materials available on liberal terms. Peron has stressed that such support would benefit the US by enabling Peron to adopt a stronger stand against Communism in Argentina, and by increasing Argentine capabilities for combatting the growth of Communism throughout Latin America and for defending southern South America in the event of external Communist aggression.

31. Argentina's efforts to extend its influence in Latin America have had little success except in the cultural field. The Argentine-sponsored labor movement (ATLAS), assisted by Argentina's extensive network of labor attachés, has not attracted the support of the major Latin American labor organizations. Although Argentina has signed "economic union" pacts with Paraguay, Chile and Ecuador,[2] any significant extension of Argentina's economic influence has been blocked by its inability to fulfill its trade commitments.

32. Argentine-Brazilian rivalry remains strong and may pose special problems for the US now that Argentina is seeking friendlier relations with the US. Each country will be quick to claim that the US is favoring the other. There are already indications of increasing anti-US sentiment in Brazil, which may be strengthened if the impression grows that the US is favoring Argentina at the expense of Brazil. Thus, closer US-Argentine relations, in addition to causing friction between the US and Brazil, may complicate US relations with other Latin American countries—such as Uruguay—which are suspicious of Argentine expansionist ambitions.

33. Argentina maintains diplomatic relations with the USSR and all the European Satellites except Albania. All these countries have res-

Both Ecuador and Paraguay adhered to the Act at a later date.

On July 8, 1953, Argentina and Chile signed a treaty at Buenos Aires providing for an economic union between the two countries in pursuance of the provisions of the Act of Santiago; the text was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 28, from Buenos Aires, dated July 10, 1953, not printed (425.3531/7–1053).

ident missions in Buenos Aires which provide channels for the dissemination of Communist propaganda both within Argentina and to neighboring countries. Argentina in turn has resident missions in the USSR, Czechoslovakia (accredited also to Hungary), Poland, and Rumania (accredited also to Bulgaria).

34. Argentina's trade with the Soviet Bloc is now about 2.5 percent of its total foreign trade. This percentage will increase substantially if commitments under the recent Argentine-Soviet trade agreement are carried out. The agreement calls for an exchange of goods totalling $150 million, with Argentina exporting non-strategic raw materials in exchange for Soviet capital goods and fuels. To facilitate this trade, the USSR advanced to Argentina a $30 million dollar credit for the import of Soviet capital goods. There is no time limit on delivery. Soviet exports would be small in relation to Argentina's total import requirements, but would satisfy Argentina's needs in certain important categories, particularly petroleum drilling and refining equipment.

V. Probable Developments

35. The Peronist Party will almost certainly win a decisive victory in the Congressional and Vice-Presidential elections scheduled for 25 April 1954, thus substantially strengthening Peron's position. As long as there is no serious economic deterioration, political opposition to Peron will be ineffective and Peron will maintain his hold over the country.

36. The principal potential threat to Peron is the unrest, particularly in the laboring class, that would result from a major crop failure or severe economic depression. We believe that through his control over the CGT leadership Peron would probably be able to prevent labor unrest from becoming unmanageable. In the event that the CGT leadership were unable to control its mass membership, we believe that Peron would retain the support of the armed forces and the police, and that these forces would be able to control any disturbances or revolt that might occur. We believe that there is little chance that Peron will be ousted by an armed forces coup.

37. Barring a serious crop failure or a severe drop in the world demand or price for Argentine exports, we believe that there will be a slight and gradual improvement in the Argentine economy through 1955. There will probably be sufficient foreign exchange earnings from agricultural exports to maintain essential imports at present levels and at the same time to permit: (a) increases in agricultural productivity through the import of tractors, fertilizers, seed, etc., and (b) some rehabilitation and modernization of industrial plant and equipment. Foreign exchange earnings, however, will remain inadequate to permit a relaxation of present stringent import controls or to undertake many of the major development projects called for by the Five-Year Plan.

38. In these circumstances, Peron will probably seek to implement the developmental aspects of the Plan through private foreign credits and private foreign investment. Although Western Europe and Japan are increasing their trade with an investment in Argentina, and West Germany has recently become one of Argentina's most important sources of short-term commercial credits, Peron apparently believes that the US is his principal potential source of foreign private capital. Peron has already liberalized the law applying to new foreign investment. He will also probably offer more attractive terms to investors in fields of special interest to the government, particularly petroleum. He may also permit present private investors to remit accumulated backlogs of profits, royalties, and dividends, to the extent that exchange availabilities permit. Despite such measures, it is unlikely that Peron will be able to attract sufficient foreign capital, particularly in the field of transport, power, and other basic services, to permit substantial fulfillment of the major development projects included in the Five-Year Plan.

39. Although Peron will probably concentrate on agricultural and industrial rehabilitation, there will remain the danger that for political or prestige reasons Peron will feel compelled before the end of 1955 to adopt measures which would have serious inflationary results. For example, he may feel it necessary, under pressure of popular demands, to relax controls on imports, wages, or credits. If he does not succeed in attracting sufficient foreign capital, he may also feel compelled to distract attention from continued austerity conditions by pushing ahead rapidly with spectacular projects at the expense of strengthening agriculture and industry.

40. The influence of the Communist Party will probably not increase. Peron will probably continue repressive measures against the official Communist Party, and will attempt to curb its efforts to promote anti-US opinion. A few "dissident" communists, however, may succeed in infiltrating the Peron Administration. If Peron should abandon his policy of accommodation with the US, a more favorable climate for the extension of Communist influence would exist, but the Communists would still not pose a serious threat to the Peron regime.

41. Peron will continue his policy of accommodation with the US as long as his internal political control remains strong, and as long as collaboration with the US appears on balance to favor Argentine national aspirations. Peron will be sensitive to any US intrusion in foreign markets vital to Argentina's exports, and resentful of US actions that appear to him to block the extension of Argentine influence in Latin America. During the period of accommodation with the US, Peron will probably continue to facilitate the solution of problems facing US enterprises, including news services and publications. Argentina will probably be more cooperative with the US in international organizations.

42. Argentina will almost certainly continue to maintain diplomatic relations with the Soviet Bloc and attempt to increase Argentine trade with the Bloc, especially with the USSR. To the extent that Argentine economic development objectives are not attained through collaboration with the US and other Free World nations, Peron will probably seek a further expansion of trade with the Bloc, especially if the USSR fulfills within a reasonable time at least the major part of its commitments under the recent trade pact.

43. Peron will continue to seek to expand Argentine influence in Latin America. Argentina's prestige throughout the Hemisphere will probably improve during the next two years, provided Peron continues his policy of accommodation with the US and refrains from undue interference in the internal affairs of other Latin American nations. Although Argentine trade with other Latin American nations will probably increase somewhat, Argentina is not likely to develop sufficient economic strength to increase significantly its economic influence in Latin America generally.

44. In the event of general war, Peron is not likely immediately to enter the war in active support of the US. His primary objective would be to exploit the war to Argentina's advantage. He would almost certainly demand high prices for exports of food and raw materials to the Allied powers. Although initially he would probably wish to remain neutral, he might subsequently enter the war and offer: (a) to cooperate in measures to suppress the Communists in South America, and (b) to collaborate with the US in Argentine coastal defense and patrol activities. He would probably be reluctant to provide forces for service outside the Western Hemisphere.

45. Peron's disregard of personal security precautions increases the chances of his death by accident or assassination. He has kept in his own hands so many of the instruments of control that the problem of succession would be extremely difficult. A struggle for power would almost certainly ensue. In such a struggle, the Army would almost certainly play a determinng role. The most likely immediate development would be an Army-backed caretaker government. In its early stages, any successor government would probably attempt to follow the same general internal and external policies as were being followed by Peron at the time of his death.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Attaché-designate in Argentina (Sandifer)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 24, 1954.

Participants: The Secretary
Durward V. Sandifer

I called to say goodby to the Secretary today in view of my prospective departure for Buenos Aires next week.

The Secretary referred to his recent experiences in Caracas[2] and said that the Argentine delegation had not been too helpful. He said that he had been told by veterans of inter-American conferences that the Argentine performance was far better than it would have been six or eight months ago. He said he had a number of conversations[3] with the Argentine Foreign Minister. The Foreign Minister had referred to the steps taken by President Peron to improve relations with the United States and to establish a basis of mutual confidence and trust between the two governments. He said that the Government of the United States had not responded in kind to these overtures. I queried the Secretary on this point to make sure that I had understood it correctly. The Secretary said that the Foreign Minister had complained about three or four specific points:

1. The Argentine desired to purchase the Czech steel mill. The Secretary said that he had signed a letter[4] yesterday to the Foreign Minister telling him that the transfer of the steel mill to Argentina would be approved if we were successful in the bidding to be opened shortly by the Treasury Department.[5]

[3] A memorandum of conversation between Secretary Dulles and Foreign Minister Remorino which took place on Mar. 2, 1954, drafted by Mr. Cabot on the following day, is in OAS files, lot 60 D 665, "Bilateral Talks." No others were found in Department of State files.

[4] Not printed.

[5] On Mar. 25, 1954, the U.S. Treasury Department announced that the blocked Czech steel mill was open to public sale by sealed bid. In telegram 676, to Buenos Aires, dated May 10, 1954, the Department of State informed the Embassy that the Treasury Department had notified the Argentine Embassy that the Argentine Government was the highest bidder (at $9 million) on the steel mill (835.331/5–1054). The transaction was completed on May 17, 1954, and the component parts of the mill were subsequently shipped to Argentina between June and September 1954. For additional information on the sale of the mill, see Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the State of the Finances for the Fiscal Year Ended June 30, 1954 (Washington, 1955), pp. 61, 134.

2. The import restriction on Argentine oats.
3. Sale of wheat to Brazil.
4. Sale of wheat to Pakistan.

The Secretary commented specifically on each of these points to Remorino, and referred to some of the steps taken by this Government in response to Peron's friendly gestures.

The Secretary said that the Argentine Government seemed inclined to "play footsie" with the Guatemalans. While he realized that not too much importance should be attached to such incidents, he referred to Remorino's making a symbolic handshaking gesture to the Guatemalan representative as Remorino passed in front of the entire assembly on his way to the platform to make a speech on the resolution on communism,[6] and to Remorino's ostentatiously congratulating the Guatemalan representative after his speech on the same resolution.

In connection with his comments on the resolution on communists and the Guatemalan situation,[7] the Secretary spoke particularly of the need for cultivating solidarity in this hemisphere as a security measure, in light of the difficulties that we are experiencing with our security program in other areas. He was concerned about the Guatemalan situation especially as the potential source of infiltration and of disunity. This, however, was far less important than any tendency on the part of the Argentinians to play cozy with the Guatemalans at the present juncture. It is of the greatest importance, he said, to develop a sound basis of solidarity with the Argentine Government to prevent its becoming a possible communist threat to inter-American security and solidarity. We should do all that we possibly can to respond to Peron's present favorable orientation. This, of course, must be done in the context of our over-all inter-American policy and, it is important not to do it in such a way as to offend or alienate our good friends of long-standing. He mentioned Brazil in particular in this connection. The Secretary ended by reiterating the importance of inter-American solidarity as a primary basis of American security.

The Secretary congratulated me on my assignment to Buenos Aires, saying that he thought it was an excellent place for me to begin my new career in the Foreign Service.

Memorandum by James F. O'Connor, Jr. of the Office of South American Affairs to the Deputy Director of That Office (Bennett)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 30, 1954.

Subject: Assistance to Argentina.

We have assisted Argentina since the Milton Eisenhower trip in the following significant instances:

Tangible Items:

1. Eximbank approval $2.52 million dollar loan guaranty to Baldwin-Lima-Hamilton Corporation in connection with sale of 50 locomotives to Argentina.[1]

2. Treasury sale of Czech steel mill to Argentina.

3. Eximbank approval in principle of $12.3 million dollar loan guaranty to the McKee Company for sale of a blast furnace to Argentina.[2]

Intangible Items:

4. Making available, at Argentine request, 47 T–6D reconditioned training planes (Argentina eventually refused this offer, ostensibly for technical, but really for budgetary reasons.)

5. Making available, at Argentine request, 318 Ford tank motors (at last word Argentina had not yet accepted this offer, and was likely to refuse again for budgetary reasons.)

Memorandum by Henry Dearborn of the Office of South American Affairs to the Deputy Director of That Office (Bennett)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 6, 1954.

Subject: Problems of International Packers in Argentina and Uruguay[1]

I refer to the Memorandum of Conversation of August 5[2] between Mr. Holland and Mr. Taylor[3] regarding the problems of the International Packers in Argentina and Uruguay.[4] In my opinion it would strike a sour note with Perón and with the Uruguayan Government if we were to follow Mr. Taylor's suggestion—namely, to have Ambassador Nufer and Ambassador McIntosh approach Perón and the Uruguayan Government respectively on the Frigorifico problem with the hope that it might be solved before Mr. Holland arrives in Argentina and Uruguay.[5] In all probability such an approach would be resented and might well do more harm than good. You would not go to visit a neighbor on your own initiative and send him word beforehand that he could create a friendly atmosphere for your arrival if he would cut the grass between your two houses. If the neighbor did this on his own, it would make the visit more pleasant, but if you suggested it beforehand you would doubtless get a cool reception. If we wish either Ambassador McIntosh or Ambassador Nufer again to bring this problem to the attention of the respective governments I believe we should so instruct them without any reference to Mr. Holland's visits.

[1] The problems of International Packers, Ltd., and other American-owned meatpacking firms in Argentina (often referred to as the "Frigoríficos") related to losses incurred by the firms as a result of Argentine regulations restricting profit margins, and establishing ceiling prices and delivery quotas for local consumption. Pertinent documentation is in files 835.311 and 811.05135 for 1952 through 1954. See also footnote 22, Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. II, p. 1127.

It is apparent from the reports from Buenos Aires and Montevideo that Ambassadors Nufer and McIntosh have done and are doing just about all that is appropriate and promising of results by way of helping the packers. They show every disposition to continue the strong efforts that they have already made. We should continue to make specific suggestions to the Ambassadors as we have in the past but at the same time should have a full appreciation of the problems on the ground and should not push the Ambassadors into action which would create antagonism in government circles towards the packers.

The question will have to be considered sometime as to whether Mr. Holland should bring up this matter while he is in Buenos Aires and Montevideo. Apropos of this question we might remember that the Argentines expressed bitter disappointment in Eddie Miller's second visit to Buenos Aires for the very reason that individual U.S. business problems and complaints were important items on his agenda. The Argentines felt that such a visit should have been devoted to consideration of broader matters. It would seem to me that if Mr. Holland were to discuss with Perón hemispheric problems such as Communism, the place of Argentina in hemispheric defense, and over-all economic

[5] Between Sept. 5 and Oct. 10, 1954, Mr. Holland visited Mexico and all of the countries of South America for the purpose of explaining to and gaining acceptance from the leaders of those countries for the policies adopted by the United States in connection with the forthcoming Rio Economic Conference; extensive documentation concerning his trip is in file 110.15 HO for 1954.

The Rio Economic Conference is formally known as the Meeting of Ministers of Finance or Economy of the American Republics as the Fourth Extraordinary Meeting of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council, held at Quitandinha, Brazil, Nov. 22–Dec. 2, 1954; for documentation relating to the conference, see pp. 313 ff.

questions, he would be able to bring up without giving offense this question of the packers as an illustration of what should be remedied if U.S. investments were to be encouraged. In this context I believe mention of the matter might do some good. This is the context in which our Embassies in Buenos Aires and Montevideo have discussed this problem with high officials and Mr. Holland's reiteration would underline the U.S. Government's views at a high level.

Recommendation:

It is recommended that we continue to correspond freely with Ambassadors McIntosh and Nufer on the subject of packers in order to show them our concern. We should continue to urge high-level action whenever we think it necessary but not in reference to Mr. Holland's visits. When Mr. Holland does make the visits he might bring up the matter with those Governments also but not in a way that would make it seem that we give the matter equal importance along with questions of increased trade, hemisphere defense, democratic processes and action against Communism.[6]

[6] Below the text of this memorandum appears the following handwritten note initialed by Mr. Bennett: "One of the reasons for Dr. Eisenhower's great success in B[uenos] A[ires] was that he kept his visit on an entirely informal basis. Peron has indicated his awareness of the distinction between that & the Miller approach."

Paper Prepared in the Office of South American Affairs[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 17, 1954.

BALANCE SHEET: U.S.-ARGENTINE RELATIONS

WHAT UNITED STATES WANTS FROM ARGENTINA

1. Cooperation against Communism. (This includes such bilateral cooperation as we may ask for, control of Communism within Argentina and support of our position in multilateral organizations.)

2. Cooperation on hemisphere defense policies and measures.

3. Cooperation on US policies regarding East–West trade. (Battle Act,[2] etc.)

4. An agreement by which US would obtain uranium from Argentina. (Negotiations[3] now in progress.)

5. Good relations between US and Argentine labor organizations. This is a delicate problem and has not been a subject of formal discussion between our governments. (Obstacles continue to be: a) Argentine labor policies and b) US labor reaction thereto.)

[1] Drafted by Mr. Dearborn.

[2] Reference is to the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951 (Public Law 213), called the Battle Act after Representative Laurie C. Battle of Alabama, approved Oct. 26, 1951; for text, see 65 Stat. 644.

[3] Documents pertaining to this subject are in file 835.2546.

6. Resumption as soon as possible of profit remittances. (US interests have over $80 million worth of pesos in Argentina which they are unable to remit owing to Argentina's lack of dollar exchange.)

7. Argentine action to resolve outstanding problems of American meat packers in Argentina.

8. Argentine action to resolve the American & Foreign Power Company problem.

9. Argentine action to remove discriminations against US shipping (especially requirements that certain cargo be carried in Argentine bottoms).

10. Argentine compliance with certain provisions of US-Argentine Trade Agreement[4] with which she is not now complying.

WHAT ARGENTINA WANTS FROM UNITED STATES

1. Noninterference by US agricultural surplus disposal programs in Argentina's normal marketing. (Argentina has recently requested that US halt nonconsultative linseed oil sales and that we take joint action with Argentina to work out means of avoiding displacement of normal Argentine markets.)

2. No US import restrictions on linseed oil, tung oil,[5] oats, meat from Tierra del Fuego, etc.

3. No increase on wool tariff.

4. Export-Import Bank financing for 120 million dollar Argentine integrated steel plant. If further Export-Import Bank financing available after this project, Argentina favors such financing for certain other projects: power plant for Buenos Aires ($26 million), compressor plants for pipeline ($3.4 million), chemical plant ($5.5 million).

5. US assistance in developing Argentina's uranium possibilities. (Negotiations now in progress with AEC.)

6. Development of certain Argentine shipyards and drydocks. (Argentina has never defined what assistance it wants in this respect.)

7. US foreign investment in certain projects, especially petroleum extraction. (As yet Argentine laws regarding foreign investment have not been sufficiently favorable to attract US capital to increase its investments, though the Argentines appear to be sincerely trying to improve their legislation.)

8. US cooperation against Communism. (Perón has suggested to us a consultative hemisphere meeting on Communism, and has made certain other specific suggestions.)

[5] On Nov. 22, 1954, President Eisenhower announced that in view of the decision made by Argentina and Paraguay voluntarily to restrict their export of tung oil to the United States, he would take no action on the recommendation made by the U.S. Tariff Commission to establish a quota on tung oil imports. For text of the White House press release on this subject, dated Nov. 22, see Department of State Bulletin, Dec. 13, 1954, p. 912.

9. Argentina has shown signs of desiring harmonious labor relations with the US but this has not come about because of specific disagreements between US and Argentine labor.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)[1]

SECRET [BUENOS AIRES,] September 19, 1954.

Participants: President Perón
Henry F. Holland, Assistant Secretary of State

At 9:00 a.m. on September 19, Ambassador Margueirat accompanied me to visit President Perón at his summer residence in Olivos. The President received us with the Minister of Education[2] and an aide, Sr. Renner. The five of us talked very generally for about twenty minutes. Thereupon, the others withdrew and the President and I continued talking for about two hours. The conversation generally fell into three fields.

Perón's Domestic Policy

He gave me what I assumed to be an abbreviated discussion of Justicialismo. He said that the traditional Latin is an intense individualist who works exclusively to improve his own personal status and with no regard for the welfare of his community. Perón is trying to preserve this personal incentive, but, at the same time, make the individual conscious of his obligation to improve the welfare of his community and country.

He pointed out that this intense individualism traditionally makes the Latin a great individual performer but a very poor member of a team. He is trying in his educational system to emphasize team athletics as a means of achieving the purpose indicated above.

He discussed at length his efforts to create employment, saying that when he took over the Government in 1946 there were four million Argentines gainfully employed, whereas there are now eight million. He described the extent to which the standard of living has generally been improved throughout the country and his plans with respect to further improvements, particularly the need to persuade people to vary their preponderantly meat diet.

He described his theories of social security and the Government's program for extending uniform retirement benefits.

He described in some detail his Five Year Plans, saying that some 800 objectives have been identified; that general stages of development

Mr. Holland visited Argentina, Sept. 18–22, 1954. An account of his visit was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 283, from Buenos Aires, dated Sept. 29, 1954, not printed (110.15 HO/9–2954).

have been agreed upon for the next 25 years, these being broken down into five-year periods of which detailed programs have been prepared for the next period. He said that a weakness in our efforts to combat Communism lies in the fact that Communism promises people specific definable benefits, whereas the free enterprise system does not. These programs serve as a weapon against Communism because through them the Government offers the people specific benefits superior to those offered by Communism.

Perón says that he intends to place greater emphasis on private enterprise, doing everything that he can to encourage it to take over production and business in the country. He cited various examples of factories which he says he has encouraged businessmen to establish instead of having the Government undertake them. He also cited two examples of local factories which he said that the Government established and then sold to private investors. He agreed with me that the Government should do everything possible to encourage private enterprise to invest in the country's economic development and without discrimination between domestic and foreign investors.

Communism

He stated that he has records on approximately 50,000 communists and fellow travelers throughout Argentina and said that each one has assigned to him a particular individual who reports on his movements and who is assigned the duty of liquidating him in the event of war or other crisis. Thus, he said, in case of war Argentina will solve its Communist problem within a week.

He discussed at some length his cooperation with the Embassy on Communist matters[3] and the extent to which he has penetrated his local Communist organization. He states that he has agents in the highest policy levels of the local party.

He says that the local party is directed by the communist party in France which sends instructions to Prestes in Brazil who is in charge of the Communist party throughout South America. He says that he has succeeded in penetrating the Communist party in France and is frequently aware of instructions sent to the Argentine before they are received by local leaders.

He argued strongly that there must be closer cooperation between the American States in their police actions against Communists, saying that our individual efforts are nullified if a Communist sought by one Government can escape to an adjacent country and can continue his operations unmolested there. He maintains some 800 Communists in prison in Southern Argentina. When the Russian Ambassador complains, he offers to release any prisoner whose return to Russian that Government will approve.

[3] Documentation relating to this subject is in file 735.001 for 1954.

He says that asylees returning from Guatemala will be closely supervised and that the four most dangerous agents are immediately being sent forward to Poland.

I had expected him to raise the question of a Hemisphere conference on Communism. Instead, he said that publicized programs to combat Communism were of little benefit; that our coordinated efforts should be worked out through secret conferences with carefully selected officials in each Government and reduced to secret agreements. He offered his fullest cooperation in pursuing such a plan and emphasized that any carelessness in the selection of officials with whom to deal in the other Governments would amount to a disclosure of our plans to the Communists.

As regards Argentina, in summary, he says that he is seeking to combat Communism by a course of police measures on the one hand and on the other by outdoing the Communists in popular appeal.

He described the Communist situation in Brazil, Uruguay, Chile, and Bolivia. In Brazil, he says, the Communists have penetrated the army extensively and are multiplying rapidly under the leadership of Prestes who now moves openly about the country. He says that the educational system in Uruguay is substantially penetrated and that the Uruguayan policy of complete freedom of press makes the Government powerless to combat the local Communists.

In Chile he says the situation is deteriorating rapidly and that he can foresee just what the outcome will be.

He says that he has great confidence in the President of Bolivia[4] as a strong anti-Communist, but that the great poverty of the Indians makes them particularly susceptible to Communist propaganda. The first problem there, he feels, is to raise the standard of living of the workers. He feels that the Bolivian Indian will naturally resist Communism if his minimum physical needs are satisfied.

The Rio Conference

I explained to him in considerable detail our views regarding the conference. Its basic goal must be definition of means to elevate the standard of living of the American peoples. That burden must be borne primarily by each people. Each country must seek means to assist others. We conceive that our own help will fall primarily in the field of trade, government finance, and technical aid. I described in considerable detail our Export-Import Bank policy and the opposition and criticism that we expect from those sectors which aspire to a massive grant-aid program.

He said that he was fully satisfied with our policies and promised the support of his delegation. He said that extensive loans to Latin American Governments would prejudice our prestige and relations in the Hemisphere. Of any amount loaned, 50 percent would be stolen by [4] Víctor Paz Estenssoro.

Government officials and the remainder inefficiently invested, with the result that any benefits would have been achieved at an exorbitant price. When the people are called upon to repay such debts they are exceedingly resentful because they feel that the real benefits of the loans have gone to Government officials.

Perón urges instead a policy of loans to private enterprises, both domestic and foreign, and with the added assurance of a guarantee by the local Government. He says that Latin American Governments themselves, his own included, are notoriously poor builders and administrators. Loans to private enterprises will insure the most efficient possible utilization of money.

Miscellaneous Subjects

He talked at length about the fact that the United States spends more on propaganda than any other country in the world and achieves less. He pointed out the success of Soviet propaganda at convincing Latin America that the United States supports colonialism whereas Russia is the real champion of oppressed groups. He said that the United States in fact was the only country in the world that supported social justice without reservation, that the United States had no colonies and no aspirations for colonies, whereas Russia maintains fourteen nations in a state of slavery.

He said that in our propaganda and in our actions we should be careful to avoid anything which would offend the intense nationalism which prevails generally in Latin America and particularly in Argentina. He says that this can be achieved by greater tact in the manner in which we express our views rather than by any change in the substance of our positions.

In this connection he referred to the Antarctic, saying that the Argentine people are particularly sensitive on the subject and that any untactful statements by our government officials would create considerable resentment. On the other hand, he said that any genuine differences between us could be worked out in private conferences. He urged that the Antarctic could have no real military value to us because he was prepared to assure us whatever bases we might need in the southern part of Argentina. He argued that if we had advance assurance of harbors and military bases in southern Argentina the Antarctic wastelands would have no military significance to us.

He said that war seemed very probable and that he would be prepared to cooperate with us closely in the event of war.

He said that he had taken the position with his own generals that in the event of another war Argentina must immediately and strongly identify itself with the United States and that if Russia should prevail he and they would be the first to be executed by the Russians.

He praised Ambassador Nufer highly, saying that he was able to talk with the Ambassador without any restraint and with great confidence in his judgment.

I stressed our satisfaction with the current state of our relations and assured him of the President's interests and that of the Secretary of State in doing everything within our power to remove any problems that would place a strain on these relations. He said that he fully realized that we could not agree on every matter arising between us because each of us must defend, first, the interests of his own country, but that disagreement after a frank and friendly discussion would not prejudice our relations.

He was exceedingly cordial throughout the interview. When we finished he accompanied me on a tour through the grounds and buildings at Olivos. We visited the gymnasium, the hospital, the dining hall, the administrative buildings, and the athletic fields. Throughout the tour he stopped and talked with hundreds of school girls engaged in different activities around the place. He gets intense satisfaction out of their applause and was happy for me to see him against this background.

Memorandum by the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs (Nolting) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 1, 1954.

Subject: Proposed telegram to Ambassador Nufer re Military Assistance for Argentina.

The attached telegram[2] to authorize the Ambassador to sound out Peron on the question of military assistance has been received in this office for concurrence. I do not feel that I can concur in this telegram for the following reasons.

In my opinion, it would be unwise and undesirable at this time for Ambassador Nufer to make any approach to Peron however informally.[3] Any suggestion or offer of military aid, however tentative or qualified, would undoubtedly be looked upon by the Argentines as a commitment.

[1] Drafted by George S. Newman of the Office of the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs.

[2] Attached to the source text, but not printed; it is marked "Not sent."

[3] In despatch 255, from Buenos Aires, dated Sept. 22, 1954, Ambassador Nufer requested authorization to sound out President Perón informally on possible Argentine interest in a bilateral military pact, and stated that this would be the only way to obtain a clear indication of President Perón's position on the matter. The Ambassador further stated that a military agreement was prospectively useful for furnishing Argentina with concrete evidence of U.S. goodwill. (735.5 MSP/9–2254)

As you know, at the present time we have not programmed any aid for Argentina and if we were to furnish them aid it would have to be by the diversion of funds and matériel from other programs. We are not certain that the JCS have a military mission in mind of sufficient priority to justify any such diversion of funds and matériel. Moreover, it does not seem probable that the Chiefs will establish a force basis, to be MDAP supported, that will result in an MDAP program of sufficient magnitude to be attractive to Peron. I am advised that the program originally planned for Argentina involved several AAA battalions and some support forces. This, by comparison to the Brazilian program, is not very large. If it is national policy to furnish military aid to Argentina, we should immediately take steps to have Defense include the requirements in the FY 1956 military aid program.[4] The recommendations set forth in your briefing book[5] on this subject (p. 33; also part of the attached[6] file) appear to me to be quite sound.

I believe that before any approaches are made to Peron, we should reach agreement within the Executive Branch that, as a matter of policy, military assistance should be furnished to Argentina; assure that the Joint Chiefs have a sound military mission in mind; determine that the nature and magnitude of the assistance to be furnished would probably be acceptable to Peron; and provide that the necessary resources for this program are included in the Mutual Security Program.

The Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Kalijarvi) to the Administrator of the General Services Administration (Mansure)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 22, 1954.

DEAR MR. MANSURE: Reference is made to the question now under consideration in your office of whether the General Services Administration should extend its contract for the purchase of tungsten ore from the Argentine firm Minerales y Metales (MINMET). This matter has been discussed on a number of occasions between officers of this Department and of your agency.

---

[1] Drafted by Mr. Dearborn; cleared with the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs and the Office of International Materials Policy.

The Department of State understands that the contract in question provides a schedule of deliveries beginning in 1952 and running through June 30, 1958. This schedule was revised July 17, 1952. The contractor has made only small deliveries against this schedule and those were made early in the contract period. The contractor claims he has been prevented from developing his properties and delivering material because he was unable to place orders for machinery and get delivery in 1951, due to the economic controls exercised in the United States at that time. The Export-Import Bank loan that accompanied the purchase contract required that it be spent for United States materials. His machinery has only recently arrived in Argentina.

The contract contains a provision that permits the contractor to claim force majeure for a maximum of 270 days. If deliveries are not made on schedule after that time has elapsed, the United States Government may, at its option, further extend the suspension period or cancel the contract. MINMET has requested that the GSA extend the force majeure period and permit the company to deliver the full amount under the contract. It is understood that the GSA has taken no action under its option either to extend the suspension period or to cancel the contract, and that the company is not willing to proceed further with its development until it is assured its deliveries will be accepted.

At a meeting in Mr. Eberly's office on July 7, 1954,[2] it was decided to postpone a decision until we should have an opportunity to obtain the opinion of the American Embassy in Buenos Aires as to the possible effect of cancellation on over-all relations between Argentina and the United States. The Embassy submitted its opinion in its despatch no. 83 of August 2, 1954,[3] copies of which were sent to the General Services Administration.

As you will have noted from the mentioned despatch, the Embassy has informed the Department that it is convinced that a cancellation of the GSA–MINMET contract might well "jeopardize the present United States-Argentina rapprochement", and at the very least the adverse consequences would far outweigh any possible temporary financial advantage to the United States that might come from the action. On September 20, Mr. Henry F. Holland, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs was visiting Argentina and he discussed the effects of cancellation with the Ambassador. As a result of the discussion, the Ambassador cabled[4] the Department that it was the considered opinion of the Embassy and Mr. Holland that cancellation would unduly jeopardize United States relations with Argentina.

In view of the opinion of the Embassy and the Assistant Secretary of State this Department on political grounds strongly opposes a cancellation of the MINMET contract. Argentina is a key country in Western Hemisphere defense. During the past fifteen months our relations with that country have improved markedly over their previous status. This improvement has been achieved as a result of several years of careful implementation of a considered United States policy which has been directed towards inducing Argentina to better our bilateral relations and to collaborate with the United States on important world issues. The Embassy's despatch no. 83 and its cable of September 20 in effect inform us that a cancellation of the MINMET contract might well bring about a major setback in the relationship which has been attained and which has been brought about basically in the interest of the security of the United States.

Aside from that aspect of this problem having to do with United States-Argentine relations, this Department is concerned about the adverse effect which cancellation of the MINMET contract may have on the comparative success or failure of United States objectives at the Economic Conference of the American republics which is scheduled to meet in Rio de Janeiro on November 22. We have been striving to resolve as many of our bilateral problems with the other American republics as possible before that Conference so that the atmosphere for constructive discussion will be improved and so that the meeting will not be taken up with numerous particular grievances of the various participants against the United States. We have been especially desirous of resolving our bilateral problems with Argentina because, being one of the largest and most influential Latin American countries, it is in a key position to contribute to the success or failure of the Conference. Through its effect on our Argentine relations, therefore, the cancellation of the MINMET contract could have an adverse effect on our foreign policy objectives at Rio de Janeiro.

If the contract is not cancelled, it would seem necessary and desirable to negotiate an amendment. The Department understands that Mr. Otto Tolerund of MINMET is now in Washington for the purpose of arriving at a satisfactory settlement of this problem and the American Embassy in Buenos Aires has informed the Department confidentially that Mr. Tolerund is authorized in his negotiation to omit from further consideration the deliveries which failed to be made and to consider only future quantities due. This would seem to be a promising beginning toward a compromise settlement which would alleviate hardships on the part of the contractor, lessen the grounds for criticism of the United States by Argentina and other Latin American countries, and, at the same time, substantially reduce United States commitments to buy tungsten.

[4]Reference is to telegram 164, from Buenos Aires, dated Sept. 20, 1954, not printed (835.2547/9–2054).

In the light of the considerations referred to in this letter, I urge in the national interest that the MINMET contract not be cancelled.[5]

Sincerely yours, THORSTEN V. KALIJARVI

[5] The question of the extension or cancellation of the MINMET contract was not resolved in 1954.

Memorandum of Conversation With President Perón, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)[1]

SECRET DECEMBER 6, 1954.

I made more or less the following statements to the President. I came to Argentina for two purposes.[2] First, to report to him our analysis of the results of the Rio Conference, and second, to give him my interpretation of the general situation in the United States, particularly as it affects our relations with Argentina.

The greatest importance of the Rio Conference to the United States was that it forced us to review our economic policies in Latin America and to achieve substantial unanimity within our Government as to what those policies should be. We did that during the interim after the Caracas Conference and, to a greater degree than has been true in past years, today we have a rather clear economic policy for the Hemisphere, one that has general support throughout the Government and the Congress.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Holland; this conversation took place at President Perón's summer home in Olivos. Mr. Holland was in Argentina between Dec. 4 and 8, 1954.

[2] In a memorandum of conversation between the heads of the U.S. Delegation to the Rio Economic Conference, drafted by Mr. Cale and dated Dec. 2, 1954, Mr. Holland is recorded as having stated that he would be happy to go to Argentina if there was agreement on specific objectives he should seek, and Under Secretary Hoover is recorded as having replied "that he was inclined to the view that Mr. Holland should make the trip even though it may not be possible for him to get any definite action taken by the Argentine Government while he is there." (OAS files, lot 60 D 665, "Memoranda of Conversation")

The principal features of that policy are expansion of credit and economic development; expansion of Inter-American commerce with greater assurance that access to United States markets will not be impaired and, finally, greater emphasis on measures which will encourage private enterprise to be more active in the Hemisphere.

Another very important feature of the Rio Conference is that it represented something of a frontal collision between two schools of economic thought; first, those men who sincerely feel that the interests of our peoples would be best served by increasing socialism among governments, greater intervention of government in business and displacement of private enterprise. The opposing view is that of the United States and Argentina which views private enterprise as the principal factor in economic development.

For some years we have observed a gradual and increasing trend toward socialism among the governments of Latin America. The Communists strongly support all such movements because they lead to conditions favorable to the eventual control of governments by communism. We feel that at the Rio Conference there was a rather sharp collision between those two schools of thought, and that the Conference largely committed itself to the economic philosophies of Argentina and the United States.

Finally, I attributed great importance to the fact that the Conference gave Secretary Humphrey an opportunity to know much of Latin America at firsthand. He obviously left the Conference enthusiastically interested in the future development of Latin America and determined to see that the policies announced by the United States Delegation are positively implemented.

At this point the President interrupted me and said that when he came into power in Argentina the country had for years undergone a process of Marxist indoctrination. If he had from the outset supported the private enterprise system he would have been discredited and would never have achieved the support of the people. On the contrary, in the first years he had taken a strongly Marxist point of view to capture the support of masses who were predisposed in that direction. He had gradually shifted his position to the right bringing the people with him. He now feels that they will support him, is openly anti-Communist and pro free enterprise position.

I then told the President that I would like to give him my own analysis of the current situation in the United States.

Today our Latin American economic policies reflect the views of those men like Secretary Dulles, Dr. Milton Eisenhower, Senator Capehart[3] and Mr. Randall[4] who are well known to support strengthening our commercial ties and expanding our financial support for the economic development of the Hemisphere. These views have the full support of the President and also of Secretary Humphrey in which as regard to Argentina, there is no feature of our relations within the Hemisphere to which we today accord greater importance than our steadily increasing cooperation with Argentina. We feel this has great significance to the security of the Hemisphere, because, situated as we are, the two nations can by close cooperation go far toward assuring the security of the Americas.

[3] Homer E. Capehart (R.–Ind.), Chairman, Senate Banking and Currency Committee.

[4] Clarence B. Randall, Chairman, President's Commission on Foreign Economic Policy, 1953–1954, and subsequently Special Consultant to the President for Foreign Economic Affairs.

I feel that our current cooperation can also have important economic significance. In this connection I cited the successful results of our efforts to avoid the establishment of a quota for tung oil and our own avoidance of negotiations on Brazilian wheat which could have prejudiced Argentina's normal trading relations. I also mentioned our close cooperation at the Rio and Montevideo Conferences.

Our policy of strengthening relations with Argentina is criticized by certain sectors in the United States and, perhaps, by groups in Argentina. He agreed that this was true.

When I returned from my trip in September I was criticized for the obvious pleasure and satisfaction caused me by courtesies which he had so kindly extended me. When the Czechoslovakian steel mill was exported from the United States to Argentina these same groups were very active in their criticism of the United States administration for permitting such an export.

Our own policy with respect to these anti-Argentine groups will be to seek opportunities to demonstrate the importance which we attribute to closer cooperation between us and to seek opportunities to dispel misapprehensions and misunderstandings which can obstruct our policy of bringing the two nations closer to each other.

While I have been invited to stop off in several Latin American capitals in the course of my present trip I have declined to do so and, instead, have extended my trip to visit Buenos Aires, thus giving added evidence of the importance that we attribute to our relations.

The resumption of Export-Import Bank activity in Argentina will constitute another important demonstration of our current policy. The granting of the steel mill loan would be an excellent way for the bank to move back into this field. Announcement of that loan would undoubtedly provoke strong reaction from anti-Argentine sectors in the United States. As a leader of the Republican party Secretary

Humphrey must, of course, take into consideration such criticism and, if possible, seek to avoid it. He felt and advised Minister Cafiero that if the announcement of a loan by the Export-Import Bank could be coordinated with some move on the part of the Argentine Government it would do much to weaken the position of anti-Argentine critics in the United States.

I stated that I did not feel that this was a condition to the granting of the steel mill credit; that I would support the granting of that credit regardless of Argentina's taking any reciprocal move; that I was confident that the President would make all such moves that he could and as rapidly as possible. On the other hand, I repeated that if some step could be taken at this time by the Argentine Government it would be helpful to us.

The President said that he was ready to extend to old investments the benefits heretofore accorded only to new investments by the present law on remission of profits.[5] He asked if this would serve the purpose that I had in mind. I said that I felt it would. He said that he would give instructions that this be done immediately.

Thereupon he called Secretary Gómez Morales,[6] Minister Cafiero, Minister Remorino, Chief of Protocol Bernini,[7] Captain Renner, as well as Ambassador Nufer and Mr. Atwood. He stated his decision described above. There followed a general discussion of the subject and agreement that necessary amendments to the existing law would be submitted to the President's special session of congress.

The President stated that if I wanted to do so I could publicly announce his decision.[8]

[8] In a memorandum of conversation with President Perón, dated Dec. 8, 1954, Mr. Holland stated that he had indicated to President Perón that it would appear presumptuous for a foreigner to make statements about Argentine internal matters, and that both President Perón and Secretary Gómez Morales, who was present during the conversation, assured him that they would make the appropriate announcement "before the first of next week." On Dec. 14, Secretary Gómez Morales announced in a press conference in Buenos Aires that the government was considering the matter of profit remittances. In despatch 647, from Buenos Aires, dated Jan. 21, 1955, the Embassy informed the Department of State that on Jan. 19 the Argentine Government had issued Decree 637, which permitted foreign-owned mining and industrial enterprises to remit profits, if earned after Aug. 23, 1953, up to 8 percent a year on their invested capital (800.05135/1–2155).

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND BOLIVIA[1]

Miller files, lot 53 D 26, "Bolivia"

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Thorp) and the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller) to the Secretary of State[2]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 2, 1952.

[Subject:] Bolivian Tin Negotiations[3]

Problem

The negotiations with Bolivia on tin are deadlocked again, though in a more friendly atmosphere.

The President of Bolivia[4] has written President Truman asking him to intercede to bring about a final agreement with Bolivia on tin at a remunerative price.

The Department has been asked what its position is as to the final offer to be made to the Bolivians.

Recommendation

That the Department recommend that Mr. Miller call in the Bolivian Ambassador privately and tell him (a) that we have considered the matter carefully, (b) that there is no hope whatsoever of our giving any increase in price that would make any real difference to the really high-cost producers, (c) that in the light of President Ballivian's letter[5] we are willing to help solve their real problem through advances of $5.5 million plus technical assistance for improving tin production and urge him to try to get his government to accept $1.18 on this basis. If this is unsuccessful, we should then make a formal offer in plenary session to the Ambassador[6] and the negotiators of $1.20 F.O.B. for one year only plus a $5.5 million line of credit specifically for improvement of facilities, informing them that this is the President's final decision.

Background

The facts are as follows.

The Singapore market price has been approximately $1.18 for the last month. On March 26 it sagged to $1.17875, recovering to $1.18 even yesterday.

RFC has signed up for 20,000 tons with the British, 18–20,000 tons with the Indonesians, and 7–9,000 tons with the Belgians, all at $1.18 F.O.B. We have agreed with each that if we pay Bolivia a better price they will get it also.

RFC has purchased 5,800 tons since January at $1.18 in spot purchases. This inflow is continuing.

The International Tin Study Group Report[7] shows that tin production exceeded free-world consumption by 24,000 tons last year. The consumption figure, however, does not allow for United States stockpile demand, which is still considerable.

The Bolivian negotiator, Dr. Hochschild, is insisting on $1.30 F.O.B. Indications from La Paz are that the Bolivian Government would consider settling for $1.25. Up until a few days ago Mr. Larson and General Wilson would have recommended $1.20, but with the Singapore price steadily at $1.18 they now do not see how they can go above that figure.

Most of the tin for which we have contracted is metal, but there is enough ore to keep the Texas City smelter going on a very reduced and uneconomical basis for 1952. The Bolivian ore is necessary to keep the smelter going at anything like capacity and thereby to avoid large operating losses.

If we stick to $1.18, we will almost certainly get the Bolivian tin eventually. They have no other place in which to sell it. But Bolivia might well try a number of expedients before giving in. She might depend on the concerted pressure of Latin American countries, in the OAS or otherwise, to get her a higher price. She might appeal to Argentina or Brazil for economic aid. She might curtail production.

The Bolivians are convinced that the British were induced to accept $1.18 because of the steel we gave them, the Indonesians because of the credits we have given them plus a two-year contract, and both of these countries and the Belgians because they knew that, under their contracts, if the Bolivians got a better price they would benefit.

[7] Apparent reference to the report entitled Tin 1950–1951: A Review of the World Tin Industry (The Hague, Netherlands, International Tin Study Group, 1951). The International Tin Study Group was established pursuant to recommendations approved at the World Tin Conference, held in London, October 1946; it met for the first time in April 1947.

We have considered and rejected the possibility of giving the Bolivians a reduction in their smelting charges. We have rejected this because the smelter is now losing money at present charges. The only other sweetener that we can find for the package is a possible offer of financing of from 5–6 million dollars for facilities to improve the quantity and quality of the Bolivian ore, which GSA is now seriously considering. This would particularly benefit the small Bolivian miners and would be very helpful. But it would be something they would have to pay back with interest. There are also certain other loans, not related to tin, which have been under consideration by the Export-Import Bank for some time and which are making good progress. If they are to be approved anyway, it would be very helpful to do it as part of this package.

We have come up from 99 cents F.O.B. to $1.18 F.O.B. in the price since last summer. The market price at Singapore has come down to $1.18. The $1.18 price would be adjusted retroactively to cover the approximately 1,800 tons the Bolivians shipped us last September and the approximately 12,000 tons they now have at port. They would gladly have accepted $1.18 six months ago. Nevertheless, they maintain that no settlement would be just and equitable unless it recognizes their higher costs and gives them a slightly better deal than the British, the Indonesians and the Belgians. They quote the Johnson Committee report[8] statement that they should get a premium because of their high costs.

We cannot pay them enough to meet the problem of their very highest-cost producers. But some extra payment will probably save enough face to permit a reasonably amicable settlement.

It is ARA's opinion that without such extra payment there will probably be a further prolonged deadlock. We should make sure of this if possible.

Since any price we give the Bolivians will have to be passed on to the British, the Indonesians and the Belgians, every extra cent a pound we pay the Bolivians would cost us approximately an extra $1,250,000 per year, of which the Bolivians would get about $400,000.

This situation has two essential elements:

1. How badly do we want fairly prompt shipments of the Bolivian ore necessary to keep the Texas City smelter in operation on some sort of economical basis? If there is any reasonable argument that it is worth an extra 2 or 3 million dollars to us to get this tin promptly, the answer to the problem is easy. We should then pay approximately 2 cents more to the Bolivians.

2. How badly do we want to reach speedy agreement with the Bolivians on a basis that will save their face? We face a heavy legacy of bitterness and ill-will left by the whole recent United States-Bolivian history on tin. This has become a cause célèbre in Latin America. It has been useful to Peron[9] in stirring up anti-United States feeling. It has even caused the President of Chile[10] to intervene with President Truman on behalf of the Bolivians. This ill-will was created largely by ourselves. Two or 3 million dollars a year in increased payment for a product we need is probably not a large sum of money in view of the possible stakes involved here and the amounts of money we are spending to avoid similar dissension and ill-will in other parts of the world.

It can also fairly be argued that the price of $1.18 was not a commercial price, but was the result of shrewd bargaining by the United States; that although the two British deals each stand on their own feet, the British were certainly influenced to some extent by their desire to make a gesture for the United States and by the steel they got; and that this has fixed the price with the Indonesians and the Belgians and the current market price.

On the other hand, payment of this extra amount would invite a heavy blast of criticism from Senator Johnson and those who think like him and possibly some criticism also from the business community which now sees a falling market. The Administration, and the Department in particular, will be blamed for a political decision which imposes on American consumers a new burden of foreign aid without legislative fiat and gives an unearned windfall to the British, Indonesians and Belgians. It will be said that this is particularly improvident in a falling market and that we should have stuck to $1.18 and given the Bolivians any financial aid they need by direct assistance methods. They will point out that the extra 2 cents is pure politics, since it isn't enough to make any difference to the really high-cost producers.

The question is, therefore, should the Department acquiesce in the present inclination of GSA to stand firm on $1.18, sweetened with a line of credit for improving tin production, or should it urge upon GSA, Dr. Steelman[11] and the President that the United States pay a cent or two more?

Reasons for the Recommendation

Our recommendation is set forth above. The main reasons for it are as follows.

1. At this narrow range of choice in price the commercial, political and general interests of the United States become inextricably merged and we must be guided by the net balance.

---

[9] Juan Domingo Perón, President of Argentina.
[10] Gabriel González Videla.
[11] John R. Steelman, adviser to the President.

2. When it comes to a deviation in price of a cent or two one way or the other, no one can say with certainty that $1.18 is right and $1.19 or $1.20 is wrong. One can only operate within a range. This is particularly true when we are unwilling to put the price to the test of a free market.

3. By building the Texas City smelter and buying Bolivian tin for many years, we have discouraged the Bolivians or any other country from constructing a tin smelter to use the Bolivian concentrates. By preventing private purchase in the United States and remaining out of the market for so long, we have prevented competition from determining the price of tin. We have, in effect, used our stockpile to force that price down, since in the absence of the stockpile we could never have held out as long as we did. We therefore have a moral obligation to pay a "fair price". We believe that the larger quantity of Bolivian production can be brought out profitably at $1.18 and that $1.20 would probably not be enough to take care of the higher-cost marginal producers. These points will be made by our critics and will be hard to answer. The Bolivians, however, insist that $1.18 is not a fair price to them simply because it is acceptable to lower-cost producers. It is really more a question of face than of money.

4. It is in the interest of the United States to get enough tin promptly to keep the smelter personnel and minimize operating losses.

5. The cost to the United States generally would be relatively small; the cost to the taxpayer would be negligible. There is no question of inflation or price ceilings involved.

6. The political advantage to us of settlement with Bolivia is clear. It is also in our commercial interest in a real sense because of the effect of this running sore on general relations with South America; e.g. supply of raw materials for our stockpile, the attitude of South Americans to United States investment, the supply of copper from Chile. An increase of one cent a pound in the Chilean export tax on copper would cost the United States consumer many times the amount at issue here.

7. Tough commercial bargaining does not necessarily mean haggling for the last penny and forcing a reluctant bargain. The price of $1.18 was set in exceptionally favorable circumstances, i.e. the United Kingdom deal. We cannot sustain the position that this was a purely commercial deal on tin alone.

8. To sum up: We are in a situation in which no one can say with certainty that as a purely commercial proposition $1.18 or $1.20 is exactly the right price. We cannot establish that $1.18 was arrived at on a purely commercial basis. The financial cost of the two-cent increase is comparatively small. The general interests of the United States would be significantly served by choosing the higher price. We should therefore do so if necessary to close the matter promptly.

Editorial Note

Between April 9 and 11, 1952, opposition forces led by the Movimiento Nacional Revolucionario (MNR), the party of Dr. Víctor Paz Estenssoro, overthrew the ruling military junta in Bolivia headed by President Hugo Ballivián Rojas. Extensive documentation relating to the coup is in Department of State file 724.00 for 1952.

At the Secretary's staff meeting, held April 10, 1952, Assistant Secretary Miller, in response to a question from Secretary Acheson concerning the situation in Bolivia, stated in part the following: "It is clear that this [upheaval] is an internal fight, but unfortunately it may be played up as part of our difficulties with Bolivia on tin. If there is no change in the government we will go ahead with our negotiations today, making an offer of $1.18 plus a loan for building concentration plants." (Notes of the Secretary's staff meeting, held April 10, 1952, Secretary's Staff Meetings, lot 63 D 75)

On April 13, 1952, at the Secretary's staff meeting held that day, however, Mr. Miller stated in part that "we cannot negotiate further with the Bolivians on tin because of the overthrow of the government. It will be some time before we recognize the government [established as a result of the coup]. Some elements in the present government favor nationalization [of the tin mines], but it is reported that some of the more sober officials suggest that this is unwise." (Notes of the Secretary's staff meeting, held April 13, 1952, Secretary's Staff Meetings, lot 63 D 75)

The Secretary's staff meetings, held twice a week during the period 1952–1960, were attended by the Under Secretary of State, Assistant Secretary of State, certain members of the Executive Secretariat, and certain office directors. A broad range of policy matters was discussed at these meetings, and the Secretary normally presided.

611.24/5–2752

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President

SECRET WASHINGTON, May 22, 1952.

Subject: Diplomatic relations with Bolivia

I would appreciate your authorization to announce some time next week continuation of diplomatic relations with Bolivia.

As you know, on April 9, 1952, a revolution broke out in La Paz on the part of the party known as the Movimiento Nacional Revolucionario (MNR) with the support of the national police and a substantial part of organized labor in Bolivia. The revolution was directed against the then ruling military junta which had been in power for a little less than one year. The military junta had taken over after the elections of May 1951 when the MNR candidate, Dr. Victor Paz Estenssoro, won a plurality of the votes but not the majority required under the constitution. Under these circumstances the Bolivian constitution required the Congress to elect the President, but the Government of President Urriolagoitia[1] voluntarily relinquished the executive power to the army, which appointed the junta. Throughout the eleven-month period that the junta was in power there was a continuous series of plots and rumors of plots, many of which were based upon the strong conviction of certain elements, both in and out of the armed forces, that the army should not be in politics and that the MNR, having won over 40 percent of the votes in the 1951 elections, should be given a chance to run the country. The failure of the military junta to negotiate a tin contract with the United States contributed to the loss of its prestige. There is no doubt that the uprising of April 9 constituted to a large extent a spontaneous expression of public sentiment. On April 15, six days after the outbreak of the revolution, Dr. Victor Paz Estenssoro returned from an exile of six years in Argentina and Uruguay and assumed the presidency.

Despite the fact that the revolution did constitute an expression of public sentiment, the Department of State has not moved earlier to recognize the new government because of a number of confusing factors in the situation. The first prerequisite to recognition of a de facto government is that it have control of the national territory. We have not been certain that the present government does exercise such control. The reason for this is that during the revolution civilian fighters of the MNR broke into an arsenal and seized a large number of rifles which have continued in the possession of these civilians. Further, the revolutionists inflicted such severe damage on army forces in the La Paz area that there has been doubt whether the Bolivian army in that area is an effective force. Similar reports have reached us from the mining areas where, as you will remember, two Americans were killed in 1949 by rioting mine workers.[2] Our Chargé d'Affaires in La Paz, Mr. Thomas J. Maleady, has discussed this situation frankly with the present Foreign Minister, Mr. Walter Guevara Arze, who is completely aware of the situation and who tells us that the Bolivian Government is quietly rounding up as many of the arms as it can trace. The Foreign Minister advises us that the present government has complete control of the national police and that it is rebuilding the army.

[2] For information pertaining to this incident, which occurred in May 1949, see Foreign Relations, 1949, vol. II, p. 525.

With regard to the question of whether or not the government is in control, another complicating factor has been the position of the present Minister of Mines and Petroleum, Juan Lechín,[3] who is head of the mine workers' union. Lechín is an extremely controversial figure of Syrian origin who has spent much of the last few years in exile in Chile and to whom the government of Paz Estenssoro owes a great debt of gratitude for the mine workers' part in overcoming army resistance to the revolution. Whereas Paz Estenssoro, his Vice President,[4] his Foreign Minister[5] and his Finance Minister[6] are moderates, Lechín and his designee as Minister of Labor, German Butrón, are, at the least, extreme radicals who have in the past shown a tendency to use violent methods, as in the abovementioned Catavi massacre of three years ago. There seems to be little doubt that there has been a struggle for power within the present government as between these two conflicting forces, but we have come to the conclusion that Paz is the ablest individual in the group and that he will stay in power. Withholding of recognition, which has had in recent days the effect of causing the scheduling of public demonstrations before various embassies in La Paz, will be an unsettling factor.

With regard to Bolivia's willingness to abide by its international obligations, the reference to this matter in the government's official note[7] requesting recognition left some doubt as to the scope of the undertaking. However, the Foreign Minister in conversations with Mr. Maleady and the President in a subsequent public statement to a Time correspondent have cleared this up in a manner which we consider satisfactory.

We have been extremely concerned over Lechín's program to nationalize the tin industry immediately. This concern does not arise so much out of sympathy for the Patiño and Hochschild interests who are in large part responsible for their present predicament, but because of (1) the unsettling effect which any confiscatory action would have on private investment in Latin America, including U.S.-owned copper interests in Chile and petroleum interests in Venezuela, and (2) the legal questions which would arise in regard to our ability to buy tin from confiscated mines, which difficulties would in turn create economic problems of great gravity for Bolivia. Our Chargé has discussed these matters very frankly with the Foreign Minister, and we doubt that there is anything more that we can do at this stage. Continued withholding of recognition is not going to prevent nationalization and may, in fact, have the opposite effect, namely, that of strengthening the radical elements in the government and pushing the government more in the direction of Peron. Paz Estenssoro last week named a commission to study the future status of the tin mines, but this could possibly be a stalling maneuver; and it is possible that they might settle for some arrangement similar to the Chilean Government's action on copper whereby the government becomes the sole seller.

Another complicating factor has been the status of Bolivia's leading newspaper La Razon, which has been closed down since the revolution. This closing has not been the result of any deliberate action by the government, although the government has refused to furnish protection to the publishers. During and since the revolution, armed civilians threatened the plant, and the result has been that the publishers have been afraid to attempt to resume publication. While certain liberal elements in this country will attempt to make this another La Prensa case, the parallel is not exact since La Razon is the personal property of one of Bolivia's leading tin producers, Carlos Victor Aramayo, and the problem is thus indivisible from the tin problem and the feeling against the Big Three tin producers. In any event, withholding of recognition is not a lever with which to guarantee publication of La Razon. As conditions go back to normal in Bolivia, this situation might work itself out.

We have been in consultation with other governments in Latin America on the subject of recognition. Thus far, only Argentina, Guatemala, Paraguay and Spain have recognized. Chile and Peru are both worried about the matter, but we consider that their fears are exaggerated; it is interesting that the Chilean Ambassador in La Paz strongly disagrees with his Foreign Office. On the other hand, Brazil, which has important interests in Bolivia, wishes to proceed immediately to recognize. We believe that Brazil's views reflect those of Uruguay. Under these circumstances, since we have had an informal agreement to proceed in concert with Brazil, Chile and Peru, we are confident that we can arrange simultaneous action next week with Brazil, Chile, Uruguay and Peru and also with Venezuela and Colombia, as well as with the British and French who are awaiting our decision. We will also notify other governments in Latin America and Europe of our plans.[8]

DEAN ACHESON

[8] A memorandum of conversation with President Truman, by Secretary Acheson, dated May 22, 1952, reads as follows: "I went over the memorandum with the President and left it with him for his consideration. He said he had been following the matter closely through the cables and had expected this recommendation and thought that it was probably the right course of action. He would like to give it some further thought" (724.02/5–2252).

President Truman approved Secretary Acheson's recommendation on May 27, 1952. On June 2, Chargé Maleady at La Paz delivered a note to Bolivian Foreign Minister Guevara Arze informing him that the United States was continuing relations with Bolivia; the text of the note, dated June 2, 1952, was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 845, dated June 3, 1952 (611.24/6–352).

Subject: Sale of Bolivian Tin

Mr. Evans opened the meeting by stating that the Bolivian Government had decreed that the Banco Minero should be the sole exporter of all valuable minerals produced in Bolivia. The Banco Minero had given some sort of authorization to a Mr. Ditisheim,[11] who in turn was being represented in Washington by Mr. Leon Henderson, to act on its behalf. Neither Mr. Henderson nor Mr. Ditisheim has shown this authorization to United States officials but they had claimed to have an exclusive agency for sale of all Bolivian tin, including Patino concentrates. The problems requiring the most immediate solution were whether any agency of the United States Government should now recognize the monopoly of the Banco Minero and deal with it, and, if so, whether such negotiations should be carried out with Ditisheim–Henderson.

Mr. Evans pointed out that the sweeping authority granted to the Banco Minero by the Bolivian Government apparently cut across existing contracts. This raised a number of questions: (1) Would the Bolivian Government now give assurances that the Banco Minero would honor (a) existing contracts between United States Government agencies and Bolivian producers; (b) existing contracts with United States private purchasers; (c) existing contracts with other foreign governments and individuals? (2) Would the Bolivian Government also honor existing contracts if the mines were nationalized? (3) Until assurances were received from the Bolivian Government on these questions would it be wise to deal with a representative of the Banco Minero even if he proved his right to act in its behalf? (4) Was there a danger of becoming involved in litigation with present mine owners if United States agencies accepted deliveries from the Banco Minero under existing contracts with private companies? (5) Assuming that other obstacles to dealing with Ditisheim–Henderson were removed, and their claim that they were in a position to offer all Bolivian tin were substantiated, should the United States Government purchase all or any part of the Patino concentrates in spite of the long-standing arrangements between Patino and the British?

EPS reported that it had contracts for tungsten and asbestos. Some of the former were tied to loans made by the Export-Import Bank. DMPA said it was buying columbium on open offer at premium prices. Premiums were, however, only paid to producers themselves and not to sellers who were not producers. Export-Import Bank reported that it had authorized three loans for tungsten development. There have been disbursements in connection with only one of these.

The question was raised as to whether RFC and the other procurement agencies of the United States Government could agree not to make further contracts for Bolivian minerals until Bolivia had indicated whether or not it would honor all existing contracts with United States Government agencies. It was pointed out that the only effective bargaining weapon in the hands of the United States for insuring fair treatment to the contracting agencies was the conditions under which we were willing to buy these minerals from Bolivia, and most particularly the conditions under which we were willing to buy tin.

RFC stated that from the standpoint of supply it was not at present forced to buy tin for the Texas City Smelter. It had stocks on hand and was, moreover, faced with a strike. At the same time a suggestion that RFC stop buying tin would place that agency in a difficult position, since it had had an apparently genuine offer from Ditisheim and Henderson. It was charged by Congress with operation of the smelter and tin was in overall short supply. Moreover the offer included Patino concentrates and a refusal might lead to Congressional criticism. RFC had not, however, been shown any authorization to act on behalf of the Banco Minero by Ditisheim–Henderson. RFC could only agree not to make any term contract for Bolivian tin if each interested agency sent a letter to RFC specifically requesting that it refrain from doing so.

After further discussion it was agreed that RFC would talk with the agents and ascertain their terms but not immediately conclude a contract. Meanwhile a telegram would be dispatched to La Paz for information as to whether Bolivia would honor existing contracts now and as to the mechanics of safeguarding the Export-Import Bank loans. An inquiry as to whether Bolivia had selling plans other than the Ditisheim–Henderson arrangement would be included. The telegram would also indicate that until satisfactory replies were received from Bolivia, United States Government procurement agencies would not conclude any contracts with the Banco Minero or its agents.

It was also agreed that a memorandum embodying this decision would be signed by all the participating agencies and would be given to RFC. A copy is attached.[12]

Subsequent to this meeting, further discussion among representatives of the State Department, EPS, DMPA and the Export-Import Bank led to the conclusion that the request by these agencies to the RFC should be not to make any term contract with the Banco Minero or its agents while the present uncertainty concerning nationalization of the mines persisted, and that no other purchase be made until satisfactory answers had been obtained from the Bolivian Government to the questions referred to above. It was also agreed that the proposed cable[13] be altered accordingly.

Memorandum of Conversation, by William P. Hudson of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 31, 1952.

Subject: Bolivian Tin

Participants: Ambassador Andrade[1]
ARA—Mr. Miller
OSA—Mr. Hudson

Having called for the first time on Mr. Miller, Ambassador Andrade said that he wished to bring up certain specific problems. By far the most important of these was tin. His principal immediate responsibility was to negotiate a contract with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The price to be specified in this contract was of course important, but it was less important than the length of the contract. Bolivia urgently needed a term contract with a duration of one year or more.

The Ambassador indicated that he planned to offer Patiño ores to the RFC, although he was aware that such an offer would involve legal complications which would have to be studied. He indicated that Bolivia would hope to receive a more favorable price if Patiño ores were included than if they were not.

Mr. Miller replied that the RFC had been buying Bolivian tin and was prepared to continue doing so, on a short-term or spot basis. However, in view of certain purely commercial considerations arising out of the pending nationalization issue, the United States believed that a long-term contract at this time would be premature. The issue of nationalization was one for the sovereign people of Bolivia to decide for themselves, but it would raise problems which would make a long-term contract at this time commercially unrealistic. For example, the decisions on nationalization which remained to be taken and implemented might create questions of the ownership of the ores involved in a tin contract, and the quantity of the ores involved in a long-term contract would be difficult to predict in advance of these decisions. The United States also had to consider the interests of American citizens who were stockholders in Bolivian mining companies.

Regarding the Patiño ores, Mr. Miller supposed that the RFC would be willing to consider their purchase, but the United Kingdom was greatly interested in this matter, and there were legal complications which would require very careful study.

Ambassador Andrade remarked that he had read with interest the report[2] of the Preparedness Sub-Committee of the Senate Armed Services Committee. Mr. Miller commented that this report, which had caused certain difficulties in our relations with tin-producing countries, had not been cleared with interested executive agencies of the United States Government and thus was the view solely of the legislative branch. The executive branch agreed with some of the findings of the Sub-Committee, but disagreed with others. It was extremely unfortunate that in the heat and excitement of the tin crisis of the past year the impression of an economic battle between the United States and Bolivia, both members of the friendly community of American states, had been created. However, he could assure the Ambassador that there was no question of any such battle now, and that the Ambassador would find United States officials prepared to discuss the tin problem with him in a manner becoming members of the same friendly family of nations.

The Ambassador said that he wished to clarify the position of Leon Henderson. Mr. Henderson had had an option authorizing him to sell Bolivia's tin production, but this option had expired, and although Mr. Henderson seemed to believe that he still had some authority to offer Bolivian tin ores, this was not in fact the case. It was his personal opinion that the granting of the option had been a mistake in the first place and he was speaking officially for the Bolivian Government in saying that he himself was now the only person authorized to deal with the RFC, although he would have certain technical assistance from other Bolivian officials. [Mr. Hudson later telephoned the Ambassador to confirm an impression that in speaking of the "Henderson option" the Ambassador had been referring to the arrangement with the Banco Minero in which Hans Ditisheim had the principal interest. The Ambassador replied that this impression was correct, and that what he had said about Mr. Henderson applied also to Mr. Ditisheim.][3]

Mr. Miller indicated that the Department had had doubts about the soundness of the Ditisheim–Henderson arrangement, and said that he wanted to assure the Ambassador that there was no need for Bolivia to employ intermediaries in dealing with the RFC.

The Ambassador said that he had heard a rumor that the United States planned shortly to permit the resumption of tin imports by private buyers, and he wondered what effect this development would have on the negotiation of a contract between Bolivia and the RFC. Mr. Hudson replied that the announcement of this action was to be made the following day, and that the American Embassy in La Paz had been requested to inform the Bolivian Government in advance. He said that this action should not make any difference in the negotiation of a contract for Bolivian ores, since the RFC would continue to purchase ores for the Texas City smelter. The resumption of United States private trade in tin might have some effect on the market, but it was the opinion of some tin experts that this effect would not be very marked, since the RFC would continue to buy and sell large quantities of tin at $1.21½. For the Ambassador's confidential information Mr. Hudson gave him a copy of a statement on this subject by the Administrator of General Services,[4] which was being released to the press for publication the following day.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Milton Barall of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 18, 1952.

Subject: Tin Talks between RFC and the Bolivian Ambassador

Participants: Victor Andrade, Bolivian Ambassador
OSA—Mr. Atwood, Mr. Barall

Ambassador Andrade called on Mr. Atwood to report on the three meetings he has held with RFC officials to discuss the possibility of a tin contract. He said that the RFC was reluctant to enter into a long-term contract at this time because of the question of legal ownership of the ores in the event of nationalization. The Ambassador tried to dispel these fears by giving assurances that there would be no immediate question as to ownership and that any lawsuits which might be brought would first have to be taken before the Bolivian courts. Eventually, should it be felt that compensation for the mines were not adequate, a case might go into diplomatic channels. However, in view of the feeling in RFC against a long-term contract at this time, the Ambassador said he had proposed the sale of 6,000 tons of tin on a contract basis prior to September 30. Since the nationalization report is not expected before October, there would be no question as to the legality of this sale.

The Ambassador said that the Bolivian Government was taking what it considered a very reasonable stand and was trying to avoid difficulties by asking the same price as had been paid for previous spot purchases, $1.17½ cents per pound, with the smelting charges to be kept at the previous rate. He said it would be most difficult for Bolivia to accept a lower price because of the psychological factor. The Bolivian public would believe that the country was being discriminated against because of the present regime, especially since other countries were getting this price for tin under contract arrangements with the United States. The Ambassador said he was trying to work in the most friendly and cooperative way with the RFC but that his Government would be subjected to severe attacks by Hochschild and the Bolivian public if a lower price were accepted. He also pointed out that his colleagues in Latin American Embassies in Washington had displayed great interest in the tin question and had asked him directly if the Bolivian Government were being discriminated against. Thus, he claimed, RFC insistence on a lower price would cause resentment throughout Latin America and again raise the argument that Latin America is not treated as well as other areas of the world. In Bolivia, it would also be claimed that the US Government was supporting the mine owners in the fight against nationalization. Andrade reiterated that the Bolivian Government considered its price request perfectly reasonable and had not anticipated difficulties along these lines.

The Ambassador said the RFC had offered a price of only $1.17 cents per pound together with higher smelting charges. Since the difference in price of only ½ cent per pound is so slight, the Ambassador felt that the political and psychological factors far outweighed the price question and he asked Mr. Atwood's assistance in getting the RFC to agree to pay $1.17½. He said the problem of smelter charges could be taken up at a later date in connection with a long-term contract after the nationalization issue is settled.

Mr. Atwood said he understood that the Bolivian Government had allowed certain sums to the mining companies for transportation and smelter charges but that not all of this money was used for these purposes. Under the present plan, the Bolivian Government would receive more dollars, since Hochschild would no longer be able to draw benefits from the artificially low smelting charges. Mr. Atwood asked if the Ambassador could accept new smelter charges if the price of $1.17½ cents were agreed to. The Ambassador replied that this would be a better solution from the point of view of public relations since the smelter charges could be raised gradually so as to minimize the impact of the increase. The Ambassador seemed to recognize the necessity for an eventual increase in the smelter charge. He said the Bolivian Government has been cutting expenses (for example, the Army previously got 40% of the budget) and was eliminating the profiteering of the middleman. By following its new economic policy the government will be in a good economic position. Thus, they could take ½ cent less on the price of tin without going into bankruptcy but the psychological effect might be disastrous.

Mr. Atwood explained that unless our advice were specifically requested State had not participated in the discussions of the tin question and that the RFC had been acting on its own. He explained that the RFC had responsibilities toward Congress and was required to explain why the Texas City smelter operated at a loss. They had been able to do this in the past on the basis of strategic necessity but this argument will not continue to be valid and an increase in smelter charges would be necessary. Mr. Atwood agreed with the Ambassador that the timing of the increase would have to be worked out carefully. Mr. Atwood expressed appreciation of the Ambassador's point of view and said he would discuss the problem in the State Department and then with the RFC to see if we can help in bringing about a mutually satisfactory agreement. Mr. Atwood made it clear that the ores under discussion were separate from those to be shipped to England inasmuch as the British Government considered that they have a contract through Williams-Harvey to purchase Patiño ores for their smelters.

The Ambassador said that eventually Bolivia will wish to discuss the financing of a leaching plant to improve the concentration of ores—perhaps up to 60%. This would make it better for the Texas City smelter and minimize the question of smelter charges. Then he repeated that all he was seeking at the present time was an orderly method of selling tin prior to nationalization, leaving the other complications for later discussion.

The Ambassador added that there were also many intermediaries, such as Henderson and Ditisheim, who were trying to cut in on Bolivian tin. These two gentlemen continue to insist on their offer of 80% in cash and 20% in machinery. Andrade said that he was very much opposed to this type of arrangement because it would protect a monopoly market and disrupt free enterprise channels. It would also deprive those who now import machinery from the US of their commissions. The Ambassador feels that no intermediaries are needed but expressed the fear that they may offer a higher price for tin than the RFC, then sell the ores to the RFC at a loss in order to get a monopoly market in Bolivia. He reported that the RFC said it could not refuse to buy from intermediaries if they offered to sell at a lower price, even though the RFC was not in favor of their getting into the act. This is another reason for achieving promptly a reasonable agreement between the RFC and the Bolivian Government.

The Ambassador then called Mr. Atwood's attention to another problem which he hoped could be worked out satisfactorily. He said he had talked with Mr. Larson of GSA and with Mr. Gaston of the Eximbank about the contracts between GSA and tungsten producers in Bolivia, to whom the Eximbank had made loans for the purpose of increasing production. The Ambassador said the interests of the Bolivian Government and the GSA coincided in this matter since both are interested in increased production. Andrade was to see Mr. Gaston this afternoon and expressed the hope that no difficulties would arise. With the Banco Minero designated to control exports of metals, the Bolivian Government feels that tungsten sales should also come under its jurisdiction. The Banco Minero is willing to act as agent for the producers or to take over the contracts and assure delivery of the tungsten. Mr. Larson was reported as having no objection to any internal arrangements made in Bolivia, provided that tungsten production is increased and shipments to the US continue. The Ambassador said he hoped to obtain Mr. Gaston's approval to the assumption of responsibility for Eximbank loans by the Banco Minero. He assured Mr. Atwood that the money loaned by the Eximbank would be used exclusively to increase production and that earnings would be used to repay the loans.

Mr. Atwood explained that it was necessary to avoid pooling the tungsten so that the identity of the producer would not be lost. He said that if the Bolivian Government can assure that the money would be paid to the producers and used for the purposes stated in the agreements the Eximbank would probably have no objection to the Bolivian plan.* Mr. Atwood spoke of the long range importance of tungsten as a dollar earner for Bolivia since tin was now in a surplus position and therefore could not be counted on as a continuous source of high dollar income. The Ambassador agreed with Mr. Atwood that economic diversification and increased agricultural production are essential to the economic well-being of Bolivia. He explained that the Government had certain long range plans to bring this about and that it was trying to accumulate a good dollar reserve so as to bring the official and unofficial rates of exchange into balance, this type of measure being necessary to promote increased production within Bolivia.

*_Note_: In a telephone conversation between Ambassador Andrade and Mr. Barall, this date, the Ambassador stated that he had seen Mr. Gaston and received a favorable reaction to the Bolivian proposal. The Banco Minero will prepare a draft of the proposal to be submitted to the Eximbank by the Ambassador. [Footnote in the source text.]

SECRET WASHINGTON, September 8, 1952—7:28 p. m.

70. Amb[2] from Miller. Re urlet Mann Aug 18[3] we have been reviewing in Dept position we have been maintaining that RFC shd sign no long term tin contract so long as uncertainty exists re nationalization of mines. Depts position has been based on fear that signing long term contract cld be considered by Bol Govt as green light to confiscatory nationalization and that this wld have bad effect in other countries where US property rights are at stake. Statements from Chile since recent election re possible nationalization copper mines give us new cause for concern this score.

On other hand representatives of Mercantile Metal and Ore argued last week that signing of long term contract with them wld help Paz pursue more moderate course in dealing with tin mines and that our continued refusal to sign contract wld play into hands of Lechín. This argument does not appear convincing since there is no reason why Lechín cld not take credit for contract. Furthermore since Mercantile discussions with Paz latter has issued another public affirmation of intention to take over mines immed. Also we are hesitant about beginning discussions of contract while producing cos are still negotiating with Govt.

We wld appreciate ur comments on foregoing particularly on question whether immed sig long term contract with escape clause wld tend be moderating influence in re to Bol Govts tin policy or whether on other hand continued refusal to sign contract wld play into hands of Lechín. Pls bear in mind that in view of doubts as to Bol ability to pay prompt, adequate and effective compensation upon nationalization, contract wld probably have to contain broad escape clause giving RFC right to terminate contract or stop purchases upon nationalization. In this connection we have in mind possibility of extensive litigation which wld arise as to title to ores.

We realize it is difficult for you to express view on foregoing questions except in context of package deal involving econ assistance, but situation seems so confused in Bol both with regard to nationalization and otherwise that we hesitate to use even implied promise of such assistance as bargaining point at this stage. However, we wld appreciate receiving your opinion as to whether you cld effectively approach Paz at this stage to explain fully our point of view re tin. In such a conversation you might stress our willingness continue buy tin on day-to-day basis pending clarification of situation. You cld also say that once ultimate disposition of tin mines has been made either

80. Urtels 80 and 83.[2] Approach Paz immed re nationalization and long-term tin contract. Reiterate that we consider decision to nationalize or not one for sovereign Govt of Bol to decide but that consequences of nationalization if undertaken have important bearing on contract question. Request formal and definitive oral statement whether Bol Govt has taken irrevocable decision re nationalization and if so what this decision is. State that RFC will sign contract 1 to 1½ yrs, same price and smelter charges as offered in draft short-term contract given Canedo ($1.17 and new smelter charges) or alternative terms offered him orally ($1.17½ with different sched new smelter charges) immed upon either (a) a definitive decision not to nationalize or (b) estab form nationalization which provides prompt adequate effective compensation and protection re title ores deemed adequate by RFC. Explain that until one of these events occurs US will not negot on long-term basis either with Bol Govt or with an intermediary but that when either does occur will be perfectly willing negot directly with Govt. FYI only with regard to production of properties subj to nationalization program State may urge RFC negot only with Bol Govt rather than intermediaries because of special circumstances of present case: (1) contingency of contract on Bol Govt actions re nationalization, (2) cumbersomeness of timing if intermediary involved since RFC wld insist on giving all potential agents equal chance, (3) our desire that contract benefit Bol economy which wld be in part defeated if extraordinarily onerous terms proposed by certain aspirant intermediaries were accepted. Explain also that because of fluctuations in tin market this offer cannot be held open very long but advance notice of few days will be given before its withdrawal. (FYI only offer will not be withdrawn except with reasonable notice and after consultation between State and RFC and State will consult you before concurring.) Add that when possibility of nationalization without satis compensation or of a nature which wld make Bol poor banking risk no longer a threat US will be prepared again consider broad program economic coop.

Explain frankly US purpose is offer Paz opportunity follow middle of road course, dressing up recommendations of Study Comm so as derive polit advantage but avoiding econ chaos and internatl friction which wld almost certainly follow confiscatory nationalization. Present proposal in best possible light and endeavor discreetly ascertain whether in Paz's opinion this offer gives him sufficient strength forestall nationalization or undesirable form thereof. If ur best efforts unavailing and you convinced Paz is not merely bargaining, Dept and RFC prepared consider some alternative course.

Take occasion of above conversation to remind Paz RFC offer purchase 6000 tons accumulated tin stocks and Sept production still stands.

Re Fabulosa offer RFC sees no particular advantage negot with Fabulosa and on balance wld prefer not to since wld open door possibly less attractive offers from other medianos and Bco Minero for production small miners.

The Ambassador in Bolivia (Sparks) to the Department of State

SECRET PRIORITY LA PAZ, September 24, 1952—6 p. m.

97. Deptels 78[1] and 80, Sept 19 discussed Saturday with Pres, Monday with Foreign Minister and Vice Pres and yesterday with Foreign Minister, Min Mines and Pres and two members Nationalization Study Commission.[2] Exhaustive conversations[3] covered all phases.

---

[1] The Department's telegram 78, to La Paz, dated Sept. 19, 1952, instructed Ambassador Sparks to inform the Bolivian Government, inter alia, that the United States relied on the government's assurances that it would honor existing contracts between tungsten producers in Bolivia and the GSA and avoid taking action interfering with their fulfillment (824.2547/9–1952).

[2] José Nuñez Rosales and Carlos Morales Guillen.

[3] Memoranda of the referenced conversations were transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 220, from La Paz, dated Sept. 29, 1952 (824.2547/9–2952).

Pres declared nationalization inevitable and asserted govt must nationalize or be ousted in which case need do so of succeeding govt wld be even more urgent. Therefore, Bolivian Govt decision nationalize is irrevocable taking place about Oct 20. Pres said expropriation will be pursuant Bolivian constitution and laws; confirmed govt will present companies with debit notes for unpaid taxes which companies cld contest in Bolivian courts and confided govt legal case against companies is convincing. Foreign Minister and others confirmed.

Since Pres admitted Bolivia's inability comply requirement prompt compensation I explored possibility mixed commission or other arrangement accepting nationalization and permitting commissions [companies?] continued participation but recd no encouragement. This due govt complete lack confidence in companies because their alleged past deceptions, political intervention and selfish economic policies. Pres and others wish compensate legitimate US Patino shareholders but unalterably opposed extension same treatment to Patino family Aramayo and Hochschild. President desires nationalize without internatl friction but at loss how do same and wld welcome suggestions (Pres did not mention Spanel proposal[4] Deptel 81, Sept 19[5]).

Pres said strong US position cld not be due small US investment in Patino and presumed it was US desire avoid precedent unsatis nationalization in Bolivia. View Bolivia's inability make prompt compensation Pres inquired (1) if arrangement might be worked out for payment from future tin sales or (2) if US loan cld be obtained for immed payment compensation. I observed one similar Iranian proposal and two most unlikely view undesirable precedent.

Foreign Minister and Study Commission raised complicated legal questions which I declined reply. Foreign Minister queried if US will defend Patino Company or only US shareholders; if foreign shareholders cld institute embargo proceedings in US courts. Study Commission averred US courts cld not embargo or assume jurisdiction if expropriation effected pursuant Bolivian laws.

Pres expressed desire consider further RFC offer long term tin contract but this not raised subsequent meetings probably due fact contract conditioned upon satis nationalization. Foreign Minister queried re offer 6,000 ton purchase and I said still stands.

[4] Reference is to the plan proposed by A. N. Spanel, Chairman of the International Latex Corporation, as an alternative to the nationalization of the Big Three mining companies in Bolivia. The proposal involved the establishment of a tax-free "private" corporation having a monopoly over the production, smelting, and chemical refining of all minerals. The ownership and profits of the corporation would be divided roughly in equal shares between four groups: government, labor, management, and capital (the Big Three and other mining companies).

[5] The Department's telegram 81, to La Paz, discussed the Spanel proposal and reads in part as follows: "Dept cannot sponsor corp because among other reasons this Bol domestic problem, but wld consider this type solution as applied to Big Three only to be one of several possible satis substitutes extreme nationalization if mutually acceptable Bol Govt and mine owners." (824.054/9–1952)

Lengthy discussion re tungsten contracts but without conclusion. Foreign Minister concerned re GSA position on subrogation para 4,[6] also US support supreme resolution para 5.[7] On 4, I ventured personal opinion GSA wld first wish see if production conditions under nationalization counseled subrogation or seeking tungsten elsewhere. On 5, I explained proposed supreme resolution simply one of many possible solutions. I foresee no satisfactory solution big three tungsten contracts prior nationalization.

Pres mentioned receiving tin purchase offer $1.24 Rosario Argentina but is not considering it as probably curtain origin. Also explained many offers investment due probably risks in Europe greater than Bolivia.

[6] Reference is to paragraph 4 of an Embassy memorandum, dated Sept. 20, 1952, handed to President Paz Estenssoro by Ambassador Sparks on that date. Paragraph 4 reads as follows: "The GSA [tungsten] contracts could be subrogated to the Banco Minero de Bolivia by mutual consent of the Banco Minero de Bolivia and the companies. However, GSA is unwilling to accede to the subrogation of the contracts until such time as the consequences of any nationalization which may be undertaken are known, or a decision not to nationalize is taken. The Eximbank takes a similar position with regard to the loan contracts." (824.2547/9–2952)

[7] Paragraph 5 of the Embassy memorandum of Sept. 20 reads as follows: "Pending a decision on nationalization, some such arrangement as that proposed by the [tungsten] producers to the Ministers of Finance and of Mines and Petroleum on June 19, 1952 appears desirable. GSA and Eximbank believe that the draft of a Supreme Resolution proposed by the producers appears to give the minimum requisite assurances of the fulfillment of the outstanding tungsten and tungsten loan contracts under the provisions of the [Bolivian] Export Monopoly Decree of June 2, 1952." SECRET WASHINGTON, September 25, 1952—6:48 p. m.

86. From Miller. Ur conversations with Bol officials (urtel 97) seem to have been helpful in clearing air and establishing basis further discussion.

When you see Paz again you may confirm that our position re nationalization is not due primarily to US investment in Bol but also to other factors incl undesirability of precedent of confiscation. You might inform him we fully recognize Bol right take over mines. However, we are concerned about principles, about our responsibility protect interests US cits, and about harm which confiscatory nationalization might do to present good US-Bol relations. Moreover we are much concerned over effect of nationalization upon Bol economy because of (1) probable adverse effect upon operations (2) litigation that cld ensue, with concomitant tying up of funds, and (3) danger to Bol credit standing in general and discouragement to sound foreign private investment if no agreement is reached as to compensation. Under circumstances it seems better avoid any further discussion long-term contract. If Paz shld raise question as to our purchasing policy after nationalization without agreement as to compensation, you shld avoid discussing this but without giving impression either that we wld make a contract or that we wld refrain from any ore purchases. FYI we have not crossed this bridge and Dept policy would depend in part on consideration of Iranian problem. Your views this point wld be welcome.

Former Sen Millard Tydings[2] conferred with Dept officials today in capacity lawyer for Hochschild and Aramayo. He requested we approach Bol Govt with proposal from him along fol lines which you are authorized in ur discretion to pass on to appropriate Bol officials. Hochschild and Aramayo accept fact nationalization inevitable and Tydings is sympathetic to Bol Govt aspirations and wishes be cooperative. He considers that from standpoint of all concerned principal issue is how to compensate cos and he believes, on basis of his experience with similar situation in another country, that he cld work out an arrangement that wld be generous to Bol and at same time wld prevent stigma on Bol Govt of outright confiscation. Apparently Tydings thinking of some apportionment of ores, which might be reconciled with Paz idea expressed to you. Tydings suggested Bol Govt might send someone up here to meet with him and explore preliminary outline of compensation agreement. He considers Wash best place for preliminary talks since RFC here, altho FYI we do not believe RFC wld want to be in position of refereeing dispute as to what is fair compensation. Also FYI, Tydings seemed to imply that cos wld recognize some claims to back taxes by Bol Govt. We do not necessarily endorse Tydings proposal but it is not inconsistent with our hope that a formula for nationalization cld be found under which our tin procurement cld go on without involving us in possible disputes with original mine owners. Consequently, if you see fit to pass on Tydings suggestion to Bol Govt, you might suggest that it occurs to us that advantage cld be taken of forthcoming visit to US of Vice Pres Siles to effect he cld be authorized talk with Tydings informally and without publicity or any prior commitment. This wld have merit from standpoint of Bol public opinion that there wld be no suggestion that negots are being carried on under duress or that Bol Govt sending emissaries to cos rather than vice versa. If you take Tydings proposal up with Bols report reaction earliest, since Tydings now planning go abroad Oct 3.

[2] From Maryland (1926–1950).

Rovensky,[3] Patiño Board Chairman, also called at Dept today[4] to say Mariaca[5] wld present new Patiño proposal to Paz this week end (which he will show to you). We understand Bowers of Aramayo likewise presenting proposal and Hochschild has already done so. It might be helpful if you indicated to Paz that while US takes no position on details of these proposals it hopes they will serve as basis amicable examination of compensation problem.

As to legal questions raised by FonMin, these seem hypothetical at this stage and it appears best avoid discussion of them at this time. Re US stockholder interest in Patiño, we have no documentary proof whatever about this, and we believe it preferable for you to discuss question of compensation for all of the cos in the light of Bol own long-term interests rather than in light of compensating any specific US individuals. As to Paz query whether we can lend Bol money to cover cost compensation, there is obviously no possibility whatever of this and in your discretion you may disabuse Paz categorically of any such notion.

Secretary's Memoranda, lot 53 D 444, "August 1952–February 1953"

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Secretary of State [1]

RESTRICTED [WASHINGTON,] October 7, 1952.

Subject: Call of the Vice President of Bolivia

Participants: Sr. Hernán Siles Zuazo, Vice President of Bolivia
Sr. Víctor Andrade, Ambassador of Bolivia
The Secretary
Mr. Bennett, OSA

The Vice President of Bolivia, accompanied by the Bolivian Ambassador, came in for a courtesy call during the Vice President's private visit to Washington en route to the United Nations, where he will serve as head of the Bolivian delegation to the forthcoming General Assembly.

After an exchange of amenities Sr. Siles said that he wanted to assure me that his Government was desirous of extending the fullest cooperation to the United States at the General Assembly. I thanked him for his statement and emphasized the importance of our collaboration on the issues to come before the Assembly.

[1] Drafted by Deputy Director of the Office of South American Affairs Bennett.

I then told the Vice President that I was interested in the reported plans of his Government for the nationalization of mining activities in Bolivia but that I was not cognizant of the most recent details of the matter; I said that I would appreciate his informing me of the current status of the matter. Sr. Siles began by stating that the decision in favor of nationalization was one that had been made by the Government and the people of Bolivia and that it could be described as irrevocable. He said that the Government had appointed a study commission to make recommendations regarding the most practicable ways of implementing this nationalization decision. He indicated that what the Bolivian Government has in mind is a number of mixed companies to operate the several installations; the Government would hold 51 percent of the stock of these companies and the remainder of the stock would be open, as he put it, for acquisition by private investors. The Vice President remarked that his Government intended to use this method of operation both for existing mining activities and for any new ones, such as the exploitation of columbite which had recently been discovered. Sr. Siles stated that it was his Government's intention that the interests of American stockholders in the mining companies be fully compensated, and he said that he wanted to make it clear that the Bolivian Government did not regard the American portion of the ownership of the companies as in any way responsible for their past policies and activities. He indicated that the Government would have claims of back taxes and other charges against the companies, but he stated again that the American stockholders would receive full compensation. He went on to say that the Bolivian Government was anxious not to disturb production and the orderly flow of tin and other metals in their normal sales patterns. In that connection, he said that the Government had turned down a number of purchase offers for tin from European interests since they were not sure of the ultimate destination of the tin.

I explained to Sr. Siles that the United States Government had two principal interests in the problem: (1) that American stockholders be treated justly and equitably, and (2) that, as a friend of Bolivia, the United States is interested in that country's development and progress. I said to the Vice President that a decision whether or not to nationalize was, of course, entirely the prerogative of Bolivia and that decisions as to implementation of nationalization were similarly Bolivia's alone. I reiterated that our interests lay in ensuring that the legitimate rights of foreign investors be protected.

I went on to comment to the Vice President that, with respect to nationalization, I believed his Government has some trouble ahead. I expressed the view that the operation of mining activities would be much more complicated than the Government now apparently considers it. I continued that in my opinion one of the greatest needs of the countries of this Hemisphere at this time is for foreign investment for the development of their great resources. I said that, unfortunately, Bolivia will not get foreign investment through measures of this type.

Ambassador Andrade remarked that he would like to make a few comments on that point. He declared that the "big three" mining companies had been building up very large reserves and profits over a period of more than fifty years. He said that, despite the fact that these companies and other foreign investment had been given most liberal treatment by successive Bolivian governments, very little foreign investment had actually been attracted to Bolivia. He asserted that there is a general feeling in the Bolivian Government today that these measures of control over mining activities should have been taken twenty to thirty years ago and the resultant revenues devoted to the development of Bolivia through the construction of highways, schools, stadia and so on.

I concluded the conversation by stating once again the United States has only good will for Bolivia and that, so long as the rights of American citizens are protected, we recognize fully the right of the Bolivian Government to make its own decisions regarding the future operations of mining activities in Bolivia. We then adjourned for the taking of photographs.

Editorial Note

On October 31, 1952, President Paz Estenssoro signed a decree nationalizing the properties of the three largest tin mining companies in Bolivia (Aramayo, Hochschild, and Patiño). The decree recognized the principle of compensation and set a tentative amount to be paid for physical properties exclusive of the subsoil resources. The text of the decree, furnished to the Embassy at La Paz by the Bolivian Foreign Office prior to its signature, was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 315, dated October 30, 1952, not printed (824.2544/10–3052).

In a memorandum of conversation between Ambassador Sparks, who was in Washington for consultations during November, Mr. Mann, Mr. Evans, Deputy Legal Adviser Jack B. Tate, and others, by Stanley D. Metzger of the Legal Adviser's Office, dated November 10, 1952, Mr. Tate is recorded as having stated that the United States obligation to secure just compensation was limited to American citizens affected by the nationalization decree. He further remarked that "Ambassador Sparks' proposal for negotiation with the Bolivian Government to fix the amount of compensation owing the American interest, and to provide for payment thereof through combination with a purchase contract of tin or other means, appeared to be a feasible course of action to follow under the existing circumstances." Memorandum of Conversation, by William P. Hudson of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 9, 1952.

Subject: Pending U.S.-Bolivian Problems

Participants: Víctor Andrade, Ambassador of Bolivia
ARA—Mr. Mann
OSA—Mr. Hudson

Having returned late last week from a consultation visit to Bolivia, Ambassador Andrade called on Mr. Mann to discuss pending U.S.-Bolivian problems.

The first topic which he wanted to bring up, he said, was Bolivia's desperate need for a long-term tin contract. He indicated that he had in mind a contract for one year to 18 months, at the price established in RFC's Belgian and Indonesian contracts.[1] The economic need for such a contract was obvious, he said, and the psychological need was also very important. For example, one of the most serious current problems of the Bolivian Government was the hoarding of foodstuffs, which was producing acute shortages for most consumers. This hoarding was motivated by a widespread fear that the United States would not buy Bolivian tin and that imports of foodstuffs would therefore be sharply curtailed. Only a long-term contract could remove this fear. A long-term contract was also essential to prove to the people of Bolivia that the United States was not imposing economic sanctions for Bolivian nationalization.

Mr. Mann inquired what the Bolivian Government was doing to insure that the people of Bolivia knew the facts of the situation. The United States had never even considered imposing economic sanctions on Bolivia. We had been buying tin on a spot basis from the new Government and were willing to continue doing so, but the Bolivians themselves had made no offers of tin on this basis since September. He wondered why these facts were not being placed before the Bolivian people.

Ambassador Andrade remarked that this all appeared a little subtle to him. It was the first clear statement he had had, he said, that the United States was prepared to buy Bolivian tin even on a spot basis. Nevertheless, a long-term contract was what Bolivia required, for the psychological reasons which he had set forth and to enable the Bolivian Government to plan the future.

The Ambassador said that he next wanted to bring up the question of combatting Communism in Bolivia. He had talked about this matter with his Government and had made a vigorous complaint about such episodes as the anti-U.S. remarks made by Ambassador Montenegro and Mario Torres in the Caupolicán Theatre in Santiago. Such actions by representatives of the Bolivian Government were a serious undermining of his own position in the United States.

Mr. Mann commented that the United States could not conduct the entire fight against Communism; there were some areas in which foreign governments alone could meet their domestic Communist problems by telling the truth about their relations with the United States and rejecting the temptation to make demagogic attacks on us. The Ambassador agreed, but said that the Bolivian Government would need some ammunition and the most effective ammunition would be a long-term contract.

The next point which he wanted to bring up, the Ambassador said, was the matter of compensation for shareholders of mining companies whose properties had been expropriated. Of course this was a question which in theory was entirely separate from the question of a long-term contract, but the two were in practice related since he did not believe that his Government could afford to take action regarding compensation unless it could obtain a long-term contract.

While he was in Bolivia he had convinced even the left-wingers in his party of the necessity for compensation, and he could assure us that his Government was definitely determined to make a fair arrangement with U.S. stockholders. For example, his Government was prepared to have 5% of the proceeds of a long-term contract set aside in a special Bolivian Government account which would be used in paying compensation once a determination had been made as to how much should be paid and who should receive it.

When Mr. Mann inquired whether this compensation account was to be used only for payments to American shareholders or for payments to shareholders of all nationalities, the Ambassador replied that the Bolivian Government could probably not afford to discriminate openly in favor of American citizens. Mr. Mann observed that the United States Government would probably not want to handle any funds except for its own citizens.

Mr. Mann anticipated that negotiations regarding compensation would be extremely complicated and would require a long period of time. The Department had not yet given full consideration to this problem and he could not speak with finality, but it was his personal, offhand opinion that the best procedure would be to establish immediately some machinery which both sides could be sure would ultimately produce a solution. Perhaps the best thing to do would be to set up a joint U.S.-Bolivian commission, with a provision that some impartial third party might be called in to resolve points on which agreement could not be reached. The Ambassador commented that such a procedure would amount to arbitration. He seemed receptive to the idea.

Mr. Mann then inquired whether, if some agreement could be reached to set the machinery of compensation in motion, the Bolivian Government would present this action to the Bolivian public as the result of coercion by the United States. He wondered if it might not better be presented as an arrangement which Bolivia had proposed to the United States and the latter had accepted. The Ambassador appeared to agree with this view.

Mr. Mann informed the Ambassador that the subjects which had been raised in today's meeting would be discussed thoroughly in the Department. We would do what we could to help, and he would invite the Ambassador to another conference within a few days.

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann) to the Under Secretary of State (Bruce)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 17, 1952.

Subject: Agreement to Negotiate Compensation Arrangement and Tin Purchasing Contract with Bolivia.

Political power in Bolivia traditionally has rested in alliances between the armed forces and the three wealthy tin-producing families of the country—Hochschild (naturalized Argentine citizen) and Patiño and Aramayo (Bolivian nationals).

Rightly or wrongly, the great majority of the Bolivian people attribute their incredibly low living standards to their alleged exploitation, over a period of many years, by the three families. Similarly, the people of Bolivia cordially dislike the armed forces because they regard them as the instrument of the tin producers and responsible for excesses against the people.

In May 1951 the MNR party, then in opposition to the government, obtained a plurality of the votes in a national election but was prevented from taking control of the government; in April 1952, the MNR, assisted by the police, led a successful revolution in which armed civilians defeated the army. One of the first measures of the MNR was to reorganize and reduce to impotence the armed forces and the police so that armed civilians, including especially the miners, now represent the principal military force in the country.

Simultaneously, the MNR regime announced its intention of nationalizing the various mining companies controlled by Hochschild, Patiño and Aramayo. In the months that followed the Department made consistent efforts to persuade the Bolivian Government to consider carefully the effect which nationalization would have on the Bolivian economy and people. We pointed out that the mining companies constituted Bolivia's only important industry; that the country was dependent on sales of tin and other minerals for nearly all of the foreign exchange required to purchase imports, including mining machinery and 40% of the food consumed by the people; that the ability of the government to continue to produce tin (including the problems of maintaining discipline in the mines and obtaining technical and managerial skills and capital equipment) should be carefully considered; that the removal of the companies would create serious problems of lack of capital and of replacing the company "pipelines" through which important quantities of food and machinery were imported; and that nationalization would invite litigation which would create serious marketing problems. With equal vigor we raised the problem of prompt, adequate and effective compensation, especially for American shareholders.

However, so strong were the internal pressures that the government proceeded on October 31, 1952, to nationalize the various companies referred to, although we were successful to the extent that the nationalization decree recognized in principle the obligation to compensate shareholders and earmarked 2% of the proceeds of the sale of minerals as a fund out of which payments would be made. The price which we paid for our strong representations was a suspicion, voiced in the United Nations and elsewhere, that we were prepared to impose economic sanctions against Bolivia in retaliation for nationalization—that the United States had constituted itself the protector of all the mining shareholders, regardless of their nationality.

On December 9 the Bolivian Ambassador informed the Department that the Bolivian people, uncertain of the future, were hoarding food with the result that there was insufficient food to meet the demand. He requested that a 12-month tin purchase contract, at the same price fixed in similar contracts with Indonesia and Belgium, be signed before Christmas. He said that such a contract would have great psychological significance for the Bolivian people.

The Ambassador also indicated that in the event (and only in the event) we were willing to sign such a contract the Bolivians might be willing to agree to arbitration of the claims of American shareholders and to the constitution of a fund with which to pay American claims out of a percentage of the RFC tin purchase price.

The arguments in favor of such a package deal (assuming the Bolivian Ambassador can carry out his suggestions, which is not certain) are:

1. This may be our best chance of obtaining compensation for American shareholders on reasonably favorable terms.

2. This may be our best chance to set a precedent of compensation to American shareholders, something of considerable importance in other Latin American countries where large, strategic industries are largely or wholly American owned.

3. Since we are in any case prepared to make spot purchases of tin, we suffer only a measurable loss in bargaining power for a twelve month period by agreeing to a "long term" contract. In exchange we minimize the risk that we will be accused of economic aggression; of defending the excesses of Patiño, Hochschild and Aramayo; and of causing the economic plight of Bolivia.

4. A collapse of the Bolivian economy might lead to the seizure of power in Bolivia by persons of extreme anti-United States orientation: Our information is that there is currently no hope of the present regime being replaced by more moderate elements.

The principal objections to this course of action are:

(1) Any term contract might well strengthen the hands of Bolivia in dealing with other stockholders. It could not only be interpreted as taking sides in favor of Bolivia but could actually affect the bargaining position of the nationalized companies.

(2) It could be interpreted as showing that the United States was not taking a sufficiently strong attitude against nationalization in general.

(3) The existence of a one-year contract would not in itself prevent a serious deterioration in Bolivia resulting from nationalization and Government operation of nationalized mining industries.

The arguments advanced by Senator Tydings (who represents foreign shareholders) in opposition to such a package deal are:

(1) The United States should continue to apply pressure on Bolivia until a settlement is made of the claims of all shareholders, including Bolivian and other non-American owners; otherwise the RFC, even in making spot purchases, is a "fence" for "stolen" property. (This overlooks, in our opinion, that we have no legal right to represent foreign shareholders; that there is a clear conflict of interest between American and other shareholders in so far as compensation is concerned since to put Americans in the same boat with Bolivians and others would greatly reduce the chance that we can collect for Americans; only a small proportion of the stock is owned by Americans; the importance of setting a precedent for payment to American shareholders; and our overall responsibility for maintaining hemisphere solidarity in the face of the threat represented by the Soviet bloc. It is possible, however, that the Tydings clients may be agreeable to the package deal provided we continue to help them in a more limited manner.)

(2) The precedent for payment to American nationals is of little value to us unless all Bolivian and foreign shareholders are compensated. (We do not agree. We do agree, however, that we should continue to urge compensation for all to the extent that this can be done without injury to U.S. national interests.)

(3) We are not in immediate need of Bolivian tin. (This is true. However, we will need Bolivian tin within the year.)

Recommendation:

(1) That an exchange of notes be arranged wherein the Bolivian Government agrees to submit the settlement of prompt, adequate and effective compensation for bona fide US stockholders in nationalized Bolivian mining companies to a joint arbitration commission.

(2) That following the exchange of notes described in (1) above, the US Government shall agree to negotiate a 12-months contract to purchase Bolivian tin concentrates in amounts comparable to those under previous contracts with Bolivia and under conditions comparable to those of existing contracts with other countries. A percentage of payments for such concentrates would be reserved in a special fund to be used in payment of agreed compensation to US stockholders under (1) above.

(3) That to the extent it can be done without injury to our interests, we continue to recommend to Bolivia payment of all other shareholders. Irrespective, however of whether we are successful in this (and success is doubtful because of the hatred which the Bolivian people and government have for the three principal shareholders) we should proceed to deal as outlined above.

Clearances:

The above recommendation has been approved by Mr. Linder, E, and Mr. McDonald, RFC.[2]

The Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann) to the Administrator of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (McDonald)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 30, 1952.

MY DEAR MR. MCDONALD: I think it is worth while for me to confirm in writing the agreement that has been reached between the Department and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in Mr. Atwood's conversation with Mr. McKinnon on December 17 and in the meeting you held with Mr. Atwood, Mr. Evans and me on December 24.[2]

The enclosed memorandum to Mr. Bruce[3] sets forth the lines of the proposal to negotiate simultaneously with Bolivia a term tin contract and an agreement for the submission of American claims to impartial arbitration. This memorandum also outlines the basic reasons why the Department believes this solution is in the best interests of the United States. I am glad to confirm that Mr. Bruce has agreed to the procedure recommended in the memorandum and that the Department has already held one introductory meeting with the Bolivian Ambassador. We will, of course, keep the RFC informed of further developments and will notify you when it appears profitable for you to begin negotiations with the Bolivian Government concerning the details of the contract. In the meantime, I am sure you will agree that it is desirable that these discussions receive no publicity. I would suggest that both you and we limit our answers to any press inquiries to the substance of the statement made in the Department's press release of December 19, a copy of which is enclosed.[4]

On June 17, 1952, the Department joined with other interested agencies of the Government in urging that all procurement agencies of the United States Government refrain from negotiating any term contracts for the purchase of minerals from the Bolivian Banco Minero until satisfactory assurances could be obtained from the Bolivian Government regarding existing contracts between Bolivian producers and United States Government agencies. The Bolivian Government has now given the United States formal assurances concerning these contracts, and the original purpose of this request no longer exists. We do suggest, however, that negotiations between the RFC and Bolivia be further postponed until we have obtained the Bolivian Government's approval of the compensation agreement.[5]

Sincerely yours, THOMAS C. MANN

[5] In a letter to Secretary Acheson, dated Jan. 6, 1953, acknowledging Mr. Mann's letter, Mr. McDonald stated that negotiations for the purchase of tin concentrates from Bolivia would be postponed pending further advice from the Department of State, and also that RFC response to press inquiries would be limited to the "general tone" of the press release of Dec. 19 (824.2544/1–653).

173. Department called in Andrade today attempt convince him grave danger delay reaching agreement regarding compensation and one-year contract. He was given unclassified material sent Embassy in Deptel 169.[1]

Andrade also informed that although situation has altered radically since December 19 US will still consider spot offers, but he was warned spot contract dangerous because (1) might produce delay in meeting urgent fundamental problem, (2) might make RFC more unwilling enter one-year contract later. Argument last paragraph Deptel 169 also used.[2] FYI Department and RFC hope Bolivians will abandon spot idea.

Andrade said would urge on his Government desirability prompt negotiation compensation agreement but Department doubts he will do this vigorously. He will also report Department prepared send representative La Paz negotiate details agreement while tin contract being negotiated here.

As possible alternative to immediate arbitration agreement Andrade said would suggest clause in tin contract setting aside 5% proceeds for compensation with provision that if no compensation agreement reached within term of contract fund should be distributed by US to Amcits in full or partial settlement their compensation claims. He was informed Department would consider such a proposal although we wondered whether it would be as fair to Bolivia as our own proposal especially as it might not result in Bolivias obtaining full release from Amcits claims.

824.2544/1-1553

The Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann) to the Administrator of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (McDonald)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 15, 1953.

MY DEAR MR. MCDONALD: On December 30, 1952, I wrote you to confirm the understanding which had been reached between the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Department of State regarding the simultaneous negotiation with the Bolivian Government of a one-year tin contract and an agreement for the compensation of American shareholders of mining companies whose properties were nationalized by the Bolivian Government October 31, 1952.

I am glad to say that progress toward the implementation of this procedure has been made in conversations with representatives of the Bolivian Government and that drafts of a compensation agreement are now under consideration here and in La Paz. I am also informed confidentially by officials of Patiño Mines and Enterprises, a corporation in which American investments in the Bolivian mining industry are concentrated, that the Bolivian Government has made an approach to the corporation regarding a direct settlement of the compensation problem. If a direct settlement is reached between the Bolivian Government and Patiño Mines there will be no necessity for an intergovernmental compensation agreement.

Meanwhile the Department of State has been informed that the Bolivian Government wishes to make a spot sale to the RFC of up to 5,000 tons of tin in concentrates. The purpose of this sale, according to the Bolivian Foreign Office, would be to cover urgent requirements of foreign exchange which will be needed for the purchase of foodstuffs during the course of negotiations for the one-year tin contract and the compensation agreement. This Department would have no objection to your making a spot purchase of non-Patiño ores produced prior to January 1, 1953, in an amount up to 5,000 tons of tin content. In fact, we consider that a refusal to make a spot purchase, including some nationalized ores, would be prejudicial to the interests of this Government, for the following reasons:

1. The making of a spot purchase will not appreciably affect our future bargaining power with Bolivia.

2. Our refusal to buy nationalized ores will be interpreted in Bolivia and elsewhere in Latin America as retaliation for nationalization and as applying economic sanctions to force Bolivia to agree against its will to an immediate settlement of the problem of compensation. There would be undesirable and perhaps serious consequences should Latin America come to believe that the United States is attempting to bring about an economic crisis in Bolivia, especially if, as currently appears entirely possible, irrespective of our attitude toward the purchase of tin, a situation of economic and political chaos should develop in Bolivia with a consequent strengthening of political elements in that country hostile to the United States. It was for this reason that Ambassador Sparks in early December, 1952 and the Department on December 19, 1952 stated, with the concurrence of the RFC, that we had not refused to make spot purchases of tin and were prepared to consider spot offers.

3. Both the Department and the Patiño interests are currently negotiating with the Bolivian Government for compensation; and, in view of the Bolivian Government's statement that it recognizes in principle its obligation to make compensation and that it is prepared to consider the creation of a fund out of which compensation can be made, it would be premature to conclude that these negotiations will not be fruitful. An attitude of hostility on our part towards Bolivia will prejudice the chance that these negotiations will be successful.

4. There are the humanitarian considerations which flow from the fact that Bolivia must import about 40% of its food and that proceeds from the sale of tin are needed to buy it.

While this Department thus recommends that you consider the current spot offer, we suggest that you make it clear to the Bolivian Ambassador that in view of the tin-supply situation you cannot commit yourself to consider any further spot offers from Bolivia and this Government must reserve its right to withdraw its own offer of a one-year contract without advance notice.[2]

[2] On Jan. 15, 1953, representatives of the RFC and Ambassador Andrade agreed to sign a spot-purchase contract for 5,000 tons of non-Patiño tin concentrates (Department's telegram 180, to La Paz, Jan. 15, 1953, 824.2544/1–1553). The cut-off date for the contract was Mar. 31, 1953, later extended to Apr. 30.

In a letter to Mr. Mann, dated Mar. 9, 1953, Mr. McDonald stated that the RFC had stipulated as part of the spot-purchase agreement that the contract in no way obligated the RFC either to additional spot-purchases of Bolivian tin or to negotiations for a long-term contract. He further commented that in view of the present United States tin situation, based on available stocks and existing contracts, the RFC proposed to notify the Bolivian Government that it was no longer interested in discussing a long-term tin contract. given him within few days. Dept suggested news be kept confidential at least for time being and Amb stated his personal view this desirable. You should discuss this development with Bolivian authorities along following lines:

Bolivian Government will recall that in September 1952 US advised offer of term tin contract could not be held open very long. In January 1953 Bolivian Government was given detailed information about US tin supply position, was informed that term contract offer might have to be withdrawn at any time without advance notice, and was urged to act without delay to establish conditions which would make negotiation term contract possible. Department also pointed out on January 9 that spot purchase might reduce US ability enter term contract. RFC position was stated clearly to Bolivian Mining Corporation in letter of January 22[4] regarding spot contract. Since January continuing review US tin supply position has resulted in conclusion, announced publicly on February 6 by National Production Authority, that US now has under contract or available to private importers sufficient tin meet estimated requirements government and private industry. In this situation RFC's present estimate is that if it were to contract for further tin it would be exceeding authority granted it by Congress, which is limited to procurement tin for US Government and American industry. US action of giving this notice is based exclusively on foregoing considerations and US deeply regrets this situation has developed prior to conclusion mutually satisfactory arrangements regarding compensation and contract problems. US continues have friendliest feelings Government and people Bolivia and will attempt respond in positive manner to any sound Bolivian initiative for closer cooperation.

If you are asked about possibility spot purchases you should reply no answer can be given in advance since RFC ability make spot purchases will depend on situation at time of offer including US supply position.

FYI. Possibility US Government reopening discussion term contract under developing supply situation extremely poor and any justification consideration would require not only definitive action on part of Bolivia regarding compensation problem but also evidence constructive effort insure sound operation mining industry. You may in your discretion use above bring home reality situation but make every effort avoid giving Bolivians grounds charge RFC action taken as reprisal failure reach agreement compensation problem.

The Ambassador in Bolivia (Sparks) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL NIACT LA PAZ, March 13, 1953—8 p. m.

274. Foreign Minister called me to Foreign Office this afternoon and gave me informal account of first reactions of Cabinet which met this morning consider Andrade report on RFC decision; it is no longer interested discussing term tin contract. This problem handled in detail only by few members of Cabinet and news came as bombshell. First question was is US trying force Paz government out of office? Cabinet was unable understand why news should be kept confidential and Foreign Minister anticipated it could not be so kept. He recognized consequent situation will be grave. Government plans await details by airmail from Andrade before taking decision on formal reaction.

Discussed development along lines Deptel 223 March 12. However, Foreign Minister maintained problem is political and should be resolved between two governments and not between CMB and RFC. He admitted Bolivian Government had been on notice since September last year offer of term tin contract could not be held open very long. He added Bolivian Government had wished accept offer but US had attached political condition compensation agreement which required and still requires time to resolve. He declared compensation agreement without term contract has no meaning since if Bolivia could not sell its tin it could pay no compensation. In this connection, he reiterated his proposal Embtel 270 March 11[1] as an earnest of Bolivian intention compensate bona fide beneficiary US nationals. I stressed NPA announcement and RFC absolute legal inability exceed authority granted by Congress. However, he tenaciously sustained problems political and can be resolved only on political level. I also referred consistent tin overproduction during recent years which US had been purchasing for stockpiling purposes. Foreign Minister countered this overproduction was unreal and due to political restrictions on sales to Curtain countries; therefore, this also political.

[1] Telegram 270, from La Paz, dated Mar. 11, 1953, reported a discussion between Ambassador Sparks and Bolivian Foreign Minister Guevara Arze and reads in part as follows: "Foreign Minister made two suggestions: (1) Compensate US nationals at stock market value Patiño shares October 31, and (2) sign term tin contract with percentage retention clause and continue negotiate compensation agreement. I argued first suggestion had merit if date were prior April 9 since decline in value attributable directly to acts Bolivian Government. View Department's previous position I remarked second suggestion did not seem practical since positions two governments now so far apart discussions could continue indefinitely." (824.2544/3–1153)

Foreign Minister was most serious, obviously concerned and disturbed, and undoubtedly reflected government's reaction. He anticipated when news is made public it will unjustifiedly be linked with attachment of the Banco Mineros funds in New York and will cause serious antipathy towards US in Bolivia. I feel certain news will be exploited not only by extreme left but also MNR party, in general, to our disadvantage. Effectively it is a blow to government from which it may not recover. Without assurance of US market for one-half its tin production Bolivian descent to economic chaos with attendant political consequences will be accelerated.

[3] A memorandum of conversation between Ambassador Andrade and Mr. Cabot, drafted by Mr. Hudson, dated Mar. 13, 1952, reads in part as follows: "Mr. Cabot pointed out carefully and emphatically that the decision [of the RFC not to negotiate a long-term tin contract] had not been a political one. The Department had merely transmitted to the Ambassador a description of the factual situation in which the RFC had found itself. The decision had been taken not on grounds of policy at all but on the basis of the RFC legal position under its Congressional authority to operate. The Department was fully cognizant of the seriousness of this matter for Bolivia and was sincerely desirous of cooperating toward a solution. Since a solution would be difficult and the difficulties would increase as time went on, Mr. Cabot suggested the desirability of the Bolivian Government's acting as rapidly as possible to remove the obstacles which were within its power to remove." Regarding Foreign Minister's contention world tin surplus caused by political restrictions on sales to Curtain countries, you may wish point out total Curtain deficit, which is made up through purchases from Free World, estimated at only 5,000 to 8,000 tons, whereas Free World surplus is expected to be on order of 30,000 tons in absence stockpiling by US.

In a Foreign Office memorandum, dated April 27, 1953, the Bolivian Government informed the Embassy at La Paz that COMIBOL had initiated direct negotiations with the Aramayo, Hochschild, and Patiño interests in order to reach agreement on the question of indemnification, and also that an ad referendum agreement concerning tin and tungsten already had been signed with the Patiño group. Under the provisions of the agreement with Patiño, the Bolivian Government agreed, inter alia, to pay compensation for a period of one year (while efforts were made to estimate the total value of the properties nationalized) from funds acquired by discounting a certain percentage of the value of tin sold to the United Kingdom or to an agency of the United States; the rate of discount to increase or decrease in relation to the price of tin. The Bolivian Government's memorandum was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 696, from La Paz, dated April 28, 1953 (824.2544/4–2853).

On June 13, 1953, representatives of the Bolivian Government and the Patiño group signed at La Paz a "Definitive Agreement on Retentions", by which the Bolivian Government agreed, inter alia, if the price of tin remained above 80 cents per pound, to pay certain sums on account until December 31, 1954, pending the signature of a final compensation agreement. A copy of the retention agreement was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 787, dated June 15, 1953 (824.2544/6–1553).

CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY LA PAZ, May 7, 1953—8 p. m.

300. Embdes 706 May 4.[1] In interview with Foreign Minister Tuesday, I vigorously protested Paz and Lechin May Day speeches. I said while texts had not yet reached Department I did not feel I need await instructions express my government's displeasure that facts were distorted,[2] Paz publicly doubted US Government sincerity and motives and Lechin charged US with economic aggression.

While regretting this development, Foreign Minister declared consensus in government and MNR Party was distrust US motives that US did not intend reach agreement with Bolivia simply marking time knowing economic deterioration would eventually cause overthrow government. Foreign Minister said he had combatted this thinking but in absence positive helpful action by US he had been unable impose his ideas. He added many people interpreted US refusal grant immunity to Banco Minero as further evidence US opposition to government. He underscored gravity present situation and need for prompt action dispel this thinking avoid economic chaos political and social disorder.

I reviewed in detail US actions asserting failure reach understanding must be attributed Bolivian insistence on premises unacceptable US and present adverse economic situation is due directly acts of Bolivian Government, to lack confidence here in Bolivia and anticipation what is to come due fall in mineral prices and inefficient operation mines. I stressed lack term contract has had only psychological effect since actually Bolivia has not yet completed delivery January spot purchase. Therefore, US cannot be blamed for Bolivia's ill.

Speeches reflecting awareness gravity situation, Paz' extemporaneous response to enthusiastic audience and need for whipping boy have caused dismay among conservative Bolivians and intensified anti-US feeling. Public statement by Department has been suggested but this might be expected result in bitter polemic and further aggravate anti-US feeling unless it also included constructive statement on term tin contract.

[2] The Department's telegram 247, to La Paz, dated May 20, 1953, reads in part as follows:

"We approve your protest Paz Lechín speeches and suggest you take appropriate opportunities (1) to emphasize our surprise distortions in speeches and apparent deliberate campaign of hostility undertaken against United States by Bolivian Government and labor movement it presumably controls, (2) to point out danger this campaign may make it impossible Bolivian Government later obtain popular support measures cooperation with United States which it professes desire undertake, (3) to warn such a campaign might so antagonize American people and Congress as to endanger substantial United States assistance already being given Bolivia and future assistance such as term tin contract which Bolivian Government desires." (724.11/5–753)

I am now satisfied Bolivian Government is prepared settle with Big Three. It has signed agreement with Hochschild and Aramayo for retention on tungsten offering same to Patiño; is actively negotiating realistic percentage retention on tin after which will negotiate total amount of compensation. US insistence on settlement compensation problem and refusal discuss term contract generated pressure which influenced this radical change in Bolivian Government policy but this same pressure, although unintentionally applied, leaves US partially vulnerable to charges in Bolivia and Latin America. Since new Bolivian policy can be implemented only if Bolivia retains its market for tin in US, I urgently suggest prompt consideration negotiating term tin contract.

Foreign Minister again inquired regarding usefulness Lechin and his going Washington.

This meeting was called by Mr. Cabot in pursuance of authorization granted him by the Acting Secretary[6] to consult other agencies of the United States Government regarding a program to forestall an economic collapse and undesirable political developments in Bolivia. The representatives of the other agencies had previously received copies of a memorandum[7] setting forth the program which the Department of State believed should be implemented for this purpose. This program is described in a memorandum sent by Mr. Cabot to the Acting Secretary on May 18, 1953.[8]

Mr. Cabot opened the meeting with a brief outline of the dangers of the Bolivian situation and a statement that the program proposed by the Department of State was a carefully integrated one designed both to meet the immediate economic crisis in Bolivia and to provide a stimulus to economic diversification, which appears to be the only long-run solution for the basic Bolivian problem. He then called on the representatives of the other agencies for comments on the program and its feasibility.

In general Mr. Overby and Mr. Southard appeared to question whether there was an immediate crisis in Bolivia, but the arguments which they subsequently developed to support their opposition to parts of the Department's program indicated that they considered the situation in Bolivia to be almost hopelessly bad.

Mr. Overby began by raising the policy question of the implications of the Bolivian program for our relations with other countries. He asked whether the United States was prepared to offset in countries all over the world foreign exchange "losses" resulting from the decline of commodity prices from the high levels reached immediately after the outbreak of the Korean War. He cited figures indicating that Bolivia's exchange receipts even at present tin prices would be higher than her receipts in most recent years. Without questioning the fact that the poverty of Bolivia was undesirable he wondered whether the assistance proposed for Bolivia was not designed rather to maintain a standard of living than to meet an immediate emergency.

Mr. Cabot explained that, while Bolivia's exchange earnings had been rising, the foolish policies of Bolivian governments had been resulting in a progressive decline of agricultural production. He feared that there might actually be a shortage of food in Bolivia in the fairly near future. The present government, he said, had taken courageous action to reverse the trend of recent years, but it would need help from the United States in order to succeed.

[8] An unsigned draft of the reference memorandum is in file 824.00/5–1853. In it Mr. Cabot recommended the following four-point program for Bolivia: (1) A three-year contract at market prices by the RFC for the purchase of Bolivian tin; (2) an increase of Point IV funds from $1.5 million to $3.5 million for an emergency food program; (3) Export-Import Bank loans up to a total of $10 million to finance projects developed for emergency food production; and (4) U.S. support for Bolivia's request to draw on the International Monetary Fund beyond the gold tranche, up to $7.5 million.

Mr. Southard also questioned whether there was a foreign exchange crisis in Bolivia. He said that the Fund's figures did not show this. The Fund understood that Bolivia had received or would shortly receive nine million dollars from the Williams Harvey smelter and 7.5 million dollars from the RFC. Offsetting Bolivia's liabilities against these receipts, the Fund calculated that Bolivia's net gold and foreign exchange holdings would shortly be in the neighborhood of 16 million dollars. Regarding food, he understood that Bolivia had used part of its gold tranche drawing to buy wheat, and that the supply of this commodity was assured through the third quarter of this year.

Mr. Atwood agreed that Bolivia was not yet bankrupt, but stated that trouble could be anticipated within a few months, when the effects of the tin price decrease and the tin production decrease began to be felt. When Mr. Overby inquired whether it might not be better to wait until an emergency actually arose and supply food if there was a threat of famine Mr. Atwood replied that if we waited that long the damage would already have been done and that what the Department of State proposed was to head it off. In the Department's view it was essential to anticipate the payments emergency and also to get started immediately on a food production program.

Mr. Southard then went specifically to the point of the proposed Bolivian Fund drawing of 7½ million dollars. Such a drawing, he said, would be more difficult from the standpoint of United States policy than a similar drawing by any other country in the world except Iran and Paraguay. Whereas usually other countries were favorable or at least neutral regarding requests for assistance from the Fund, there was here the unusual case of opposition to the Bolivian request by countries other than the United States. He had been informed by the British representative that Great Britain considered the proposed Bolivian drawing to be as inappropriate as any he had ever heard of. Other directors of the Fund thought that the Bolivian monetary stabilization program was very thin and ill-founded. They had no confidence that the new exchange rates could be maintained, that further wage increases could be prevented, that the Bolivian budget could be balanced, or that the normal economic readjustment contemplated in the Bolivian Government's program could be effected. Thus the waiver requested by Bolivia did not appear to be desirable.

Mr. Overby supported Mr. Southard by stating that if Bolivia were allowed to draw without putting up gold collateral there would be no excuse for denying the same privilege to all the other countries in the world, and the 3.2 billion dollars now in the Fund would evaporate. In summary, he said, the Fund would be making a loan which would not be paid back and it would be corrupting all its principles.

As to the possibility of a drawing against gold collateral, Mr. Southard said that there was conflicting testimony as to the Bolivian Government's attitude. While the President of the Central Bank had indicated a possibility that as a last resort Bolivia would be willing to put gold collateral in a satisfactory depository bank, a Cabinet Minister had informed our Ambassador that this would be politically impossible. He was inclined to believe that the Cabinet Minister was right, and he also wondered whether from the United States viewpoint it would be politically desirable to require Bolivia to ship her gold out of the country.

Aside from the question of Fund principles, Mr. Southard also doubted the wisdom of allowing Bolivia to draw the remainder of her quota now, because he feared that it would be spent foolishly. He did not consider it proper for Bolivia's Fund resources to be used in a short-term loan for the purchase of food. Even if the difficulties of principle could be resolved, he would therefore recommend that Bolivia not be allowed to draw more than an additional 25% of her quota, and he felt that any such drawing should be made against gold collateral.

Mr. Cabot then inquired about the RFC's attitude toward the proposed three-year market-price tin contract. Mr. Cravens replied that the RFC would be perfectly agreeable to making such a contract provided satisfactory answers could be found for two questions: (1) Was the operation of the Texas City tin smelter to be continued? and (2) How could RFC market the tin obtained under the contract? He realized the truth of Mr. Cabot's statement that a refusal to purchase Bolivia's tin would be equivalent to "cutting Bolivia's throat," but he was answering the question purely from RFC's standpoint, without reference to considerations of foreign policy or national security. On this basis he believed that the RFC would have to recommend to the President, and probably to the Congress, that the tin smelter be shut down.

Mr. Cabot inquired whether RFC would make the contract if it received a Presidential directive, or whether it would be necessary to obtain authorization from Congress. Mr. McKinnon pointed out that authority already existed for operating the smelter through June 30, 1956, but said that there was some question about appropriations for this purpose.

General Edgerton was then called on to express the views of the Export-Import Bank regarding the proposed loan for agricultural development. He said that the Bank's charter provided no basis for loans except on a project basis, and he thought that it would require a considerable period of time to work out appropriate projects. He indicated further that the Bank was rather cool toward the general idea of making any further loans to Bolivia.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 22, 1953.

Subject: Bolivian Tin

Participants: The President
The Secretary of State
The Secretary of the Treasury
Mr. Arthur S. Flemming, Director, Office of Defense Mobilization
Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower
Mr. John M. Cabot, Assistant Secretary of State

After a preliminary exchange of pleasantries, the President told Mr. Cabot to explain the problem which the latter briefly did. The President said that in his opinion the question of raw materials was vital since increasing quantities were being used everywhere while supplies were getting scarcer. It would be much better to have tin in Fort Knox than gold. The President also alluded to the security aspects of Bolivian tin. He mentioned that the Congressman from the Texas City district had first brought the matter to his attention and that it had then been further underlined by Dr. Milton Eisenhower.

Secretary Humphrey pointed out that the stockpile of 245,000 tons would be filled under existing contracts by August. The RFC was already obligated under existing contracts to take large quantities of tin at a price far above the present world market and, moreover, the average price of the stockpile tin was very high. Purchase of further tin at present contract prices would be very expensive and could not be justified. The Texas City Smelter was losing $15 million annually.

The President expressed chagrin at the heavy losses involved but again emphasized his views regarding the desirability of having raw materials.

Secretary Dulles pointed out that we tended to buy everything Latin America could produce at very high prices when we were at war and to tell them of our eternal friendship for them. Then at the end of the war, we would stop our contracts, let their economies slide, wreck the war-built production and wait until the next war before we again started to buy Latin American products at fancy prices. Someday we would find that Latin America was not willing to sell them at any price because the countries would have become unfriendly.

A general discussion then followed of prices, amounts in tonnage, the liability of an ore stockpile to deteriorate, etc. Secretary Humphrey said it would be better simply to stockpile tin ore than to continue to operate the Texas City Smelter. If we ever needed to use our ore we could build a new smelter before we used up our stockpile. Mr. Cabot brought out through a question that of the Texas City Smelter's annual loss only $2 million was due to operation and the other $13 million to the drop in prices of tin.

The President referred to the low quality of the ore and suggested that some bargaining might be done about prices. He referred tentatively to buying say 10,000 tons per annum with a two-year contract.

Mr. Cabot hurriedly sketched the Department's plan. The President thought that we could move ahead immediately on the Point IV aid and spoke of the possibility of using a tin contract as a lien to guarantee the proposed $10 million loan for agricultural development.

Secretary Humphrey pointed out that there were many areas in the U.S. which had been hit when war production ended. He mentioned particularly the coal mines. The President said that it would have been helpful if we had big coal stocks above ground; it was very difficult to explain to the soldiers in 1943 why John L. Lewis could call a coal strike.

Secretary Humphrey suggested that the matter be placed in the hands of tin experts who could come up with a really good technical solution. Dr. Milton Eisenhower emphasized the importance of doing something before his party reached La Paz and Mr. Cabot pointed out that no one could say how long the situation in Bolivia would hold together. It was generally agreed that the matter should be referred as quickly as possible to tin experts and, at Mr. Cabot's suggestion, that a representative would thereafter be sent to La Paz to negotiate a tin contract. It was felt that the announcement that such an expert would be sent would in itself be sufficient to put a fair wind behind the party's visit.

On going out, Mr. Cabot suggested that some announcement of the subject discussed might be made to the press as a means of indicating the interest in the Bolivian problem in the higher quarters. Dr. Milton Eisenhower took this up and the announcement was subsequently made.

(b) Bolivian Tin Purchases—Secretary Humphrey urged that the United States make an outright grant to Bolivia which could be used for developing agriculture or other aspects of an effective economy rather than continuing to purchase low-grade tin which cannot be smelted economically. Gen. Smith warned that such a policy would create much unemployment, which would foster the growth of Communism, and he urged continued stockpiling of tin. Gov. Stassen suggested that tin purchases be continued for one year while other more effective programs could be developed.

It was agreed that (a) purchase of Bolivian tin should be continued for one year to the amount of 10,000 tons,[2] (b) MSA should be prepared to undertake a solution of the Bolivian economic situation at the end of that period; (c) the decision on purchasing tin after the one year should remain open for further discussion; and (d) the establishment of a study team and other projects agreed upon at the meeting with the President on July 2nd[3] should be carried out.

In telegram 5, to Quito, dated July 3, 1953, for Dr. Eisenhower and Mr. Cabot, Acting Secretary Smith stated in part that at the meeting, attended by Messrs. Humphrey, Dodge, Cravens, Flemming, and Waugh, "tentative decison taken not to buy any tin concentrates because of domestic fiscal situation." He further stated that this decision was reconsidered by the President and the Cabinet on the morning of July 3. (120.220/7–353)

The Secretary of State to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration (Stassen)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 2, 1953.

DEAR HAROLD: A situation dangerous to the security of the United States is developing in Bolivia, and urgent action is required to meet it. Because of a sharp drop in the price of Bolivia's principal export commodity, tin, owing to the imminent cessation of United States tin stockpiling, Bolivia faces economic chaos. Apart from humanitarian considerations, the United States cannot afford to take either of the two risks inherent in such a development: (a) the danger that Bolivia would become a focus of Communist infection in South America, and (b) the threat to the United States position in the Western Hemisphere which would be posed by the spectacle of United States indifference to the fate of another member of the inter-American community.

Various possibilities of assistance to Bolivia (including the payment of a subsidy price for tin and the extension of a balance-of-payments loan) have been examined and rejected as inconsistent with other United States policy objectives or otherwise unsuitable.[2] It would appear that the most appropriate means of assistance would be a Mutual Security Act grant for the purchase of basic foodstuffs and other essential import items, with the local currency funds generated by the grant being employed to speed Bolivia's progress toward a balanced economy which would not be dependent upon fluctuations in the world minerals market. I urge that you make an allotment of $10 to $15 million for this purpose.

I attach a memorandum[3] which sets forth this proposal in detail.

If this proposal meets with your approval, officers of the Department of State are prepared to meet with members of your staff on an urgent basis to discuss means of implementation.

Sincerely yours, JOHN FOSTER DULLES

A balance-of-payments loan to Bolivia would have no satisfactory prospect of repayment. There is serious question whether the legislative history of the Famine Relief Act would make use of this authority completely appropriate to the immediate circumstances in Bolivia." Aid for Bolivia

6. Mr. Nolting reported that additional aid for Bolivia had been agreed to by interested government agencies and that the only question that remained was the source of funds. Mr. Stassen had proposed using $5,000,000 from appropriations for famine relief. Mr. Stassen had checked with certain members of Congress and received a favorable reaction to the use of famine relief funds. He had now prepared a memorandum [1] for the President which was in the Department for the Secretary's concurrence. Mr. Nolting's recommendation was that the Secretary sign the memorandum requesting Presidential determination in favor of using famine relief funds. Mr. Kalijarvi said that the difficulty in using famine relief funds was that the Bolivian case was a continuing problem. He recommended, however, that the Secretary sign the memorandum to the President on the condition that procedures for the use of such aid be regularized in the future. General Smith recommended that the Secretary sign the memorandum since Mr. Stassen had worked the problem out with Congressional groups. Mr. Morton said that he shared Mr. Kalijarvi's fears since our position before Congress had been that famine relief would not be used for straight economic aid purposes.[2]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 4, 1953.

Subject: United States-Bolivian Relations in General

Participants: Walter Guevara Arze, Foreign Minister of Bolivia[1]
Victor Andrade, Ambassador of Bolivia
ARA—Mr. Cabot
OSA—Mr. Hudson

In response to a reference by Mr. Cabot to the visit of the Eisenhower mission,[2] Señor Guevara remarked that the visit had produced an excellent and far-reaching effect in Bolivia. The enthusiastic reception which the people had given to Dr. Eisenhower had been entirely spontaneous. This enthusiasm, which had endured, had provided an important element of the base on which the Bolivian Government was now erecting its policy of open friendship with the United States.

The subject of the United States aid program for Bolivia then came up, and the Foreign Minister expressed the deep gratitude of his Government, saying that this assistance would help Bolivia cover the gap in her essential payments during the period for which the assistance was scheduled.[3] However, he pointed out, without further assistance of some sort in the following year Bolivia's position would be even more desperate than it had been when the present program was conceived. Bolivia's foreign exchange costs, to feed her people, to keep the mining industry in operation, and to prevent the collapse of the national economic structure, were all fixed costs, whereas the price of tin was still going down and Bolivia lost $715,000 for every drop of [3] In a briefing memorandum prepared for Mr. Cabot, dated Nov. 3, 1953, Deputy Director of the Office of South American Affairs Bennett stated that the U.S. program of assistance to Bolivia amounted to $31.3 million: $17.9 million in tin purchases for the stockpile; $9 million in Famine Relief and MSA grants; $2 million in emergency technical assistance; and a $2.4 million increase in the Export-Import Bank credit (No. 467) authorized Oct. 10, 1949, for the construction of the Cochabamba–Santa Cruz highway (611.20/11–353).

one cent per pound. The United States assistance program would keep Bolivia from drowning for the time being, but additional help was needed to get Bolivia across the river—by which the Foreign Minister meant that Bolivia needed assistance for economic diversification which would remedy her fatal dependence on the price of tin.

Mr. Cabot replied that the Department faced domestic difficulties in justifying the kind of additional assistance which the Bolivians desired. He hoped that the Bolivian Government would do everything in its power to put us into a position from which at a later date we should be able to justify further assistance to Bolivia.

The Foreign Minister inquired whether Mr. Cabot had in mind any particular persons in the Bolivian Government. Mr. Cabot responded in the negative, and said that an example of the sort of action he had in mind was the settlement of the Patiño compensation issue. Sr. Guevara stated that a Supreme Resolution ratifying the retention agreements made in June and July with all the large companies was ready and would be issued immediately. Regarding the problem of evaluation of the expropriated properties, he said that his Government had invited the companies to initiate negotiations immediately and was awaiting the designation by the companies of representatives for this purpose.

Mr. Cabot said that another case he had in mind was that of Panagra, against which the Bolivian Government has made tax claims on a basis which Panagra considers inequitable. Señor Guevara said that neither Señor Elío, the La Paz representative of Panagra, nor Mr. Shea,[4] the President of Panagra, whom he had seen recently, had ever mentioned this subject to him, but that he would look into it.

Mr. Cabot then brought up the case of the Bolivia Tin Corporation, a corporation registered in Maine, whose Bolivian properties have been "intervened" by the Bolivian Government. The Foreign Minister expressed surprise at our interest in this case, saying that he had supposed that Bolivia Tin was a British investment, since the British Ambassador had been to see him about it. He pointed out that there was always a danger that non-American capital interests might, as he contended the Patiño interests had done, put up the facade of incorporation in the United States and the sale of a few shares to American citizens in order to be able to claim the protection of the American Government.

Mr. Cabot recognized this danger and told Mr. Hudson that we must be sure of the extent of the American ownership of Bolivia Tin. Mr. Hudson said that an effort was already being made to determine this factor. We were not sure that there was any substantial American interest in the firm, and furthermore we were not presuming to pass judgment on the facts and the law in this case. However, we were concerned about the background of emotionalism and agitation of public opinion which marked the case, and we hoped that the Foreign Minister would take an interest in it to insure that the company should obtain fair treatment and that the case should not become a source of friction between our two Governments. We believed that this case and that of Panagra were potentially important as sources of misunderstanding of Bolivian policy by foreign capital. Bolivia had proclaimed that its nationalization of the Big Three was a special case and that far from intending to pursue a policy of nationalization it wished to attract foreign private capital. In order to obtain general acceptance of the sincerity of these pronouncements Bolivia would have to be especially careful to avoid misunderstanding abroad of its handling of cases like these two.

Mr. Cabot pointed out that the United States policy of assistance to Bolivia had already provoked considerable criticism in this country. We had to be mindful of this criticism, and we should be less capable of helping Bolivia in proportion as any actions of the Bolivian Government might give rise to an increase in such criticism.

Referring to a Wall Street Journal article of November 2 criticizing Bolivia and United States policy toward Bolivia, Señor Guevara said that the attitude of the Journal appeared to be based on bad information. He planned to go and talk with the editors of the Journal and also to write them a letter explaining that nationalization was not a policy of the Bolivian Government. He wondered what advice Mr. Cabot could give him regarding this proposed action. Mr. Cabot suggested that he talk with the editors first and decide afterward whether to write a letter.

The Foreign Minister then pursued further the topic of Bolivia's hospitality to foreign private capital. His Government, he said, had reversed the policy of the preceding governments with regard to petroleum investments and now had an open-door policy, as evidenced concretely by the favorable terms which it had accorded to Glen McCarthy.[5] The Government was also studying legislation which would provide for the participation of private capital in the operation of certain of the nationalized mines.

[5] A U.S. citizen of Houston, Texas, to whom the Bolivian Government granted oil concession rights in southern Bolivia; documentation pertaining to the McCarthy concession is in file 811.05124.

Mr. Cabot said that he wished to make it clear that the United States Government was not seeking to force an entry for new private capital in Bolivia. The admission of new private capital was a matter for the Bolivian Government itself to decide on the basis of the interests of Bolivia. The only thing that we were insisting on was that American capital should be respected once it had entered Bolivia, because otherwise difficulties would arise in relations between our two Governments.

Señor Guevara then developed the idea that the only practicable fields of operation for private capital in Bolivia today were mining and petroleum exploitation. Bolivia would try to attract capital to these fields, but under present circumstances it could not be hoped that foreign private capital would participate in the agricultural development of the country. He wished to emphasize that Bolivia would have to rely on funds from public sources for agricultural development. Mr. Cabot expressed the view that when the Bolivian economy had been stabilized private capital might very well come to Bolivia for all sorts of purposes. For the moment, he agreed with the Foreign Minister that mining and petroleum exploitation were the only likely fields for private investment. It was still doubtful that much private capital could be attracted even to these fields, and a great deal would depend on the attitude and efforts of the Bolivian Government itself.

Ambassador Andrade brought up the subject of Bolivia's need for further assistance after the expiration of the present aid program. Mr. Cabot said that there were at present too many variables, or unknown factors, for him to be able to give an answer on this point. He listed these variables as follows:

1) The future of United States aid programs in general is in doubt.
2) United States loan policy has still not been fully defined. He expected that the Eisenhower report would bring this question to a head and that it would be sharply debated in coming months, but he thought that this debate would produce a decision. Since he could not anticipate the action of Congress, however, he was not in a position to promise anything.
3) We were still uncertain how solidly we could get Congressional and public opinion behind us in recommending further assistance to Bolivia.
4) Much would also depend on what the Bolivians did to help themselves.

After expressing the determination of Bolivia to take all possible measures of self-help, the Foreign Minister said that he appreciated our inability to give him immediate answers to his questions but that he did want to pose the problem as widely and completely as possible among officials of the United States Government who would be concerned with it. With the present aid program Bolivia could get along until June 1954. This aid would have been thrown away, however, if Bolivia were left to sink after that date. To escape drowning Bolivia would need further emergency assistance (food) and would also need help toward increasing her domestic agricultural production. The $2 million of emergency technical assistance would serve for little more than an experimental program. He expected that self-help measures which his Government was taking would result by the end of 1955 in the covering of substantial parts of Bolivia's present deficit in sugar and petroleum products. However, these efforts and the emergency technical assistance already promised would not in themselves suffice to solve the problem, and Bolivia would need additional developmental aid. He realized that this need was not immediate, since Bolivia could probably not immediately make good use of a large developmental credit; but he did want to prepare the way for developmental loans and further grant assistance in the near future. For this purpose he wanted to give the full background of the Bolivian situation personally to appropriate officials in the Department of State, the Treasury Department, the Foreign Operations Administration, the Export-Import Bank, the International Bank, and the International Monetary Fund. He also wished to pay a visit to Dr. Milton Eisenhower. Mr. Cabot said that the Department would help set up meetings for him with the United States officials whom he wanted to see, and suggested that he make his own arrangements directly with the IBRD and the IMF.

Mr. Cabot expressed doubt whether the IBRD would be able to consider loans to Bolivia in view of the status of default of Bolivia's foreign indebtedness. The Foreign Minister replied that, while Bolivia was obviously not in a position immediately to initiate payments on the defaulted debt, he was prepared to discuss this subject with the IBRD and try to make some satisfactory arrangement.[6] Although Bolivia's present situation was very difficult, her long-term prospects were promising.

The Foreign Minister then inquired about Mr. Cabot's views on the present political situation in Bolivia, remarking that the Government was now under attack by the Communists and that these attacks had been of such severity as to provoke the Government into arresting the editor of the Communist newspaper El Pueblo.

Mr. Cabot asked that the Bolivian Government not misunderstand the position of this Government regarding the Communist problem in Bolivia. We should be very seriously concerned if the Bolivian Government should permit Communists to hold official positions or if there were any Communist influence on the actions of the Government. Further, we were disturbed about attacks in the United States on our [6] In a memorandum of conversation between Mr. Cabot and Foreign Minister Guevara Arze, drafted by Mr. Hudson, dated Nov. 23, 1953, the Foreign Minister was reported to have stated, inter alia, that he was authorized to talk with representatives of the Foreign Bondholders Protective Council regarding Bolivia's defaulted external debt. policy toward Bolivia which were based on the allegation that the Government of Bolivia was pro-Communist. However, we had not completely suppressed the Communist party in the United States, and we were not asking that the Bolivian Government do so in Bolivia.

Señor Guevara stated categorically that there were no Communists in any important positions in the Bolivian Government. Ambassador Andrade said that he had interpreted United States assistance to Bolivia as meaning that we were convinced that the Paz Estenssoro Government was non-Communist. Mr. Cabot assured him that we would not have assisted a government which we considered Communist.

Señor Guevara stated that there were a good many important people in Bolivia who were anti-American but were not Communists. In fact, he said, the Government itself had until recently been split between two groups, one of which maintained that the United States was interested only in conserving its imperialist hegemony in this hemisphere and was not concerned about the fate of the subject peoples, whereas the other group had maintained that it was the policy of the United States to help the Latin American peoples achieve their aspirations because the United States believed that such progress by its neighbors was in its own interest. The present program of aid to Bolivia had placed the latter group in a position of dominance.

Mr. Cabot commented that we had indeed consulted our own interests in reaching the decision to assist Bolivia, as he had explained frankly in his address on October 14.[7]

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador in Bolivia (Sparks)[1]

SECRET [LA PAZ,] November 23, 1953.

I called on President Paz Saturday morning, November 21, at 11:00 by appointment.

The President told me that it had been decided to postpone indefinitely his visit to Chile. He explained confidentially that it would have been imperative in any joint statement released to the press during the course of the visit to have included a reference to Bolivia's aspiration for a port on the Pacific. The President made it clear that it was not Bolivia's intention at this time to raise this question with Chile since Bolivia had more than sufficient internal problems without reopening the port question. Nevertheless, Bolivia considered that a reference to the port problem could not have been omitted in a press statement during the visit since the opposition would have seized upon this and would have charged the Paz Government with having abandoned this legitimate Bolivian aspiration. The President added that, on the other hand, President Ibañez is being pressed with many local Chilean problems in view of which neither he nor the Chilean Government were inclined to have a statement on the port question included in any press release during the course of the visit. Therefore, it was mutually agreed that the contemplated visit be postponed until a more appropriate time.

The President reminded me of a previous statement by him that he intended to take a more forthright action against Bolivian Communists after his return from his visit to Chile. He confided that the timing on this action was influenced by the fact that there is an articulate Communist group in Chile which, if the action had been taken prior to his arrival in Chile, would have plagued him throughout his visit. However, now that the visit had been postponed, he would begin to take measures immediately. He stated that there would be a meeting of the Political Committee of the MNR Party on Friday, November 27, which would outline the position of the Party with respect to Communism, following which these principles would be applied within the Party and throughout Bolivia. In this connection the President inquired if the Acting Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had shown me the handbill issued prior to the syndical elections at Catavi, Llallagua and Siglo XX. It will be recalled that this handbill in its appeal to the miners contained the significant phrase "¡Afuera los Comunistas!" The President was obviously gratified that the miners had overwhelmingly elected anti-Communist syndical officers.

. . . . . .

I mentioned to the President that I had just discussed with the Acting Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs the position of the United States with respect to the United States nationals who had been dismissed from the United Nations, and the decision of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal that the action of the Secretary General[2] had been illegal.[3] I outlined briefly the problem and added that the Acting Under Secretary planned, after consultation with the President, to instruct the Bolivian delegation to the UN to support the United States position. The President told me that Bolivia would consistently support United States positions in matters of this nature and that he would direct the Acting Under Secretary to instruct the Bolivian delegation at the United Nations.

[3] For documentation on this subject, see vol. III, pp. 312 ff.

I then brought up the tax problem of Panagra which has been carrying on conversations with the Director of Revenue over a period of months with respect to its tax obligations in Bolivia. I explained that previous Governments had implicitly decided that Panagra was exempt from taxation in Bolivia, but that the Director of Revenue had reviewed this question and had reached the conclusion that Panagra was liable to income tax and had issued a Bill of Assessment. In establishing the tax due the Director had taken as a basis Panagra's revenues in Bolivia and had deducted only expenditures in Bolivia. I observed that this appeared to be an inequitable basis for calculating the tax since no provision was made for depreciation of equipment, maintenance of equipment which was carried on in Lima and Miami, and innumerable other important operating expenditures made outside of Bolivia. I also pointed out that receipts included passenger fares and air express and freight charges to ultimate destinations of which Panagra received only a part since the balance had to be paid to other carriers. I stressed that Panagra was not trying to avoid tax obligations in Bolivia and that, with a view to reaching a formula equitable to the interests of Bolivia and Panagra, it had suggested a system which had already been accepted by Chile, Peru, Ecuador and Panama. I explained that this involved an annual statement of the profits or losses of Panagra and their apportionment in accordance with the actual miles flown in Bolivia. I added that officials of the Department had examined the Panagra documents and were in agreement as to the apparent reasonableness of Panagra's position in the light of normal practices in other countries, and that it was the desire of the Department that a fair and equitable basis be established for determining the tax.

The President was not informed of the discussions that had been proceeding between Panagra and the Bolivian tax authorities. I informed him that Panagra planned to discuss the problem with the Minister of Finance on Monday, November 23 and to appeal the decision of the Director of Revenue, having already made the deposit of the portion of the assessed tax required by Bolivian law. The President appeared to be favorably impressed with the reasonableness of the position of Panagra and said that he would speak with the Minister of Finance and the Director of Revenue.[4]

The President told me that the Council of Ministers on Friday, November 20 had approved and signed a decree ratifying the retention agreements signed by the Corporación Minera de Bolivia and the Patiño, Hochschild and Aramayo groups. He furnished me a copy of the decree which will be transmitted to the Department under cover of a despatch.[5]

I then raised the question of critical comment appearing in the American press, referring in particular to the open letter of former President Hertzog[6] which had appeared in the New York Times on November 11. I also mentioned the previous comments in the Herald Tribune, the Journal of Commerce, the Wall Street Journal and the American Metals Market. I said that I had discussed this problem with Foreign Minister Guevara at the airport on November 13 when he was returning to the United States, and that he had stated that he planned to call upon the editors of the principal American newspapers and explain the Bolivian situation. I expressed the hope that he would carry out this intention since the open letter of former President Hertzog is also critical of the United States in that the United States is virtually accused of supporting a Communist-dominated Government in Bolivia. The President is most sensitive to this criticism. He said that this matter is very much in his mind and that steps are being taken to counteract its adverse effects.

I took advantage of the opportunity to inquire as to developments following the abortive attempt of November 9th.[7] The President said that the situation is entirely under control and that the Government will take legal action against those responsible, in conformity with Bolivian law. He volunteered that the leaders and adherents of the FSB were a desperate, determined group and that they might make further efforts to achieve their objective. However, the Bolivian police were continuing their vigilance and search for arms and that the latter to date had been very productive. At this point I mentioned that I was being approached by individuals and groups who alleged that conditions in the Panóptico, in particular, and the detention camps, in general, were inhuman and that brutal methods were being used to extract information from the political prisoners. I added that this, of course, is an internal matter of Bolivia, but I could not but exhibit a humanitarian interest in the welfare of these persons. I added that I was unaware of any physical changes that had taken place in the Panóptico over the years; nevertheless I did not believe that, if the conditions there or in the detention camps were as described, this could be in the long-term interest of Bolivia or conducive to the pacification of the Bolivian scene which I understood was the ultimate objective of the President and his Government. (The Embassy has received many allegations of brutality by the police in extracting information, but has received virtually no proof that this is a common practice except that physical conditions in the Panóptico are, and probably have always been, repulsive and degrading.) The President replied that these conditions were undoubtedly exaggerated although "the methods of police all over the world are rough". I gained the impression that the President does not condone such "rough measures" by the police, but that the information obtained by the police permitted the timely discovery of plots and of the location of clandestine arms and ammunition which effectively prevented greater bloodshed among the Bolivian people.

I mentioned that the Embassy had received from the Minister of Economy, Augusto Cuadros Sanchez, the Bolivian request for the distribution of the 9 million dollars of food grants and that no final determination had yet been made with respect to the balance of 1.3 million dollars. The President seemingly had not understood that this amount was designed to be utilized for acquisitions in United States currency which would permit greater implementation of the local currency counterpart in the plans for the diversification of the Bolivian economy. I explained that FOA and the Department had intended that this amount be set aside from the grants for that purpose, or that should this amount be used for further food commodities then the Bolivian Government would commit itself to set aside from its own foreign currency availabilities an equivalent amount for that purpose. I said that I had discussed briefly this matter with the Foreign Minister on November 13 and that he planned to discuss it during his visit to Washington. The President appreciated this suggestion of FOA and the Department. No decision has yet been reached except the possible employment of a part of this amount for the purchase of pumps for the irrigation project at Villa Montes. The President stated that the possibilities would be given intensive study and he would inform me later as to the decisions that might be reached.

PROBABLE DEVELOPMENTS IN BOLIVIA[2]

THE PROBLEM

To assess the current situation and probable developments in Bolivia, particularly the character and stability of the present regime.

CONCLUSIONS

1. Bolivia is one of the most economically retarded and politically unstable countries in Latin America. The present National Revolutionary Movement (MNR) regime is one of the few broadly based governments which Bolivia has had. It enjoys wide popular support, particularly from labor and middle class elements.

2. The only significance of Bolivia's extremely weak military and para-military forces lies in their ability to influence the domestic political situation. At present the MNR firmly controls all three components of Bolivia's forces—the Army (which includes the Air Force), the police, and the civilian militia. If any two of these groups combined against the government, however, they could almost certainly seize power.

3. While the general orientation of the MNR is left of center, dominant influence in the government is now exercised by the party's moderate wing. Although it has accepted some support from Bolivia's two small Communist groups, the MNR is making increased efforts to reduce Communist influence. Nevertheless, it has hesitated to launch a frontal assault on the Communists and they retain some influence, especially in the school system and among organized labor.

4. Although the MNR government was critical of the US when it first came to power, it has become increasingly pro-US in its outlook because of US support of the regime. However, should the government lose confidence in US support, it almost certainly would revert to an anti-US orientation.

5. The MNR's ambitious program to expand and diversify Bolivia's economy and lessen its dependence on tin exports is the most vigorous attack to date on Bolivia's basic economic problems, but it is unlikely to bring about substantial increases in output in less than two years.

[1] A cover sheet and dissemination notice are not printed.

[2] A note on the cover sheet reads as follows: "The Intelligence Advisory Committee concurred in this estimate on 16 March 1954. The FBI abstained, the subject being outside of its jurisdiction. The following member organizations of the Intelligence Advisory Committee participated with the Central Intelligence Agency in the preparation of this estimate: The intelligence organizations of the Departments of State, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and The Joint Staff."

Meanwhile, owing largely to a sharp decline in tin prices, Bolivia faces growing economic difficulties, although emergency US aid has averted economic collapse.

6. After mid-1954, when emergency US aid will be exhausted, the government's stability and political orientation will depend greatly upon its ability to obtain additional outside support. If it can secure such aid, the MNR will probably continue its present moderate course without any serious threat to its continuance in power.

7. In the absence of external aid, the government would soon face an economic crisis and its stability would become increasingly tenuous. The MNR's labor wing would probably demand and receive an increasingly important role in the government. It might gain a controlling voice in the government, possibly with Communist support. Such a leftist regime would almost certainly be turbulent and short lived.

8. Moreover, to the extent that the present regime moved leftward it would lose much of its moderate support. In these circumstances the chief opposition party, the rightist, ultranationalist Bolivian Socialist Falange (FSB), would probably, over a period of time, amass sufficient backing to bring off a successful coup. Thus sooner or later the present government would almost certainly be overthrown.

9. An FSB regime would not be capable of stabilizing the economic situation without itself receiving substantial external aid. Even with such assistance, the FSB would have difficulty obtaining broad popular support.

10. In any case, the basic weaknesses of the Bolivian political, economic, and social structure are such that no Bolivian government will be able to prevent recurrent unrest and economic crises, and some degree of political instability will persist for some years to come.

11. Further political and economic deterioration would almost certainly increase Communist strength. However, the Communists alone could not gain and maintain control of Bolivia in the foreseeable future.

DISCUSSION

12. Bolivia is one of the most economically retarded and politically unstable countries in Latin America. Formidable geographical obstacles and lack of transportation facilities have hampered national growth. The small population of some 3,500,000 is clustered mostly on the high Andean tableland, while the more fertile but less accessible lowlands to the east are largely undeveloped. Most of the population exists on a subsistence economy. The only developed industry is mining, particularly of tin, which provides the great bulk of government revenues and foreign exchange. Normally slightly over half of Bolivia's tin goes to the UK, and the remainder to the US. The fact that Bolivia is the sole significant Western Hemisphere source of tin gives it considerable strategic importance to the US, although Bolivia normally provides only 10–15 percent of US peacetime requirements.

13. Bolivia's remoteness and poverty in developed resources have greatly retarded its social and political progress. The great bulk of the people are illiterate Indians and mestizos (persons of mixed ethnic origin) who have had no effective voice in national affairs. A small minority of literate whites and mestizos have constituted the effective body politic. The country has been dominated by a still smaller group of large landholders, senior army officers, and representatives of the mining interests. These groups were unable to maintain political stability and showed little effective interest in economic development or social improvement. Bolivia's humiliating defeat in the Chaco War (1932–1935) emphasized the ineptitude of the country's traditional leadership and stimulated the demands of middle class and labor elements for social, economic, and political reform. The continuing inertia of the traditional ruling group in the face of these demands resulted in a progressive decline of its prestige.

14. The National Revolutionary Movement (MNR) was organized by middle class elements in 1941 to press for economic and social reforms. The MNR participated in the Villarroel[3] Administration (1943–1946), but the military elements dominant in that regime prevented the MNR from shaping major policies. Nevertheless, during this period the MNR was able to broaden its political base through its appeal to labor elements, especially to the miners. With the fall of Villarroel the MNR went into eclipse, but the failure of succeeding governments to effect appreciable reforms resulted in a revival of its popularity. In the 1951 presidential balloting the MNR candidate, Victor Paz Estenssoro, received a substantial plurality of the vote of the narrowly restricted electorate, but the incumbent government forestalled his election by Congress by turning over its power to a military junta. In April 1952, however, this junta was overthrown by a revolution organized by the MNR with the support of the police and of armed workers, and Paz Estenssoro was called from exile in Buenos Aires to assume the presidency.

15. The policies of the MNR government, especially its nationalization of the tin mines and agrarian reform, have aroused much interest throughout Latin America. The other Latin American countries are closely watching the US attitude toward the new regime.

Political Situation

16. The MNR, led by President Victor Paz Estenssoro, has formulated the first broad program of economic development and social reform. It has undermined the power of the old ruling groups by purging the Army and creating its own militia, by nationalizing the tin mines, and by instituting agrarian reform. It has broadened the electorate to include the unassimilated Indians and mestizos by decreeing universal suffrage with no literacy requirement, and is making efforts to organize rural labor. Although these measures have incurred the embittered opposition of many in the previous ruling group, they have been generally popular and the net effect has been to strengthen the MNR's political backing.

17. While the MNR regime is authoritarian, it enjoys broad popular support. It has strong backing from urban and farm labor and a probable majority of the middle class professionals, white collar elements, and owners of small and medium-sized farms. The MNR has the support of the powerful mine workers federation of approximately 45,000 members led by Juan Lechin, the leftist Minister of Mines who is the second strongest figure in the present regime. The MNR also controls the other two major labor federations: the factory workers (about 25,000), and transport and communications unions (about 15,000). Moreover, the MNR dominates the Bolivian Labor Central (COB), a council created by the MNR to represent labor at the national level and to strengthen government-labor liaison.

18. However, the MNR is not a homogeneous party, and its coherence is largely dependent on the personal relations among a few key men. Although Paz Estenssoro is the recognized leader and key figure, his party is split roughly into a presently dominant moderate wing, composed largely of middle class elements led by Vice President Siles Suazo and a more radical labor wing led by Lechin. Paz is inclined toward the moderate wing. Thus far his unifying influence, and the feeling of each wing that it needs the other have led both wings to accept compromise solutions on most issues. For example, the labor wing pushed the MNR into immediate nationalization of the tin mines and expropriation of large landholdings, but the moderates prevailed in securing approval of compensation for these properties (although the amount has not yet been agreed upon). The moderates have also successfully resisted labor pressures for sharp wage increases and for greater participation in management of the mines. Should Paz be removed from the scene, Lechin would probably succeed him, although not without some opposition.

19. Leftist Influence in the MNR. Although dominant influence is now exercised by its moderate elements, the general orientation of the MNR is left of center. The leftist cast of the MNR reflects not only the nature of some of its leadership and backing, but also the fact that it rose to power as a revolutionary protest movement against previous conservative regimes. Allegations have been made that the MNR is pro-Communist because it has received varying degrees of Communist support and because many of the objectives of the MNR (nationalization, agrarian reform, etc.) have also been favored by the Communists.

20. In fact, Bolivia's small and divided, but vociferous, Communist groups have been a source of both support for and opposition to the MNR. They represent another manifestation of the same reaction that fostered the MNR, and have drawn their membership from some of the same social groups as has the MNR. They gained a foothold in Bolivia by capitalizing on the growth of resentment against previous regimes and on the Latin American tendency to blame "capitalism" and "Yankee imperialism" for most national ills. Two small parties are currently active, the Stalinist Bolivian Communist Party (PCB) and a Trotskyite group, the Revolutionary Workers Party (POR). The PCB has roughly 2,000 members, drawn mostly from middle class intellectual elements, particularly in the school system. The POR, with roughly 1,000 members, is strongest among organized labor. The two parties present a common anti-US front on foreign policy, but have adopted different tactics on domestic issues. The PCB has followed a policy of conditional support for the MNR; it advocates a "united national front" and is apparently willing to compromise, at least temporarily, its long term objectives. The POR, on the other hand, has been considerably more extreme and has increasingly opposed MNR policies.

21. The advent of the MNR regime has benefited the Communists in Bolivia and they enjoy a considerable degree of government toleration of their activities. However, the MNR's attitude toward the Communists has undergone a considerable evolution since the 1952 revolution. Initially the MNR accepted Communist support in its struggle for power as a matter of expediency. Once in power, however, the MNR has tended to recognize the fundamental rivalry between itself and the Communists, and has gradually adopted a more anti-Communist attitude. It has also recognized that close association with the Communists would diminish its chances of getting US aid. The Communists in turn have become increasingly critical of the MNR.

22. The MNR has made increasing efforts to reduce Communist influence in the government and among labor and agrarian elements. For example, it has removed a number of Communists and suspected Communists from important government and trade union posts, although the Communists retain some influence in the unions and in the school system. While Lechin, among others, cooperated with the Communists before the revolution, thus facilitating the spread of Communist doctrine in the labor movement, he and the POR are now rivals for control of labor. However, the MNR has hesitated to launch a frontal assault on the Communists because of: (a) the conditional support it has so far received from the PCB; (b) its need to draw upon PCB-influenced groups for technical and administrative personnel; and (c) its far greater concern over the threat from the right and its desire to avoid exposing both flanks simultaneously.

23. The Opposition from the Right. The rightist Bolivian Socialist Falange (FSB) constitutes the chief opposition to the MNR. The FSB, a small but militant ultranationalist group drawn mostly from conservative elements among the middle class, has become the focal point for those opposed to the MNR, such as high ranking army officers removed by the MNR, the expropriated tin interests, and some large landowners. Some members of the Church hierarchy also are in sympathy with the FSB, although the general Church attitude apparently is one of toleration toward the present government. The FSB denounces the MNR as Communist dominated and seeks to overthrow it in favor of an authoritarian conservative regime. However, the FSB has so far been unable to gain much popular support, and its present capabilities for a coup are limited. Close MNR surveillance and security measures have reduced it largely to clandestine activity. Many FSB and other opposition leaders have been forced into exile. The FSB is also weak in the key La Paz area, control of which has usually been essential to a successful coup.

24. Military and Para-Military Forces. The only significance of Bolivia's extremely weak military and para-military forces lies in their ability to influence the domestic political situation. At present the MNR firmly controls all three components of Bolivia's forces—the Army (which includes the Air Force), the police and the civilian militia. No one of these groups could seize power if both others opposed it, but any two of them combined could almost certainly seize power.

25. The Army, the bulwark of previous governments, was shattered by the 1952 revolution, but the MNR has rebuilt it to some extent. It now numbers approximately 10,000 and consists largely of short-term conscripts who receive little more than basic training. Its usable equipment consists largely of light infantry weapons. The Army Air Force has 454 men, 42 of them pilots, and 51 aircraft, mostly trainers. Its sole tactical unit consists of seven C–47's. The MNR has purged the Army and the Air Force and keeps them under close surveillance. Most active officers are probably sympathetic toward the basic objectives of the regime. The regiments in the vital La Paz area and in the mining center of Oruro are the most dependable because of higher pay and careful screening. However, many officers are disturbed by the leftist and alleged pro-Communist tendencies within the MNR; some of the younger ones are susceptible to the influence of various exiled officers who support the FSB.

26. There are also 4,300 National Police, mostly long-service personnel, armed with light weapons. Except for the Army regiments in La Paz and Oruro, the police are probably the most efficient force in Bolivia, but are too few by themselves to cope with either the Army or the militia. They supported the MNR in the 1952 revolution and are now loyal to the regime.

27. The civilian militia, numbering 20,000–30,000, is composed in part of MNR party units directly responsible to President Paz and in part of worker units controlled by the MNR labor leaders. The MNR organized the militia from the armed workers and other groups which supported the 1952 revolution in order to bring them under control and to provide a counterweight to the Army. Although the militia is very poorly organized and trained, amounting in some cases to little more than an armed mob, large numbers of them are fanatically loyal to the regime. They are particularly strong in La Paz and the mining areas.

Economic Situation

28. Bolivia's economic growth is hampered by formidable obstacles to communication; low levels of literacy, health, and living conditions; lack of investment capital; and Indian resistance to change. At least two-thirds of the population is engaged in agriculture and most farming is on a subsistence level. The small amount of commercial agriculture has been increasingly inadequate to meet the needs of the nonagricultural population. Thus Bolivia has to import a large part of its food. Industrial development, aside from mining, is limited to a few simple processing and fabricating industries; it is retarded by the smallness of the local market, high transportation costs, and the inadequacy of domestic raw materials and fuels. Thus such demand as exists for manufactured goods must also be satisfied mostly from abroad.

29. Under these conditions Bolivia's economy is largely dependent upon mineral exports, mostly tin, antimony, and tungsten. Tin exports have normally supplied about 70 percent of Bolivia's foreign exchange and 90 percent of government revenues. However, Bolivia is an increasingly marginal tin producer and highly vulnerable to fluctuations in the world tin market. Since World War II, the declining tin content of Bolivia's ore and higher extraction costs have weakened Bolivia's competitive position, thus reducing its ability to meet essential import needs. These economic difficulties have been aggravated by chronic governmental inefficiency and maladministration, persistent inflation, and political and social unrest.

30. The MNR has launched an ambitious long-range program to expand and diversify the economy, largely by increasing production of foodstuffs and consumers goods. It hopes thereby to lessen Bolivia's need for extensive imports and consequent dependence on fluctuating exports of tin. The government is stressing development of agricultural, forest, and petroleum resources in the lowlands and the Amazon basin. It is attempting to develop commercial agriculture in place of subsistence farming, to expand rail and highway facilities, and to encourage foreign investment. The MNR is utilizing US and UN technical assistance and has given a concession to private US interests to develop oil deposits in southeast Bolivia.

31. However, the MNR has met serious difficulties in its economic stabilization and development efforts. Its hope that the revenues and assets gained from the nationalized tin mines would stabilize its fiscal position and ease foreign exchange shortages was nullified by the precipitous decline in tin prices which began in April 1953. Moreover, the government also felt compelled to disburse a large part of the liquid assets secured from mine nationalization in bonuses and unemployment compensation. These factors, together with continued governmental inefficiency and poor fiscal management, have intensified one of the most severe inflations in Latin America. The government's attempts to stem the tide by a series of wage, price, and currency stabilization measures have proved largely ineffective.

32. Nevertheless by such means as borrowing on its foreign gold holdings, drawing on its quota in the International Monetary Fund, liquidating exchange reserves, and above all securing emergency US aid, the MNR has at least temporarily staved off economic collapse. A US grant of $9 million, mostly foodstuffs, in October 1953 has helped assure adequate imports until about June 1954, and a $2 million increase in US technical assistance is facilitating a food production program.

Probable Domestic Developments

33. Bolivia's future political stability will depend greatly on the extent to which its government can prevent further economic deterioration and meet development needs. Although the MNR has launched a vigorous attack on Bolivia's basic economic problems, its ability to fulfill its ambitious program is limited not only by lack of capital but by the shortage of skilled administrative and technical personnel, the feeling of insecurity in business circles, and some continued opportunism and corruption in the government. None of the agricultural projects now underway will appreciably increase food production in the next year or two. Although the MNR apparently intends to restrict expropriation to relatively few landowners, uncertainty on this point and occasional agitation over agrarian reform may lead to further declines in food production in areas affected. Moreover, tin prices appear unlikely to rise significantly in the near future. Therefore, we estimate that the MNR is unlikely to be able to bring about substantial increases in agricultural and industrial output in less than two years.

Moreover, completion of the MNR program will require at least five years.

34. Meanwhile, the MNR's ability to retain broad popular support will depend greatly on whether it can meet the immediate problems of inflation and food shortages. Largely as a result of existing US aid further serious economic deterioration is unlikely before mid-1954, and the MNR will probably face no serious political challenge. After mid-1954, however, renewed economic distress is likely unless Bolivia can obtain additional external support. If such aid were secured, the MNR would probably continue its present relatively moderate course; it would probably continue to move slowly on agrarian reform and would attempt to make some compensation payments to the tin interests.

35. On the other hand, without economic aid, the MNR Government would soon exhaust its slender resources and be unable to forestall a further inflationary spiral. Agitation from the right and left, including the MNR labor wing, would almost certainly increase. We believe that in such a case the MNR would feel compelled to move increasingly toward the left to maintain its crucial labor support. The MNR's labor wing would probably demand and receive an increasingly important role in the government. It might gain a controlling voice in the government, possibly with Communist support. However, such a leftist regime would almost certainly be turbulent and short-lived.

36. Moreover, to the extent that the present regime moved leftward it would lose much of its moderate support. In these circumstances the FSB would probably over a period of time amass sufficient backing, including disaffected army and police elements, to bring off a successful coup. Thus, without additional aid, the present government would almost certainly be overthrown sooner or later.

37. An FSB regime would not be capable of stabilizing the economic situation without itself receiving substantial external aid. Even with such assistance, the FSB would have difficulty obtaining broad popular support. In particular, it would face formidable opposition from the MNR.

38. In any case the basic weaknesses of the Bolivian political, economic, and social structure are such that we believe that no Bolivian government, even with substantial external aid, will be able to prevent recurrent economic crises and social unrest from persisting for some years to come. Thus at best the long term outlook is for some degree of political instability.

39. Communist Prospects. So long as the MNR's moderate leadership feels relatively secure in power, it will probably continue its efforts to contain and weaken the Communists. To the extent that the MNR program is successful, the government's ability to curb the Communists would be increased. By the same token, renewed economic deterioration and consequent political unrest would almost certainly lead to an increase in Communist influence. If, in this event, the MNR moved more to the left, it would be more willing to accept Communist support. If the MNR's labor wing went so far as to split off, it would probably cooperate closely with the Communists. Finally, a successful FSB coup would probably lead the MNR as a whole to cooperate at least temporarily with the Communists in attempts to regain power. In any event, the Communists alone could not gain and maintain control of Bolivia in the foreseeable future.

Foreign Relations

40. Bolivia's internal weaknesses, its past military defeats and losses of territory, and its lack of access to the sea have tended to create a national inferiority complex and sense of insecurity. Its long-range aspiration to re-acquire a Pacific port has occasionally caused strained relations with Chile and Peru. Fearful of the intentions of neighboring countries, successive Bolivian regimes, including the MNR, have sought to play foreign interests off against each other, as in the case of Argentina and Brazil. Although preserving cordial relations with Argentina, an important source of foodstuffs, the MNR government is resisting Argentine penetration, and seeking to decrease its dependence on Argentina by developing trade and communications with Brazil.

41. The MNR's program has aroused much sympathetic interest in Latin America, and only Peru has had a strongly unfavorable reaction. Peru fears that the example of the MNR program may lead to similar demands in Peru and that the MNR might encourage the Odria Government's opponents. Conversely, the MNR fears that its rightist opponents, many of whom have taken refuge in Peru, may secure Peruvian assistance for a coup.

42. Bolivia's policy toward the US is primarily determined by its desire for US economic support. Nevertheless, with the growth of popular demands for change which culminated in the MNR coup, there has been a tendency to blame alleged US "imperialism" for backing the tin interests and for not helping Bolivia sufficiently, especially in times of economic stress. This latent anti-US sentiment has been widely exploited by political leaders, including the Communists, to blame the US for Bolivia's woes. When the MNR first came to power, domestic political exigencies and its uncertainty as to US intentions made it quite critical of the US. As a result of subsequent US aid and the tolerant US attitude toward the regime, however, the MNR has become increasingly pro-US in its outlook and has taken the position that Bolivia's interests will be best served by cooperating with the US. However, should the government come to feel that the US was not supporting it, active anti-US feelings would almost certainly increase again. Bolivia has generally supported the US in the UN on important issues between the US and the Soviet Bloc, although like most Latin American states it has been less willing to follow the US lead on economic, colonial, and racial questions. In event of general war, Bolivia would almost certainly cooperate with the US.

43. At present, Bolivia has very limited relations with the Soviet Bloc. There are no Bloc diplomatic missions in La Paz, although the Czech and Hungarian legations in Buenos Aires are accredited to Bolivia. Bolivia's trade with the Bloc is also insignificant. However, continuing economic difficulties would stimulate greater Bolivian interest in closer diplomatic and trade relations with the Bloc, and thereby render Bolivian opinion vulnerable to Communist propaganda. In these circumstances, the USSR, by applying economic warfare measures to Bolivia, could secure important psychological advantages there and elsewhere in Latin America.[4]

Memorandum by the Secretary of the Army (Stevens) to the Department of State[1]

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, April 22, 1954.

Subject: Extension of Army Mission Agreement with Bolivia

1. Reference is made to your memorandum of 21 December 1953,[2] subject as above, requesting the Department of the Army's views concerning the extension of the Army Mission Agreement with Bolivia.

2. The Department of the Army is currently maintaining a mission in Bolivia of seven officers and five noncommissioned officers at an annual cost to the United States of approximately $95,000. Since 1947, the Bolivian Government has failed to meet its obligation under the terms of the agreement providing for this mission. This failure on the part of Bolivia is a matter of increasing concern to the Department of the Army, particularly in view of the current emphasis on maximum economy in the utilization of manpower and funds.

3. Bolivia has failed to reimburse the Department of the Army for transportation furnished at the behest of that government as stipulated in Article 15 of the agreement. At the close of the fiscal year 1953, the Bolivian Government owed the Department of the Army approximately $85,000 for transportation incident to the outward movement of mission members. At present, the Bolivian Government is unable to meet its obligations with the Grace Line to defray the expenses incident to the return of mission personnel to the United States. The Grace Line will not return mission members to the United States unless guaranteed payment in advance, and since Bolivia cannot make such payment, the Department of the Army has been compelled since June 1953 to pay these additional expenses.

[2] Not printed (724.58/12–2153).

4. The mission is encountering protracted delays with respect to Article 15 of the Agreement whereby Bolivia is obligated to defray the medical expenses of the mission members. The Bolivian Ministry of Defense is slowly reimbursing the mission members for these bills but many have been outstanding for over two years.

5. The Army Mission in Bolivia is making negligible progress in obtaining any tangible results with respect to our government's military program of ultimate standardization of Bolivian military organization, training, doctrine and equipment along U.S. lines. The major obstacles to the attainment of military objectives are lack of funds for the Bolivian Army and political deterrents to military progress. The economic situation in Bolivia and the influences of the leftist elements who look with disdain upon any attempt to build an efficient professional army is resulting in a paucity of appropriations for the Bolivian Army. The lack of funds precludes attendance of Bolivian military students at U.S. Army service schools in the United States or Panama and the purchase of U.S. military equipment. Army officers who are suspected of political thoughts or activities against the present regime are either reassigned to frontier regions or expelled from the Army. Understandably, no Army official in Bolivia dares to become too energetic in building up an efficient army for fear of incurring the consequences of the wrath of the leftist elements in the government.

6. Since the revolution in April 1952, the Bolivian Government has emphasized expansion of the service elements of their army, particularly engineering, transportation and signal, and has endeavored to utilize its army for the economic development of the country. To further such development, increasing assistance has been required from the U.S. Army mission in offering technical advice and instruction in the fields of engineering and communications.

7. At a meeting on 21 September 1952 with the Commanding General, U.S. Army, Caribbean, the President of Bolivia, Victor Paz Estenssoro, explained that his plans for the future of the Bolivian Army were directed toward expansion in technical fields and use in developing the economic resources of the country. He expressed his desire for the continuation of the U.S. Army mission, organized along lines to provide maximum technical assistance for his economic program.

8. The Department of the Army will agree to initiating negotiations with the Bolivian Government with a view to extending the mission agreement in its present form either for a period of four years or indefinitely, provided a settlement of Bolivia's outstanding obligations is effected during these negotiations and appropriate arrangements are made to insure prompt settlement of future obligations. In the event such settlement cannot be achieved, the Department of the Army will reconsider the feasibility of maintaining this mission.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Under Secretary of State (Smith)[1]

OFFICIAL USE ONLY [WASHINGTON,] June 24, 1954.

Subject: Tin Purchase from Bolivia

Pursuant to the recent decision to continue the operation of the Texas City smelter, the RFC is now negotiating with Bolivia a purchase contract for tin concentrates.[2] After reviewing its production costs, RFC has offered to Bolivia the same terms as the September 23, 1953 contract, with the exception that an additional deduction will be made ammounting to approximately $350,000 on the total contract of about $20 million. The Bolivians object on the grounds that this action is not justified and will be resented in Bolivia.[3]

The present contract negotiations are in the nature of a commercial operation and therefore the RFC feels justified in insisting upon the additional deduction. The RFC feels that it cannot agree to other terms in the absence of specific authorization to do so. Costs of operating the smelter have increased, but the processing of Bolivian ores is only a part of the operation. RFC acknowledges that its production costs are necessarily estimates; assessing the increase among various phases of the operation is largely a matter of bookkeeping.

[1] Drafted by John L. Topping of the Office of South American Affairs and cleared with Mr. Atwood, but not signed by Mr. Holland.

[2] A memorandum by Mr. McKinnon to the Administrator of the RFC (Cravens), dated June 17, 1954, summarizes to its date the course of the negotiations between representatives of the Bolivian Government and the RFC, which took place at Washington during late May and June 1954 (824.2544/6–1754).

[3] A memorandum by Milton Barall of the Office of South American Affairs to Mr. Atwood, dated June 17, 1954, reads in part as follows: "In a conversation I had with Ambassador Andrade on June 15, he became quite emotional about the tin contract now under negotiation with the RFC. He said from his point of view the contract had become successively worse and that at the present time some 'functionary' in the RFC was trying to save the US Government a little money at the expense of Bolivia which was in dire need. He said a saving of $300,000 on smelter charges on a total contract of $20 million would be of little importance to the Government of the United States, whereas it would jeopardize the political value of the contract in Bolivia." (824.2544/6–1754)

The United States has extended $14.5 million in assistance to Bolivia during the current fiscal year. The Administration plans to extend substantial further aid during the new fiscal year in line with US objectives there. In view of the aid being given to Bolivia, the sum involved will become available to that country in one form or another. Moreover, it is my considered opinion that the adverse psychological effects in Bolivia of a contract on the proposed RFC terms would negate the favorable effect we expect from the purchase itself. In view of the present situation in Latin America, I feel that we should avoid adverse reactions in Bolivia.

Recommendation

I strongly urge that you seek Cabinet authorization for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to conclude a contract with Bolivia for the purchase of 12,000 tons of tin on terms identical with those of the contract of September 23, 1953, covering the last purchase from Bolivia.[4]

---

[4]The Department's telegram 177, to La Paz, dated June 28, 1954, reads as follows: "RFC agreed today purchase 12 thousand tons Bolivian tin on terms Sept. 1953 contract with no new deductions. Seek early opportunity convey this decision orally to FonMin and President Paz adding problem considered at top level where decision reached to meet Bol request despite sound justification of original RFC offer." The Secretary of State to the Secretary of the Army (Stevens)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 22, 1954.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to a memorandum of April 22, 1954[2] from Major General James M. Gavin to Mr. George O. Spencer, and to subsequent discussions between officers of the Departments of State and the Army regarding the extension of the Army Mission Agreement with Bolivia.

The Department of State has brought to the attention of the Bolivian Government its outstanding obligations to the United States for transportation expenses for Army Mission members and has urged that some action be taken by that government to settle this obligation. This Department is prepared to follow this matter up in negotiations for extension of the Mission Agreement with a view to arriving at some arrangement for the settlement of this account.

This Department does not, however, believe that the payment of this account should be a prerequisite to extension of the Agreement. The inability of Bolivia to keep this account current is apparently due to its unsatisfactory economic condition which reached very serious proportions when the price of tin dropped drastically last year and resulted in total grants by the United States to bolster the Bolivian economy of $14 millions. The Congress has been requested to appropriate an additional $9 millions for fiscal year 1955. The deficit in Bolivia's foreign exchange budget during 1953 was around $12 millions and the estimated deficit for 1954 is over $21 millions. In the light of this situation, I do not believe that it would be desirable or productive of results to press strongly for payment of this account. I would suggest instead that consideration be given to modifying the existing Agreement to reduce the dollar cost of this Mission to Bolivia and thus avoid further additions to Bolivia's outstanding account. I understand, for example, that the Department of the Army has the authority to assume the cost of transportation of members of the Army Mission and their families and the shipment of their household goods and effects to and from Bolivia and does pay such costs under the terms of similar agreements with Costa Rica[3] and Paraguay.[4]

General Gavin's memorandum also notes that because of the political situation in Bolivia it has not been possible for the Mission to perform as effectively as it should. It appears now that the Bolivian Government is endeavoring to re-establish a professional army. Recent events also show that the Bolivian Government has placed itself squarely on the side of the United States and against communism. There has, therefore, been a material improvement in the last six months over the situation described in paragraph five of General Gavin's memorandum.

In addition to the fact that it is our general policy to maintain military missions in Latin America, it is in our interest that we help Bolivia rebuild its military establishment so that it can help in maintaining internal security. It is particularly important at this time to insure that the Bolivian Government will be able to back up the strong stand it is taking against communism and to thwart the efforts that the communists are making in Bolivia to create unrest and to cause the overthrow of the present government.

I would appreciate being informed whether the Department of the Army would be agreeable to entering into negotiations with the Bolivi-

824.2547/8–2654

The Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Waugh) to the Administrator of the General Services Administration (Mansure)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 22, 1954.

DEAR MR. ADMINISTRATOR: Reference is made to my letter of August 27, 1954[2] on the subject of United States Government contracts for Bolivian tungsten, and to the letter of August 26, 1954[3] from Mr. A. J. Walsh to Mr. Harlan Bramble of this Department, transmitting a draft letter which the General Services Administration proposes to send to Bolivian tungsten producers.

In addition to the correspondence noted above, conversations have taken place between officers of the General Services Administration and of the Department on this subject. As a result of these conversations and its own analysis of the contracts in question, the Department now believes that the weight of the arguments regarding interpretation of the contract specifications is in favor of the Emergency Procurement Service position that the contracts calling for tungsten trioxide in the form of wolframite do not obligate this Government to pay for tungsten trioxide that may be contained in the ore in forms other than wolframite. The Department considers that the Bolivian contention that tungsten trioxide in the form of scheelite meets the specifications of contracts calling for wolframite is an incorrect interpretation of the contract terms. The Department is also of the opinion, however, that the presence of scheelite in the ores in question is not in itself a violation of the contract specifications. The only contractual requirements in this connection are that the ore contain a minimum of 65 percent tungsten trioxide as wolframite and that certain specified impurities, among which scheelite is not included, not exceed the stated maximums.

A number of shipments against contracts calling for wolframite have failed to contain the minimum of 65 percent tungsten trioxide in the form of wolframite. In particular, the deliveries under the Hochschild contract have been below that standard. It is possible that the supplier cannot remedy this situation in the near future. The Department realizes that the suppliers have the right to take back ore not meeting the specifications, beneficiate it, and resubmit it within ninety days. There is a practical difficulty with this alternative, however, since the one firm in a position to perform this beneficiation is booked far in advance, in substantial part on material for the United States Government. It is possible that treatment of some lots could be arranged elsewhere but the practicability of this course has not been demonstrated. Under a strict application of the terms of the contract, therefore, it seems certain that if the Bolivian Government attempted to beneficiate ores not meeting contract specifications it would fail to meet delivery schedules, thus permitting the United States Government to cancel the contract.

The Department believes that the national interest requires that the contracts with Bolivian suppliers continue in force. The present Government of Bolivia has been increasingly friendly and cooperative toward the United States. If it should disappear or be substantially altered, the resultant administration might well be less favorably disposed toward the aims and objectives of the United States, and of the western world in general. Also, it is probable that a period of economic collapse and political chaos would accompany a change in administration. Such developments in Bolivia would be most undesirable from the standpoint of United States security.

In order to avoid economic collapse and actual starvation in Bolivia, the United States has since November, 1953 been engaged in a program of economic grant assistance to that country. Under this program, a total of $23.4 million has already been expended or allocated for expenditure in that country. The need for such assistance arose primarily from the almost complete dependence of the Bolivian economy on revenues from its minerals exports in order to pay for essential imports of foodstuffs. Lower prices in the world market for Bolivian minerals exports, of which tungsten ranks second only to tin, have caused that country to be unable to pay for its needed food imports. The loss of income from tungsten exports would cause Bolivia to be even more unable to pay its own way and additionally dependent on United States economic aid.

In addition, it has been hoped that the aid extended to Bolivia would strengthen the desire of its officials and people to live in harmony with other countries of the Hemisphere, including the United States. That objective has been partially achieved. However, that success would be completely lost if the United States now cancelled the contracts for tungsten. The action would be interpreted in Bolivia as displaying a disregard and lack of sympathy for the serious problems faced by that country, and as an example of the one-sided trading practices of which Bolivia, and other countries in Latin America, frequently accuse the United States. The Bolivians are aware that the United States is continuing to pay its own tungsten producers even higher prices than those contained in the Bolivian contracts, and would greatly resent the fact that they, as a principal foreign supplier, were singled out for economies practiced by the United States. Bolivia has been a particularly vocal exponent of the argument that the United States should enter into arrangements to guarantee stable markets for the raw materials it obtains abroad, and would use our cancellation of the tungsten contracts as a further proof of their argument that the United States looks abroad for help in time of crisis, but when that moment is past, shows no inclination to extend reciprocal treatment.

The Department also considers that the maintenance and development of tungsten production in Bolivia depends on contracts such as those now existing. The deposits were never extensively exploited on a basis of private purchases. While it may be possible that Bolivian production is not essential to the United States at the present time, developments in high temperature alloys, and in political conditions elsewhere in the world, could make it imperative that the United States have extensive supplies of tungsten available in the Western Hemisphere in addition to its own mines. Should the contracts now be cancelled, it appears that the Bolivian mines would be shut down. Redeveloping them would be expensive and time-consuming, and the Bolivian producers and the Bolivian Government would be hesitant to commit themselves to such redevelopment in the future. Moreover, the Bolivian disappointment if the tungsten contracts were cancelled would probably lead to a lack of cooperation in this and other fields as well.

In this connection, it should be noted that other countries which are producers of raw materials needed by the United States will be aware of whatever treatment is extended to Bolivia in this case, and their cooperation in the future will be accordingly influenced.

The draft letter which the General Services Administration proposes to send to the contractors would in effect result in cancellation of at least the Mauricio Hochschild contract and perhaps others. It is unlikely that enough material meeting the strict specifications of the contracts can be delivered in time to meet the delivery schedules. The Department, therefore, requests that the letter in this form not be sent.

The Department of State suggests that a satisfactory solution might be arrived at along the following lines:

1. That the contracts be continued.
2. That the existing price basis in the contracts be maintained.
3. That from that price basis there be deducted the cost of bringing the wolframite content of the ore up to specification plus other charges necessary to make the ore acceptable under the contracts.

It would be possible to attain the effect of this proposal by extending the delivery date until the Bolivian suppliers could have the ore treated. In view of the desperate need of the Bolivian Government for foreign currency, however, it would be preferable for the United States to accept and hold the material until it could be beneficiated. The United States should not accept ore that could not be brought up to specification.

It is recognized that the proper treatment charges may be difficult to calculate. In particular, the disposition of the scheelite contained in the ore may raise questions. Under the contract the United States is not obligated to pay for the scheelite, yet it has value and the United States could elect to use the unbeneficiated ore as a mixed wolframite–scheelite concentrate rather than upgrading it to a wolframite type. The Department prefers not to suggest specific provisions to govern this aspect of the transaction, but it believes the suppliers should receive a payment comparable to what they themselves would have realized if they had arranged for the beneficiation and delivered specification material. It is also recognized that the terms should be arranged so as to encourage the Bolivians to deliver the best grade of material they can produce. The Department is confident that these problems can be solved.

The Department of State is firmly of the opinion that every effort should be made to reach a satisfactory solution to this problem along the lines indicated. Acceptance of the proposal on the part of the Bolivian Government would require a substantial retreat from the position which that Government now takes, and would result in less income from the contracts than they have expected. At the same time, the proposal would protect the financial interests of the United States to the fullest extent practicable, while permitting continuation of the contracts, which the Department considers to be essential.[4]

Sincerely yours,

SAMUEL C. WAUGH

Memorandum of Conversation With Bolivian President Paz Estenssoro and Members of His Cabinet, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland)[1]

LA PAZ, September 30, 1954.

The President brought up the following problems:

1. Bolivia's exchange deficit. He asked for $9 million of trade to go to capital goods, machinery, and equipment and $7 million of agricultural surpluses including wheat, cotton, lard and milk. He presented a memorandum[2] showing how the $9 million would be spent, but prepared on the assumption they would receive only $7 million.

2. Export-Import Bank loans to cover paving the Cochabamba Highway, the construction of the Puncu highway, a construction of a bridge over the river Piraí (?).[3]

3. He discussed Bolivia's desire to build an oil line from Cochabamba to Santa Cruz, with extensions from that point to La Paz and Arica.

4. His desire to build a tin smelter in Bolivia to reduce freight rates and to eliminate the cost of importing sacking.

When the conference broke up, I told him privately that I thought he should be able to get private financing for the oil line and the tin smelter.

5. Bolivia's desire for a three-year tin contract to enable it to do long-term planning.

6. Bolivia's desire to extend the Wolfram contract.

7. Bolivia's negotiations with respect to the amount of final payment for the appropriated mines.

8. Bolivia's attitude toward private enterprise. The Government wants to retain control of the tin smelter, if built, and its traditional monopoly on the manufacture of matches. However, it will welcome private capital in any other enterprise, including the oil and gas industries.

9. Bolivia's default of foreign debt. The Government proposes to submit an offer to the bondholders calling for terms or a scale tied to the price of tin.

At the end of the conference, I drew the President aside and told him:

1. Made the statement regarding the financing of the oil line and tin smelter which was stated above.

2. Asked him if he felt that his Government could adopt fiscal revisions suggested by either the IBRD or the Exim Bank and designed to increase Bolivia's borrowing capacity. He assured me that he would try to follow any suggestions.

3. I asked him if he felt confident of his ability to control the Communist problem in Bolivia. He said that he did.

The Deputy Under Secretary of State (Murphy) to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration (Stassen)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 23, 1954.

DEAR HAROLD: As you know, the President personally considered and concurred in the decision to extend grant aid to Bolivia in September, 1953. At that time, it was recognized that additional grant aid would be necessary during the present fiscal year. In his confidential report to the President in January, 1954,[2] Dr. Milton Eisenhower expressed the opinion that a minimum of $15 million would be necessary. I understand that this was in harmony with the conclusions and recommendations of your Administration, as well as those of the Department. On the basis of recommendations from our Embassy in Bolivia and of studies in the Department, it is now felt that $16 million will be required, consisting of approximately $10 million in the form of agricultural commodities and $6 million of developmental equipment. The local currency arising from the sale in Bolivia of the agricultural commodities would be used in that country's program for expanded agricultural production and economic diversification. I am told that this conclusion is concurred in by the United States Operations Mission in Bolivia and by your Administration. Officers of the Department have informed me that it appears possible to make the necessary funds available under the provisions of existing legislation, particularly the Mutual Security Act of 1954[3] and the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954.[4]

I therefore urge that you do whatever is necessary in order to assure that $16 million in grant aid will be available for Bolivia promptly.[5] I am sure you agree that such action follows logically from our original decision concerning aid to that country, and reflects the Cabinet's decision of March 5, 1954 when approving in principle, as indicative of the Administration's determination to implement Dr. Milton Eisenhower's report, a memorandum[6] which included the statement to the Secretary by the President that "I am struck by the fact that in a number of cases, a very small loan or investment on our part might reap very definite and extensive advantages for us".[7]

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in Bolivia

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, December 15, 1954.

Subject: Compensation for Nationalized Properties of Patiño Mines and Enterprises Consolidated, Inc.

A–167. The Department's policy with respect to the international obligation of a government to make compensation for property nationalized by it, is set forth in the Aide-Mémoire handed to the Guatemalan Ambassador[1] on August 28, 1953,[2] a copy of which is enclosed. It is the Department's position that compensation meeting the criteria set forth therein should be made to the United States citizen owners of Patiño Mines & Enterprises Consolidated, Inc., which concern was deprived of its properties in Bolivia by the Nationalization Decree of October 3, 1951 [October 31, 1952?]. The Department would prefer that mutually satisfactory arrangements be reached by direct negotiation between the Bolivian Government and representatives of the firm. However, it does not appear that the direct negotiations now taking place will result in an early Agreement.

As the Embassy is aware, the "Definitive Agreement on Retentions" signed between representatives of the "Patiño Group" and the Bolivian Mining Corporation at La Paz on June 10, 1953,[3] is scheduled to expire after December 31, 1954. Sums have been paid to the "Patiño Group", including Patiño Mines & Enterprises Consolidated, Inc. under the provisions of that Agreement. In view of the American interest in Patiño Mines & Enterprises Consolidated, Inc., the Department is concerned over the failure to date to reach an agreement on the modification and extension of the "Agreement on Retentions". The Department considers such action is the minimum that should be expected from the present negotiations. Failure to reach such an agreement might well cause reactions in United States public opinion unfavorable to the present Government of Bolivia, and would cause the Department to consider most carefully and critically the question of the sincerity of the repeated declarations by high ranking officials of the Bolivian Government that they intended to make adequate compensation to the former owners of the nationalized properties.

Provided the Embassy considers that the action would be useful in achieving the desired objectives, it may make the above observations known on a confidential and informal basis to high officials of the Bolivian Government. The Embassy should report promptly any action taken.[4]

BRAZIL

POLITICAL, ECONOMIC, AND MILITARY RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND BRAZIL[1]

Editorial Note

On January 3, 1952, the Brazilian Government issued decree no. 30363 establishing new regulations governing the return of foreign capital invested in Brazil and profit remittances on such capital. Under the provisions of the decree, a firm's profit remittances were limited to 8 percent annually on capital actually brought into Brazil (registered capital). Remitted profits in excess of 8 percent were to be regarded as "capital", and the remittance of capital was limited to 20 percent annually of the registered amount. A translation of the decree was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 1098, from Rio de Janeiro, dated January 5, 1952 (800.05132/1–552).

Editorial Note

On January 3, 1952, representatives of the United States and Brazil initiated negotiations at Rio de Janeiro for a bilateral military assistance agreement. Pertinent documents are in Department of State file 732.5 MSP. The agreement was signed on March 15, 1952, and entered into force on May 19, 1953; for text, see Department of State Treaties and Other International Acts Series (TIAS), No. 2776, or United States Treaties and Other International Agreements (UST), volume 4, page 170.

Concurrent with the negotiations for the military assistance agreement, Major General Charles L. Mullins, Jr. (USA) negotiated a related bilateral military plan with representatives of the Brazilian Government. In telegram 829, a joint Department of State–Department of Defense message, dated March 14, 1952, Secretary Acheson informed Ambassador Johnson that Secretary of Defense Lovett had approved the military plan negotiated by General Mullins (732.5 MSP/3–1452). On March 15, General Mullins and Brazilian General of the Army Pedro Aurélio Góes Monteiro signed the Military Plan Between Brazil and the United States for Their Common Defense, in a private ceremony following the signing of the military assistance agreement (732.5 MSP/3–1952). No copy of the Plan was found in Department of State files.

The Ambassador in Brazil (Johnson) to the Department of State

SECRET PRIORITY RIO DE JANEIRO, January 5, 1952—9 a. m.

840. For Asst Secy Miller. Embtel 836, January 5.[1] We are greatly disturbed in Emb at implications decree limiting remittances of profits on fon capital. It understatement to say it will discourage entry of private fon capital.

After conf this morning with Emb officers and experts Amer Section Joint Econ Comm,[2] I called on FonMin Fontoura[3] to discuss matter. I told him I had not yet had time make thorough study decree and I had as yet no instrs from my govt to make any comment. I said, however, that on basis my very real concern for successful progress Joint Comm in which both countries interested and for protection Amer interests already established here, I felt compelled express my apprehension that this decree together with certain statements in President's speech[4] re fon capital a day or two ago wld be interpreted in Wash as extreme trend toward nationalism and wld be a definite discouragement to all those endeavoring encourage flow of private capital to Braz for its econ development. I called his attention particularly to the provision that profit remittances in the past in excess of 8 percent of capital brought in from abroad will be considered as remittances of capital. In some cases this will mean all orig capital brought in from abroad has been repatriated and firms in question will therefore not be permitted make future profit remittances. . . . FonMin attempted defend doctrine that earnings plowed back into fon enterprise cld not be considered as fon investment on ground that this compounding feature wld drain away so much exchange Braz balance of payments cld not stand it.

It obvious FonMin had not been consulted by President Vargas in regard this decree and that he himself is seriously disturbed by it. He made several comments not relevant to technical features of decree but in attempted explanation of why it was issued. Although stating emphatically President is not opposed to entry fon capital and is not pursuing blindly nationalistic policy, his admin is nevertheless in so weak a position politically that he is faced with two alternatives, one is to take over by coup d'etat and rule by decree, the other is to remain loyal to 1946 constitution and govern according to that constitution. He had chosen latter way. In order be able govern at all under that dispensation, without even a simple majority his party in Congress, he is compelled gauge carefully opinion of all elements of opposition, to conciliate sections of that opinion and to secure their support. He has, therefore, been compelled take certain measures (and FonMin implied present decree is one of them) which will strengthen his support amongst the masses and give them feeling he is really doing something in their interest. FonMin remarked he wld make a comment to me which he as member of Vargas cabinet had no right to make. He asked if it had ever occurred to me Vargas might not be able to finish his term. This was said to emphasize his point that President is compelled make polit compensations in order hold things together and to combat ceaseless undermining of Commies which has reached proportions that have authorities here gravely concerned.

Argument that Braz will not have exchange possibilities to allow fon capital to be repatriated with earnings on any basis except that of orig investment may sound plausible from nationalist point of view but it seems to us here will have disastrous effect on entry fon capital so vital to Braz econ development. Question retroactive effect injuring vested interests which have operated under old decree and in good faith appears technically to be different matter and one on which we wld have every sound legal grounds for protest.

It wld be helpful have this decree carefully studied by Dept's legal experts and for Emb to be given benefit any views which may result and of any instrs which Dept may care give. It wld be helpful if my informal representations of today might receive Dept's support and with such direct instrs for further comment as may seem justified after full study question. Dept may care consult reps Eximbank and IBRD since this present decree, regardless FonMin's statements, seems certain to appear as total discouragement of fon private investment and may seriously undermine concept on which Joint Comm has been erected.[5]

[5]Department of State telegram 614, to Rio de Janeiro, drafted by Assistant Secretary Miller, dated Jan. 7, 1952, reads in part as follows: "Very much appreciate urtel 836 Jan 5 and completely concur ur analysis and especially with ur views concept on which Joint Comm has been created may be seriously undermined. Business circles here naturally bombarding Dept with questions and we are certain to come under heavy pressure engage in reprisals through holding up loans, etc." (832.131/1–552)

In a memorandum to Assistant Chief for Exchange Restrictions and Payments Agreements Mortimer D. Goldstein, dated Jan. 8, 1952, Deputy Assistant Legal Adviser for Economic Affairs Stanley D. Metzger stated that the Brazilian decree governing remittances did not violate international commitments of Brazil to the United States with respect to either the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) or the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund, and that such alleged violations should not be used as the basis for any representations to Brazil regarding the decree (832.131/1–852).

The Ambassador in Brazil (Johnson) to the Department of State

SECRET PRIORITY RIO DE JANEIRO, March 11, 1952—8 p. m.

1112. For Asst Secy Miller. Embtels 1109, Mar 10,[1] and 1101, Mar 7,[2] urlet Mar 4.[3] I met yesterday afternoon with FonMin and contd discussion reported Embtel 1109. It evident FonMin deeply concerned about possible effect of banks withholding action on Joint Comm projects until satis Braz action on exchange decree. His views which appeared to me slightly over-emphasized but perhaps not intentionally so are substantially as fols:

There are two groups in Braz whose activities and intentions are hostile to US-Braz collaboration. One of these groups is Commie whose motives are known and require no particular discussion relation present situation. Other group composed people who profess profound skepticism at practical possibility of any benefit to result to Braz through coop with US. This group at present moment is focusing its attacks on Lafer[4] who is staunch proponent Braz-US collaboration. Any indication that banks are withholding action on Joint Comm projects as means of pressure on Braz Govt wld be according to FonMin immed pointed to by Lafer's enemies as proof that US lacks sincerity and that loans so confidently promised by Lafer wld never materialize. As much as FonMin wld like have banks issue favorable statement re these projects, he wld not want them to issue any statement if it were coupled with reservation re Braz on exchange decree. He professed belief it wld have damaging effect on position Lafer in particular and on those elements in govt who are struggling for effective coop with US. FonMin further stated that if Lafer shld lose out in his present fight, he wld unquestionably be replaced by some one not favorable to close coop with US, that it wld mean a serious setback for all proponents of that collaboration. He considers it particularly unfortunate that this crisis has arisen just at moment when US and Braz are approaching agreement on various important matters long under study. He mentioned specifically this connection mil agreement and pending discussions on sales of monazite and still unconcluded manganese and uranium questions. All these matters are progressing favorably he said, the two latter being under active study. While he did not specifically say so, he indicated that a polit crisis which wld result in Lafer's departure might jeopardize or seriously retard our agreement on other matters.

[3] A copy of the referenced letter is contained in Miller files, lot 53 D 26, "Brazil." In the letter, Mr. Miller stated that some businessmen believed there was a "great deal of merit to our policy which might be described as 'not rocking the boat'", but that many others feel it is "wishy-washy and amounts to appeasement." He further stated that if the situation was not soon clarified, business groups in the United States would begin to exert increasing pressure on the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD) and the Export-Import Bank not to make any loans to Brazil.

[4] Horacio Láfer, Brazilian Minister of Finance.

Attacks on Lafer and Joint Comm have not been caused by US reactions to decree but according to FonMin are motivated by desire to get rid of Lafer who is sound and conservative FinMin intent on curbing public expenditures and imposing regime of austerity on govt depts. This is maddening to other group which also has ear of Pres and whose real desire according to FonMin is to destroy Lafer so they can "get their hands into the public treasury". This group therefore seizes on any angle from which to attack MinFin. Recent disaster with many fatalities of central railway has given new ammunition to attack MinFin and Joint Comm for failure expedite necessary financing of railway improvements.

Pressures from various quarters for a "get-tough policy" described urlet Mar 4 are known to both Fon and Fin Mins. I have personally been at particular pains to point out to them on repeated occasions our practical difficulties, and our disagreement with them on subj fon exchange decree. I referred to this point again in my talk with FonMin yesterday urging that he and MinFin facilitate our task of trying to help Braz by speeding up as much as possible action on fon exchange decree which MinFin's comite now trying work out in practical terms. I urged him not to let us get caught in a vicious circle of conflicting polit difficulties. I told him that I understood and sympathized with difficult position which MinFin was passing at present and asked him to realize that my own govt likewise had difficulties in maintaining its position without public evidence of corresponding understanding and action from Braz side. I very much appreciate stand Dept has taken and hope it will continue to press view on banks that processing of these agreed projects shld go forward in normal manner. While I am not able to share in full degree FonMin's pessimism re possible results Lafer's losing out, I nevertheless think that his departure from FinMin on this issue wld be grave setback to our interests in Braz. I believe I realize difficulty of dealing with dissident business groups in US. I hope, however, that banks can continue to be urged to resist undue pressure from this quarter and proceed firmly on basis confidence in good faith Braz and her Fon and Fin Mins. In my opinion we have nothing to lose by supporting our friends in this govt. If fortified by our confidence and support they win, as I believe they can, we shld be in better case than before. If they lose out and we shld be forced to reconsider our position and measures for safeguarding Amer interests, we wld be no worse off than if we take a "get-tough attitude" now for I do not believe Vargas from a polit point of view cld voluntarily yield to US pressure. If eventually forced to do so through overriding econ facts and circumstances, we wld have aroused a deep and abiding hostility which wld play into hands of those elements who for whatever reason desire to diminish Amer influence and interests here.

Lafer is more calm and restrained than Neves in expressing his views and seems more confident his position with the Pres than above-reported remarks of FonMin wld indicate. However, when I saw him at the office on Mar 6 after a bad day and vicious public attacks, there was no doubt in my mind that he cared very much for what position the banks might take on the agreed project and made a dignified plea for our understanding and support.

1370. For Asst Secy Miller. I can understand argument with which Dept apparently is faced, namely that US shld refuse take action on all loan applications until remittance decree satisfactorily modified (Deptel 998 May 7[1]). Such a stand at least by implication is threat that we are willing to let Lafer plan die if Brazil does not take action we consider necessary. Those favoring such tactics must not realize President appears adamant against giving into pressure, and using approaching expiration date of Lafer plan is considered pressure by him.

If we are patient and can convince President our sincere intent assist econ development Brazil, I am certain we shall work out solution remittance decree problem which we can accept. If we allow Lafer plan succumb adjustment remittance decree in my opinion will become impossible for long period to come. Consequences will be extremely serious to all phases our relationship with Brazil: mil, raw materials, polit in UN and agencies and OAS with its organs. I wish repeat our relations with Brazil now at crossroads.

With specific reference to remittance decree problem, in our opinion making $10 million central loan does not materially weaken our bargaining position since Lafer and others know additional loans will not be forthcoming till acceptable solution remittance problem found. In other words we wld be making $10 million loan the withholding of which in our opinion might lessen possibility finding solution while making it wld at least postpone and perhaps prevent crisis of first magnitude in all phases our relationship with Brazil.

[1] In the referenced telegram, to Rio de Janeiro, drafted by Mr. Miller, dated May 7, 1952, Ambassador Johnson was informed that the Department could not promise President Vargas that Brazil's request for a loan to the Central do Brasil railroad would be made irrespective of a solution to the remittance decree problem, in view of the fact that the IBRD had to take into account strong sentiments in U.S. financial quarters, and also that it would be impossible, as suggested by the Embassy, to transfer the loan application to the Export-Import Bank (800.05132/5–652).

I am certain it realized in Wash that Lafer plan provides internal financing to extent $500 millions. Plan was undertaken partly because our insistence early days of joint comm that Brazil itself must solve its cruzeiro financing problem. It seems to us that as internatl institution IBRD can not take upon itself responsibility for causing this internal financing plan to become inoperative.

Bohan and I are seeing President tomorrow (Friday) at 3:30.

The Ambassador in Brazil (Johnson) to the Department of State

SECRET PRIORITY RIO DE JANEIRO, May 9, 1952—8 p. m.

1391. For Assistant Secretary Miller. Bohan and I saw Pres Vargas this afternoon. Pres had been previously informed that we wished to discuss certain aspects of remittance decree and both Bohan and I felt that he gave us an exceedingly friendly and attentive reception. I told Pres that we hoped he might be interested to hear directly from Mr. Bohan, who had come recently from Wash, something of the effect produced by the decree in Amer circles that are friendly to Braz and keenly interested in its development.

When we had finished, Pres, who gave every indication of an understanding of position we outlined, began his own remarks with statement that he hoped we wld realize tremendous pressure now on him through growing force of nationalism, which he frankly said had been linked in many minds with Commie, but nevertheless, was a major factor in his own political calculations. He spoke of resentful feeling existing in Braz because of large sums of money allocated through Marshall Plan to Eur, and other areas of the world in comparison to what had been done for Braz. He also expressed his disappointment and dissatisfaction with slow progress made by Joint Comm, and said that speaking frankly, he wld also tell us that he had been informed that several members of the Amer sec of the Comm had close ties with Wall Street. Bohan and I defended the Amer sec of Comm vigorously. We told Pres he had been seriously misinformed regarding Wall Street connections of members of the Comm, which was contrary to fact. Pres seemed receptive to our explanations and statements and likewise to our expression hope that he wld be patient for we felt that the Comm was on eve of really constructive accomplishments.

Pres was very frank and moderate in all his statements. From things he said it was apparent, however, to Bohan and me that he has been subjected to considerable anti-Amer propaganda much of it vicious, and that it has been so persistent he is beginning to wonder if some of it is not true. In spite of Pres's moderation of statement, I have concluded that opinions given me by FonMin Fontoura regarding certain influences on Pres have not been exaggerated, and that he and FinMin Lafer are objects of attack by these same groups. Pres gave us feeling of his sincere friendliness to US, but also feeling that he is genuinely disappointed at neglect with which he considers Braz has been treated by US. This feeling of disappointment has undoubtedly been fed by extremely nationalistic and anti-Amer propaganda to which he has been subjected and is consequently greatly exaggerated, but has become something of an obsession. I believe he is open-minded with a friendly disposition and not only ready but desirous to be convinced that our professions are sincerely meant. Most telling action that we can produce in clearing Pres Vargas's mind of any remaining doubts will be prompt and effective action on loan projects recommended by Joint Comm.

Trend of Pres comments was consistent but in more moderate vein with account of his remarks to FinMin Lafer on May 7 reported in memo of conversation of May 8[1] between Lafer, Moreira Salles[2] and Bohan. Copies of this memo were forwarded by courier pouch today in an envelope addressed to Kidder and shld be in your hands on Mond.

Bohan is returning to Wash tonight by air will arrive some time May 11. He has an excellent and accurate understanding of situation here and will fill you in on details of talk with Pres today, as well as numerous conversations he has had with Min Lafer and latter's advisers.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 15, 1952.

DEAR HERSCHEL: I have three matters on which I wish to comment in this letter as follows:

First, I have received a letter from Burke Knapp[1] telling me that he wishes to be relieved of his assignment in Rio no later than the end of August. Merwin Bohan has told me that Knapp is adamant and I believe we have no alternative except to honor his desires in this matter. The problem immediately arises as to who should be his successor. My very strong conviction is that there is one and only one person for the job and that is Merwin Bohan. However, Merwin seems to be reluctant to do it although I believe he would if he were pressed to. Would you let me know what you think of this suggestion and also let me have any ideas that you may have about alternatives. I think Merwin is ideal, first, because it will be hard to get a top-notch man to take over from Knapp; second, because Merwin already knows the job; and, third, because, in so far as concerns competence and ability to get along with the Brazilians, I know of no one who could do this as well as Merwin. Please let me have your thoughts on this as soon as possible.[2]

Second, I have your letter of May 1[3] concerning the Secretary's visit to Brazil. It seems to me that we were extremely wise to postpone this visit until after the remittance problem got settled. It now seems to me that it would be preferable to postpone it until the latter part of June by which time I am hopeful that not only will the remittance problem have been settled on the basis of the proposed free market bill,[4] but also because by then I should think we might have gotten the two banks to have made some sizeable loans, all of which would provide a happier atmosphere. If you should agree with this timing, it would be possible to relate the visit to the trip which the Secretary has to take to England around June 24 to receive an honorary degree from Oxford University and to preside over a meeting of U.S. Ambassadors in the European area.[5]

Third, with regard to the problem of remittances, the formula for creating a free market seems to be meeting with considerable approval up here and I hope that we can get word to you and Knapp very soon about it and that the banks will be able to move ahead very quickly on certain pending loan applications. It is too bad that this problem has created so many difficulties that really weren't necessary but I take it that it is part of diplomacy to be continually staving off disaster rather than to be working towards positive and constructive goals. Merwin and I will do everything we can to get over a hundred million dollars of loans made in the next six weeks by the two banks which should create a much better feeling about the U.S. in Brazil.

[4] On Apr. 24, 1952, Brazilian Deputy Adolpho Gentil introduced into the Chamber of Deputies a bill establishing an official free exchange market for capital transactions. The bill, inter alia, authorized the executive to divide the foreign exchange market into official and free markets; the International Monetary Fund parity rate would prevail in the former, while rates in the latter would be determined by supply and demand. Capital and profit remittances would be regulated by the executive and effected through both the official and free markets. The Portuguese text of the bill was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 1784, from Rio de Janeiro, dated May 2, 1952 (832.131/5–252).

I am looking forward very much to having Walther[6] up here.

Sincerely yours, EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

The Ambassador in Brazil (Johnson) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL RIO DE JANEIRO, May 22, 1952—2 p. m.

1451. Totec.

1. Knapp, Bohan telephone conversations have caused us greatest anxiety. Firm loan assurances obtained up to now, seem to us fall tragically short of "package" required to restore some measure confidence in US-Braz econ collaboration thus enabling Lafer obtain positive backing Pres on free market and save Braz development program, including joint comm.

2. As we understand it, firm package so far developed includes Am Fon Power $41 million Paulista Railway $7 Central Railway $10 plus IBRD assurance $15 additional on railroads other than Santos Jundiai total $73. In our judgment this package must be improved by, at very least, addition of Santos Jundiai and Rio Grande power loan, plus new general statement from banks recognizing progress Braz has made since last Sept in domestic financial and institutional program, expressing confidence in work joint comm on basis projects completed thus far, and doing utmost, short of fixing actual figures on time sched, to carry conviction to skeptics here that, aside from initial package, banks really mean business in Braz.

3. Santos Jundiai project is technically inseparable from Paulista project and omission from package renders inclusion Paulista largely meaningless. This addition wld bring total to $82 million. Believe, however, further addition Rio Grande do Sul project indispensable for any prospect of success for fol multiple reasons:

(a) Only its inclusion, bringing total to 107, comes within shooting distance of Braz aspirations;

(b) Without it Braz Govt approval of Am Fon Power loan is most seriously jeopardized; without this loan, company wld be unable meet clamor for better service and its ability maintain operation as private enterprise wld be seriously threatened.

(c) Collapse Rio Grande loan negotiations because of insistence further legis changes wld be violently resented throughout Braz as evidencing attempt at unjustifiable intrusion in Braz domestic affairs; and

(d) Pres has keen personal interest in this program for his home state, which is ardently shared by FonMin also from Rio Grande whose influence with Pres in present crisis has probably been lifesaver. Nothing wld be better calculated antagonize them than further delays granting this loan.

4. In addition foregoing strongly urge Eximbank consideration $15 million credit for agricultural equipment subject to working out project details. This wld bring total to 122, or roughly half figure mentioned by Lafer. We are not prepared say inclusion this loan in package is indispensable, but on other hand it shld in no sense be considered substitute for Santos Jundiai or Rio Grande loan.

5. We have been shocked by Bohan's latest advice that IBRD assurance of $15 million in addition to $10 million central project constitutes credit ceiling not for Central Railway but rather for all railways other than Santos Jundiai prior to passage reorganization legis. Any such statement to Braz wld be disastrous. Assuming $15 million devoted to central suburban cars, we must have latitude for emergency rehabilitation loans to other railways during next few months while Lafer is obtaining passage reorganization legis.

6. I cannot emphasize strongly enough the importance as I see it of basing our actions vis-à-vis Braz at this time on a sober realization that Braz patience is running out. It is not necessary to remind the Dept that Brazs are convinced that in granting econ assistance to other important countries US has acted with despatch when high policy considerations have been involved. I also do not need point out that Brazs are not asking for grants but for loans for vitally important purposes.

7. I do not wish to be alarmist, but it seems to me Braz leaders right now are questioning whether close econ collaboration with US is a useful policy. We shld realize that our failure to provide convincing assurance on this score can have important repercussions in other fields vital to us including the mil and polit fields.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 31, 1952.

DEAR HERSCHEL: From your telephone conversation and the message[1] from Lafer, our maneuver has apparently worked since I gather that Lafer will proceed with the free market proposal next week. If this deduction is correct we are over this hump. In such an event the Eximbank can announce next week $50 million of loans to the American & Foreign Power Subsidiary and the Paulista Railroad and very soon thereafter should be able to announce the Santos–Jundiai loan, making a total of roughly $60 million from the Eximbank.

[1] Not identified.

As to the International Bank, my message[2] referred to an aggregate of $42 million of loans, namely, $25 million to the Central do Brasil and $17 million to the Light. Developments during the last week may lead to the eventual modification of this. Valentim Boucas has been arguing vigorously with Black with regard to the Rio Grande do Sul loan and, as of the end of the last bout on Thursday, Black appeared to be getting softened up somewhat. However, Black seems to feel that until the free market bill is passed he should not put into Brazil much over $40 million (although he might be willing to make the Light loan in addition). In such an event, if he went ahead with the Rio Grande do Sul loan, he told Boucas that he would have to cut down the Central do Brasil to about $15 million. At this point apparently Boucas exploded and accused Black of breaking a commitment. There was apparently a very unpleasant scene in which Boucas at one point was on the verge of walking out of Black's office and threatening to recommend to Lafer that they suspend all dealings with the International Bank. Black thereupon asked that he be permitted to think about the problem over the weekend and Boucas is coming back from New York to have lunch tomorow. Thus, as of this writing, our heroine is again tied to the railroad track, but I think that she will be snatched from disaster next week. My earnest hope is that Black will make the Rio Grande do Sul loan and the full $25 million for the Central and that after a few weeks he will probably also add the Light. This will make a total of over $120 million of loans from the two banks and it ought to create a very good atmosphere. I am, of course, a little bit concerned over some of the connotations of Lafer's message in which he, in effect, puts the Secretary and me on the spot to produce automatic financing for Joint Commission projects as they are approved. However, I take it that this is customary Brazilian needling. Also I think that we will have some trouble in getting immediate financing for the Parana–Santa Catarina Railroad since the project has not arrived in Washington yet. My own feeling is that after the expected announcement in June of $100–$120 million of loans by the two banks, it will be hard to expect anything more until the free market bill is actually passed. Once that is done, then things ought to proceed very rapidly. In your discretion, you might point out to the Minister how important we consider actual passage of the free market proposal. If a long period of time elapses between the announcement of the government's support of the Gentil Bill and the actual passage of it, pressure will start building up in the financial community against Brazil just as it has been building up in the last few months. As a matter of fact, there are elements in the financial community who are opposed to Black's doing anything in the way of loans until the free market bill passes and others who seek to limit the amount of loans to be announced now to token sums. I, of course, disagree with this but it is part of the facts of life.

Black has not been particularly helpful. While he sees the point of view of the business community with all too perceptive eyes, he seems to have blinkers on when it comes to trying to understand the Brazilians. He talks to a person like Boucas just as if he were talking to a prospective borrower in the Chase National Bank, everything being on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. The fact that the U.S. Government has an investment of over $3 billion in the Bank seems to have no effect whatever in determining his judgment. At times I believe that the real Executive Director of the Bank is not the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury but Leo Welch of Standard of New Jersey. I sometimes regret that we ever created the Bank (your friends Messrs. Acheson and Miller having played a leading role in the launching of it at Bretton Woods[3]) or that we made the decision in February of 1951 to make the International Bank the institution of first recourse for Brazilian development loans. However, in extremis, we could fall back on the Eximbank and that possibility constitutes the one method of bringing leverage on Mr. Black. Thus far I have played it out as patiently as possible. Merwin Bohan and I have throughout this week tried to exercise a soothing influence on Boucas and we have thus far dissuaded him from pulling out of the International Bank which he on several occasions threatened to do on the theory that the Bank is not living up to the commitment which Mr. Black made to Mr. Lafer last September. However, if the time ever comes when it appears necessary to take the position that the Bank has not lived up to that commitment, then it would be possible, it seems to me, to review the earlier decision with regard to the preferential position of the International Bank for loans to Brazil. This would, of course, cause repercussions of enormous magnitude, but, if and when the time comes when we have to do this in the interests of U.S.-Brazilian relations, I am prepared to do it. I hope I never have to face up to the decision.

While in New York Boucas has apparently been conducting negotiations with the National City Bank for a substantial loan to Brazil based upon a negative pledge agreement with regard to its gold holdings in the Federal Reserve, the purpose of which is to pay off Brazil's commercial arrears. He seems extremely enthusiastic about this and feels that it will greatly improve Brazil's credit standing with the financial community. He has talked to Black also about this and Black infuriated him by saying that, under the terms of the Brazilian Government's guarantee agreement with the Bank in respect of the Brazilian Traction loans, Brazil had to get the Bank's consent before entering into such an operation. However, after Mr. Boucas exploded over than one, Black agreed to facilitate the operation in every possible way with the Federal Reserve.

With best regards,

Sincerely yours, EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

P.S. There have been some developments since I dictated the foregoing which make the first part of the second paragraph of this letter subject to some question. I understand that Black will not make the Light loan at all if he makes the Rio Grande do Sul loan even though he cuts down the Central. However, Boucas and Walther Moreira Salles are lunching with him today and are to see the Eximbank later. We will probably have more news before the afternoon is out. It is good to have Walther here and he has plunged right into full activity on his first day.

1536. For Bohan.

1. Presume IBRD keeping you informed activities their del here, but summary report fols.

2. Bank del informed Lafer last night willing proceed negot Rio Grande loan, i.e. legis no obstacle. Further informed Lafer bank prepared negot immed on project Nr 1 for Central Railway, amount of which estimated by bank at $12.5 million after allowances for contingencies. Bank del stated, however, that further $15 million for central suburban cars cld not be firmly assured by June 30, since wld require further study and wld have to be considered in light further progress on free market legis (not quite clear whether bank del said, or Lafer understood, that granting this loan contingent upon actual passage free market legis). Bank del reports Lafer extremely pleased and that he did not press with them for additional projs (e.g. National Alkali, Parana–Santa Catarina or Salto Grande) except that he expressed hope loan for third unit Paulo Afonso cld be pressed through in order that initial package wld "provide something for north." Min has requested Berenhauser present latter proj to joint comm as soon as possible, but since this proj hinges upon difficult (even dubious) market study, believe impossible for joint comm and bank act within proposed time sched.

3. "Package" which thus emerges same as that formulated in Embtel 1451, May 22,[1] minus loan on central suburban cars. Lafer clearly strongly desires include Parana–Santa Catarina in June 30 package although we cannot say this indispensable to acceptable resolution present crisis. Fact Lafer failed mention this proj to bank del merely reveals his hope it will be handled by Eximbank. Wld appreciate early advice as to which bank handling this proj and as to prospects firm assurance thereon before June 30. Pls advise similarly re Rio road proj, polit importance of which obvious.

4. Understand from Lafer Black agreed not proceed further with Braz traction loan until proj presented through normal channels joint comm. Pls confirm.

5. As result foregoing events situation has eased here immensely. We consider immed crisis resolved, although additional firm assurances before June 30 on Parana–Santa Catarina and Rio road proj wld be most helpful and we urge their inclusion in "package" if at all possible. We have no doubt these additions, which wld appeal to Braz as positive step, wld substantially buttress Lafer's polit influence, expedite passage free market bill, and create warm atmosphere for Secretary's visit.

Résumé of Discussion Held at the Presidential Palace, Rio de Janeiro, July 5, 1952[1]

CONFIDENTIAL

Participants: His Excellency Getulio Vargas, President of Brazil
The Honorable Dean Acheson, Secretary of State of the United States
His Excellency Dr. João Neves da Fontoura, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Brazil
His Excellency Dr. Horacio Lafer, Minister of Finance of Brazil

Other Americans Present: Ambassador Herschel V. Johnson
Assistant Secretary of State Edward G. Miller
Mr. Randolph A. Kidder
Mr. William A. Wieland

Other Brazilians Present: General Aguinaldo Caiado de Castro, Chief of President's Military Household
Dr. Walter Sarmanho, Minister-Counselor, Brazilian Embassy, Washington
Dr. Roberto Campos, Brazilian Adviser to Joint Brazil United States Economic Development Commission (translator)

[Here follows a note indicating that the résumé was a reconstruction based on stenographic notes, that President Vargas was reviewing similar notes with the probable intention of making corrections, and that Secretary Acheson had departed from Brazil before having an opportunity to make corrections.]

[Here follows an exchange of amenities.]

ACHESON—One very clear and happy impression that I have is the result of my meeting with the Joint Commission yesterday morning.

I am deeply impressed with the profound thoroughness and competence with which that Commission is doing its work.

I am tremendously impressed with the high quality of the advice of the representatives of the Brazilian Government that serve in the Commission.

Mr. President, it seems to me that work of this sort has got to be done in a thorough, vigorous, competent way. It is not something that can be done with just happy enthusiastic ideas. It must be done thoroughly from a rock bottom basis.

[1]Transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 48, from Rio de Janeiro, dated July 14, 1952 (110.11 AC/7–1452).

A reconstruction of the conversation prepared by the Brazilian Government, together with a translation containing footnotes indicating differences between the two versions prepared by the Embassy, was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 334, dated Aug. 26, 1952, not printed (110.11 AC/8–2652).

I think more harm can be done by unwise and incomplete planning based on enthusiasm. Therefore, it is important that what should be done would be best developed on careful studies, directed toward coordinating public and private initiative.

I have no competence to appraise the specific work of this Joint Commission, but I have had long experience with men and organizations. When I go back to Washington I shall speak to Mr. Black of International Bank and Mr. Gaston of the Export-Import Bank and say that they can have confidence in this Commission; that it is thoroughly and professionally good; they do good work.

My impressions are incomplete since I still have the impression that I will receive in São Paulo. I shall report to the Finance Minister my impressions in São Paulo. He will complete to Your Excellency the résumé of my impressions.

VARGAS—President Roosevelt told me once that the United States had the greatest interest in the economic development, and especially in the industrial development of Brazil; because the United States wanted a strong ally, not a weak ally. President Roosevelt believed that the wealthier Brazil becomes the more it would buy from the United States. President Roosevelt did not fear that Brazil would thereby become an industrial competitor of the United States. He felt, rather, that the range of possible interchange would be widened. And this policy I see with satisfaction is being followed by President Truman. An example of this is the operation of Point IV throughout the Latin American countries, beginning with Brazil, which because of its extension and traditional relations with the United States, believes, without being partial, it should really deserve preference in these economic relations.

Some weeks ago I had a talk with Ambassador Johnson and Ambassador Bohan and I manifested my concern over what I considered a delay in the work of the Joint Commission, and commented on the repercussions of this delay on Brazilian public opinion, giving rise to skepticism regarding the efficiency of its labors. I must confess that I realize that since then things have improved considerably; that several projects were concluded by the Joint Commission and duly forwarded to Washington, and that today I am the first to recognize and praise the effort and the competence displayed by the Joint Commission in carrying out its task.

FONTOURA—I have spoken twice with The Secretary of State and I emphasized to him the importance of the internal aspects of Brazilian policy which are bound to reflect inevitably on our foreign policy. And I told His Excellency that our friends in the United States should carefully interpret the character of the election of President Vargas, who was the opposition candidate, elected by the masses and committed, of course, to help meet the needs of the people. I signified that without this notion, many of the Government's acts could not be understood. I added that the competitors in the election campaign of His Excellency were illustrious, competent and distinguished men. Despite these qualities which they had, it would be extremely difficult for them to face a crisis because they could not count on sufficient popular support to be able to fulfill their promises to the masses, once they were in power. They would not be able to impose sacrifices on the masses to achieve future improvements. I was pleased to hear The Secretary of State, a man of great experience and understanding, say that he considered that no government can subsist at this time if it does not attend to the appeals of the people. He mentioned the New Deal as an example. He also advanced as his personal opinion in this respect, that without doubt, the Democratic Party has a good chance to win the elections, because it has always sought to meet the needs of the people.

The last consideration I wish to add is that the present conduct of our foreign policy stems straight from directives given by President Vargas when he was still a candidate, and subsequently President-elect. I am now trying to implement his policy in the foreign field.

This was the policy I took as Delegate in the Fourth Consultative Meeting of Foreign Ministers in Washington.[2] Furthermore, when the Secretary of State presented the project of the Washington Declaration,[3] I did not sign it without express consultation by telephone with President Vargas, even though I did not believe that it contained any policy innovations. Our policy of cooperation with you is the same now as it was under President Vargas' previous Government. But new problems have emerged under Getulio's new Government, and although the policy is the same, the nature of these problems requires some adaptation.

Today when the Secretary of State was saying goodbye to me, I told him that he knows Brazil, has seen Brazil, and was able to see that everywhere he had a very cordial reception. He has talked with public officials, Members of Congress and the people. He saw that this cordiality was spontaneous; that it could not be enforced on all classes of the people by a democratic government. The government reflects public opinion, and this proves the sincerity of the feeling of cooperation demonstrated by our administration.

(The President invited Minister of Finance Horacio Lafer to present his comments on economic problems, asking him to include an expression of his views on the degree of success achieved by the Joint Commission.)

LAFER—Mr. Secretary, a Finance Minister always has things to request. But I ask you not to be frightened because the President told me to behave myself as much as possible.

The Brazilian situation may be characterized as President Vargas defined it—a crisis of growth. And this crisis has brought a perilous result which is the excessive rise in the cost of living for our people. This rise had two causes: one of a monetary nature; the other resulting from lack of production. President Vargas, despite obstacles, with enormous sacrifices, struggling against all the States, political parties and friends, is determined to curb the monetary cause by achieving a balanced budget. Brazil is today in a regime of budget balancing, not spending more than its possibilities, not granting speculative credits, and avoiding everything which for monetary reasons may afflict the Brazilian people by causing a rise in their cost of living.

The second cause is lack of production. That in turn has one chief origin, the lack of transportation—land and sea, lack of silos and warehouses. We are losing in Brazil around 25 or 30 per cent of the food yearly produced due to lack of transportation. Last year we had the paradox of being obliged to import potatoes from Holland when we had loads of potatoes produced in Paranã which could not be used, and which rotted for lack of transportation.

It was because of this that President Vargas, when sending me to Washington last year, gave me instructions to present a plan, based on the Joint Commission's studies, and according to which Brazil would contribute 50 per cent of the financing required, in cruzeiros, to meet those needs, while requesting credit in foreign currency for the importation of indispensable equipment and materials. President Vargas thus wanted to show that Brazil does not want only to request help but also to contribute and to work on the principle of self-help.

The President has aked my opinion on the work developed by the Joint Commission. I must say that the work so far done by the Joint Commission, and the work still to be performed, if the necessary support is forthcoming, as I am certain it will be, because it was nobly and understandingly promised in the document which has the honor to have the signature of Mr. Acheson in Washington last year, will represent the guarantee of Brazilian social stability. And, in my opinion, it will contribute the best basis for a stronger friendship between Brazil and the United States.

Only one small point I would like to ask Secretary Acheson, and ask also President Vargas and Dr. João Neves da Fontoura because all of them are friends of Mr. Black. This is that Mr. Black set up an organization that will make possible more expeditious action on the studies presented to the International Bank by the Joint Commission. As Mr. Acheson said, the projects which leave here for the International Bank represent a careful, accurate and perfect study. So, this study alone should constitute a reliable base for a rapid decision.

I beg to go from a general point of view to slip in a point more particular in nature, but very important. Brazil, as Mr. Acheson said in his admirable speech,[4] has a tremendously big coast. Food and other goods we have to transport from south to north and from north to south. Our merchant marine fleet is worn out and inadequate. When last year we had the drought which greatly harmed the Northeast, we had great difficulty in getting rice and beans in the South to send urgently to those people who were suffering hunger. Our ships are worn out and obsolete. If it were possible for the Secretary to use his high influence to enable Brazil to purchase or lease ships of the mothball fleet it would be a great thing for the urgent solution of this problem. It would be an enormous help to Brazilian economy. We would prefer 20 small ships today to 200 "Queen Marys" 100 years from now. Our coastwise transportation problem is really of the greatest urgency. But trans-ocean shipping must also be developed. It is not the impossibility of getting shipping space, but the high foreign exchange expenditures for freight. Of course we have ships of other countries available but we must expend almost 200 million dollars a year for their shipping services. If we could save a part of these dollars by carrying our shipments in our own ships we could save money with which to buy machinery and other goods which Brazil really needs, including equipment and materials to develop agriculture.

Another point, which is more by way of explanation: it refers to the basic product of Brazil—coffee. Mr. Acheson should know and understand that Brazil does not wish excessive prices for coffee; but coffee is our main currency for paying for our imports; and if we do not have a price for coffee on the same level as that we pay for imported merchandise, the sacrifice will be tremendous for Brazilian economy and for our imports, which would have to be curtailed. Therefore, it is within this criterion that we wish the American Government to regard all the problems related to coffee, since in the past and still today coffee is the basis of Brazilian economic stability.

Unless the President has other instructions, those are the comments that I would like to make at this stage. I wish to conclude by saying that Mr. Acheson has conquered the hearts of all Brazilians, (smiling) and what is more alarming including those of the Brazilian women.

VARGAS—I wish to second the appeal made by the Finance Minister with relation to ships, of which Brazil has at present a great need. Brazil has 6,500 kilometers of sea coast. One-third of its merchant marine fleet was destroyed by submarines during the last war. Some of the German ships that we had taken over were ceded to the United States during the war. Today our merchant marine, one can say, is falling to pieces. It is in constant need of repairs to such an extent that it is naturally impossible to cover operating costs from receipts. Very soon many of them will be laid aside because they are unserviceable. Under these conditions I appeal to the Secretary, as the representative of President Truman, that through sale or lease we be granted some ships. This matter is now being studied by the Joint Commission, but as it depends essentially on the goodwill and understanding of the American Government, I make this appeal now to avoid further delay of a solution. I shall work on this matter and prepare a memorandum for the examination of the Joint Commission for it to submit to Washington as soon as it has worked on it.

I must mention that Brazil is the second largest market in the world for United States goods. It is surpassed only by Canada. This was the appeal that I had to make, recalling an old saying here in Brazil "Os negócios claros conservam a amizade". (Interpreter's translation: "Clear and straight business preserves friendship". The word "straight" was added by the interpreter.)

I wish to add that we are taking steps to improve our port situation. Dredging operations have been contracted for, and administrative measures are being taken to facilitate loading and unloading of ships, in order to reduce time of stay at ports.

The ports will soon be cleared and have empty berths, ready for the new ships to come.

And further, I wish to reiterate my thanks for the honor of the visit of The Secretary of State, expressing the hope that from what he has been able to see and observe he takes with him a good impression, and I sincerely hope that he will defend our interests and aspirations upon his return.

ACHESON—I wish to make one or two comments. (Two or three sentences unheard.) Within a few days after the President's election as President of Brazil, some of your trusted advisers were working with us, on the plans which resulted in the operation of the Joint Commission. Only two or three days ago a loan was announced by the International Bank for hydro-electric power in the State of Rio Grande do Sul. This is very important for the economic development of Brazil. This is still a young administration; it has not gone very far, but fruits have already been harvested. The work of the Commission, of course, had help from the bankers. The projects submitted to the consideration of the banks might be compared to Rio traffic. When you have motorcycle escorts to get obstacles out of the way, you move very fast. But when there are traffic jams, all the horns start blowing and no one makes any progress. Work in banks is no different. On my return, I will request that the banks expedite your matters.

The matter of shipping that the Minister of Finance spoke about presents a very difficult problem for President Truman, because he does not have legislative authority to transfer these ships. This calls for legislation which is difficult to obtain under any circumstances and especially now that Congress is on vacation. Also because this is an election year, and two very powerful groups that are interested are the shipping companies and the Maritime Commission. It is almost impossible to touch on this problem.

This question is being examined and will continue to be examined carefully. It may be found advisable to consider a possible alternative which might be assistance from the United States to enable Brazil to repair and construct its ships for coastwise navigation. Both of these things might be studied carefully. The solution will not be possible, until Congress opens, and this will be a matter to be decided next year when President Truman will not be there and I will no longer be the Secretary of State. All I can do is to indicate the problem and have some recommendations to make.

Mr. President, there are some matters which are of interest to my government, which I know are being given careful consideration by the Brazilian Government. I do not wish to discuss these matters but merely to mention them. At this moment they are being studied by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, by the Minister of Finance or other Government Departments. I do not wish to request any specific decision, but only that there be some decision. I know that whatever decision is reached will be a reasonable and wise one. Some of these problems relate to strategic materials. I know the problem is a difficult one for you, but I hope we can reach a conclusion. There are also problems related to the question of shipping. Some time ago we discussed with your military advisers participation of Brazil in Korea. If you could consider it, it would be very helpful. (One brief remark unheard.)

I should like to mention a matter in very great confidence. It may be of significance or it may not. I wish to inform you that within the last two or three days there has been a marked change in the attitude of the communists during the negotiation for exchange of prisoners. I give you this information in confidence.

We have had these changes in the past. Sometimes they are important, at others without significance, just means of propaganda. This time it may be significant. I do not allow myself to be too optimistic. But there has been a change in the last days, and more of a desire to discuss exchange of prisoners—and this gives me some hope.

The reason I mention this is because it will have a great effect on the international situation if there is an armistice in Korea. We may get some idea of the effect of this if we consider one or two facts about our own effort in Korea.

For instance the supplies we are sending to the front in Korea engage more shipping than the highest volume shipped at any time during the war with Japan. This will give you some idea of the transportation problem confronting the Trans-Siberian Railway. Another fact which is of importance here is the expenditure of ammunition per division on the front; it is six times greater than ever was reached during the last world war. You see this struggle imposes such stress on United States economy, we can get some idea of the strain on Soviet economy. So you can see why this development in the struggle in Korea becomes significant. It is this fact more than any change in attitude on prisoners that leads me to have some hope. If the fighting in Korea stops, we will not have come to the end of the Soviet effort. Only the military phase would be ended, and the new phase of infiltration will begin. The matter will come before the Fall Assembly of the United Nations when the Far East question will be discussed. I shall then see Minister Neves da Fontoura at the General Assembly and I will have the opportunity to discuss matters with him for common guidance. We will have to consider together very carefully and treat the problem coolly and realistically.

Political stability in the Far East will create conditions of stability which . . . (some remarks missed). I thought it was important to lay this situation before you because we must be the ones to bring coolness and wisdom to consideration of the Far East. Some of our colleagues are very enthusiastic. We must be the ones to cool them off. Dr. Neves da Fontoura knows the people I have referred to.

FONTOURA—(Smiling) I know them well.

ACHESON—Mr. President, these are the only observations I had to make and I want to thank you for the close and intimate consultation which you let me have with you and your great advisers.

VARGAS—Consideration is being given to Brazilian interests in the Joint Commission and among those interests is the question of shipping. Maybe the Commission will find a solution for this very pressing problem. I understand legislative difficulties, but I was not aware that they existed. Perhaps I will find a solution. I regret that President Truman is not again a candidate, as the Constitution of his country permits. Perhaps this would have made things easier.

We took into consideration what the Secretary mentioned with regard to the international situation. Several commissions, civil and military are studying the various problems of common interest. On the part of Brazil every effort will be made to overcome difficulties in the treatment of those problems provided Brazil's ability to maintain the social order is not impaired. Brazil is studying the responsibilities that it must undertake in the international situation. They should be proportionate to the authority which may be recognized to Brazil in international decisions, the means that will be assured to it, and account must be taken of the time indispensable for its preparation for the fulfillment of such commitments.

I thank you and everybody present for the success of the conversation.

Minutes of the 197th Meeting of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems, Held in Washington, October 10, 1952 [1]

RESTRICTED

[Here follows a list of those present (26).]

1. Proposed Export-Import Bank Loans to Brazil

Mr. Glendinning stated that the Export-Import Bank had requested the advice of the Council with respect to two loans in Brazil. One of the loans, a credit of $1.86 million, would be to a private Brazilian company that manufactures cast iron pipe. The other loan, of $18 million, would assist in financing Brazilian purchases of United States agricultural equipment. In the discussion of these loans in the Staff Committee, no questions were raised on the technical side. Considerable interest was shown, however, in Brazil's current international short-term position and in the prospects of more favorable treatment for American private investment in Brazil.

Mr. Glendinning noted that the basic questions are how U.S. development lending should be affected by Brazilian action in dealing with Brazil's current unfavorable balance-of-payments position and with its treatment of U.S. private investments. Brazil's current international position is shown by reserves of approximately $317 million, and short-term liabilities of between $300 and $400 million. In addition, Brazil has a sizable payments backlog with Britain and Germany. Conflicting reports exist on the effectiveness of credit control in Brazil. There are indications that control of bank credit has been rather limited and relatively ineffective. With respect to the Brazilian action on private investment remittances, legislation has been introduced providing that such remittances would have access to a free exchange market. This legislation, which is supported by the Brazilian Executive Department, is still pending.

---

[1] The National Advisory Council (NAC), established in 1945, had responsibility for coordinating the policies and operations of U.S. representatives to the IMF, the IBRD, and all other agencies of the government involved in making foreign loans or engaging in foreign financial, exchange, or monetary transactions. The NAC consisted of the Secretary of the Treasury, as Chairman; the Secretaries of State and Commerce; the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System; the Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank; and, originally, the Administrator of the Economic Cooperation Administration (followed by the successive administrators of U.S. agencies for foreign aid).

At this meeting, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs Linder represented the Department of State; he was accompanied by Mr. Corbett and Mr. Stenger.

Mr. Glendinning concluded that considerable discussion occurred in the Staff Committee concerning additional U.S. lending to Brazil in the light of Brazil's current treatment of private investors. During that discussion the representative of the Securities and Exchange Commission had commented on the effect of Brazil's action on the financial position of the American and Foreign Power Company.

Mr. Gaston stated that both loans are considered to be economically justified by the Export-Import Bank as well as by the Joint Brazil–United States Economic Development Commission. The Bank is also satisfied with their soundness. From the point of view of the economy of Brazil, the farm implement loan is a valuable project. As to the other factors, in view of the steps being taken by Brazil, the problem of the arrearages should not be insurmountable, nor does the Bank think further lending should depend on such long-range problems as the inflationary situation, devaluation of the cruzeiro, and associated questions.

Concerning the issue of making loans while the investment legislation is still pending, Mr. Gaston indicated that this is a question for others than the Export-Import Bank to judge. The Bank's impression is that the present Brazilian Government is proceeding in good faith in its attempt to carry through that legislation, and that to interrupt a soundly conceived lending program on the ground that the United States must wait until the legislation is passed would be a mistake. However, Mr. Gaston added that question is in the diplomatic field, and he would defer to the State Department in that respect.

Mr. Rossbach[2] pointed out that the primary concern of the Securities and Exchange Commission was with the American investor. His situation in Brazil does not look well and has become worse in the past year.

Mr. Rossbach expressed the feeling of the Commission that the only way to try to improve the position of the American investor would be by withholding additional loans to Brazil until someone had talked firmly with the Brazilian Government. He agreed, however, that this procedure would be in the field of diplomacy, in which the SEC is not qualified to act. Mr. Rossbach concluded that it did not appear justifiable to make these loans while the position of the American investor in Brazil is so poor.

Mr. Linder began by saying the State Department was not unmindful of the situation of the American investor. However, he believed a different conclusion from the one arrived at by Mr. Rossbach could be drawn from the same facts. Although a good deal of discussion has taken place with the Brazilians, it is impossible to talk to each man in the legislature. The Brazilians have fulfilled their commitment. In fact, they have gone further than that. Both committees of the legislature have endorsed what the United States wants—convertibility arising out of capital transactions. The situation is complicated by reason of the fact that certain exporters have wanted to get on the bandwagon.

Mr. Linder remarked that the judgment of the State Department is that holding up these loans would have just the opposite result to that normally expected. The Brazilians are likely to draw the conclusion that the only time the United States Government will make loans is when our own special interest is involved. As an example, recently a $65 million manganese development loan was made to Brazil. To the State Department it would appear to look very bad, and would induce a very stubborn and unfortunate reaction, if we distinguish between the manganese and other loans. This would have the reverse effect from what everyone here desires.

Mr. Overby indicated that he would like to report the opinion of Mr. Black. The International Bank has had discussions with the Brazilians about the free market bill. In June, 1952, when the Bank made two loans to Brazil (see NAC Action No. 558[3]), it was given assurances that the bill would be passed promptly. The Bank management has taken the attitude that the Bank should not go ahead with additional loans to Brazil until the free market bill with respect to capital transactions has been enacted. Thus various projects are being held up and no final action will be taken until the free market bill is passed. Mr. Black also indicated that the granting of loans now would weaken the Brazilians in going ahead with the free market legislation and that he could not avoid the view that an element of non-parallelism exists in a situation in which the International Bank does not proceed with loans while the Export-Import Bank continues to make them.

Mr. Overby concluded that he believed the above statement fairly represents Mr. Black's views, i.e., opposition to the proposed loans. Since Mr. Black believed it unwise for the International Bank to make loans to Brazil at the present time he would like to see the United States come to the same conclusion with regard to loans by the U.S. Government.

Mr. Gaston observed that all would agree that one objective is to ease the difficulties of American investors in Brazil by adopting methods most likely to relieve their situation. The disagreement seems to be over which method would produce the best results. In commenting on Mr. Overby's remarks, he questioned whether the Brazilians had not made predictions rather than given assurances. He did not believe that the President of the United States could have given assurances in a similar instance.

Mr. Gaston believed a judgment has to be made whether closing the gate on Brazil would so disturb the Brazilians as to complicate United States-Brazilian relations. He believed that is the situation seen by the State Department, and that the problem is to decide on the best tactics. By cutting off the proposed Brazilian loans, he concluded, the United States would be doing itself damage.

Mr. Martin[4] agreed that the basic question is a matter of judgment and that it is wise to accept the judgment of the State Department and the Export-Import Bank. He pointed out that the Bank is satisfied with the soundness of the loans and that the Government has to rely on the conduct of negotiations as to what progress is being made.

The Brazilian short-run picture, Mr. Martin continued, is one of mismanagement and difficulties that the Brazilians are perhaps compounding, and every effort should be made to assist them to take steps to protect not only the investors, but the solvency of Brazil as well. Particularly since the International Bank has a different attitude, the Council should take note of the present difficulties of the Brazilians and should place the burden of responsibility on the State Department and diplomatic officials to obtain some solution of the fundamental problems.

The Chairman stated he believed that the State Department has faced this responsibility. He recalled that in discussing the Brazilian situation with Mr. Acheson, he was advised that the State Department was fully prepared to carry the matter through. The Department felt that the granting of these loans would put the situation on a better diplomatic level. The Department has the strongest assurances from the Brazilian executive side that this matter will be pushed through—so there has not been any neglect of the gravity of the situation. The Chairman concluded that, when Finance Minister Lafer was here, he and Mr. Acheson had impressed on the Finance Minister and the Brazilian Ambassador that the matter was one that had to be given very prompt consideration and had to be pressed on through.

Mr. Linder commented that he had considerable sympathy with the point of view of the International Bank, but he did not believe the two Bank situations were the same. The International Bank has the problem of the sale of its securities and the attitude of the public. He added that the State Department would be perfectly agreeable to the exertion of such pressure as is likely to bring about results.

The Chairman remarked that the U.S. Government cannot continue to lend funds without some definite assurances from the Brazilians that they will go through with the plans to the best of their ability.

Mr. Schneider[5] said that the Department of Commerce would go along with the State Department. He questioned, however, the wisdom of lending money to a private Brazilian company for the manufacture of cast iron pipe, since the company is in competition with U.S. exporters.

Mr. Gaston explained that the Bank was lending a relatively small amount for the purchase of American materials in order to have a part in the construction of the pipe plant. It has been a part of the Bank's policy to encourage private industry in foreign countries to expand. This industry will not be in competion with American industry because he did not believe there was any movement of pipe of this character at this time. It would seem rather illogical, he felt, for a country with Brazil's iron resources to import so bulky a product as this large-dimensional pipe from the United States.

Without further discussion the recommended action was approved.

Action: The following action was taken (Action No. 581):

The National Advisory Council advises the Export-Import Bank that it approves consideration by the Bank of two Brazilian loans: one, a credit of $1.86 million to the Companhia Metalurgica Barbara to help finance the improvement and expansion of its cast iron pipe manufacturing facilities in Brazil; and the other, a credit of $18 million to the Banco Nacional do Desenvolvimento Economico to assist in financing Brazilian purchases of United States agricultural equipment.

It is understood that the $1.86 million credit would be repaid in installments with a final maturity of approximately eight years, including a grace period of approximately 18 months, and that the interest rate would be not more than 4½ percent. It is also understood that the $18 million credit would be repaid in installments with a final maturity of approximately five years, including a grace period of 18 months, and that the interest rate would be 4 percent or less.

[Here follows discussion concerning a proposed Greek debt settlement.]

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller) to the Ambassador in Brazil (Johnson)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL
OFFICIAL–INFORMAL

[WASHINGTON,] October 17, 1952.

DEAR HERSCHEL: You have read my letter of October 11[2] to Merwin reporting on Lafer's visit,[3] and outlining the increasing difficulties we are facing up here until the remittance bill is passed and something is done about the backlog.[4]

I recognize the danger of overplaying our hand if we apply too much pressure on our Brazilian friends, but I'm wondering if this might not be a very opportune time for you and Merwin to call on the President and review the situation with him.

I assume that Vargas' recent proposal to create new government jobs for his political opponents may mean that he is getting along with them much better. Hence, he now might be able to get some support from them in pushing the remittance bill through.

Also, I gather that Lafer has checked in with the President after his trip and has passed on the views he collected up here. A visit by you and Merwin now might help crystallize his decision and speed up action.

Such a visit might backfire if the President construed it as a pressure play, but I am sure you could handle it to avoid this result.

You might indicate to Lafer that your desire for a talk with Vargas was prompted by me, because I feel that the picture has been muddied

---

[1] Drafted by Mr. Cottrell.

[2] A copy of the referenced letter is contained in Miller files, lot 53 D 26, "Brazil."

[3] Minister Lafer's unofficial visit to New York City and Washington took place during the latter part of September.

[4] Reference is to the commercial debt owed by Brazil to U.S. exporters. With respect to the commercial backlog, Mr. Miller's letter of Oct. 11, 1952, reads in part as follows:

"The picture is becoming complicated by a new factor, namely, the dissatisfaction that is felt up here over Brazil's credit position and this has in the last few weeks become the prime issue in regard to Brazil both here and in New York. It is true that Lafer has taken certain courageous measures to cut down imports but the feeling is that in addition to this he should come up with some definite plan with regard to the backlog and secondly that he then should go to the root of the problem which is the devaluation of the cruzeiro. On the first of these, namely the backlog problem, Lafer met with unanimous disapproval of his idea of putting exports for the next six months on a 180-day credit basis. Mr. Snyder himself felt that this was unfair to the smaller exporters who are now waiting for their money and there was general skepticism as to whether he could get their suppliers of wheat and oil to go along. The Eximbank offered him in effect a $250 million credit for four or five years at a low interest rate for the backlog and both Treasury and Mr. Southard of the Fund supported this proposal. Lafer however did not display enthusiasm probably because of his fear that once Brazil was up to date, they would go on another spending spree. With regard to the proposed devaluation of the cruzeiro, he simply said absolutely no, and he seems to be adamant even over the proposal to put some exports up into the free market."

since Lafer's visit by some misunderstandings, including the recent press statement by Stanley Andrews, and I would like to have the situation clarified to the President as we now see it. Although I have not seen Ary[5] or Sarmanho personally for some time, I understand that both of them are quite bitter about the position of the IBRD. If they report to Vargas that the whole difficulty is here in Washington, it may focus Vargas' attention in this direction instead of spurring efforts to move the remittance bill along, and get on with a solution to the backlog problem.

You might seek the audience on the grounds that both of you called on him last April, and would like to review the progress made since that date. You might say to the President that United States Government agencies in Washington and the World Bank are, thanks in part to the fine impression left by Minister Lafer, willing to help Brazil to the maximum extent in getting on with our development loan program. This goodwill was originally demonstrated when the Banks granted about $100 million in loans during the early part of the year, and has been demonstrated again by the Eximbank loans for the Barbara and agricultural machinery projects. However, although this willingness has not diminished, certain problems have arisen in the United States which have made it difficult for the Banks to continue at the rate they and we desire. You might point out that both Banks are necessarily sensitive to public opinion here, and particularly so in this election year. Consequently, they find it increasingly difficult to maintain the loan program at top speed in the face of growing impatience on the part of U.S. investors and exporters concerned with the remittance decree and the backlog. You can say that, as a result of Minister Lafer's visit, official circles here are convinced of Brazil's active interest in these problems, but the general public is not fully aware of this. They only see that their bills are still unpaid and the remittance bill is not passed. You might tell the President that you are sure he can understand this political dilemma in which we find ourselves, and you could emphasize that we do not want him to interpret this slowdown to any idea that it might be deliberate coercion on our part, or due to any lack of sympathy or understanding of his own problems.

You might tell him that it is a fact that when these two problems are solved, it will relieve the pressures on the Banks to slow down, and they will then be able to resume the normal rate.

I should tell you that we also have a selfish interest up here in promoting such a visit to the President. First, it would permit us to reply to our critics that the problem has been discussed with the President himself, and secondly, if he gives you any encouragement, it will be very helpful in bucking up other agencies here and certain skeptical individuals.

I hope you and Merwin will give this suggestion your best thought, and let me know what your views are. If you approve, please go ahead without any further clearance, and make your approach as you think best.

Our reports on radio broadcasts in Brazil indicate that Neves Fontoura may come up prepared to talk about the loan program. We shall discuss this subject with him along the lines outlined above.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely yours, EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Sterling J. Cottrell of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 12, 1953.

Subject: Status of JBUSEDC Railroad Projects

PARTICIPANTS

IBRD	State
Mr. Eugene Black	ARA—Ambassador Merwin Bohan
Mr. Robert Garner	AR—Mr. Edward Cale
Mr. Burke Knapp	E—Mr. Emerson Ross
	OSA—Mr. Sterling Cottrell

A. Following is a summary of the principal statements made by Ambassador Bohan:

1. The Joint Commission expects to finish its work on March 31, with project reports completed and reviews of the railroad program by the Budd [1] group, of the power program by Mr. Ackerman,[2] and of the shipping program by Admiral Cochrane.[3]

2. Of the approximately $140 million of railroad projects, $40 million in loans have already been granted, about $50 million are now under study by the Bank, and the remaining $50 million are in final preparation by the Joint Commission and should be in finished form by March 31.

3. The railroad projects are the heart of the whole development loan program. President Vargas has repeatedly expressed his opinion that

Mr. Budd was also Chairman of the Chicago Transit Authority, President and Director of the Great Northern Railway, and Director of the First National Bank in Chicago. For a list of the members of the Special Railroad Mission (the "Budd group"), see The Development of Brazil, p. 244.

[2] Adolph Ackerman, Special Consultant on Power Development, United States Section, Joint Brazil–United States Economic Development Commission.

[3] Edward L. Cochrane, Chairman, Federal Maritime Board.

the railroads must be rehabilitated as quickly as possible and should be given top priority.

4. When the Joint Commission was established in 1950, the most important political question was whether Vargas would lead Brazil towards cooperation with the US or towards an independent or opposition position. The hope of financing a substantial part of Brazil's basic economic development through the help of the Joint Commission may well have tipped the scales in favor of a US orientation. The Joint Commission and the US therefore have an implied obligation to see that properly prepared projects are financed.

5. Now the stage is set and positive action is required. The projects are almost complete, and the Brazilian bill to reorganize the railroads will soon be debated in Congress. A statement is now needed from the IBRD that the railroad projects, totalling approximately $140 million, will be financed—subject to clearly stated terms. This will a) enable the Joint Commission to terminate its mission properly, having fulfilled its commitments, b) give support to the passage of the railroad reorganization bill, c) indicate clearly to the Brazilians what more they must do to qualify for the loans and d) constitute an outstanding success in US–Brazil relations.

6. Failure of the Bank to provide the above assurance of financing subject to clear terms, and an indefinite delay in acting on projects already presented by the Joint Commission would:

a) Completely wipe out the prestige of the Joint Commission.

b) Make more difficult, if not preclude, passage of the railway reorganization legislation.

c) Profoundly affect US–Brazil relations and alienate President Vargas, who has always laid particular stress on the railway rehabilitation program. Vargas frankly outlined his views to us last May, pointing out his inability to understand how we gave prompt aid to rehabilitate an enemy's rail system (Italy) while so long delaying cooperation with an ally (Brazil).

B. The views expressed by Mr. Black, Mr. Garner and Mr. Knapp are summarized as follows:

1. Minister Lafer and other Brazilians were informed two years ago, and subsequently, that the railroad system of Brazil must be reorganized before the IBRD could make railroad loans.

2. In two years there has been little tangible progress by Brazil to improve the situation, with the exception of the draft bill to reorganize the railroads, which has not yet been considered by Congress. No decision has yet been made by the Brazilians concerning the Bank's proposal to share with it in sponsoring a railway management survey group.

3. The IBRD is interested in investing only in a sound rail transportation system in Brazil, not in financing additional equipment which the existing badly operated lines could not use effectively. Patching up the poor existing system is unsound. The IBRD must be concerned with the soundness of its investment, in the interests of all its members.

4. The IBRD has always avoided prior commitments to lend any specific amounts. Placing conditions on such commitments is no real protection; these are rapidly forgotten and misunderstandings soon arise. The general statement of IBRD to the effect that, in principle, it believed sound projects could be developed in Brazil of at least $300 million, and that IBRD would consider such projects, was twisted by the Brazilians into a report that IBRD would loan Brazil $300 million.

5. IBRD cannot guarantee financing in advance of a detailed study of each individual loan project, and consideration of other general factors.

6. Even if the US felt that it had a political interest in the railroad projects, the IBRD is an international banking institution and cannot compromise its principles to accommodate US political considerations.

7. Although the Department should not inform the Brazilians, the fact is that European members of IBRD are very concerned about Brazil's delay in settling old European claims, and they are reluctant to see large new credits granted before the Brazilians show a reasonable willingness to undertake negotiations on these old debts.

8. Without prior commitment as to a total amount, the IBRD is prepared to do its utmost in financing Brazilian railroads on the basis of sound loans. Aside from investigation of the technical merits of individual projects, the Bank feels that the necessary conditions are:

a) Passage of the railroad reorganization bill.

b) A survey report by consultants acceptable to the IBRD and to the Brazilians (IBRD would pay ½ the cost).

c) Managerial reforms to complement any equipment rehabilitation loans.

If the survey group confirmed that the railroad projects were sound, and that the Brazilians were sincerely interested in making necessary reforms, it is possible that the IBRD could go along step by step in granting loans, as it has done in Colombia. However, at the present time there are too many unfavorable factors to permit prior guarantees. The Brazilians must show some constructive results and attitudes to qualify for railroad loans.

9. Loans for railways or any other purpose must be considered in the light of the Bank's judgment as to Brazilian over-all credit worthiness and the priorities among different development fields. The Bank looks to Brazil to take adequate steps to solve the present arrears problem, and to insure future financial stability. This has a direct bearing on whether Brazil can repay development loans.

10. If the Department or the Joint Commission cannot work with the IBRD on the above basis, for political or other reasons, they are free to seek other sources of financing. In such an event the Department should plan on finding funds to cover the entire balance of the Joint Commission's projects because the IBRD could not take only a portion of the program. This would create the risk that Brazil might be loaded with other loans in excess of its ability to pay.

The Acting Secretary of State to the Embassy in Brazil[1]

SECRET PRIORITY WASHINGTON, February 5, 1953.

850. For Ambassador Johnson. FYI we are increasingly concerned at Brazil's delay in ratifying Military Assistance Agreement. (1) Brazil's participation of major importance to success whole Latin American program not only because of traditionally close defense ties with U.S., but also because role Brazil assumes under military plan means she will receive largest share U.S. assistance. (2) Unless existing appropriations are obligated before June 30, we have no assurance funds will be continued available for use during FY 1954. To obligate funds for program for Brazil by June 30 will require time. Defense indicates it cannot complete obligation procedure until Brazil has ratified. Even if ratification accomplished by early March, obligation by June 30 will be extremely difficult. (3) Defense anticipates that after Brazilian agreement ratified, Brazilian military will be approached with proposal for amendment to military plan under which Brazil would agree prepare additional AA battalion or battalions for hemispheric defense, for which U.S. would provide assistance. If Brazil should prove unwilling agree to accept expanded defense mission, agreement of another LA country may be sought. In either case, funds should be obligated by June 30 to assure their availability during fiscal year 1954.

Unless you perceive objection, you should discuss ratification problem with FonMin soonest, indicating reason our concern except (3) above.

Desire you discuss with General Beiderlinden[2] advisability of approach by him to Brazilian military officials in best position to further ratification. In military conversations it would be desirable to indicate U.S. prepared start deliveries equipment at earliest date after ratification, within about ninety days.

Reference (3) above, as separate undertaking, if considered advisable, General Beiderlinden being requested by separate message to ascertain from appropriate Brazilian military authorities, without making definite U.S. commitment, whether there is prospect Brazil after ratification would agree to amendment military plan under which Brazil would prepare additional AA battalion or battalions and U.S. would provide additional assistance.

If you and General Beiderlinden concur in above procedures proceed accordingly otherwise indicate soonest your reaction.

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in Brazil

SECRET WASHINGTON, February 20, 1953—5:43 p. m.

891. Executive Board of IMF acted Feb. 19 on Brazil proposal for free market. Text of Brazil's cable to Fund describing market is contained in accompanying Department telegram.[1] Fund decision as follows:

"1. Brazil has consulted with the Fund regarding the establishment of a free exchange market for most capital and invisible transactions, as well as for some trade items, in which the rates will fluctuate freely, according to supply and demand. The Fund approves the establishment of a free market as described in the cable of February 13 from the Superintendency of Money and Credit, the remaining transactions to be conducted in the official exchange market at fixed rates based on the parities declared to the Fund by its member countries.

"2. The Fund considers that the objective should be progressively to transfer exports and imports to the free market. However, the Fund does not consider that multiple mixing ratios for exports or imports are either desirable or necessary. There might be developments in the free market rate which would justify single mixing ratios for exports and imports respectively for a temporary period. In this event, the Fund realizes that some experiment to determine the appropriate mixing ratio might be necessary and that periodic adjustments in the mixing ratio might be needed. The Fund wishes to continue in consultation with Brazil on this aspect of the system.

"3. The Fund agrees that Brazil may shift exports and imports from the official to the free market without further prior consultation with the Fund. It is understood, however, that Brazil will remain in close consultation with the Fund, and that Brazil will inform the Fund promptly of such shifts, including any changes which may be made in the mixing ratios.

"4. The Fund notes that Brazil intends to continue a highly restrictive import policy with a view toward restoring its reserve position and reducing its heavy short-term exchange obligations. The Fund further notes that measures are being undertaken to ensure a more effective coordination between the issuance of import licenses and exchange availabilities. However, the Fund calls attention to the need for more far reaching adjustments in order to bring about the prompt restoration of Brazil's balance of payments equilibrium. In this connection, the Fund wishes to stress the importance of enforcing effective monetary and credit policies, which are indispensable to ensure the success of the new exchange system.

"5. The government of Brazil is deemed to have fulfilled the requirement of consultation in accordance with Article XIV of the Fund Agreement. In concluding the 1952 consultations, the Fund has no other comments to make on the transitional arrangements maintained by Brazil."

Embassy should note that effect of paragraph one of above Fund decision is to approve Brazilian proposal contained in accompanying Department telegram. Paragraph two of decision therefore has status of advice and does not in legal sense qualify approval contained first paragraph. Thus if Brazilians adopt three mixing ratios for exports they will not be violating the Fund decision.

Decision should first reach Brazilian authorities direct from Fund. Embassy should make certain this is case before revealing its knowledge text.

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann) to the Secretary of State[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] February 20, 1953.

Subject: Brazil's request for a Commercial Backlog Loan; Briefing for the Brazilian Ambassador's visit.

The Brazilian Government has applied to the Export-Import Bank for a 3-year, $350 million loan to enable Brazil to liquidate its commercial backlog owing to United States exporters. The Under Secretary, on the recommendation of Mr. Linder,[2] decided that the United States should not approve a loan in excess of $100 million. The Under Secretary added that if Brazil reacted unfavorably he would be disposed to reconsider. With the Department's concurrence, the NAC yesterday approved a $100 million loan and the Export-Import Bank is expected to pass on the Brazilian application this morning.

Upon being informed of the $100 million limit, the Ambassador requested an appointment with you.

The Brazilian Government will consider our attitude toward this request as a test of the willingness of the new administration to cooperate with Brazil in the solution of its economic problems. While this Bureau has never recommended economic grants for Latin America, I believe that a sound and adequate lending policy toward the area is vital to our ability to keep them on our side; and that this is particularly true of Brazil, our traditional and principal ally in the inter-American system. Our failure to lend adequate cooperation will create a serious risk that Brazil will become more nationalistic and less cooperative in its relations with us.

While Brazil should institute extensive reforms, it is vital that our tactic at this time should be to lend them sound and reasonable support while at the same time urging them to recognize that their, and not just our, interests require them to carry out these reforms. We should not attempt to hold Brazil's feet to the fire and attempt to force them, by limiting our cooperation, to do things which they are not yet prepared to do.

Recommendations:

1. That you listen to the Brazilian Ambassador's exposition of his point of view and inform him that you will take this matter under immediate advisement.

2. Subsequent to the Ambassador's departure, that the Department reconsider this problem. It is ARA's position that the Department should inform the NAC that it considers an Export-Import Bank loan to Brazil of between a minimum of $200 million and a maximum of $300 million required by the national interest. The question of the limit of Brazil's ability to repay and the precise terms and conditions under which the loan will be made should be specified by the Export-Import Bank. This formula would give the Export-Import Bank the necessary latitude to negotiate an agreement which would accommodate the best interests of both countries.[3]

On Feb. 21, 1953, the Export-Import Bank authorized a line of credit in the amount of $300 million in favor of the Banco do Brasil, S. A., to assist Brazil in liquidating its past due United States dollar accounts. [1]The Secretary's staff meetings, held two or three times a week during the years 1952–1960, were attended by the Under Secretary of State, the Assistant Secretary of

Brazilian Export-Import Credit

5. The Secretary reported that over the weekend the President had made a decision, in which the Secretary had concurred, with regard to $300-million which the Brazilians claim the U.S. had made a moral commitment to endorse. While the Brazilian argument was not conclusive, it was believed that the U.S. should go along with the Brazilians understanding of the commitment. The Secretary noted that there had been previous contact with the new administration on this matter. The President had taken a keen interest in it and did not want to lay the new Administration open to possible charges from the Latinos of bad faith with regard to commitments made with the old Administration.

Mr. Linder said his previous reasoning had been that since our moral commitment was made with regard to a figure between 100- and 150-million the present figure of 300-million seemed to change the basis of our agreement. This request, furthermore, may be only the first of a series of such requests and acquiescence now might establish a precedent. The Secretary said that the reduction in the 300-million figure was discussed in the White House, but it was felt that the U.S. would be freer to deal with subsequent requests if the U.S. went along with commitments the Brazilians believed had already been made.

The Ambassador in Brazil (Johnson) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL RIO DE JANEIRO, April 27, 1953—8 p. m.

1501. Embassy telegram 1451, April 15.[1] I met with Foreign Minister this afternoon by arrangement to discuss question JBUSEDC termination. He told me that he has been in active consultation with President and his government colleagues on this matter for past two weeks, that he now has a draft note, which is projected as reply our note which he has in draft form (Department's instruction 77, April 2).[2] Minister said he would prefer not give me his draft this afternoon as he has one or two points yet to clear up through conversation with Ambassador Salles at Washington. He will ask me to see him later this week and will give drafted text.

[1] In the referenced telegram, Ambassador Johnson reported that he had discussed termination of the Joint Brazil–United States Economic Development Commission with the Brazilian Foreign Minister, and that the Foreign Minister had asked him to refrain from delivering a note on the subject until he had an opportunity to review the matter with President Vargas (832.00 TA/4–1553).

[2] Not printed (832.00 TA/4–253).

Minister then began his discussion of proposed Brazilian reply by saying that he agreed with principles of our proposed note and with our reasons for proposing termination Joint Commission on June 30. He said, however, that for "purely internal political reasons" Vargas administration earnestly hopes we will accede to Brazilian request which is contained in his draft note for termination Commission December 30 instead June 30 this year, even if it is continued with greatly reduced personnel after June 30. He hopes we would agree to withhold our projected note until arrival Dr. Milton Eisenhower in Rio end of June. I replied to Minister that I will be glad transmit his draft note when I receive it, together with his views, but that I had certain personal views about matter which I would state to him quite frankly. First, in my personal opinion, it would be unfortunate delay decision on this matter until end June and that I personally did not think question of life of Commission was matter which should be brought up for discussion with Dr. Eisenhower.[3] I further pointed out to him that if life of Commission is extended on skeleton basis after June 30 until December 30, it would be bound to arouse hopes and expectations on part of public which might well be impracticable of realization; that resulting disillusionment would tend to wipe out good effects of Commission's previous achievements and might, through its effect on a disappointed public opinion, have undesirable results on our relations, which would not be to benefit of either Brazil or United States. I further pointed out that by June 30, project reports included in Commission's program will have been completed, that there is no practical possibility of any enlarged program resulting from continuation Commission for further six months, particularly as projects already completed by June 30 will be in hands of lending institutions for consideration and final determination as to financing. The Minister took my statements in good part and said he fully understands cogency of argument.

There is little doubt in my mind that Vargas administration hopes for further extensive financing from US and is therefore reluctant see technical termination Joint Commission, which provides convenient machinery for these expanded hopes. In spite of government's desperate economic situation, however, and the intense desire and need for all dollar currency they can obtain, I believe responsible members of government, including Lafer and Fontoura, realize how thin a basis they have for additional loans from US until those already received and others possible under completed program of Joint Commission, have been organized and put in process of eventual liquidation. Political weakness of administration and its difficulty in getting support for legislative and administrative programs, is also factor which would give illusion that salvation might be found in further loans.

I am setting forth these preliminary views for Department's consideration, I have discussed matter briefly with Ambassador Bohan, who agrees with foregoing. I would prefer reserve further comment until I have had opportunity consult with Lafer as well as Neves da Fontoura again, and to have actual text Brazilian draft note.

1534. For Atwood from Bohan. In view possibility Department's taking early decision re life joint commission as suggested Deptel 1175,[1] I wish to submit my views on this important question.

As general feeling Brazilian circles joint commission should not be dissolved, it would appear we have three alternative courses of action:

1. To follow present policy that joint commission can be terminated June 30 whether agreement reached or not with Brazilians.

Disadvantages:

a. This action would undoubtedly be interpreted by public as proof new administration not interested economic cooperation with Brazil and would be popularly considered as failure US live up to commitment provide financing joint commission program. While admittedly no legal commitment re financing present joint commission program exists and even moral commitment debatable there is no question that from public relations standpoint in Brazil, US committed finance program since public officials and newspapers here have so stated for better part of two years without any denial ever having been made by US.

b. Failure provide plan for foreign financing means uncompleted program since cruzeiro financing arranged, implementing institution (Banco de Desenvolvimento) established and technical projects finished.

2. Acquiesce in desires continue joint commission until December 31.

Disadvantages:

a. Solution only remaining problem facing joint commission, i.e., foreign financing, would not be furthered but would become more acute with passage of time because of political and other pressures.

b. Staff of joint commission with one or two exceptions cannot be held together after June 30 and manifestly impossible recruit and clear new group for this limited service.

3. Complete program joint commission by reaching agreement on foreign financing plan prior to June 30 thus removing valid substantive objections to termination that date. This, of course, would not meet present Brazilian pressure for continuance commission to December 31 for "internal political reasons."

American section finishing a financial plan which appears to be well within Brazil's capacity assume foreign debt and provides for orderly and systematic implementation joint commission program including managerial reform railways and reforms in administration of port and coastwise shipping services. This plan will be ready for submission to Department within 10 days.

This course would appear to be in best interests US since it would permit meeting Brazilian public conception US commitment, relieve US from joint responsibility implementation program during period when Brazilian Government finds it particularly difficult take sustained economic action and allow US retire from joint commission program with all flags flying.

Foregoing does not preclude our continuing lend assistance in implementation of program through railway mission or otherwise although we would prefer that US provide advisory assistance rather than assuming new joint responsibilities at this time.

Minister emphasized vital importance which his government attaches to extension life of commission to end this calendar year.

From our gauge of responsible official and public opinion on this question, I am in agreement with Minister's view that termination commission June 30 would be generally misunderstood here and would have damaging effect on US-Brazilian relations.

If for reasons of policy, Department reaches decision to accede to Brazilian views, it seems to me essential that we have at same time a clear-cut and precise understanding on both sides as to what is to be expected of commission when its present program is completed by June 30 and what is to be expected from US. Scope for misunderstanding in this field could be very wide and would seem to require understanding also with lending institutions who would be expected pass on financing of approved projects. If a satisfactory mutual basis of understanding for extended life commission can be found, I think it would be in our interests meet Brazilian view regarding date of termination. Vargas administration is passing through very serious crisis at present moment, which it is generally believed will end in number cabinet changes. Until peak this crisis has been passed, elements of confusion which exist in Ministry Finance and Bank of Brazil are not likely be cleared up. As early decision as practicable on question termination date joint commission favorable to Brazilian views and with appropriate mutual understandings between US and Brazil along lines above indicated would do much stabilize political position and strengthen administration's hand.

Foreign Minister says his government is looking forward with keenest anticipation to visit Dr. Milton Eisenhower and is confident that during visit broad basis of understanding for future development our mutual interests and relations can be established.

Brazilians believe existence Commission will help obtain commitments from banks or shift balance program financing to Eximbank or Treasury. Should be made clear Foreign Minister neither possibility exists.

2. Past misunderstandings and present impasse are result repeated unsuccessful attempts place financing on basis advance Bank commitments, specified conditions. Also public statements have created misunderstandings regarding financial commitments. Continuation this basis would lead to further frustrations and misunderstandings detrimental entire program.

3. To break impasse and move forward constructively towards ultimate successful financing Joint Commission program new basis must be established now. It should rest on understanding that US Government, Brazilian Government and lending institutions all desire see Brazil's economic development be financed as rapidly as possible but within Brazil's borrowing capacity to prevent over extension credit and default. If this principle accepted then Brazil's capacity becomes key and limit to financing, not advance commitments unrelated to Brazil's financial position.

4. These criteria can be determined by IBRD in close cooperation and study with Brazilian economists of National Development Bank. To accomplish this purpose IBRD willing establish representative Rio and work closely on financial aspects.

5. Should be understood that if Brazil's credit deteriorates for whatever cause, loaning progress will slow accordingly. If credit improves loan rate should accelerate.

6. IBRD and Development Bank staff studies will reveal what measures can be taken to improve Brazil's credit and these will provide guide to constructive action.

7. Embassy telegram 1534[3] describing financing plan being developed American Section Commission indicates prior bank commitments implicit. Since these cannot be obtained Department recommends this plan be submitted IBRD not for purpose exacting commitment but for its staff use in proceeding according above outlined plan.

8. Department appreciates possible internal political repercussions and possible attacks upon US as result terminating Commission. However Department believes extent these developments will depend largely upon how termination is presented to Brazilian public and officials. If no effort made place constructive view on above plan reaction could be severe. If intelligent sincere effort made by Brazilians and Embassy to present new plan in favorable light and early publicity initiative taken to forestall critics then repercussions could be minimized.

This will be facilitated through close cooperation National Development Bank and IBRD local representative; (c) Execution projects. Main responsibility rests recipient loans. Assistance by bank staffs. US help through technical assistance provided through Technical Assistance Agreement 1950.[4]

The United States Commissioner on the Joint Brazil–United States Economic Development Commission (Bohan) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL RIO DE JANEIRO, May 20, 1953.

No. 1735

Subject: Termination of Joint Commission

The receipt of the Department's telegram 1197 of May 8, 1953[1] brought an end to a period of uncertainty dating back to the first days of October 1952. In one sense, the receipt of specific policy directives was a welcome development, in another, a deep disappointment.

All members of the American Section of the Joint Commission will scrupulously observe the policy directives laid down and do whatever is in their power to present the new policy in the best possible light to the Brazilian Government and public. A good case can be made for the Joint Commission. Rarely has a cooperative international effort achieved such concrete results in so short a period. The Commission, in just under two years, has laid out a program amounting to an equivalency of over U.S. $1 billion, assured a noninflationary financing of the entire cruzeiro costs of the program and obtained, or is in the final stages of obtaining, almost 50% of the foreign currency requirements. In addition, an institution (National Bank for Economic Development) has been set up for the express purpose of implementing the Joint Commission program.

This would seem to be record enough. It certainly deserves a rating of very good, just a fraction under excellent. Why, then, are we disappointed? Simply because that fractional difference is the difference between failure and success, certainly in the political sense and perhaps also in the economic sense.

Looking back over the last two years it is easy to see the mistakes that have been made. One of the worst was the very limited area in the United States Government to which responsibility for and knowledge of the Joint Commission was restricted. By January 1953 there was no one in the Department with a personal knowledge of the events leading up to the establishment of the Joint Commission or of its first year of operations. This explains, in part at least, why the true nature of the Joint Commission began to be lost sight of, for the Commission was the heart of a political not an economic program. It was designed to play the major role in an effort to recapture the spirit of mutual confidence which from the days of Elihu Root and the Baron of Rio Branco down to the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt had characterized Brazilian-American relations.

Before the connotations of the word "political" affect the reputation of the Joint Commission, let me hasten to add that the Commission is quite prepared to show that its program is economically sound and within Brazil's ability to assume foreign debt as well as to repay it without either undue strain on its resources or its friendship with the United States. The point I wish to make is that the objective was political—only the implementation was economic. Improving the balance of payments or bettering the managerial practices on Brazilian railroads, for example, were problems, not objectives.

Once it is granted that the program was political, then the selection of the International Bank as the sole source of financing (with specified exceptions) can be seen to have been a major error since it delegated authority over implementation of a bilateral political program to an international banking institution which quite rightly prides itself on its independence and resistance to the individual political interests of its members. By June of 1952 those concerned with the program were becoming fully aware of the gravity of the mistake that had been made and this awareness was not based entirely on the political considerations I have described, but also stemmed from the growing ill will shown towards the Bank in Brazil.

This ill will, bitterness is perhaps a better term, is a fact that must be taken into account not merely in the relations of Brazil and the IBRD but also in the relations of Brazil and the United States. As no presently useful purpose would be served by attempting to allocate responsibility for this unfortunate situation, I will only observe that, on the one hand, the importance of the "jeito" in getting along in Brazil was not recognized; and on the other hand, if Brazil had deliberately started out to sabotage its own credit record abroad and to dissipate the really extraordinary fund of good will it had built up in United States business and Government circles, it could not have succeeded in doing half as good a job as its economic bungling has accomplished in the last two years.

In fact, Brazil committed so many sins in the economic field that a great many of its former friends turned against it. This easy way of escaping responsibility was denied the American Section of the Joint Commission which had to keep its sights trained on the political objective of its program and do what it could to repair the damage done in the economic sector, as witness the role it played in finding a solution for the remittance problem and influencing the Minister of Finance to work out a plan for the liquidation of the commercial backlog.

Comparatively successful in its efforts to patch up the damage done to its program by extraneous developments in Brazil, the American Section failed conspicuously in its efforts in Washington to bring its program back into political focus and to obtain acceptance of the fact that serious as were the short-term effects of the mistakes which had been made by the Brazilian Government, nothing more than superficial damage had been done to the Brazilian economy.

Between my return from Washington on April 5, 1953 and departure for Quitandinha on April 8, the situation was reviewed with Ladd[2] and Glaessner.[3] Out of those conversations came a determination to make a last attempt to find a solution for the impasse in which we then found ourselves, it having been agreed that the following considerations would have to be kept in mind if we were to find a wise solution.

1. Consideration of the problem within the narrow confines of what the IBRD would and would not do would be expanded to the broader area of U.S. political and economic interests in Brazil. Even so, the commitment prejudices of IBRD would be given full weight.

2. Particular stress would be laid on the economic soundness of any solution since our insistence that the program's long-term objectives took precedence over Brazil's short-term mistakes had led to a certain confusion in Washington. While the Joint Commission had nothing to apologize for as concerns its economic approach (legislation for noninflationary financing, creation of the Development Bank, and reorganization of railway management all trace their origin to the Joint Commission), nevertheless, it should be prepared to have its proposals judged in the light of commercial rather than sound economic development banking practices.

3. The debatable question as to whether or not the U.S. has a moral commitment to finance the program would be excluded, but the fact that the Brazilian public believes such a commitment exists would be given full weight. Two factors influenced our decision in this instance. The first, that an acceptable way to meet that belief could be found without the need for any banking commitments; the second, that failure to meet it laid the U.S. open not only to the widespread belief that it had failed to live up to its obligations, but would make it the whipping boy for any failures in program implementation. The cynical observation that this is the traditional role of the U.S. is not entirely pertinent since failure to include a foreign currency financial plan in the Joint Commission program leaves that program with only three of the four legs which correspond to it (cruzeiro financing, projects, implementing institution).

4. Any considerable delays in the orderly and systematic implementation of the program increases the danger of diversion of Lafer Plan funds, affects the currency of projects (the railway projects, for example, are based on railway needs today, not last year or next year), and promotes the general unwinding of the entire correlated program. Such consequences, if no financial plan is advanced, can and undoubtedly will be blamed on the United States, but as these delays may well result from failure on the part of the Brazilian Government to carry out such measures as prompt managerial reform of railways, the U.S. should, in such a case, be in a position to escape joint responsibility for the results of such delays.

Even though a great deal of work had been done, particularly in the field of the balance of payments, we were not quite ready when events forced us to send our telegram 1538 of May 5 [6], 1953.[4] Incidentally, the Department was in error in concluding that our plan necessarily called for prior bank commitments (point 7, Department's 1197). It would only have called for a policy decision on the part of the U.S. Government. In broad outlines the last project of the Joint Commission would have made specific recommendations to the Brazilian and U.S. Governments which, upon acceptance, would have constituted an inter-governmental commitment. Details: Brazil to a) Ask urgency for railroad legislation; b) Create Executive Board for Railway Rehabilitation composed of from five to seven outstanding Brazilians to act prior to passage of reform legislation; c) Contract Foreign Railway Mission; d) Appoint Executive Board composed of outstanding executives to specific railways to start improving operations at once; e) Institute port administrative reforms; f) Merge the Lloyd Brasileiro and Costeira coastwise shipping services. The U.S. would only have been committed to lend its good offices to secure the necessary foreign currency financing as the measures recommended to Brazil were taken and in planned relation to total Brazilian foreign debt outstandings. A debt ceiling would, of course, have been recommended. The situation would then have worked out about as follows:

ESTIMATED DEBT SERVICE IN ALL CURRENCIES ON BRAZIL'S EXTERNAL DEBT, ASSUMING FULL FINANCING OF JOINT COMMISSION PROGRAM BY THE END OF 1955

(in millions of dollars)

Year	Service on debt other than backlog loan 	Service on $300 million backlog loan	Service on rest of JC project loans†	Total estimated debt service
1954	77.5	107.7	4.4	189.6
1955	78.6	104.2	9.4	190.2
1956	77.9	67.6	13.3	158.8
1957	62.3		19.4	81.7
1958	56.9		20.1	77.0
1959	51.2		21.3	72.5
1960	44.6		21.3	65.9
1961	39.0		21.3	60.3
1962	36.2		21.3	57.5

According to our preliminary calculations, total Brazilian external indebtedness, which stood at 597.5 million dollars at the end of 1951, before the granting of any Joint Commission loans, will reach 942.8 million at the end of 1953 (including Exim backlog loan and $50 million IBRD loans now under negotiation). This exceeds by 45.3 millions the debt ceiling indirectly approved by the IBRD in 1951 (597.5 plus 300). If the rest of the Joint Commission program were entirely financed during 1954 and 1955, total outstandings at end of 1955 would be 862.2 millions and at end of 1957, 627.8 millions, or only 30.3 million more than at start of Joint Commission. This is, of course, based on the assumptions that the backlog and other obligations are met as scheduled and has the drawbacks inherent in any over-simplification of a problem. Nevertheless, it does show that a financial program could be laid out that stays within the limits fixed in 1951, adds virtually nothing to the service burden on the balance of payments during the next three years when heavy repayments of short-term debt are called for and implies a very small net increase in service payment and debt total over the long run.

This report is, of course, too late to be of any value to the Department in making its final decisions. However, the American Section did not want the record to give the impression that we had at any time failed to give balanced consideration to both the political and economic aspects of our Mission as we saw them and judged them.

Forgive me if I end on a personal note. I had come to think of the Joint Commission program as proof that statesmanship was still a factor in our relationships with Latin America and if at times I have become impatient with those who have seen that program only as another Point 4 project, this may help explain my attitude. An attitude also influenced by the ghost of another experiment, the Bolivian development plan of 1942.[5] I sometimes wonder if the United States had not listened to all the sound advice it received to justify postponement of the implementation of that program if things would have come to their present pass. At least, the Bolivians would have had the exciting attraction of a growing and diversified internal economy to distract them from the hopeless contemplation of their economic miseries. The two cases, of course, are not entirely parallel, although time may show that the lessons were.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot) to the Under Secretary of State (Smith)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 1, 1953.

Subject: Agreement with Brazil to Terminate the Joint Brazil–United States Economic Development Commission.

Discussion:

1. Since last year the target date for termination of the Commission has been June 30, 1953. This date was approved by President Vargas. However, last Friday Embassy telegrams 1622 and 1623[2] reported a change of mind on the part of the President. He now believes it politically impossible for him to agree to termination on June 30 and insists that an understanding (commitment) be reached on the financing of the balance of the projects.

2. The reason for this change of heart is that he fears that the termination of the Commission will provoke a debate in Congress about how the balance of the projects will be financed, and thereby embarrass the Administration, which is already under heavy criticism from its opponents on many issues.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Cottrell; a note attached to the source text, dated June 2, 1953, indicates that the Under Secretary saw this memorandum.

[2] The referenced telegrams, dated May 29, 1953, are not printed (832.00 TA/5–2953).

3. The Administration has led the Brazilian Congress and public to believe that the United States, the Eximbank and the IBRD are firmly committed to provide the foreign financing needed for this entire program. If the debate following the termination of the Commission reveals that there is no such definite commitment, the Administration will be very vulnerable for having created a National Development Bank and imposed taxes to provide the Cruzeiro financing.

4. The Department desires a voluntary agreement with Brazil to close out the Commission, rather than terminating it unilaterally. Since President Vargas now feels strongly that he cannot agree to close on June 30, the Department has proposed an extension until August 31 or September 30 provided that the Brazilians will agree now to close on either of those dates. Our Chargé d'Affaires, Walter N. Walmsley, thinks it might be possible to reach an agreement on this basis and is proposing it to the Foreign Office today, maintaining the attitude that this proposal is not relevant to the question of further financing.[3]

[3] In telegram 1739, from Rio de Janeiro, dated June 19, 1953, Chargé Walmsley informed the Department that Brazilian Finance Minister Oswaldo Aranha agreed to the closing of the Joint Commission after completion of its substantive work on or about July 31, 1953, that he did not believe prior financing commitments existed, and that he preferred a simple announcement rather than an exchange of notes terminating the commission (832.00 TA/6–1953).

In telegram 1368, to Rio de Janeiro, dated June 23, 1953, the Department indicated that in view of Finance Minister Aranha's position, it would not insist on an early exchange of notes terminating the commission, but believed that notes should be exchanged at some appropriate future time (832.00 TA/6–1953).

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Mann) to the Secretary of State[1]

[WASHINGTON,] June 25, 1953.

Problem

To obtain the introduction in the Congress of the necessary legislation to permit the sale and transfer to Brazil of up to 12 coastwise vessels.

Background

It will be noted that the attached letters[2] to the Vice President[3] and the Speaker of the House of Representatives[4] refer solely to Brazil's economic need for coastal vessels, and to the United States national interest.

[4] Joseph W. Martin, Jr. (R.–Mass.).

The Department on October 23, 1952 addressed a communication to the Brazilian Ambassador outlining a four point proposal designed to solve our outstanding shipping problems with Brazil. This proposal involves: (1) Brazil to improve port conditions to save shipping companies and importers millions of dollars annually, (2) Brazil to eliminate certain discriminations, (3) United States to allow waivers permitting Brazilian ships to carry up to 50 percent of the Export-Import Bank loan cargo, and (4) the Department to seek legislation to permit the sale of coastal vessels from the reserve fleet.[5] On March 2, 1953 the Brazilian Ambassador advised the Department of the Brazilian Government's acceptance of the proposal. The Brazilians have suspended the discriminations by administrative action and are seeking legislation to eliminate them from their statutes. They are also making progress in the matter of port improvements. The United States has granted the waivers and the next step is for the Department to seek the subject legislation to permit the sale of coastwise vessels to Brazil. The United States shipping lines operating to Brazil have agreed to support such legislation, and the CIO Maritime Union will not object to this legislation. Heretofore, since the termination in 1948 of authority for the sale of the war built vessels to non-citizens, both industry and unions have consistently opposed any efforts to obtain legislative authorization to sell such vessels to foreign countries.

Recommendation

It is recommended that you sign the attached letters[6] to the Vice President of the United States and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives in order that the first step toward the introduction of this legislation may be accomplished.

---

[5] In a memorandum to the Secretary, dated Oct. 10, 1952, Mr. Linder stated that E could not endorse ARA's overall shipping proposal with respect to Brazil because the Bureau was opposed to legislation that would reward Brazil for discriminating against U.S. ships, grant special treatment to a single country in view of the Department's assurances to other countries that their shipping needs would be considered in new legislation, and committing the incoming administration to "a type of legislation which had proved extremely unpopular with the Congress in the past." (Miller files, lot 53 D 26, "Brazil")

[6] The letters were signed by the Secretary and sent under date of July 1, 1953; they are not printed.

Editorial Note

Senate bill 2370, authorizing the sale of certain vessels to Brazil for use in the Brazilian coastwise shipping trade, was introduced on July 13, 1953; companion bill 6317 was introduced in the House of Representatives on July 15, 1953. 57. For State and DMS. Reference Depcirtel 1237,[1] Embdes 1521, April 9[2] et ante. Military assistance agreement approved by Brazilian Congress in April marking long awaited step forward military phase MSP Brazil. Although Brazilian promulgation completed only mid June, US and Brazilian military groups had anticipated planning phases, designating Brazilian units for hemisphere defense, and making plans for their supply. Likewise, US delegation JBUSMC, anticipating establishment MAAG, took initiative activating program and arranging initial transfer grant-aid material, five B–17's, June 18, four days after Brazilian promulgation agreement. Delivery these aircraft created favorable Brazilian impression. MAAG now established.

JBUSEDC in final stages work on forty priority projects in transportation, power, shipping, agriculture. These projects estimated require 13.2 billion cruzeiros internal financing and $381 million external, of which $135.4 million now obtained and $48.6 million in negotiation. Projects would provide essential additions to economic infrastructure and should result stimulus to private investment. US assistance indispensable in preparing above projects. Difficulties arose however, with regard termination Joint Commission. Unfavorable Brazilian reaction to US request attributable mainly to fact completion external financing does not coincide with prospect of Joint Commission termination and Brazilian press and congressional critics made it appear US giving new interpretation to alleged understanding re relationship cruzeiro and dollar financing. Although political controversy is continuing in Congress regarding 1951 Brazilian legislation to provide cruzeiro financing, I have reached agreement with new Foreign Minister[3] and Finance Minister installed recent weeks to exchange notes July 20 to close Joint Commission when work finished but not later than September 30.[4] With regard technical cooperation following critique designed assist your appraisal impact and provide new DTC guidance re local problems.

Scope of technical cooperation activities in Brazil increased with beginning full-scale operations under productivity program and new public administration projects. Industrial education program, previously impaired by inadequate cooperation by certain Brazilian officials, now in position resume. We have concluded new agreements with Foreign Office, Minister Education,[5] Minister Labor,[6] Minister Agriculture,[7] which provide continuing bases for activity in these and related fields, namely, special services agreement,[8] supplementary agreement on industrial productivity, extension of industrial education agreement,[9] and agricultural and natural resources agreement.[10]

Conclusion of these agreements received favorable though modest publicity Brazil press and Brazilian attitude toward technical cooperation continues receptive. Brazilian Government can be expected to give support and contribute its share to agreed programs. Note, however, that at April session ECLA Rio,[11] at which economic development was major topic, US technical cooperation received only barest mention in contrast frequent mention and high praise UN technical cooperation activities, fact which suggests importance of watching Latin American attitude toward our technical cooperation programs in coming months.

One possible reason here is that our more recent projects in Brazil have tended become diversified with resultant thin spread of resources this vast country. Certain projects in public administration and industrial productivity programs are pertinent illustrations.

Also emphasized in our previous telegrams (Embtel 1124, February 10[12] and 980, January 10[13]) programs of maximum effectiveness generally possible only when strongly desired and supported to our satisfaction by Brazilians. Promotion of projects by us unrewarding.

I am also concerned with apparent bureaucratization of technical cooperation in Brazil resulting from increased proportion professional civil servants assigned to projects rather than outstanding specialists who have demonstrated proficiency in private pursuits. There appears moreover, to be concentration personnel Rio of approximately 30 US officials, and only 23 elsewhere Brazil, and purposeful but wasteful build-up of technical cooperation administrative staff (30 people) owing differences in administrative procedures and accounting between TCA and Embassy which thus stopped from giving administrative support. UN agencies in Brazil also increasing personnel which now totals 61 active in matters relating to technical cooperation, mainly in Rio.

In summary, I continue feel and wish emphasize that technical cooperation for Brazil desirable and positive element in US–Brazil relations. Most programs, particularly those which predate technical cooperation legislation (agriculture, public health and minerals) are especially effective and well organized. I am not yet sure some of more recent projects which now take substantial portion of funds will prove equally effective in technical accomplishments or contribution to US objectives.

SECRET RIO DE JANEIRO, July 27, 1953.

At a small reception given by President and Mrs. Vargas for the members of the Mission, President Vargas asked Doctor Eisenhower to meet with him privately. At the discussion were President Vargas, his daughter Alzira (as interpreter), Minister of Foreign Affairs Rao, Minister of Finance Aranha, the President's brother-in-law, Walder Sarmanho, President of the National Development Bank, and Doctor

[1] Dr. Eisenhower drafted this memorandum. He visited Brazil, July 22–27, 1953, as part of his factfinding mission to the countries of South America during the summer of 1953.

Eisenhower. The President explained that Brazil would take action to reduce its imports by expanding the production of wheat and developing oil resources.[2]

(The President is not well. He speaks scarcely above a whisper.) The words he used in his explanation were almost identical to those previously expressed by the Minister of Finance and the President's brother-in-law to Doctor Eisenhower. Indeed, Doctor Eisenhower gained the impression that these two individuals are essentially responsible for presidential policy in Brazil. President Vargas indicated that he would like to write personally to President Eisenhower, summarizing Brazil's economic situation and explaining the actions which the government proposed to take to develop resources and achieve a balance in international trade; he also indicated a desire to send one or two members of his official family to Washington to explain these matters. Doctor Eisenhower indicated that he was sure his brother would welcome any message President Vargas wished to send. Doctor Eisenhower then went on: (1) On a purely personal basis he could say that he had great faith in the Brazilian people and in their capacity to overcome present difficulties. (2) It must be recognized that the International and Ex-Im Bank could act only on the basis of specific projects placed before them. The latter faced a difficult situation because its loans were a charge against the annual Budget and the debt of the United States; this fact was pertinent in view of the imperative necessity of reducing total public costs in the United States. (3) Matching the frankness of President Vargas and the Minister of Finance, who had referred to oil development as a "political problem", Doctor Eisenhower indicated that it would present a political problem in the United States if Ex-Im Bank loans of substantial size were to require a recommendation for an increase in the legal debt level of the United States. (4) He urged that the misunderstandings with respect to the International Bank be overcome. The conversation ended by President Vargas indicating again that he would write in detail to President Eisenhower. (Doctor Eisenhower gained the impression that the Minister of Finance and the President's brother-in-law, who have so recently assumed new responsibilities wished to have time to formulate a total program, including action looking to a balance in international payments, which would be reassuring to the U.S. government and bank officials.)

---

[2] A summary of this conversation, drafted by Chargé Walmsley, based on information related to him by Dr. Eisenhower, dated July 28, 1953, reads in part as follows: "The President said that in the matter of oil the plan, owing to difficult internal political problems, would be to let the present legislation in the [Brazilian] Congress take its course, unsatisfactory as it may be. At an appropriate time in the future (it was not clear whether this was a matter of weeks, months, or years) the Government would seek through legislation an appropriate amendment of a general nature under which contracts could be negotiated with foreign companies." 832.2546/9–1753: Airgram

The Acting Secretary of State to the Embassy in Brazil[1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, September 17, 1953.

Subject: Renewal of Procurement Contracts.

A–68. Reference is made to the procurement contracts dated December 23, 1952,[2] between the Government of Brazil and the United States of America covering monazite, rare earth compounds, and thorium compounds. In Article III of both contracts it was agreed that ninety days before expiration of the contracts, consideration would be given to determining whether further arrangements would be mutually desirable.

After a thorough canvass of government agencies, the Department finds that the Atomic Energy Commission will be prepared to discuss renewal of the thorium procurement contract; that no agency of the Government is in a position to renew the contract for rare earth compounds and monazite. There is attached a suggested note[3] to the appropriate Brazilian agency expressing these views.

The Embassy's discussion of these problems with the Brazilian officials should be limited to a discussion of renewal in terms of Article III in the current procurement contracts. However, if the Brazilians raise the question of obligation in terms of the exchange of notes of February 21, 1952,[4] the following is provided for the Embassy's information and appropriate use.

The exchange of notes of February 21, 1952, states, in the final sentence of the first paragraph, that the U.S. Government "is prepared to purchase these materials under the following conditions"; the conditions are then outlined in the seven numbered paragraphs which follow. The Department lays stress on the words "is prepared" and points out that these notes foresee, in numbered paragraph five, further negotiations to work out any firm commitment. The exchange of notes is not in itself a procurement contract; it does outline a basis on which negotiations might be conducted.

It was conceivable that the procurement negotiations might have become deadlocked and no contract developed. The exchange of notes could not, of course, represent an obligation to reach agreement on procurement details. That the negotiations might not actually follow

Hamilton of the Office of the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Atomic Energy Affairs; cleared with the Office of South American Affairs, the Metals and Minerals Staff, Assistant Legal Adviser for European Affairs Raymund T. the basis on which the two countries indicated their willingness to negotiate, was also surely a possibility. It is the Department's view, therefore, that the obligation represented by the notes is essentially an obligation to negotiate and not a firm commitment to buy or sell any specific quantities at any specific price. In fact, no mention of price is made in the notes. In other words, the notes were a good faith indication of the intention of these parties to sell and buy certain products provided agreement could be reached on details of a firm commitment. Negotiations carried out in good faith, whether or not a contract resulted and whether or not they followed the conditions which both countries indicated a willingness to accept, do, in the Department's opinion, discharge the obligation incurred by the notes.

This was evidently the Brazilian view at the time of the negotiations. The memorandum of September 16, 1952 (copy enclosed[5]) prepared by Mr. William Freeman,[6] who was the negotiator for EPS, describing the negotiations states "it was impossible to execute the contract for monazite and rare earth chlorides, or to execute a contract for thorium on account of the inability of the Brazilians to reach agreement among themselves in connection with the export of thorium. The United States negotiating team had made it clear when they arrived that they could only remain until the 11th of September. It was felt that all points in connection with the obligations set up in the exchange of notes of February 21, 1952, had been completely discussed and ironed out with the exception of the matter of thorium, and that the United States had done all they could in that connection . . . . In the meantime, the whole matter would be held in abeyance with the understanding that whether or not contracts were finally executed, both sides, Brazil and the United States, felt that the intent of the exchange of notes of February 21, 1952, had been completely carried out and that all obligations had been fulfilled."

That both sides, during the procurement negotiations, believed that the period and the quantities mentioned in the exchange of notes were unrealistic, is clearly brought out in the memoranda of the U.S. negotiators describing the proceedings. Thus, the memorandum of September 12, 1952,[7] from Claude Courand, representing DMPA, to the Ambassador states in paragraph three, "the Brazilians indicated that after considerable discussions they had decided that a one-year contract appeared most practicable from their standpoint."

The memorandum prepared by Mr. Freeman states, on page one, "the Brazilians stated that due to the passing of time they considered that the situation had changed materially and that they felt they would like to carry on the discussions based on the conditions presently existing rather than the conditions that existed six months to a year ago.

They indicated that their original ideas with regard to their resources were overly optimistic and that their actual possibilities of supplying the materials involved were much less than they had contemplated. They asked if we would consider commitments for one year rather than three years and quantities not in excess of those mentioned on an annual basis in the exchange of notes (of February 21, 1952)."

The record further shows that although the Brazilian producers probably would have preferred three year contracts, the Brazilian Government officials were more conservative and their views prevailed. Thus, Mr. Freeman's memorandum on page four states "the producers kept insisting that they wanted a three year contract although they apparently would not disagree with the Brazilian Government officials that to make any definite three year commitments would be completely unrealistic."

Mr. Emerson Brown's memorandum of September 12, 1952,[8] to Ambassador Johnson states, on page two, "ORQUIMA would like to have a contract for three years on the sale of thorium even at the U.S. price . . . in order to insure revenue from the sale of thorium which can not be marketed through commercial transactions."

From all of the above, it seems quite clear that at the time of the negotiations, it was the considered opinion of the official negotiators on both sides that no more than the one year contracts entered into were desirable.

It is, therefore, proper to hold that the two procurement contracts which resulted from these negotiations reflected the only kind of obligation which both sides were willing to undertake in terms of detailed, specific commitments. On the subject of further procurement, the judgment of the negotiators is brought out in Article III of both contracts which states, inter alia, "it is understood and agreed that ninety days prior to the expiration of this contract that the parties thereto will give consideration to circumstances then existing in order to determine if further arrangements would be mutually desirable." Obviously, this Article can not be construed as an obligation on the part of the U.S. to renew the contract. The contracts contain Article III, above referred to, and in addition state, specifically, in Article XVIII in one contract, in Article XV in the other, "this contract is entered into in accordance with the exchange of notes between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the United States of Brazil dated February 21, 1952." It is the Department's view that such obligation as now exists in this matter is embodied in the appropriate article in the two procurement contracts.

The Department is aware that, regardless of the merits of the legal argument, if the U.S. follows in this matter a course which is opposed by influential Brazilian interests, undesirable repercussions may result in other U.S.-Brazilian interests such as the long-continuing uranium problem. Every reasonable effort should be made to avoid such repercussions. The Department and other interested agencies, however, can not attempt to arrange procurement of materials which are not now needed in order to forestall this.

The Acting Deputy Under Secretary of State (Murphy) to the Secretary of Defense (Wilson)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 12, 1953.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to your letter of June 15, 1953[2] and to previous and subsequent correspondence between the Departments of State and Defense concerning the establishment of a new joint defense organization with Brazil. There are two problems which need to be resolved by our two Departments before diplomatic notes creating the new organization can be exchanged with the Brazilian Government, namely, the question of whether the Department of State and the Brazilian Foreign Office should be represented on the proposed board by regular membership, rather than in an advisory capacity, and the question of what name should be given to the organization.

With regard to the request of the Department of State to the Department of Defense for regular membership, the enclosure to your letter of June 15, 1953 contains a recommendation by the Joint Chiefs of Staff that this request be placed on the agenda for the first meeting of the organization as a proposal of the Department of State. In my opinion, it would be preferable for the proposal to be presented to Brazil as a United States Government recommendation having the support of both of our Departments. I am sure that membership of the Department of State and the Brazilian Foreign Office on the board would serve to promote the military, as well as the political, interests of the United States. The substance and form of many of the military arrangements developed in the new board will require careful consideration by the Department of State and the Brazilian Foreign Office with a view to determining what portions, if any, of a desired arrangement should be concluded through diplomatic channels, in the form of an international agreement, and what portions, if any, should preferably be embodied in a purely military understanding. The prolonged delay of the Brazilian Congress in ratifying the Bilateral Military Assistance Agreement testifies to the need for such close consultation with the political branch of the Brazilian Government on defense matters. Without full participation by the Department of State and the Brazilian Foreign Office, it may be difficult for the new organization to deal effectively with problems that are not confined to military matters in their narrow context but will on many occasions involve important political considerations. This is particularly true in a country as politically sensitive as Brazil.

I therefore recommend that the Department of Defense approve a proposal to Brazil through diplomatic channels that full membership of the Department of State and the Brazilian Foreign Office be provided for in the diplomatic notes which are to be exchanged with Brazil for the purpose of bringing the new organization into being. I believe that the Brazilian Foreign Office and the Brazilian military authorities would favorably consider such a proposal.

There remains the question of what name should be given to the new organization. This Department has given careful study to the proposal that it be named the "Permanent Combined Board on Defense, Brazil–United States". It is the considered judgment of the Department of State that this name bears such a close resemblance to the name of the United States-Canadian board ("The Permanent Joint Board on Defense, United States–Canada") that it would be certain to arouse Canadian anxieties, hurt Canadian sensibilities, and otherwise needlessly injure our relationship with Canada. This view is also held by the United States Ambassador, the Honorable Douglas Stuart, who has given particular attention to this problem and discussed it briefly on September 25 with Admiral Arthur W. Radford, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Information available to the Department of State indicates that Brazilian officials do not insist on a name identical or closely paralleling that of the United States-Canadian board, do not demand the inclusion of the word "Permanent" but would be content with a title which conveys the conception that the board is a combined United States-Brazilian organization. The word "Permanent" has been one of the chief difficulties from the Canadian viewpoint. It would therefore be the hope of the Department of State that the new organization might be given a title, such as, "Brazil–United States Defense Board", or "Combined Board on Defense, Brazil–United States", or "Combined Brazil–United States Defense Board".

Finally, I should like to emphasize that the Department of State fully shares the desire of the Department of Defense to proceed as quickly as possible to establish the new board and to cooperate in supporting this new and useful instrument for the strengthening of relationships between Brazil and the United States. I therefore hope that agreement can be reached as soon as possible on Department of State representation in the new organization and the choice of an appropriate name for it.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT MURPHY

National Intelligence Estimate[1]

SECRET
NIE–86

WASHINGTON, December 4, 1953.

PROBABLE DEVELOPMENTS IN BRAZIL[2]

THE PROBLEM

To estimate the current situation and probable developments in Brazil through 1955, with particular reference to the stability of the government and the probable development of its foreign policy.

1. The political situation in Brazil is characterized by growing social unrest and increasing nationalism. The chief factors in this situation are (a) Brazil's sustained effort to maintain a high rate of economic development with emphasis on industrialization; (b) the accompanying inflation and rapid urbanization, which have caused particular distress among urban lower income groups; and (c) Brazil's failure to obtain from the United States the amount of financial assistance to which it feels entitled. These conditions facilitate ultranationalist and Communist agitation.

2. President Vargas was elected primarily on the strength of his appeal to lower income groups, but he must enlist conservative support in order to obtain a congressional majority. So far he has pursued a middle-of-the-road course. Most conservatives distrust him, but support his administration and seek to exercise a moderating influence on it.

3. Vargas is politically committed to maintain a high rate of economic development, which can be accomplished only with substantial amounts of foreign capital. Substantial foreign private investment is precluded by the prevalent nationalistic attitude toward such investment and by the uncertain economic outlook. Some modification of Brazil's investment policy and a retrenchment program may be prerequisite to substantial foreign developmental loans. Retrenchment is politically dangerous in that its immediate effects will probably be to intensify existing economic dislocations and social unrest. Vargas, however, will undertake the minimum which he considers necessary to obtain further substantial loans. He will also take political action designed to soften the economic requirements of foreign lending institutions.

4. If Vargas succeeds in obtaining such loans and in checking inflation, his political position will be reasonably secure and he will probably continue to pursue moderate policies during the remainder of his term. Otherwise he will be under increasing extremist pressures, but will probably not be threatened with expulsion from office as long as conservative elements, including the Army, are satisfied that he has done all that could be done to improve the economic situation.

5. In the event of a severe economic deterioration Vargas might be able to secure conservative support for a more nationalistic program. On the other hand, Vargas might abandon his conservative connections and seek to establish an authoritarian labor-leftist regime. In the latter case, however, the Army and the conservatives would probably depose him.

6. The Communists have no prospect of gaining control of Brazil by electoral means or by force, but their influence will probably increase through their exploitation of popular issues and their infiltration of the bureaucracy and of organized labor. Their immediate objective is the exploitation of social unrest and Brazilian nationalism to neutralize Brazil as an effective ally of the United States.

7. Brazil will almost certainly continue to support the United States on major issues between the US and the Soviet Bloc, but, if not granted the special consideration to which it feels entitled, with particular reference to further developmental loans, it may pursue an increasingly independent course in economic matters. A desire to strengthen its bargaining position vis-à-vis the United States will be an important factor in Brazilian diplomacy. Brazil will seek to establish closer economic relations in Latin America and with Europe, including efforts to increase its now negligible non-strategic trade with the Soviet Bloc. It may also re-establish diplomatic relations with the USSR.

8. Brazil will continue to oppose Argentine bids for leadership in Latin America and the development of an Argentine-led bloc.

9. In the event of general war Brazil would almost certainly enter the war actively in support of the United States.

DISCUSSION

I. Introduction

10. Brazil's continued cooperation with the United States is a matter of great significance. Brazil is a major power within the Latin American community and exercises considerable influence in the Organization of American States and the United Nations. Moreover, Brazil is strategically located with respect to sea and air routes in the South Atlantic and is an important source of strategic materials, notably metallurgical manganese, quartz crystals, beryl ore, mica, and castor oil. It is the only Latin American country with known sizeable deposits of atomic energy raw materials. The Brazilian armed forces are capable of making an important contribution to Hemisphere defense.

11. Except in some areas (e.g., Sao Paulo) little progress has been made in developing Brazil's large human and material resources. The national economy continues to depend on exports of agricultural products. These exports have not been sufficient to sustain the postwar rate of economic development. The industrialization that has taken place since 1930 has been accompanied by severe inflation and by economic and social strains, especially on the rapidly growing urban middle classes and urban labor. Industrial and commercial interests have acquired greater political power, which prior to 1930 was largely held by a narrow oligarchy of landowners and Army leaders. More recently lower income urban groups have begun to exert pressure for greater representation in the government and for betterment of their lot. The frustrations which are inevitable in the process of such rapid and uneven economic development as Brazil is experiencing are exploited by nationalists and Communists. Brazil, however, has been less subject to political violence than most Latin American countries.

II. Political Situation

12. As in many other Latin American countries, the postwar pressures in Brazil for accelerated economic and social progress have contributed to increasing political stresses and strains. These pressures are more fundamental than the character of any particular administration as a determinant of political developments.

13. The dominant personality in the present political situation is 70-year-old Getulio Vargas, who was elected President in 1950 to serve until 1956. Vargas, a key political figure in Brazil since 1930, has been an astute opportunist. He has shrewdly manipulated one group against another and has successfully posed as the friend of the underprivileged.

14. General resentment of the Sao Paulo oligarchy's prolonged control of the federal government and the severe depression caused by the contemporary slump in coffee exports and prices enabled Vargas to seize the Presidency by force in 1930. Seven years later, with Army support, he established a quasi-fascist regime called the "New State," an ideological facade for his strong personal rule. Under the "New State" Vargas espoused cultural and economic nationalism, established federal control over the states, abolished political parties, suppressed all opposition of both the left and the right, undertook government intervention and initiative in economic development, promoted industrialization, concerned himself with amelioration of the living conditions of the urban masses, and sought to mobilize and control urban labor as a political force through government-sponsored labor unions. It was during this period that the urban lower income groups began to become an important political factor.

15. In October 1945 the Brazilian Army, in response to growing opposition to totalitarianism, ousted Vargas in a peaceful coup and paved the way for the constitutional election of General Eurico Gasper Dutra to the Presidency. Dutra's administration (1946–1951) was moderate; political parties re-emerged and popular participation in politics increased. However, the conservative ruling groups failed to cope effectively with the growing economic hardships experienced by lower middle class and labor groups. Partially as a result of this failure, Vargas retained a large personal following and built up a political machine. In the 1950 presidential campaign he exploited the discontent of the lower income groups and the inept leadership of the two dominant conservative political parties and received about 49 percent of the popular vote, as compared to 30 percent for his nearest competitor.

16. Vargas returned to office with substantial popular support, particularly that of the urban proletariat. However, he has not attacked the problems confronting Brazil with the vigor and self-confidence which characterized his earlier administration. While this difference may be in some degree attributable to his more advanced age and reported ill-health, it stems more directly from the attendant circumstances reviewed below.

17. Vargas is in power at a difficult time in Brazilian history. Heavy migrations from the back country into the rapidly growing cities have brought hundreds of thousands of Brazilians into their first contact with higher standards of living, glaring inequalities, and the insecurity of urban existence. Distressed by inflation, the urban masses generally are increasingly dissatisfied with their level of living and clamorous for its improvement. At the same time middle and upper class conservatives, including Army leaders, are disturbed by the adverse prospects for maintaining a high rate of economic development and by the growth of labor-leftist and Communist strength, which threatens their dominant position in Brazilian life. Moreover, these elements are highly sensitive to any supposed denial of the international recognition to which they feel Brazil is entitled. These frustrations and tensions facilitate the incitement of an emotional nationalism. Brazilian nationalism and the economic strains brought about by overexpansion have in recent years imposed considerable limitations upon foreign private investment and upon Brazil's ability to obtain development loans from the International Bank, which in turn has seriously impeded the achievement of either the social benefits demanded by leftist elements or the economic development desired by conservatives.

18. The absence of well-organized and responsible national political parties makes it difficult for the government to align stable support for political and economic programs. Brazilian politics has traditionally been based on regional rather than national interests, and on personalities rather than principles. The parties which have emerged since 1945 have begun to espouse political and economic principles and national programs, but regional and personal interests still predominate.

19. To obtain a majority in Congress Vargas must secure the support of conservatives who opposed his presidential candidacy. He personally controls the Brazilian Labor Party and is also supported by the Social Progressive Party, but these two Parties together hold only 19 percent of the seats in the Senate and 27 percent of those in the Chamber of Deputies. For even a nominal majority Vargas is dependent on the mainly conservative Social Democratic Party, which opposed his candidacy but generally supports his administration. The representatives of these three Parties constitute 67 percent of the Senate and 63 percent of the Chamber. Even so, party discipline is so lax that, to obtain majorities for specific measures, Vargas must often secure the additional support of members of the mainly conservative National Democratic Union, the nominal opposition. Thus Vargas cannot present a coherent, well-defined legislative program, but must seek major legislation piecemeal, through shifting ad hoc parliamentary combinations.

20. Most conservatives distrust Vargas because of his opportunism. They have been concerned about his apparent indifference to Communism, his labor-leftist backing, and the indecisive character of his economic policies. While a number have remained in opposition, many others have decided to support and if possible dominate the administration. However, conflicting vested interests have thus far prevented the conservatives from agreeing among themselves on legislation to alleviate Brazil's economic problems. The June 1953 appointment of Oswaldo Aranha, one of Brazil's most prominent conservatives, as Minister of Finance has tended to mitigate the differences among the conservatives and between them and Vargas. Aranha has become the dominant figure in the Vargas cabinet.

21. Vargas' necessary concessions to conservatives antagonize his lower income group supporters. The largest single segment of these supporters consists of the government-controlled labor organizations whose estimated 1,700,000 members constitute approximately 10 percent of the total labor force. These lower income groups, although increasingly restless, are not strong enough to provide an adequate base for political action. Recently the opportunist Minister of Labor, Joao Goulart, has made some attempts to build up a stronger, Peronist-type labor organization. Thus far the clearly expressed opposition of conservatives and the Army, and opposition within the labor movement itself, have deterred Goulart from carrying any plans of this nature to fruition. However, his collaboration with Communists to further his objectives has enabled them to increase their influence.

22. The Brazilian Communist Party (PCB) lost strength when it was outlawed in 1947. Since 1950, however, and especially during 1953, it has made considerable progress in recruiting new members and raising funds. It is currently estimated to have 60,000 members subject to party discipline and a much larger number of sympathizers, and its strength and influence are increasing. The Communists draw their support largely from urban labor and lower middle class groups, although professional men, intellectuals, and retired military personnel are prominent in the leadership of the Party and its front organizations. Communist strength is concentrated in and around the city of Rio de Janeiro, in the important states of Sao Paulo and Minas Geraes, and in the strategic "hump" of Brazil.

23. The immediate objective of the Communists appears to be to stimulate anti-US nationalism in order to neutralize Brazil as an effective ally of the United States. They incited vigorous opposition to the ratification of the Brazilian military assistance agreement with the US. Although ultimately defeated in that case, they (in conjunction with ultranationalists) successfully promoted the enactment of legislation which excluded the participation of foreign capital in the development of Brazil's petroleum resources. More recently the Communists have concentrated on exploiting the social unrest caused by the rising cost of living and on promoting closer relations with the Soviet Bloc. On both issues they enjoy considerable non-Communist support.

24. Vargas has remained largely indifferent to Communist activities and the Communists have now begun to operate more openly in the leadership of popular movements and to renew pressure for legalization of the Party. Meanwhile a number of Communists and sympathizers have already infiltrated the government (including the Foreign Office) and the labor organizations. Despite new legislation designed to curb Communist activities, politically motivated appointments to key positions in the Federal Police have considerably weakened the enforcement capabilities of its political section. An investigation of Communism in the armed forces has discovered few Communists there, but has revealed the existence of an apparatus sufficiently well-organized to arouse concern among Brazilian military authorities.

III. Armed Forces

25. The armed forces, organized and trained along US lines, have an approximate strength of 194,000. The Army, with a strength of 104,000, consists of 7 infantry, 1 armored, and 4 cavalry divisions, supplemented by numerous separate combat units. The Navy, with a personnel strength of 20,000, has a combat strength of 2 light cruisers, 7 destroyers, and smaller escort, patrol, and mining craft. The Air Force, with a personnel strength of 20,000 (including 1,140 pilots), has approximately 920 combat, transport, and reconnaissance aircraft, including about half of the 60 British jet fighters ordered for delivery in 1953. In addition, there are about 50,000 militarized police available for local or regional use.

26. The operational effectiveness of the three combatant services is high by Latin American standards as a result of their reorganization, re-equipment, and operational experience with US forces in World War II and of the assistance of US military missions. Their effectiveness is impaired, however, by a lack of adequate support facilities, poor maintenance, and general obsolescence of equipment and dependence on foreign sources for resupply of material, munitions, and fuel. A severe dollar shortage and the high cost or unavailability of US military supplies have caused Brazil to turn to Europe for some aircraft and heavy military equipment, to the detriment of Hemisphere arms standardization. However, procurement from this source is also severely limited by lack of foreign exchange.

27. The Brazilian armed forces are adequate to maintain internal security and to deter aggression by any neighboring power. They could not repel a major overseas invasion without US assistance, but Brazilians do not expect any such necessity to arise. In the event of general war they could probably protect strategically important installations and facilities from extensive sabotage and from possible raids. The Brazilian Navy and Air Force have limited convoy and antisubmarine capabilities, but effective patrol of the long Brazilian coast would require the active participation of US forces. With US logistic support the Army could provide a small expeditionary force, but Brazil is presently disinclined to provide forces for service outside the Western Hemisphere.

28. The Brazilian Army has been a decisive, though normally passive, factor in Brazilian politics. (The Navy tends to remain aloof, the Air Force to follow the Army's lead in political matters.) The Army is predisposed to uphold the established government, but considers that it has an overriding responsibility for the preservation of Brazilian civic institutions and the maintenance of order. In a situation threatening prolonged civil strife the Army would be likely to give more weight to this sense of civic responsibility than to legalistic considerations. The Army's action in a given contingency would depend on its judgment as to the gravity of the threat to established institutions and the relative amount of disorder which would ensue from the alternative courses open to it. The growth and organization of the urban proletariat tends to inhibit political action by the Army insofar as the Army would prefer to avoid action which might provoke bitter popular resistance. At the same time the Army is disturbed by this development and any precipitate attempt to mobilize the proletariat as a countervailing force might provoke the Army's immediate and decisive political intervention.

29. Most of the Army's leaders opposed the election of Vargas in 1950 because they disliked his labor-leftist backing and feared that he might again resort to a dictatorship. Nevertheless they have given his administration their passive support. The Army's leaders have been increasingly disturbed by Vargas' lack of an effective economic program and by his indifference to Communism. In 1952 they forced the resignation of a Minister of War who supported a nationalist-Communist clique in the important Military Club. However, their dissatisfaction has not reached the point at which they would either initiate or support a move to depose Vargas by force. No such movement could succeed without active Army participation.

IV. Economic Situation

30. Brazil has experienced rapid economic growth in the past seven years. The total production of goods and services has been increasing at an average rate of somewhat under 6 percent a year, or about 3 percent a year per capita. Funds devoted to public and private investment have greatly exceeded the amounts which Brazilians were willing to save and investment by foreigners has not come up to Brazilian expectations. Moreover, a major part of investment has gone into long-term basic industry projects and very little into improvement of agricultural and minerals production which furnished the bulk of Brazil's exports. The result has been sustained and rapid inflation and a deficit in foreign exchange transactions, which increased rapidly after the outbreak of the Korean War. The number of urban wage earners has grown rapidly under the impetus of industrialization but the level of living of this group has been declining rather than increasing.

31. The sustained inflation has been manifest in a constant rise in the cost of living, particularly among the growing urban concentrations, with a particularly sharp increase since 1950. For example, in Sao Paulo the cost of living index has risen by more than 700 percent since 1939. Wage rates have increased much less. Steady increases in the prices of foodstuffs and consumer goods have resulted in part from the increasing strains on the antiquated agricultural, transportation, and distribution systems as urban population has increased. Additional inflationary factors have been a largely unchecked credit expansion, inefficient tax collections, and unbalanced federal budgets. In the past year, however, some headway has been made in modifying these inflationary financial policies.

32. The foreign exchange deficit reflects Brazil's tendency since World War II to live beyond its income. Until recently the Brazilian Government has been willing to incur mounting foreign exchange deficits because of hopes that with foreign financial assistance economic development would soon permit a permanent solution to the country's foreign exchange problem. These hopes have been so strong that the government has given relatively little attention to increasing agricultural and mineral production for export. The sizeable foreign exchange surpluses accumulated during the war were expended within a few years. Special impetus was given to imports by rapid credit expansion and overvaluation of the cruzeiro, and, from 1950 to 1952, by liberal import licensing policies based on a fear of shortages following the outbreak of the Korean War. Until foreign exchange restrictions were imposed on January 1, 1952, private net capital outflows and large profit remittances on foreign investments at the favorable official rate added to the drain on Brazil's foreign exchange.

33. By mid-1953 Brazil's commercial indebtedness with the US and other creditors had reached $850 million, approximately two-thirds of the value of its annual exports. This situation has been somewhat relieved by a $300 million balance of payments loan from the Export-Import Bank, by loans from private banks in the US, and by arrangements with European creditors. During 1953 Brazil has been able to reduce the rate of accumulation of foreign exchange deficits by drastically cutting imports and by improving to some degree the marketability of some of its exports. These measures, however, have not been sufficient to close the gap between imports and exports. The government maintains that the current volume of imports of consumer goods and foodstuffs (20 percent of total imports) cannot be further substantially reduced. It cannot, without adversely affecting the level of economic activity, cut deeply into imports of raw materials and fuel (55 percent of imports). It has also been reluctant to cut significantly imports of capital goods, which would jeopardize the rate of growth to which economic activity has been geared in recent years.

34. The problem of Brazil's development requirements was the subject of intensive study by the Joint Brazil–US Economic Development Commission, established in July 1951. The Commission recommended a number of specific projects emphasizing the development of transportation, distribution, and power facilities. Brazilian hopes for loans from the Eximbank and the International Bank (IBRD) to finance these projects have not fully materialized. To date Brazil has obtained from these Banks a total of $130 million for specific development projects as compared with Brazilian expectations of $500 million (including $380 million for projects recommended by the Joint Commission). The effect of the $130 million in loans has been minimal in relieving Brazil's present foreign exchange difficulties because the loans were granted for intermediate and long range developmental projects. Moreover, the foreign exchange crisis which Brazil hoped the loans would prevent had already materialized by the time they were granted.

35. The IBRD thus far has refused to meet Brazil's request for loans in addition to the $41 million now being negotiated on the ground that Brazil's present economic policies make it impracticable for Brazil to increase its financial obligations. The Bank has urged Brazil to facilitate development and exploitation of Brazilian resources, especially oil, by encouraging foreign investment and to promote fuller development of Brazil's agricultural potential. The Vargas administration has reluctantly recognized the unlikelihood of securing financial assistance of the magnitude it expected at the time the Joint Commission was created. It has also recognized that it must re-examine its present economic policies if it is to secure sizeable credits from the US and the IBRD. It has, however, hesitated to take concrete steps toward readjustment, primarily because any of the alternative courses of action involve political decisions which the government at this time would prefer to avoid making.

36. The existence of important petroleum resources in Brazil is suspected on the basis of geological indications, but has not been proved. Exploration and development of such resources might be of substantial advantage in reducing Brazil's adverse balance of trade. At present Brazil must import almost all of its petroleum requirements. Such imports now constitute 13 percent of total imports and Brazilian requirements are rapidly increasing. Present prospects for petroleum development are poor, however. Brazilian capital and technical resources available for the purpose are inadequate. The IBRD and Eximbank are unwilling to grant loans for petroleum development because adequate private foreign capital is available on reasonable terms. Meanwhile Brazilian ultranationalists, abetted by the Communists, have secured the passage of a law prohibiting the participation of foreign capital in petroleum development. In view of this law, Brazilian oil resources will not be substantially developed in the near future. In general, the prevalent nationalistic attitude regarding the exploitation of Brazil's mineral resources has deterred the participation of foreign capital in their development.

V. Foreign Policy

37. Brazil has traditionally regarded itself as the particular friend and ally of the United States in Latin America. With a self-confidence based on its vast extent and relative political stability, it has considered itself superior to its Spanish-speaking neighbors and the natural associate of the United States. Moreover, the United States is by far Brazil's most important coffee market and the only important source of needed financial and technical aid. For these reasons Brazil strongly desires the friendship and support of the United States and is highly sensitive to any US tendency not to accord Brazil special consideration and favor. At the same time Brazil is sensitive to any implication of US tutelage.

38. In recent years US-Brazilian relations have been impaired by growing Brazilian nationalism, which has produced friction in both economic and politico-military affairs. An important factor in this development has been a growing feeling in Brazil that the US undervalues Brazil's friendship and tends to take it for granted. In particular, Brazilians feel that US economic and financial assistance to Brazil has not been commensurate with Brazil's past services and present strategic importance to the US, or with Brazil's value to the US as a moderating influence in Latin America and in UN affairs.

39. Brazil cooperates closely with the US in the Organization of American States and has consistently supported the US in the UN on basic issues between the US and the Soviet Bloc. Thus far Brazil has made no move to restore diplomatic relations with the USSR, which were broken in 1947, and maintains diplomatic relations with only Poland and Czechoslovakia among the Bloc countries. Brazil's trade with the Bloc is at present negligible. There are, however, mounting official and popular pressures for closer relations with the Bloc. This idea is attractive because of Brazil's need to find new markets for its exports, and perhaps also as a means of strengthening Brazil's bargaining position vis-à-vis the US. Communists and their sympathizers are pressing it for their own ulterior purposes, with considerable nationalist support.

40. In the Latin American community Brazil has always opposed Argentine bids for leadership. At present Brazil is principally concerned regarding the efforts of the Peron regime to expand its influence in neighboring countries. It views the recent Argentine-Chilean economic treaty with disfavor as the possible forerunner of an Argentine-dominated economic bloc. Brazil has sought to counter Argentine penetration of Uruguay, Paraguay, and Bolivia, and, for its own part, has cultivated its relations with Peru, Colombia, and Venezuela. Fundamentally, however, Brazil deprecates the idea of competing blocs in Latin America and promotes instead the concept of Hemisphere solidarity.

VI. Probable Developments

41. Regardless of the policies pursued by Vargas during the remainder of his term, Brazil will continue to be subject to great political and economic stresses and strains. Vargas, dependent on both the right and left for support, will probably pursue a middle-of-the-road course at least until the congressional elections in the fall of 1954. He will continue recently initiated efforts to avoid foreign exchange deficits and will attempt to control inflation. In these efforts he will probably be able to enlist the active support of influential moderate-rightist elements which are anxious to improve Brazil's international economic situation.

42. Vargas will probably succeed in establishing less inflationary government financial policies. Nevertheless, the cost of living will probably continue to rise and social unrest will probably increase among the urban lower income groups. This trend may lead to considerable popular disorder, but will probably not by itself present a serious threat to the stability of the government.

43. The nationalistic attitude prevalent with regard to the exploitation of Brazilian mineral resources will probably continue to deter foreign investments in this field. Brazil's petroleum resources will probably not be developed on a large scale. Should the result of the 1954 congressional elections strengthen Vargas' political position, he might attempt to liberalize the nationalistic petroleum law so as to attract foreign private capital. However, in view of the nationalistic emotions aroused by this issue, it is unlikely that such an attempt would succeed.

44. Vargas will continue to seek foreign developmental loans. He will undertake the minimum retrenchment which he considers necessary for that purpose, and will also take political action designed to soften the economic requirements of foreign lending institutions. If he should succeed in obtaining large development loans before the 1954 congressional elections, his political position would be greatly strengthened. A failure to obtain loans by then, however, would not greatly weaken Vargas' political position if he had adopted domestic measures which the moderate conservatives believed would alleviate Brazil's economic difficulties.

45. Vargas will probably continue to pursue a middle-of-the-road course throughout his presidential term, unless his political position is seriously weakened by the results of the 1954 elections. In the latter event, he might adopt a more nationalistic course in response to increasing extremist pressures.

46. In the event of a severe economic deterioration, conservative groups might countenance a more nationalist program if they foresee no quick end to Brazil's difficulties. It is also possible that Vargas, should he become apprehensive of a deterioration of his political position, might take extreme measures to build up mass support. Should he appeal to the masses over the heads of the Congress and the military, or should he move precipitately to consolidate organized labor as a source of political support, he would probably be removed from office by moderate and conservative elements, including the Army, which are hostile toward dictatorship and toward labor-leftist elements.

47. Reports that Vargas is in ill-health suggest the possibility of his becoming physically or mentally incapable of coping with the strenuous problems of governing. The constitution provides that in the event of the President's death or incapacitation the Vice-President should serve the remainder of the term as President. The present Vice-President is Joao Cafe Filho. If he came to power he would probably pursue moderate policies. He would in particular avoid alienating the conservatives, including the Army, since he would probably estimate that his crucial support would come from those elements.

48. The Communists will continue to enjoy ample opportunities for agitation, in view of the continuing economic and social dislocations of the mass of the people. They will probably continue to exploit those issues which already have aroused considerable popular feeling, in particular the rising cost of living. Their association with such issues will probably enhance their influence and further their efforts to obtain legalization of the Party. Their primary objective will continue to be to stimulate anti-US feeling in order to neutralize Brazil as an effective ally of the US. The Communists will be unable to win control of the government, but their influence in official circles and popular opinion will probably increase.

49. Brazil will almost certainly continue to support the United States on major issues between the US and the Soviet Bloc, but, if not granted the special consideration to which it feels entitled, with particular reference to further developmental loans, it may pursue an increasingly independent course in economic matters. A desire to strengthen its bargaining position vis-à-vis the United States will be an important factor in Brazilian diplomacy. Brazil will seek to establish closer economic relations in Latin America and with Europe, including efforts to increase its non-strategic trade with the Soviet Bloc. It may also re-establish diplomatic relations with the USSR and other nations of the Soviet Bloc. These developments would enhance the prestige and influence of the Communists in Brazil.

50. Brazil will continue to oppose Argentine bids for the leadership of Latin America. It will oppose any Argentine political or economic penetration of neighboring countries and the development of any Argentine-dominated economic bloc in South America.

51. In the event of general war Brazil would almost certainly enter the war actively in support of the United States. Its contribution would consist primarily of making available strategic raw materials and air and naval bases, and of honoring its commitments to furnish forces for Hemisphere defense. Under pressure it might also furnish a small expeditionary force for use outside the Hemisphere.

The Deputy Administrator of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (Robbins) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, March 3, 1954.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to our letter of September 18, 1953[1] and previous correspondence with regard to the liquidation of 60,000 shares of capital stock of the Amazon Credit Bank of Brazil held by this Corporation.

We are in receipt of Dispatch No. 727 of December 7, 1953[2] from the United States Embassy in Brazil suggesting that the Embassy be authorized to advise the Brazilian Government that the Government of the United States will accept the Brazilian offer for payment in cruzeiros of all dividends declared but unpaid, with the reservation that with respect to dividends declared after December 19, 1951 payment would be accepted in cruzeiros, with the understanding that foreign exchange might be required at a later date.

In addition, the Embassy suggests it make known to the Brazilians our desire to receive 60,000,000 cruzeiros, or the par value of the 60,000 shares of stock, in return for the transfer to the Brazilian Treasury of such stock; that both governments leave to a more favorable occasion the question as to when and at what rate the United States would arrange, through the Bank of Brazil, for the transfer at one time or in installments over a reasonable period of time the 60,000,000 cruzeiros representing the proceeds of the sale of the stock. The Embassy also stated it believes it can support the sale of the stock at 100% of its par value in cruzeiros on the basis of per-share-earnings ratio, and yields, relating to comparable Brazilian bank stocks, in particular shares of the Bank of Brazil.

There are enclosed an original and two copies of a letter[3] which we have addressed to the United States Embassy in Brazil authorizing the Embassy to proceed to negotiate with the Brazilian Government on the basis of receiving the declared but unpaid dividends in cruzeiros and sale of the stock at 100% of its par value in cruzeiros, with no reservations as to the exchange of the cruzeiros into dollar funds.

Would you please cause the original of the enclosed letter to be for-

[4] In instruction 18, to Rio de Janeiro, dated Mar. 24, 1954, the Department directed Ambassador Kemper to negotiate the liquidation of the U.S. Government's shares of the Amazon Credit Bank Capital stock and accrued dividends (832.053/3–354).

In telegram 579, from Rio de Janeiro, dated Dec. 10, 1954, Ambassador Kemper stated that he had settled the Amazon Credit Bank matter. He reported, in part, that the settlement was made "on basis full payment in cruzeiros for investment U.S. stock interest and unpaid dividends. Brazil will pay 10,000,000 cruzeiros immediately and equal amounts each month thereafter until entire debts liquidated." (832.10/12–1054)

The Ambassador in Brazil (Kemper) to the Department of State

SECRET PRIORITY RIO DE JANEIRO, April 1, 1954—1 p. m.

754. For Secretary from Ambassador. Reference Department's telegram 684, March 31.[1]

When in Washington discussed with General Smith and others exchange of wheat for monazite and thorium which looked like good arrangement particularly because it would settle present dispute with Brazilian Government regarding US obligation under exchange of notes February 1952. Thus far Foreign Office and Finance Minister reject barter idea claiming it would open up demands from all quarters for similar arrangements. Should think New York banks would be willing finance purchase up to 300,000 tons 18 months particularly in light substantial improvement Brazilian financial position stemming largely from advance in prices coffee and cocoa. Someone in administration undoubtedly could set this up with New York banks without difficulty. Both wheat sale and settlement dispute on purchase monazite would be most helpful[2] present major negotiations with Brazilian Government on uranium.[3]

[3] In telegram 732, to Rio de Janeiro, dated Apr. 22, 1954, the Department notified the Embassy that the Office of Defense Mobilization agreed to authorize the use of its funds for the purchase of monazite and rare earth derivatives in exchange for U.S. wheat, and instructed the Embassy to inform the Brazilian Government that the United States was prepared to negotiate an appropriate contract in Washington or Rio de Janeiro (832.2311/4–2254).

The group then discussed the defense organization with Brazil. The subject was divided up into two phases: (1) the name of the Joint Board; and (2) membership on the Board. Mr. Murphy called on Mr. Holland to present the State Department's position.

With respect to the Board's name, Mr. Holland indicated that State wanted to get away from one which was too much like the Canadian-U.S. Permanent Joint Board on Defense. He said that the State Department preferred the title: "Brazil–U.S. Defense Board" or secondly, "Combined Board on Defense, Brazil–U.S.".

Admiral Radford indicated that the title "Combined Board on Defense, Brazil–U.S." was acceptable to all three services. Mr. Murphy indicated that it was also acceptable to State. It was agreed to use that title.

Referring to the question of membership, Mr. Holland indicated that the Brazilians shared the view of the State Department that State and Brazilian Foreign Office representatives should be permanent representatives of the Board.

General Bolte drew on his experience with the Canadian-U.S. Board, and with the Mexican-U.S. Board, to indicate why he felt it was preferable that State Department and Brazilian Foreign Office representatives should not be permanent members, but rather should be invited to sit in with the Board only when matters of a political nature were included on the agenda. He emphasized that there had been no difficulty with permanent Canadian and U.S. political department representatives on the Canadian Board largely because the two countries spoke the same language, both literally and figuratively. It was different with the Mexican Board, he said. In the case of the Mexican Board, it would have been better if no political matters had been discussed and if such questions had been handled in the routine way through diplomatic channels. He attributed this conviction to the temperament of the Latin Americans as contrasted with that of the Canadians.

Admiral Radford stated that the Chiefs had no firm position on the question, but that in view of the character of our Latin American friends he felt it was advisable to consider whether politics and military matters should be mixed below the Rio Grande.

Mr. Holland emphasized that there was no military matter which might be discussed with Latin American representatives which did not have political implications, and that therefore the Department felt it was preferable to have its own representatives permanently on the Board.

Admiral Carney inquired whether the inclusion of political representatives did not change the complexion and character of the Board, raising it above the military level. He also brought up the question of chairmanship. He referred to his experiences in Europe in negotiating status of forces agreements, etc., to his reliance on a political adviser who was not present at the military meetings but who studied the political implications of any military decisions and referred them through diplomatic channels.

Mr. Murphy expressed the view that there would be no difficulty with respect to chairmanship.

General Bolte stated that in his experience with the Canadian and the Mexican Boards there was no firm decision without State Department clearance.

Mr. Holland pointed out that in Canada when you dealt with the army you were dealing with a definitely military organization, while in Latin America when you deal with the army you are also dealing with an important political entity, and with personalities who had present or potential political importance.

General Bolte then reviewed his experience in London with General DeGaulle. He indicated that he and Admiral Stark had always dealt with General DeGaulle not as head of the Provisional French Government, but as Commander of the Free French Forces. When any political matters were brought up by General DeGaulle, and there were many, he was referred to our Embassy in London.

General Twining summed up by saying that the whole question of our defense organization with Brazil had been dragging on for some time, and that it was time to get on with it.

Mr. Murphy said that he would like to leave it with the Chiefs that the State Department favors permanent representatives on the Board along with members of the Brazilian Foreign Office.

Admiral Radford indicated that the Chiefs would think it over, and that they would have an answer for State in a week's time.[2]

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Acting Secretary of State [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 16, 1954.

Subject: Proposed Joint Brazil–U.S. Economic Board

Discussion:

The Brazilian Foreign Minister spoke to the Secretary at Caracas about the possibility of forming a Joint Brazil–U.S. Economic Board, and President Vargas and the Foreign Minister have also spoken to Ambassador Kemper about this. You may recall that when the Secretary first mentioned this in his staff meeting, he thought it might be advisable to create this kind of board, but I believe he now has doubts about the wisdom of doing so.

While creation of a high-level formal Joint Economic Board with Brazil would be a significant method of fostering our important relationship with that country, such a Board would be almost certainly called upon by the Brazilians to consider further U.S. loans for economic development. Our experience with the Brazil–U.S. Joint Commission for Economic Development, which was terminated just a short while ago, bears this out. Having assisted the Brazilians in drawing up their economic development projects in bankable form, we were faced with Brazilian insistence that we assure financing for these projects. Moreover, it is also likely that the Brazilian Government, faced with Congressional elections, considers that with such a Board it could shift to the U.S. a part of its political responsibility for any delay in economic development.

Brazil now has outstanding commitments from the Eximbank and the International Bank totaling $838 million and has repaid $63 million. Even though high coffee prices have improved her dollar position, the easing of the terms on the $300 million Eximbank loan for the liquidation of commercial arrearages is under discussion. Thus, it is unlikely that either the Eximbank or the World Bank will favor further large loans to Brazil in the near future.

Recommendations:

That you authorize me to inform the Brazilian Ambassador that (1) it would not be desirable to establish a high-level and formal Joint Brazil–U.S. Economic Board because we cannot set a precedent under which U.S. Cabinet officers would be expected to participate on joint boards to examine the internal economic problems of foreign governments; and (2) we are prepared to carry on bilateral discussions with

Subject: Proposed Joint Defense Commission with Brazil

Discussion:

Since January 1953 there has been correspondence with the Defense Department concerning participation by the Department and the Brazilian Foreign Office on a proposed US–Brazil Defense Board. An exchange of notes establishing the new commission, which was agreed on in conversations at Rio de Janeiro in September 1952, is overdue. The exchange of notes will also give public authorization for the existing structure of US-Brazilian defense cooperation, organized on the basis of secret notes exchanged in 1942.

There has been certain Army opposition to civilian membership on the new Board. Despite the fact that our Embassy at Rio, our Army, Navy and Air representatives in Rio, and the Brazilian Government all favor civilian membership, Army opposition in the Pentagon has been sufficiently strong to persuade the JCS to a negative position. Mr. Murphy has recently presented the Department's position again to the JCS,[2] but the JCS has maintained its earlier opposition.

Civilian membership would in our view assist in the attainment of military objectives in Brazil. Most of our anticipated military objectives there, such as a large Army communications center and guided missile bases, involve the use of Brazilian territory by numerous American personnel and are potentially explosive political subjects. Civilian participation on the new Board would provide an alternative channel between the two governments for the handling of technical arrangements of defense character and, as has been the experience in Canada, would make it possible to expedite decisions and agreements in the political-military field and avoid delays and security problems involved in referring them to the Brazilian Congress. The Army's obstinacy regarding civilian membership ignores even Army long-range interests. See Tab A[3] for a fuller discussion of the issue.

Recommendation:

That you take the matter of civilian membership to the Cabinet for decision, in view of the necessity for handling political-military relations with Brazil with full regard for Brazilian sensitivity. You may wish to mention this matter to the President beforehand. ARA will arrange for Defense to be given advance notice of our intention.[4]

[4] A memorandum to Mr. Holland, dated June 2, 1954, by Mr. Murphy, reads as follows:

"With reference to your memorandum of May 18 on the above subject, I have twice discussed this question with Acting Secretary of Defense Anderson, who put the question to the Joint Chiefs stating that unless the Joint Chiefs had very good and valid reasons for their position, that he would urge them to reconsider in favor of our suggestion. I understand the Joint Chiefs are meeting shortly on this question, and for that reason feel that we should await the outcome of their reconsideration before suggesting that the Secretary go to the Cabinet with this question." (732.5 MSP/5–1254). On June 4, 1954, the JCS reaffirmed to the Secretary of Defense their original position that the proposed combined board should be military in nature.

Editorial Note

Documents in Department of State file 732.56 for 1952–1954 indicate that during these years the Brazilian Government remitted to the United States three payments of $5 million each, and two payments of $500,000 each under the provisions, respectively, of the Brazilian Lend-Lease Settlement Arrangement of April 15, 1948, and Supplement No. 1, dated April 19, 1950, to the Settlement Arrangement. For text of the Settlement Arrangement, see Foreign Relations, 1948, volume IX, pages 383–387; the exchange of notes constituting the supplementary agreement is contained under cover of a memorandum, dated April 25, 1950, by Charles W. Kempter of the Lend-Lease and Surplus Property Staff (732.56/4–1950).

These remittances completed payment of obligations amounting to $72.144 million assumed by Brazil under lend-lease settlement terms. For text of Department of State press release 358, dated July 1, 1954, and related statements with respect to Brazil's fulfillment of its lend-lease obligations, see Department of State Bulletin, July 12, 1954, pages 47–48.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Holland) to the Deputy Under Secretary of State (Murphy)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 12, 1954.

Subject: United States Military Relations with Brazil

Discussion:

We have four serious immediate problems with Brazil in the military field.

1. The establishment of a new combined defense board with Brazil has been delayed since 1952 because of our argument with the Pentagon over Department and Foreign Office membership on the Board. The Brazilians are pressing for action and are unhappy about our delay. (Tab A)

2. The JBUSMC in Rio has proposed a $50 million equipment program for the Brazilian Army, Air Force and Navy. The Pentagon is stalling, maybe with good reason, but the Brazilians are unhappy because they thought their chances were good. (Tab B)

3. The Brazilians are very irritated about not obtaining from the U.S. a baby carrier, two submarines and four destroyer escort vessels. They threaten to reduce the size of the U.S. Naval Mission, slow down improvements of Brazilian naval bases, and cut down privileges of the U.S. naval radio facility in Recife. (Tab C)

4. The Pentagon is about ready to ask the Department to negotiate an agreement with Brazil to establish an Army 1000-acre, 500-man radio relay station in Brazil, three air bases and 75 acres for a guided missile tracking facility for the Air Force, and an extension of the Navy radio facility agreement at Recife. (Tab D)

Recommendation:

That you call Secretary Wilson, refer to his request for Secretary Dulles' views on the new Combined Board, (see Tab A), and tell him:

1) You believe the new Board should be established without further delay, and with Department and Foreign Office full membership. The new Board should immediately undertake a review of our bilateral military arrangements with Brazil, including a) the $50 million JBUSMC program, b) the latest Brazilian Navy request for fleet units and c) negotiation of the base rights and facilities needed by the Pentagon.

2) You would appreciate Secretary Wilson's reply before July 15, to inform Ambassador Muniz, who is going to Brazil and says he will be confronted by his Government with the first three problems outlined above.[2]

[Tab A][3]

PROPOSED COMBINED DEFENSE BOARD, BRAZIL–UNITED STATES

Agreement was reached with Brazil in 1952 to establish a new Combined Defense Board, but its creation has been delayed principally because of differences with the Pentagon over State Department and Foreign Office membership on the Board. The Brazilians have made known their dissatisfaction over the long delay, and are pressing for action.

The Department believes that Foreign Office and State Department representatives should be members of the Board because some of its most important problems will have significant political ramifications, and that such membership will be invaluable in solving them. One such problem includes negotiation of extensive U.S. base rights and facilities in Brazil. The Foreign Office, the Embassy, the top U.S. military officers of the existing Joint Brazil–U.S. Military Commission, and Assistant Defense Secretary Struve Hensel concur.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff reject the Department and Foreign Office membership on the grounds that it "would alter the concept of the Board to that of a Government-to-Government body, thus opening the way to include political and economic matters as well as setting an unwanted precedent . . ." Since certain military issues have now reached the position where they threaten the harmony of our political relations with Brazil, the JCS view appears unrealistic and potentially dangerous.

[2] The source text contains no indication of Deputy Under Secretary Murphy's action on Assistant Secretary Holland's recommendation.

A letter to Deputy Secretary of Defense Anderson by Deputy Under Secretary Murphy, dated Aug. 3, 1954, reads in part as follows:

"I refer to our conversation on July 21 at which time you confirmed the agreement of the Department of Defense that representatives of the Department of State and the Brazilian Foreign Office should be included as members of the proposed Combined Board on Defense, Brazil–United States.

"Now that agreement has been reached, I suggest we proceed at once to effect an exchange of notes with Brazil to establish the Board." (732.5/8–354)

In a letter dated Sept. 3, 1954, Acting Secretary of Defense Anderson informed Deputy Under Secretary of State Murphy that he and the JCS had considered the draft note to the Brazilian Government regarding the Combined Board and the draft statement of objectives, functions, and procedures of the joint military agencies received under cover of Mr. Murphy's letter of Aug. 3. The Acting Secretary of Defense transmitted a memorandum by the JCS to the Secretary of Defense dated Sept. 1, 1954, in which they recommended that the statement of objectives be referred to the Combined Board and suggested a change in the draft note. Acting Secretary Anderson expressed concurrence with the JCS views and recommendations. (JCS files, 092.2–Brazil)

A copy of the note delivered to the Brazilian Foreign Office on Sept. 16, 1954, proposing the establishment of a Combined Board on Defense, Brazil–United States (CBD–BUS), was transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 301, dated Sept. 17, 1954, not printed (732.5/9–1754).

[3] This and the three following annexes were presumably drafted by Mr. Cottrell.

Assistant Secetary of Defense Hensel agrees with our view and has suggested to Secretary Wilson that he discuss the problem with Admiral Radford rather than overrule the JCS at this time.

The Defense Secretary has aked Secretary Dulles for his comments on an unsigned draft letter[4] from Defense setting forth and concurring in the views of the JCS. ARA has recommended to Secretary Dulles that he inform the Secretary of Defense that he does not concur with the views of the Joint Chiefs and that State Department and Brazilian Foreign Office membership on the proposed Board is essential to the achievement of our military objectives in Brazil.

[Tab B]

PROPOSED MILITARY EQUIPMENT PROGRAM FOR BRAZIL

On January 13, 1954 the Joint Brazil–United States Military Commission (JBUSMC) submitted a recommendation to the Joint Chiefs of Staff for a $50 million equipment program for the Brazilian Army, Navy and Air Force. This report was signed by the top Brazilian and U.S. members, including Generals Beiderlinden and Wade,[5] and Admiral Whitehead.[6] The State Department has not been officially informed of this recommendation.

The additional forces requested by JBUSMC for Brazil include:

Army:	1 Airborne Regimental Combat Team
	2 Infantry Regimental Combat Teams
	1 Battalion of Medium Tanks
Navy:	16 Destroyer Escort Vessels
	5 Destroyers
	4 Fleet-type Submarines
	It was recommended that these vessels be made available in four installments, the first of which would include:
	4 Destroyer Escort Vessels
	1 Destroyer
	1 Fleet-type Submarine
Air Force:	1 Squadron (12 planes) of C–32 Fairchilds
	1 Squadron (12 planes) of PB4Y–2 (Privateers)
	10 Helicopters (H19)

The Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Pentagon have not taken affirmative action on the recommendation. They have told JBUSMC that the plan is "under consideration". Unofficially, we understand that the Pentagon took a very dim view of the recommendation, and are not prepared to supply the equipment. This creates a serious problem because the Brazilians expect some action.

In addition, the Chief of the U.S. Air Force Section of JBUSMC has recommended that six C–47 aircraft be included in the military grant aid progam for Brazil. Brazil has also indicated its interest in purchasing from Defense ten C–45 aircraft and six C–119 airplanes.

[Tab C]

BRAZIL'S REQUEST FOR NAVY VESSELS

Brazil transmitted through the State Department to the Defense Department a request for a baby aircraft carrier, two submarines and four destroyer escort vessels. (This corresponds, with modifications, to the first installment recommended by the JBUSMC equipment plan.) Admiral Whitehead, ranking U.S. Navy officer in Brazil, came to Washington for the purpose of personally recommending to Admiral Carney that the Brazilian request be approved. Admiral Araujo,[7] Inspector General of the Brazilian Navy, accompanied Admiral Whitehead to press for favorable action. Mr. Holland informed the Navy of his favorable interest in the matter. As yet no formal reply has been received from the Defense Department.

Admiral Carney informally told Admiral Araujo that the Navy did not have sufficient ships in its reserve fleet to justify approving the Brazilian request in the absence of any overriding political consideration from the State Department. Ambassador Muniz, obviously under great pressure from his Government, has on more than one occasion asked the Department if it would not be possible for us to come up with the necessary political considerations.

The Navy considers its reserve fleet inadequate to justify the transfer of these vessels to Brazil, and such a transfer would require special enabling legislation by Congress.

On July 7 Ambassador Muniz informed Mr. Holland that the Brazilian Navy Chief, Admiral Guillobel,[8] is very irritated about not obtaining from the United States the vessels which he had been encouraged by JBUSMC to believe Brazil could expect. Guillobel threatens to reduce the size of the U.S. Naval Mission, slow down improvements of Brazilian naval bases, and cut down privileges of the U.S. Naval radio facility in Recife.

[Tab D]

DESIRED AGREEMENT FOR U.S. MILITARY FACILITIES IN BRAZIL

The Pentagon is about ready to ask the Department of State to negotiate an agreement with Brazil for certain rights and facilities in that country. A draft agreement[9] has been prepared and sent to Rio for the comments of the Embassy and the U.S. military officials there.

[7] Vice Adm. Ernesto de Araújo.
[8] Renato de Almeida Guillobel.

1. The Army desires the right to construct and operate a world-wide radio communication station at Recife. This would require obtaining from Brazil 1,150 acres of land and permission to station about 500 officers and men to staff the stations after completion.
2. The Navy desires the right of continued operation of the Naval Radio Station at Recife.
3. The Air Force lists as general requirements three Off-Base sites as surveillance stations for missile flights, and three Air Bases. These would require the acquisition of real estate in several areas in Brazil, the right to use certain airports in Rio, Belem and Natal, and the right to station approximately 840 officers and men at these bases.

Negotiation of this "package" will be virtually impossible if the Brazilian military people remain in their present unhappy frame of mind. Also, even in the best climate for negotiation, ARA does not believe an agreement can be reached unless the Pentagon is willing to give the Brazilians part of what they want (matériel under the $50 million plan) in return for base rights.

The new Combined Board, with Department and Foreign Office membership, should be the logical instrument to work out the solutions to these problems.

Editorial Note

On August 20, 1954, the United States and Brazil signed an exchange of notes at Rio de Janeiro, effective the same date, declaring that the agreement of February 21, 1952, with respect to the purchase of monazite sand by the United States, was superseded, and providing for the purchase by the Brazilian Government of 100,000 long tons of United States wheat, and the opening of negotiations for the possible purchase of monazite and rare earth sodium sulphates by the United States in equivalent value. The notes were transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 203, from Rio de Janeiro, dated August 23, 1954, not printed (832.2311/8–2354).

Documents in file 832.2546 for 1954 indicate that negotiations between the United States and Brazil for the purchase of monazite and sodium sulphates in accordance with the agreement of August 20 were initiated in September and suspended in November. No purchase agreement was reached in 1954.

Editorial Note

On August 24, 1954, during a period of political crisis in Brazil, President Vargas committed suicide, and Vice President João Café Filho succeeded to the Presidency. Documentation concerning these events and the United States reaction is in files 732.00 and 732.11 for 1954.

The Ambassador in Brazil (Kemper) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY

RIO DE JANEIRO, September 12, 1954—10 p. m.

278. Pass Treasury, Federal Reserve Board and Export-Import Bank. From Holland.[1] Full extent extremely critical financial situation Brazil (reference Embassy telegram 270 September 9[2]) resulting from disastrous coffee price support policy and other mistakes of previous government became clear to new administration only last few days. Actual magnitude although feared by technical experts including Embassy owing to sales of dollar exchange for delayed delivery without certainty of cover (see Embassy economic Weekas and financial reports) was not available statistically prior our lengthy discussion with Finance Minister Gudin[3] and staff. Problem breaks down:

(1) Immediate situation to be faced in September; and (2) situation which will become increasingly critical during October–December 1954 and in 1955.

Brazil confronted with immediate crisis in foreign exchange position involving sale of gold if new Federal Reserve gold loan is not granted. Brazilian authorities believe that if they are obliged to sell gold domestic political consequences would be severe if not unbearable to present administration which is trying to gain support to face financial crisis and take necessary measures reorient economic policy.

Brazilian officials assert, however, government would sell gold before defaulting exchange contract. Domestic effects indicated are (1) bears would enter coffee market with resulting reduction sales; (2) commercial bankers reduce credit lines; (3) severe political blow prestige and popular support of present administration. Moreover refusal US grant gold loan forcing sale elsewhere would diminish US influence new administration impairing our ability persuade Brazil take sound economic measures including opening oil development private enterprise.

Following is estimated dollar exchange position for September and following three months on cash basis.

Receipts (estimated)	September 1954	October–December 1954
Exports	60	180
Drawings on bank lines (net)	−5	93
Other	5	0
Total	60	273.0
Expenses for which exchange is closed or promised
Export-Import loan	4.2	12.6
FRB loan	0	80.3
Swaps (net)	2.5	6.4
Petroleum	12.1	78.6
Imports with exchange closed	39.2	42.0
Exchange certificates in circulation—estimated closings	40.0	64.0
Government commitments	9.2	25.2
Letter of credit, Brazil Light and other	18.1	18.7
Total	125.3	327.8
Deficit (minus)	−65.3	−54.8

To foregoing should be added government imports and newsprint for which exchange must be made available as follows: September 1.2 million; October–December 15.6 million.

Above represents considered opinion of Ministry Finance and Joao Dantas, director exchange department Bank Brazil. However, Dantas suggested that September crisis could be mitigated by following developments which could not be promised or assured. Receipts: Exports at extreme might reach 70 million (although Embassy believe negligible chance exceeding 60). Drawings on bank lines could rise by 30 million producing net receipt from that source of 25 million. Swaps might not be reduced thus providing additional net income of 5 million rather than net expenditure of 2.5 million. Expenditures: All exchange certificates in circulation might not be presented for closing exchange contracts, reducing 40 million figure to perhaps 30 million. Thus on unexpected favorable turn of events, and robbing remaining months of year to improve September position, deficit might be reduced to 9.0 million. Nevertheless some sale of gold probably still necessary if FRB loan not extended or other sources of credit not found.

October–December picture made acute by obligation to repay existing FRB credit in October. Attempts to alleviate September position while awaiting reply on request for new credit would heighten difficulties in last three months of year as against figures shown in above table.

1955 prospects. Brazil figures for this period which are being airmailed show deficit of 155 million in first six months and 90 million in last six months. These figures assume continuation sale 120 day forward exchange against general imports, 90 days against petroleum and for varying and longer periods against certain services. No wheat imports from dollar area have been provided for although every indication of need for wheat from US or Canada in amounts of about $3 million per month. Dollars to be provided in auction markets 20 million a month commencing in September with exchange to be delivered in January and thereafter.

Brazilians have proposed medium-term loan of $341 million to be available in November or shortly thereafter to pick up deficit as outlined above and to pay off 62 million of bank lines. This would not place Brazil on current basis but would continue 120 and 90 day sale of exchange certificates.

Brazilians request informal. We made no comment beyond clarifying supporting figures. Suggest matter be considered exhaustively with Minister Gudin who arrives Washington September 21. Methods for handling late 54 and 55 deficit far more varied than September deficit and final decision should await disclosure much additional information and appropriate Brazilian action and commitments regarding which Embassy will comment fully.

Am impressed Gudin's ability and sincerity. He asserts willingness continue office until end of present administration and claims full Presidential support combat inflation and institute sound fiscal policies. President personally confirmed this to me and stated will continue present Cabinet regardless outcome October elections. I feel careful analysis present crisis may reveal opportunity achieve reversal long period fiscal folly, institution sound petroleum program and consolidation in power of solidly pro-US Government.

My recommendations (1) feel situation warrants decision before Gudin's arrival Washington that, if necessary, up to full new 80 million gold loan will be granted and (2) full discussion by Washington authorities with Gudin with decision to be made then concerning renewal of old 80 million loan, amount new money required, and arrangements for repayment of such FRB credits as may be then outstanding.

I strongly urge no publicity and express no opinion US domestic political implications.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Woodward)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 7, 1954.

Subject: Future Assistance in Solving Brazil's Exchange Problem

Participants: Secretary of the Treasury
Under Secretary of State
Mr. Andrew Overby, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury
Mr. Kalijarvi, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs
Mr. Woodward, ARA

Mr. Hoover had requested the conversation with Secretary Humphrey in order to arrive at a preliminary position with respect to possible future assistance to Brazil in solving its exchange problem. When the meeting was suggested, it had been expected that the Brazilian Finance Minister might come to Washington briefly before his departure for Brazil. Before the meeting took place, however, it had been learned that the Brazilian Finance Minister had departed from New York for Brazil that morning, fairly well satisfied with the success of his mission in obtaining an additional gold loan of $80 million and provoking serious thought among high officials of the United States Government concerning methods of giving future assistance to Brazil. Therefore, the meeting with Secretary Humphrey assumed less urgency.

Secretary Humphrey conceded that we would have to face the problem of further financial assistance to Brazil because of the inevitable exchange deficit in 1955. Secretary Humphrey emphasized, however, that the data received from Brazilian officials in the past had proved to be so unreliable that the first important step would be to make certain that reliable and detailed information is obtained concerning the precise exchange position of that country. Mr. Hoover agreed, and as a result of thorough discussion, it was decided that Assistant Secretary Overby and Assistant Secretary Waugh would be responsible for consulting with the Presidents of the Eximbank and the IBRD in order to select two or more fully qualified persons who could go to Rio de Janeiro and examine into the precise exchange situation of Brazil. Mr. Hoover said that these persons would be given every facility by the Embassy and that it might be desirable to have the principal officer formally designated as a Treasury representative.

Mr. Overby mentioned, in the course of the discussion, that Senhor Paraguaná[1] of the IMF, who carries out special assignments for the

[1] Octavio Paraguaná, Executive Director for Brazil, IMF.

Brazilian Government, had given him a tabulation of the Brazilian exchange situation with the outline of a plan[2] by which Brazil could refinance the amounts of repayments on the loan against gold as these repayments become due, by borrowing equivalent amounts against gold from commercial banks in New York. By this system, Mr. Overby said that Senhor Paraguaná had demonstrated with his calculations that Brazil could maintain its exchange situation without other loans until the middle of 1955—provided, of course, that the Brazilian Government carries out certain measures to reduce the dimensions of the problem by further curtailment of imports. Even this plan would only postpone the necessity for further assistance to Brazil in maintaining its exchange position, unless Brazil should succeed in taking measures which would attract large amounts of additional foreign capital for exploration for petroleum.

[2] Reference is to the "Paraguaná Plan", a proposal whereby Brazil would raise $216 million to cover deficits through 1955 by postponing certain payments due on Export-Import Bank loans, obtaining loans against gold from private banks, and drawing an additional $50 million from the IMF.

832.10/11–754

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Financial and Development Policy (Corbett) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Waugh)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 17, 1954.

Subject: Brazil's request for financial assistance.

Problem:

What is the financial position of Brazil, and is the new Government doing all that can reasonably be expected? Should the U.S. aid Brazil and if so what shall be the extent, timing and conditions of such aid?

Discussion:

In spite of recent borrowings it appears that Brazil's supply of dollars will be inadequate over the next 12–14 months to meet maturing obligations and pay for essential imports, even on an austerity basis. According to figures brought back from Rio by Messrs. Knoke and deBeers, Brazil had at the first of November cash balances of $33.7 million and unused lines of credit of $19 million, a total of $54.7 million to meet an expected deficit of $84.3 million to January 1, 1954. Brazil, however, is about to receive $40 million from private N.Y. banks, and be relieved of $26.8 of payments due the Federal Reserve Bank of New York during this period. Also exchange earnings during the first 11 days of November have amounted to $39 million which is better than expected; the estimated deficit is based on earnings of $60 million per month.

Brazil will therefore probably have enough dollars to get through January and perhaps February. The swaps need not be reduced as rapidly as scheduled during the next few months, and there is a little flexibility in some other items, although not a great deal since a large portion of the payments are contractual obligations.

During 1955 the situation is similarly bleak, unless coffee and other earnings should be materially better than the $60 million per month estimated. The price of coffee has been falling and futures indicate a further substantial decline is expected, so that estimated earnings may not be realized. The dollar deficit for 1955 is calculated at $202 million, which does not, however, allow for elimination of payments to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York of $134 million, thereby reducing the deficit to about $68 million. Brazil is asking for an Eximbank loan of $100 million.

The new Government is doing well in measures to control inflation. The coffee policy, however, is essentially unchanged and involves internal price supports at a level which encourages withholding of coffee from export. The Brazilians seem to feel that larger exports would not result in larger dollar earnings. They, including perhaps Mr. Gudin, do not appear greatly concerned about the coffee policy, and assert that in any event for political reasons it cannot be changed until the next coffee year which begins June 30.

Similarly with respect to petroleum, we are told that for political reasons nothing can be done for some time, that the next Congress which convenes in March may be able to deal with it. Mr. Gudin recognizes the need for changing the petroleum law, but President Cafe Filho is, according to the Embassy, insufficiently aware of the seriousness of the exchange problem and the relation of coffee and petroleum to it.

If the U.S. bails out the new Government they will doubtless relax, and while the program to control inflation and to institute certain other reforms will go forward, it will lose steam and the tendency will be not to deal adequately with the main problems, particularly coffee and petroleum.

Recommendation:

The U.S. should extend aid to Brazil, but this should not be in one large sum. It should be extended piece-meal, and in each case without commitment as to further amounts, which would depend upon developments and Brazil's progress in a constructive program. An initial sum might be granted in January if needed at that time and if other conditions are satisfactory.

We should discuss Brazil's problems with the President, the Foreign Minister and Finance Minister, complimenting them on their measures to control inflation, but pointing out our difficulties in extending aid in the absence of a coffee policy which permits coffee to move in volume, and a petroleum policy which permits the development of petroleum resources. We should urge that they announce a new petroleum policy. We should tell them that it appears they will not need aid until at least in January, and that at that time we will consider aid for immediate needs, and that further amounts will depend upon developments. If the coffee and petroleum problems should be satisfactorily dealt with in the near future, and the need for aid existed the U.S. might then modify the piece-meal approach.[2]

[2] Mr. Waugh saw this memorandum, but there is no indication on the source text whether he approved or disapproved the recommendation.

820.2333/12–2854

Memorandum of Conversation, by Sterling J. Cottrell of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 28, 1954.

Subject: Coffee situation.

Participants: Mr. João Carlos Muniz, Brazilian Ambassador to the U.S.
Mr. Egydio da Camara Souza, Economic Minister, Brazilian Embassy
Mr. Maury Gurgel Valente, First Secretary, Brazilian Embassy
ARA—Assistant Secretary Henry F. Holland
E—Assistant Secretary Samuel C. Waugh
OMP—Mr. Willis C. Armstrong
OSA—Sterling J. Cottrell

Ambassador Muniz presented a note which, he said, he had been instructed by the Foreign Office to discuss with Mr. Holland, Mr. Waugh, or the Secretary, in his discretion. The note referred to very unfavorable reaction in Brazil if the U.S. Congress were to place coffee under the Commodities Exchange Authority. The note and Ambassador Muniz' explanatory remarks indicated that the Brazilians felt this action would be unnecessary, discriminatory, inopportune, and untimely, since the Rio Conference had succeeded in establishing a fairly satisfactory atmosphere, and possibly a violation of the resolution[1]

[1] Reference is to Resolution ES–Res. 34/54, approved Dec. 1, 1954; for text, see Report of the United States Delegation to the Meeting of Ministers of Finance or Economy of the American Republics as the Fourth Extraordinary Meeting of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council, November 22 to December 2, 1954, Quitandinha, Brazil (Washington, 1954), Appendix 6, p. 14.

adopted at Rio to establish a special committee to study the coffee situation. The Ambassador explained that a unilateral act on the part of the U.S. to control the coffee market would be contradictory to the multilateral agreement reached at Rio to work out this problem under the framework of the OAS.

The Ambassador was informed that in our view the resolution at Rio could not be construed as limiting the rights of Congressional committees to make any recommendations they see fit. However, Mr. Waugh said that he intended to see Senator Capehart on another matter and would be glad to provide the Senator with a copy of the resolution reached at Rio. Mr. Armstrong undertook to inform appropriate members of the Beall Committee[2] of this resolution.

In the discussion it was the general understanding that the Beall Staff Committee was now preparing its report but that it would not be submitted to the full Committee until some time in February. After that there would be hearings prior to any legislative action by the U.S. Congress if the Beall report recommended legislation.

The Ambassador concluded by urging that all appropriate steps be taken by the Department to inform the Beall and Capehart Committees of the anticipated repercussions from coffee-producing countries if legislation were introduced to place coffee under the Commodities Exchange Authority. During the meeting Ambassador Muniz was called to the 'phone and then reported that Mr. Paraguaná had just received a telephone call from Minister Gudin, asking for a decision from Secretary Humphrey concerning a standby loan for Brazil. The Ambassador said that Minister Gudin, on the basis of his conversations with Secretary Humphrey in Rio, was hopeful of a favorable answer. Mr. Holland said he would look into this matter for him.

CHILE

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND CHILE[1]

Miller files, lot 53 D 26, "Chile"

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller) to the Ambassador in Chile (Bowers)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 7, 1952.

DEAR AMBASSADOR BOWERS:

[Here follow comments about Ambassador Bowers' health and the tin situation in Bolivia.]

I am extremely worried about the copper situation. Nieto del Rio[2] and Muller[3] came in to see me last Friday, as predicted in your telegram 334,[4] to warn that any effort to change the price of copper without Chile's consent could lead to Chile taking over all the country's production as authorized in the bill[5] which recently passed the Chamber of Deputies. You will be getting a report of this conversation from Barall. However, to me it is just one more instance of Gonzalez Videla and the Chileans going off half cocked without any responsible study of their action. To base a major governmental decision upon a half-garbled newspaper account by one official of our Government without any prior checking with us seems to me to represent the height of irresponsibility and to verge on Mossadegh[6] tactics. We were able very simply to point out to Muller and Nieto that there was not the remotest thought of tampering with Chile's copper price and that we would never think of changing any price covered in an international agreement without consulting with the other country. Then I think I really impressed them by saying that Chile had to stop acting in this way since they were only prejudicing their own position in this country. I said that the copper companies had already expressed grave concern to us over the pending legislation and that they were seriously considering reviewing their whole investment program in Chile. This could only have adverse repercussions to Chile's economy.

It seems to me that some time you might have a frank talk with Gonzalez Videla and others about this constant trend on the part of Chileans to make their entire cooperation with us hinge upon details of our conduct towards them and to disregard entirely the things that we have done for Chile. The list of these things include the following during the last year:

1) Export-Import Bank loan for amplification of steel mill.[7]

2) Obtaining of priorities for steel mill at strong insistence of the Department of State with NPA to obtain steel badly needed in our defense program.

3) Obtaining of priorities for construction of petroleum refinery which was equally as difficult as the priorities for the steel mill. (The result of the obtaining of these two priorities puts Chile in as favorable position for steel allocations as any country in the world and took a very great deal of urging. We had to use as a basis for these discussions with NPA the resolutions of the Foreign Ministers' Conference[8] with regard to supplying Latin American requirements which of course were predicated on the parallel resolutions having to do with their supplying us with strategic materials.)

4) Straightening out of Chile's long difficulties with the International Bank which as the President will remember was personally attended to by me when I was in Chile last March. At the time he seemed to express due gratitude for this although it seems to have slipped his mind since. If it had not been for the coincidence of my visit and that of Black's, I doubt very much whether there would exist the present happy state of affairs between the Bank and Chile.

5) The sale of two cruisers to Chile at bargain prices both of which have been delivered to Chile in perfect form ahead of those bought by Brazil and Argentina.

6) Offer to negotiate a grant military aid agreement with Chile entirely unconditional upon any demonstration of Chile's interest in Korea.

7) Negotiation of copper agreement with Chile under which Chile obtains 3 cents a pound for copper more than our own producers, copper being the only commodity with regard to which our producers get less than foreign producers. So far as I know no one in Chile has taken the trouble to answer the demagogic attacks against the United States that this is so.

8) Substantial increase in our Point IV activities in Chile especially in agricultural fields as desired by the President.

9) United States support of Chile for the Security Council of the UN and for the election of Sra. Figueroa[9] as President of the General Assembly's Committee on Human Rights.

As against this, we have the following record on the part of Chile:

1) Total lack of interest in responding to our request for troops for Korea.

2) Failure on the part of Chile to implement copper agreement by passing law with regard to fair exchange and tax treatment for American copper companies while on the other hand an extremely dangerous bill is about to pass giving President power of life or death over companies which he may be forced by the exigencies of the campaign to invoke.

3) Demagogic attacks on American and Foreign Power Company and other American interests.

4) Frequently uncooperative attitude of Santa Cruz[10] in UN, for example, in holding out until nearly the bitter end in favor of Byelorussia instead of Greece for the Security Council[11] and in his intransigent and blackmailing attitude in regard to his resolution on economic development.[12]

It seems to me that the story of U.S. cooperation with Chile has not been told and that the Chilean public is being sold a bill of goods by their own Government. It seems to me that this is extremely unfortunate when most of the Chilean leaders are friends of the U.S. I understand that most of the Latin Americans including our friends everywhere conceive that political necessity in an election year requires attacks on the United States. I am terribly afraid that these attacks on the United States may whip up such sentiment that the Government, largely because of its own acquiescence in this type of behavior, may find itself in the position where it will have to take demagogic and prejudicial action such as invoking the authority given in the legislation under reference on acquiescing in a conference of twenty Latin American countries to put the heat on the United States with regard to raw material prices.

I think that Chile ought to realize that if they expect us in the State Department to continue to fight their battles for them successfully, as we have been doing, with other agencies of this Government which are subjected to the most intense internal domestic pressures, they will not be helping their case or ours by breaking their commitments to us or by creating in this country the kind of adverse publicity for Chile which would ensue from activities of the type mentioned.

Sincerely yours, EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

Editorial Note

On January 21, 1952, representatives of the United States and Chile initiated negotiations at Santiago for a bilateral military assistance agreement. Pertinent documents are in Department of State file 725.5 MSP. The agreement was signed on April 9, and entered into force on July 11, 1952; for text, see Department of State Treaties and Other International Acts Series (TIAS) No. 2703 or United States Treaties and Other International Agreements (UST), volume 3 (part 4), page 5123.

Concurrent with the negotiations for the military assistance agreement, representatives of the two governments negotiated a related bilateral military plan. The "Plan of the Governments of the Republic of Chile and of the United States of America for Their Common Defense" was initialed on April 9, 1952, by Ambassador Bowers and Chilean Minister for National Defense General Guillermo Barrios Tirado. A copy of the plan and a translation were transmitted to the Department of State under cover of despatch 1210, from Santiago, dated April 10, 1952, not printed (725.5 MSP/4–1052).

SECRET PRIORITY WASHINGTON, January 25, 1952—5:27 p. m.

349. No distribution outside Department. From Assistant Secretary Miller. Defense Mobilizer Wilson convened top level conference this morning at which Thorp, Brown and I present for Dept to discuss extremely critical copper situation. Requirements defense program such that US estimated to have 60,000 ton deficit first two quarters this year. As one possibility acquiring additional copper suggestion was put forward by some officials present at meeting that US shld consider offering Chile higher prices than 27½ cents per pound for part of Chile's retained 20 percent of US cos production. Depts reps strongly discouraged this idea on ground 1) that polit situation re copper so touchy in Chile that any move along this line might upset present relatively satisfactory copper agreement and 2) we cld probably not obtain enough copper to make any appreciable impact our shortages so as to warrant taking risks which we foresaw in Chile.

Our recommendation was that best course for us wld be to encourage increased production by US cos in Chile and that to this end we shld try to get Chile Govt to adopt soonest necessary laws and regs re revised tax and exchange treatment for copper cos.

We will have another meeting next week with reps Kennecott and Anaconda to discuss these problems in greater detail. Tele immed your estimate chances enactment laws re tax and exchange treatment and

[2] In telegram 392, from Santiago, dated Jan. 28, 1952, Ambassador Bowers suggested that one possible way to obtain more copper from Chile was to amend the United States–Chile copper agreement of 1951 to enable the United States to purchase 90 percent rather than 80 percent of the total Chilean production. He also stated that the Embassy did not see any way that it could "effectively enter picture with govt to seek early enactment tax and exchange law." (825.2542/1–2852)

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of International Materials Policy (Brown)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 14, 1952.

Subject: Copper

Participants: Mr. Nieto del Río—Chilean Ambassador
Mr. Muller—Economic Counselor, Chilean Embassy
Mr. Wilson—Director of Defense Mobilization
Mr. Brown—OMP

The meeting was arranged as a result of the Ambassador's instructions from his government to continue discussions about the price of Chilean copper on an informal basis with Mr. Wilson if possible.

Mr. Wilson opened the meeting by reporting that the night before he had received the first good news about copper that he had had in some time. He had attended a meeting of a business advisory group at which many large copper consumers were represented. They had all told him that they were much less worried about copper than they had been and were getting ample supplies for their needs. Mr. Wilson pointed out the extent to which aluminum was becoming available and was being used in substitution for copper, either by directive of the Government or as a result of the user's choice.

Mr. Muller pointed out that, nevertheless, copper was still in short supply and the United States representative in the IMC was actively pressing for large allocations for the United States.

Mr. Muller outlined the problems facing Chile, namely, that it was beginning to find difficulty in selling its 20 percent at 54 cents a pound, that it did not like to seem to be holding up friendly European countries for high prices, and that it would like to have a single price for copper at, say, 33½ cents. It seemed anomalous that the United States, the richest country in the world, should be paying the lowest price for its copper, and that poorer countries, which the United States was aiding financially, should be paying high prices for their copper.

Moreover, Mr. Muller said, it seemed unjust to the material-producing countries that the large industrial countries should extol the virtues of the law of supply and demand when supplies were plentiful and prices were low, but should rush in to impose price and other controls as soon as shortages developed. In his opinion, there could be no long-term solution of the problem of the material-producing countries, no solid foundation for a democracy in which the bad influence of demagogues could be counteracted, until some assurance of substantial and stable income from primary products could be given to the producing countries.

Mr. Muller appreciated the desire of the United States to keep stable prices. He recognized that this policy worked substantially to the benefit of Chile. He was not well enough aware of United States domestic procedures to be able to suggest exactly how the problem might be met, but the possibility occurred to him that the United States might buy Chilean copper at a higher price for its military requirements, keeping other supplies under control. This might be possible since military products did not enter into the general price structure.

Mr. Wilson said that he was impressed by what Mr. Muller had said and was appreciative of Chile's problem. He did not see how the United States could possibly be justified in increasing the domestic price of copper in view of the profits currently being earned by the domestic copper producers. Moreover, he felt that inflation was one of the great enemies facing the United States and he did not want to see an increase in the price of copper which would necessarily have to be passed on through the general price structure. He thought the mechanical problem of allocating high-priced Chilean copper to military orders, scattered in 100,000 plants over the United States, would be almost insuperable.

Mr. Muller countered by pointing out that the amount of copper which would be imported from Chile would be less than half the United States military requirements as presented to the IMC and could certainly be taken up by a few of the major domestic consumers such as ordnance factories and certain large corporations.

Mr. Wilson pointed out how unhappy the United States was about the failure of Chile to enact the tax and exchange legislation which had been agreed with the companies a year ago. Mr. Muller and the Ambassador said they personally felt equally unhappy about it. Mr. Muller said that a satisfactory solution of the current problem would make it much easier for Chile to pass the law now. I pointed out that this was precisely what had been said by Chilean negotiators a year ago. Mr. Muller and the Ambassador accepted this point as valid.

Mr. Muller made it perfectly clear that no part of any increase in price which he was suggesting would go to the companies. He said that he was negotiating for the Chilean Government, not for the companies which were making good profits at present prices.

Mr. Muller emphasized the political difficulties faced by the Chilean Government in an election year, with four candidates running for president, each one trying to outdo the other in promises to the voters.

It was left that the matter would be discussed further and that if reporters should ask about the visit, we should say that the Chileans called to discuss with Mr. Wilson the possible effect of his recently announced proposals for expansion of aluminum production on copper.

After the Chileans left, I asked Mr. Wilson how he proposd to follow up on the matter. He said he hoped it could be stalled for ten days or two weeks, since very important decisions would have to be made in connection with steel that might affect the whole future of CMP. I said I thought that would be easy, but that there should be a genuine negotiation, headed by someone from Mr. Wilson's office. Mr. Wilson inquired who we thought the negotiator should be. I said the best negotiator we had seen around in a long time was Mr. Fleischmann. Mr. Wilson said he would try to get him to do it and would let the Chileans know whom he had appointed by Tuesday or Wednesday of the following week. He said the negotiating team would include Mr. Larson and someone from State.[1]

I reminded Mr. Wilson of his agreement to take the companies into his confidence in any negotiation with the Chileans and to include them in the negotiation. Mr. Wilson said he did not think it would be necessary to bring the companies in at this stage.

Draft Position Paper Prepared in the Department of State[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 31, 1952.

DEPARTMENTAL POSITION CONCERNING CHILEAN COPPER NEGOTIATIONS

Problem

The Department member of the team designated to negotiate with Chile has been asked what course it [sic] recommends.

[1] Drafted by Deputy Director of the Office of International Materials Policy Evans.

Discussion

1. Chile has asked for renegotiation of the agreement under which 80 percent of the production of the large mines remains under control of the companies and the remaining 20 percent is controlled by the Chilean Government. The agreement had no explicit time period, but it is agreed that Chile could unilaterally renounce it after one year (mid-May) without violating its spirit.

2. Chile is in a strong bargaining position:

(a) Although the world free price for copper has weakened lately, it is still substantially over 27½ cents.

(b) We depend on Chilean copper to provide some 15 to 20 percent of the supply on which our second and third quarter CMP allocations are based. We could not forego Chilean imports without serious impact on the defense effort and our basic economy. In fact, we are in serious need of increased supplies.

(c) Chile might not be able to sell more than its 20 percent at prices much above 27½ cents but it could obtain more governmental revenue by seizing what is left of the companies' profits, either by tax action or outright expropriation. The present government is unlikely to take drastic action along these lines, but the legislature is quite capable of doing so.

3. The next move is up to the United States. Mr. Larson agreed to "think it over" and call the next meeting. We are not likely to obtain any advantage by delay:

(a) The present level of deliveries is unsatisfactory.

(b) Only a month and a half remains before Chile could renounce the present agreement with a clear conscience.

(c) Further delay is likely to arouse indignation and increase the likelihood of punitive action by the legislature.

4. We are forced to choose among several alternatives, none of them attractive.

Two theoretical alternatives can be rejected without serious consideration. The first—holding firm with no concession to Chile—is impracticable in the light of the strong Chilean bargaining position mentioned above and our need for increased copper supplies. At the opposite extreme there would be the possibility of the United States offering a long term contract which would support Chile's copper price for some time to come. In view of some indications that the world price is weakening, this might be sufficiently attractive to Chile to persuade them to settle for 27½ cents, or possibly even lower. On the other hand, if world free prices should go below 27½ cents, the United States Government would be incurring a very expensive liability. None of the usual arguments for long term contracts, such as their usefulness in stimulating additional production, is particularly applicable. The United States would do better to seek a solution which would not prevent the world price from declining to the United States domestic price level whenever supply and demand will permit.

If these two alternatives are eliminated, the three principal courses worth further exploration are:

Alternative A

Buy some additional copper from Chile (say 10 percent of the large line production) at a price well above 27½ cents.

Alternative B

In exchange for Chilean agreement to permit the companies to dispose of 90 percent of their production, revise the price in the agreement upward with the understanding Chile would sell all her copper at that price.

Alternative C

Same as alternative B but permit Chile to sell the remaining 10 percent and the small mine production at higher prices.

Appraisal of Alternatives

Alternative A has the possible advantage of postponing an increase in the price of copper being sold by other countries at 27½ cents. But it seems unlikely that this advantage would be more than temporary. Its two principal disadvantages are that it would require Government purchase, at a loss, and that it would improve the bargaining position of Chile in the sale of its remaining copper and add to the economic difficulties of Chile's European customers.

Alternative B would have the disadvantage of immediately raising the price of the remaining 27½ cent copper in the world. On the other hand, it would leave market forces free to bring that price down as supply improves or demand slackens. It would not require United States Government purchase, at a loss to the Government. It would ease the problem of Chile's European customers.

Alternative C would avoid United States Government purchase but might retard the effect of supply and demand in reducing world prices and would transfer the burden to Chile's European customers.

If the total cost to the United States taxpayers and consumers were the same for all three alternatives, alternative B would clearly seem to be the best. It would probably establish a single price outside the United States. It would make it possible for Chile to place its entire production under international allocation. It would eliminate a cause of friction between the United States and other customers of Chile. It would make it unnecessary for the United States Government to purchase foreign copper and would probably best protect the future position of the companies by reestablishing their right to maintain their normal commercial outlets.

It is impossible, however, to determine the respective costs of the three alternatives except by negotiation.

Recommendation

That the United States proceed with negotiations to determine which alternative would cost United States consumers or the United States Government the most, and then decide which alternative, if any, is acceptable.

In sounding out the Chileans, the following position should be made clear:

(1) We would not necessarily accept any increase but want to learn more precisely the price Chile would demand under specified conditions.

(2) Under all three alternatives the following conditions would apply:

(a) Chile would pass the tax legislation promised last spring.
(b) Chile would agree not to withhold any of the "backlog" now owed by the companies.

(3) In addition, the following conditions would apply to the specified alternatives:

Alternative A. Chile would not object to the sale by American companies of any part of their 90 percent to their traditional customers.
Alternative B. Chile would place all production under IMC allocation.
Alternative C. Same as alternative A.

No final decision on the three alternatives should be made until the negotiators are convinced they have obtained the best Chilean offer on each. Nevertheless, it should not be assumed that the decision as to which alternative we should accept should be based entirely on the average price of Chilean exports to the United States. It may be that the advantage of avoiding cost to the taxpayer and the other advantages of alternative B would argue in favor of its selection even though the average price were somewhat higher than for either of the other alternatives.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 2, 1952.

Participants: Señor Felix Nieto del Río, Chilean Ambassador
Mr. Atwood, Director, OSA
Mr. Brown, Director, OMP
Mr. Barall, OSA

The Ambassador stated that he had received instructions from his government to call off the "informal" talks in which he had been engaged with Assistant Secretary Miller, Mr. Charles E. Wilson, Mr. Larson, Mr. Fleischmann, Mr. Atwood, Mr. Brown, etc. He offered an opinion that the reason for the change might be the possibility of adverse political repercussions in Chile. He said that the Chilean public was more interested in what happened to the 20 percent than in the bulk of copper shipments and if action were taken to establish a 33½ cent price for all of Chile's copper this might be misconstrued by the public as a negotiation which lowered the price of copper instead of raising it.

He said the President had informed him that the Banco Central was having no difficulty in selling Chile's 20 percent at the high price established (54.4 cents per pound as opposed to 27½ cents for the 80 percent) and agreed that, if this is so, the urgent necessity for discussions of a possible increase to 33½ cents no longer existed. He did not raise the question of eliminating the two-price system which had been used as the basic argument for initiating the conversations. The Ambassador added that, of course, if the US had a proposal to submit with respect to a new copper price, the Chilean Government would be glad to consider it at any time, even a year or two from now, thus implying that the copper agreement would remain indefinitely in effect.

The Ambassador expressed his personal opinion that the termination of the copper talks did not mean that Chile was prepared to take unilateral action and impose an export tax. He said the President would not take such action because of his high respect for international agreements and because of his loyalty and friendship toward the United States. In answer to a specific query on the stories which had appeared in the Government's newspaper, La Nación, concerning the possibility of a 10-cent export tax, the Ambassador stated that there had been considerable discussion in Congress and in the press on the subject of an export tax, but that within the government itself there was no desire for this type of action.

The Ambassador stated that he had received word from President Gonzalez yesterday that the nitrate strike was settled satisfactorily and that the possibility of a copper strike had been averted, with the situation well in hand. Mr. Atwood commented that this was certainly good news for Chile since with a good market for both copper and nitrate at this time Chile stood to lose large amounts of dollar exchange if exports were curtailed. The Ambassador agreed and added that Chile had lost about 100,000 tons of nitrate sales as a result of the strike. He asked Mr. Brown to express his thanks to Mr. Wilson, Mr. Fleischmann, Mr. Larson, and the others who had dealt with him very sympathetically on the subject of copper. He also expressed his personal satisfaction that the talks had been called off. Mr. Brown promised to convey the Ambassador's message to the other gentlemen concerned. Mr. Atwood thanked the Ambassador for informing the Department promptly of the decision of the Chilean Government.[1]

[1] In telegram 496, to Santiago, dated Apr. 9, 1952, Mr. Miller stated that he had reason to believe that Ambassador Nieto del Río had misconstrued his instructions to suspend the copper negotiations, and also that Chile had no intention to abandon its efforts to obtain a higher price for its copper. He further stated the following: "I am worried about Chile's tactics since Nieto and Muller began their informal conversations with us several weeks ago. They have been very careful keep conversations on 'informal' basis and to put responsibility on us for proposing solution to their problem. I am very much afraid they may be maneuvering us into position where they cld justify imposition substantially higher price. Naturally in view anti-inflation program in Govt and gen softening raw material prices, it is extremely difficult for us, in absence specific Chil proposal, give serious consideration to price rise. Coming on top of Chile's peculiar tactics, Nieto's apparent misconstruction his instrs may put us in difficult position inviting drastic action by Chil Govt." (825.2542/4–252)

Memorandum of Conversation, by Milton Barall of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 2, 1952.

Subject: Chile Denounces Copper Agreement

Participants: Ambassador Félix Nieto del Río, Chilean Ambassador
Señor Mario Rodríguez, Counselor, Chilean Embassy
Señor Jorge Burr, Counselor, Chilean Embassy
Assistant Secretary Edward G. Miller
R. S. Atwood, Director, OSA
Mr. Barall, OSA

The Ambassador said he had received a telephone call from President González Videla this morning instructing him to see the President of the United States in order to inform him that the Chilean Government had reached a decision to denounce the copper agreement of 1951 and take full control of the sale of copper. (Presumably under the provisions of Law No. 10,255 of February 12, 1952.) The Ambassador explained that he knew President Truman was busy with important strikes and he, therefore, approached the State Department instead. He said the reasons for the decision of the Chilean Government, as explained to him by the President, were:

a. The extreme danger in which the Government finds itself both politically and economically.

b. A Foreign Exchange Budget for 1952 which is short by an anticipated $50 million because of the failure of Chile to get its price in sales of its 20 percent quota.

c. Rising anti-US sentiment in Chile despite the efforts of the Government to keep it down. (At this point, Mr. Miller interjected the question, "What efforts?" He said he knew of no efforts on the part of the Chilean Government to combat anti-US feeling. The Ambassador was unable to reply.)

d. The strike in the Anaconda mines which threatened to spread to the Kennecott mine, too.

e. Chile's inability to work out a satisfactory price arrangement with the United States in recent "informal" conversations.

f. Chile's desire to avoid the type of thing which developed in Bolivia.

The Ambassador said he had also been instructed to continue to negotiate with the United States (presumably about a new price for any part of the production of the American-owned mines which might be sold in the United States). He then said he had been instructed to ascertain and report on the US reaction to Chile's decision.

Mr. Miller replied that the Ambassador could inform the President that the reaction in the United States was extremely bad, since denunciation of an agreement is a very strong measure. He expressed the opinion that unilateral action on the part of Chile to denounce the copper agreement and take control of all the copper produced by the American copper companies was exactly the thing that Lechín[1] was proposing to do in Bolivia. Mr. Miller said this would affect every aspect of our relations with Chile; that it would make it almost impossible to secure further investment of American private capital in Chile; it would strongly affect Chile's credit position in the United States, which might not be able to grant any additional loans; that Chile's action was against her own interest and would make her a residual supplier of copper at a time when production was increasing in other countries and aluminum was being developed as a substitute; that the US had agreed to a 3 cent increase in the price of copper in the 1951 agreement and abrogation of this agreement might drop the price back to 24½ cents; the United States had shown itself to be willing to discuss the price of copper or any other specific proposal made by the Chilean Government; that meetings had been arranged with the highest officials in the government to discuss this problem, but Chile, not the United States, called off these talks; the US might have to use its stockpile; Chile was trying to throw the blame for its action on the United States but our hands were perfectly clean since we had lived up to the copper agreement and had shown our willingness to negotiate, whereas Chile had not lived up to its obligations under the agreement and had failed to pass the copper contract law. He added that he had been wondering if the entire purpose of the "informal" talks had been to try to throw the onus on the United States for the action that Chile proposed to take. With respect to the continuation of negotiations, Mr. Miller said "This would mean negotiating with a gun at our heads". However, he added, as the representative of a sovereign nation, the Ambassador could see President Truman at any time and the Department could arrange for an appointment if he wished. The Ambassador said he would like to see the President next week if possible.

The Department officers asked when and how the agreement would be denounced. Ambassador Nieto did not know, but said that President González had told him over the phone that he was going to call in Ambassador Bowers today to inform him of the decision of the Chilean Government. When asked if the American companies had been notified, Nieto replied in the negative. The Ambassador tried to throw some responsibility for Chile's action on the American companies for selling copper in Europe in competition with Chile's 20 percent. The Department officers pointed out that, if 40,000 tons sold in Europe was enough to depress the market for Chile's 20 percent, how much worse it would be for Chile when all of its copper becomes available in that market. It was strongly stated that US capital had been a major factor in building up Chile's economy and that, in the long run, Chile's denunciation of the agreement was not in her own best interest.

CONFIDENTIAL SANTIAGO, May 5, 1952—4 p. m.

574. For Miller and Pres. Saw Pres at his request. His explanation of recent event follows:

He says public statement of Fleischmann and stories by UP and AP exposed the informal discussions in Wash re copper price resulting in fall price in Europe and inability sell Chile's 20 percent. Party leaders along with common demagogues seized on this as an excuse attack copper agrt and the Amer Govt. Inability Chile dispose its copper at price expected together with closing copper mines strike had created a grave economic, social, and political situation four months before an election.

Strike accentuated the gen danger. The Pres resents statement from Wash that Govt here made no attempt carry out its promise of better exchange rates for US. He appreciates cos cannot absorb the increased cost due wage increase demanded and he prepared a decree which was declared illegal by the Comptroller who has practically dictatorial power. The decree cld have been put thru by being signed by all the Mins but this wld have been interpreted by demagogues as assumption dictatorial power and as making it possible for Pres override not only Comptroller but Congress. This in midst campaign involving democracy Chil wld have been perilous. He says even had decree stood, agitation wld have continued because of price copper and failure profitably dispose of its twenty percent in European markets. Result too wld have been violent attacks on US Govt.

He says Nieto to see Truman Tues or Wed. He requests Truman after conf with Nieto say in press conf or otherwise that he is willing open or resume negots. He put this as a direct request. He wld thereupon announce his desire negotiate. This he says wld relieve unreasonable pressure on his Govt and disarm those seeking a pretext agitate against US.

He then said with emphasis that never at any time had he thought such a thing as withholding from US all the copper we need for defense and other vital purpose.

He had been informed that our Govt has suspended all priorities for Fomento including machinery essential to needs of Endesa. He did not know that this suspension applies gen and not to Chil only and is due steel strike. Accepting the misinterpretation of his informant he is trying keep this secret here since publicity wld create an ugly reaction against US.

His manner was conciliatory, most friendly. He unquestionably is right as to critical situation financial, social, and political when enemies democratic regime are very active. Am convinced govt exerting itself keep down criticism Amer Govt.

543. No distribution. For Amb. from Miller. Chil Amb saw Pres Truman this afternoon with Miller present. Nieto explained briefly background of cancellation agreement stressing unsatis sales 20 percent quota, bitter opposition to Gonzalez Videla, unstable econ situation and unpopularity copper agreement among all circles in Chile. He handed Pres memo[2] which Nieto told Miller he had prepared on telephonic instrs Gonzalez Videla and which Nieto had admitted to Miller previously was extremely harsh and unfair. Memo contains virtual ultimatum that we buy copper at between 33 and 34 cents pound although it does open door to our purchase of all Chil production.

Pres Truman replied that Chile's action had come as great surprise; that he had thought Chile our best friend in LA; and that he considered Gonzalez Videla his friend. He said that there had been no need for Chile denounce agreement since in any case it expired today under gentlemen's agreement. Furthermore we were always ready work out any agreement with Chile that was in interests of two peoples. However, although he was willing order GSA pay fair price for copper, Pres said in strongest terms that he did not like to be coerced. He said in previous cases where fon suppliers had tried hold us up for high prices, such as case of rubber, fon suppliers had eventually come to disaster. We did not want any such thing happen to such good friend as Chile. He felt Chile's action coupled with its failure to accord agreed treatment US cos re tax and exchange rates amounted virtually to confiscation and gravely prejudiced our vital investments in Venez oil and iron and other positions. He was surprised that at time when US was making great sacrifices prevent third World War at cost many US lives in Korea Chile cld not remain content with substantial subsidy for their copper over price paid to US domestic producers. He said his admin had been willing throughout our informal negots to listen to any fair proposal from Chile but that none had ever been put forward and we had been completely taken aback by Chile's sudden action last Fri. He expressed astonishment that Pres of US shld be handed document such as memo Nieto gave him containing unfair inferences and constituting virtual ultimatum. He repeated that he was willing instr his assistants work our fair deal with Chile but, if negots were to be conducted on basis of ultimatum from Chile, Chile wld have to resort to its fate in free market.

After meeting Miller accompanied Nieto back his Emb where he expressed gratification that Pres had listened so long and carefully and had taken time to read and comment on memo. He expressed to Miller complete agreement with our position and said Chile had blundered in its handling copper starting with Novoa's unrealistic fon exchange budget. He showed me numerous exchanges teles with FonOff in which his requests for instrs were always precise and explicit whereas FonOff messages were vague and contradictory. In tele sent just prior termination agreement, Nieto had asked that Muller be sent back to Washington to handle copper matters. He feels incompetent handle them.

We were relieved that Gonzalez Videla instructed Central Bank not to set floor price which action wld gravely prejudice possibility quick solution this matter. We will probably have meeting here Fri to determine course action which may take form of inviting Chiles begin discussions.

Foregoing report re Pres conversation with Nieto is primarily forur-info and Nieto making his own report to FonOff concurrently. You will of course treat with extreme confidence Nieto's views re his Govt's actions. Since this tele is marked no distribution pls do not refer to it by number in any reply.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Milton Barall of the Office of South American Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 20, 1952.

Subject: Chile Informed of US Decision on Copper

Participants: Ambassador Félix Nieto del Río, Embassy of Chile
Mario Rodríguez, Counselor, Embassy of Chile
Jorge Burr, Counselor, Embassy of Chile
Edward G. Miller, Jr., Assistant Secretary
Winthrop Brown, Director, OMP
Milton Barall, OSA

Mr. Miller handed the Ambassador the Department's note of this date (copy attached)[1] informing the Chilean Government that the "United States proposes to establish arrangements under which private United States firms will be free to buy copper and copper concentrates abroad at prices to be determined between them and the seller." Mr. Miller went on to explain that this decision was taken only after almost continuous discussions among United States Government agencies concerned. He explained that this is the only action the United States was able to take to meet all of Chile's objections to the copper agreement of 1951, as brought out in the conversations of May 2 and in previous meetings. This action does away with the two-price system; it breaks the 80–20 percent distribution pattern and permits Chile to exercise control over the entire production of the large American-owned mines; it does away with the 27½ cent price formerly applied to Chilean copper sold in the United States despite the fact that the US ceiling price of 24½ cents is being retained on domestic production; and it eliminates competition in the European market from sales by US firms of copper produced in Chile.

Mr. Miller then took up the question of publicity which should be given to the United States decision. He referred to the message which the President of Chile will make on May 21[2] at the opening of the regular session of Congress and said that the United States had made all haste to meet this deadline and to permit the President to make an appropriate announcement. The Ambassador said that the President's speech was already printed but that he might, nevertheless, wish to make a statement with respect to copper. Mr. Miller suggested that the President might wish to send a supplemental message to Congress.

[1] Attachment is not printed.

[2] President González Videla's address is reported in despatches 1364 and 1365, from Santiago, dated May 21, 1952, not printed (725.00 W/5–2152).

Mr. Miller continued by pointing out that this action on the part of the United States puts grave responsibility on Chile not to undermine its own position in the world market. He said he had heard rumors to the effect that a price of 35½ cents per pound had been fixed today by the Central Bank. He expressed the hope that Chile's price will not be set so high since, in the long run, a price which is too high might be disastrous for Chile.

The Ambassador asked if the Department's note was to be considered as a counter proposition to Chile's note of May 7, 1952.[3] Mr. Miller replied that it was not; that it was a US decision and that DPA would have to make an announcement soon to the public. The Ambassador said he understands it is a US decision but at the same time he considers it a proposition which Chile can discuss. Mr. Miller explained that this was unilateral action on the part of the United States in response to the unilateral action taken by Chile but that, of course, we can review our position at any time and, in that sense only, it may be considered a proposition. He said this was the best feature of the US decision because it did not put us in an inflexible position. He said that negotiation of a new price would be a long process and would necessarily involve the United States as a government, whereas the present action now leaves the matter of price to be decided between the buyer and seller.

Mr. Miller expressed the hope that Chile will be able to achieve increased production by passing the tax and exchange law which would permit the US producers to bring down the cost of production and lower unit costs to enable Chile to continue its sales when a competitive market in copper returns. He said he hoped the Central Bank will not set an inflexible minimum price as was done in the sale of the 20 percent quota and which produced difficulties when the price started to fall. He said it would be best for Chile to act as a normal seller, study the market, and set an appropriate price each month.

The Ambassador asked Mr. Brown if under these conditions the United States could absorb the 80 percent previously bought from Chile. Mr. Brown answered that it depends on the price. American consumers would like to buy more than 80 percent if the price permits. He explained that under our new regulations the consumer will be free to purchase more than the 80 percent previously allocated. Mr. Miller added that this, too, is up to Chile. We would like to buy more and have now provided incentives, by means of adjustment in ceiling prices, whereby the US buyers can purchase copper and copper concentrates abroad. Mr. Brown explained how brass and wire mills will be able to reflect a high proportion of the increased cost in their ceiling prices, whereas until now they had had to absorb the higher cost of Chilean copper. He said the ultimate test of how much copper can be sold in the United States will be determined by what the ultimate consumer is willing to pay for products manufactured from copper. This level will now be fixed by the law of supply and demand and not by the United States Government. He said we had considered all possible alternatives and came to the conclusion that it was best to get the problem of copper out of government channels and let consumers and sellers fix ultimate prices. Copper will move according to the requirements of those people using the metal, not on the decision of the US Government. This meets Chile's objections to the copper agreement of 1951. Mr. Brown reiterated the points made by Mr. Miller on this subject and added that it also makes it possible for Chile to participate fully in the IMC, if it wishes, since it no longer needs to reserve its 20 percent for higher priced sales.

The Ambassador asked about the United States stockpile. Mr. Miller replied the United States would withdraw from the stockpile the amount of copper necessary to make up for the loss caused by the strike in the Anaconda mines and Chile's embargo on copper shipments. He said that this would be announced by the US Government later on. He explained very carefully that the stockpile is not being used in pursuance of a tough policy toward Chile. The United States is acting in an honorable way with Chile and using the stockpile only to make up for deficiencies. The Ambassador asked if the stockpile would be used for sales in competition with Chilean copper. Mr. Brown replied that it would be used for emergencies only and not for competition since we do not wish to withdraw from the stockpile but rather to add to it and preserve it for possible emergencies, such as war. On the contrary, the stockpile might come in as an additional purchaser if the price is reasonable. He said we especially wished to make this explanation so that Chile will fully understand our temporary withdrawals to meet the existing shortage.

Mr. Miller explained that the decision on US action was taken by President Truman, with Dr. Steelman presiding at the meetings, and over the strong objections of our Price Stabilizer.[4] He pointed out that this was a grave decision for the United States and Chile should realize the importance of this step in this country at a time when price increases are being denied to US industries.

The Ambassador said he would explain the US decision to President González over the telephone at 5:00 p.m. today. He said it was his own feeling that this is a step forward and expressed the hope that the President will understand the problem fully. He seemed somewhat concerned that US action did not set the price of Chilean copper and stated that prices mentioned in previous discussions were only asking prices. Mr. Brown reiterated that Chile must be cautious in exercising the full control it has now assumed. He added that we should not like to have a Johnson Report[5] on copper such as we had on tin because that would generate irresistible pressures in the United States.

Mr. Miller pointed out strongly that the anti-US propaganda in Chile can have serious effects. He said this was a very hard decision for a lot of people in the United States to swallow; the American producers who are still frozen at 24½ cents; the OPS and EPS; the brass and wire mills which have to raise prices; DPA which has to change its allocation system; and the US public which is opposed to further inflation. Mr. Rodríguez requested clarification of the last phrase in the note "The Chilean Government will not offer copper to third countries at prices lower than prices offered to consumers in the United States". It was explained that this was inserted to avoid positive discrimination against US consumers and that, as a matter of policy, Chile should sell to all buyers at the same price.

The meeting was terminated with a discussion on what action should be taken with respect to publicity. It was agreed to let the President of Chile make the announcement tomorrow if he wishes, but that the United States must know when he will make a statement, and perhaps the contents, so that a parallel announcement can be made to the US public. This is also necessary so that OPS can issue its order putting the new arrangement into effect. It was also agreed to avoid describing this action as "decontrol" to the press but rather to describe it as an adjustment in ceiling price, which it is. Mr. Brown said that the OPS order will be issued effective either the 16th or the 23rd of June.

The Ambassador promised to call Mr. Barall at home this evening to inform him of the time of the President's announcement. The Ambassador remarked to Mr. Rodríguez that he was very much impressed by the speed and force exhibited by the United States in arriving at a major decision of this nature.

(Note: The Ambassador phoned Mr. Barall later this evening to inform him that President González expected to make an announcement on the new copper decision at 5:00 p.m., May 21. The President specifically requested that the United States issue no release before this time. The Ambassador expressed the belief that the President's reaction would be "generally favorable" and that he would express general approval of US action.)

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller) to the Ambassador in Chile (Bowers)

[Extract][1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 23, 1952.

DEAR AMBASSADOR BOWERS:

. . . . . .

I think that the decision that we have taken in this Government is the correct one and, in fact, I think that it was the only one that was open to us. For us to have meekly negotiated a new "agreement" with the gun at our heads (or as President Truman put it to Nieto, with our feet being held to the fire) would have been just as miserable and craven an act as that of Gonzalez Videla in caving in to the communists. Furthermore, we would have been the victims of (1) attacks from all interested parties in this country for participating in the fixing of a higher price for copper, and (2) continued dissatisfaction with the agreement on the part of the Chileans since there would probably continue to be a world market premium over any new price and (3) disillusionment on the part of the Chileans when the higher price contract would eventually terminate. In other words as the Embassy so clearly grasped in its telegram[2] last week, it was incumbent on us to get off the hook now and to get off it not only in regard to price but in regard to the relations between the Government of Chile and the copper companies. No doubt the Chileans now feel that they have scored a great victory but even already the sober-minded ones like Nieto and Burr are clearly worried. Nieto has several times asked me in the two meetings I have had with him this week whether or not our note was a "proposición" or a "negociación". I have told him that we had taken a unilateral decision which seemed to us to be the only act which we could take consequent upon Chile's unilateral decision of May 2. He got the point perfectly and yesterday said that our decision was "muy inteligente".

I am glad that you have been so concerned over the anti-Yankee attacks which have become the fashion in Chile and that you took the time to discuss this frankly with the Foreign Minister[3] in connection with the military agreement. Yesterday after our meeting on the copper agreement, I asked the Ambassador to stay on alone and I read him most of my letter to you of January 7[4] in which I listed the things that we had done for Chile and the things that they had failed to do for us. I read him verbatim the last two paragraphs in which I had expressed the fear that the Chilean Government would eventually become the victim of its own anti-Yankee propaganda (or of its own failure to defend us in their negotiations with us) and that the consequence would be that they would get in a vicious circle and would have to take action in regard to the copper agreement which is ostensibly anti-Yankee but is really against Chile's own interests.

In any case we will try not to let this hurt our relations with Chile too much and you will note that all of us have refrained from any provocative public statements. In fact I thought that all of the statements which have been made up here have been models of restraint and correctness.

. . . . . .

As I said above we will not impose sanctions on Chile and after due deliberation I have decided to tell the International Bank to go ahead with the cellulose loan.[5] . . . As to the two coal projects, there are still the usual technical difficulties and studies. We are also going ahead with the priority for a large crane for Huachipato since this had already been scheduled but I am afraid that Roberto Vergara[6] is going to run into pretty rough weather when he gets here looking for additional priorities.

In my conversations with Nieto I have strongly stressed the importance of Chile behaving itself in regard to copper sales and the need for them to get ahead now with fair treatment to the companies in regard to exchange and taxes. I have also expressed concern over Gonzalez Videla's proposal in his speech on Wednesday[7] about the creation of a copper sales corporation. This seems to me the height of ingratitude after what the companies have done to develop markets for Chilean copper in Europe and elsewhere.

I also hope that our action on copper will contribute to a more favorable ambiente for the military agreement. Even though your more recent reports have been more hopeful, I shall keep my fingers crossed until it is through.

With kindest regards,
Sincerely yours,

EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Miller) to the Ambassador in Chile (Bowers)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 9, 1952.

DEAR AMBASSADOR BOWERS: Naturally the results of the Chilean election have come as a severe blow to us. I say this even though you had prepared us for the shock through your brilliantly accurate reporting over the months preceding the election. In reporting to the Secretary's staff meeting this morning[1] about the Chilean situation, I referred to the fact that you had called the shots on the nose. In fact you knew the score better than many Chileans with whom I have discussed the elections. I want to congratulate you on your objectivity knowing as I do how distasteful Ibañez' candidacy has been to you and how more distasteful it will be living with this new situation that we have to face in Chile. Needless to say the crowing that is emanating from Buenos Aires is sickening.

The press here is already expressing alarm about the situation in Chile and the Washington Post has gone so far as to imply that this is due to our neglect of Latin American affairs. This of course is representative of what I consider to be an alarming tendency on the part of our press here to consider the Department of State not merely responsible for conducting our relations with other countries but of guaranteeing good conditions in other countries. Actually I think that we have done more for Chile than for any other country in Latin America, at least proportionately. Our help to them on loans, on securing priorities, on the transfer of the cruisers, and the conclusion of the military agreement, under the Point IV program, and in relation to copper has been exemplary, and in addition we went out of our way to give Chile's democracy a pat on the back by making Gonzalez Videla one of the two Presidents from Latin America to be brought up to the United States in the last three years. The only thing we did not do was force Matte and Alfonso to get together on a single candidacy, and I suppose someone with 20/20 hindsight will be telling us how we could have done that.

One of the saddest aspects of the Ibañez victory is its close parallel with the situation in Ecuador. There Velasco Ibarra without any party organization and after many years' absence from the country swept through to an overwhelming victory against three moderate candidates simply through demagogic appeal. While Velasco did not go so far in attacking the United States, his irresponsibility in appealing to the discontent was along the same lines as that of Ibañez. In many respects also the pattern of victory is similar to that of Vargas' election two years ago where he won against a divided moderate opposition. In all three cases you have demagogues who had been thrown out of office before, coming back without any party organization and scoring a tremendous victory simply through a personal appeal to the discontent. In the case of Vargas, he has fortunately surrounded himself by some good men and has been much more moderate (possibly because he is a Brazilian). But one adverse effect of the personalism of his candidacy is that he has no solid party strength to work with in the Congress, a fact which makes for ineffective government. In the case of Velasco Ibarra, the new administration has in its first week turned viciously on President Galo Plaza, completely disregarding that the latter had guaranteed free elections and pacifically turned over the power to the new group. Velasco has ruthlessly dismissed all the top Army officers, all the top men in government, and a substantial part of the diplomatic corps. These actions, particularly as they affect the Army, are typical of personalismo at its worst and constitute a lamentable barrier to the development of the constitutional forms which are so badly needed in Latin America. Of course in Bolivia and Argentina we have seen the wholesale dismissal of useful men from government office.

I have today signed a telegram[2] to you in reply to one[3] which came in over the weekend. We are of course distressed over Lira's[4] statement although it seems to conflict in some respects with what Ibañez told the American newspapermen. The most serious thing is the threat to nationalize the copper mines since this would constitute the gravest invasion of American property rights since the Mexican oil expropriations in 1937.[5] In view of the changed climate of opinion in this country since then and the world-wide implications that the nationalization of copper would have, it would have the gravest kind of repercussions in this country, not only towards Chile, but towards the administration since we would be accused of having followed the same kind of policy towards Chile as we allegedly have had towards China. The termination of the military agreement would be less of a blow to us, except that our prestige would suffer as in the case of the collapse of our bilateral military negotiations with Mexico. The reestablishment of diplomatic relations with Russia and her satellites and the repeal of the law for the defense of democracy would be matters exclusively for Chile to determine but they would, of course, be unfortunate and they would likewise have bad repercussions in the press here.

In response to your question as to whether you should seek Ibañez out, we all think here in the Department that it would be far better for you to let any initiative come from Ibañez or anyone else in his entourage who wants to discuss matters with us. In the first place, and strictly technically, Ibañez has not yet been confirmed by the Chilean congress and, in the second place, he is not yet President. However tactically it would seem in our advantage for them to come to us and not to show undue alarm. Our feeling would be to take the attitude that matters will develop normally and in the meantime we up here will try to refrain scrupulously from giving information even for background on Chilean developments so as to avoid getting them frozen into any undesirable positions as a result of premature speculation emanating from Washington. If and when an opportunity should present itself, I think it would be good to review what we have done for Chile in the last twelve years or more as indicating our sincere interest in the welfare of the Chilean people and the ridiculousness of the claims of our enemies that we are imperialistic. With regard to the military agreement, you could take exactly the same line that you took so effectively with Yrarrázaval[6] when you made the point that it was entirely up to Chile and that Chile obviously has more to gain than to lose from the agreement. No doubt Perón has made great efforts to get Ibáñez turned against the agreement. The reason for this is that Perón was not included in any agreement, a decision which was reached by us as a result of Perón's attacks not only on us but on the Rio Treaty[7] and the OAS and his repeated statements to the effect that he would not join in hemisphere defense efforts. With regard to reestablishment of diplomatic relations with Russia, the situation is somewhat complicated by the fact that we still have relations with them but there would be no reason why you should not point out that a Soviet diplomatic establishment is nothing more than a center of espionage and refer to the recent action on the part of Cuba and Venezuela in closing them down. The main difficulty is, of course, the threat to the nationalization of copper. It would be well on this point to point to the very fair treatment that we have accorded to Chile including the $25 million balance of payments loan in October 1949 when the price of copper had dropped to 16 cents; our strenuous and successful efforts to get the copper tax eliminated; our very fair agreement of 1951 which gave Chilean producers 3 cents a pound more than domestic producers; and finally our action in what amounted to decontrolling copper after Chile denounced the agreement. You could point out the tremendous capital investment of the American copper companies in Chile; the technical and managerial skills which they have brought to that country; the tremendous investment programs which are now underway and will have the effect of devising new methods for mining copper and thus keep these industries alive for the benefit of the Chilean economy and the Chilean workers who are employed in the copper industry. Above all you should stress the fact that while Chile has complete sovereign dominion over its national territory, we will expect any act of expropriation to be met by prompt, adequate and effective compensation. The investment of the copper companies is so large that the obligation on the part of the Chileans to indemnify the companies added to their present privately held dollar debt and their obligations to the Export-Import Bank, International Bank, etc. will obviously add up to a total debt so staggering as to be far beyond Chile's capacity to pay. Only one of the immediate consequences of this will be the ending of all lending activities to Chile for any purpose.

You have a very difficult problem ahead but we have every confidence that you will handle it with skill and patience and with the interests of the United States always uppermost in your mind. I cannot help hoping that even though the prospect is a dark one, your great personal prestige and your reputation for complete integrity and for friendship with Chile will help to prevent disaster from overtaking that great country.

[Here follow personal comments.]

With kindest regards,

Sincerely yours, EDWARD G. MILLER, JR.

P.S. If an opportunity should present itself to talk of Aníbal Jara, you might, if you think it wise, refer to my own personal friendship with him and my gratification over the fact that he has apparently returned to a position where he can lend his great talents to the maintenance of good relations between our two countries.

P.P.S. In regard to Lira's announcement about the prospective termination of the military agreement, this raises the immediate question of whether the Department of Defense should continue to process the equipment to be sent down under the agreement. The Department of Defense has asked us whether they should take the various steps which have to be taken in the way of placing orders, etc., before any shipments could leave this country. We have told them for the time being that it is premature for us to make any decision on this point. Do you believe that any useful purpose could be served in discussing this problem some time with President Gonzalez Videla or to have our own military discuss it with the Chilean military? Of course, if the agreement is eventually to be terminated after the new administration comes into power, we could save ourselves a lot of trouble at this end by immediately holding up any further processing of the equipment.

Memorandum by Milton Barall of the Office of South American Affairs to the Director of That Office (Atwood)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 13, 1953.

Subject: The Situation in Chile

1. Political Structure and Orientation of Government

Chile has a democratic form of government under the Constitution of 1925 and, since 1931, all Chiefs of State have been elected by the people. A Chamber of Deputies and a Senate make the laws which are then promulgated by Presidential decree. In actual practice, the President and his Cabinet form a strong executive branch which directs the centralized activities of the government. With a multiplicity of political parties, and with no majority party, the Cabinet is generally formed by coalition to give the President a working majority in Congress. President Ibañez took office in November 1952 after receiving 47% of the popular vote in a 4-way race. The present lame-duck Congress will be replaced after Congressional elections in March, 1953. Ibañez's campaign was virulently anti-U.S. but he has tried to curb the pro-Peron, pro-Nazi and pro-Commie factions among his supporters. The present Cabinet will probably not last long, but it cannot be described as friendly to the U.S. The Minister of Interior[1] is . . . and anti-U.S. He is in a key position with respect to Communism, which has been as successful in Chile as anywhere in South America. The Foreign Minister[2] . . . is anti-U.S. and pro-Peron. His foreign policy, though professing not to be anti-U.S., calls for the creation of a Latin-American economic bloc to compel the U.S. to pay high prices for raw materials. Alliance with other underdeveloped countries, it is argued, will reduce Chile's economic dependence on the U.S. Historically, Chile generally has been friendly toward the U.S. and if Ibañez can control the forces he set in motion, his regime may very well continue in this tradition.

2. Economy

Though more people are engaged in agriculture than in any other occupation, Chile has switched from an exporter to a large net importer of foods, while it has been building up its industry. The bulk of government revenues and foreign currency exchange is derived from the export of minerals, chiefly copper, of which Chile has the world's largest reserves. Chile's monopoly on fertilizer was broken by the development of synthetics, though the production and export of nitrate and iodine is the second most important factor in the country's economy and foreign trade. With the assistance of Eximbank loans and U.S. technicians, Chile has a steel mill, using domestic iron and coal. Large iron deposits are being developed for the export of ores to the U.S. The Government's Fomento Corporation has helped develop the manufacture of consumer products such as textiles, leather, pharmaceuticals, cement, glass, tires, but the government's meddling in private industry and its restrictive practices have also helped produce a dangerous and continuous inflation, about 30% in 1952. This has led to great curtailment of imports from the U.S. Chile is not now economically sound and it faces a major crisis in 1953 because of its dependence on the present artificially high price of copper for government funds and for economic development. The long-range solution lies in reduced government controls, increased agricultural and industrial production, diversification of the economy, and an improved communications network. Chile has the basic resources and manpower for the establishment of a prosperous economy and a much higher standard of living. Chile has no Trade Agreement with the U.S. but is a member of GATT.[3]

3. Strategic Military Importance

Chile's long coastline and its control over the Straits of Magellan give it strategic military importance, especially if the Panama Canal should be knocked out and the Drake Passage becomes our means of communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Since its acquisition of 2 cruisers from the U.S. in 1951, Chile has the strongest navy on the West Coast and by signing a military pact with the U.S., in 1952, has undertaken some responsibility in the protection of the hemisphere. Under agreements running until 1954, the U.S. has Naval[4] and Air Missions[5] in Chile to help train its armed forces.

4. Major Problems dealt with in 1952 which Furthered U.S. Objectives

a. U.S. initiative

(1) In response to Chile's denunciation of the copper agreement in May of this year the U.S. amended its price control regulations on imported copper. This has permitted the continuation of sales of large quantities of copper in the U.S. The high prices helped eliminate sales to the iron-curtain countries.

(2) Interested Executive agencies agreed unanimously to seek continued suspension of the 2 cents per pound copper tax. The present suspension terminates February 15, 1953.

(3) The distribution of Chilean copper was retained under the IMC by the favorable price policy adopted by the U.S.

(4) A new . . . program was put into effect to help counteract virulent anti-U.S. propaganda.

(5) Chile signed the bilateral military agreement which was then ratified by its Congress. The U.S. was subjected to much vilification because of this agreement, which became one of the leading issues in the presidential election. After a short delay to see if Ibañez would denounce the agreement, the U.S. started the shipment of supplies and will live up to its responsibilities. Ibañez and his Cabinet have agreed to honor their commitments.

(6) U.S. maintained a friendly and favorable policy on requirements for Chile, especially for the Huachipato steel mill.

b. Chilean Initiative

(1) Ibañez was elected President with a 47% plurality. The following anti-U.S. issues were raised during the campaign:

(a) Denunciation of the military pact

(b) Reestablishment of diplomatic and commercial relations with Communist countries

(c) A possible "third position", especially economically

(d) Repeal of the Law for the Defense of Democracy, which curbs Communists

(e) Possible eventual nationalization of copper mines.

Ibañez won with the support of ex-Nazis and Commie sympathizers. By sending a strong delegation, headed by Mrs. Roosevelt,[6] to Ibañez' inauguration,[7] and by maintaining a friendly but correct and "hands-off" attitude toward the new government, the U.S. has helped stave off the anti-U.S. actions which were campaign issues. There has been no further deterioration in U.S.–Chile relations and friendly contacts have been established with Ibañez himself.

(2) Ex-President Gonzalez Videla put pressure on the U.S. copper companies to contribute to the campaign fund to defeat Ibañez. Fortunately, the State Department prevented this by refusing to relax its prohibition on this type of activity.[8]

(3) Anglo-Lautaro and Cia Salitrera de Antofagasta y Tarapáca have requested loans from the Eximbank to expand production and improve methods. A new U.S. loan policy toward Chile is still to be formulated but we have agreed to approve an IBRD loan for a chemical pulp and paper mill and the Eximbank loan to de Castro's nitrate company without further delay for political reasons.

[7] President Ibáñez was inaugurated on Nov. 3, 1952.

[8] In telegram 53, from Santiago, dated Aug. 14, 1952, Ambassador Bowers reported that the Chilean Government apparently planned to draw on U.S. companies for contributions to the presidential campaigns of Senator Matte and/or Señor Alfonso, and he stated the following: "Aside from fact this is a squeeze, am convinced it would be dangerous remove ban [on campaign contributions], unwise for our people become involved in election and certainly unwise for our govt become involved." (725.00/8–1452)

The Department's telegram 52, to Santiago, dated Aug. 15, 1952, reads in part as follows: "We concur that it is undesirable for Amer owned concerns to become involved in internal affairs other LA countries by making financial contribution to campaigns of particular candidates . . . . We assume Amer cos and Chile Govt already aware of this." (725.00/8–1452)

5. Major Problems which did not Develop Successfully in 1952

a. U.S. initiative

(1) Chile agreed to consult under GATT on import restrictions but consultation will not take place until after Chile's consultation with the IMF in January 1953. Embassy's efforts in Santiago to remove restrictions proved to be fruitless.

(2) No Point IV Education Agreement was signed because the political situation has kept Chile from adopting a firm position. The U.S. has now given Chile the initiative and if Chile wants an agreement it will have to approach us. Not much progress was made in improving agriculture.

(3) Chile did nothing to implement the provisions of the copper agreement of 1951 with respect to increased production.

(4) Chile failed to act on the passage of a new tax and exchange law for the copper companies.

(5) No improvement was achieved in securing firm support from Chile for U.S. objectives in the UN.

(6) No improvement was noted in the attitude of Chilean labor with respect to political strikes against U.S. companies.

b. Chilean initiative

Chile has asked for assistance to small and medium copper mines. So far the U.S. has not actively supported this. The problem has been referred to DMPA regional office in Lima in order to delay action until the course of the new government is clearer.

6. Status of Pending Problems (Urgent when marked with asterisks)

*a. The issue of the two-cent tax on copper is a great potential danger to our relations with Chile. The Executive agencies are actively seeking continued suspension and Representatives Patterson[9] of Connecticut and Reed[10] of New York submitted bills for suspension until June 30, 1954. We should exert pressure to meet the February 15 deadline.

b. Chile has requested or is likely to request large loans for 1953, for the Chilean Railways, nitrate production, aid to small and medium copper miners, coal production, irrigation and agriculture, and others. Quite apart from political considerations, there is a real question as to Chile's ability to absorb and service additional debts. An overall loan policy toward Chile will have to be formulated.

c. Anti-U.S. sentiment and propaganda is still a problem. We will continue efforts to bring our case to the people and explain away distortions and misconceptions. We must try to keep the government and the people on our side, with particular emphasis on Ibanez, so that he can keep his extremist supporters in line.

d. Intersessional GATT consultations will take place after January 1953 to try to ameliorate Chile's discrimination against imports from the U.S.

[9] James T. Patterson.
[10] Daniel A. Reed.

e. Over 250,000 tons of copper have been sold in the U.S. at the 35½ cents price. A serious internal problem will arise in Chile if the world price falls, (as is likely if the U.S. removes controls) for its economy and budget are geared to continued high receipts.

f. The possible shipment of strategic supplies to Communist countries will continue as a problem. Chile has agreed to some control measures and has not knowingly sold behind the Iron Curtain, but a change in the price of copper or in Chile's political orientation might lead to deliberate sales.

g. Chile's foreign policy and strong nationalist tendencies will bear close watching. There is an incipient movement toward emotional and irrational nationalism such as we have seen in Iran and Bolivia.

h. Chile is the source of almost all copper imported into the U.S. (40% at the present time). We should make continued efforts to secure the cooperation of the Chilean Government for protection of the Kennecott and Anaconda plants in accordance with a NSC directive.[11]

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of South American Affairs (Atwood) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 15, 1953.

Subject: The Copper Situation in Chile and the Need for United States Loans

When Chile denounced its Bilateral Copper Agreement with the United States in May, 1952, Mr. Miller predicted to the late Ambassador Nieto that Chile's action was against its own interests and would make her a residual supplier of copper at a time when production was increasing in other countries and substitutes for copper were being developed. Mr. Miller's prediction has now been borne out. Chile is the highest-price supplier in the world and a back-log of unsold copper has already been built up in the Kennecott mine. In July, similar stocks will accumulate in the Anaconda mines because of Chile's inflexible, non-competitive price.

On May 30, 1953, representatives of the Kennecott Company met with Finance Minister Rosetti,[2] to inform him that they were unable to place their production at the present price and that unless Chile's price

[1] Drafted by Mr. Barall.

[2] Juan B. Rosetti; on June 25, 1953 Señor Rosetti was succeeded as Minister of Finance by Felipe Herrera.

were made competitive, Kennecott would have to curtail production. (This curtailment took place June 12). The Finance Minister replied, that it was the obligation of the United States Government to maintain the 35½ cents price in order to save the Chilean economy from bankruptcy. When the Kennecott representatives pointed out that the United States Government had nothing to do with the price of copper and that his proposal, in effect, asked United States private industry to subsidize the Chilean Government, the Minister criticized United States loan policies in Latin America. He indicated that, in the absence of United States loans, there would be increasingly strong demands in Chile for nationalization of the mines and for sales behind the Iron Curtain. Unfortunately, the Minister did not mention another possible solution, i.e., the possibility that solvency might be approached by curtailing government expenditures, eliminating subsidies, and attacking the fundamental problems of the Chilean economy; nor did he recognize that any blame attached to the Government of Chile for its nationalization of copper sales and its arbitrary establishment of a very high minimum price.

Chile's excuse for the denunciation of the copper agreement was its financial and economic problem and its deficit in 1952. We informed Chile at that time, that if it expanded its foreign exchange budget because of anticipated higher copper receipts, it was likely to create another economic and financial crisis such as it was trying to solve. Despite the fact that Chile made an extra $80 million on the copper overprice, Chile's current crisis bears out our prediction. The Minister apparently considers the drop in the price of copper a temporary dip and that United States loans would provide a satisfactory stop-gap solution. If the United States provides, without conditions, the loans which Chile seeks, we merely postpone and make more difficult the eventual day of reckoning. The only logical solution lies in fundamental economic reforms by Chile which will result in increased production, the establishment of competitive prices, diversification of the economy, and less government intervention in and control of business, industry and agriculture. If United States assistance is to be made available to Chile, it must be provided on a basis which will bring about the long-range constructive program required in Chile if it is to attain economic stability.

The Minister said he had been informed by our Embassy that sales behind the Iron Curtain would mean cancellation of the military pact and technical assistance and make it impossible for Chile to obtain further loans. If we are unable to consider Chilean requests for loans, Chile would not risk much loss by resorting to nationalization and/or sales to Communist countries. Military and technical assistance combined amount to only a few million dollars per year, whereas Chile would lose about $8 million per year for each cent of decline in the price of copper. With the world price now below 30 cents and Chile's budget based on the 35½ cent price, Chile faces an immediate loss of at least $45,000,000. Although it is very unlikely that Communist countries could or would absorb Chile's surplus production at 35½ cents, irreparable damage would be done to United States-Chilean relations if any such sale were openly made and we would risk strengthening the war potential of the Soviet bloc.

United States loans, provided in a cooperative program based on Chilean self-help, would probably be the most effective means to preserve democratic institutions in that country, help bring about economic stability and ward off the possibility of nationalization or sales of strategic materials to Communist countries.[3]

Memorandum of Conversation by Milton Barall of the Office of South American Affairs

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 4, 1953.

Subject: Chile Requests United States Purchase Accumulated Copper for Stockpile

Participants: Ambassador Jara, Chilean Embassy
Luis MacKenna, Representative of Central Bank of Chile
Mario Rodriguez, Minister Plenipotentiary, Chilean Embassy
ARA—Mr. Cabot
OSA—Mr. Atwood
Mr. Barall

The Ambassador and his party called on Mr. Cabot to discuss Chile's grave copper situation. After the introduction of Sr. MacKenna, and Mr. Cabot's expression of thanks to the Ambassador for the courteous treatment extended to him and to Dr. Eisenhower's Mission[1] during their recent visit to Chile, the Ambassador said he wished to continue the discussions previously begun with Mr. Atwood, prior to Mr. Cabot's return to the United States.

Mr. Cabot reviewed the general copper problem, mentioning Chile's inability to dispose of its full production at the 36½ cent price and said he was aware of Chile's desire to sell its accumulated stocks of some 60,000 tons to the US stockpile at market price. Jara said this was correct but that the copper was accumulating rapidly and, while there were only 65,000 tons now on hand, Chile would like to arrange for the sale of 100,000 tons, the estimated amount which would have to be disposed of before normal sales and deliveries could be resumed. Mr. Cabot said the United States was prepared to give serious consideration to the Chilean proposal but that, naturally, he could not now predict the outcome. He expressed some dismay at the increase in tonnage and explained that, under any circumstances, it would be very hard to obtain agreement from the interested US government officials to make such a purchase. Mr. Cabot referred to the precarious fiscal position of the United States and to President Eisenhower's recent efforts to have the debt limit extended. Since Congress had not acted favorably on the President's request, all public funds would have to be very carefully watched. Mr. Cabot reminded Ambassador Jara of the difficulties experienced in reopening negotiations for the purchase of Bolivian tin, although Bolivia was in even greater need of assistance than Chile and the amount of money involved was much smaller.

Sr. MacKenna stated that Chile's need for this stockpile sale was urgent. He said his government recognized that it had to sell copper competitively at the world price. The American producing companies could not continue to finance current production indefinitely and had already stated they might have to curtail production. The resulting unemployment would add political problems to the already acute economic difficulties and increase public agitation. Chile is afraid to place its accumulated copper on the normal market because this would have a disastrous effect on the price. MacKenna indicated that there might be other suitable sales arrangements for the 100,000 tons, such as partial purchase by the stockpile, with the American companies buying the balance for their own plants at about 30 cents. When Mr. Atwood mentioned a report received today that American Smelting and Refining was reducing the price of primary copper to 28½ cents, effective immediately, MacKenna revealed indirectly that his government was not yet adjusted to a freely fluctuating market price, but now identified "market price" with the 29¾–30 cent range which has prevailed for some time. (The Chilean Government is probably recalculating its estimated revenues at this rate.)

Sr. MacKenna made it clear that the stockpile purchase would be part of an overall settlement of the copper problem. He said Chile had under active consideration plans for a new tax and exchange law and for better operating conditions for the American producers. He said he had been authorized to begin these discussions with the companies and/or the US Government at once. He stated it was his government's intention, in line with the economic reforms now under way, to move copper to the 110 exchange rate as soon as possible, as had been done for the nitrate industry on July 31.

Mr. Cabot said better treatment for the copper companies would be in the best interests of Chile and the United States inasmuch as the present system, which taxed away 80–90% of the companies' profits, was not conducive to additional investment nor was it encouraging to any private investor. MacKenna said his government recognized the difficulties under which the American companies had been operating in Chile and hoped the new arrangements to be worked out would lead to increased production and spur additional investment. Ambassador Jara broke in to add that President Ibañez, who understood the situation better than anyone, was especially interested in establishing a climate favorable for private investment, and that it is the desire of the Chilean Government to cooperate with the United States. The Ambassador said he would send a formal note[2] covering Chile's proposal tomorrow and asked if he could expect an answer within a week. Mr. Cabot replied that the Department would start working on the problem immediately but reiterated that all he could say at the present time was that the US would give it serious consideration.

MacKenna then moved on to the second point he wished to discuss, Communist propaganda in Chile for sales to iron-curtain countries, and the belief of the man in the street that a good market for 35½ cent copper (FAS Chilean ports) exists in Western Europe but that Chile is prevented from making these sales because of Chilean loyalty to the United States or because of threats of US economic pressure. He said he wished to destroy this "fantasma" (phantom idea) that Chile would be forced to sell at the market price out of deference to the US, instead of profiting from higher-priced sales in Europe. [Note: He failed to acknowledge that repeated public statements by Chilean officials had led to widespread acceptance of this erroneous belief by a large segment of the Chilean public. An editorial in El Mercurio April 23, 1953, took the government to task for lack of understanding of the copper market which had led to repeated denials of a price drop.][3]

MacKenna expressed his personal belief that there was no such market for Chile's copper in Europe, supporting his position by citing the numerous inquiries and offers addressed to the Central Bank by European forwarders, only one of which had been effectively backed up by the opening of a dollar credit on a London bank. MacKenna said he stopped this shipment and that he had provided full cooperation to the Embassy in controlling East–West trade in copper but pointed out the political difficulties involved in explaining to the public that Chile accepted a lower price in order to cooperate with the United States. This led to Communist claims that the government was a tool of the United States.

[2] Chilean Embassy note no. 1164–150, dated Aug. 6, 1953, requesting the United States to purchase for its stockpile 100,000 tons of Chilean copper, and the Department of State's reply, drafted by Mr. Barall, dated Sept. 3, 1953, indicating that the United States was prepared to discuss with Chilean representatives the conditions under which copper might be purchased, are in file 825.2542/8–653.

MacKenna proposed offering a token sale of perhaps 500–1000 tons to a Western European country, at 35½ cents, without requiring the non-re-export certificate which Chile demands for all sales outside the Western Hemisphere. He feels sure there will be no buyer to put up dollars at this price and that the government would then be able to use this case to destroy the "fantasma" and defeat Communist propaganda. MacKenna asked if there weren't some US organization abroad which could follow the shipment and prevent its diversion to the iron-curtain if the sale should actually be completed. The Department officers explained that this proposal might backfire even if there was only a small but effective demand in Europe, and that it was difficult to follow all shipments to prevent diversion. After further discussion of this proposal, it was decided that it would be studied on its merits, apart from the major proposal for the stockpile sale.

Sr. MacKenna then introduced the third item on his agenda. He said he had brought with him a letter[4] from President Ibañez to President Eisenhower seeking general support for the stockpile purchase. However, he had been instructed to discuss this letter first with Mr. Cabot and to deliver it only when and if the Department felt it would be helpful in securing approval. Mr. Cabot said he thought it would be best to delay on the letter, to allow time for discussions within the US government and with the companies, and for the formulation of an inter-agency opinion.

In the course of the discussion Ambassador Jara had remarked that the American companies, as was natural under the circumstances, were selfishly taking advantage of the present difficulties to try to force the maximum in concessions from the Chilean government. At an appropriate time Mr. Atwood picked up this remark and said he thought the Ambassador was mistaken in his opinion of the companies. He assured the Ambassador that, on the contrary, the companies were very much concerned with Chile's economic welfare, that they were aware of the acute financial difficulties being faced, and that they wished to cooperate in finding a mutually satisfactory and beneficial solution which would bring stability to the copper industry.

MacKenna said he was under instructions to reply frankly and fully to any questions raised by the United States. He and the Ambassador said the purpose of their visit was to obtain the Department's support for the proposed sale, which was so important in Chile's efforts to strengthen its economy. Mr. Cabot replied that he had been aware of Chile's economic difficulties ever since he first assumed his present office but that, until now, there had been no opportunity to deal effectively with the problem. This was the first proposal Chile had made for a cooperative effort to improve the situation. He said he would see if it is possible for the United States to assist Chile in this matter.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of Commerce for International Affairs (Anderson) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot) [1]

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, August 10, 1953.

Subject: Chilean Copper

As a consequence of the softening of the copper market, the Chilean Government has accumulated unsold stocks of copper of about 75,000 tons under its present deal with the companies. Up to now, this copper has been offered at 35½ cents FOB Chilean port. A special representative of the Chilean Government, Mr. MacKenna of the Central Bank of Chile, under instructions from the President of the Bank, is in Washington and has made a written proposal substantively as follows:

The Chilean Government will negotiate a new deal with the American copper companies, substituting an income tax at a presently unspecified rate, for the present scheme of requiring the companies to return dollars for Chilean expenses at 19.37 pesos per dollar, and for the present scheme of buying the companies' copper at 24½ cents for resale at higher prices. The new exchange rate will be 110 pesos to the dollar. The Chilean Government will also concurrently adopt certain anti-inflationary policies, long overdue. The government will also authorize the companies to sell their copper in the normal way at world prices from now on. Pursuant to this undertaking, which Mr. MacKenna insists can be passed quickly through the Congress, the government will press the United States to purchase at world market prices, approximately 100,000 tons of unsold copper (75,000 tons now on hand, plus near-term accumulations).

My impression is that the Chilean Government is, for the first time since 1951, seriously resolved to carry out rationalization of the copper deal with the companies, and has a fair chance of success.

[1] Addressed also to Assistant Secretary Waugh, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Overby, Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization Flemming, and Acting Assistant Administrator of the Defense Materials Procurement Agency Gumbel.

There is also some evidence that it may have greater success in dealing with inflation than has been the case heretofore.

It seems obvious to me that under the present circumstances, the U.S. cannot purchase $50 million to $60 million worth of spot copper for fiscal reasons. If we are, therefore, to make any compensatory gesture to the Chileans to encourage them to carry out their part of this scheme, we must devise some alternative idea.

I propose the following plan for debate. The U.S. Government, through ODM or DMPA, propose to the two copper companies, Kennecott and Anaconda, that it would be prepared to execute a "put" to these companies of 100,000 tons of copper at say 25 cents a pound ($50 million). The "put" would be exercisable in whole or in part, only at the end of five years and not during the five years. The companies would agree that if during the five-year period of the ownership by them of the 100,000 tons of copper, they should propose to sell any of the copper, the U.S. Stockpile would be afforded a first refusal at the proposed selling price, less ½ cent per pound. The companies thereupon would make a purchase of 100,000 tons from the Chilean Government at whatever price could be negotiated with the Chilean Government (say, for the sake of this discussion, 28 cents a pound). The companies would thereupon borrow from American private banks on a five-year note $50 million, at say 4%. The note would not be serial, but would mature at the end of five years and would be collateralized with 100,000 tons of copper protected by the U.S. Government "put". The companies, of course, would be obligated on their own credit to pay interest charges currently on the loan.

The effect of this transaction would be that the companies would put up an initial margin of about $6 million and would be further obligated during the five-year period, if no selling off of copper took place, to an aggregate interest charge of about 20%, or $10 million. The companies' risks would thus be a maximum of $16 million, if no sales were made during the five-year period, and if all of the copper had to be put to the government at the end of the five years.

It is reasonable to expect that during the next five years, the opportunity to sell or consume this much copper at a price higher than 25 cents per pound (indeed higher than 28 cents per pound), would be presented. This amount of copper is only about one month's consumption in the United States. To the extent that such opportunities appear and were accepted, the companies' risks would be progressively reduced.

It is believed that the question of whether DPA funds would have to be obligated pursuant to this deal would be dependent entirely upon whether ODM's present judgment was that the government would be likely to suffer a loss at the end of five years. If the answer to this question is negative, no obligation of DPA funds would be required. If it is positive, the amount required would depend upon the estimate of the possible loss. Thus, there is a chance that this kind of a transaction would not affect the debt limit problem and, of course, it would, under no circumstances, affect the cash outflow.

We do not, of course, know the reaction of the companies except that we are aware of the fact that the companies have a large stake in rationalizing their deal with Chile, which they have desired for many years. Chile has a substantial stake in accomplishing this rationalization in that a rate of 110 pesos to the dollar for return of dollars would stimulate the companies to purchase materials and supplies in Chile, as against imported.

In view of the fact that Anaconda proposes a sharp reduction in its mining activities at the end of August, there is great urgency in reaching a decision as to what, if anything, can be done in this matter.

SAMUEL W. ANDERSON

825.2542/8–1353

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cabot) to the Secretary of State [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 13, 1953.

Subject: Chile Requests United States Purchase 100,000 Tons of Copper for Stockpile

Chile is facing perhaps the most serious financial crisis in its history. Under special powers granted President Ibañez, he has issued some 400 decrees, at the risk of political agitation, taking steps to meet Chile's inflationary problem, eliminate artificial exchange rates and stabilize the economy. Because of its arbitrary price of 36½ cents per pound as compared with the market price of 28½–30 cents, Chile has accumulated about 70,000 tons of copper, its principal export, which cannot now be marketed except at the risk of weakening an already unstable market and further adding to Chile's financial difficulties. The Chilean Government has formally proposed that the United States purchase the accumulated stocks which it says will soon approach 100,000 tons, for our strategic stockpile. This measure would stabilize Chile's chief industry and provide the new administration an opportunity to work out a more realistic budget for 1954.

The advantages and disadvantages of a purchase are listed below:

Advantages

1. Chile will conclude arrangements for a satisfactory tax and exchange law with the American producers and halt a trend toward the gradual nationalization of an investment by these companies of over 500 million dollars.

[1] Drafted by Mr. Barall; a handwritten notation on the source text indicates that the Secretary saw this memorandum.

2. United States consumers would have access to Chile's copper production at prevailing market prices whereas they now pay premium prices.

3. Chile would establish adequate safeguards to prevent sale or diversion of copper to Soviet bloc countries. Without this purchase, such sales are a distinct possibility.

4. This would be an unquestionably sound alternative to loans.

Disadvantages

1. This purchase would involve delivery of copper not now needed in our stockpile program and might lead to charges of discrimination if a similar opportunity for stockpile sales were not given to other sellers.

2. The purchase would involve an expenditure upward of 40 million dollars.

This problem is an example of conflict between sound US objectives in the field of foreign policy and equally sound domestic policies. I am afraid that if the US cannot help Chile, there will be enormous pressure for radical measures affecting our interests, including attempts to make large-scale sales to iron curtain countries and possible nationalization of the Anaconda and Kennecott mines which produce 95% of Chile's copper.

825.2542/8–1353

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of South American Affairs (Atwood)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 13, 1953.

Subject: Chilean Copper (Meeting in Mr. Flemming's Office at 4:30, August 12, 1953)

Participants: Mr. Arthur Flemming, Director, ODM
Mr. Andrew Overby, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury
Mr. Samuel Anderson, Assistant Secretary of Commerce
Mr. Mansure, DMPA
Mr. Samuel Waugh, Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs, Dept. of State
Mr. John Cabot, Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs, Dept. of State
Mr. Rollin S. Atwood, Director, Office of South American Affairs, Dept. of State

Mr. Flemming opened the meeting and, after a few general remarks, asked Mr. Anderson to discuss his proposal regarding the Chilean copper situation. Mr. Anderson discussed his proposal as outlined in his memorandum of August 10[1] which suggests a procedure whereby the United States copper companies would seek to make arrangements directly with the Chilean Government to handle the problem of unsold accumulations of copper. The proposal involves participation by the United States but does not contemplate any direct stockpile purchases.

[1] Ante, p. 703.
