ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, Gentlemen of the Congress:

In pursuance of my constitutional duty to "give to the Congress information of the state of the Union," I take the liberty of addressing you on several matters which ought, as it seems to me, particularly to engage the attention of your honorable bodies, as of all who study the welfare and progress of the Nation.

I shall ask your indulgence if I venture to depart in some degree from the usual custom of setting before you in formal review the many matters which have engaged the attention and called for the action of the several departments of the Government or which look to them for early treatment in the future, because the list is long, very long, and would suffer in the abbreviation to which I should have to subject it. I shall submit to you the reports of the heads of the several departments, in which these subjects are set forth in careful detail, and beg that they may receive the thoughtful attention of your committees and of all Members of the Congress who may have the leisure to study them. Their obvious importance, as constituting the very substance of the business of the Government, makes comment and emphasis on my part unnecessary.

The country, I am thankful to say, is at peace with all the world, and many happy manifestations multiply about us of a growing cordiality and sense of community of interest among the nations, foreshadowing an age of settled peace and good will. More and more readily each decade do the nations manifest their willingness to bind themselves by solemn treaty to the processes of peace, the processes of frankness and fair concession. So far the United States has stood at the front of such negotiations. She will, I earnestly hope and confidently believe, give fresh proof of her sincere adherence to the cause of international friendship by ratifying the several treaties of arbitration awaiting renewal by the Senate. In addition to these, it has been the privilege of the Department of State to gain the assent, in principle, of no less than 31 nations, representing four-fifths of the population of the world, to the negotiations of treaties by which it shall be agreed that whenever differences of interest or of policy arise which can not be resolved by the ordinary processes of diplomacy they shall be publicly analyzed, discussed, and reported upon by a tribunal chosen by the parties before either nation determines its course of action.

There is only one possible standard by which to determine controversies between the United States and other nations, and that is compounded of these two elements: our own honor and our obligations to the peace of the world. A test so compounded ought easily to be made to govern both the establishment of new treaty obligations and the interpretation of those already assumed.

There is but one cloud upon our horizon. That has shown itself to the south of us, and hangs over Mexico. There can be no certain prospect of peace in America until Gen. Huerta has surrendered his usurped authority in Mexico; until it is understood on all hands, indeed, that such pretended governments will not be countenanced or dealt with by the Government of the United States. We are the friends of constitutional government in America; we are more than its friends, we are its champions; because in no other way can our neighbors, to whom we would wish in every way to make proof of our friendship, work out their own development in peace and liberty. Mexico has no Government. The attempt to maintain one at the City of Mexico has broken down, and a mere military despotism has been set up which has hardly more than the semblance of national authority. It originated in the usurpation of Victoriano Huerta, who, after a brief attempt to play the part of constitutional President, has at last cast aside even the pretense of legal right and declared himself dictator. As a consequence, a condition of affairs now exists in Mexico which has made it doubtful whether even the most elementary and fundamental rights either of her own people or of the citizens of other countries resident within her territory can long be successfully safeguarded, and which threatens, if long continued, to imperil the interests of peace, order, and tolerable life in the lands immediately to the south of us. Even if the usurper had succeeded in his purposes, in despite of the constitution of the Republic and the rights of its people, he would have set up nothing but a precarious and hateful power, which could have lasted but a little while, and whose eventual downfall would have left the country in a more deplorable condition than ever. But he has not succeeded. He has forfeited the respect and the moral support even of those who were at one time willing to see him succeed. Little by little he has been completely isolated. By a little every day his power and prestige are crumbling and the collapse is not far away. We shall not, I believe, be obliged to alter our policy of watchful waiting. And then, when the end comes, we shall hope to see constitutional order restored in distressed Mexico by the concert and energy of such of her leaders as prefer the liberty of their people to their own ambitions.

I turn to matters of domestic concern. You already have under consideration a bill for the reform of our system of banking and currency, for which the country waits with impatience, as for something fundamental to its whole business life and necessary to set credit free from arbitrary and artificial restraints. I need not say how earnestly I hope for its early enactment into law. I take leave to beg that the whole energy and attention of the Senate be concentrated upon it till the matter is successfully disposed of. And yet I feel that the request is not needed—that the Members of that great House need no urging in this service to the country.

I present to you, in addition, the urgent necessity that special provision be made also for facilitating the credits needed by the farmers of the country. The pending currency bill does the farmers a great service. It puts them upon an equal footing with other business men and masters of enterprise, as it should; and upon its passage they will find themselves quit of many of the difficulties which now hamper them in the field of credit. The farmers, of course, ask and should be given no special privilege, such as extending to them the credit of the Government itself. What they need and should obtain is legislation which will make their own abundant and substantial credit resources available as a foundation for joint, concerted local action in their own behalf in getting the capital they must use. It is to this we should now address ourselves.

It has, singularly enough, come to pass that we have allowed the industry of our farms to lag behind the other activities of the country in its development. I need not stop to tell you how fundamental to the life of the Nation is the production of its food. Our thoughts may ordinarily be concentrated upon the cities and the hives of industry, upon the cries of the crowded market place and the clangor of the factory, but it is from the quiet interspaces of the open valleys and the free hillsides that we draw the sources of life and of prosperity, from the farm and the ranch, from the forest and the mine. Without these every street would be silent, every office deserted, every factory fallen into disrepair. And yet the farmer does not stand upon the same footing with the forester and the miner in the market of credit. He is the servant of the seasons. Nature determines how long he must wait for his crops, and will not be hurried in her processes. He may give his note, but the season of its maturity depends upon the season when his crop matures, lies at the gates of the market where his products are sold. And the security he gives is of a character not known in the broker's office or as familiarly as it might be on the counter of the banker.

The Agricultural Department of the Government is seeking to assist as never before to make farming an efficient business, of wide cooperative effort, in quick touch with the markets for foodstuffs. The farmers and the Government will henceforth work together as real partners in this field, where we now begin to see our way very clearly and where many intelligent plans are already being put into The Treasury of the United States has, by a timely and well-considered distribution of its deposits, facilitated the moving of the crops in the present season and prevented the scarcity of available funds too often experienced at such times. But we must not allow ourselves to depend upon extraordinary expedients. We must add the means by which the farmer may make his credit constantly and easily available and command when he will the capital by which to support and expand his business. We lag behind many other great countries of the modern world in attempting to do this. Systems of rural credit have been studied and developed on the other side of the water while we left our farmers to shift for themselves in the ordinary money market. You have but to look about you in any rural district to see the result, the handicap and embarrassment which have been put upon those who produce our food.

Conscious of this backwardness and neglect on our part, the Congress recently authorized the creation of a special commission to study the various systems of rural credit which have been put into operation in Europe, and this commission is already prepared to report. Its report ought to make it easier for us to determine what methods will be best suited to our own farmers. I hope and believe that the committees of the Senate and House will address themselves to this matter with the most fruitful results, and I believe that the studies and recently formed plans of the Department of Agriculture may be made to serve them very greatly in their work of framing appropriate and adequate legislation. It would be indiscreet and presumptuous in anyone to dogmatize upon so great and many-sided a question, but I feel confident that common counsel will produce the results we must all desire.

Turn from the farm to the world of business which centers in the city and in the factory, and I think that all thoughtful observers will agree that the immediate service we owe the business communities of the country is to prevent private monopoly more effectually than it has yet been prevented. I think it will be easily agreed that we should let the Sherman antitrust law stand, unaltered, as it is, with its debatable ground about it, but that we should as much as possible reduce the area of that debatable ground by further and more explicit legislation; and should also supplement that great act by legislation which will not only clarify it but also facilitate its administration and make it fairer to all concerned. No doubt we shall all wish, and the country will expect, this to be the central subject of our deliberations during the present session; but it is a subject so many-sided and so deserving of careful and discriminating discussion that I shall take the liberty of addressing you upon it in a special message at a later date than this. It is of capital importance that the business men of this country should be relieved of all uncertainties of law with regard to their enterprises and investments and a clear path indicated which they can travel without anxiety. It is as important that they should be relieved of embarrassment and set free to prosper as that private monopoly should be destroyed. The ways of action should be thrown wide open.

I turn to a subject which I hope can be handled promptly and without serious controversy of any kind. I mean the method of selecting nominees for the Presidency of the United States. I feel confident that I do not misinterpret the wishes or the expectations of the country when I urge the prompt enactment of legislation which will provide for primary elections throughout the country at which the voters of the several parties may choose their nominees for the Presidency without the intervention of nominating conventions. I venture the suggestion that this legislation should provide for the retention of party conventions, but only for the purpose of declaring and accepting the verdict of the primaries and formulating the platforms of the parties; and I suggest that these conventions should consist not of delegates chosen for this single purpose, but of the nominees for Congress, the nominees for vacant seats in the Senate of the United States, the Senators whose terms have not yet closed, the national committees, and the candidates for the Presidency themselves, in order that platforms may be framed by those responsible to the people for carrying them into effect.

These are all matters of vital domestic concern, and besides them, outside the charmed circle of our own national life in which our affections command us, as well as our consciences, there stand out our obligations toward our territories over sea. Here we are trustees. Porto Rico, Hawaii, the Philippines, are ours, indeed, but not ours to do what we please with. Such territories, once regarded as mere possessions, are no longer to be selfishly exploited; they are part of the domain of public conscience and of serviceable and enlightened statesmanship. We must administer them for the people who live in them and with the same sense of responsibility to them as toward our own people in our domestic affairs. No doubt we shall successfully enough bind Porto Rico and the Hawaiian Islands to ourselves by ties of justice and interest and affection, but the performance of our duty toward the Philippines is a more difficult and debatable matter. We can satisfy the obligations of generous justice toward the people of Porto Rico by giving them the ample and familiar rights and privileges accorded our own citizens in our own territories, and our obligations toward the people of Hawaii by perfecting the provisions for self-government already granted them; but in the Philippines we must go further. We must hold steadily in view their ultimate independence, and we must move toward the time of that independence as steadily as the way can be cleared and the foundations thoughtfully and permanently laid.

Acting under the authority conferred upon the President by Congress, I have already accorded the people of the islands a majority in both houses of their legislative body by appointing five instead of four native citizens to the membership of the commission. I believe that in this way we shall make proof of their capacity in counsel and their sense of responsibility in the exercise of political power, and that the success of this step will be sure to clear our view for the steps which are to follow. Step by step we should extend and perfect the system of self-government in the islands, making test of them and modifying them as experience discloses their successes and their failures; that we should more and more put under the control of the native citizens of the archipelago the essential instruments of their life, their local instrumentalities of government, their schools, all the common interests of their communities, and so by counsel and experience set up a government which all the world will see to be suitable to a people whose affairs are under their own control. last, I hope and believe, we are beginning to gain the confidence of the Filipino peoples. By their counsel and experience, rather than by our own, we shall learn how best to serve them and how soon it will be possible and wise to withdraw our supervision. Let us once find the path and set out with firm and confident tread upon it and we shall not wander from it or linger upon it.

A duty faces us with regard to Alaska which seems to me very pressing and very imperative; perhaps I should say a double duty, for it concerns both the political and the material development of the Territory. The people of Alaska should be given the full territorial form of government, and Alaska, as a storehouse, should be unlocked. One key to it is a system of railways. These the Government should itself build and administer, and the ports and terminals it should itself control in the interest of all who wish to use them for the service and development of the country and its people.

But the construction of railways is only the first step; is only thrusting in the key to the storehouse and throwing back the lock and opening the door. How the tempting resources of the country are to be exploited is another matter, to which I shall take the liberty of from time to time calling your attention, for it is a policy which must be worked out by well-considered stages, not upon theory, but upon lines of practical expediency. It is part of our general problem of conservation. We have a freer hand in working out the problem in Alaska than in the States of the Union; and yet the principle and object are the same, wherever we touch it. We must use the resources of the country, not lock them up. There need be no conflict or jealousy as between State and Federal authorities, for there can be no essential difference of purpose between them. The resources in question must be used, but not destroyed or wasted; used, but not monopolized upon any narrow idea of individual rights as against the abiding interests of communities. That a policy can be worked out by conference and concession which will release these resources and yet not jeopard or dissipate them, I for one have no doubt; and it can be done on lines of regulation which need be no less acceptable to the people and governments of the States concerned than to the people and Government of the Nation at large. whose heritage these resources are. We must bend our counsels to this end. A common purpose ought to make agreement easy.

Three or four matters of special importance and significance I beg that you will permit me to mention in closing.

Our Bureau of Mines ought to be equipped and empowered to render even more effectual service than it renders now in improving the conditions of mine labor and making the mines more economically productive as well as more safe. This is an all-important part of the work of conservation; and the conservation of human life and energy lies even nearer to our interest than the preservation from waste of our material resources.

We owe it, in mere justice to the railway employees of the country, to provide for them a fair and effective employers' liability act; and a law that we can stand by in this matter will be no less to the advantage of those who administer the railroads of the country than to the advantage of those whom they employ. The experience of a large number of the States abundantly proves that.

We ought to devote ourselves to meeting pressing demands of plain justice like this as earnestly as to the accomplishment of political and economic reforms. Social justice comes first. Law is the machinery for its realization and is vital only as it expresses and embodies it.

An international congress for the discussion of all questions that affect safety at sea is now sitting in London at the suggestion of our own Government. So soon as the conclusions of that congress can be learned and considered we ought to address ourselves, among other things, to the prompt alleviation of the very unsafe, unjust, and burdensome conditions which now surround the employment of sailors and render it extremely difficult to obtain the services of spirited and competent men such as every ship needs if it is to be safely handled and brought to port.

May I not express the very real pleasure I have experienced in cooperating with this Congress and sharing with it the labors of common service to which it has devoted itself so unreservedly during the past seven months of uncomplaining concentration upon the business of legislation? Surely it is a proper and pertinent part of my report on "the state of the Union" to express my admiration for the diligence, the good temper, and the full comprehension of public duty which has already been manifested by both the Houses; and I hope that it may not be deemed an impertinent intrusion of myself into the picture if I say with how much and how constant satisfaction I have availed myself of the privilege of putting my time and energy at their disposal alike in counsel and in action.

	Mr. Knox to Mr. White (telegram).	1912. Feb. 5	Same subject. It is represented to the department that an American citizen, Mr. W. S. Valentine, fears that the Government of Honduras will dispossess him of railway and wharf properties at Puerto Cortés without adjustment of his claim. Instructs the minister that this Government, without at present discussing the legal aspects of the claim, is convinced that the claim possesses equities that should be met, and that any action	595
	\		taken in violation of such equittee could not be regarded by this Government as an indication of a friendly attitude. The minister is instructed to address the Honduran Government in the sense of the foregoing.	505

The railroad construction bill seems to involve the amulty of $250,000 shortly to become payable by the United States to Panama and the income from the $6,000,000 invested in New York. Department's attitude as to the $250,000 is made clear in its telegram of May 31,1912, and as to the income from the $6,000,000 it is a matter requiring the most careful consideration and consultation between the two Governments. The department would therefore object to the passage of the bill as it now stands, and believes it should be amended so as to except these two items. Same subject. Reports compliance with Department's Feb. 17. He is informed by President Porras that the bill had become a law on Feb. 18, and the present attitude of the United States is surprising in view of the report of the minister of Panama at Washington that the department had no objection to the pledge of the interest on the $6,000,000. The President denied that the United States had any right to control the employment of the $250,000 annuity or the interest on the $6,000,000. CIRCULARS.

CERTIFICATES OF INSPECTION OF NURSERY STOCK.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 21, 1912.

To the Diplomatic Officers of the United States.

Gentlemen: I enclose herewith copies of a circular issued by the Department of Agriculture on December 20, 1912, containing the text of an Act of Congress known as the "Plant Quarantine Act," approved August 20, 1912, and the Rules and Regulations for carrying out the Act.

It is desired by the Secretary of Agriculture that you will transmit one copy of the Act to the Governments to which you are respectively accredited, inviting their special attention to the conditions imposed in Regulation 7 relating to foreign certificates of inspection and informing them that after July 1, 1913, foreign certificates of inspection of nursery stock (which are a condition of entry) will not be accepted except when issued and countersigned or officially sealed by duly authorized officials of foreign countries or their agents in accordance with the provision of the regulation mentioned, and with section 1 of the Act. After July 1, 1913, imported nursery stock not certified, or improperly certified, will be stopped at the customhouses and its entry will be impossible.

INTERNATIONAL RIFLE-SHOOTING TOURNAMENT.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 30, 1912.

To the Diplomatic Officers of the United States.

Gentlemen: I enclose herewith an invitation addressed to the riflemen of the country of your residence by Lieutenant General John C. Bates, U. S. A., Retired, President of the National Rifle Association of America, to take part in an International Rifle-Shooting Tournament to be held at Camp Perry, Ohio, in September, 1913. You may accordingly, on behalf of the Association, transmit the invitation to the Foreign Office and request that it be forwarded to the appropriate officials to the end that it may be given publicity and come to the knowledge of those interested. In doing so you will say that the National Rifle Association of America will conduct the tournament as a private organization and that the tournament will not be under the auspices of the Government of the United States, which will, however, be glad to learn that the invitation is favorably received.

PLANT QUARANTINE ACT.

File No. 811.612/72.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 7, 1913.

To the Diplomatic Officers of the United States.

GENTLEMEN: With its circular instruction of December 21 last the Department enclosed to you a circular issued by the Department of Agriculture on December 20, 1912, containing the text of an act of Congress known as the "Plant Quarantine Act," approved August 20, 1912, and the rules and regulations for carrying out the act.

In order that the appropriate officials of foreign countries may have the information which will enable them to comply with the requirements of the act with respect to inspection and certification, the Department of Agriculture has prepared specific directions, a print of which is enclosed herewith for transmission by you to the Governments to which you are respectively accredited.

To comply with section 1 of the act and the regulations quoted in relation thereto the Secretary of Agriculture states that "it is expected that there will be for each country a chief inspection official, who will be responsible, either directly or through his assistants, for the examination and certification of all nursery stock offered for export to the United States." It may occasionally be desirable, he adds, "to have a number of such officers for the principal subdivisions of a country; but the appointment by local authorities of inspectors for towns or small districts of a country, such inspectors not being under the control of a central or chief official and not necessarily experts, will not be considered a compliance with these requirements. It is expected, in other words, that there shall be chief or State inspectors, as there now are in Holland, Belgium, and France, who will have control of the whole inspection service, through as many subordinates as the work may necessitate, and therefore this need should be presented directly to the Central Government of each country. Many of the reports so far received in relation to such foreign inspection indicate that consuls, to whom this matter has been referred, have made local inquiries, and this has led to provisions for inspection by towns or limited districts, and by local inspectors who can not be looked upon as experts and who are not responsible to any central control, and therefore not at all meeting the requirements of the Plant Quarantine Act and Regulations."

EXPATRIATION OF NATURALIZED CITIZENS.

No. 193. Special Instruction. Consular.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 28, 1913.

To the American Diplomatic and Consular Officers in Central America, Mexico, Panama, and the West Indies, and the Consular Officers in Canada.

Gentlemen: With reference to the circular instruction of April 19, 1907, and amending instruction of May 14, 1908, prescribing rules whereunder the presumption of expatriation arising against naturalized American citizens under the provision of the second paragraph of section 2 of the act of March 2, 1907, may be overcome, you are informed that the Department has come to the conclusion that exceptional treatment should be accorded certain naturalized citizens temporarily residing in countries near to the United States for reasons and in a manner not inconsistent with the retention of American citizenship and protection. Accordingly, in pursuance of the discretionary authority vested in the Department by the law mentioned, the following rule is prescribed in addition to the existing rule:

(Special rule a): In the case of a naturalized American citizen residing in Canada, Mexico, the West Indies, Central America or Panama, the presumption of expatriation may be overcome upon his presenting to a diplomatic or consular officer satisfactory evidence that he is employed by a legitimate corporation or company or principally engaged in any legitimate concern, which is effectively owned and controlled by a citizen or citizens of the United States and materially promotes the interests of this country, and that he intends to return to the United States to reside.

When there seems to be any doubt as to the application and effect of the above rule in a particular case the matter should be referred to the Department, with a full statement of the pertinent facts and circumstances, for its determination. In this connection it may be observed that, in the case of a person against whom the presumption of expatriation has arisen, if it is shown that he has retained in good faith in this country a residential house or other property, such fact, although not of itself decisive, should be given due weight in determining his status, and particularly the question of his intention of returning to the United States to reside.

SPEECH OF SENATOR ELIHU ROOT IN THE SENATE, JANUARY 16, 1913, REPUDIATING SENTIMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO HIM IN RELATION TO LATIN AMERICA.

File No. 710.11/90a and 90b.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 14, 1913.

To the American Diplomatic Officers in Latin America.

Gentlemen: The Department learns that within the last few months articles have appeared in various newspapers in South and Central America commenting on an alleged speech of Senator Root dealing with Latin-American affairs. Senator Root is quoted as saying, among other things:

It is only a question of time until Mexico, Central America, and the islands that we still lack in the Caribbean Sea, will be brought under our flag.

and other statements of a similar nature are attributed to him. This matter was first brought to the notice of the Department by the American Minister to Honduras', after an article of this character had appeared on October 26 last in "El Cronista," a newspaper in Tegucigalpa, Upon this article being brought to his attention, Senator Root authorized the following statement, which was transmitted by cable to Minister White [at Tegucigalpa], and subsequently appeared in the press of Tegucigalpa:

Washington, November 25, 1912.

The newspaper "El Cronista" of Tegucigalpa published on October 26, 1912, certain alleged extracts from some speech of mine.

These are impudent forgeries. I never made any such speech. I never said any such things. The expressions contained in these spurious and pretended extracts are inconsistent with my opinions and abhorrent to my feelings. They are the exact opposite of the views which I have expressed on hundreds of occasions, during many years, both publicly and privately, officially and personally, and which I now hold and maintain.

ELIHU ROOT.

Should newspaper articles of the character quoted above, attributing utterances of this nature to Senator Root, appear in the press of the country to which you are accredited, you will cause such publicity to be made of Senator Root's statement as in your judgment may be necessary to counteract the effect of such articles.

Department of State, Washington, March 13, 1913.

To the American Diplomatic Officers in Latin America.

Gentlemen: Referring to the Department's unnumbered instruction of January 14 last, concerning the publication in "El Cronista," a newspaper in Tegucigalpa, of an alleged speech of Senator Root dealing with Latin-American affairs, the Department encloses herewith a copy of the Congressional Record of January 16, 1913, beginning on page 1609 of which is printed the public repudiation in the Senate by Senator Root of the sentiments attributed to him in the article. Accompanying the Record is a translation into Spanish of Senator Root's remarks.

These papers have been sent to the Department at Senator Root's instance with the request that they be sent, through the channel of the Legation, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of [name of country].

You are instructed to carry out this wish of Senator Root.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I make a statement in a matter of personal privilege.

On the 26th of October last there was published in the newspaper "El Cronista" in Tegucigalpa, the capital of Honduras, a false and fabricated pretended speech alleged to have been made by me regarding the relations between the United States and Central and South America. I send to the desk a translation of this pretended speech, and will ask that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my statement, without detaining the Senate by reading it in full.

ELIHU ROOT BEFORE LATIN AMERICA.

The following paragraphs of a recent speech of Mr. Root, United States Senator, ex-Secretary of State, and one of the most eminent personages of the Yankee country, ought to be known in Central America.

with new lodgers in the house, as the Latin Americans converted into citizens of our great Nation cannot help but be?'

"I understand and confess that we are governing badly in Porto Rico, as we governed badly in Cuba the second time. But though we may do it badly we shall always do it better than the natives. In the Philippines, where our rule has been more strict, the results have been admirable. And the Porto Ricans, Cubans, and Filipinos should be convinced of the fact that, since our experience with the annexation of Hawaii, we will not repeat the expedient of citizenship.

"If it were possible for these Latin America nationalities to understand 'self-control' and 'self-government,' as is the case with our northern neighbors, then Pan Americanism would be a beautiful reality, without necessitating our learning to command in Spanish; but can they or do they know how to govern themselves? Let Haiti say; let Mexico say; let Colombia, Panama, Nicaragua, and, above all, Cuba, twice instructed by us, watched diplomatically since and whose present economical disorganization is as disastrous as in the colonial epochs, say. In the hands of these people is their fate; but I doubt whether it will be good unless it is beneath our protectorate.

"Did not the North American Government find itself on the eve of change to replace the present administration or to confirm it in power, no one would deny that in these hours we would have already solved the Mexican and Central American complication and given special attention to the economical affairs of the Great Antilla (Cuba). And whoever speaks of national finances, speaks of all the Government and national system. Fortunately, and soon, we shall reach a tragical position, since 'alea jacta est,' and whoever of the three candidates occupies the White House, as they are of one opinion regarding foreign policy and, above all, expansion in America, the country can trust in the Congress, which with hands free will know how to second the Chief of State, as in 1812, 1845, 1861, 1861, and 1898.

This pretended speech contains most arrogant and offensive statements as to the relations which do and should exist between the United States and the Latin-American countries of these continents. I have denied over my own signature the authenticity of this speech, and my denial has been published in Tegucigalpa. I should let the matter rest there were it not that this pretended speech is being published all over Central and South America, and that some years ago, while Secretary of State, I made a visit to South America and represented the United States in many expressions of friendship toward the people of the Latin-American countries. Owing to this and to the fact that I am still connected with the Government of the United Sates, these expressions in this pretended speech are being treated by the people of Latin America as indicating either a change in the attitude of the people of the United States or insincerity in the former expressions of friendship.

I send to the desk and ask to have the Secretary read one illustration of the way in which this paper is being used. It is an extract from an editorial published in the newspaper "El Fonografo," of Maracaibo, Venezuela, on the 28th day of November, 1912.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. It will be read as desired.

The Secretary read as follows:

Senator Elihu Root, who before the whole Spanish America protested, when he was Sccretary of State, that the United States did not desire even 1 inch more of territory than that which it already possessed and that the sovereignty of our different States would be respected, and who praised us for our ability and aptness for self-government, by one stroke of the pen has blotted out those statements and other still stronger ones which he made in regard to the autonomy and independence of Spanish America. In his last speech he says: "All America down to Panama, including the islands of the Caribbean Sea, must be under our flag. We need Cuba, Mexico, and Central America as a man peods his two arms and a woman her two carrings."

bean Sea, must be under our flag. We need Cuba, Mexico, and Central America as a man needs his two arms and a woman her two carrings."

In view of this flagrant contradiction, will there be anyone amongst us who will have a particle of faith in the friendly protests of the United States?

We must not entertain any illusions. It is evident that the United States not only do not intend to endeavor to prevent Europe from taking possession of Latin America, but they themselves pretend to become the arbiters of our political and commercial destinies.

Because of the use which is being made of this publication by the enemies of the United States, by the men who wish to stir up strife and create ill feeling between the Latin-American countries and the United States, I wish to repeat here in the most formal and public manner, and to make a public record of the denials which I have already made as to the authenticity of this pretended speech.

The alleged expressions which are thus imputed to me are impudent forgeries. I never made any such speech. I never said any such things or wrote any such things. The expressions contained in these spurious and pretended extracts are inconsistent with my opinions and abhorrent to my feelings. They are the exact opposite of the views which I have expressed on hundreds of occasions during many years, both publicly and privately, officially and personally, and which I now hold and maintain. I will add. Mr. President, that they are inconsistent with the views and the feelings of the great body of the American people.

DECLARATION OF POLICY WITH REGARD TO LATIN AMERICA.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 12, 1913—1 p. m.

To the American Diplomatic Officers in Latin America.

In view of questions which are naturally uppermost in the public mind just now, the President issued the following statement to the public, March 11, 1913.

"One of the chief objects of my administration will be to cultivate the friendship and deserve the confidence of our sister republics of Central and South America, and to promote in every proper and honorable way the interests which are common to the peoples of the two continents. I earnestly desire the most cordial understanding and cooperation between the peoples and leaders of America and, therefore, deem it my duty to make this brief statement.

"Cooperation is possible only when supported at every turn by the orderly processes of just government based upon law, not upon arbitrary or irregular force. We hold, as I am sure all thoughtful leaders of republican government everywhere hold, that just government rests always upon the consent of the governed, and that there can be no freedom without order based upon law and upon the public conscience and approval. We shall look to make these principles the basis of mutual intercourse, respect, and helpfulness between our sister republics and ourselves. We shall lend our influence of every kind to the realization of these principles in fact and practice, knowing that disorder, personal intrigues, and defiance of constitutional rights weaken and discredit government and injure none so much as the people who are unfortunate enough to have their common life and their common affairs so tainted and disturbed. We can have no sympathy with those who seek to seize the power of government to advance their own personal interests or ambition. We are the friends of peace, but we know that there can be no lasting or stable peace in such circumstances. As friends, therefore, we shall prefer those who act in the interest of peace and honor, who protect private rights, and respect the restraints of constitutional provision. Mutual respect seems to us the indispensable foundation of friendship between states, as between individuals.

"The United States has nothing to seek in Central and South America except the lasting interests of the peoples of the two continents, the security of governments intended for the people and for no special group or interest, and the development of personal and trade relationships between the two continents which shall redound to the profit and advantage of both and interfere with the rights and liber-

"From these principles may be read so much of the future policy of this Government as it is necessary now to forecast, and in the spirit of these principles I may, I hope, be permitted with as much confidence as earnestness to extend to the Governments of all the Republics of America the hand of genuine disinterested friendship, and to pledge my own honor and the honor of my colleagues to every enterprise of peace and amity that a fortunate future may disclose."

BRYAN.

PEACE PLAN OF THE PRESIDENT.

File No. 711.0012/64.

Statement made by the Secretary of State on April 24, 1913, on presenting the President's Peace Plan to the Representatives, some thirty-six in number, of the Foreign Governments, who constitute the Diplomatic Circle at Washington.

Your Excellences: I have called you together in order that I may present to you all, simultaneously, a plan for the promotion of peace which I am directed by the President to submit. It reads as follows:

The parties hereto agree that all questions of whatever character and nature, in dispute between them, shall, when diplomatic efforts fail, be submitted for investigation and report to an international commission (the composition to be agreed upon); and the contracting parties agree not to declare war or begin hostilities until such investigation is made and report submitted.

The investigation shall be conducted as a matter of course upon the initiative of the commission, without the formality of a request from either party; the report shall be submitted within (time to be agreed upon) from the date of the submission of the dispute, but the parties hereto reserve the right to act independently on the subject matter in dispute after the report is submitted.

You will notice that it is very brief and deals only with the principles involved, not with the details which must be considered in embodying the principles in diplomatic form. The President's object is to hasten universal peace. All arbitration treaties contain certain exceptions—that is, certain questions are not to be submitted to arbitration, and, as these questions are of the highest importance, they are likely to become themselves a cause of war.

The plan proposed by the President, through you, to the nations which you represent, is intended to supplement the arbitration treaties now in existence and those which may be hereafter made. It is intended to subject to investigation those disputes which have not up to this time been considered fit subjects for arbitration. It is based upon the belief that we have now reached a point in the progress of civilization when nations cannot afford to engage in war before the cause of the war is impartially investigated and openly declared to the world. It is believed that the period of investigation—a time to be fixed by agreement, and which may be different in different agreements-will enable the parties to the controversy to separate questions of fact from questions of national honor and reach some amicable adjustment of their differences. The period of investigation will also allow passion to subside and the great forces that work for peace to assert themselves. When men are excited they talk about what they can do; when they are calm and capable of deliberation they talk about what they ought to do. And this is true of nations as well as of individuals. Public opinion is an increasing force in the world, and the time provided for investigation permits the formation and expression of public opinion.

You will note that while the proposed plan provides for the investigation of all questions which do not yield to diplomatic treatment, it reserves to each of the contracting nations the right to act independently after the investigation is concluded. If, after the time specified elapses and after the results of the investigation are made known, the nations still desire war, they are at liberty to settle their differences with the sword, but it is believed that this will seldom be the case and it is hoped that this agreement when entered into will make war between the contracting parties a remote possibility.

The plan as outlined does not prescribe the method by which the commission will be created. This is a matter of detail which is left for discussion. It may differ in the different agreements entered into, but it is desired that the commission shall be permanent in character, in order that the investigation may be made by the commission, upon its own initiative, without the formality of a request from either party. This is suggested because of the fear that in times of excitement neither party might be willing to ask for investigation lest such a request be regarded as an evidence of weakness.

In the original draft, as presented to the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, a suggestion was made that the period of investigation should not be utilized for a change in the naval program of the contracting nations, but this is a detail which has been omitted from the plan as proposed because it was feared that different nations might look upon it from different standpoints.

The plan has been made as simple as possible and everything has been eliminated except the things which seem essential to its success, and this Government stands ready to discuss with those Governments which are willing to enter into such an agreement such details as it may be necessary to consider.

In conclusion, let me assure you that I am very much gratified to be the medium through which the President presents this plan to the nations represented here, and I esteem myself fortunate to occupy the office with which the President has honored me at the time when the step is taken in the interest of peace. Our nation desires to use its influence for the promotion of the world's peace, and this plan is offered by the President with the hope that its acceptance by the nations will exert a large influence in this direction.

I thank you for your courtesy in coming at this time and giving me your attention. I hand to each one of you a copy of the plan as outlined, and on behalf of the President, I respectfully invite your cooperation in putting it into effect.

To the diplomatic officers of the United States in Argentina, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, China, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Germany, Great Britain, Haiti, Italy, Netherlands, Norway, Peru, Portugal, Russia, Spain and Sweden.

> DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 7, 1913.

Sir: The following nations: Argentina, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, China, Denmark, France, Germany, Great Britain, Haiti, Italy, Netherlands, Norway, Peru, Portugal, Russia, Santo Domingo, Spain and Sweden, have announced their acceptance of the principle embodied in the President's peace plan, a copy of which I herewith enclose.

I have submitted to the Washington representatives of those countries a copy of a memorandum, which I also enclose, covering the suggested details. It occurs to me that it might be well for you to supplement the work that is being done through the representatives here by bringing these details to the attention of the Foreign Office and explaining them. They are offered merely by way of suggestion and we are prepared to consider anything that the other countries may suggest as a means of perfecting the plan.

It is very gratifying to the President and to myself that the plan has been so quickly and so widely accepted. We believe that it will go forward toward the prevention of war, and I think that by fall we will have reached an understanding with all the nations in regard to both the principle and the details and thus be able to complete the treaties during the present year.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S PEACE PROPOSAL.

The parties hereto agree that all questions of whatever character and nature, in dispute between them, shall, when diplomatic efforts fail, be submitted for investigation and report to an international commission (the composition to be agreed upon); and the contracting parties agree not to declare war or begin hostilities until such investigation is made and report submitted.

The investigation shall be conducted as a matter of course upon the initiative of the commission, without the formality of a request from either party; the report shall be submitted within (time to be agreed upon) from the date of the submission of the dispute, but the parties hereto reserve the right to act independently on the subject matter in dispute after the report is submitted.

SUPPLEMENTARY MEMORANDUM BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

In the peace plan proposed by the President to all the nations, the composition of the International Commission is left to agreement between the parties, and I am authorized to suggest for the consideration of those who are willing to enter into this agreement:

1. That the International Commission be of five members, to be composed as follows: one member from each of the contracting countries, to be chosen by the Government; one member to be chosen by each of the contracting countries from some other country, and the fifth member of the Commission to be agreed upon by the two Governments, the Commission to be appointed as soon as convenient after the making of the treaty, vacancies to be filled according to the original appointment.

2. The time also is to be agreed upon, and it is suggested that that time be one year. If a year is considered too long or too short, this Government will consider either a greater or a less period.

3. This Government is prepared to consider the question of maintaining the status quo as to military and naval preparation during the period of investigation, if the contracting nation desires to include this, and this Government suggests tentatively that the parties agree that there shall be no change in the military and naval program during the period of investigation unless danger to one of the contracting parties from a third power compels a change in said program, in which case the party feeling itself menaced by a third power, shall confidentially communicate the matter in writing to the other contracting party and it shall thereupon be released from the obligation not to change its military or naval program, and this release will at the same time operate as a release of the other contracting party. This protects each party from the other in ordinary cases, and yet provides freedom of action in emergencies.

All of these suggestions, however, are presented for consideration, and not with the intention of imposing any fixed conditions. The principle of investigation being accepted, the details are matters for conference and consideration.

> Department of State, Washington, August 12, 1913.

Sin: I transmit herewith a copy of the treaty entered into on the 7th instant with Salvador. You will notice that it embodies all of the details suggested in connection with the President's plan for securing investigation in all cases of dispute. While Salvador was willing to have the treaty made in exact accordance with the suggestions submitted, you will make it clear to the Government to which you are accredited that the suggestions in regard to details are purely tentative and that we are ready to consider any modifications that may be suggested. Our chief purpose is to secure investigation in all cases whatsoever and time for deliberation before any declaration of war or commencement of hostilities.

Twenty-six nations have now endorsed this principle, and these nations represent more than four-fifths of the population of the world.

It is not expected that all of the countries will agree to the same details and it is not at all necessary that the several treaties shall be identical in language. Please make this clear and let us know what suggestions the [blank] Government has to make and when it is ready to take up the matter with a view to agreeing upon a treaty.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, September 23, 1913.

The Department desiring to complete negotiations for a treaty according to the President's plan, already sent you, providing for investigation in all cases, the principle of which has already been accepted, you will see the Minister for Foreign Affairs and urge consideration of details; if those submitted by the Department are unsatisfactory any changes desired will be cheerfully considered. Treaties embodying the principle and the details as submitted have been signed by Guatemala, Panama, and Salvador.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 18, 1913.

Sir: I enclose herewith a copy of the treaty with Salvador, which provides for investigation in all cases of disputes. Four other treaties, identical in language, have been signed with Guatemala, Panama, Honduras and Nicaragua. We have just signed a treaty with the Netherlands, a copy of which is also enclosed. You will notice by comparing the two freaties that the chief point of difference lies in the elimination from the Netherlands treaty of the entire section relating to the military and naval status. This Government has at all times been willing to omit this section or to modify it to suit the wishes of contracting nations. There are some minor changes, the two principal being: first, the provision requiring the nations to furnish the necessary facts during investigation; and, second, the provision that the fifth member of the commission shall not be a citizen of either contracting country. I send you the copy of the treaty with the Netherlands in order that you may bring it, and the Salvador treaty again, to the attention of the Government to which you are accredited in the hope that we may reach an early agreement in regard to details and be ready to sign the treaty within a short time.

The President in his recent message expressed gratification that thirty-one nations had accepted the principle of the proposed peace plan. These nations comprise more than three fourths of the population of the world. We feel that the treaties made in accordance with this plan take a long step in advance, and are much pleased that the plan has been so generally approved.

PROHIBITION OF IMPORTATION OF AIGRETTES, EGRET PLUMES, ETC.

File No. 611.006/81.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 29, 1913.

GENTLEMEN: Paragraph 347 of the Tariff Act of October 3, 1913, contains the following provision:

That the importation of aigrettes, egret plumes or so-called osprey plumes, and the feathers, quills, heads, wings, tails, skins, or parts of skins, of wild birds, either raw or manufactured, and not for scientific or educational purposes, is hereby prohibited; but this provision shall not apply to the feathers or plumes of ostriches, or to the feathers or plumes of domestic fowls of any kind.

Out of abundant caution and with a view to obviating any occasion for embarrassment to the ladies of your families, the Department brings to your knowledge that this prohibition extends to the prohibited plumage when brought in as baggage, notwithstanding the fact that it may form the trimming of hats or other wearing apparel, and that the customs officers of the United States have been instructed by the Treasury Department to remove such plumage from the hats of women passengers arriving in ports of the United States. No exception will be made in the cases of ladies of the families of diplomatic officers of the United States.

INVITATION TO THE PANAMA-PACIFIC INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION TO BE HELD AT SAN FRANCISCO IN 1915.

File No. 811 607 G/289.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, September 17, 1913.

To the diplomatic officers of the United States.

Gentlemen: The Department by its circular of February 5, 1912, invited, in pursuance of the Joint Resolution of Congress approved February 15, 1911, and on behalf of the Government and people of the United States, the nations of the earth to participate in the Panama-Pacific International Exposition to be held at San Francisco, California, in 1915, for the purpose of celebrating the completion of the Panama Canal; and it directed you to communicate the President's invitation to the Governments to which you are accredited.

Congress, in the Naval Appropriation Act approved March 4, 1911,

The President is further authorized and respectfully requested, in extending his invitation to the foreign nations in pursuance of the aforesaid joint resolution of Congress, to invite their representatives and their fleets to assemble at Hampton Roads, Virginia, and from thence come to the city of Washington, there to be formally welcomed by the President; and, at the conclusion of the ceremonies at Washington, the President is requested to proceed to Hampton Roads and there review the assembled fleets as they start on their voyage to the city of San Francisco.

In pursuance of the above provision, you are now instructed to convey to the Governments to which you are accredited an invitation from the President to send representatives and as many of their national war vessels as they may deem proper to Hampton Roads, Virginia, to arrive there early in 1915, at a date to be subsequently communicated.

The President will, as contemplated by the Act, welcome the representatives of the foreign nations accepting the invitation on their arrival at Washington, and on the conclusion of the ceremonies at the capital the President will proceed to Hampton Roads where he will review the assembled fleets as they start on their voyage to San Francisco, where they will take part in the opening of the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

In communicating this invitation to the Governments to which you are accredited, you will express the pleasure which the President would feel should they decide to accept it by appointing representatives and by sending as many of their national war vessels as they may deem proper to assemble at Hampton Roads as above indicated.

Department of State, Washington, November 25, 1913.

To the diplomatic officers of the United States:

Gentlemen: On September 17, 1913, the Department addressed to the diplomatic officers of the United States a circular in which, pursuant to the provision in the Naval Appropriation Act approved March 4, 1911, they were instructed to convey to the Governments to which they are accredited an invitation from the President of the United States to send representatives and as many of their national war vessels as they may deem proper to Hampton Roads, Virginia, to arrive there early in 1915, at a date to be subsequently communicated for the purpose of participating in the celebration of the completion of the Panama Canal.

It is further set forth in the circular of September 17, 1913, that:

The President will, as contemplated by the Act, welcome the representatives of the foreign nations accepting the invitation on their arrival at Washington, and on the conclusion of the ceremonies at the capital the President will proceed to Hampton Roads, where he will review the assembled fleets as they start on their voyage to San Francisco, where they will take part in the opening of the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

The Department having received an inquiry as to whether by "representatives" is meant naval officers commanding war vessels or additional representatives of the Government to which the invitation was extended, and being desirous that no misunderstanding arise as to this Government's invitation concerning the quality of such representatives, will be glad to have you inform the Governments to which you are accredited that the naval program to be carried out at Hampton Roads and at Washington before the fleet starts on its journey through the canal, is entirely distinct from the more extensive ceremonies to be held at San Francisco after the Exposition shall have been opened, and that therefore the "representatives" that are to assemble with the fleets at Hampton Roads are to be naval representatives only. These naval representatives are not, however, to be only officers of the Navy in a military sense, but also civil officials of the Navy, such as Lords of the Admiralty and Ministers of Marine.

In communicating this information to the Governments to which you are accredited you will express the earnest hope that as many of these officials as possible will honor the occasion with their presence.

[Telegram—Paraphrase.]

AMERICAN LEGATION, Buenos Aires, June 30, 1913.

In celebration of the centenary of Argentine independence, American citizens resident in Buenos Aires will present to the Argentine Nation a noble monument to Washington. On the fourth of July I shall make the presentation in behalf of the American Colony, and the gift will be accepted by President Saenz Peña in person. Not only our fellow-citizens here, but the Argentine Government, the public and the press would highly appreciate a message on that occasion from the President.

THE WHITE HOUSE, Washington, July 4, 1913.

On the occasion of Your Excellency's acceptance of the monument to George Washington, presented to the Argentine Nation on this anniversary day of the independence of the United States by American citizens resident at Buenos Aires, in celebration of the centenary of Argentine independence, I offer to Your Excellency my congratulations on the progress made by the Argentine Nation and its high standing among the nations of the world. I trust that in this noble monument Your Excellency will see a lasting evidence of the enduring friendship and good will which the American people entertain for the people of Argentina.

American Legation, Buenos Aires, July 5, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to report that the celebration of the 4th of July in Buenos Aires this year was a marked success. It was made especially noteworthy by the presentation of the statue of Washington, the gift of resident Americans to the Argentine Nation. The President, the Vice President, the Chief Justice, the President of the Senate, nearly all the Cabinet and other high officials of the Government attended the unveiling and great appreciation was shown of the monument. The American colony here is neither large nor wealthy when compared to the other foreign colonies and it is all the more credit to them therefore that they have erected and presented the most dignified and noble of all the monuments in Buenos Aires. After the dedication, the Monument Committee, composed of Messrs. Edmund P. Graves, Chairman, George E. Fuller, Secretary, James A. Wheatley, Treasurer, John C. Zimmermann, Arthur J. Simmons and Alfred Zucker, presented commemorative plaques to the invited guests. Two of the plaques were in gold, the rest in silver and bronze. The gold ones were intended for the Presidents of the two nations. At the request of the Committee I have the honor to send in the pouch herewith the plaque for President Wilson, and I respectfully request that it be delivered to him in the name of the Committee. The Committee, the American colony in general, as well as the President and officials of the Government were greatly pleased and touched by President Wilson's message.

Clippings from the newspapers giving good accounts of the proceedings and photographs of the monument are enclosed herewith.

No further evidence of the very friendly relations existing between the two greatest American Republics is necessary than the ceremony of the official presentation to the Argentine Nation of the George Washington statue at Palermo yesterday. The statue is the work of Mr. Charles Keck, a prominent New York sculptor, who was commissioned by the following committee of local United States residents:

Edmund P. Graves, chairman; George E. Fuller, secretary; James A. Wheatley, treasurer; John C. Zimmermann, Arthur J. Simmons and Alfred Zucker.

The statue is of bronze and is a reproduction of the one which stands in front of the New York Treasury building in Wall Street. It is 2.30 metres high, and represents the Father of his Country in the Colonial dress of the period in the act of speaking, having risen from his chair.

The pedestal, which is of Deer Island, Maine, granite, was designed and erected by Mr. Alfred Zucker, the well-known architect of this city, and forms an artistic finish which is in perfect harmony with the surroundings.

Engraved in the upper panel of the base of the monument is the following inscription in golden letters:

George Washington.

A la Nación Argentina en conmemoración de su centenario
M.C.M.X.
Los Ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos de America
Residentes en la Republica

The site of the monument is a most happy one in the Parque 3 de Febrero, fronting the magnificent lake of the "Pabellon de los Lagos." The large trees and rare plants on either side and in the rear form an ideal background for such an imposing work. The base and pedestal of the monument yesterday were gaily bedecked with the colours and coats of arms of both nations.

The Honorable John Work Garrett initiated the proceedings by calling upon Mr. Arthur J. Simons to address the gathering in the name of the United States residents.

ADDRESS BY MR ARTHUR J. SIMMONS REPRESENTING THE MONUMENT COMMITTEE.

Mr. Presider, Your Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen: By permission of the municipal government, and honoured by the presence of His Excellency the President of ne Nation and other high officials of State, we are assembled for an unusual eent.

It is a significant occasion, in commemoration of the rounding out of the first century of a national growth and development. No great nation has ever yet come into existence and maintained its government without struggle, turmoil, strife. Hunanity's destiny is upward and forward. The masses rise and advance through struggle, but the struggle is most courageously carried forward when led by patriotic action, and the rise is most rapid when leavened by patriotic wisdom. Intrepid patriotism is sublime. All peoples of the earth meet crises. In the supreme moment of coping with those crises, when humanity's fate hangs in the balance, to waver is fatal, firm resolutions must be adopted, and fearless, decisive action follow to enforce them. Perilous indeed, with consequences immeasurable, far-reaching and long-lasting, affecting the lives and well-being of future generations, is the crisis that pertains to the momentous question of the fundamental principles of government. Argentina has met, struggled with, passed through, conquered and risen above the peril of this crisis in her history. And a pause has been made, at the first hundred-year mark, for the world to take note of the growth and development of this independent and progressive people. It is, indeed, significant.

The celebration of the Centennial of that glorious and memorable 25 de Mayo de 1810 by the Government and people of Argentina afforded an opportunity for the various foreign communities here resident, whose members still own allegiance to their respective native governments, to show their goodwill; to offer some token that might long stand as an expression of their appreciation for the Government and people of the land of their sojourn; for her Government which welcomes them and guarantees to all the enjoyment of the rights and privileges of labour, trade, commerce, and the untrammelled effort for the gratification of that universal desire—the pursuit of happiness; for her people toward whom we are drawn with such fascination, with whom we labour and dwell in such concord, among whom we count such warm-hearted friends and genial companions.

No more appropriate date could be chosen for the ceremony of presenting the memorial which we of the northernmost republic have been privileged to proffer, than this, July 4th, the anniversary of the day when the first formal declaration of inalienable individual rights and the principle of free and independent government in the western hemisphere was solemnly adopted and boldly pro-

We citizens of the United States of America who reside in Argentina, in choosing the emblem that might permanently stand as our expression of good will, have deemed it highly fitting for the occasion as being the most suitable manner by which our community here resident might convey its sentiment, as being the most representative of the friendly spirit from our home land, as being the means of most delicately touching and vibrating the mystic chords of sympathy between liberty-loving peoples, that the token should be a figure of that man whose character stands out, pre-eminent, as symbolic of Liberty, Independence and Republicanism in the New World.

Here, in the presence of this assembly, on this magnificent site, in this beautiful Palermo Park, to stand under the blue canopy of Argentina's skies, is now to be unveiled a statue of the immortal Washington. The stalwart form, the stately figure, the expressive features, the serene countenance of the patriot, statesman and gentleman seem to breathe forth the spirit of his sublime faith in the justice and ultimate triumph of the cause to which he so zealously devoted his life, and of which he himself said: "Our cause is noble, it is the cause

No nation, no continent, produces many men whose fame becomes world-wide, of mankind." and whose characters live in history. We of North America have one, you of South America have another, standing out with transcendental distinction. Though they laboured not contemporaneously, yet the life-long activities of the one corresponded to those of the other in the same formatic period of their respective country's history. The same high ideals of patriotism fired the strong passions of both to consecrate their lives to the same noble cuse of mankind. It is, therefore, with appropriate fitness, on this notable occason, that we link to the name and fame of our immortal Washington, the name ad fame of that other patriot, Argentina's immortal San Martín.

And now we, the posterity of the one, dedicate this memorial o you, the posterity of the other, and fervently exclaim: "Viva la República!"

PRESENTATION OF THE STATUE BY THE AMERICAN MINISTER.

The orator of the day has well and eloquently expressed the felings of our fellow-countrymen and countrywomen resident in the Argentine Republic towards the great Republic in which they live.

It is my privilege, on their behalf, to present the noble testimoly of their sentiments.

Before doing so I am happy to be able to read the following telegram:

"THE WHITE HOUSE, " Washington, July 4th.

"On the occasion of Your Excellency's acceptance of the monument to George Washington, presented to the Argentine Nation on this anniversary day of the independence of the United States by American citizens resident at Buenos Aires, in celebration of the centenary of Argentine independence, I offer to Your Excellency my congratulations on the progress made by the Argentine Nation and its high standing among the nations of the world. I trust that Your Excellency will see in this noble monument a lasting evidence of the enduring friendship and goodwill which the American people entertan for the people of Argentina.

"Woodrow Wilson."

I ask you, Mr. Minister, acting in the name of His Excellency the President. to accept this monument as our tribute to the glorious achievement of the first centenary of independence and of the esteem and friendship we entertain towards our great sister nation.

ACCEPTANCE OF THE STATUE BY THE MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The honour falls to me to interpret the sentiments of His Excellency the President of the Nation and to give testimony of the gratitude of Argentina for the gift of this beautiful monument, which is destined to perpetuate in the eternal beauty of art the friendly participation of the North American residents in our Centenary celebrations.

It is a happy and memorable circumstance that this ceremony should take place on the anniversary of that day on which, proclaiming the Independence of the United States, your forefathers gave life to a new nation which was destined to astonish the whole world by her marvellous progress. Nor is that circumstance less worthy of record that you should have had the praiseworthy idea to offer us as your gift a statue of the noble American who stood and stands first in the affections of your fellow-citizens and whose memory is held in veneration by all free men.

Washington holds high place in this, the fatherland of San Martín. intellect and his work have received deep echo in the thoughts of our statesmen and in the spirit of our people from the earliest hours of Argentine nationality. He was a stimulant and an example to our ancestors. His effigy is the highest symbol of all that constitutes the greatness of your nation, which has inspired ours by the wisdom of her laws and the reality of her democracy.

Your Excellency; Gentlemen!

I express the wish that the statue of George Washington, rising amongst these trees, may help the children of the great northern Republic to feel more. at home in this land from today onwards and that every day the bonds of honest friendship which unite our countries may be strengthened more and more and that the policy of the two Governments may be urged towards the same ideal of liberty and justice.

The reply of its Excellency Doctor Roque Saenz Peña to the telegram of the President of the United States is as follows:

THE PRESIDENT OF ARGENTINA TO THE PRESIDENT.

In the persn of Your Excellency I greet the great sister nation on the occasion of the glorious anniversary of your Independence, and sincerely return thanks or your felicitous greetings to the Argentine Nation on this day, when we receive with satisfaction and gratitude the statue of the great American, George Washington. It has given me great pleasure to assist at the unveiling of the monument consecrated to the immortal memory of the great Republic. Vashington in North America and San Martín in the South are examples of character and citizenship that have modelled the soul of new nationalities and guided their destinies. May the monument which I have just unveiled by an eternal symbol of friendship between these two nations, which are developing their dominions amid ideals of democracy and republicanism. I beg Your Excellency on this day of happy memory for America to accept the sentiments of friendship and sympathy of the Argentine Government and people for the people of the United States and for Your Excellency's personal wellbeing.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 16, 1913.

Sir: The Department sends you herewith a copy of a letter of July 9, from Mr. Morris Reich, of New York City, concerning the arrest in Galicia of his brother, Julius Reich, a naturalized citizen of the United States. It appears that his brother was kept in jail in Pruchnik from June 2 until June 6, and that his naturalization certificate, which was taken up by the local officials, as well as forty dollars which he was required to pay as a bond, was never returned to him. It appears further that this case has already been presented to you and that you have communicated with the Foreign Office in Vienna concerning it.

From the application upon which passport No. 3644 was issued to Julius Reich April 23, 1913, it appears that he was born in Lubaczow, Austria, August 15, 1888, emigrated to this country December 11, 1899, and obtained naturalization as a citizen of the United States in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New

From the information before the Department it does not appear that Mr. Reich, who left Galicia and came to this country when a young boy, was liable to punishment under the provision of the second article of the Naturalization Convention of 1871 between the United States and Austria-Hungary. So far as the Department is informed the arrest and imprisonment of Mr. Reich and the retention of his naturalization certificate and bond were entirely unwarranted, and it is inferred that the apparent injustice was due to the error of overzealous local officials. If, as a result of your inquiries, this appears to be the case, you will please express the earnest hope of this Government that such instructions will be issued to the local officials that cases of this kind may not arise in the future. You will also ask for the immediate return of Mr. Reich's certificate of naturalization and the money referred to.

Sir: In view of the oft-recurring arrest and imprisonment in Austria-Hungary of naturalized American citizens on the charge of evasion of military service, and of the instructions contained in the last paragraph of the Department's No. 305 of the 16th ultimo, I addressed a note dated the 2nd instant to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, a copy of which is enclosed, calling his attention to the frequency of these cases and expressing the hope that the various local officials throughout the Dual Monarchy might be informed of the terms of the Treaty of Naturalization and instructed to give due and prompt consideration to the evidence presented in each case before having recourse to extreme measures.

During my interview with him on the same day I went more into detail, pointing out especially that the laws of Austria-Hungary granted no compensation or relief to persons unjustly arrested and held for trial, but provide only for cases of unjust conviction and punishment

AMERICAN EMBASSY, Vienna, August 2, 1913.

Pursuant to instruction from his Government the undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of the United States of America, has the honor to invite the attention of his excellency, Count Berchtold, Imperial & Royal Minister for Foreign Affairs, to the comparatively large number of cases of arrest and imprisonment of American citizens, former Austro-Hungarian subjects, which have occurred in the Dual Monarchy within recent months on the charge of evasion of military service.

In practically every instance proof has been given establishing the right of these persons to exemption from military service under the provisions of the Austro-Hungarian-American Naturalization Convention of 1871. It would appear that in the majority of cases ample proof of this fact was produced at the time of arrest, but that in spite of this these persons have been subjected to the indignity of imprisonment together with the sequestration of their papers and funds, thereby inflicting on them, and often on their families, both inconvenience and loss.

While the American Government is in no wise desirous of either aiding or abetting evasions of the just obligations of its naturalized citizens to the country of their origin, the undersigned ventures to express the hope that some means may be found by which the competent local authorities throughout the Dual Menarchy may be advised of the terms of the treaty of 1871 and that American citizens, born in Austria-Hungary, may be assured of a prompt examination of the evidence at hand before being deprived of either their property or liberty.

Message of the President.

[Extract-Translation.]

The American Ambassador, in a note of January 21, 1913, suggested to our Foreign Office that it would be desirable, for strengthening the traditional friendship that unites Brazil to the United States, that the statesmen of the two countries should cultivate personal relations with each other, thus emphasizing the benefits produced by the visit which the Secretary of State, Mr. Elihu Root, made to us in 1906 on the occasion of the Third International American Conference.

To this end the Ambassador stated that he was instructed to say that if the Government of Brazil found it suitable to appoint the Minister for Foreign Affairs to return the visit of Secretary Root, he would be very cordially and affectionately received as the guest of the American Nation, which would endeavor to give him the opportunity to become acquainted with that country under the most favorable auspices in so far as the period of his visit would permit.

Since Mr. Taft's term of office would expire on March 4, and he would be succeeded by the President-elect, Mr. Wilson, the Ambassador's note added that the Administration that had the honor and pleasure of extending this invitation to our Minister, would not be the one officially to welcome him upon his arrival; but that the Administration of President Wilson, who would then have been inaugurated, would doubly esteem that visit in case it should occur in the months of March and April, thus evidencing the desire of the Brazilian Government to salute the new Administration immediately upon its taking office, and to establish personal relations with the American Executive and the statesmen who would direct the public affairs of the United States during the ensuing four years.

In a note of April 18, 1913, our Ambassador stated to the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs that the Administration of President Wilson had shown the same cordial appreciation in regard to his visit to the United States as the Administration of his illustrious predecessor had manifested, and that the Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, would take satisfaction in receiving the visit of our Minister in his official capacity whenever it might be convenient for him.

Accepting this gratifying invitation, the Brazilian Government resolved that Doctor Lauro Müller, in his official character as Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, should visit the great American Nation, in recognition of the visit of Mr. Root, made to our country in 1906. He will leave in a few days to discharge this national mission.

The proceedings relating to sales of coffee from the valorization stock, instituted in the United States, have been happily ended and the two Governments have arrived at an understanding whereby the existing stock can be placed on the market without valorization. Through the medium of our Embassy at Washington our Foreign Office declared that the sales had been bona fide, whereupon the Attorney General of the United States, satisfied with that assurance, also declared that the American Government would not prosecute the matter further.

Brazil took real pleasure in welcoming the Delegates of the American Republics to the International Commission of Jurists created by the Convention of August 23, 1906, signed in Rio de Janeiro during the Third International American Conference. The commission met from June 26 to July 19, in this city, and the Delegates of seventeen Nations were present at the opening session, namely those of the United States of America, Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Guatemala, Mexico, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Salvador, Uruguay and Brazil; and, at a later session, those of Cuba, Bolivia and Venezuela. The Dominican delegate, Mr. Americo Lujo, did not take part, being still en voyage on the closing day. And we regret that the Delegates of Haiti, Honduras and Nicaragua were not present.

The Commission held six ordinary sessions besides the preparatory, inaugural and closing sessions. At the inaugural session Doctor Lauro Müller, Minister of State for Foreign Relations, was made Honorary President, and Doctor Epitacio Pessôa, the Brazilian Delegate, was elected President.

Of the special committees appointed by the International Commission of Jurists, there are at work those of Rio de Janeiro, Montevideo, Santiago de Chile, and Buenos Aires; those of Washington and Lima have not yet convened.

The law No. 2416 of June 28, 1911, regulates extradition of nationals and foreigners and the prosecution and sentence thereof when perpetrators, outside of this country, of any of the crimes mentioned in the law, and Article 12 provides that upon the promulgation of the law copies be sent to all the Nations having relations with Brazil, all existing treaties of extradition being terminated. By virtue of this provision copies of the law were sent to the interested Governments and the existing treaties terminated by our Government. At the date of this law the following Acts relative to extradition were in effect: * * * with the United States of America: the Treaty of May 14, 1897, and the annexed Protocols of May 28, 1898, and May 29, 1901. The Treaty and the two Protocols were denounced on January 23, 1913, by a note of our Embassy at Washington; as the provision for terminating them is for a period of six months, the three Acts will cease to be in effect on July 23 of this year.

* * The Fifth Annual Conference of the Southern Commercial Congress, with its seat at Washington, will meet at Mobile, Alabama, in the fall of 1913, on the occasion of the opening of the Panama Canal. The Delegate of Brazil is our Consul General in New York, Mr. Manuel Jacintho Ferreira da Cunha.

American Embassy, Petropolis, August 28, 1911.

Sir: Referring to the Department's instruction No. 294, of May 13, 1911, I have the honor to report that, on June 28, 1911, the bill regulating extradition in this country, of which I forwarded a copy with my No. 444 of November 28, 1909, became a law without amendment. Two copies and translations of the statute are herewith enclosed. The passage of the act was wholly unexpected by the interested missions in view of the confident prediction made at the Foreign Office (see my No. 591, of September 12, 1910 1) and the attitude of the Foreign Minister in opposition to its passage last year.

Article 12 of the statute requires that all existing treaties of extradition shall be denounced, and I was informed on the 25th instant by Baron do Rio Branco, the Foreign Minister, of his Government's intention, accordingly, to terminate all such treaties. The Director-General of the Foreign Office, whom I saw later the same afternoon, stated, however, that the notices of intention to abrogate would not be issued until after a decision was made by the Supreme Federal Tribunal respecting the constitutionality of the statute.

Brazilian Extradition Statute No. 2416, of June 28, 1911.

The President of the Republic of the United States of Brazil:

I make known that the National Congress has decreed and that I have sanctioned the following law:

Article I. The extradition of nationals and foreigners is permitted:

Section 1. The extradition of nationals will be conceded when, by law or treaty, the demanding country guarantees to Brazil reciprocity of treatment.

Section 2. Lack of reciprocity will not prevent extradition in the case of naturalization following the act which leads to the request of the country where the offense has been committed.

Article II. Extradition cannot be granted in the following cases:

Section 1. When the crime is not punishable, according to Brazilian law, by imprisonment of one year or more, including the attempt, the participation and the complicity;

Section 2. When the person to be extradited is being tried, or has already been condemned or acquitted, by the Judicial Power of Brazil, for the same infraction which has led to the patition.

infraction which has led to the petition;

Section 3. When the crime or the penalty has already [been?] prescribed according to the law of the demanding country.

Section 4. When the accused has to answer, in the country requesting extradition, before some judge or court of exception; Section 5. When the infraction is:

a) purely military:

b) against religion;

c) of the press;d) political.

The allegation of political ends or motives shall not prevent extradition when the deed constitutes principally an ordinary infraction of the penal law.

The Supreme Federal Tribunal in taking cognizance of the request shall particularly determine the nature of the infraction.

Extradition having been granted, delivery will not be made except on condition that the country requesting the extradition shall guarantee that a political end or motive shall not concur to aggravate the penalty.

Article III. When the accused, against whom the request has been made, is being tried or is subject to a prison penalty or other penalty consequent upon his trial, for another act committed in Brazil, his extradition will be decided in accordance with the stipulations of this law, but the delivery will be effected after the conclusion of the trial or the termination of the sentence.

Article IV. If the penalty, which the person to be extradited will incur, be that of death or corporal punishment, according to the laws of the demanding country, extradition will be granted only on condition that said penalty be commuted to one of imprisonment.

Article V. Extradition having been granted, the demanding country must agree not to charge the person extradited, except for an act or the acts for which his delivery is granted, unless, however, the accused freely and expressly consents to be tried for those other acts or if, when placed at liberty, he remains in the territory of the demanding State for a period exceeding one month.

Article VI. The demanding State may not, without the consent of the State of which the request is made deliver the extradited person to a third State which may claim him except under the last exception designated in the preceding article.

Article VII. In case requests for extradition are made by different countries for the same person, if involving the same infraction, the request of the country in whose territory the infraction was committed shall be preferred; in case other acts are involved, the request which has to do with the most serious infraction will be preferred; in case the infractions are of equal gravity, that State will be granted the preference which shall first have made the request In the last two cases extradition may be arranged for later defor delivery. livery to the other demanding countries.

Article VIII. Extradition shall be requested through diplomatic channels, the request being accompanied by a copy or authenticated statement of the sentence of condemnation or the warrant or the minutes of the criminal proceedings, issued by the proper judge. These documents must contain a precise description of the delinquency, the place and date on and in which it was committed, and must be accompanied by copies of the texts of the laws applicable to the crime.

Article IX. The Minister for Foreign Affairs will transmit the request to the Minister of the Interior who will take steps looking to the arrest of the person to be extradited and for his appearance before the Supreme Federal Tribunal.

Sole Section. In urgent cases, provisional arrest may be effected as a precautionary measure and the accused held for sixty days during which time the country making the request shall present to the country of which the request is made a formal demand duly authenticated.

Article X. No request for extradition will be granted without the previous decision of the Supreme Federal Tribunal as to the legality and propriety of the same.

Upon the arrest of the person to be extradited, all the documents referring to the petition shall be sent to the Supreme Federal Tribunal, from whose decision there shall be no appeal.

The person to be extradited, who will be brought before the Tribunal, may be accompanied by a lawyer, his defense being a denial that he is the person sought, formal defects in the documents presented, and as to the legality of the extradition

Article XI. If, within twenty days after the date of the granting of the extradition and notice to the effect that the person to be extradited is at the disposition of the demanding country, the diplomatic agent of the said country fail to place the fugitive in transit to the demanding country, the prisoner shall be set at liberty and never again subjected to arrest for the same cause of ex-

Article XII. After publication of this law its text shall be transmitted to all countries with which Brazil maintains relations and all treaties of extradition still in force shall be abrogated.

Article XIII. Brazilians, even out of the Republic, may be tried and sentenced when, in foreign lands, they commit any of the crimes:

a) Against the independence, integrity and dignity of the native land (Penal Code, articles 87, 92, 94, 98, 101, 102 and 104);

b) Against the Constitution of the Republic and the form of its government (Penal Code, Articles 107 and 108);

c) Counterfeiting (Penal Code, articles 239 and 243);

d) Forgery of securities of the Federal Government, of the States and of Banks (Penal Code, articles 245 and 250).

Section 1. The judgment against such criminals however become[s] effective only upon their return, of their own accord or by extradition, to the country.

Section 2. The trial and judgment of foreigners who shall have committed any of the crimes here enumerated shall only take place when the criminals, of their own accord or by force, shall have come into the country.

Article XIV. Either a national or a foreigner may be tried and judged in Brazil who, in foreign territory, commits a crime against a Brazilian which entails, according to Brazilian law, a penalty of two years at least.

Section 1. The trial of a national or foreigner shall be commenced only upon requisition by the Minister of the Interior or complaint of the offended party, when, in cases where extradition is permitted, such trial is not requested by the country in whose territory the infraction was committed.

Section 2. The trial and judgment of the crimes referred to in article 14 shall not take place when the criminals have already, in a foreign land, been acquitted, punished or pardoned for such crimes, or when the crime or punishment has already [been] prescribed according to a more favorable law.

The trial and judgment of crimes stipulated in article 13 shall not be obstructed by any decision or act whatever on the part of foreign authority.

Nevertheless, the time served in foreign countries for such crimes shall be computed in the term of imprisonment.

Section 3. The Federal judiciary is always the proper branch to deal with those crimes committed in foreign territory. Article XV. All provisions to the contrary are hereby revoked.

The Ambassador of Brazil to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

Brazilian Embassy, Washington, January 23, 1913.

HERMES R. DA FONSECA.

Mr. Secretary of State: According to instructions which I have received from my Government, I have the honor to inform your excellency that article 12 of Law No. 2416, of June 24, 1911, governing the extradition of citizens and foreigners tried for crimes committed outside of Brazil, provides that all extradition treaties concluded by Brazil with the various countries shall be terminated.

The new law, recently promulgated, is much more ample than any of the treaties in force, and under it the rule for reciprocity exists only in case of the surrender of citizens. The procedure now established in Brazil in connection with an application for extradition has also undergone a simplification. These applications will always be made through diplomatic channels, and in the way of documents serving as evidence of the crime, the only thing required will be a copy of authentic transcript of the convicting sentence or of the sentence or order in the criminal proceedings issued by the competent judge. The following points must be clearly stated: the crime committed, the place and date of commission, and a citation of the text of the criminal law applicable to the case in the country requesting the surrender of the criminal. It shall be the duty of the Supreme Federal Court to examine the documents presented and to decide as to the admissibility of the application.

The Brazilian Government, in view of the liberal provisions of this new law would appreciate it if, waiving the clause of article 13

(For. Rel. 1903, page 32) of the extradition treaty concluded by Brazil and the United States on May 14, 1897, in which it is stipulated that said treaty ". . . shall continue in force until six months after one of the contracting parties shall have notified the other of its intention to terminate it", the American Government would consider the said treaty as having ceased to exist for all intents and purposes from the date of the receipt of the present note.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 28, 1913.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 23rd of January, in which you state that your Government has enacted the law of June 28, 1911, which carries out its policy in regard to extradition better than existing treaties do and which involves the abrogation of all the extradition treaties to which Brazil is a party. You state that the Brazilian Government would appreciate it if the United States would waive the clause of its extradition treaty with Brazil which provides that the treaty shall continue in force until six months after one of the contracting parties shall have notified the other of its intention to terminate it, and would consider the treaty to have ceased to exist for all intents and purposes from the date of its receipt of your note.

In reply I regret to inform you that this Government has no power to waive the treaty requirement that six months' notice of an intention to terminate its extradition treaty with Brazil be given; and I beg to inquire whether your Government has not overlooked the fact that, if the treaty should be abrogated, the United States could not surrender a fugitive from Brazil upon the request of the Government of that country. As the United States is not able to grant extradition in the absence of a treaty, it is its practice not to request the surrender of a fugitive by a foreign government with which it has no extradition treaty.

The Ambassador of the United States at Rio de Janeiro has already had the honor to point out to your Government that a serious obstacle to the conclusion of a satisfactory extradition treaty between the two Governments exists in the provision of the Brazilian law mentioned above to the effect that, if the offense for which extradition is sought is punishable by death or corporal punishment, extradition shall be granted only on condition that the penalty be commuted to imprisonment. Other difficulties in framing an extradition treaty would be caused by the fact that the law contains no list of extraditable offenses, and by its provision that no request for extradition will be granted without a previous decision by the Supreme Federal Tribunal of Brazil as to its legality and propriety.

AMERICAN EMBASSY, Rio de Janeiro, July 27, 1913.

The extradition treaty between the United States and Brazil dated May 14, 1897, together with the protocols and annotations of May 28, 1898, and May 29, 1901, have been denounced by Executive decree dated July 23, 1913, published in the Official Gazette.

On July 30 I shall forward to the Department a printed copy of a draft extradition treaty framed in accordance with the Law of June 28, 1911 (enclosed with this Embassy's despatch No. 758 of August 28, 1911); the draft treaty was sent to the Embassy by the Foreign Office, to be submitted to the Department for consideration and such modifications as do not impair the principles of the Law of June 28, 1911. The purpose of Brazil is to adopt a form which all her extradition treaties shall henceforth follow.

AMERICAN EMBASSY, Rio de Janeiro, July 29th, 1913.

Sir: In amplification of my telegram of July 27th, which related to the recent publication in the Official Gazette of an executive decree denouncing our treaty of extradition with Brazil, signed on the 14th of May, 1897, together with the protocols and annexes of May 28th, 1898, and May 29th, 1901, I have the honor to report as follows:

The Embassy had received no information either from the Department or from the Brazilian Foreign Office that Brazil had in mind the denunciation of this treaty. It was, therefore, with surprise that I received a Foreign Office note, a translation of which forms the first enclosure of this despatch, in which I was informed that the Government of Brazil had determined to sanction and promulgate the law which the Brazilian Congress voted on the 28th of June, 1911, (a copy of which was enclosed with Mr. Dudley's despatch No. 758, of August 28th, 1911) which regulated the manner in which Brazilians and foreigners should be extradited as well as the mode of their trial when they should have committed crimes abroad enumerated in the body of the said law. The note also stated that the 12th clause of the law provided not only that its text should be transmitted to those countries which maintained relations with Brazil but also that all existing extradition treaties should be cancelled in order that those which hereafter should be negotiated might be uniform and might be framed in accordance with the provisions of the law.

¹The protocol of May 29, 1901, containing amendments to the treaty made by the United States Senate, was incorporated in the treaty at the time of its ratification, and has not been published separately; it was inclosed in Despatch No. 330 from the American Embassy, dated May 29, 1901.

I was also informed that these two provisions had already been carried into effect.

Moreover, the note went on to state:

The provisions of the law are sufficient in themselves to guarantee that in cases where the Government of Brazil shall address petitions for extradition to other countries, reciprocity in treatment of such petitions shall be afforded. Nevertheless, for the satisfactory settlement of details, it has been found convenient that new treaties shall be concluded.

In order to attain this end, I have drawn up the enclosed project, based upon the articles and principles established by the above-mentioned law. I ask Your Excellency to submit this project to your Government so that, after careful examination, it may express its opinion upon it, informing me whether it is acceptable in its present form or whether slight modifications should be inserted which would not be antagonistic to the said articles and principles of the law of June 28th, 1911.

Enclosed with this note was a printed draft of a treaty of extradition, a copy of which, together with the translation, I have the honor to enclose.

On the same day on which the above note reached the Embassy, the Diario Official printed an executive decree of the 23rd of July stating that the President of Brazil made public the fact that from that day he had denounced the treaty of extradition between Brazil and the United States, together with its protocols and annexes. A translation of the text of this decree is also herewith enclosed.

Beyond formally acknowledging the receipt of the above mentioned note, I have not communicated on the subject of the extradition treaty with the Foreign Office, preferring to await any instructions which you may see fit to give me.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS. Rio de Janeiro, July 22nd, 1913.

Mr. Ambassador: The Brazilian Government, with the intention of granting extradition petitions relating to criminals taking refuge in Brazil and coming from those countries with which Brazil has not yet negotiated treaties of extradition, has determined to sanction and promulgate, under No. 2416 and under date of June 28th, 1911, the law voted by the National Congress which regulated the manner in which Brazilians and foreigners shall be extradited as well as the mode of their trial when they shall have committed such crimes abroad as are enumerated in the body of the said law.

The 12th clause of this law provides not only that the text of the law shall be sent to all countries which maintain relations with Brazil but also that all existing extradition treaties shall be cancelled in order that any treaties which hereafter shall be negotiated may be uniform following the provisions of the above law. This has already been done.

The provisions of the law are sufficient in themselves to guarantee that in cases where the Government of Brazil shall address petitions for extradition to other countries, reciprocity in treatment of such petitions shall be afforded. Nevertheless, for the satisfactory settlement of details, it has been found convenient that new treaties shall be concluded.

In order to attain this end, I have drawn up the enclosed project, based upon the articles and principles established by the above mentioned law. Draft of an extradition treaty.

The President of the Republic of the United States of Brazil and_____ animated by a desire to prevent fugitive criminals from freely moving or finding an asylum within the territory of each of the High Contracting Parties, have agreed to celebrate the present Extradition Treaty, and for that purpose have nominated the following Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the Republic of the United States of Brazil____and Mr.___who, after having made known their respective full powers, which have been found in good and due form, agree upon the following articles:

Article 1.

The two High Contracting Parties mutually agree to deliver up to each other the criminals passing through their respective territories, or who have sought there an asylum, provided that the following conditions exist:

1.° That the party making the demand has the authority to prosecute and judge the crime or offense occasioning the demand;

2.° That the fault or crime perpetrated before or after the celebration of this Treaty be of an ordinary character;
3.° That the criminal shall have already been convicted or condemned as the principal culprit, a fellow culprit or accomplice;

4.° That the penalty to be inflicted or already inflicted by the laws of the country demanding the extradition be one year's imprisonment at least, both for the convicted persons and the condemned persons;

~5.° That the party making the demand shall exhibit documents which, according to the laws of said party and to those of the party to whom application is made shall prove the criminality of the person making the demand or justify his prosecution;

.The foregoing articles apply also to any attempt at the commitment of the crimes or offenses subject to extradition.

Article 2.

The High Contracting Parties shall in no case be obliged to surrender their own citizens, but should any of them be given up it will only be on the basis of complete reciprocity.

Article 3.

Extradition shall be refused:

When the crime or sentence shall have been extinguished by prescription according to the law of the country requesting the extradition or when the culprit shall have been already tried therein for the very crime to which the request refers;

2.° When it refers to purely military crimes, to crimes against religion, to crimes against the press, or political crimes and those of similar nature.

The allegation of a political purpose or motive shall not hinder the extradition when the offense is merely an ordinary infraction of criminal law;

The following are not considered political offenses:

a) Acts of anarchical character constituting crimes provided against by the laws of the Contracting States.

b) The murder or an attempt at murder against the Chief of the State demanding the extradition, against his legal substitutes and against his ministers of State or against any of the heads of the separate States forming part of a Confederation or against any of the Governors of the States which constitute a Federal State.

Article 4.

When, in order to prevent the escape of a criminal, one of the High Contracting Parties shall deem his provisional arrest urgent, as a preliminary measure to extradition, the party shall apply for extradition by telegraph or by post or through a diplomatic agent stating at least, that a warrant for the apprehension of the demanded person has been issued or a writ of arrest in flagrante. This arrest shall hold for sixty days within which period the demanding Government shall present the formal demand for extradition duly evidenced.

Article 6.

Demands for provisional arrest and those for extradition shall be made by one Government to the other Government either directly or through their respective diplomatic agents and shall be accompanied by the following documents:

1.° În relation to the accused whose provisional arrest is requested, a certified copy, at least, of the warrant of arrest or of the writ of imprisonment in flagrante.

2.° In relation to those criminals already convicted: a certified copy of the sentence or of the criminal prosecution from a competent judge and containing a precise statement of the acts charged, of the place where and the date when it was committed and a copy of the text of the penal law applicable to the special act.

3.° Whenever it be possible, the above stated documents shall be accompanied by a photograph, finger prints or the characteristic indications of the person whose surrender is asked.

In no case shall the request of the accused person be granted that he be delivered up to the State demanding him previous to the presentation of the required documents.

Article 6.

If the penalty incurred by the fugitive criminal be that of death or corporal punishment, the extradition shall be granted by Brazil only on the condition that it be commuted by the competent authorities to that of imprisonment.

Article 7.

Except in the case of death of the person whose surrender is requested, and of desistance on the part of the requesting Government the provisional arrest and the extradition already granted shall be ineffective in the following cases:

1.° If within sixty days from the date of the provisional arrest of the criminal, the documents supporting the request for extradition in due form and duly certified to being not presented by the demanding Government.

2.° If the criminal, when placed at the disposal of the demanding State, Legation or Consulate, be not removed within twenty days of the date of the advice thereof.

3.° If within sixty days of the date of the provisional arrest, the prisoner shall apply for and obtain a writ of habeas-corpus

In any of the aforesaid cases the person discharged from custody shall not be arrested again for the crime which caused the request for extradition.

Article 8.

The delivery of a person whose surrender is requested shall be postponed without any injury to its effectiveness:

a) While the procedure in regard to habeas-corpus is going on;

b) When serious disease does not permit the criminal without danger to his life to be removed to the demanding country;

c) When the person whose extradition is requested be under penal prosecution in the demanded State.

Article 9.

When an application for extradition, made by one of the High Contracting Parties be considered by the other Party as unacceptable because it is not in due form or on account of the insufficiency of the documents presented, these documents shall be returned to the former, the reasons being stated which have prevented the progress of the procedure.

In this case, a new application may be made in due form.

Article 10.

Relative to the procedure for application for extradition, and to the legitimacy of such procedure, the admission and consideration of the objections by which it may be impugned by the fugitive criminal demanded, shall proceed in conformity with the legal proceedings and practices in force in the said country.

To the fugitive criminal, however, there remains the right of restoring to habeas-corpus or bail, according to the course established by the laws of the country from which the extradition is demanded.

Article 11.

Persons delivered through extradition shall not be tried or punished for political crimes previous to the extradition or for any acts in connection there-They may, however, with their free and declared consent, be tried and judged for common offenses liable to extradition in accordance with the present Treaty, and which have not been the reason for extradition previously granted, but they shall not be delivered to the third Power demanding them without the consent of the State from which the extradition is asked.

This consent shall not be necessary, if after having been pardoned or having completed the term of sentence the person remains for more than one month in the territory of the State requesting extradition.

Article 12.

When several powers request the delivery of the same person for the same crime, the country in the territory of which the crime was committed shall have precedence; if several crimes have been committed, the request dealing with the grayest crime shall be first conceded, at the discretion of the Government from whom extradition is requested; if the crime be of equal gravity and committed at different dates, the request first presented shall have the preference, but if all requests have the same date, the Government applied to shall decide to which of the demanding States the criminal shall be delivered.

Article 13.

A criminal who, after having been surrendered to the demanding State, shall succeed in escaping the course of justice and shall seek asylum again in the territory of the State from which extradition was demanded or pass across it, shall be detained through direct requisition or by diplomatic intervention and delivered up again, without further formalities.

Article 14.

The Power from which extradition was demanded shall convey the criminal to the harbour or locality most convenient for his embarkation or delivery to the agents who are to receive him.

The demanded Government may however, at the request of the demanding Government send one or more agents either of the military or police force, to guard the criminal, until he reaches his destination. In this case, the demanding Government shall defray the travelling expenses of its agents.

Article 15.

The expenses incurred in the arrest, maintenance and extradition of the criminal up to the date of his delivery or disembarkation shall be borne by the State from which the extradition be demanded; after that, they shall be borne by the demanding State.

Article 16.

All articles, valuables or documents having any connection with the crime which causes the extradition and found in the possession of the criminal at the time of his arrest or in his luggage, shall be seized and delivered together with the criminal to the demanding State:

The articles or valuables in possession of third persons shall also be seized but shall only be delivered to the demanding State after the claims raised by their owners have been decided.

Article 17.

One of the High Contracting Parties shall permit a criminal delivered up by a third Power to the other Party to be conveyed in custody across its territory or over its territorial waters, except if the criminal be a native of the country to be crossed or in case the criminal in question be one covered by this Treaty.

For the same purpose a simple notification containing the request for permission of transit and the designation of the offense occasioning the extradition shall be sufficient.

Article 18.

When, in a non-political criminal case, the testimony or summoning of witnesses resident or in transit through the territory of one of the High Contracting Parties be necessary for the evidence of a procedure, the other shall make demand through diplomatic or consular channels. That testimony shall be furnished in a rogatory letter coming from competent authority and accompanied by a translation in the language of the country where it shall be carried out.

The expenses connected with those criminal documents shall be borne by the State receiving them.

Article 19.

The present Treaty shall be in force for an undetermined period, and shall continue in force one year after one of the High Contracting Parties shall have notified the other of any intention to denounce it.

It shall be ratified and the ratifications exchanged at Rio de Janeiro or at after the legal formalities be fulfilled in each of the two countries.

In witness whereof, the above mentioned Plenipotentiaries sign the present Treaty in duplicate, written in the Portuguese and _____ language and thereunto affixing their seals in the city of Rio de Janeiro, this _____ day of _____.

Decree denouncing the treaty.

Official Gazette, July 25th, 1913.

Decree No. 10,355, of the 23rd of July, 1913, published the denunciation of the treaty of extradition of criminals signed in Rio de Janeiro between Brazil and the United States of America on the 14th of May, 1897, and the protocols and annexes of the 28th of May, 1898, and the 29th of May, 1911.¹ The President of the Republic of the United States of Brazil makes public that from today the Treaty of Extradition of Criminals, signed in Rio de Janeiro between Brazil and the United States of America on the 14th of May, 1897, and the protocols and annexes of the 28th of May, 1898, and the 29th of May, 1911, has

No. 78.7

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 29, 1913.

Sir: The Department has received your No. 224, of July 29th last, reporting on the subject of the Brazilian law concerning extradition of criminals between foreign nations and Brazil.

In January last the Brazilian Ambassador wrote to the Department stating that the Brazilian Government had enacted a law (of June 28, 1911), a copy of which he subsequently transmitted to the Department, which he stated carried out the policy of that Government in regard to extradition better than existing treaties do, and which involved the abrogation of all existing extradition treaties with Brazil. He stated that his Government would appreciate it if the United States would waive the stipulations of article 13 of the treaty between the United States and Brazil of May 14, 1897, requiring six months' notice of intention to terminate the treaty, and consider the treaty as having ceased to exist for all intents and purposes from the day of the receipt of his note.

The Department replied to the Ambassador, under date of February 28, last, stating that this Government has no power to waive the treaty requirement of six months' notice of intention to terminate its provisions. The Department in its note called attention to the fact that if the treaty should be abrogated the United States could not surrender a fugitive upon the request of the Government of Brazil. Other serious objections to the proposed Brazilian law were also pointed out. A copy of the Department's note is transmitted herewith for your information. No reply was received to the Department's note but it appears from your despatch, and its enclosure, that the Brazilian Government considers its communication of January 23 last as notice by the Government of its intention to terminate the treaty, the Diario Official having printed an executive decree, dated July 23, declaring that the President of Brazil had denounced the treaty.

It is stated in the note of the Brazilian Foreign Office that the "provisions of the law referred to are sufficient in themselves to guarantee that, in cases where the Government of Brazil shall address petitions for extradition to other countries, reciprocity in treatment of such petitions shall be afforded." "Nevertheless," the note continues, "for the satisfactory settlement of details it has been found convenient that new treaties shall be concluded."

The Foreign Office transmitted to you a project of an extradition treaty, said to be based upon the articles and principles established by the law referred to, and asked you to submit it to this Government, "so that after careful consideration it may express its opinion upon it, informing me (the Brazilian Foreign Minister) whether it is acceptable in its present form, or whether slight modifications should be inserted which would not be antagonistic to the said articles of the law of June 28, 1911."

A careful examination has been made of this project, and it is found to contain provisions which render it unacceptable to this Government as the basis of a treaty between the two countries. The most conspicuous of these provisions are the following:

1. Article 6, which provides that, if the penalty incurred by the fugitive criminal be that of death or corporal punishment, extradition shall be granted by Brazil only on the condition that the penalty be commuted by the competent authorities to that of imprisonment.

The objections of this Government to such a provision as this were very fully set forth in the correspondence in 1910, at which time the Brazilian Congress was considering the extradition law. (See instruction No. 183, of January 21, 1910, and the accompanying memorandum.)

2. The project contains no list of offenses for which extradition is to be granted, but provides generally for extradition for all offenses the penalty for which is one year's imprisonment or more.

It is probable that this provision might yield to negotiation more readily than that first enumerated.

The Department would be glad to find some common ground upon which an extradition treaty between the two countries may be concluded, but fails to perceive such ground in the rigid provisions of the Brazilian law or project.

PROPOSAL BY BRAZIL OF A SPECIAL AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES REGULATING THE PROSECUTION OF COUNTERFEITERS WHEN NOT SUBJECT TO EXTRADITION.

[Translation.]

BRAZILIAN EMBASSY, Washington, October 31, 1913.

Mr. Secretary of State: Law No. 2416, of June 28, 1911, of Brazil, besides regulating the extradition of criminals, lays down (articles 13 and 141) the rules required for the prosecution and trial of nationals, and, in part, of aliens when they commit abroad any of the crimes mentioned in the aforesaid law.

The crimes of counterfeiting money, securities and credit paper of the Federal Government, States and Banks are included among those that come under the jurisdiction of the Federal courts (paragraphs c and d of article 13).

While Brazilian criminals, when absent from the territory of the Nation, may be prosecuted until sentenced (Article 13) foreign criminals can only be prosecuted and tried when they come to Brazil, freely or under duress.

In consequence of this—and of the impunity enjoyed by counterfeiters of Brazilian money, securities and credit paper who are out of Brazil, if because the case affects foreign money, the local law should be incompetent to prosecute and try:

1. when they never return or come to Brazil;

2. when the Govenment of the country where the offense was committed refuses to surrender its nationals, the offender being one of EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 31st of October by which you inform me that your Government desires that the judicial situation between the two countries, as set forth by you, regarding the immunity from prosecution and trial enjoyed by counterfeiters of Brazilian money, securities and paper credit, who are out of Brazil, be made known to the Department and that you be advised whether there are in the general legislation or any special law of the United States provisions for the prosecution and trial of counterfeiters of foreign money and credit paper; including seals and adhesive stamps. You add that, even should such provisions exist, your Government wishes to know whether this Government would be disposed to enter with it into a special agreement regulating the prosecution and trial of such counterfeiters, when not subject to extradition.

In reply I beg to say that provision is made in the general laws of the United States for the prosecution and punishment of any person who "within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, with intent to defraud," counterfeits bonds, certificates, obligations or other securities of any foreign government, or any Treasury note, bill or promise to pay issued by such foreign government intended to circulate as money. A copy of the Revised Penal Code of the United States, approved March 4, 1909, is transmitted to you and your particular attention is invited to the provisions of sections 156 to 161 (chapter seven thereof). No treaty agreement would be required to secure the prosecution and trial of Brazilians or other foreigners violating the provisions of these laws.

As the territorial theory of crime obtains in the United States, it would not be practicable for this Government to enter into a treaty arrangement with the Brazilian Government providing for the prosecution of persons for committing in Brazil the crimes of counterfeiting.

VALORIZATION OF COFFEE.

File No. 832.61333/76.

The Acting Attorney General to the Secretary of State.

[Extract.]

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., July 12, 1911.

Sir: Will you kindly give formal authority to your Mr. Joseph J. Slechta, Vice and Deputy Consul General of the United States at Rio de Janeiro, to give to this Department, and particularly to Mr. William T. Chantland, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, who has the matter in charge, all the facts and information he has relative to the Brazilian coffee valorization scheme.

Very respectfully,

J. A. FOWLER.

File No. 832.61333/76.

The Secretary of State to the American Vice Consul General at Rio de Janeiro.

[Extract.]

Department of State, Washington, July 20, 1911.

Sir: I inclose a copy of a letter received from the Department of Justice, together with a copy of this Department's reply thereto, relating to the subject of information which the Department of Justice desires you to furnish concerning the Brazilian coffee valorization scheme.

You are instructed to furnish to the Department of Justice such information as may be in your possession, when called upon by that Department.

I am [etc.]

For Mr. Knox:

Senate Doc. No. 36, 63d Cong., 1st Sess.

Report of Wm. T. Chantland, Special Assistant to the Attorney General.

> DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, September 6, 1911.

Hon. J. A. Fowler,

Assistant to the Attorney General.

Sir: On July 11, 1911, I submitted a report on coffee valorization. Further consideration has only strengthened the conclusions therein reached. As indicated by you to me personally, I submit herewith a somewhat more detailed report of the transactions and facts.

The world now consumes a million and a half bags of coffee, of 60 kilos each, per month, or 198,000,000 pounds of coffee per month, or 18,000,000 bags, with a total of over two and one-third billion pounds of coffee per year. Of this, the United States consumes 40 per cent of the entire amount, or about 80,000,000 pounds per month, or 950,000,000 pounds per year. Therefore each cent of rise in the price of coffee maintained throughout a year means over nine and one-half million dollars tax on the people of the United States. A 6-cent rise in the price of coffee means $57,000,000 per year, or about 60 cents for every man, woman, and child in the United States. During valorization the price of coffee has more than doubled, and the rise exceeds 6 cents.

For the coffee year from July 1, 1910, to June 30, 1911, the world's crop of coffee for the first time fell far below the world's consumption. It was fourteen and one-half million bags, or a shortage of three and one-half million bags on the world's consumption for the year. Of the world's coffee the Republic of Brazil produces from 80 to 85 per cent, and of the Brazilian coffee the great bulk is produced in the two large States of São Paulo and Rio.

It will appear clearly, therefore, that anything which affects coffee in Brazil must immediately be felt in the United States, which consumes 40 per cent of all the world's coffee and which buys and consumes from 80 to 85 per cent of the Brazilian coffee. In 1906–7 the world's crop of coffee was unusually large, being estimated at about 22,000,000 bags. The Minister of Finance of the State of São Paulo, Olavo Egydio de Sousa Aranha, conceived or stood sponsor for a plan as to coffee, something like the once proposed populistic plan of making wheat the standard of value. This coffee plan has become known as the "Valorization of coffee," and the State reports, published at length on it, are spoken of as "Transactions in the defense of coffee."

"Valorization," as defined in the consular reports of our consul, means to give, by law, a fictitious or artificial value above or apart from the normal or ordinary market value. That the sole intent of the valorization plan from its conception and inception was to artificially enhance the price of the staple, coffee, above its natural or market price, there is now no longer any room for doubt, and I do not see that there ever should have been any real question on that score. What other object can either excuse or explain the attempt, let alone justify it?

That the desired objects have been attained pari passu with the dreams of their originators is also now apparent. However, there are still some who profess to think that natural causes and not valorization are responsible for the recent rise and doubling in the price of coffee.

On the questions both of the intention and result of the valorization plan, as a plan to raise the price of coffee, let us overlook for a moment Minister Egydio's naive disclaimer of any further interest on the part of his Government in the plan, as set forth in his cable of April 1, 1919, referred to later on in this report, and quote from his last official report relating to valorization, made to his Government under date of September 30, 1910, in which he says:

There is no foundation whatsoever to the suggestion which has sometimes been made that the benefits which followed the Government's (in valorization) action were due simply to natural causes and were not in any way influenced by such action.

What happened was just the contrary, as may be verified by examining the following table, showing the figures for the crops of four years preceding and of four years succeeding the Government's intervention.

Then follow the tables and statements that show that, despite larger average crops and greater than anticipated following the intervention, the market price has steadily risen. It seems that the planters were able to increase their yield without increase in area more than had been anticipated, for a term of years at least. But be that as it may, the potent resulting and conclusive fact remains as he states it, that in spite of the fact of such increase in quantity, the partial corner, maintained by the State for itself, its committee members, and financiers, did unnaturally enhance the price just as set out.

Let the editor of the Brazilian Review, who was against the plan to begin with, from economic reasons, as a Brazilian, offer his testimony as to the object and result of the plan from the South American standpoint.

The action of the São Paulo Government in promoting valorization has been condemned because it succeeded, against all expectations, in putting up prices and so, incidentally, raising the cost of coffee to consumers.

Surprising as it may seem, this was indeed the very end and aim of its existence.

Here again is good testimony of what the aim and result was and is.

The law and declared policy in the United States is that value shall be the result only of natural market conditions of supply and demand and competition, and that anything which seeks to and does fix prices artificially at a different level is frowned upon and made illegal in most States by statute, and illegal by Federal statute where such artificially fixed prices are the direct result of some restraint upon interstate commerce if produced as a result of any contract or combination or conspiracy. Likewise, section 73 of the Wilson Tariff Act of August 27, 1894, which is still in force, specifically provides:

That every combination, conspiracy, trust, agreement, or contract is hereby declared to be contrary to public policy, illegal, and void, when the same is made by or between two or more persons or corporations either of whom is engaged in importing any article from any foreign country into the United States, and when such combination, conspiracy, trust, agreement, or contract is intended to operate in restraint of lawful trade, or free competition in lawful trade or commerce, or to increase the market price in any part of the United States of any article or articles imported or intended to be imported into the United States, or of any manufacture into which such imported article enters or is intended to enter. Every person who is or shall hereafter be engaged in the importation of goods or any commodity from any foreign country in violation of this section of this act, or who shall combine or conspire with another to violate the same, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof in any court of the United States such person shall be fined in a sum not less than $100 and not exceeding $5,000, and shall be further punished by imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, for a term not less than 3 months nor exceeding 12 months.

This being the law, the quotations above set out are proof, both by official report and common knowledge, of its intended and actual violation. And this Government should not sit by supinely and see its people imposed on by coffee traders, financiers, and others who are operating to help out a foreign country in direct violation of our own

To make effective this plan of coffee valorization it was necessary to have the aid of powerful financiers, and conditions demanded by them had to be met. As Minister Egydio puts it, in his cable of April 1, 1909, measure "created by exigency (demand) of the bank ers," but which "the Government is negotiating with them to replace it by another more acceptable to the markets." This report is only interested with such financiers so far as they may be citizens of the United States.

At the beginning several agreements were entered into between the three Brazilian States of Rio, Minas Geraes, and São Paulo, in accordance with which edicts were published to make the agreements effective, which contained among their provisions one for the curtailment and restriction by law of further coffee planting "by a sufficiently high tax," while the three States should mutually agree. These laws are still effective, and the additional planting of coffee trees stopped in 1906. Naturally when the planting was stopped every owner of coffee trees tried to make those which he had planted and growing produce to the utmost, and they were attended to properly, with the one good result that the quality of coffee grown was probably bettered. However, when the limited production thus made possible had been reached, the increase in the production of coffee must stop. On the other hand, the world's consumption of coffee has steadily increased. Thus there would come a time-and it has already arrived-when coffee consumption annually exceeds coffee production. And when such a condition of affairs arrives and continues for a time, as it soon will, it is apparent that any man, or group of men, or financiers, who control any appreciable percentage of the world's visible supply of coffee are in a position to exact any price they desire for what they have on hand. In other words, if such have not a complete corner, they have at least such power of undue restraint over the market and coffee trade as to be able to arbitrarily control and fix the price of coffee. This exact contingency was foreseen and calculated on in the conception of the valorization plan. Whether the financiers and their coffee-trading associates took any active steps to induce the making of these restrictive laws or not, the fact remains that such laws were either in existence and known at the time or enacted subsequently by demand of the bankers, and formed a part of the scheme of security by future enhancement of price under which the loans were made and accepted and made secure to the financiers.

The loans made in the so-called defense or valorization of coffee were as follows:

(1) Treasury notes of the State of São Paulo for £1,000,000, drawn

August 7, 1906, for one year, and yielding net £919,000.

(2) The first loan proper of £3,000,000, made jointly to the State of São Paulo by J. Henry Schroeder & Co., London, and the National City Bank, of New York, in the preliminary arrangements for which the National City Bank was represented by Mr. Herman Sielcken, as its authorized and accredited agent in London, the provisional contract for which was made December 8, 1906, the definitive contract made or signed December 14, 1906, and the contract of ratification signed February 14, 1907, for four years, on or before.

(3) The loan of £3,000,000 made by the Federal Government of Brazil, under contract with N. M. Rothschild & Sons, through the agency of Eugene J. J. Hollender, jr., January 28, 1908.

(4) The final loan, completing the so-called valorization, in the sum of £15,000,000, made by the combined bankers to the State of São Paulo, and guaranteed by the Federal Government of Brazil, to run 10 years to January 1, 1919, and to be used, as stated in article 3 of the law and decree announcing it, under date of August 25, 1908, "For the completion of the measures necessary for the defense of coffee, and for the conversion into a consolidated debt of the various temporary operations undertaken with the same object in view."

Inasmuch as the treasury or exchequer bills issued and the £3,000,000 Schroeder-City National Bank loan were both paid out of subsequent loans, so that as to that £4,000,000 they were renewals, it is therefore fair to say that the gross amount of funds at any time available under the various loans was not exceeding £18,000,000, less the discount and cost of floating, and the expense incurred by the State must therefore properly be figured on such net sum. In fact, the largest amount of coffee purchased by the State and on hand at any one time, it appears, was 8,474,623 bags, at a total cost of £17,227,213, based on an average cost, as shown in various transactions, of 7.7 cents per pound.

According to the report of Egydio, the minister of finance, dated September 30, 1910, these loans have already cost the State of São Paulo in expenses and charges of various kinds, to use his own language, "difference of types of various loans (discounts), freights, insurances, buying and selling commissions, interest on advances, warehousing charges, collection and remittance fees, and other expenses in connection with State-owned coffee," 156,273,158,$084, or over $50,000,000 gold. In other words, on a gross amount available to the State of less than $90,000,000, the expense has already been over $50,000,000, a sum for expense so out of proportion with the money procured for the use of the State or its purposes that my fixed conviction is that the plan, to have its full real designation, should be called "The valorization of coffee, or the exploitation of a State."

Under the valorization plan purchase of coffee for the account of the government of São Paulo was begun August 20, 1906, through several banking and coffee firms, among them Crossman & Sielcken, of New York City, a partnership composed of George W. Crossman and Herman Sielcken. (Vol. 1, p. 75.)

As to the general plan of the loans to be made and the security to be exacted, I am informed by Vice Consul Slechta that Mr. Frank H. Vanderlip was the active agent, who had prior knowledge and part in the transactions, representing the American bankers.

The laws and decrees under which the purchase and control of coffee by the State of São Paulo and the coffee committee was acquired contain the following provisions:

ARTICLE 6. The contracting Governments obligate themselves to create a surtax of 3 francs, subject to increase or reduction, upon each bag of coffee exported from any of the (contracting) States, and also to keep in force the laws which hinder, by a sufficiently high tax, the increasing of the areas planted with coffee in their territories, for a period of two years, which may be prolonged by mutual agreement. (Agreement of Aug. 6, 1906, between States of Rio de Janeiro, Minas Geraes, and São Paulo.)

Law No. 1127, of August 25, 1908, contains the following provisions:

ARTICLE 1. Upon the coffee which leaves the State and which exceeds 9,000,000 bags during the current crop year, which began on the 1st July, pp., 9,500,000 bags during the crop year beginning July 1, 1909, and 10,000,000 bags during the following years, an additional tax of 20 per cent ad valorem will be collected in the manner prescribed by the laws in force.

ARTICLE 2. The surtax created by article 29 of law No. 984, of the 29th December, 1905, and which will apply to all the coffee which leaves the State, is hereby increased to 5 francs, or their equivalent in (Brazilian) currency, calculated at the official rate of exchange of the day.

ARTICLE 3. The State Government is authorized to contract a loan immediately, abroad, for a maximum of fifteen million pounds sterling, the product of said loan to be used for the completion of the measures necessary for the defense of coffee, and for the conversion into a consolidated debt of the various temporary credit operations undertaken with the same object in view.

1a. The loan to be contracted will have, in addition to the general guarantees, a special guarantee in the coffee which the State has acquired and still possesses, and in the product of the surtax referred to in the preceding article.

2a. The product of the sales of coffees of the State, which shall take place opportunely, shall be applied to the amortization of the loan contracted by virtue of the present authorization. (Vol. 2, pp. 3–4.)

By decree No. 1661, of September 12, 1908, the President of the State of São Paulo published, among other things, the following regulations relating to said tax:

ARTICLE 1. (The same as article 1 of the previous law—of 25th August, 1908, with the following additional paragraph.) The said additional tax of 20 per cent ad valorem shall be collected together with the export duty of 9 per cent imposed by previous laws, and with the tax of 5 frames.

ARTICLE 2. (The same as article 2 of the law of 25th August, 1908, but "upon each bag of 60 kilos that leaves the State.")

ARTICLE 3. The duties to which the present regulations apply shall be collected by the State customs office in Santos upon all coffees presented for shipment, the method of collecting being the same as up to the present. (Vol. 2, p. 5.)

By a special contract executed in London, December 11, 1908, the entire conduct of the valorization scheme for the benefit of the State and the financiers, was intrusted to a committee of seven members, of which Herman Sielcken, of the firm of Crossman & Sielcken, New York City, who had originally represented the National City Bank as its authorized agent in the negotiations for the three million pounds loan of 1906, was and is yet the American member.

Among the duties of the committee are those relating to the sale of the valorized coffee, as follows:

Liquidate the stocks of coffee in the name and for account of the Government of S. Paulo, by means of public auctions or sealed proposals, viz: 500,000 bags in 1909-10, 600,000 bags in 1910-11, 700,000 bags in 1912-13, and thereafter 700,000 bags per year.

Beyond these minimum quantities, and at any time before the beginning of the obligatory sales, the committee may furnish to the trade such quantities as it may require, taking as a basis the price of 47 francs per 50 kilos for good average, and 50 francs for Havre type superior. (Vol. 2, pp. 395-396.)

In the agreement relative to the committee dated London, December 11, 1908, made between representatives of all the bankers having to do with the loan and the Government of São Paulo, article 2 is as follows:

A. The Government of São Paulo now obligates itself to offer for sale, through the committee, at public auctions or by sealed proposals, at the price of the day, preferably during the last six months of the coffee crop, i. e., from January to June 30: 500,000 bags in 1909-10, 600,000 bags in 1910-11, 700,000 bags in 1912-13, etc., and 700,000 bags each following year.

B. In consequence the Government expressly concedes to the committee full and irrevocable power to determine the times of sale, the minimum obligatory quantities above mentioned, the markets in which to sell, and to make the sales in the name of the Government, exercise control over the transactions, and generally to do what is required.

C. Beyond and within the minimum quantities fixed by these figures, and at any time before the beginning of the obligatory sales, the trade may always have at its disposal the quantities which it requires at a price not lower than 47 francs per 50 kilos for good average and 50 francs for Havre type superior. The additional quantity may equal in each year the minimum obligatory quantity.

D. Should this quantity not be sufficient for the needs of the trade, the committee shall also stipulate, in agreement with the Government, the price to be asked for the additional quantity.

E. In case that, through the effect of the preceding clause, the sales should exceed the quantities annually provided for, the committee may postpone the later minimum sales if the state of the market and the statistical situation appear to warrant such delay, but only to the extent of the sales actually made in anticipation.

F. All the sales shall be made by the committee in the name of the Government of São Paulo, under the rules for public auctions or sealed proposals; the notes of advice shall be sent to the committee, but for the State of São Paulo.

(Vol. 2, pp. 399-400.)

Articles 10 and 11 thereof are as follows:

ARTICLE 10. The Government having decreed a law imposing an additional tax of 20 per cent upon all coffees exported from the State of São Paulo in excess of 9,000,000 bags during the year June 30, 1908-9, in excess of 9,500,000 bags during the year ending June 30, 1910, and in excess of 10,000,000 bags during any year after July 1, 1910, it hereby obligates itself not to revoke nor to modify this law as long as the said bonds are in circulation and not redeemed.

ARTICLE 11. In addition to this the Government obligates itself to decree any new law that may become necessary to guarantee that the limitation of exports will be strictly observed. (Vol. 2, p. 402.)

Under such restrictive agreements and legislative measures, enacted by the "exigency of the bankers," did the committee members accept trusteeship or agency, and actively work to carry out the intended enhancement of price of that important item of import, coffee, and accomplish thereby under such agreements the resulting restraint of trade therein, into and among the several States of the United States, in violation both of the Sherman Antitrust Act and of section 73 of the Wilson bill.

In plain English, this whole thing looks like a plan devised in the apparent interest of São Paulo and Brazil, but, in fact, carried out to the great glory and financial profit of Baron Schroeder, the National City Bank, and their subsequently allied banks, and accomplished through the probably honest, patriotic motives and sense of São Paulo's financial minister, Egydio Aranha, who, in his official reports, sets out enthusiastically how it all happened, and how they were able to pay loan after loan by making new loans, each one larger and each negotiated at a greater disadvantage, discount, and loss to the State, and, consequently, a resulting new and bigger profit to the eminent international financiers and their coffee-trade friends.

Under this much vaunted scheme of finance, whereby the most ready cash or credit that was available to the borrowing State was not over $80,000,000 at any one time, and against which expense charges of all kinds in the aggregate of over $50,000,000 have already been collected in the way of taxes, etc., and paid out, there was still outstanding and unpaid about $64,000,000 on last January 1, according to the official reports. I can not see the great cause for rejoicing or for hailing the master mind who conceived this expensive plan as the great patriot of São Paulo. I can see reasons for it from the standpoint of the financiers and the committee members who now seem to be juggling the supply to suit themselves and to enhance their fortunes.

If there might be those who would conjure up any halos for those members of the committee, let me cite them to the action of the committee as officially reported by themselves of their meeting of April 27, 1909, wherein "the committee, after careful consideration of all interests, is of opinion that the proposed change of the law is desirable," which proposed the "replacement of the existing law limiting the export of coffee by a new law creating an extra duty of 10 per cent on all exports of coffee, payable in kind, such coffee to be destroyed under the control of the committee," and which went so far as to consider whether said coffee should be burned or carried out on shipboard and dropped into the sea.

Speculation as to whether, without valorization, the jobbing price of coffee would now be higher, as some opine, is purposeless to this inquiry, because without valorization and attendant restrictions upon the areas of cultivation, the conditions as to supply can not now be known, but the normal guess would be that the supply would now be ample; that is, that the increase in acreage of cultivation would have kept pace with the increase in consumption in coffee as it does in most matters, instead of having ceased at reaching the limit under trees recently planted and their better cultivation, as reported. And it is not sound argument on that side to say that valorization saved the planters from ruin and the plantations from going into the hands of the bankers. It is but common experience that what goes into the hands of bankers is only under their greater keenness to have their property and plantations well and fully cared for and cultivated.

Likewise, other planters would naturally have been diverted to the development of new plantations. We, however, have only to deal with the situation as it is, with the crop area restricted, the utmost limit of production thereon reached, and the consumption steadily increasing. Already have we this year reached a situation where the world's production is considerably less than its consumption; and where the visible supply of coffee on June 8 of the present year was only 11,885,000 bags, as against a visible supply on December 1, 1909, of 17,555,000 bags. Thus, at this moment, the surplus from the big 1906–7 crop has already been absorbed, and the visible supply is back to the average before that, when the consumption was much smaller than now, and when the trade proper owned all of the coffee, whereas now the so-called valorization committee, representing the international banking interests, holds surely 5,100,000 bags, and probably more nearly 6,000,000 bags, in its control, and the trade proper has only the remaining 6,000,000 bags. In other words, approximately half of the world's small visible supply is now in the control of the valorization committee, composed of the strongest and most powerful coffee men and their allies and the financiers back of The mere suggestion of this fact must make it apparent how thoroughly at the mercy of this valorization committee is the price of our coffee. Add to this condition the fact that valorization has still more than seven years to run, with continual increase of consumption and no prospect for any large increase in production—at least within seven years, as it takes six full years for new trees, if any were planted immediately, to bear any substantial amount of coffeeand the danger and iniquity of the situation and the power of the valorization committee appalls.

I have said that in stead of the valorization committee controlling 5,100,000 bags, which is the official showing to-day, they probably control nearer 6,000,000 bags. I base that conclusion on the following state of facts: Crossman & Sielcken, of New York City, the American agents of the valorization committee, and even the Brazilian Government, in answer to a direct official inquiry properly made, positively refuse to say to whom the April, 1911, sales of valorized coffee were The trade, up to the present time, can discover no evidence that any substantial amount of it has been withdrawn from the New York Dock Co.'s warehouses, or other warehouses, for consumption. Outside of a few small lots to interior roasters and jobbers, there is no information available, or even circumstantial evidence, that any of this coffee has really gone out of their hands. Moreover, there has come to light recently what the trade knows as a "restrictive contract," namely, a contract used by these valorization agents in selling coffee which forbids the coffee purchased to be used in filling contracts on the coffee exchange. This is rather a subtle scheme, particularly inasmuch as these restrictive sales are made at a fraction under the exchange prices. At first blush it would appear, therefore, that this was entirely legitimate and even a process beneficial to the general consuming public. However, when we recall that the present price is partially an artificial one, based on the holding up and holding back by these same people of one-half of the world's visible supply of coffee, it will be seen that it amounts to nothing more than fractional underselling in small quantities under their own artificially enhanced and created price, with the very purpose of not breaking that artificial price.

The members of the committee, and the financiers for whom they are agents, are certainly day by day and year by year restraining trade in coffee by holding out these 6,000,000 bags. Moreover, the very essence of this plan, in which they engaged and are engaging was to valorize or cause an artificial, or fixed, or made price on coffee,

Again, the committee and those in control of the coffee are not even true to their trust so far as the State of São Paulo is concerned, because their minister of finance cabled the Brazilian ambassador here. at the time of the attempt to place a proposed import duty on coffee by Congress in 1909, to the effect that all of the coffee could be sold when it had reached the price of 47 francs per bag of 50 kilos, or the equivalent 56.4 francs per bag of 60 kilos. Instead of that, they are now holding the coffee at a price far above that, the last sales, in April, having been made at about 73 to 75 francs per bag of 60 kilos.

The only good points, from the standpoint of the American public, in the plan are possibly the two following:

(1) It has steadied the market and prevented useless, reckless speculation. Whether the steadying and fixing of the market is a good thing is a question. The theory is, in this country, that the market should be open and unsteady, and inviting to free and open competition; so this may be a questionable benefit after all.

(2) It has probably improved the average quality of coffee, in that the restriction on planting made them cultivate more carefully.

The net results of the valorization appear to be:

(1) Large profits to the financiers.(2) Some net profit to the planters.

(3) None to the State; rather a loss because of the amount of revenue, the collection of which is called for and diverted, and, while the State's coffee is going up in price, yet it is probable that the interest, storage, and commission charges will eat that up before the end of the valorization scheme, January 1, 1919.

(4) The addition and piling of all these costs and advances on the coffee consumers.

(5) The restraint in trade caused by the carrying out of the plan.

(6) The enhancement of the price of the great article of common use imported chiefly from Brazil—coffee.

There has been substantial restraint, and attempts to enhance, and enhancement of the price in this matter by the following:

(1) The curtailment of production by stopping the additional planting and cultivation to keep pace with an increasing demand. This situation still exists.

(2) By systematically engaging in a campaign at big expense to make an increased demand in the face of a restricted production.

(3) By restraining exportation from Brazil under a heavy export tax, levied on the "exigency" or demands of the bankers who made the loan that made the scheme possible.

(4) By restraining exportation from Brazil by a levy of extra tax on all exports over a given quantity.

(5) By holding the valorization coffee out of the open market.

(6) By holding coffee even when way above the declared Government maximum price to be demanded of 47 francs per 50 kilo, or 56.4 francs per 60-kilo bag. The last sales were at 73 francs and 75 francs per 60 kilos.

And each of these things have been deliberately and designedly done, according to the official reports, with the one actuating motive and intent present from the very origin of the idea, namely, to increase the price of an article which some one or more of them were engaged in importing, to wit, coffee, in direct conflict with and in violation of the statutes of the United States, to wit, section 73 of the Wilson Act, elsewhere quoted—and this the law in the Nation which takes 80 to 85 per cent of their entire product, which they well knew, or should have known.

¹ Compare with the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of this report.

This purpose and these facts and this law the bankers well knew or should have known when they demanded certain restraints to make the intended result of increased price more certain.

In this declared purpose the bankers and their agents aided and abetted and participated when they took the bonds and made the loans to carry out this purpose to increase the price of this commodity of such common use in the United States that the people of the United States absorb 40 per cent of the entire world's supply.

In this violation of the law certain brokers joined in taking and holding certain portions of the stock of this coffee, for the purpose of assisting in the consummation of this plan to increase the price of an article in which they were engaged in importing.

Of a violation of this law the members of the so-called valorization committee, who are among the best-posted coffee men in the world, were and are guilty, but of them we can deal only with the American member, Mr. Herman Sielcken, who is now and has been since before this investigation was begun living out of the United States, to wit, on his estates in Baden-Baden.

When this investigation had developed far enough to find that one American citizen was a member of this committee, and had been since its organization, the question presented itself as to how he could be reached so as to stop his activities, and through him those of the committee so far as it dealt with the imports to the United States, when he did not appear as a party to the original contract between São Paulo and the other States and the bankers. This is not now a problem, because it appears that Mr. Herman Sielcken, of New York, the American member of the committee, appeared and acted for the National City Bank, as its "agent duly authorized in the city of London," representing it "for the purposes of this agreement" at the making of the first "definitive" agreement for the loan of the £3,000,000 on the 14th of December, 1906, and personally signed the said definitive agreement as the representative of said bank, and his firm also actively bought valorized coffee for São Paulo. We have him therefore present as the active tort feasor at the outset of the plan, and he can not escape the penalty of his act and subsequent acts in the plan by saying he committed the misdemeanor as the agent of another.

But he is more than agent, if that were necessary, which I believe it is not. He is the trustee, who has accepted the trusteeship in this country of the illegal plan and agreement and its subsequent or resulting bonding scheme, and all the demands for security made in the way of restricted exports and planting and cultivation with its resulting restraint upon imports into the United States and the consequent enhancement of prices upon such imports. He is the illegitimate trustee of the operations in this country of the illegal agreement or its results which are violative of section 73 of the act of August 27, 1894, and of which agreement the original contracting parties remain only the cestues qui trustent, while Mr. Sielcken and the other six committee members act, do, carry on, and carry out, a plan in violation both of the act of July 2, 1890, and particularly of section 73 of the act of August 27, 1894, "to increase the price of imports" in which they deal 80 or 85 per cent of which are to come to this country. Therefore said acts as [and?] criminal statutes can and do reach him in his accepted, adopted, and acting active capacity, as he must stand sponsor for his own torts or misdemeanors. He can not escape by setting up his representative capacity either as agent or as trustee ex malificio. If that were so, what a splendid opening for international criminal schemes through trustees and agents. His acts must stand by themselves as misdemeanors, no matter who inspired, or in reliance upon or through what contract they were brought into being. Were it otherwise, a criminal would always plead representative capacity, "Let me off and take my principals." Criminal law answers: "We will take and punish both principal and agent." Criminal laws are for deterrents as well as punishments. To take both principal and agent is the greater deterrent.

Section 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, provides—

That any property owned under any contract or by any combination, or pursuant to any conspiracy (and being the subject thereof) mentioned in section 73 of this act, and being in the course of transportation from one State to another, * * * shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law.

This is identical with section 6 of the Sherman Act. I have always wondered why section 6 has been invoked so little. It is my belief that when that act was framed, section 6 was designed to be the real effective deterrent, particularly to continuing violations. Moreover, its employment makes the Government's actions at the expense of the offenders, as they should be, and not a tax upon the people.

In this case I would recommend that, as a part of the proceedings, instructions be given to institute seizure and condemnation proceedings on the first valorization coffee to move in interstate commerce. I do not believe it would require but one such seizure to enable the Government to make terms as to the future handling and disposition of valorization coffee. It may be urged that such a proceeding might make international complications. I have thought of that. Suppose the situation was reversed and it was a commodity, a mere commercial trade commodity, of the United States that was being moved intraterritorially in some foreign country, in violation of its plain statutes. Is there any doubt what the upshot would be? I conceive The property would be seized at once. And what is more, the respect for the laws of other nations, particularly intraterritorially, which the comity of nations demands be observed, would leave the injured nation without either legal, equitable, or even moral grounds of complaint. I believe that I can safely make that assertion, even though I am not versed in international law.

Moreover, the Government of São Paulo, through the Brazilian Government, has officially disclaimed further interest in the valorization operations. In an official message to the secretary of the Brazilian embassy at Washington, sent for the purpose of influencing the official actions of the Congress of the United States, and sent through the Brazilian Government's official channels, the minister of finance of São Paulo, under date of April 1, 1909, said:

The Government of São Paulo is no longer engaged in any valorization operations and has ceased entirely with its intervention in the market with the signing of the 15,000,000 pounds sterling loan. All the coffee stock belonging to the State has been delivered to the committee of bankers authorized to sell it. The committee is obliged to sell, in accordance with the contract, at the market price and to the amount of 500,000 bags during the year 1909-10, 600,000 bags during the year 1910-11, and 700,000 bags during the year 1912-13, and an equal amount in the following years. The committee can, however, sell all or any coffee as soon as the price will reach 47 francs per 50 kilos of good average.

There is therefore no action of this Government to advance the price of coffee, as its whole stock can be sold within a few years at the market price. On the contrary, it limits the rise of the market to the maximum price of 47 francs (equivalent to 56.4 francs per ordinary bag of 60 kilos), by which all stock can be sold at once, that price being hardly sufficient to cover the cost of production in the finest coffee zones of this State.

And then, in order that there might be no question at all as to the State's disinterestedness, he proceeds with his disclaimer by putting the burden of causing the export duty to be levied by his State on coffee upon the bankers who financed the scheme, as follows:

The taxes collected by this State were given in guaranty of the loan and will be reduced, once the loan is redeemed. The tax of 20 per cent ad valorem on the export beyond the amount marked by law (9,000,000, 9,500,000, and 10,000,000 bags for 1908-9, 1909-10, and 1910-11, respectively) was created by exigency of the bankers, but the Government is negotiating with them to replace it by another more acceptable to the markets.

Under such circumstances would it not be an act of international kindness for the United States to help São Paulo to remove this millstone of surtax, export tax, and added ad valorem export tax? And particularly when this same minister of finance adopts as his own this language:

To suppress coffee exports it is to profoundly injure the whole of Brazil, threatening its very existence. (Report of Sept. 30, 1910.)

Their acts thus disowned as the acts of agents of the Government, the committee and the financiers must face alone the onus of holding the valorization coffee out of the market while it has gone up 6 cents per pound, and while it has gone far above the 47 or 56.4 francs per bag, which the minister of the Government who has had the matter in charge says is the top limit of price desired by the Government for its product. They must stand as having deliberately and willfully conspired to enhance the price of this import and to restrain the trade in coffee by so doing. I can see neither justification, excuse, nor escape for them. Under the terms of their trusteeship contract, if they only sold the minimum amount of coffee per year there would still be one and one-half million bags on hand, the last six months of the term for which the last big loan runs. This is a clear indication that they were expected to sell additional amounts as soon as the price reached the desired level and tends to corroborate the minister's message in that respect. It is true that they have, during the current year, apparently sold an extra 600,000 bags above the minimum, but so far as the market and trade in the United States are concerned not only the extra but also the obligatory sales might as well not have been made. The sales have all been made in secret, and practically none has been withdrawn for consumption, indicating as strongly as circumstances can that the pretended sales are not sales at all bona fides, but a mere bidding in of the coffee by the coffee committee, coffee people and their friends, to hold for a still higher squeeze. And what a good time it was to have to bid it in. The crop just marketed was millions of sacks short of the world's consumption for the year, and though the prospects are for a good crop, to cap it all, for some reason, either through error or otherwise, there is no obligation on the committee to sell a single pound of valorized coffee the coming year, or until June, 1913, so that instead of having done something for the market and the consumer these people on the inside have simply taken advantage of their position to buy some extra coffee which they can, within their powers, as indicated, by subsequent refusal to sell, boost still higher.

While there have also undoubtedly been substantial violations of the Sherman Act, the remedy thereunder is similar to the remedy under the Wilson Act. It seems to me that the whole plan constitutes a plain and complete offense against the latter statute. I therefore recommend that the proceedings be had primarily under section 73 of the act of August 27, 1894, and also under section 76 of the same act. I firmly believe that only criminal proceedings will bring effective results in this case.

A failure on the part of this Department to prosecute this matter to the utmost would rightfully bring down upon it the censure of the people, for whom it constitutes the machinery which must stand between them and such unconscionable, open, high-handed, continuous, and bold violation of law for the express and only purpose, from the very conception and inception of the scheme, of gouging the consuming public of this country to the extent of all the numerous commissions and charges which the scheme involved, to the profit of the high financiers of international operation, plus whatever profit which was to come to this foreign nation and its people, at the expense of the American consuming public, who are the known customers of from 80 to 85 per cent of their entire product. Such a lack of patriotism alone should be considered little short of treasonable conduct, but when it is done in the face of and in violation of plain statutes it deserves and should meet the exact and full penalty which the law provides and prescribes. The fact of the standing of the offending parties is nothing that this Department can consider. law is plain. The intent is plain—there has been but one purpose from the beginning. The results are apparent. The future results, unless checked, will be appalling.

If any steps taken bring on negotiations with the Brazilian States, the persons who are conducting them should under no circumstances forget to have the removal of planting restrictions in mind, as a part of the remedy desired, so that the increase of area may again at least begin to grow with the continuing increase in consumption. Even then the situation on that point will be very bad before the remedy can become effective because of the six-year term required for coffee trees to come into fruition. The urgency of the promptest kind of

Respectfully submitted.

The Ambassador of Brazil to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

EMBASSY OF BRAZIL, Washington, May 30, 1912.

Mr. Secretary of State: As soon as I assumed charge of this Embassy in June of last year I had the honor to talk with your excellency about an inquiry instituted by the Department of Justice into the operations of the so-called Committee on Coffee Valorization of the State of São Paulo in this country in order to ascertain whether the said operations were conducted in violation of the Sherman Act to prevent restrictions on American commerce. Your excellency was so good as to promise me then to acquaint me with the results of the inquiry immediately when receiving the information from the Department concerned.

I then forwarded your excellency's answer to my Government and when one of the members of the Committee on Coffee Valorization of São Paulo was lately called upon to testify before the Parliamentary Commission of Inquiry into the "Money Trust" in this city, I explained to the parties interested that both this inquiry and that of the Department of Justice were intended to enable the American public authorities to form an opinion on questions that affected the general welfare before taking any measures whatever in the matter and that the Brazilian Embassy in the United States would certainly be duly notified of any such steps.

But it was only by reading the papers of the 19th instant that the Brazilian Embassy learned that proceedings had been instituted the day before by the Attorney-General in the District Court of New York against the Committee on Coffee Valorization of the State of São Paulo, which was claimed in the indictment to have violated the provisions of the Sherman Act above mentioned. The Brazilian Embassy at Washington, which regards it as one of its most pleasant duties to cooperate with the American Government in its efforts to maintain and develop the very friendly relations between the two countries, this Embassy, whose creation was a token of the lasting friendship which binds the two peoples, was left in ignorance of an official measure of such extreme gravity as this which deals with acts and property of the Government of a Brazilian State.

It is not for me here to enter upon an examination of the merits of the case since, be those what they may, the jurisdiction of an American tribunal over the acts of a foreign sovereign State can not be admitted. The doctrine alleged by a representative of the Department of Justice before the court that by placing merchandise on the market of the world a State loses its sovereignty can not be defended before the Department of State, where it is well known that sovereignty is never lost or relinquished automatically but always through a formal and express instrument, whether voluntarily or With a refusal to consider the international under compulsion. aspect of the question, the matter assumes more importance, as the initial proceedings of the suit were instituted without due warning to the foreign and friendly Government interested therein. court has already denied that part of the Attorney-General's petition which relates to the previous delivery of the coffee owned by the State of São Paulo to a depositary (for sale) in the market, but the suit continues.

This state of things, which has lasted for two weeks and which, I fear, may not continue without detriment to the moral and material interests of both countries, is that which I wish to submit to your excellency's consideration in order that you will, if you deem it proper, bring it to the knowledge of the President of the Republic with a view to its discontinuance and proper reparation.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 8, 1912.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to acknowledge your excellency's communication of the 30th ultimo wherein you allude to a conversation with me last June regarding the question of an institution of an inquiry by the Department of Justice into matters of combination affecting the sale of coffee and of concern to the State of São Paulo in Brazil. Your excellency alludes to my having promised at the time to acquaint you with the results of the inquiry in question so soon as I should receive the necessary information from the Department of Justice.

Your excellency then proceeds with some narrative of the manifestations of the Embassy's interest in this subject and enters to some extent upon a discussion based upon the course of the suit instituted by the Attorney General, finally intimating the hope that the subject be brought to the knowledge of the President.

As your excellency is aware, I was happy to comply with your wishes in this last respect.¹ Our recent conversations seem to me to render it still more unnecessary at this time to enter upon any general discussion of certain points raised in the communication under acknowledgment, for, as your excellency knows, I am very sensible of the interests of Brazil in the matter and am using my best endeavors to make sure that the Government of Brazil shall have no just cause of concern in respect to the matter in question, it being the hearty wish of the Government of the United States that the interests of the two countries should be mutually treated with specially friendly consideration.

I must reiterate here, as I have said to your excellency, that while I have no recollection of the conversation of last June, nevertheless I have no doubt that I promised to give the Embassy the desired information so soon as I should receive it, the fact being, as I have already informed you, that the Department of State had no official information of the so-called coffee suit until after your excellency had gained such information directly from the Department immediately concerned.

Sir: As of possible interest to the Department I have the honor to enclose herewith, accompanied by a partial translation, a clipping from the Jornal do Commercio of the 15th instant containing a portion of the annual message addressed by Dr. F. de Paula Rodrigues Alves, the President of the State of São Paulo, to the Congress of that State.

This clipping will give the Department a fair idea of the real attitude of the Government of the State of São Paulo in connection with the American investigation into the matter of coffee valorization.

EDWIN V. MORGAN.

[Inclosure—Translation—Extracts.]

Message of the President of the Brazilian State of São Paulo to the State Congress.

July 14, 1912.

The high price of coffee, which is due to natural causes, has been attributed to the stocks which the State of São Paulo holds. Commercial and political pressure exerted in certain quarters has caused distrust of these deposits and of the intentions of the São Paulo Government.

The State of São Paulo was not led into valorization through the wish to speculate or to make money. Its object was the patriotic one of saving large sums of money invested in the cultivation of a product on which to a large extent State credit depended. The Government has always explained its attitude frankly and the markets of the world have accepted it without suspicion. We have always maintained the best of relations with the United States, and it was not right to expect that our intentions would be misunderstood or misinterpreted.

It will be remembered that at the beginning of last year the American Government wished to be informed of the conditions under which valorized coffee was sold in the month of April. Representative Norris of Nebraska, in the House of Representatives, asked whether the tariff laws afforded a means of retaliation against Brazil, which, "acting in conjunction with American and European capitalists, had raised the price of coffee from 40 to 50 per cent, thereby causing an annual loss to the United States of 35 million dollars." He also inquired "if the Department of Justice could not institute legal proceedings, under the Sherman law, against the American members of this trust."

Omitting, as one would expect between friendly powers, this allusion to Brazil, the Department of Justice began the investigation which the House of Representatives recommended regarding the sale of coffee in the month of April.

The State Government was not apprehensive during the work of investigation, which, however, revealed a certain lack of confidence regarding our attitude, when all at once came the report that one of the New York courts was taking action against the members of the committee of valorization, jeopardizing, in a very strange fashion, the legal status of the deposits of our coffee.

And we deeply regretted to learn the terms of the petition presented in the name of the American Government to the District Court of New York. From a perusal of that document, it is plain to be seen that great fear is felt lest we might be instrumental in upsetting the great principles which political science has created for the complete administration of justice among nations.

So as to be able to state that the members of the valorization committee had violated the provision of the law of July 2, 1890 (the Sherman law), there was presented to the tribunal a lengthy memorandum of which I am at this moment able to give you only the general lines:

"The suit was brought before the District Court of New York by the United States of America against the members of the valorization committee.

"It was alleged that the persons interested in maintaining the price of coffee at the highest possible figure had conceived a plan with a view not only to maintaining that price but to increasing it through artificial means which would, directly and illegally, result in a restraint of trade throughout the entire world and therefore between Brazil and the United States.

"For the purpose of carrying out that plan, the members of the committee, and others who are cited in the petition, entered into agreements, contracts, combinations, and conspiracies (these are expressions used in the Sherman law), and purchased, received, stored, and sold coffee, and manipulated the market in various ways.

"Inasmuch as three-fourths of the world's supply of coffee is produced in Brazil, the conservation of the high price would not be possible without the cooperation of the Government of Brazil and of the States, the State of São Paulo being the largest producer. Therefore various laws were passed at the suggestion of interested parties." (The Federal laws and those of the State, as well as sur-taxes on our coffee, exportation, loans, the Convention of Taubate, and, in fact, every law which can have any connection with the valorization plan, are cited at length.)

It is then affirmed that the law for the protection of industry and commerce against restrictions and monopolies (the Sherman law) was violated, and the petition recites the following views:

"a) The valorization plan was organized by individuals who would be benefited by the maintainance of the price of coffee above the level which would prevail if the law of supply and demand were allowed to pursue its natural course;

"b) These individuals induced the State of São Paulo to decree laws and to enter into contracts which materially reduced the quantity of coffee exported from Brazil;

"c) Inasmuch as the United States consumes forty per cent of all the coffee used in the world, and inasmuch as coffee is a staple article of food, any law which restricts its importation into the United States in normal quantities, or which in any way tends to elevate its price, constitutes a direct restraint of foreign inter-state trade. Therefore, the valorization plan was organized in contravention of the principles incorporated in the Sherman law, and the agreements and conspiracies of the several individuals, who obtained from the State of São Paulo laws and contracts in this connection, are in disagreement with its provisions;

"d) The fact that the said agreements and conspiracies are not illegal in Brazil and the fact of their being participated in by a foreign State can not justify the committee in the perpetration of acts committed within the United States. The several contracts and agreements were, it is true, concluded outside the limits of the United States, as were the meetings of the committee. Nevertheless, one of the defendants, Mr. Sielcken, resides in the southern district of New York, where he deals in coffee."

The writer concludes by saying that "the laws, contracts and agreements from which the valorization plan originated violate the American law of July 2nd and they should be declared illegal," requesting that there be at once appointed a depositary to take charge of our coffee, which was there warehoused, and that it should be sold under the court's orders.

No course was left open to this Government in defense of our rights except categorically to reaffirm them to the Federal Government, which was personally informed by the Secretary of Finances of the State as to all of the elements which entered into the formation and execution of the plan, which was given due publicity and which, after being so many years in operation, has only now produced the alarm which so greatly offends us.

I can not refrain from saying to you, with my most profound thanks, that the Federal Government and the Honorable the Minister for Foreign Affairs have been sincere champions of those rights, which are, above all, rights of the Brazilian nation. And everything leads us to believe, in view of the first decisions made public and in view also of friendly manifestations between the two countries, that the incident will not affect the cordiality of ancient relations with the great American nation and that the question will be settled in a dignified manner.

The example of the United States not unnaturally produced effects in Europe. In the French Chamber of Deputies, Mr. Briquet, a socialist, proposed a motion against coffee, attributing the high price of that product to the action of the São Paulo valorization committee, and requesting that the Government adopt measures designed to put a stop to speculation. For this purpose, he suggested an increase in the import duties, and the concessions of favors to coffee from the French colonies and other producing countries. The Minister of Commerce was opposed to this action, and he loyally stated just what had occurred in Brazil in connection with the valorization of coffee, adding that it had been proposed that France should pursue the same course with a view to raising the price of wheat. He stated that he could see no legal means of attacking the acts of an independent State. As a consequence of this clear and just intervention, the motion of the illustrious deputy did not succeed in impressing public opinion in France.

One should reap from these facts the lessons which they naturally suggest. The United States is the largest consumer of our coffee, which enters that country free of duty. Large amounts of capital are invested in the coffee business in the United States, and there is within the country and in the neighboring coffee-producing territory a current of opinion favorable to the levying of an import duty on the product. No advantage is to be gained by the great American people through the taxation of a product which to-day forms a part of its daily bill-of-fare, but the exigencies of the administration, and the pressure upon politicians and people interested in commerce, the insistence of small producers of coffee, may result in other complications, for which it is said in the United States that the amplitude of the Sherman law is admirably adapted. The coffee producer should be vigilant and not deposit excessive confidence in the action of public authorities nor in the sentimentalism of friendly peoples when the pressure of great commercial and revenue-raising interests begins to become intense.

AMERICAN EMBASSY, Rio de Janeiro, September 3, 1912.

An hour ago I was informed by the Brazilian Minister for Foreign Affairs that the Brazilian Ambassador at Washington had cabled him on the 2d instant that the American press had published reports to the effect that the Attorney General intends to revive the investigation of the legal status of valorized coffee. The Brazilian Minister for Foreign Affairs told me that the Brazilian Government would deplore greatly a revival of this delicate question and that it fails to comprehend the alleged justification of the attitude taken by the Department of Justice of the United States. General public opinion throughout Brazil as well as in the State of São Paulo is most sensitive to any attack on valorization, and the growing commercial interests between the United States and Brazil will very probably be jeopardized if the coffee market should be broken by an enforced sale of valorized stock in New York, which stock, according to the valorization program, if left unmolested will be liquidated by gradual sales. The Government of Brazil attaches great importance to the international aspects of this matter. Morgan.

American Embassy, Rio de Janeiro, September 16, 1912.

Sir: I have the honor to report, referring to my cablegram of September 3, that the Brazilian Foreign Office has learned nothing further from the Brazilian Embassy at Washington regarding the rumor which Mr. da Gama cabled on the 2d of September: that the American press then reported that the Attorney General intended to revive the investigation of the legal status of valorized coffee. A careful and constant examination by the Embassy of the telegrams from abroad which appear in the local press and also of the telegraphic news from São Paulo has given no indication that such press rumors are current in the United States and for the advantage of our commercial position in Brazil this fact is a desirable one.

Not only in the State of São Paulo but throughout Brazil public opinion appears particularly and increasingly sensitive regarding valorization, and American enterprises which deal with either the Federal or State Governments would, as a result of renewed discussion of this question, probably be embarrassed, at least temporarily, in their efforts to secure new business. This would affect companies such as those which supply materials to the Government, as well as those which desire to enter into negotiations with the Government for the construction of the proposed military port.

The Brazilians believe that if the stock of valorized coffee in New York is left unmolested it will be liquidated within a year through ordinary sales. There is no intention of increasing that stock. The recent frosts in the coffee district make it certain that the present crop will be a small one and that the excessive crop of a few years ago, which was the inception of the valorization plan, will not be repeated this year.

I am requested by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Brazil to inform you that the Governor of the State of São Paulo has assured him that at its annual meeting next January the valorization committee will vote to dispose of the entire stock of valorized coffee in New York. The Minister for Foreign Affairs is anxious to learn whether in view of this assurance given him by the Governor of the State of São Paulo it will be possible to defer the proposed suit against the international coffee syndicate until the cause for action shall have disappeared. The Minister for Foreign Affairs also expressed the hope that the proposed liquidation may check any Federal legislation against valorized coffee that may be contemplated. He stated emphatically that the Brazilian Government does not wish the action of a sovereign State of the Republic of Brazil which has been endorsed by a Federal law to be reviewed by a foreign legislative body or court, and is anxious that further newspaper controversy regarding valorized coffee should, if possible, be avoided.

AMERICAN EMBASSY, Rio de Janeiro. November 8. 1912.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Brazil just now informed me that he had heard that legal proceedings against valorized coffee will be taken in the United States on November 14th. He is extremely regretful that the promise of the valorization committee to liquidate its stock of coffee now in New York by the end of January has not resulted as he had hoped. The Foreign Minister fears that it may be difficult to prevent public opinion in Brazil from erroneously inferring that the Government of the United States is unfriendly to He believes that the people of Brazil will draw this inference from the fact of the revival of this delicate subject upon which Brazil is peculiarly sensitive and which would automatically disappear within a short time. The Embassy is firmly of the belief that it would be most advantageous to our position in Brazil to postpone further legal action until after the adjournment of the Brazilian Congress on December 31st, since American commerce and industry is likely to derive considerable advantage from pending legislation which should be closed by that date.

Replying to your October 17th. The Attorney General has agreed to postpone action provided the proposition relates to the entire stock of valorized coffee now in New York, about 932,000 bags, and if it is proposed to sell it in the open market free from any restrictions on or before April 1, 1913, he is willing to abandon further proceedings. AMERICAN EMBASSY, Rio de Janeiro, November 18, 1912.

Reply to Department's Nov. 9, 1912. I have been informed by the Brazilian Minister for Foreign Affairs, in an aide mémoire, that the Government of São Paulo accepts the obligation to liquidate the entire stock of coffee now in New York, by April 1, 1913, amounting to about 950,000 bags. The coffee will be sold in the legitimate market in order to prevent speculation by combined interests as might occur if, for instance, the stock were offered at public auction at the mercy of the coffee roasters and without benefit to the consumers in America. When sale by public auction was tried in Europe for a much smaller stock buyers held off in order to force prices down. The result was there was not a single bidder and that market had to be abandoned. If this procedure were applied to a stock of nearly one million bags it would cause a general break in the coffee market which would be a serious detriment to the market and to the State of São Paulo, benefitting the New York interests alone.

If this understanding is satisfactory to the Department of Justice the Brazilian Foreign Office and the Embassy will exchange notes in this sense.

AMERICAN EMBASSY, Rto de Janeiro, November 29, 1912.

The Brazilian Foreign Office has requested me to inform you that the Government of São Paulo believes that the publication of any intelligence about the details of the pending negotiations concerning the abandonment of the coffee suit would cause unnecessary harm. The Brazilian Government agrees with the Government of São Paulo that secrecy should be maintained between the three Governments as to any agreement arrived at.

The reception of telegrams from New York by the Government of São Paulo, in which were reported rumors current in the United States to the effect that the embargo on 950,000 bags of valorized coffee had been raised and that the coffee would be offered in the market, has occasioned this request for secrecy.

AMERICAN EMBASSY, Rio de Janeiro, December 11, 1912.

The Brazilian Minister for Foreign Affairs has assured me in writing as well as orally that the Government of São Paulo promises that by the first of April next the entire stock of valorized coffee now in New York will be fiquidated in accordance with the terms set forth in the Embassy's telegram of Nov. 18, 1912, that none of the coffee in New York will be assigned to a syndicate of insiders or persons associated with the valorization, and again affirms that all sales will be made in the legitimate market.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs further says that the valorization committee at its annual meeting next January will decide upon the manner of liquidation based upon these general principles. He desires, however, that neither the Brazilian nor the American Government should give out any public statement regarding the settlement of the coffee matter either now or after final agreement. He explained that unofficial rumors could probably not be prevented, but they would not so injuriously affect the interests of São Paulo producers and merchants as would a statement issued by either Government.

Sir: I am in receipt of your letter of 12th instant, transmitting paraphrase of a telegram dated December 11th, received by you from the American Embassy at Rio de Janeiro, transmitting [etc.]. These positive assurances of the Government of São Paulo, repeated by the Federal Government of Brazil, are accepted as satisfactory evidence of the intention to dispose of the coffee in an open market, and I see no reason why the exchange of notes referred to by Ambassador Morgan, in his telegram of November 18th, should not now be had.

Excellency: I have the honor to inform your excellency that a complete understanding has been reached between the Government of Brazil, on behalf of the State of São Paulo, and the American Embassy at Rio de Janeiro, on behalf of this Department, to the effect that the hearing of the demurrer would be held in abeyance and the stock of coffee now in New York sold without restriction in the open market before April 1, 1913. Your excellency will readily understand, however, that unless Mr. Sielcken withdraws his motion that a date be set for hearing the demurrer, the Government of the United States can not be held responsible if the suit should proceed. The Department is further informed that the Brazilian Government is taking steps to check the initiative of Mr. Sielcken, and it is hoped that these steps will result in his withdrawing his motion before the 20th instant, the date now set by the court for hearing the same.

I am informed by the Minister for Foreign Affairs that according to information given him by the Government of São Paulo all of coffee stored in the United States has been sold. The coffee was bought by about eighty purchasers in several different States and the price and conditions of sale were uniform. The Government of Brazil has asked the Government of São Paulo to supply it, for the use of the Embassy, with a detailed account of the transaction which may be incorporated in a statement to the press. The Minister for Foreign Affairs hopes, however, that this statement will not be of such a nature as to jeopardize the interests of valorized coffee in Europe, more especially in Germany, where there may be a movement against it.

[Memorandum—Translation—Extracts.]

On the 18th of May of last year action on the charge of violation of the Sherman law against Hermann Sielcken and other members of the Coffee Valorization Committee of the State of São Paulo was brought before the United States District Court of New York by the Attorney General of the United States. Neither the Embassy of Brazil nor the Department of State itself received notice of this suit instituted against the acts and property of the State of São Paulo, represented by its agents specially commissioned to liquidate a stock of coffee acquired in 1906 with the object of stopping a continuous depreciation of the commodity caused by an abnormal crop, which depreciation was proving ruinous to the cultivation of coffee in that It is proper to note that until the beginning of 1912 the regular annual storage and sales of that coffee had not been considered to be in violation of any law of the United States. The committee for the liquidation of the valorization deposit dealt with sales only and never with purchases and the stock acquired by the State of São Paulo had already been reduced about 60% when proceedings for conspiracy and restraint of trade were instituted. The Department of State did not see fit to intervene in the case which was in some way within its province affecting as it did international relations and preferred to let the suit take its course.

The New York court having declined to issue the warrant for the seizure of the coffee deposited in that city, for a judicial sale "in the open market" as petitioned in the bill of complaint, the Attorney General recommended to the Congress of the United States an amendment known by the name of Norris bill which would authorize such seizure or confiscation and the Congress passed that measure ad hoc, as appears from the Attorney General's report, and it is now the law of the land.

In the meanwhile and to the end of showing that there was no restraint of trade nor unlawful combination or conspiracy in the operations of the valorization committee, Mr. Sielcken proposed a stay of the proceedings that were injurious to the commercial and political relations of the two countries, while he endeavored to obtain from his colleagues and the Government of São Paulo authority to sell in the regular market and within a reasonable time the coffee deposited in New York thus removing the object of the complaint without the necessity of a hearing in court. The committee approved Mr. Sielcken's proposition, but the State of São Paulo rejected it on account of the engagements made with the purchasers of coffee and the bankers that had lent the money required for the valorization operations. The Government of São Paulo, confident of the perfect legality of its position before the national laws of the United States, thought it preferable to go on with the suit, which the American Government had to lose if it should not first recognize the error it made in institut-

It was then that the Brazilian Government resorted to the friendly settlement of the incident in the terms that are known to the Department of State. While the negotiations looking to that settlement were going on in Rio de Janeiro, Mr. Sielcken asked the Court in New York to set a day for the hearing of the defense presented by the counsel for the defendants. On the American Government's request the Brazilian Government prevailed on Mr. Sielcken to withdraw his request, as the conciliatory action of the two Governments would be embarrassed by a continuance of the case.

An agreement for the disposal of the stock of valorization coffee deposited in New York having been reached, a doubt seems to have arisen as to the manner of effecting that sale, the Brazilian Government understanding that the coffee under litigation was simply to be sold in the customary way and the American Government understanding that the sale was to be made "in the open market." The Attorney General would thus achieve through friendly arrangement what he did not obtain from the court in New York as a preliminary measure in the civil suit he had instituted. But there was no time for a discussion of the disputed interpretation of the arrangement. On the 16th of January the Coffee Valorization Committee of the State of São Paulo met in London and announced that they had sold and disposed of its stock in New York to eighty roasters scattered in twenty States of the Union. In order to dispel any doubt as to the good faith of the sale, the committee confidentially furnished the Embassy of Brazil with the list of the eighty several buyers. It was explained that secrecy was enjoined in accordance with the usage of trade, it being contrary to practice for sellers to publish the names of buyers. But this does not prevent the Embassy from asserting, from the enumeration it has before it, that the sale of the valorization coffee deposited in New York was bona fide, without restrictions and for actual consumption in the United States.

The Brazilian Government desires the dismissal of the case, which stands as an obstacle to perfect harmony in the relations of the two countries and was instituted by the Attorney General of the United States without previous notice to the Brazilian Embassy or the Department of State itself and is still prosecuted after the object, which was the sale and distribution of the coffee deposited in New York, has been accomplished.

And in compliance with its duty as representative of Brazilian interests abroad, the Brazilian Government would also like to hear from the American Government if it proposes that the operation of the Norris Act or of the law it amended is intended to exclude the remainder of the valorization coffee, or to prevent its deposit and regular sale in the United States or, in general terms, what will be the probable effects of those acts on the exchange of merchandise in the now rapidly growing trade between the United States and Brazil. DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 22, 1913.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to inform you that in answer to my inquiry directed to the Attorney General asking him whether the statement of the Brazilian Ambassador is sufficient to justify the withdrawing of the suit in the valorization case, I am advised that it is the opinion of the Attorney General that the Ambassador's statement together with facts already within the knowledge of the Attorney General constitute sufficient ground for such action and that he has accordingly directed the District Attorney at New York to enter a decree to the effect. Following the custom of the Department not to give an opinion upon a hypothetical case concerning the effect of congressional legislation, he does not decide the second question, namely, whether a new suit should be brought in case of a repetition of the acts upon which the former suit was based, and he would not therefore give assurance as to modification or nonenforcement of the acts in question. I have written him in line with our conversation asking him to notify this Department in advance before commencing suit in case a future cause of action should arise so that I may take up with you the question of securing through the action of your Government the same result that could be reached through a suit.

Mr. Secretary of State: I had the honor to receive the note of the 22d instant in which your excellency was pleased to communicate to me the reply of the Attorney General of the United States regarding the suppression of the suit begun by the American courts against the valorization of the coffee of the State of São Paulo. It is stated therein that my declaration, together with the information now in the possession of that Department would be sufficient to justify this suppression, instructions for which purpose were issued to the Attorney for the District of New York. The Attorney General adds that, as it is not the custom of his Department to issue an opinion on possibilities in the application of laws, he can not say whether a similar lawsuit would be repeated under analogous conditions, nor can he promise the modification or the non-application of such laws.

I also thank your excellency for the information that you gave me on the same occasion that you had requested the Department of Justice that, should there occur in the future any reason for a similar lawsuit, due information would be furnished to the State Department thereof, so that when this Embassy was informed we could through Governmental action obtain the same result which judicial

My dear Dr. Lauro Müller: Among the many subjects upon which I have the satisfaction of feeling that we maintain views in common, there is none upon which I venture to believe we more heartily agree than in our mutual belief that the distinguished and influential citizens of Brazil and the United States should become more thoroughly acquainted. My fellow citizens and yours entertain a similar point of view on so many matters, that an increase in their personal knowledge of each other cannot fail to substantially promote their common respect and regard. The visit which the Honorable Elihu Root, in his official capacity as Secretary of State, made to Brazil, and, incidentally, to other nations of this continent during the Third Pan-American Conference, did more than any other one event not only to strengthen, but to demonstrate and justify, the existing and ever-increasing friendly relations between Brazil and the United States.

Since entering upon my present mission, I have been exceedingly desirous that my Government and people should secure a similar opportunity for making and enjoying the acquaintance of a Brazilian statesman of the first rank and of demonstrating their warm friendship for this country, as was afforded the Government and people of Brazil during Mr. Root's visit. My Government is in complete and decided accord with this desire, concerning which the Embassy bas communicated with the Department of State, and I am instructed to say that, in case the Government of Brazil should find it opportune to send you

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 6, 1913.

Secretaries of State, War and Navy leave Washington on Mayflower Monday June ninth at four p. m. to meet Doctor Lauro Müller, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Brazil, who comes as Ambassador of Brazil on Special Mission to return your visit to South America as Secretary of State. The Secretary of State desires you to join the receiving party on the Mayflower. We are just in receipt of cable message as to exact time of arrival of Doctor Müller and hasten to extend invitation.

DUDLEY FIELD MALONE.

Note.—On June 10 a reception committee aboard the Mayflower, Sylph, and Dolphin met the Ambassador and suite at Hampton Roads: The Ambassador of Brazil, Sr. da Gama, and members of the Embassy; the Secretary of the President, Mr. Tumulty; the Secretary and the Third Assistant Secretary of State; representatives of the Departments of War and Navy; Senator Root; the Director General of the Pan American Union; and others. The Mina Geraes was escorted by the war ships Florida, Arkansas, Beale, Perkins and others to Fortress Monroe, with appropriate honors.

On June 11 the Ambassador and suite, transferred to the Mayflower, were accompanied by the committee to their hotel in Washington, escorted by the 15th United States Cavalry. Calls by members of the Cabinet. Formal reception by the President. A call upon the Secretary of State. Drive about the city. Dinner at the Brazilian Embassy. Reception at the White House.

June 12.—Luncheon at the Pan American Union. A banquet at the residence of the Secretary of State.

The ensuing days were filled with functions both formal and informal, and visits to places of interest. In the Senate Chamber, Doctor Müller left his card on the desk of Senator Root, on the 12th; on the 13th he called upon the Vice President at the Capitol, and was entertained at dinner by the Secretary of War. On the 14th Doctor Müller laid upon the tomb of Washington a wreath inscribed "The homage of Brazil to George Washington." 1 and the thanks of the Brazilian Government for the cordial reception which Dr. Lauro Müller, Brazilian Minister for Foreign Affairs, has received in the United States. The President told me that the reception, which had far exceeded his expectations, had produced an admirable effect in Brazil, where henceforth American approximation would be more popular than it had been at any time since the visit of Mr. Root to Brazil seven years ago.

President Wilson will already have received before this despatch is written the telegram of thanks which President Hermes sent him on the 15th instant, and the Senate and the House of Representatives will also have received the telegrams which were sent them by the Brazilian Senate and Chamber of Deputies. Mr. President: The Senate has information regarding the sincere manifestations of consideration and esteem with which Dr. Lauro Müller has been welcomed in the United States, these manifestations coming not alone from the President and the official world but also from the great North American people, who together celebrate the visit as a proof of the friendship of Brazil and of the sentimental ties that unite the two countries in a bond of fraternity and peace.

Our Foreign Minister is not only a messenger carrying the goodwill and national sentiment of Brazil; he represents also the high ideals of all Southern America in their efforts towards guaranteeing peace and a general fraterniza-tion amongst the nations of this continent.

The Senate, therefore, cannot remain unmoved before such demonstrations of respect, goodwill and esteem, and for this reason the Constitutional and Diplomatic Commission of this Senate, through my medium, solicits from the Senate a solemn manifestation to this effect, by means of a telegram of congratulation and gratitude to the Senate of the great American Nation.

Speech of Representative Coelho Netto.

The kindly attitude of the noble American people imposes on us the courtesy of a motion which I am going to present, in the name of the Diplomatic Commission of this Chamber.

We are living in a hostile age. Men seek to crush one another as enemies; nations arm themselves, suspicious of attack; the clouds that darken the horizon are heavy with the smoke of battles. Thus the generosity of the American nation is enhanced, contrasting with the warlike aspect of the Old World under arms.

While war troubles the west, America festively receives the ambassador of peace. It was a happy choice that the Government made when naming our Foreign Secretary for this mission.

Dr. Lauro Müller is, amongst the politicians of the Republic, one of the most worthy of consideration. While yet a young man he appeared as a fighter on that glorious morning of November, and since that date he has never shirked the responsibilities of the great destiny of his country. He represented his State in both houses of the National Congress and has continually proved to his fellow-citizens his worth as an active worker and honest official. As Secretary of Ways and Communications he was one of the great improvers of the city of Rio de Janeiro; he rid it of its colonial deformities and worked actively towards its sanitation. He was called to take the place of great Rio Branco and has maintained with success the post occupied by the hero of our national

A statesman, possessing purity of character and undoubted patriotism, Dr. Lauro Müller is the right man in the right place as the Ambassador of Brazil and under the flag of his country, gloriously waving beneath the skies of America, he worthily represents our ideals. The homage which is being done him by America and Americans represents commendation of our policy of peace and fraternity.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of August 18, 1913, informing me of the resumption by Doctor Lauro Müller, Minister of State for Foreign Relations of Brazil, of the duties of his high office, and his excellency's desire that his appreciation of the courtesies extended to him during his recent visit to the United States be communicated to the President, the Vice President, the Senate, the House of Representatives, the heads of the Judiciary, Military and Civil branches of this Government as well as to the American people and the press.

In reply I have the honor to state that it will be my prompt and pleasant duty to carry out the wishes of Doctor Müller, whose high attributes and genial disposition made his visit to this country one of sincere pleasure [to] all who had the honor to meet him.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 31, 1913.

Sir: The Department acknowledges the receipt of your No. 306, Bulgarian Series, of the 11th instant, forwarding at the request of the Bulgarian Minister of Foreign Affairs three documents which the Bulgarian authorities at Sofia desire to have sent to and signed by Ieromonach Grigori and Evangelie Pop Stefanoff, both residing at 258 Franklin Street, Steelton, Pennsylvania.

An examination of the documents show them to be summonses to appear before a Bulgarian court to answer to suits brought against the persons mentioned.

The three papers are returned herewith in order that you may transmit them to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Bulgaria with the following statement:

There is no provision made by the statutes of the United States whereby service of summons or other process of a foreign court can be effected on a resident of the United States, and that you are therefore constrained to return the papers to him.

EXTRATERRITORIAL RIGHTS AND MOST-FAVORED-NATION TREATMENT OF THE UNITED STATES IN BULGARIA.

File No. 711.743/16.

The Secretary of State to the American Minister.

No. 84.]

Department of State, Washington, February 12, 1913.

Sir: The Department has received the despatches of August 19th, November 12th and November 16th last (Bulgarian Series Nos. 111, 161 and 164) in which complying with the Department's instruction No. 35, of July 27th last, you reported further concerning the projected abolition of the extraterritorial régime in Bulgaria.

From your No. 111, of August 19th, it appears that the tradelicense law has not yet affected the interests of the United States or given cause for complaint by its citizens, and presumably would not have upon American interests the retroactive effect which it is understood constitutes the objection to the law on the part of the British and French Governments. It would therefore seem that the attitude of this Government towards the proposed discontinuance of extraterritorial conditions in Bulgaria would not be affected adversely by considerations in connection with the trade-license law.

In your No. 161, of November 12th, and No. 164, of November 16th, you indicated and commented upon the reservations which the American missionary interests in Bulgaria consider necessary or desirable; and with the latter of these despatches you enclosed a memorandum compiled from letters from Mr. Leroy F. Ostrander, of the American Institute at Zamokow, specifying the "requests to be made to the Bulgarian Government in behalf of American citizens residing in Bulgaria." An examination of the requests thus put forward in behalf of the American missionary interests in Bulgaria, and subsequently communicated to the Department in behalf of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, has led the Department to the conclusion that, save in so far as they have a basis in the principle of most-favored-nation treatment, these requests are in the nature of special privileges, not possessing such a national interest as would warrant this Government's undertaking negotiations with a view to their realization. It is therefore considered that the interests of the American missionary enterprises in Bulgaria, as well as the other American interests which now exist or which may hereafter be created in that country, may be most satisfactorily and adequately served by assuring to them most-favored-nation treatment, in the fullest and most liberal sense possible, on the part of the Bulgarian Government. These views, which are believed to be substantially in accord with those indicated by you in your No. 164, of November 16th, were explained to Dr. James L. Barton, Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, upon the occasion of a recent visit to the Department; and there has now been received from him a letter (a copy of which is enclosed herewith) in which, in behalf of the American Board, he withdraws the requests for specific privileges previously made in conformity with Mr. Ostrander's suggestions, and expresses confidence that American interests would be amply protected by most-favored-nation treatment.

By reason of the fact that the United States possesses no capitulatory rights vis-à-vis Bulgaria, except by virtue of the Treaty of Berlin and through the operation of the most-favored-nation principle, which the Bulgarian Government recognizes as being applicable to this country as a matter of comity, there would seem to be no necessity for any formal negotiations on the subject of the relinquishment of American capitulatory rights in Bulgaria; it would seem feasible and advisable simply to define what is understood to be the existing situation by an exchange of views with the Bulgarian Government. To this end, you are authorized to bring to the knowledge of the Foreign Office, in whatever manner you may deem expedient, the fact that this Government, recognizing that it has no intrinsic right to the benefit of the Capitulations as established by the Treaty of Berlin, stands ready to facilitate the negotiations in which the Bulgarian Government is engaged, by assenting in advance to the relinguishment of such rights as it now enjoys in this respect, at such time as the signatory Powers shall all have consented to the discontinuance of the capitulatory régime; and you will take this occasion to seek from the Bulgarian Government an assurance of its readiness to accord to the United States, as a matter of international comity, the most extensive and liberal application of the principle of most-favored-nation treatment, including the extension to American citizens and their interests, whether commercial or religious or philanthropic, of all rights, privileges and exemptions which may be granted to the citizens or interests of any other nation.

There is enclosed herewith a copy of the letter, under date of the 4th instant, which the Department is addressing to Dr. Barton in reply to his communication to which reference is made above.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Bucharest, February 26, 1913.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt today of your instruction No. 84, of the 12th instant, in regard to the effect of the "Capitulations" on American philanthropic and education institutions in Bulgaria, and to note with much satisfaction your authorization to bring to the knowledge of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs at Sofia the fact that the United States Government stands ready to facilitate the negotiations in which the Bulgarian Government is engaged by assenting in advance to the relinquishment of such rights as it now enjoys in this respect, at such time as the Powers signatory to the Treaty of Berlin shall have consented to the discontinuance of the capitulatory régime. On the occasion of my next visit to Sofia I shall take occasion to seek from the Bulgarian Government an assurance of its readiness to accord to the United States the most extensive and liberal application of the principle of most-favored-nation treatment to all American interests.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Bucharest, October 23, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to report that after waiting until the Department, under date of March 18th, had acknowledged the due receipt of my despatch No. 207, of February 26, 1913, I communicated the contents of the Department's instruction No. 84 of February 12th to the Bulgarian Ministry of Foreign Affairs in a semi-official letter addressed to the then Secretary General of that Ministry. No reply was made to my letter, partially owing to the disorganization brought about by the conflict between the former Balkan Allies, and partially owing to the appointment of Mr. Dimitroff, the Secretary General, as Diplomatic Agent at Cairo, but I know that it was put on the files of the Ministry.

In speaking of this matter with Mr. Ghenadieff, the Minister of Foreign Affairs at Sofia, a few days ago, the Minister told me that Bulgaria was quite ready to accord to American educational and philanthropic institutions the same facilities as are accorded to those under other foreign (Austrian, French and German) protection. Under the circumstances I did not, however, feel at liberty to go into the matter at length, and I merely refer to it now in order that appropriate instructions may be given to my successor.

WAR BETWEEN BULGARIA AND GREECE, SERVIA, MONTENEGRO AND ROUMANIA.

File No. 768.74/75.

The American Minister to Greece to the Secretary of State.

[Extract.]

No. 107.]

American Legation, Athens, July 10, 1913.

Sir: War having broken out between the Balkan allies, I have the honor to make a report to the Department on the conditions out of which the war finally developed and the real issue which it involves.

[The Minister here mentions his interviews with the Prime Ministers of Servia (June 24), Bulgaria (June 27), Roumania (June 19) and Greece (July 9 and previously). He then describes his observations of the military situation at Uskub (where the fighting began),

Veles, Prilip, Monastir and Saloniki.]

The vital historical movement in the Balkans since the beginning of the 19th century has been the disentanglement of the subject peoples (Slav and Greek) from Turks and latterly their differentiation from one another. With the resurrection of these long-entombed nationalities and their recovery of national consciousness have come national self-assertion, the struggle for mastery, the determination to dominate rivals, and above all the deliberate policy to appropriate to the utmost possible extent the vast domain which the palsied hand of the Turk was gradually but inevitably releasing in Europe.

Thrace, between the Black Sea and the Nestos River, had in the course of the war against Turkey been automatically assigned to Bulgaria, whose armies also occupied the territory west of the Nestos up to an irregular line approximately fixed by the points of Doiran, Strumica, Istip and Kochana, excepting only the Chalcidian Peninsula and its immediate hinterland which were held by the Greeks. By the same automatic process the war had assigned to the Greeks Epirus, Southern Albania and Southern Macedonia, up to the line of Koritsa, Florina and Gumendza, though the determinate northern boundary of New Greece awaited the action of the Great Powers as regards Albania and of the Allies as regards Macedonia. The valor of the soldiers of Montenegro had also marked out its field of expansion to the south and east of the present Kingdom. Of Turkey's possessions in Europe, apart from Constantinople with its fringe of hinterland and Albania with its unsettled southern frontier, there remained the territory known as Novi Bazar, Old Servia, and that portion of Macedonia lying between the provisional western boundary of New Bulgaria and the provisional northern boundary of New Greece; and this entire tract had been conquered and was held by To this Bulgaria objected. She made no issue over Novi Bazar and most or all of Old Servia; but in virtue of her treaty with Servia she claimed everything that was left in Macedonia north of the final Greek frontier and south and east of a line drawn from Ochrida towards the Vardar, which it intersected a few kilometres above Veles, extending thence over Ovce Polje to Egri Palanka and terminating on the present Bulgarian frontier at Golema Vrch. It is over the disposition of this triangular section of western Macedonia (which I traversed some days ago in two different directions) that the Allies have had recourse to arms; for though Bulgarians resented the Greek occupation of Saloniki, and Greeks the Bulgarian occupation of south eastern Macedonia—the Seres, Drama and Kavala district—it is improbable that either Government would have made war to alter the fait accompli in those localities.

Western Macedonia is the crux of the difficulty. Servia holds it by force of arms, but the population in the triangular section in dispute is not prevailingly Servian. The Greeks can make a good ethnological case for Monastir and some other points north of their present military frontier. But as a result of my own observations and inquiries I am disposed to believe that while the majority of the inhabitants are Mussulman—Turks or perhaps Albanians—the largest element in the Christian population is Bulgarian.

Any ethnological statements about Macedonia, however, must be received with great reserve and no little suspicion. For the Balkan peoples, foreseeing the inevitable collapse of Turkish power in Europe, have long been busy in "staking out claims" for the succession. * * * Life, property, peace, order, justice, humanity, the sanctities of religion—these have all been ruthlessly sacrificed to establish in Macedonia the exclusive claims of rival nationalities to the Turk's inheritance. The maxim "live and let live" has been unknown among these fierce contestants for national aggrandizement.

At the close of the war with Turkey the Bulgarians not only concentrated their forces near the Greek lines, but they made successive attacks against sections of the region included in the Greek military occupation. Then followed violations of the neutral line, each resulting in a gain of territory for the Bulgarians and a corresponding loss for the Greeks. To prevent further effusion of blood there was finally and formally established a new line of demarkation which was traced on the basis of the state of things created by the previous aggressions of the Bulgarians. But though this took from Greek occupation half of the Panghaion—the region extending from Orphani towards Kavala—the line seems to have been loyally respected by the Suddenly, however, on the 30th of June the Bul-Greek forces. garian army crossed this line, and occupied the whole of the Panghaion, and commenced a rapid offensive against both the Greek and Servian fronts all along the line from Eleftherai on the Gulf of Kavala to Guevgheli on the Vardar, and thence to Kotchana, north of Istip. This being regarded as war though without a declaration, the conciliation of Mr. Venizelos was at an end and the Greek troops were ordered to advance. Mr. Venizelos declared in his speech in the Chamber of Deputies that this "advance demonstrated, what also the despatches of the King prove, that the Bulgarians had already commenced their march against Saloniki, which they planned to take by surprise."

Thus ended all hope of a peace settlement of the dispute between the late Allies against Turkey. For such a peace solution no one had striven more earnestly than Mr. Venizelos. He believed that the task of dividing the conquered Turkish territories could be accomplished by a conference of the representatives of the victorious Balkan States. And, in case of failure, he proposed arbitration. Nor was this programme of recent birth. On the contrary, only a few days after the declaration of war against the Ottoman Empire, Greece communicated with her allies on the subject of the division amongst them of Turkey in Europe, tracing the line of her own ethnological claims and adding that, in case of the failure of direct negotiations, she thought that the disputed points ought to be referred to arbitration. But Bulgaria gave no definite reply, and after months of waiting the question was postponed till the close of the war against Turkey. But Mr. Venizelos has not ceased to champion this method of settling the dispute, which he has kept, on all suitable occasions, before the view of the Allies and of Europe. And his devotion to the programme of negotiation with recourse if necessary to arbitration gives Greece today an enormous moral advantage in the opinion of the civilized world.

In the conversation already referred to I asked Mr. Venizelos what Greece was fighting for. First, he said in substance, we are defending ourselves against attack; and then, as regards our programme, we assert the principle of nationality, we oppose the hegemony, the domination, of Bulgaria, and we desire an equilibrium between the Balkan States.

To curb the pretensions of Bulgaria is now a leading object with the Greeks, Servians, and Montenegrins. This was clear both from the talk of Mr. Venizelos and [the Servian Prime Minister] Mr. Paschitch. But these are not the only national statesmen who would clip the Bulgarian wings. The Premier of Roumania, Mr. Maioresco, voiced the same policy in the conversation I had with him on June 19th, at which Minister Jackson was also present. And he said clearly that in case of war Roumania would adjust her frontiers on the Bulgarian side.

Time alone will show how Bulgaria can meet all these attacks.

Meanwhile the auguries seem to be unpropitious for her.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT, YUAN SHIH K'AI.1

During all the years in which I have taken part in political life I have always adopted a safe and firm policy, under the conviction that the fundamental basis upon which a nation is built is law and order. With law and order conserved a nation can then devote itself to uniting the people in the path of progress. I have therefore always been interested in everything calculated to enlighten the people but have necessarily always advanced by gradual steps. I have preferred to go slowly rather than hurriedly. I have always held the nation and people in too high esteem to be risked at one throw of the dice, thereby completely sweeping away the inherited teachings and traditions of four thousand years.

After the year 1909 I retired and paid no more attention to politics. My life-long ambition to save the country vanished like a fleeting cloud. However, when the outbreaks occurred at Wuchang and Hankow I was forced by circumstances again to assume the responsibilities of state. I was fearful lest my nation and my people might lose their existence, and my one thought was to mitigate their condition. Then the abdication of the Manchu Emperor took place and the Republic was proclaimed. Not discarded by the Five Great Races, I was chosen to be the Provisional President of the Republic. The republican form of government existed in China in embryo four thousand years ago, and thus is not entirely strange to us. But restrictions and obstructions were placed upon my authority, making progress impossible. I was worn out by anxiety and deprived of appetite and the power to sleep. But I persevered and persevered in the hope that peace and tranquility might come at last.

Unexpectedly, in the seventh month of this year, a handful of violent characters attempted to destroy the social fabric and overthrow the country, and the fate of the infant republic of eastern Asia trembled in the balance. To save the nation and its people I reluctantly resorted to arms, and in consequence of the general aversion from anarchy and the discipline of the troops the rebellion was suppressed within two months. After this it was my purpose to resign and go into retirement in order that I might enjoy the blessings of the Republic. But contrary to my wishes the people's convention has elected me, and the friendly powers have decided to recognize the Republic on the day when I should be elected. Therefore I did not dare, by setting a lofty standard of humility, to refuse to accept the position, for fear that the foundations of the nation might be shaken and the expectations of the fathers and brothers be unfulfilled. I also am one of the citizens of the country and the single purpose of my heart is to effect the salvation of the nation and of its people. I dare not regard success or failure nor the hardships or slanders which I will have to bear. I have therefore forced myself to accept this post. I now take this opportunity to express some of my most sincere and friendly thoughts to the people of the Ropublic

It is a saying of western scholars that a constitutional government is founded on law, and that a republican government is founded on Morality should be considered as the actuality and law as the outward manifestation. Our people have been suddenly converted into citizens of a Republic, therefore it is imperative that there be law to support the morality of the people. I have made many inquiries among the learned scholars of France, America and other nations and have come at the true nature of republicanism. The republican form of government is a government which gathers together the ideas of all its citizens to form a perfect system of law for the strict observance of all, and liberty or freedom outside that system will be publicly discredited. This kind of law-abiding habit can only be developed gradually, until it becomes as habitual as rising up or going to bed, or as eating and sleeping. When such a point has been reached with us then will this nation be called a lawabiding nation. Though our citizens are by nature tractable they have never acquired to any great extent the habit of obedience to law. I expect the citizens of this country all to keep the laws, thereby unconsciously raising their moral standard.

Furthermore, the body of republican government is the people. The desire of the majority of the people is to live quietly and enjoy the fruit of their labors. But since the revolution the people have sustained all manner of hardships and difficulties, and to speak of their condition is heartrending. I have daily hoped for the restoration of the people to their normal condition, and I have not dared to put forth any measures which would tend to disturb them. I deeply regret that no precautions could be taken to restrain the violent characters who have caused the innocent to be afflicted. I wish to exert my utmost strength to allow the people to enjoy the real blessings of a republic so that the goal of seeking for them the greatest possible happiness may be attained. Earning a living has become so difficult, and the people have been so pressed by hunger and cold, that the more cunning ones among the violent characters have availed themselves of the opportunity to drive them to the path of death. This is indeed deplorable. It is desirable that the country enjoy a long period of peace. It is imperative that every man be enabled to earn a living, and this will only become possible by paying special attention to agriculture, industry and commerce.

I have heard that the best class of people in the enlightened countries enter upon a life of industry. The climate and natural resources of our country are by no means inferior to those of other powers; but as the arts of agriculture and cattle-breeding have not been studied, the results of industry are inferior, and mines, forests and fisheries are undeveloped, leaving the riches under the ground. No reliance has been placed on commerce and the export trade has steadily languished. It is like a rich man who after burying his money in the ground complains continually of his poverty. I hope that the people of the whole country will direct their attention to industrial enterprises, so that opportunities of earning a living may be thereby extended. Thus will the foundation of the nation be

There are two reasons why the industries of the country have not been developed: first, because of the rudimentary state of education; second, because of a lack of capital. Every branch of industry is closely related to science. But physics and chemistry are not understood and the principles of steam and electricity are untaught. While others are engaged in the struggle for education or the war of commerce, we are still cleaving conservatively to the old system, and superstitiously resting our faith upon empty talk. I hope that the citizens of the country will introduce the enlightened educational methods of foreign countries. In government and law the practical and not the theoretical must be emphasized. These are my views regarding education.

Unless there is capital it is no use to talk of industry. of the fertility of our soil and the richness of our produce, how can this country be called poor? The necessities of life are but those things which are associated with clothing, food and dwelling, for which silver and gold serve as a medium of exchange. a shortage of silver and gold the means of exchange are lessened. Without silver and gold we should be without a medium of exchange. Therefore, to prepare for the various industrial enterprises, we must look to our neighbors who possess an ample supply of the medium ef exchange. When the natural resources are opened and there are no waste lands nor idle people, the capital which has been borrowed will become a never-ending source of profit. After paying off the capital a surplus will be left. Would not this be a better method than that of the man who buried his treasure and yet was continually worrying about his poverty? I hope, therefore, that my country will introduce foreign capital in order that the industry of the country may be stimulated and developed.

To introduce the civilization and capital of foreign countries would benefit not only this country but also the world at large. The highest ideal of world civilization is to supply the deficiency of others from our own surplus, conferring happiness upon society, practically without distinction between countries. This is why Confucius loved to talk of universalization. Now that our country has become a Republic all the old ideas belonging to the period of seclusion should be swept away. As our citizens observe the laws of our own country so should they also understand the common law of nations. In intercourse with other nations everything should be in accordance with the practices of civilization, and there should be no prejudice shown towards foreigners, which only leads to trouble and law-breaking.

The attitude of the foreign powers towards us has always been that of peace and fairness, and whenever occasion therefor has arisen they have rendered us cordial assistance. In this is furnished ample evidence of the civilization of the world, and such exhibitions of good will from friendly nations arouse in us sentiments of deep gratitude. It is most important that all citizens of the Republic should clearly understand this, in order that with sincerity of purpose they may endeavor to strengthen the friendship of our international bonds. I hereby declare, therefore, that all treaties, conventions and other engagements entered into by the former Manchu and the Provisional Republican Governments with foreign governments shall be strictly observed, and that all contracts duly concluded by the former governments with foreign companies and individuals shall also be strictly observed; and further that all rights, privileges and immunities enjoyed by foreigners in China by virtue of international engagements, national enactments and established usages are hereby confirmed. This declaration I make with the view to maintain international amity and peace. All of you, citizens, should know that this is in accordance with a principle of international relations which must be carried out. If we can show an honest proof of our friendly intentions our relations with foreign countries will be properly managed.

The foregoing is but a summary of the thoughts which I desire to lay before you, citizens, and the moral which I want again to teach and enlarge upon consists of two characters: Tao Te [the practice of virtue]. These two characters are most comprehensive, and it has been impossible even for the great sages, by the use of thousands and thousands of words, to reveal their full significance. I will state what I understand by these two characters, and I will group my remarks under four heads: Chung [loyalty], Hsin

Loyalty. The original idea of loyalty is that a person should be loyal to his country and not to any particular man. If everyone held as his guiding principle loyalty to the nation instead of loyalty to a man or to a family, he would sacrifice his own interests for the interests of the majority. It is most important that everyone should pay less attention to the attainment of power and influence and more to the fulfillment of duty. The interests of the country should not be sacrificed for the acquisition of personal power and influence.

Honesty. Confucius said that without honesty no one can stand upright. In enlightened countries the deceitful are bywords among their fellow men and are held in general contempt. Washington when young received instruction from his father and thereafter never told a lie. From ancient times our country has laid stress on honesty, but of late the spirit of the people has not been as in earlier days. The people have acquired a habit of deceitfulness. Since it is difficult for a person to stand upright, how much more a nation. Tseng Kuo-fan of the late Ch'ing Dynasty said that in order to attain to upright stature it was essential never to tell a lie. Therefore, whether dealing with internal or with external problems, honesty is necessary.

Sincerity. In all enlightened countries no efforts have been spared to preserve the traditions of the nation, even so far as regards individual names or things. This is no impediment to progress. In the past the Renowned Religion has been the great bulwark of our country, and after four thousand years of alterations and changes there is the germ of something indestructible in it still. However, there are some who have been misguided by theory and are bent on destruction. They do not follow what is practical but are full of high-sounding words. Before they have acquired any advantage from foreign learning they have thrown away all the traditions of their own country. This shallowness of mind has spread quickly. If there are no branches, where shall the leaves be attached? The remedy for the complaint here described is in sincerity.

Respect. One must have a constant mind before one can have a constant occupation. When a person destitute of constancy has business to attend to he will attend to it confusedly; when he has none to attend to he will be idle. All his affairs will be characterized by idleness. Everything will come to grief through carelessness. No one will take any responsibility; all will stand by mockingly. No one will attend even to his own private affairs. From this we can understand the virtue of the saying of the ancients: "Respect your business." To do away with pride and laziness there must be respect.

The four words Loyalty, Honesty, Sincerity and Respect should be used to encourage us. Let us keep them in mind every day and not allow them to leave our mouths. The principles upon which the nation is established are right and wrong, good and bad, and although the likes and dislikes of individuals are not always exactly the same, yet there is the same standard for right and wrong, good and bad. Speaking generally, those who discharge their duties and abide by the law are right and good, and those who have overstepped the bounds of propriety and violated the laws of righteousness are wrong and evil. I desire that the citizens of the country may have the power to discriminate between these two classes.

There are some persons who say that as civilization advances economy will give place to extravagance. A weak and poverty-stricken country trying to imitate the extravagances rather than the civilization of other nations is like a bed-ridden invalid trying to fight against an athlete. During recent years the standard of living of the people has steadily risen, but wealth has decreased in even greater proportion. There is an ancient saying that when a nation becomes extravagant economy should be preached. I therefore hope that in the practice of morality by the citizens more attention will be paid to economy.

In a word, if law and morality go hand in hand, the state will be firm and immovable. As for the problem of national defense, the country needs rest and recuperation, and this therefore is no time for struggle with armed force. But I am most anxious that every man in the army and navy regard it as his duty to obey orders and protect the people. Who among the officers does not know this? But these two duties have not been entirely observed in the shock of the late storm, and I must acknowledge that I have not been equal to my responsibilities. Hereafter I will pay great attention to moral education so that I may not be ashamed to face the people.

Actuated now by the most sincere and friendly sentiments, I declare before you, citizens, that for each day that I remain in office that day will I take full responsibility. The Chinese Republic is a republic of its four hundred million people. If brothers are friendly the family will be prosperous, if the people are of one heart and one mind the nation will be prosperous. This is my prayer for the Chinese Republic.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Peking, November 12, 1912.

S_{IR}: I have the honor to report that as far as outward appearances go, the political situation here is one of gradual improvement. It is still far from ideal, and no great promise for the future is present, but, upon the whole, the political outlook is better than it was a few months ago.

This improvement is largely evidenced by the single fact that Yuan Shih-kai is slowly but steadily increasing his hold upon the country.

* * By common consent all hopes for the future are largely centered in this one man. Unfortunately he is aging fast, and the fear is often expressed that he may break down, and the wonder is, what will happen if such a misfortune occurs; there is no man in sight to take his place.

It may be said that the improvement I have noticed is largely superficial. That no constructive work of any great importance has been done and none is under way. That the fundamental question as to the relation of the central government to the provinces remains undetermined. * * * This important question will probably not be settled until the permanent constitution is adopted.

I think the over-shadowing fact remains that the country has settled down to the new order of things. The people, so far as they know anything about it, have accepted the Republic as an established fact. For a time I was afraid that there would be a great struggle for control, between the north and south, at the coming election, and that all kinds of trouble would ensue. But now that the opposition to Yuan has so largely disappeared, he may be regarded as the accepted leader, for the time at least. The crops this year have been uniformly good, except perhaps in a few districts subjected to unusual floods. This fact helps the situation very much; it brings not only comfort but confidence to the people; confidence, because the good crops show that Heaven was not so much displeased, after all, by the removal of the Emperor, and therefore, they may accept the new order with the assurance that it is all right from a religious as well as a political standpoint.

The difficult, the delicate and the dangerous problem with which the President is confronted, is how to get rid of the independent tutus or provincial governors, and also the military chiefs who defy all civil authority. Only one or the other of two ways is possible for the solution of this problem. The President must fight these men with armed force and thereby in all probability bring on a civil war, or he must buy them off with money. He doubtless thinks the latter course is the easiest and the cheapest.

It is not meant that it shall be implied that there is no legitimate or other need for money aside from the specific purpose above named. The disbandment of the troops is the most prominent need, but the arrearages of the indemnity and other liabilities, and the supply of the actual expenses of the Government in many legitimate ways, require the borrowing of money to bridge the country over until the disrupted revenues resume their normal returns. Without considerable money the new Government cannot get on its feet, so to speak. The query in every one's mind is how long the present condition of affairs will last; it cannot, in the very nature of things, last indefinitely. If Yuan is not supported, he will fail, anarchy will result, and armed foreign intervention, with all its complications and unforseen consequences will surely follow.

> DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 4, 1913.

MY DEAR SENATOR CULLOM: Referring to your conversation this morning with Mr. Huntington Wilson, I have the honor to enclose herewith for your personal information a memorandum which I trust will give the information you desire on the status of the question of the recognition of China.

Very sincerely yours,

P. C. Knox.

[Inclosure.]

Memorandum on the recognition of the "Republican Government of China."

The joint resolution providing for the immediate recognition of the Republican Government of China, introduced by Senator Bacon on January 2 (S. J. R. 146)1, raises important questions of fact, law, and policy.

The resolution provides that-

Whereas the people of China have asserted the right of self-government, and in pursuance thereof have thrown off the rule of monarchy and sought to establish for themselves a representative republican Government; and
Whereas in the time which has elapsed since the establishment of their present republican Government satisfactory evidence has been given that a permanent and stable Government has been established and will be maintained: Therefore be it Resolved, etc., That the present republican Government of China is hereby recognized by the United States of America, with all the powers and privileges of their intercourse and relations with this Government properly appertaining to and in general extended to independent and sovereign governments and nations.

The resolution is based upon the assumption that the present Government of China is, in point of fact, "representative", "permanent", and "stable", whereas the information received by the Department, both from its own representatives and by a comparison of views with other governments having large interests in China, goes to show that while it may be republican in principle the Government as at present constituted can not be considered truly representative; that it does not claim to be permanent; and that its stability is open to serious question.

I. FACTS.

The present Government of China is admittedly a provisional one formed to conduct the affairs of state until the meeting of the representative Constitutional Assembly which is to be soon convened for the purpose of adopting a permanent constitution and governmental organization which may be accepted as truly expressive of the will of the people.

The development and character of the existing Provisional Government in China may be briefly described as follows:

Early in the disturbances the revolutionary military leaders in the various Yangtze Provinces and in southern China established a cabinet form of government with Nanking as headquarters, and convoked in that city an assembly composed of their special representatives. On December 29¹ this assembly unanimously elected Sun Yat Sen Provisional President of the Republic of China and he was inaugurated as such on New Year's Day at that city. On February 12² the Throne abdicated in favor of a republican form of government, at the same time conferring on Yuan Shih-kai full power to organize such a government. Three days later Yuan was unanimously elected Provisional President by the Nanking Assembly and the resignation of Sun and his Cabinet was accepted by the Assembly to take effect on the inauguration of Yuan, which took place at Peking on March 10.

On February 13 the American minister at Peking was officially informed that the Chinese minister accredited to the Government of the United States would continue in the discharge of his functions under the designation "provisional diplomatic agent."

On March 10, the date of Yuan's inauguration, a provisional constitution, previously approved by the Peking authorities, was adopted by the Nanking Assembly providing that within 10 months after its promulgation the Provisional President should convene a representative national assembly to adopt a permanent constitution and elect a president, thereby providing for the normal establishment of constitutional government. In the meantime the authority of the State was to be exercised by an Advisory Council, the Provisional President, and his Cabinet.

The character and composition of the Nanking Assembly, which exercised such liberal powers on behalf of the 400,000,000 Chinese people, was indicated in a memorandum received through official channels, based upon information furnished by a member of the Nanking Government. From this memorandum dated March 19, 1912, it appears that the total membership of the Assembly was 34, and the Provinces and outer dependencies were represented as follows:

Kweichou 2 Szechwan 3	Shansi	2 He11	ungkiang 0
Kiangsi 3	Shensi	1 Inne	er Mongolia 0
Fukien 3	Fengtien		er Mongolia
	Yunnan		nghai 0
Kwangsi 3	Shantung	Z Tibe	et0
	Hupeh Kiangsu	ŏ	Total 34
Honan 1	Kansu	ň	TOTAL 04
Chibli 1	Sinkiang	ŏ

Hupeh and Kiangsu formerly sent three delegates each, but all had resigned. Shensi originally appointed three. One failed to attend and one had resigned. Shansi originally appointed three, but only two reported at Nanking. Chekiang originally had three delegates, but one resigned. None of the members was regularly elected by the people of the respective Provinces. Some seem to have been self-appointed. Some were selected by the provincial assemblies and some appointed by the "Tu-tu", or military governor. The memorandum adds:

The Assembly seems to have taken itself very seriously, but it is difficult to see how it can be considered really representative.

Early in May, after the formation of a coalition government under Yuan, the Department telegraphed the Legation at Peking to report promptly as to

how far, in the judgment of the Legation, and in the light of the more recent reports from our consuls, the situation in China was responsive to the conditions of recognition of governments under international law and specifically in what respects the Provisional Government still fell short of the requirements. In reply the Department received the following telegram, dated May 7.1

In July the Department addressed a circular telegram 2 to all the principal powers having important interests in China inquiring their disposition toward the question of recognition, based upon the information they had received from their representatives as to existing conditions in China. The governments were unanimous in replying that, in the light of their reports, they did not regard conditions such as to warrant the consideration of the question of the formal recognition of the present Government until the assurance of its permanent stability should be of a more promising nature and until it should itself have been confirmed by the vote of the National Assembly convoked for the purpose and regularly invested with authority to express the will of the people.

In July, during a cabinet crisis precipitated by the sudden resignation of the Premier, Tong Shao-yi, President Yuan issued a public proclamation in which he declared that the Republic was not yet established; its foundations were yet insecure; and that it could hardly stand any political storm. The situation was so critical that he succeeded in getting a new cabinet confirmed by the

During the past few months the situation, while gradually improving, has not changed in any material respect save that the elections have been going on for the members of the new National Assembly, which is soon to be convened, probably in February or March. According to the latest official advices from Peking the date has not been definitely fixed, although the Provisional Constitution provides that it should meet not later than January 10.

It was upon these grounds that the President in his annual message 4 stated

During the formative constitutional stage and pending definitive action by the assembly, as expressive of the popular will, and the hoped-for establishment of a stable republican form of government, capable of fulfilling its international obligations, the United States is, according to precedent, maintaining full and friendly de facto relations with the Provisional Government,

II. LAW.

In introducing the resolution Senator Bacon spoke as follows:5

It has been a subject matter of discussion almost ever since the foundation of this Gov-It has been a subject matter of discussion almost ever since the foundation of this Government as to whether the function of the recognition of an independent government, or, when there has been a change in government, the recognition of the stability and authority of a government is a function which belongs to the executive or to the legislative branch of the Government. When I say "legislative" I should properly say the law-making branch of the Government, which includes both the two Houses and the President.

making branch of the Government, which includes both the two Houses and the President. By some it is contended, and has been contended with much earnestness, that it is a function which exclusively belongs to the executive branch of the Government, whereas by others it has been contended with equal earnestness that it belongs to the law-making power of the Government. I believe the more conservative view is that which is represented by the opinion of many, that the initiative can be taken by either the Executive alone or by the law-making power, embracing the joint action of both the legislative and the executive branches of the Government—the Congress and the President—acting in a legislative capacity. In my opinion, the ultimate power of decision is with the law-making power, and where the final action in such case has been taken by the Executive it has been final through the acquiescence and approval of the Congress. But without now stopping to discuss the question I simply make the statement in order that my attitude may not be misunderstood in introducing the joint resolution. I move that it be referred to the Committe on Foreign Relations.

In regard to this aspect of the question it is perhaps sufficient to point out that Mr. Moore, in his International Law Digest, sums up some 170 pages of precedent and opinions in the following words:

In the preceding review of the recognition, respectively, of new states, new governments, and belligerency, there has been made in each case a precise statement of facts, showing how and by whom the recognition was accorded. In every case, as it appears, of a new government and of belligerency, the question of recognition was determined solely the Executive. [Vol. 1, p. 243.] [Vol. 1, p. 243.]

It should be noted that in the case of China the question involved is the recognition of a new Government and not a new State.

In a "Memorandum upon the Power to Recognize the Independence of a New Foreign State," presented to the Senate in January, 1897, by Mr. Hale (see Senate Document No. 56, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session) the statement is made that-

It will be shown, both by the terms of the Constitution itself and by the uniform prac-It will be snown, noth by the terms of the constitution user and by the amount plate-fice thereunder, that the recognition of independence of a new foreign power is an act of the Executive (President alone, or President and Senate), and not of the legislative branch of the Government, although the executive branch may properly first consult the legislative.

Speaking on the proposition "That the power to recognize belligerency or independence of a foreign government is executive in its nature has been recognized by the weight of authority in Congress, and almost without exception by the executive branch", the report continues:

Acquiescence by Congress.—It is entirely erroneous to suppose that the present question is a novel one. The boundaries between the legislative and executive powers in relation to foreign affairs have been debated since the very foundation of the Government. The right to recognize the independence of a foreign state was discussed with great ability at the time of the South American revolutions, and received some attention again at the time of the revolution in Texas. The weight of authority, legislative as well as executive, was strongly against the right of Congress to interfere. In each case the President, when the time came for recognition, acted in concert with Congress, for the obvious reason that affirmative action might involve the nation in war, and thus force Congress to make large appropriations and otherwise assist in the settlement of the controversy thus opened. The question has occasionally arisen since for discussion, as in 1864 and 1877. It has never been fully debated, however, since the time of Monroe.

The number of instances in which the Executive has recognized a new foreign power without consulting Congress (because not anticipating consequences which made such consultation necessary) has been very great. No objection has been made by Congress in any of these instances. The legislative power has thus for 100 years impliedly confirmed the view that the right to recognize a new foreign government belonged to the Executive; and if it is correct doctrine that the same power can not be exercised for the same purposes by two different branches of the Government, this implied approval is conclusive of the whole present controversy. Acquiescence by Congress.—It is entirely erroneous to suppose that the present quessive of the whole present controversy.

III. POLICY.

The matter of policy involves the question as to the wisest and most effective way, in according recognition, to safeguard foreign interests and the best interests of China itself. It is desirable that in this, as in other matters concerning China, there should be harmonious action among the powers most vitally The situation is not an ordinary one. It presents the spectacle of about one-fourth of the world's population overturning a form of government that has been the religion of the people and the supreme expression of their civilization for over 4,000 years.

A new condition of affairs has been created in China which presents many serious and complicated problems, both of internal rehabilitation and of international relations, which will require much time and patience to solve. tablishment of orderly and stable government must necessarily proceed slowly and by degrees. The efforts of this Government have therefore been directed primarily toward securing, if possible, such a sympathetic and just cooperation among the powers as would not only best protect their own interests but would also safeguard the welfare of China. While these efforts have involved no commitment on the part of this Government to the prejudice of such freedom of action on our part as might at any time seem best or necessary in the carrying out of our historic policies in China, it should be noted that in the exchange of views with the interested foreign governments in July last a majority concurred in the opinion that the best results, both for China and the powers, could be obtained only by the harmonious action of the governments largely

When the elective National Assembly of China convenes, the question will arise as to whether this Government shall take cognizance of the first definitive act of this constituent assembly in Coclaring by proclamation or otherwise that it adopts a republican form of government, or whether we shall wait until the constitution has been adopted and the new Government formally established

Our latest precedent—that of Portugal 1—is in favor of the first course, and our precedents generally may be said to be in favor of the earliest recognition consistent with the usual standards of international law and our national interests.

On the other hand, it seems quite certain that none of the other government, with the possible exception of Germany, would be inclined to join us in such recognition before the constitution had been adopted and the new Government fully established in accordance therewith, at which time Great Britain and France as well as Germany might be willing to join us, while it is probable that Japan and Russia would desire, if possible, to delay action still further by demanding certain formal guaranties of the rights of foreigners acquired by treaty or usage.

The position taken in the President's message quoted above is broad enough to cover either of these courses.

The question, therefore, becomes one of policy and the choice would be between, on the one hand, acting in accordance with our precedents and getting for this administration any advantage that might be attached to the prompt recognition of the Republic and, on the other hand, consistently adhering to our policy of cooperation, which we believe has thus far been to the best interests of China.

It is possible that by adopting the second alternative we might reach a definite understanding with England, France, and Germany that they would act with us without further delay when the new Government had been regularly established, in which case Japan and Russia also doubtless would join. Should we act independently on the first alternative it is quite probable that England and France would then wait until their allies, Japan and Russia, were ready to act and general recognition by the powers, which would be of the greatest value to China, would be thereby considerably delayed. Any understanding such as that above mentioned, unless it could be acted upon before March 4, might be an embarrassment to the next administration.

A third possibility would be simply to stand by the position taken in the

A third possibility would be simply to stand by the position taken in the message and await developments without either taking cognizance of any preliminary proclamation or making any attempt at an understanding with the other powers, allowing the question, if necessary, to go over to the next adminis-

If the first alternative be adopted, it seems that we would be bound in courtesy to give sufficient previous notice of our intention to the other governments with which we have thus far been cooperating to allow them, if they chose, to act simultaneously with us.

The Acting Secretary of State to the Secretary to the President.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 25, 1913.

Dear Mr. Hilles: Referring to our conversation by telephone this morning regarding the request of Dr. Butler for information upon the question of the recognition of the Republic of China, I beg to make the following observations, setting forth quite fully the views of the Department on the subject.

In the recognition of the changes of form of administration in foreign governments, the policy of this country for nearly a century and a half has been to apply the de facto test and be satisfied that the new authority in power exists with the acquiescence of the governed and is in a position to discharge all international obligations pertaining to the state. It has also been the policy to enter into practical relations with the temporary government of such a state, pending final organization. On February 13, 1912, the Foreign Office at Peking notified the American Legation that China had entered upon a formative period and that the Provisional United Government had decided to continue the foreign minister accredited to the United States under the temporary designation of "Provisional Diplomatic Agent." On February 14, 1912, the Chinese Minister officially informed this Government, that the Emperor in abdicating had vested Yuan Shih-Kai with power to adopt and establish a Republican form of government and that pending the establishment of such a government, the diplomatic and consular officers of China abroad are and continue in the discharge of their functions. Pursuant to established policy, the Chinese Minister was promptly admitted to full relations with this Department and the American Minister at Peking was permitted to continue in the exercise of his office. The two countries are therefore practically in full relations during the formative or provisional period.

The Provisional Government has called a Constituent Assembly to frame a constitution, and if the result be to change the existing Provisional Government into a permanent constitutional government with the assent of the governed, the claims of such a government to recognition would, of course, be promptly and sympathetically considered. In the meantime, the diplomatic intercourse of the two countries is complete as far as China has gone, and the United States is in full relations with the Government which announces itself to exist provisionally in virtue of an imperial decree and to be formative only, looking to the eventual establishment of a republican form of

It was upon these grounds that the President in his annual message stated that

During the formative constitutional stage and pending definitive action by the Assembly, as expressive of the popular will, and the hoped-for establishment of a stable republican form of government, capable of fulfilling its international obligations, the United States is, according to precedent, maintaining full and friendly de facto relations with the Provisional Government.

This is the view of the situation taken by the other leading powers and no government whatever has as yet accorded formal recognition to the Republic of China. Under the circumstances it is difficult to see what further action could consistently be taken until the Constituent Assembly has actually met.

Trusting that the above statement contains the desired information,

THE ELECTIONS.

The recent elections for the national House of Representatives and for the provincial assemblies passed off in most districts very * * Some of these assemblies are now in session and quietly. have held the senatorial elections. All are expected to make choice within a few days and the National Assembly will perhaps meet about the middle of April. * * *

THE ADVISORY COUNCIL AND THE PRESIDENT.

The Advisory Council, as the provisional parliament is called, has obstructed the President at every turn. The President having found it difficult to secure the support of the Advisory Council for his policies, has resorted to various methods to overcome the obstruction. At times he has summoned the leaders and reasoned with them; at times he has secured the necessary votes by special favors granted. At times the military have appeared in the galleries of the Council chamber, or the generals have sent strongly worded letters of advice to the Council, which has thus been intimidated into compliance with the President's views. But for over two months now it has been impossible to secure a quorum for the transaction of business except upon three occasions when bills were brought up which the majority favored. * * *

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

One subject of disagreement between the President and the Council has been a Government bill to organize a constitutional committee. The provisional constitution provides that the permanent constitution shall be adopted by the National Assembly, which has not yet convened. The Council, therefore, refuses to pass the measure proposed by the President. But the President holds that the appointment of a committee to draft a constitution does not infringe the provisions of the present constitution, inasmuch as the National Assembly will in any event have to pass upon the work of the committee. His measure is urged as a time-saving expedient. * * *

THE PROVINCES AND PEKING.

Provincial feeling has always been strong in China. Patriotism has been parochial, rather than national, and the provinces having broken away one by one, as they did in the revolution, from the control of Peking, are reluctant to surrender their independence. * * It will doubtless be many months before this question can be adjusted, for the jealousy of the provinces towards one another and towards Peking is no less pronounced than was that of our own colonies towards each other and towards the Federal Government in our own early history.

The situation is made more difficult here by the existence of provincial armies controlled by the military governors of the provinces who are not eager to surrender their present power and profits. The Tutu or Military Governor of Kiangsi has, within a few days past, openly defied the authority of the President. * * been a conflict of authority in Shansi, also. * * * An attempt upon the life of the Civil Governor of Fukien was made at Foochow * * * shortly after his arrival, on February 4th. In the same province, a rebellion has been in progress for some months past in the prefecture of Hsing-hua. * * At the beginning of February, a plot against the Vice President of the Republic was discovered in Wuchang. * * * Other conspiracies have been unearthed in Shang-Northern Manchuria is over-run with hai and Nanking. bandits and a mutiny of the troops in the Chien-tao district occurred on February 6th. * * * Honan is infested with robbers, and the authorities appear to be unable to suppress them. Cities that last year were considering the demolition of their walls are now repairing and strengthening them. A serious outbreak occurred recently in southwestern Shansi, and a missionary writing from Ho-tsin says the people are weary of the Republic and are beginning to shave their heads and again grow queues. The war with Tibet drags on in western Szechuen, where the Chinese troops have suffered severe reverses. Large numbers have deserted. Disorders have occurred also in Kueichou and in Shantung.

THE MONGOLIAN SITUATION.

Of more serious import is the situation in Mongolia. * * * Russians are drilling the Mongol troops and the latter are planning to raid the Chinese settlements in Inner Mongolia at the opening of Spring. * * * Such a conflict, if it lead the Chinese over the border, would furnish all the excuse that Russia would need for attacking China. * * *

Sir: Continuing my No. 772, of March 11, 1913, I have the honor to report further upon the political situation in China, as follows:

COUNCIL AND ASSEMBLY.

* * The Council having refused to sanction the President's proposal for a constitutional committee, the project has been abandoned. The leading political parties are conferring in regard to the matter and it is now proposed that when the Assembly meets it shall at once pass two articles of the constitution providing for the election of a permanent President and the appointment of a Premier and Cabinet; that following this the election shall be held and the new government inaugurated; after which the Assembly will proceed with the drafting of the Constitution.

FINANCES.

The Government has relieved itself temporarily of financial embarrassment by making some small loans. * * * On the other hand, the Minister of Finance reports the situation as improved. Immediate necessities, he says, are met by these small loans and the appeal of the Central Government to the provinces has, he says, brought in some funds. It is evident however that the Government is living from hand to mouth.

MONGOLIA.

According to information received on the 15th instant from the War Office, the Mongols have already begun their attack upon the Chinese frontier settlements. * * *

The American Chargé d'Affaires to the Secretary of State.

[Extract.]

No. 782.]

American Legation, Peking, March 18, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to submit the following observations upon the advisability of a recognition of the Republic of China by the United States of America.

In the reports upon the political situation in China recently sent by the Legation the unsatisfactory condition of the present Provisional Government is to some extent set forth.

It must be admitted that the masses of the people of China take little or no interest in the Republic. They are too ignorant to understand the meaning of the word "republic." * * * Patriotism in China has for the most part been parochial; at best but provincial. Provincial jealousies have been very strong. * * * Recent changes in the organization of the army had created considerable bodies of troops that were serving in their own provinces and thus in sympathy with their fellow provincials as against the Peking Government. Province after province thus broke away from the Empire, with little or no fighting, and declared their independence. By the abdication of the Manchus a reunion of the provinces became possible and a republic was proclaimed. But the brief experience of self-government has awakened, especially in the southern and central provinces, a strong desire to preserve their autonomy, and a jealousy of the authority of the Central Government has developed not unlike that which the American colonies displayed toward the Federal Government at the close of our own Revolution. For this reason the present republican Government in Peking has been left almost without revenue and finds it difficult to enforce its authority when opposed to local interests.

But, on the other hand, it remains a fact that the people, however indifferent to the form of government, are making no resistance to the They are a peaceable people and have shown themselves quick to appreciate any measure looking toward the improvement of their condition by the development of the natural resources of their country, the improvement of communications, the introduction of various new industries, and the opening of schools, and there can be no doubt whatever that, given time, they will show themselves capable of self-government. * * * Parochialism, too, is slowly disappearof self-government. ing with the spread of education and by the extension of railways and steamship lines, which have made intercommunication easier. The encroachments of the foreigner have done much to hasten this recognition of national interests. The coming of the missionary into the remotest corners of the country, bringing with him a broader outlook upon the world, and the intermingling of Christians from all the provinces in the national gatherings that have been held in recent years have aided this tendency in a very marked degree.

Furthermore, the Provisional President has shown marvelous tact in reconciling the conflicting interests of the provinces and strengthening the bonds of the union. The disorders which have occurred in various provinces are, after all, no worse than those which were of frequent occurrence under the Manchus. When it is realized what a great revolution has occurred, it is surprising that order has been so well maintained. * * *

Taking all these facts into consideration, it seems to me that even the most discouraging features of the situation in China are not of a sort to recommend delay in recognizing the new Government.

There is no rival government contending with it for the possession of the country. The Manchus are not offering any resistance to it. It was established, in fact, by the cooperation of the Manchu Government, which abdicated with the object of preventing further civil strife. It has complete possession of all the provinces of China proper and of Manchuria. Outer Mongolia declared its independence before the Republic was formed. Tibet is engaged in strife with the Republic, but Tibet has always been autonomous, as indeed is true also of Mongolia. The elections just held throughout the 22 provinces, in spite of the delays and deadlocks occurring in some, show that the people who really take any interest in the political situation mean to stand by the Republic. But even if it should prove true that a dictatorship or an empire is to succeed the present Government it would be no more than has happened in the case of other republics recognized by the United States, and there is nothing in the anticipation of such an event to encourage us to withhold from this strugling Republic a sympathetic recognition by the Mother of Republics.

Such a recognition would of itself do much to prevent a return to imperialism. The Chinese have an exaggerated idea of the importance of recognition by the western powers. They have been especially chagrined by the failure of the United States to recognize their new Government. They are confidently expecting that when the National Assembly meets and the President is elected the foreign powers will recognize the Republic.

I believe that our own should be the first government to do so. It will greatly strengthen the good feeling toward us already existing, and it may serve to prevent the making by other governments of such unjust conditions of recognition as have in some cases been proposed. Great Britain has stated that it will not recognize the Republic until China shall have entered into a new convention with it respecting Tibet. Others are suggesting other conditions—some the reorganization of the courts; some the abolition of likin; some the enlargement of foreign jurisdiction in the treaty ports.

I do not believe that any real advantage is to be gained by wounding Chinese pride and arousing the enmity of those with whom we must deal in the settlement of outstanding questions and in the promotion of American interests. There must be mutual respect, if international intercourse is to be of any value.

I have the honor to suggest that, while the cooperation of the great powers has resulted in much good to China, if a continuance of that policy requires us to withhold recognition of the Republic until all are agreed to recognize it, we may injure our interests and merely promote the aggressive designs of others.

I have [etc.]

Happy to learn of your assumption of the office of Secretary of State I beg to congratulate you heartily and assure you of my sincere wishes for your personal happiness and prosperity. I feel grateful for the renewed expression by the Government of the United States¹ of sympathy and good will toward the Chinese Republic. Remembering with appreciation your own generous interest in the well being of my country as seen on the occasion of your visit to us five years ago as well as on other occasions, I cannot refrain from hoping with confidence that the traditional relations between China and the United States, always friends at heart and now sisters in liberty, will be even more closely cemented by your eminent hands and that the first step you will see fit to take in this direction may be to urge President Wilson, loyal to the glorious traditions of the United States, to be the first representative of a great and generous nation to introduce the Republic of China into the family of nations.

The Acting Secretary of State to the Secretary to the President.

[Extract.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 27, 1913.

My Dear Mr. Tumulty: I send for the President's perusal a memorandum of a conversation I have had today with the Secretary of the Brazilian Embassy, in relation to the recognition of China.

Very cordially yours,

ALVEY A. ADEE.

[Inclosure.]

Memorandum of Interview, March 27, 1913.

The Secretary of the Brazilian Embassy (for the Ambassador) called upon Mr. Adee this morning to say that the Ambassador had received a telegram from his Government asking if the American Government has taken any steps about the recognition of China.

Mr. Adee said that the matter was under careful consideration by the President, but that nothing further would be done until after Mr. Bryan's return.

Merely by way of unofficial observation, Mr. Adee added that this Government is already in de facto relations with the existing Government of China. Our Minister in China carries on business with the new Government and the Chinese Minister is treated on the same footing here as the ministers of other powers. Diplomatic relations between the two countries are therefore continuing just as usual; but of course complete recognition of the nature of the Government will depend upon our being advised of the present status thereof, and it is this phase of the matter to which the President and the Secretary of State are now giving due consideration.

The Secretary of Embassy thanked Mr. Adee, and said the Ambassador would bring up the matter in a week or so with Mr. Bryan, by which time perlans a conclusion will have been reached.

¹ This probably alludes to the interview with the Assistant Secretary of State on March 25 (see Loan negotiations, p. 175); also to the declaration of policy sent to Peking March 19 (see pp. 170-171).

The Minister for Foreign Affairs requests me to express the desire of President Yuan for immediate recognition by the United States, and in view of the tension existing I add my recommendation thereof. President Yuan believes such recognition would greatly strengthen his Government in popular esteem and also with the Assembly, which will soon convene.

The Second Assistant Secretary to the Secretary of State.

[Memorandum.]

Mr. Secretary: In response to your request I endeavor to formulate my personal views in regard to the general question of recognizing foreign governments, and in respect to the peculiar conditions in the case of China.

It will, I think, simplify the matter to keep in mind the distinction between the recognition necessary to the conduct of international business between two countries and the recognition of the form of government professed by a foreign country.

In the former case, ever since the American Revolution entrance upon diplomatic intercourse with foreign states has been de facto, dependent upon the existence of three conditions of fact: the control of the administrative machinery of the state; the general acquiescence of its people; and the ability and willingness of their government to discharge international and conventional obligations. The form of government has not been a conditional factor in such recognition; in other words, the de jure element of legitimacy of title has been left aside, probably because liable to involve dynastic or constitutional questions hardly within our competency to adjudicate, especially so when the organic form of government has been changed, as by revolution, from a monarchy to a commonwealth or vice versa. The general practice in such cases has been to satisfy ourselves that the change was effective and to enter into relation with the authority in de facto possession.

In some instances of such changes in the form of government, there have been distinct stages in the process of evolution: as in the case of Brazil, where the Empire gave place to the Provisional Government of the Republic, this being in turn succeeded by a Constitutional Federal Republic with an elected President. Again, upon the downfall of the Second French Empire, the reins of authority were taken up by the Government of National Defence of France which continued until the Republic was proclaimed by the Constituent Assembly and a President was chosen. On these occasions the United States entered at once into relations with the governing authority at each stage, by giving notice through our diplomatic representative. The same thing occurred in Portugal, when the Monarchy was replaced by the revolutionary Provisional Republic, and this by the final proclamation of the Portuguese Republic by the Constituent Assembly.

The case, in China, was and is more complex than either of those cited. At my request Mr. Miller has prepared a statement, hereto appended, showing the successive stages of the movement and the character of our relations with the governing authority of China. I may briefly remark that at the outset of the revolution which brought about the abdication of the Emperor, there were for a time two distinct forms of republican government. The southern provinces proclaimed the Republic of China, and by the vote of their revolutionary assembly chose Sun Yat Sen as President. In the north, the Emperor on abdicating, placed the administrative power in the hands of Yuan Shih Kai, for the purpose of framing a republican form of government. The merger of these two elements was soon effected by the resignation of Sun Yat Sen, and the acceptance of Yuan Shih Kai's presidency by the assembly of the southern provinces. Therewith, the southern assembly disappeared as an independent constitutional factor by being merged with the Advisory Council at Peking, and the control of China remained under one administrative head as provided by the Provisional Constitution.

The United States at no time entered into diplomatic relations with the southern republic of Sun Yat Sen. The American Legation at Peking continued to discharge all diplomatic functions and transacted business with the administration of Yuan Shih Kai, upon being notified that he had assumed power and that China had entered upon the "formative" period of republican existence. The notification made by the Chinese Minister in Washington to the effect that he was charged, as Provisional Diplomatic Agent of China, with the conduct of international business, was accepted and he has since been treated in every respect on the same footing as the accredited Ministers of the other Powers. The status of the American Minister at Peking has remained unchanged. Every usual function of international intercourse between sovereign states has been performed, although informally, in the regular course, and consular exequaturs have been asked and granted on both sides according to the established formalities.

Since the initial notification of the establishment of the Provisional Government of Yuan Shih Kai, and of the title and status of the Chinese representative in Washington, there has been no announcement of any change in the administrative system of China. That the formative stage still continues may be inferred from the recent official communication, by the Chinese Minister, of the intelligence that the now-elected Constituent Assembly is to meet on the 8th of April, 1913.

The latest communication in this regard that has reached us is the telegram from Chargé Williams, dated Peking, March 28 (today), conveying "the desire of President Yuan for immediate recognition by the United States." This would seem on its face not to be a request for the recognition of the Chinese Republic as a republic, but rather suggests Yuan Shih Kai's wish to have his status as President recognized in some more explicit way than it has hitherto been. This inference may find support in Mr. William's mention of "the tension existing," which may refer to the reported activities of the adherents of Yuan Shih Kai and Sun Yat Sen, mentioned in the memorandum of the Far Eastern Division.

You have asked my views on the question of recognition in general, and as affecting the Chinese situation in particular.

In the practice of the United States, there are several formulae of recognition.

The first and most usual is, the notification, by the American representative at the foreign capital, that he is instructed to enter into relations with the new government. This is ordinarily supplemented by informing the foreign minister (if there be one) in Washington in a like sense.

The second, and the course very generally followed in other countries, is the acknowledgment, by the President, of a letter addressed to him by the head of the new foreign government announcing his assumption of authority. (It is in this way that King George V is reported to intend to recognize General Huerta as Constitutional interim President of the United Mexican States—that being the style and title used by General Huerta in his formal letter of announcement.)

The third, also usual in the intercourse of states, is the reception of an envoy by the President, in audience for the purpose of presenting his letters of credence.

The fourth is the reception, by the President, of the continuing diplomatic agent of the foreign state, for the purpose of making oral announcement of the change of government. In both these two latter cases, the complimentary addresses of the envoy and the President suffice to define and accentuate the scope of the recognition so effected.

A fifth method may be available, namely, the formal delivery by the American envoy at the foreign capital, to the head of the new government, of a message of recognition from the President, or of a congratulatory resolution of the American Congress if one have been passed.

The sixth method, which was adopted in the case of Portugal and Spain (and, I think, in the case of the French Republic, 1871) is to supplement the recognition of a provisional or interim government by a formal announcement of recognition, made by the American envoy, upon the adoption of a new form of government by the national assembly of the foreign state.

You have invited my suggestion as to the form of recognition preferably to be given in the present case of China. I answer, with considerable diffidence:

1. If the purpose be to recognize more emphatically the existing government of China in the person of its present Head, Yuan Shih Kai, that could be immediately effected by granting the Chinese Minister audience to deliver to the President the telegram of congratulation entrusted to him by Yuan Shih Kai. This, however, would not of itself have the effect of recognizing the Republic of China as a Republic but would be a confirmatory supplement to our present acceptance of Yuan Shih Kai as the responsible head of the Chinese administration, although it would be open to the President to embody in his reply-address a designation of China as a Republic.

2. If, however, the intention be to make effective recognition of the form of government in China as being that of a Republic, the sixth alternative as above described would appear to be in order if, as is anticipated, the forthcoming National Assembly which is to meet on April 8th should proclaim the Republic and proceed to its definite organization. To ensure immediate action in such a contingency, the American Legation at Peking could be instructed in advance to make the appropriate announcement so soon as the Assembly acts. This course was adopted in the Portuguese instance, as will be seen by the annexed copy of the telegraphic instruction sent on June 6, 1911, to the Legation at Lisbon.

Respectfully submitted,

ALVEY A. ADEE.

Memorandum by the Division of Far Eastern Affairs on the development and character of the existing Government in China.

Early in the disturbances the revolutionary military leaders in the various Yangtze provinces and in southern China established a cabinet form of government with Nanking as headquarters, and convoked in that city an assembly composed of their special representatives, thirty-four in number. On December 29, 1911, this assembly unanimously elected Sun Yat Sen Provisional President of the Republic of China and he was inaugurated as such on New Year's Day at that city.

On February 12, 1912, the Throne abdicated in favor of a republican form of government, at the same time conferring on Yuan Shih Kai full power to organize such a government.3 Three days later Yuan was unanimously elected Provisional President by the Nanking Assembly (Yuan had previously been elected to this position by the Peking Assembly) and the resignation of Sun Yat Sen and his Cabinet was accepted by the Assembly to take effect on the inauguration of Nanking Assembly to take effect on the inauguration of Nanking and ration of Yuan, which occurred at Peking on March 10, 1912.4

On February 13 the Chief of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, referring to the present as the time of the formation of a Provisional United Government, officially informed the American Minister at Peking, for transmission to the Department, that the foreign minister accredited to the Government of the United States would temporarily be designated "Provisional Diplomatic Agent."

On March 10, the date of Yuan Shih Kai's inauguration, a Provisional Constitution, previously approved by the Peking Assembly and other governmental authorities there, was adopted by the Nanking Assembly providing that within ten months after its promulgation the Provisional President should convene a representative National Assembly at Peking to adopt a permanent Constitution and elect a President, thereby providing for the normal establishment of constitutional government. In the meantime the authority of the State was to be exercised by the Advisory Council, the Provisional President, the Cabinet and the Judiciary. The various ways in which the Chief Executive has been referred to at different times are shown in the accompanying annex.

Early in May, after the formation of a coalition Government under Yuan, the Department telegraphed the Legation at Peking to report promptly as to how far, in the judgment of the Legation, and in the light of the more recent reports from our consuls, the situation in China was responsive to the conditions of recognition of governments under international law and specifically in what respects the Provisional Government still fell short of the requirements. In reply the Department received the following telegram, dated May 7:

The present coalition government is nominally in possession of 20 provinces under military governors, the extent of whose submission to the Central Government is problematical. The north and south are not yet well fused but the only organized resistance is in Mongolia, Kansuh, Turkestan and Tibet. There is acquiescence but not hearty support on the part of the wealthy and educated and the real will of the mass of the people is not known. The National Council can not therefore be considered representative. The Government was established by the political maneuvers of a few, not by general demand of the people, but it is the only government in sight and recognition would strengthen its hold on the country, particularly if given by concerted action of the powers.

In July the Department addressed a circular telegram 2 to all the principal powers having important interests in China, as follows:

Confidential. The powers are in full accord, the American Government believes, in the view that a stable central government is the first desideratum in China and that formal recognition by the powers, when granted, would go far to confirm the stability of the established government.

The Provisional Government appears now to be generally in possession of the administrative machinery, to be maintaining order, and to be exercising its functions with the acquiescence of the people. The situation accordingly seems to resolve itself to the question whether there are any substantial reasons why recognition should longer be withheld. Would the Government of Iname of countryl now be disposed to consider whether the

Would the Government of [name of country] now be disposed to consider whether the present Chinese Government may not be regarded as so far substantially conforming to the accepted standards of international law as to merit formal recognition?

The Governments were unanimous in replying that, in the light of their reports, they did not regard conditions such as to warrant the consideration of the question of the formal recognition of the present Government until he assurance of its permanent stability should be of a more promising nature and until it should itself have been confirmed by the vote of the National Assembly convoked for the purpose and regularly invested with authority to express the will of the people.³

During the past few months the situation has not changed in any material respect. Order has been maintained generally throughout the country while financial conditions and international relations have at times appeared critical. The primary elections have been going on throughout the country since early in December, 1912, for the members of the new National Assembly which, by recent Presidential order, is to be convened on April 8.

Since the inauguration of the new régime there have been many changes in the system of government. The effect of these changes has not yet been fully realized and many administrative reforms, though duly promulgated, have not yet come into force. The control of the central Government over the provinces is not clearly defined, with the result that there is constant friction and misunderstanding between Peking and the provinces. The most important controversial points of difference are the system of national taxation, the contracting of foreign loans, railway construction and the appointment of provincial officials. The entire system of central and provincial administration is still in a transition stage and cannot be expected to assume a permanent form until the National Assembly has met and adopted a permanent constitution.

It is understood that the election returns in the provinces point to a decided majority in the permanent assembly for the Kuo Min Tang, or citizens party, which is the party of Sun Yat Sen and Tong Shao Yi and represents a consolidation of several minor parties generally considered to be opposed to Yuan Shih Kai. Yuan's party is the Kung Ho Tang, or republican conservative party, whose leader is Li Yuan Hung, the Vice President of the Republic. It is probable that Yuan will, nevertheless, be elected President since it seems to be appreciated by all that serious political trouble might arise if any attempt were made by the citizens' party to elect a President from their own ranks and to oust Yuan. It is doubtful if any party, no matter what its majority, could be successful in an attempt at forcing him to give up office as his position is strengthened by the large military forces at Peking and in northern provinces which are known to be loyal to him. The conflict of authority between the central and provincial governments as well as the uncertainty of Yuan's election are doubtless the causes of the existing tension referred to in the telegram from Peking of March 28.

The German Ambassador called this afternoon and said that he had received instructions from his Government to remind the Department of the understanding that had been reached, in response to the representations made by the Japanese Government in February, 1912, that the powers would act in concert in the matter of the recognition of the Republic of China. I replied that the matter was receiving the most careful consideration of the Secretary; that, of course, I was not in position to anticipate what his decision would be, but for the sake of accuracy I reminded the Ambassador that our agreement to the Japanese proposal at that time had been qualified by the reservation "so long as this course shall entail no undue delay" and that, therefore, the United States could not be held to be explicitly bound in view of the fact that over a year had elapsed since that time. I stated that the question now was only one of comity and that I was confident the Secretary had this point in mind in his consideration of the matter.

The Ambassador repeated that his instructions were not to suggest that China should or should not be recognized at this time, but only to remind the Department of the agreement as to concerted action.

No. 796.]

AMERICAN LEGATION, Peking, April 1, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to report that there has been considerable agitation in political circles for ten days past, due for the most part to the recent assassination of Sung Chiao-jen, who was Minister of Commerce and Industries in the first republican cabinet in Peking that organized by Tong Shao-yi. When Tong resigned, Sung followed his chief into retirement, but has been very active in promoting the interests of the Kuo Ming Tang or Nationalist Party, of which he was the elected leader. He was credited with the authorship of the policy, advocated by that party, which demanded a responsible cabinet composed of members of the party or parties controlling the National Assembly. He had endeavored to have this policy adopted by the Provisional Government. President Yuan, it is alleged by Sung's friends, had repeatedly declared that he would not be President with Sung for Premier. The Kuo Ming Tang is now busily engaged in circulating certain reports of alleged occurrences, which, as circumstantial evidence, tend to fasten the crime of Sung's assassination upon the President and his Cabinet. The whole country is excited by these reports and the prophets of evil are adding to the unrest by their predictions of impending trouble.

Mr. Sung had been attending a conference of his party at Shanghai and on the evening of the 20th of March he started for Peking in company with other members of the forthcoming National Assembly. While waiting to take the train at the Shanghai station, he was shot by one Wu Fu-ming, who easily escaped in the excitement occasioned by the crime and took refuge in the French Concession.

On the 23rd instant, the assassin was arrested in the French Concession and confessed his guilt, stating that he had been hired to commit the crime by a Mr. Ying Kuei-hsing. * * *
Wu Fu-ming and Ying Kuei-hsing last week had preliminary hearings in Shanghai; the former in the French Concession, the latter in the International Settlement. Wu confessed, as stated above; Ying was remanded for one week and was to have been brought up for trial yesterday.

The Diplomatic Representatives met yesterday afternoon to consider the request of the Chinese Government that the accused persons be handed over to the Chinese authorities for trial. After a careful consideration of the provisions of the treaties and precedents bearing upon the case, the Dean was instructed to reply as follows:

The Dean has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the Wai Chiao Pu's letter of the 27th March with reference to the murder of Sung Chiao-jen, in which it was requested that the murderer, Wu Fu-ming, and others, together with Ying Luei-hsing and all the witnesses, should be remitted to the Chinese authorities on the ground that the crime was committed on Chinese territory and that the guilty parties and the victim were all Chinese subjects.

The Dean is authorized by his Colleagues to state, in reply, that Wu Fu-ming is in the hands of the authorities of the French Concession at Shanghai and that his case should be treated separately with his excellency the French Minister. As to Ying Kuei-hsing, who is in the hands of the authorities of the International Settlement, the Dean is instructed to say that the Diplomatic Body have no objection to his being handed over to the Chinese authorities, provided that a prima facie case of his guilt is established to the satisfaction of the Mixed Court of the International Settlement.

It seems incredible that the President could have had any knowledge of the plot to assassinate Sung, since he could not have deceived himself into believing that such an attack upon the leader of the opposition would not at once place the Government under suspicion and weaken his hold upon the country. He has proved himself an astute politician in the past and could undoubtedly have compassed Sung's defeat without resorting to such measures. It is not impossible, however, that some overzealous follower of Yuan may have thought he was aiding the President's cause by planning such a crime.

But it is not at all necessary to implicate any of Yuan's followers in order to account for the murder of Sung. Nationalist Party is a conglomeration of a number of small parties. The leaders of these small parties are not free from jealousy, one of another, and it is reasonably sure that they are not agreed upon the policies advocated by Sung. Jealousy aroused by his ascendancy in the counsels of the party would account for the attack upon him and the resort to such a crime is not at all surprising when one reflects that the revolutionists for years past have preached and practiced assassination. They must expect to reap what they sow.

The "Republican Advocate" of Shanghai threatens that Sung's death will be avenged by a reign of terror more frightful than that of the French Revolution. But such talk is easy under the protection of the Foreign Settlement of Shanghai which has always been a city of refuge or, more properly speaking, a cave of Adullam for conspirators against the Government, whether it be Manchu Monarchy, or Chinese Republic. But, while there may be no reign of terror at hand, there is undoubtedly too much talk on the one side of bombthrowing and assassination, and too much disposition on the other side to resort to summary execution to get rid of dangerous opponents; and it is quite true that leaders of both sides are in constant dread of attack.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs receives threatening letters every day and the President has left his residence but two or three times since his inauguration and has had the streets heavily guarded when he went out.

The really serious feature of the situation is that the peace of the whole country seems to depend upon this one man. Even the Nationalists seem to have no one to present as a candidate for the presidency. * * * With such a lack of men of national calibre, what would happen to the country if Yuan were to be taken away? I can anticipate nothing but chaos. If foreign intervention could be prevented, there would undoubtedly come in due time the strong man who could and would restore peace and order, but time would be indispensable to the accomplishment of such a result.

The only hope for the preservation of order, it seems to me, is in the continuance of Yuan Shih-K'ai in power. If he should be spared, there is a possibility that the Republic may last and that the establishment of representative government may in time bring into prominence men of large mould, real statesmen, who can command the allegiance of the nation.

The recognition of the Republic by the foreign powers would undoubtedly do much to strengthen Yuan in the eyes of the people and in the estimation of the forthcoming National Assembly, and thus tend to quiet the prevailing unrest and the ever-present fear of disorder. There is no other government contending with his for recognition and he has no rival for the presidency worthy of mention. Therefore, in my telegram of March 28th, I have recommended immediate recognition by the American Government. It is not that I believe Yuan to be an ideal president or a brilliant statesman, but simply that, in my opinion, the only choice lies between Yuan and chaos, and that the sooner we recognize his Government, the better it will be for China and for American interests in China.

I have [etc.]

IMPERIAL JAPANESE EMBASSY, WASHINGTON.

The Japanese Ambassador, having reported to his Government of the aide mémoire handed to him by the Honorable the Secretary of State on April 2, in announcement of the purpose of the President on the subject of recognition to be accorded to the Government of China, has been instructed to express to the American Administration the cordial thanks of the Japanese Government for the important communication. The Japanese Government have always been no less anxious to find an early opportunity justifying such recognition. Having, however, in view the actual situation in China, and more especially the incident connected with the assassination of Sung Chiao-Jen in which the Peking authorities have been charged with being an accomplice, and which might eventually develop into serious complications between the North and the South, threatening the order and security of the country, the Japanese Government entertain a grave apprehension that the recognition, at this moment, of the Government in which Mr. Yuan Shi-Kai is provisionally the chief magistrate, would practically amount to an interference in favor of Mr. Yuan against the Southern Faction headed by Mr. Sun Yat-Sen and Mr. Huang Hsing, and would prove prejudicial, not only to the foreign Powers, but also to the true interest of China. Accordingly, the Japanese Government feel it due to frankness to confess their inability, much to their regret, to co-operate in the prompt recognition of the new Government. They venture to hope that the American Government may find it possible and advisable to watch the further development of the situation in China, and to defer the action now proposed until definite establishment of repose and tranquility shall have been assured.

Department of State, Washington, April 6, 1913—11 p. m.

If there should be more than the ordinary delays in organizing for business when the National Assembly shall have convened you will report and receive further instructions. When the Assembly shall have convened with a quorum and is organized for business by the election of its officers, you will communicate the following message to the President of China as coming from the President of the United States of America.

His Excellency Yuan Shih Kai, President of China:

The Government and people of the United States of America, having abundantly testified their sympathy with the people of China upon their assumption of the attributes and powers of self-government, deem it opportune at this time, when the representative National Assembly has met to discharge the high duty of setting the seal of full accomplishment upon the aspirations of the Chinese people, that I extend, in the name of my Government and of my countrymen, a greeting of welcome to the new China thus entering into the family of nations. In taking this step I entertain the confident hope and expectation that in perfecting a republican form of government the Chinese nation will attain to the highest degree of development and well being, and that under the new rule all the established obligations of China which passed to the Provisional Government will in turn pass to and be observed by the Government established by the Assembly.

You will inform consuls and commander in chief of Asiatic Squadron, and report execution of this instruction.

Note.—The British Ambassador on April 7 replied to the Department's aide mémoire of April 2, stating that he was instructed "to inform you that His Majesty's Government feel obliged to adhere to the views which they have always held as to the conditions which should precede the recognition of that Government. These conditions, which are already known to the United States Government, are as follows: 1. That the powers should act in concert. 2. That formal confirmation should be secured of the rights, privileges, and immunities enjoyed by British subjects as the result of treaties and established customary usage." The Ambassador added his Government's suggestion to consider whether the proposed recognition by the United States "might not with advantage be deferred until a fuller assurance of the stability of the Government and of the maintenance of tranquility in the country has been obtained. Such a course might well prove to be in the interests of China herself. In any case His Majesty's Government could not take any action of the kind indicated by you without a full exchange of views with the powers having missions at Peking, and it was practically impossible that such an interchange of communications could be effected within the period suggested by your Government." (File No. 893.00/1667.)

that such an interchange of communications could be effected within the period suggested by your Government." (File No. 893.00/1667.)

The Minister of Denmark wrote to the Secretary of State on April 8: "The Danish Minister of Foreign Affairs cables me to-day that much to his regret he is for the present unable to join in the recognition as proposed by the President of the United States." (File

No. 893.00/1603.)

The Chargé d'Affaires of Austria-Hungary on April 8 replied: "I have now been instructed by my Government to thank your excellency for your communication, but to say that we can not see in the opening of the Chinese Parliament a sufficient motive for the recognition of the Government of China and therefore must reserve us the liberty of our decision." (File No. 893.00/1606.)

The Foreign Office of Italy, on April 8, referred the American Ambassador to its decision as stated August 5, 1912 (see For. Rel. 1912, p. 85), adding that "conditions at that time prevailing do not seem to have sufficiently improved to strengthen the new Government in a definite way. The Italian Government therefore considers it still too early and premature to take a view different from that then expressed." (File No. 893.00/1605.)

The Ambassador of France on April 9 replied that he had been instructed to say that while sincerely appreciating the motives of this Government in favoring the simultaneous adhesion of France to its plan for recognition, the French Government, "with all its desire to manifest its good will to the Chinese nation, holds for its part that it would be premature to recognize an organization which, leaving aside questions of stability that must nevertheless be taken into consideration, has not yet been sanctioned by those concerned therein. Indeed, there is before us but a provisional government which neither the people nor its representatives have vet confirmed. It is with a view to such confirmation that the Constituent Assembly was called and the formation in China of a definitive government hangs on the result of It therefore seems to my Government that the de facto relations, which are besides perfectly cordial and courteous, at present maintained by it with the Chinese Republic are, for the time being, best suited to the condition in which the new organization is still placed." A declaration to the world was read at the opening ceremony when the two Houses of the National Assembly met in joint session, as follows:

[Translation.]

On this 8th day of the 4th month in the 2d year of the Republic of China, the date fixed for the first opening of our permanent National Assembly, the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, having met in these halls to celebrate the event, now make this declaration of their sentiments.

The will of Heaven is manifested through the will of the people. That the hundreds of millions of the people possess the authority of the State is not proclaimed now for the first time. The Monarchy, so long corrupt, proved unworthy of the grave responsibilities intrusted to it by the will of the people, but with the introduction of popular government the representatives of the people must share the likes and dislikes of the people. They are to give expression to the desires and voice the will of the people; they hold the reins in behalf of the nation to govern with severity or leniency, with parsimony or extravagance; they become the pivot upon which the prosperity of the State is made to turn. For the success or failure, safety or danger, adversity or good fortune, theirs is the merit or the blame.

Can we be otherwise than anxious? Yet through great tribulation the spring comes to prosperity, and our very bad management and anxieties are a means to happiness. Now, therefore, we unite to form this Assembly and presume to publish our aspirations: May ours be a just Government! May our five races lay aside their prejudices! May rain and sunshine bring bounteous harvest and cause the husbandman to rejoice! May the scholar be happy in his home and the merchant conduct his trade in peace! May no duty of Government be unfulfilled and no hidden wound go unredressed! Thus may the glory be spread abroad and these our words be echoed far and wide, that those in distant lands who hear may rejoice, our neighbors on every side give us praise, and may the new life of the old nation be lasting and unending! Who of us can dare to be neglectful of his duties!

No. 807.]

American Legation, Peking, April 11, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to report upon the political situation in China as follows:

The members of the Senate and House of Representatives recently elected and constituting the first National Assembly of China met in joint session on the morning of the 8th of April to celebrate by appropriate ceremonies this inauguration of representative government in China.

The ceremonies were held in the hall of the House of Representatives, one of the buildings of the former School of Finance, which had been altered and refitted for the purpose. * * The city was gaily decorated with flags and at the beginning of the ceremonies 101 guns were fired in honor of the event. * * *

When the hour arrived for the beginning of the exercises seven Ministers of the Cabinet filed in and took seats on the dais, and the chairman of the committee in charge of the program, who acted as master of ceremonies, called the Assembly to order. There were 682 members in attendance—that is to say, 179 Senators out of a total of 274 and 503 representatives out of a total of 596.

By agreement of the political parties, at a meeting held on the 6th of April, it had been decided that the oldest man in the Assembly should take the chair. The honor thus came to Mr. Yang Ch'ung, a Senator from Yunnan. He called upon the Secretary of the Advisory Council (Provisional Assembly), Mr. Lin Ch'ang-min, to read an address which had been drawn up by a committee appointed for that purpose at the interparty caucus on the 6th instant. A translation of this address was telegraphed to the Department on the 10th of April. The address is written in classical style and is full of literary allusions which can be recognized only by the initiated, since there is no acknowledgment and no indication of quotation. In other words, the document is a mosaic of phrases culled from classical writings every one of which to the Chinese scholar is full of meaning because he is able to recall the context. For instance, the opening sentence "The will of Heaven is manifested through the will of the people" in the original consists of eight words only and is a condensation of a passage in the Book of Mencius, which is itself a quotation from the Book of History, the oldest extant writing of the Chinese, a passage which reads: "Heaven sees as the people see; Heaven hears as the people hear." It has been impossible, therefore, in the translation made of the address, to convey to the non-Chinese reader the wealth of meaning which it contains.

After the reading of the address the President's representative, Mr. Liang, was called upon to carry to the dais the message of which he was the bearer and lay it upon the Speaker's table.

The chairman then asked the Cabinet Ministers to descend to the floor of the House and, led by the master of ceremonies, the whole Assembly bowed in unison three times to the five-colored flag, the emblem of the Republic, draped behind the Speaker's chair.

The exercises were interspersed with music furnished by a military band in the garden, and the whole ceremony was dignified and im-

The members of the Assembly were, with a very few exceptions, dressed in western costume-black frock coats and silk hats-in striking contrast to the mass of brilliant colors which always characterized a Chinese crowd in the old days.

Had it not been for the reported intention of the American Government to recognize the Chinese Republic on the 8th of April, it is doubtful whether the Assembly would have opened on that day. knowledge of such intention was obtained from the press telegrams which appeared in the papers here. The Legations here were promptly informed by their respective Governments of the contents of the aide mémoire handed to their representatives in Washington by the Department. This report speedily became the topic of the hour.

At a dinner given by the Cabinet to members of the Assembly, on the night of the 8th of April, the President's secretary, Mr. Liang, made a speech in which he referred to the prospect of recognition by the United States and expressed the hope that nothing might occur to unduly delay it. To this speech, Mr. Wu Ching-lien, Speaker of the Advisory Council, replied, saying that the intention of the American Government to recognize the Republic was fully appreciated by the members of the Assembly and that nothing was going to be done to hinder it, but that he desired to point out that the United States was simply waiting for the organization of the Assembly, and that this fact was plain proof that the United States did not propose to recognize a one-man government, but a government by the chosen representatives of the people.

On the night of the 9th instant the Legation was orally informed that the Brazilian Minister in Japan had communicated to the Chinese Minister there the formal recognition by his Government of the Republic of China. This information was officially communicated to the Legation on the 10th instant. In honor of the event, April 12 has been declared a public holiday, the city is to be decorated with Brazilian flags, the public schools are to be closed, and a general celebration is to be had. The Legation was orally informed last evening that Peru also had recognized the Republic, the information having been communicated by cable from Lima. I can not but feel that this action of Brazil and Peru is probably based upon a misunderstanding of the situation here. Neither Government has a representative in Peking, and having learned of the intention of the American Government to recognize the Republic on April 8, upon the meeting of the National Assembly, and having learned of the formal opening of the Assembly, they have probably concluded that recognition by the American Government has already taken place and have thought that they were following our lead in according the recognition given. The Mexican Chargé d'Affaires has received instructions to act with this Legation and has fully explained to his Government the cause of the delay in giving recognition. The Ministers of Italy, the Netherlands, and Belgium have all expressed to me their desire to have the Republic recognized at an early date by their respective Governments, but have recommended to their Foreign Offices to withhold such recognition until the election of a President.

Since the ceremonial opening of the Assembly there has been no session of either House, but numerous conferences of the political parties have been held. * * *

Note.—The Spanish Minister on April 17 at a conference with the Counselor of the Department of State orally conveyed the reply of his Government: "that inasmuch as Spain has no political interests in China, the recognition by the Spanish Government of the new Republic of China will follow the recognition of that Government by the majority of the other Powers." IMPERIAL AND ROYAL AUSTRO-HUNGARIAN EMBASSY, WASHINGTON. [Undated.]

AIDE MÉMOIRE.

The Imperial Japanese Embassy in Vienna has communicated to the Foreign Office a circular telegram of its Government according to which said Government considers as opportune to put now its proposal of February 1912 concerning the recognition of the Chinese Republic which had met with general consent into a concrete form.

The Government suggest that the powers should recognize the Chinese Republic as far as possible at the same time when in the course of the present session of Parliament lasting tranquility in the country should appear secured and the fulfillment of the international obligations to China to be guaranteed also by the new Government. The choice of the suitable moment should be left to the diplomatic representatives in Peking and the recognition effectuated through the Powers following common proposition of their representatives by means of identical notes drafted by said representatives and delivered to the Chinese Government.

I request your excellency to inform yourself how the Japanese proposal has been received by the American Government and to add that Count Berchtold would be disposed to give to the Imperial and Royal Minister at Peking the necessary instructions in the sense of the Japanese proposal if the other cabinets were willing to do the same.

The Department of State to the Austro-Hungarian Embassy.

By an undated aide mémoire from the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Embassy at Washington the Department of State learns that the Imperial Japanese Embassy in Vienna has communicated to the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Office a circular telegram from the Imperial Japanese Government, according to which that Government considers it opportune now to put its proposal of February, 1912, concerning the recognition of the Chinese Republic into concrete form, and that Count Berchtold would be disposed to give the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Minister at Peking the necessary instructions in the sense of the Japanese proposal, if the other Cabinets were willing to do likewise.

From the aide mémoire it appears that the proposal of the Imperial Japanese Government is that the powers should recognize the Chinese Republic as far as possible at the same time, when in the course of the present session of Parliament lasting tranquility in the country should appear secured and the fulfillment of the international obligations of China should be guaranteed by the new Government; that choice of the suitable moment should be left to the diplomatic representatives in Peking, and that the recognition should be effected by means of identical notes drafted by said representatives and delivered to the Chinese Government.

With respect to the wish of the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government to be informed of the attitude of the Government of the United States towards the Japanese proposal, the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Embassy is informed that the President has directed the American representative at Peking to present the President's letter of recognition as soon as the Chinese Constituent Assembly is organized by the election of officers and that the President has expressed the desire that other nations join in recognizing the Chinese Republic at the same time.

PEKING, MAY 2, 1913.

In the name of the Republic of China I thank you most heartily for the message of recognition which you have sent to me through your honored representative in this capital. The sentiments of amity and good will which it bespeaks and the expressions of greeting and welcome which it conveys at once testify to the American spirit of mutual helpfulness and adds another brilliant page to the history of 70 years of uninterrupted friendly intercourse between China and the United States. Though unfamiliar with the republican form of government the Chinese people are yet fully convinced of the soundness of the principle which underlies it and which is so luminously represented by your glorious Commonwealth. The sole aim of the Government which they have established, therefore, is and will be to preserve this form of government and to perfect its workings to the end that they may enjoy its unalloyed blessings, prosperity, and happiness within, through union of law and liberty and peace and friendship without, through the faithful execution of all established obligations.

No. 841.]

American Legation, Peking, May 6, 1913.

Sir: In compliance with your telegraphic instruction of April 6, 11 p. m., I have the honor to report that the message of President Wilson, according recognition to the Chinese Republic, was delivered to President Yuan Shih-kai on Friday, May 2, at 11 o'clock a. m.

The conditions precedent to recognition laid down in your instruction, referred to above, were that the National Assembly should have convened with a quorum and organized for business by the election of officers. These conditions were not fulfilled until May 1. The Senate completed its organization on April 25; the House did not elect its Speaker until April 30. As soon as this was done, I intimated to the Foreign Office that the Legation was instructed to deliver a message from the President of the United States of America to the President of China when officially informed of the organization of the two Houses of the Assembly. The information was communicated to the Legation the same evening, and I at once wrote to the Minister for Foreign Affairs asking for the designation of an hour when I might carry out my instructions. He replied at once, fixing Friday, May 2, at 11 a.m. Copies of the notes mentioned are sent

On the 1st of May the House completed its organization by the election of a Vice Speaker.

I was prepared to deliver the message on May 1, since the election of a Vice Speaker could not be considered essential to the working of the House, but the President of the Foreign Office desired to mark the recognition of the Republic by the United States with signal honors and took time to prepare a very elaborate program.

At 10 o'clock a. m. on the 2d of May a state carriage was sent to the Legation with a guard of honor. Accompanied by the staff of the Legation I was driven to the gate of the West Park in which the President's Palace is located. Police and soldiers were stationed at short intervals along the route and the houses were decorated with flags.

After entering the park we were taken across the lake in the old imperial barges and met at the entrance to the President's Palace by the master of ceremonies, Mr. Sun Pao-ch'i; by Admiral Ts'ai T'ingkan, Admiral Ch'eng, and General Yin Ch'ang, chief of the general staff. A guard in the outer court received us with military honors and the President's bodyguard of lancers showed similar honors in the inner court.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs; Mr. Tuan Chih Kuei, a representative of the Premier, who was ill; and other officers were waiting in the principal hall of the palace. The President having been announced, I was conducted to an inner reception room and after a bow, which the President acknowledged, I read the message of President Wilson and handed it to President Yuan, who gave it to the Minister for Foreign Affairs. I then made a brief address, to which the President responded very cordially. I inclose copies of these addresses. Mr. Peck, the assistant Chinese secretary, read the Chinese text of President Wilson's message and of my own remarks, and President Yuan's secretary, Mr. Wellington Ku, a graduate of Columbia University, read the English text of the President's reply. The members of the Legation were all introduced to the President and, after brief conversation, he withdraw. Mr. Lou Tseng-tsiang, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, informed me that the reply of President Yuan to President Wilson had just been telegraphed to Washington and would be presented there.

We were then shown through the grounds and buildings of the West Park and upon our return to the palace President Yuan appeared again and invited us to lunch with him. A military band supplied music during the meal. At its conclusion, a photographer appeared and took several pictures of the company. We then took leave and were escorted back to the Legation * * were escorted back to the Legation.

A simpler procedure would have been more to my taste, but the Chinese are fond of ceremony and display, and in this instance it was perhaps just as well to give prominence to the event because of the rather critical condition of affairs.

The Kuo Min Tang, or Nationalist Party, was attacking the Government very bitterly because of its signature of the reorganization loan with the quintuple group without having first obtained the consent of the National Assembly. Telegrams had been sent to all the Provinces and many strong protests had been received by the Government. It was known, too, that the revolutionary leaders—Dr. Sun Yat-sen, General Huang Hsing and General Ch'en Chi-mei—at Shanghai were plotting a revolution and had attempted to borrow money and purchase arms for this purpose.

To some critics the United States appeared to be recognizing a Government which was about to be overthrown, but the very fact that the American Government carried out its program of recognition without regard to the plottings of the malcontents served to discredit the latter and had an excellent steadying effect throughout the country, increased the respect of the people for the Republic, encouraged the orderly and law-abiding, and tended to promote a better feeling by withdrawing attention from party politics. * * *

On Saturday, May 3, both Houses of the National Assembly passed resolutions thanking the American Government for its action. These resolutions will be communicated to you through the Chinese Minister in Washington.

In accordance with the instructions contained in your telegram of April 6, I informed all the consuls and the commander in chief of the Asiatic Fleet of my intention to deliver the message of recognition and recommended to them a call at the same hour upon the local authorities.

The consuls-general at Shanghai, Hankow, and Canton have already reported the carrying out of their instructions. Great enthusiasm was shown in Hankow and the neighboring city of Wuchang, where criers with gongs were sent about the streets announcing the recognition of the Republic by the United States of America. At Shanghai, too, there was general rejoicing and a celebration of the occasion by appropriate decoration. The Admiral, however, waited until informed that recognition had taken place and exchanged calls with the local officials on Saturday, May 3.

A Chinese-American association here in Peking has prepared an elaborate program for the celebration of the event on the 8th instant and similar celebrations are to be held throughout the country. All of this will have a good effect upon the relations between the two countries and will, it is hoped, do much to consolidate and strengthen the Republic of China.

Introductory remarks by the American Charge d'Affaires.

Mr. President: I am charged by the Secretary of State with the duty of communicating to Your Excellency a message from the President of the United States of America. I esteem it a high honor and a great privilege to be permitted to fulfill this duty.

[Reading of the message of the President of the United States.]

Concluding remarks by the American Chargé d'Affaires.

Mr. President: Having communicated to Your Excellency the message from the President of the United States giving formal recognition of the Republic, I desire for myself and in behalf of my fellow countrymen resident in China to express the satisfaction which we all feel in the action taken by the American Government.

As citizens of a sister republic, we can not be indifferent to anything which affects the success of republican government in China. We shall watch your progress with sympathetic interest, trusting that the hopes which animated the martyrs of the revolution may find their full fruition in the free institutions now being established. We believe in "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

Out of the mists of high antiquity echo the words of the great declaration:

"Heaven sees as the people see; Heaven hears as the people hear."

We rejoice with you to-day in the confident belief that these ancient words have found fulfillment anew; that this new Government, "broad based upon the people's will," by the establishment of lasting peace and equal justice, will minister to the highest happiness of the people of China and merit the blessing of Heaven.

The response of the President.

MR. CHARGÉ D' AFFAIRES: I have listened with the most profound satisfaction to the welcome message of the President of the United States which you have just read, and the assurances of sympathy which you have so eloquently extended to me. On behalf of the Government and people of China I thank you, and also her you to transmit my thanks to the President.

and also beg you to transmit my thanks to the President.

Though young in years, the Republic of China is founded on principles of liberty and freedom which are already deep graven on the hearts of the Chinese people. We believe that through the permanent establishment of this form of government we have found the best means of insuring to us, what you have been enjoying through the same means for 140 years, the "unalienable rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

It is equally gratifying and significant that the political ideas and ideals of two great peoples, though separated by a broad ocean and living under different skies, are of one and the same kind. The declaration in our ancient classics and the words of one of your greatest Presidents, both of which you have just recited, show that the Chinese and the Americans are always united in their love of a government based on the people's will. I am confident in the hope that this common faith in the soundness of republican government will serve to bring China and the United States into a yet closer contact than they are now and to further strengthen the friendly relations which have invariably existed between them.

American Legation, Peking, May 16, 1913.

Sir: Referring to my despatch No. 841 of May 6, 1913, in which mention was made of the attempts of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, General

Huang Hsing and General Ch'en Chi-mei to raise a rebellion against the present Peking Government, I have the honor to report further upon the political situation in China.

There can be no doubt whatever as to the truthfulness of the charges made against the three revolutionary leaders just mentioned.

The manifesto of Dr. Sun Yat-sen against the loan, issued on May 6th, of which a copy is enclosed, is itself evidence of his feeling towards Yuan Shih-k'ai and of his belief at that time that civil war was impending. But the only people who were disposed to make war were those dissatisfied with the government of Yuan; that is to say, the partisans of Dr. Sun. * * *

The common people take no interest in politics and the mercantile community is decidedly opposed to any further disturbance of the peace. The chambers of commerce in various cities sent telegrams to Peking protesting against the plottings of these promoters of a second revolution. * * * It was only after Dr. Sun and General Huang learned that the people were not with them, that money would not be forthcoming for the support of the movement, that they declared they had no thought of creating a revolution.

The movement for a separation of the southern provinces from the Republic is not altogether new. In fact the union of the Nanking Government of 1912 with that of Yuan Shih-k'ai or rather its absorption by the government of Yuan was never to the liking of certain revolutionary leaders. Some saw the perquisites of office slipping from their grasp; others of a higher character distrusted the conservative leaders of the north and did not believe that political reforms were to be expected under such leadership. They have been particularly displeased by the appointment to high office of so many old-fashioned mandarins of the Manchu régime. The foreign-educated Chinese of the south have seen with chagrin that the Government is being carried on under the Republic in very much the same way and to some extent by the very same men as under the Monarchy. Even before the Sung Chiao-jen murder occurred there was serious talk of an attempt to organize another government at Nanking. The Kuo Min Tang, or Nationalist Party, which is opposing Yuan, called a meeting of its leaders at Shanghai before the meeting of the National Assembly at Peking. Predictions were freely made that the representatives of the south would not come to Peking and that a division of the country would be made. Happily, wiser councils prevailed. But the murder of Sung and the signing of the Quintuple Loan gave the discontented further opportunities for agitation of which they were not slow to avail themselves.

For two weeks past the situation has been critical. The danger is not entirely over, but matters are slowly improving. long as the mercantile classes hold to their attitude of opposition to civil war there can be no successful attempt to overthrow the present Government. This is well known to Dr. Sun and, taken with the announcement of the Municipal Council of the International Settlement at Shanghai that agitators would not be allowed to use the Settlement for the publication of slanderous attacks upon the Government, may be said to have dampened very considerably the ardor of the conspirators. * I have [etc.]

Manifesto of Doctor Sun Yat Sen.

TO THE GOVERNMENTS AND PEOPLE OF THE FOREIGN POWERS:

As the result of careful investigations by officials appointed by the Government to inquire into the recent murder of the Nationalist leader Sung Chiao-jen in Shanghai, the fact is clearly established that the Peking Government is seriously implicated in the crime. Consequently the people are extremely indignant and the situation has become so serious that the nation is on the verge of the most acute and dangerous crisis yet experienced.

The Government, conscious of its guilt and the enormity of its offense, and realizing the strength of the wave of indignation sweeping over the nation as the direct result of its criminal deeds and wicked betrayal of the trust reposed in it, and perceiving that it is likely to lead to its downfall, suddenly and unconstitutionally concluded a loan for £25,000,000 sterling with the quintuple group despite the protests of the representatives of the nation now assembled in Peking.

This high-handed and unconstitutional action of the Government instantly accentuated the intense indignation which had been caused by the foul murder of Sung Chiao-jen, so that at the present time the fury of the people is worked up to white heat and a terrible convulsion appears almost inevitable. Indeed & acute has the crisis become that the widespread smouldering embers may burst forth in a devastating conflagration at any moment.

From the date of the birth of the Republic I have striven for unity, peace, concord and prosperity. I recommended Yuan Shih-kai for the presidency because there appeared reasons for believing that by doing so the unification of the nation and the dawn of an era of peace and prosperity would thereby be hastened. Ever since then I have done all I could to evolve peace, order and government out of chaos created by the revolution. I earnestly desire to preserve peace throughout the Republic but my efforts will be rendered ineffective if financiers would supply the Peking Government with money that could and probably would be used in waging war against the people.

If the country is plunged into war at this juncture it will inevitably inflict terrible misery and suffering upon the people, who are just beginning to recover from the dislocation of trade and lesses of various kinds caused by the revolution. For the establishment of the Republic, they have sacrificed much and are now determined to preserve it at all costs.

If the people are now forced into a life-and-death struggle for the preservation of the Republic not only will it entail terrible suffering to the masses, but inevitably also adversely affect all foreign interests in China.

If the Peking Government is kept without funds there is a prospect of a compromise between it and the people being effected, while the immediate effect of a liberal supply of money will probably be the precipitation of a terrible and disastrous conflict.

In the name and for the sake of humanity which civilization holds sacred I therefore appeal to you to exert your influence with a view to preventing the bankers from providing the Peking Government with funds which at this juncture will assuredly be utilized as the sinews of war. I appeal to all who have the lasting welfare of mankind at heart to extend to me in this hour of need their moral assistance in averting unnecessary bloodshed and in shielding my countrymen from a hard fate which they have done absolutely nothing to deserve.

Sir: I have the honor to enclose, for the information and files of the Department, a copy in translation of a memorandum, dated July 20, 1913, from the Wai Chiao Pu, regarding the present disturbances in the South, and the desire of the Government speedily to restore the country to its normal condition.

[Inclosure-Memorandum-Translation.]

The Republic has been in existence for over a year and ever since its foundation the Provisional Government has been constantly engaged in efforts to restore order and promote the union. Only thus could local peace be maintained, only thus could the nation be brought into being. Diplomatic relations between foreign governments and the Government of this nation have been carried forward without a break, while commercial and financial interests have daily improved. There has been an earnest desire to meet loan and indemnity obligations to all foreign governments promptly as they became due.

But unless order were maintained throughout the country without fear of interruption it would be impossible to improve the financial condition of the nation and no genuine safety could be secured. The Government of this nation has thoroughly realized these facts and has with all its energies sought for progress along these lines, sparing itself no exertion to accomplish these ends. It has been evident that the disruption of order would work harm to the union and it would be impossible to proceed with the disbanding of useless troops, the reformation of the currency and the national finances, and other projects. Moreover, foreign commercial interests under these circumstances could not hope to avoid detriment. Not only would the good citizens of this nation have had just cause for grievance, but friendly nations as well.

Official counsels in the central and southern portions of the country have been at variance. Persons devoted to the welfare of the nation have undoubtedly been numerous, but it has been unavoidable that there should also be those to squander funds on the collecting of troops, those whose pleasure is in disaster, whose delight is in ruin. The Government has been forced to make removals and changes as required by circumstances, to the end that localities might have worthy officials and the country prosperity.

But disorderly characters have availed themselves of these circumstances to cause disorders, and military operations have been precipitated. The local forces of the official who has acted as Military Governor of the province in question in addition to his regular duties, have been looked upon by the people of the province as enemies, and they have regarded the entire Government that has the sympathies and support of all as the government of a foreign nation. Agitations have been made for rebellious military measures and the breaking up of the union, with the result that the distressed people who have been but just rescued would again be plunged into bitter misery. The commercial classes hate these men and the markets are disorganized.

The Government has despatched troops to the small and remote region where disorder exists and it will not be difficult to restore quiet within a short period of time. But the Government is animated by sentiments of humanity and affection and it is fundamentally peaceable; hence it is not its desire to inflict upon that locality the distress of military operations. Its only desire is the early quieting of internal disturbances and the rehabilitation of commerce.

Members of the National Assembly and of the provincial chambers of commerce have demanded of the Government the immediate punishment of these rebels. The Government has received a commission from the people and it cannot but perform its full duty. This is the distressful and unavoidable situation in which the Government finds itself with respect to these internal disorders. Foreign nations are most friendly with this nation and must feel the greatest concern at the present time. Hence this communication is made for their complete understanding of the present circumstances.

cannot be reached in time. Also asks consent to the trial and punishment by Chinese of foreigners within the fighting lines aiding rebels. The Diplomatic Corps will insist on treaty rights.

The Diplomatic Corps declines the request of Shanghai Chamber of Commerce to request both of the opposed forces to refrain from hostilities within twenty miles of Shanghai.

Sun Yat Sen having demanded resignation from office of Yuan Shih Kai, Sun has been dismissed from the Railway Commission. Tong Shao Yi also requested Yuan to resign; Yuan replied that he would continue.

The Foreign Office has requested the Diplomatic Body to have Huang Hsin and Chen Chi Mei expelled from the international settlement of Shanghai. This will probably be done. Shanghai settlements are suffering now from neglect in the past to prevent hatching of sedition there.

I have held that no person while engaged in the military operations of either side should be allowed to use the settlement as a base from which to plan attacks, lest the settlement thereby become involved in hostilities.

The Consular Corps at Shanghai has authorized a proclamation against all trouble-makers, but there will be no expulsion without the consent of the consuls. They have also declared that neither side will be allowed to mass troops north of the city, which would endanger the settlements.

Consul Wilder is rightly insisting on judicial procedure.

Vice Consul Gilbert has been asked by Nanking Chamber of Commerce to use his good offices to prevent fighting in Nanking when the rebels retreat from the north. I have some doubt as to the advisability of this and should like instructions.

The Hunan China-American Association asks me to offer my services as peacemaker. This seems to me useless. The Government appears able to suppress the insurrection, which is not supported by the commercial classes of the South and must hence soon collapse. Its sole aim is removal of Yuan, which should be left to settlement by ballot.

Sir: Since my report of July 18th upon the political situation, the position of the Central Government has improved considerably. * * *

The leaders of the insurrection have been disappointed in their expectation that all the provinces south of the Yangtze would join them. So far but six provinces have shown any such disposition and some of these give but a half-hearted support. The six are: Kuangtung, Fukien, Kiangsu, Anhui, Kiangsi, and Hunan. * *

Had the leaders won any important victories, perhaps they would have found more support, but the present condition of affairs points to an early collapse of the whole movement. Should this prognostication, however, prove to be correct, the situation will be most serious. Lack of harmony between the provinces and the capital will still remain; bitter hatred of Yuan Shih-k'ai will still exist, and bankruptcy, leading to foreign intervention will be nearer than ever.

With the flight of the principal leaders, the rebellion as an organized movement may be said to have collapsed, but there must still be some fighting before order can be restored in the disturbed provinces and the sectional feeling has been increased rather than lessened. The Government is in a stronger position than ever politically, but until it can control the sources of revenue its position must be considered very precarious.

American Legation, Peking, August 22, 1913.

Sir: Referring to my No. 983 of this date, detailing the progress of events connected with the suppression of the revolt in certain southern provinces of China, I have the honor to observe that this insurrection will not have been an unmixed evil if it serves to correct the false impression, apparently quite prevalent in the western world, that the "heroes" of the Revolution, as President Yuan loves to call them, have a great hold upon the affections of the Chinese people.

The success of the Revolution of 1911 was due principally to two things: (1) The degeneracy of the Manchus and their unwillingness to die for their cause, and (2) the indifference of their Chinese Premier, Yuan Shih-k'ai, to the continuance of the Dynasty, shown in his unwillingness to follow up his victories at Hankow and Hanyang and by his readiness to spare his own countrymen the horrors of civil war, provided the north and south should unite in a Republic of which he was to be President. Yuan Shih-ka'i, after all, was the real founder of the Republic.

The southern leaders failed to realize their own weakness and although they have been permitted to enrich themselves at the expense of the public since the Republic was established they have been disgruntled by their loss of control of affairs and have constantly attempted to place obstacles in the way of President Yuan's government and to make it a failure.

The statement in Dr. Sun's recent manife to that the insurrection was but a protest against the President's despatch of troops into the southern provinces, which he had predicted would follow the negotiation of a foreign loan, is ridiculous in the light of his own seditious utterances to Bishop Bashford and others long before this movement of troops began.

That the rising was caused by any desire to avenge the death of Sung Chiao-jen is equally without foundation. No better proof of this is needed than the action of Ch'en Ch'i-mei in taking advantage of the fighting in Shanghai to secure the escape of Ying Kuei-sheng, the man in whose house the assassin of Sung found refuge and who was accused by the assassin himself of hiring him to murder Sung. This man Ying was the author of the letters to Hung in the Ministry of the Interior which letters were regarded by some as evidence of the complicity of the Cabinet in the crime.

When the Revolution of 1911 broke out, the commercial classes of the Chinese who had been hampered all their lives by official corruption, were induced to support the movement in the hope of bettering their condition. Many, however, even then, gave support very reluctantly; the disreputable character of Ch'en Ch'i-mei and his followers was well known and both Dr. Sun and Huang Hsing were regarded as impractical. The racial feeling, however, was strong and when the cry was raised for the overthrow of the Manchus, an alien dynasty, it was comparatively easy to find a response in the hearts of most Chinese.

In the recent insurrection, on the contrary, there was no such rallying cry. The inscription on the rebel banners: "Punish Yuan," met with no enthusiastic response. The business men of the country, although some of them might dislike Yuan, knew that a loan was absolutely necessary to the carrying on of the administration and, so, approved of the negotiations.*

The great problem in China up to the present has been that of finance. So long as the disaffected leaders maintained their provincial armies and refused to send the revenues to Peking, so long Peking was kept weak. The use of these provincial levies to make war upon the Government has given the best possible excuse to Peking for their disbandment and the substitution of national troops in the disturbed provinces. The dissolution of the rebellious assemblies and the flight of rebel governors have also aided in making it possible for the Central Government to obtain control of these provinces, and thus also the control of their revenues. If this control should be realized, the Republic will be stronger than ever before. But all depends upon the wisdom with which the President shall use his victory. * *

The constitutional committee is drawing up a constitution which bids fair to be unworkable. Little heed is given to the advice of those who are able to point out the practical difficulties which interfere with the application of a beautiful theory. The constitution, when drawn, will have to be reported to the Assembly and the final decision will be taken there. Possibly the President may be able to secure amendment at the time, but, if not, he is likely to find his exercise of the office so hampered as to make the administration of the government more difficult than ever.

The Japanese authorities at first hesitated whether they should give them asylum, but they finally decided that, inasmuch as they are political and not criminal refugees, they would allow them to remain in this country on the condition that they do not use it as a basis for revolutionary operations. It is suspected that they have been followed to Japan by persons seeking to take their lives, and the Japanese police are accordingly exercising the strictest vigilance for their safety. While the movements and whereabouts of the refugees have been concealed as far as possible, they are at present said to be staying in Yokohama and Tokyo.

It is rumored that Dr. Sun, and perhaps his colleagues, intend

No. 1006.]

AMERICAN LEGATION, Peking, September 12, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to report upon the political situation in China as follows:

On September 1st the City of Nanking, the last rebel stronghold in the Yangtze Valley, was captured by the northern troops. * * *

In the midst of the confusion and disorder which followed the capture of Nanking three Japanese subjects were killed. According to Mr. Gilbert's report of the occurrence, these men were accused of aiding the rebels. Inasmuch as a number of Japanese have been aiding and abetting the rebellion the charge is not unreasonable. Other reports, however, state that they were caught looting. The Japanese account current here is that they were staying at the Japanese Consulate for safety and that when they learned that their own shops were being looted, they left the Consulate and attempted to reach their homes to save their property and that while doing so they were shot by General Chang's troops.

The Department has undoubtedly been informed of the excitement created in Tokyo by the report of the killing of these three Japanese subjects. The opposition seems to have used the incident in an attack upon the Government. * * *

Joined with this incident of the killing of the Japanese in Nanking are two other cases: The first was the arrest by northern troops on August 11th of a Japanese officer in uniform, Lieutenant Nishimura, near Hankow. It is alleged that he was detained six hours and that during that time he was cruelly tortured. * * * The second case was the more recent arrest and detention at Yenchou Fu, Shantung, of a Japanese officer in uniform who was duly provided with a passport.

These two cases are regarded by the Japanese Legation as of far more serious consequence than the killing of three civilians at Nanking. The demands presented by the Japanese Government cover all these cases and certainly can not be considered excessive or unreasonable. They are as follows:

1. The culprits should be punished.
2. Those officers who neglected to accord protection to the Japanese be punished.

3. General Chang Hsun should express his regret to the Japanese Consulate for the accident.

4. The familes of the deceased Japanese be indemnified.

5. The Central Government express its regret to the Japanese Government.

6. The troops of General Chang be ordered to go to the Japanese Consulate in procession.

It would seem to be the part of wisdom for the Chinese Government to agree at once to these demands and thus dispose of a case which might easily grow into a source of serious trouble. But there is a disposition on the part of some of the Chinese officials to refuse to comply with these demands and to try to modify them. It would be entirely un-Chinese to agree to the first demands and they may be counted upon almost invariably to do the wrong thing. If these demands are not agreed to promptly, there is no doubt but that far heavier demands will be made. It is already rumored that the extension of the lease of Port Arthur and the Kuantung Peninsula will be asked.

There is also a disposition to ask for the removal of General Chang Hsun. It is doubtful if this could be done without a fight.

In the meantime, the Japanese have landed several hundred bluejackets at Nanking with machine-guns and this force is now inside the city of Nanking protecting the Japanese Consulate and the property of Japanese civilians.

Sir: I have the honor to report that the inauguration of the regularly elected President of the Republic of China took place on October 10th in the Tai Ho Tien, or principal hall of the Manchu Palace. * * *

The arrangements made for the reception of the Diplomatic Corps were almost identical with those for an audience of the Emperor under the late dynasty. * * *

On the morning of the 10th instant at nine o'clock a mounted escort sent by the Ministry of the Interior appeared at the Legation and accompanied the entire staff of the Legation to the principal entrance of the Palace, the T'ien An Men, or South Gate. We left our carriages here and the Chiefs of Missions were carried in green palace chairs three-quarters of a mile to the T'ai Ho Gate, followed by the staffs on foot. There we were met by the Master of Ceremonies, Mr. Lou Tseng Tsiang, recently the Minister for Foreign Affairs, who conducted us to the waiting room.

At eleven o'clock we were conducted across the great court to the Hall of Ceremony where we were stationed in the northeast corner, to the left of the President. No seats were provided; everyone in the hall stood. * * * The President, escorted by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, as well as officers of the body-guard, entered the hall from the rear door on the north and ascended the dais in the middle of the hall where until recently the Imperial Throne was placed. The dragon screen behind the throne was still in place, but draped with rainbow flags. An attendant placed a small table covered with red silk before the President, who stood facing the south. The Master of Ceremonies having handed the oath to the President, the latter read it. It was brief. Translated, it was to the following effect:

I hereby swear that I will most sincerely obey the Constitution and faithfully discharge the duties of the President.

The President then read an address, a translation of which is enclosed.

I have the honor to call attention particularly to the following declaration contained in it:

I hereby declare that all treaties, conventions, and other engagements entered into by the former Manchu and the Provisional Republican Governments with foreign governments shall be strictly observed, and that all contracts duly concluded by the former governments with foreign companies and individuals shall also be strictly observed, and further that all rights, privileges, and immunities enjoyed by foreigners in China by virtue of international engagements, national enactments and established usages are hereby confirmed. This declaration I make with the view to maintain international amity and peace.

This declaration was inserted at the suggestion of the representatives of those Governments which had not recognized China previous to the recent election, and its insertion was the condition upon which their Governments agreed to give recognition. On October 6th, the day of the election, the promise to insert this statement in the inaugural address was given to the foreign representatives in a note, of which I enclose a copy.

At the conclusion of the address the Chinese officials present bowed three times, a salutation which was returned by the President, after which the shout of "Long live the Republic!" was given three times by the assemblage.

The President then withdrew and the Chinese officials also left the hall. The Diplomatic Corps was then conducted out through the easternmost opening of the southern doorway and brought back through the central doorway to the front of the dais. There we were arranged in legations, according to seniority. The President returned and the Dean 2 read a congratulatory address, of which I enclose a copy and translation. This having been translated into Chinese, the President read a reply in his own tongue which was translated into French. Of this reply I have the honor to enclose an English translation.

See "Inaugural Address of the President, Yuan Shih K'ai, pp. 82-86. The Spanish Minister, Señor Pastor.

Each Chief of Mission was then presented to the President and in turn introduced the members of his staff. The President then once more withdrew to the Pao Ho Tien, and the members of the Diplomatic Corps returned to the waiting room where they were served with refreshments.

While we were so engaged, Prince Pu-lun, representing His Majesty, the Emperor, presented to the President an address of congratulation. Congratulations were also offered by the Chinese high officials, after which the President went to the reviewing stand on the top of the Tien An Men, whither we were all conducted.

The celebration of this historic event lasted three days, as is customary with Chinese celebrations. The decorations and illumination began on the ninth and lasted throughout the night of the eleventh.

Telegrams were received by the President from all parts of the Republic and from foreign Chiefs of State. The people seem relieved to know that a permanent government has been established. Many families that fled from Peking in 1911 and 1912 are now returning to the city.

Confidence in the ability of the Government to maintain peace is increasing and it is to be hoped that, now that the wrangling over the Presidency has ended, the Government will be able to give its attention to the suppression of brigandage and piracy and the establishment of an efficient administration.

Foreign Office, Peking, October 6, 1913.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I am in receipt of a communication from the Secretariat of the President's Office, as follows:

The President has issued the following statement:

"On the teuth day of October will occur my inauguration as President. On that occasion I will deliver an inaugural address containing the following declaration relating to international relations:

"The attitude of the foreign powers toward us has always been that of peace and fairness, and whenever occasion therefor has arisen they have rendered us cordial assistance. In this is furnished ample evidence of the civilization of the world, yet at the same time such exhibitions of goodwill from friendly nations arouse in us sentiments of deep gratitude. It is most important that all citizens of the Republic should clearly understand this, in order that with sincerity of purpose they may endeavor to strengthen the friendship of our international bonds.

"'I hereby declare that all treaties, conventions, and other engagements entered into by the former Manchu and the Provisional Republican Governments with foreign governments shall be strictly observed, and that all contracts duly concluded by the former governments with foreign companies and individuals shall also be strictly observed, and further that all rights, privileges, and immunities enjoyed by foreigners in China by virtue of international engagements, national enactments and established usages are hereby confirmed. This declaration I make with the view to maintain international amity and peace."

The above being draft of the declaration now in preparation, while I have the honor to communicate it to you in advance, it is earnestly hoped that no publicity will be given thereto for the present.

I have the further honor to request that the above excerpt be transmitted to Address of the Dean of the Diplomatic Corps at the Inauguration.

Mr. PRESIDENT: In the name of the Diplomatic Corps which I have the honor to represent, I congratulate Your Excellency upon your election to the Presidency of the Republic.

Meeting, for the first time since the installation of the new regime, at an official Chinese celebration, we beg Your Excellency to believe the expression of our joint wish that your formal elevation to the Chief Magistracy may be the beginning of an era of prosperity unprecedented in China.

The strict observance of treaties and usages will be for China not only a guaranty of peace and for the Government of the Republic a condition of stability but it will also assure to this country a development of its resources in which foreign nations will have an interest in collaborating.

We are confident that under such conditions the cordial relations that today so happily join our Governments to yours will be even more closely drawn. The Diplomatic Corps is assured of this beneficent effect by the valuable support of the Chief of the Chinese State. It is glad to offer to Your Excellency its wishes for the prosperity of your Administration and for your personal happiness.

Reply of the President.

Mr. Dean: On this occasion of my election to the Presidency of the Republic your excellency has been good enough to address to me, in the name of the Diplomatic Body, felicitations and good wishes on my behalf, expressive of the hope that my elevation to the Chief Magistracy may be the prelude to an era of renewed prosperity for China. I am profoundly moved by these sentiments and I desire to thank your excellency with all my heart.

You are all aware, Messieurs les Ministres, of the sentiments I entertain with regard both to treaties and established usages, that constitute the sole foundation on which have been built the excellent relations between your countries and ours. It is they that have guaranteed during this provisional period of my Government uninterrupted and most cordial relations between us.

You may count, Messieurs, on my efforts, which, from now on I will redouble, to the end that those bonds of friendship and mutual confidence already so happily existing, may be drawn closer still.

I permit myself the hope of receiving, on your part, valuable cooperation in my task of pacification and of the amelioration of the economic condition in my country. On this point I feel absolute confidence, being convinced that our past relations may be taken as the best of guarantees for the future.

In closing I desire to express, in my turn, to your excellencies, my sincere wishes for your personal happiness and for the prosperity of the nations that you represent with so much distinction,

The party name is prohibited as treasonable. Anyone using it after three days is to be arrested as a traitor. The President charges the party with responsibility for the late insurrection and with plotting further rebellion. By this move the President prevented adoption of the draft constitution, aimed at limiting his powers. Memorandum on the political situation.

THE POLITICAL COUNCIL (CHENG CHIH HUI).

On November 26, 1913, a Presidential Mandate was published in the Government Gazette announcing the convocation within a few days of a Political Coun-It was stated that the Council would be constituted as follows:

The members from the Provinces [two from each] will assemble in a few days. In addition the Premier will select two members; the heads of Ministries will each select one member; there will be two legal members; the Bureau of Mongolian and Tibetan Affairs will select a number of members.

The President himself has selected the following members [names].

While the most-talked-of subject at the present time, and obviously a most important development in the trend of political events, there is curiously enough very little authoritative information to be gleaned with respect to this Council. The Government Gazette has contained allusions to it on only three days. November 26th one was found in the Presidential Mandate quoted above, which contained a list of the President's appointees, eight in number. On December 12th Mr. Li Ching-hsi was appointed Chairman, and two names were substituted for names previously included among the President's representatives; while on December 14th a Vice Chairman and a Chief Secretary were appointed.

It is interesting to note that the President personally in conversation with the American Minister repudiated the idea that the Council was intended to supplant the Assembly in legislative function. What the President and the Cabinet had in mind in creating this organization can be gathered, however, by reference to the addresses delivered on the occasion of the convocation of the Council on December 15, 1913.

In the President's address read that day by Mr. Liang Shih-yi, Chief of the President's Secretariat, occurs a statement to the following effect:

I, the President, am convinced of the necessity of gathering the opinions and ideas of the majority, so this Political Council has been created in the Capital with a view to joint working with our countrymen for the reconstruction of the Republic. All the members assembled here to-day are specially selected from among those officials and others who are experienced in Chinese administration and it is hoped that they will give their good advice to the Government with regard to the introduction of necessary reforms.

In another lengthy address from the President, prepared for distribution among the members of the Council occur the following passages, here summarized:

As you are men of much knowledge and experience I am sure you will be fully capable of assisting the Government in formulating its policies, and in speaking for the people, so as to remove all the obstacles between the Government and the people. Now those who fought for equality and liberty without bounds did not believe in their hearts in any such doctrine; they simply used it to further their schemes to disturb the centry.

Again, the term Republic is a beautiful term; but it only implies that the people have the right to know about the affairs of the State, not that everybody can have a hand in it. If everybody tries to put in a hand there will surely be confusion. "Popular rights" only means that people have the right of suffrage, representation in deliberative bedies, and the supreme right of electing their own President. It does not mean that they have the right to administer the Government.

At the present time there are too many theorists in the country and most of their talk and suggestions can not be put into practice.

The gist of the President's remarks seems to be that the pressing necessities of the moment, the actual capabilities of the Chinese race, and the lessons of Chinese history, must guide the Government at the present time. He does not believe that the whole theory of government as practiced in China hitherto can be discarded in toto, and western ideas substituted therefor.

On the day of the convocation of the Council the Premier's address, made on behalf of the Cabinet, took the same tone:

In order to effect reorganization in our country we must first carefully examine the past history of our Nation and the existing condition of the people.

He likewise alluded to the past experience of the members of the Council in "financial, administrative, and other branches of the Government."

in the absence of official utterances with reference to the functions and powers of the Political Council, already referred to, an idea regarding them can only be deduced from the local press, foreign and Chinese. From the press it is learned that subjects of administrative, fiscal, and other character will be submitted to the Council for its consideration. Presumably the President and The President's Office will Cabinet will be guided by the decisions arrived at. exercise strict control over the subjects submitted. From the character of the men appointed to the Council the nature and trend of its decisions may be forecasted with considerable accuracy. * * * They are simply men of great experience in the actual governing of their countrymen, of distinguished learning in the classics, and of reputation among the substantial men of the Ch'ing period.

Both in his lengthy address to the Council and in his conversation with the American Minister the President has referred in terms almost bitter to the lawlessness and corruption, to the knavery and self-seeking that have masqueraded in Kuangtung and Kiangsi, provinces most pronouncedly republican, under the name of "Republic." That this has been the fact can not be gain-It is therefore not to be wondered at that he has collected about him a body of men to serve as the advisors of himself and the highest officials of the country who, only yesterday, would have been considered intelligent and worthy of great respect. Those members of the Council not directly appointed by the President were selected by his appointees, the members of the Cabinet and the provincial authorities, and while their names are comparatively unknown in the Capital they are in all probability of the same type as his own.

That the President, whether of his own volition or as tool of his camarilla, composed of men whose political fortunes are absolutely dependent on those of the President, is seeking at least temporary absolute power, is a hypothesis accepted by most foreigners in China, and by Chinese as well. This hypothesis is likewise upheld by the President's course of action. midnight last night (under date of December 18, 1913) there appeared in the Government Gazette the copy of a long telegram signed by every prominent provincial official in the Republic describing the utter lack of success and accomplishment of the Assembly, urging that the remaining members thereof be given traveling expenses and sent home to await the re-convoking of the Assembly, presumably by the President, and advising that the distinguished example found in American history be followed and the Political Council be made a Constitutional Convention and entrusted with the drawing up of the Constitution. The President in a mandate signed by every member of his Cabinet referred this telegram to the Political Council for consideration and report.

This telegram and the mandate issued in response to it bear both internal and external evidence of a carefully framed coup d'état. Internally it is undoubtedly, so a well-informed Chinese states, the literary workmanship of Mr. Jao Han-hsiang, formerly Civil Governor of Hupei with Vice President Li Yuan-hung, who has now been appointed one of the President's representatives in the Council. Externally considered, the telegram is signed by every military and civil governor and special commissioner in the country, which could hardly have been accomplished after due consultation with all the gentlemen whose names appear. Moreover, all the occurrences of the last few weeks are so extremely apposite as to appear to have been staged. No sooner are the Kuo Min Tang members of the Assembly expelled therefrom, thus rendering the Assembly hors de combat, than the Political Council appears on the scene, only to be supported by a telegram emanating from all the prominent officials of the Republic.

The tendency of everyone at the present time, both among foreigners and Chinese, is to "wait and see." Even among the most ardent supporters of a pure Republic for China there is a recognition of the immense difficulties standing in the way, of the present inability of the mass of Chinese citizens to understand and support such a form of Government, and of the mountainous obstacles that the President must surmount in carrying on the practical administration of the Government in this "time of fording the river" to use a Chinese phrase. In all probability some months will be allowed to elapse before any active opposition will be manifested to the apparently dictatorial aspirations of Yuan Shih-k'ai. At the end of such a period measures will be taken, so a person closely connected with the extremists says, measures of a nature probably directed against the President himself and having as their object his removal from the political arena.

In the meantime there are many who believe that Yuan is acting with patriotic motives, that he really considers that the only force that can amalgamate the present mélée of warring factions, that can reconcile the modern extremists and the vast bulk of the nation caring "for none of these things," is a strong central power, centered in himself, a power that will ultimately be able to bring it about that, to quote his own words, "eternally there shall be good and friendly relationships and internally there shall be peace between the weak and the strong."

Respectfully submitted to the Minister,

WILLYS R. PECK.

LOAN NEGOTIATIONS: 1 WITHDRAWAL OF THE UNITED STATES GROUP OF BANKERS FROM THE SEXTUPLE CONSORTIUM; CONCLUSION OF A REORGANIZATION-LOAN AGREEMENT BETWEEN CHINA AND THE QUINTUPLE GROUP—CURRENCY-REFORM AND MANCHURIAN-INDUSTRIAL LOAN—STUDENT LOANS—MISCELLANEOUS LOANS.

Introductory Note.—On August 30, 1912, the Chinese Government, unable to come to terms with the six-power groups, concluded an agreement with an independent financial group that became known later as the Crisp Group, for a loan of £10,000,000, secured on the unhypothecated revenues of the salt gabelle, and £5,000,000 of this amount was floated on the London market on September 26. This agreement gave the lenders until September 30 to issue the balance of £5,000,000 and, until such issue, conferred a preference for further loans on equal terms.²

On October 23 the six Ministers protested against the surplus revenues of the salt gabelle being applied to the service of the Crisp loan, and notified the Chinese Government that the advances made by the six groups on account of the reorganization loan, amounting to £1,800,000, constituted a prior charge on the revenues of the salt

On October 25 the Chinese Government expressed to the representatives of the bankers its desire to cancel the Crisp loan contract and reopen negotiations with the six groups.

On November 4 the six powers directed the representatives of the bankers at Peking to consider, in consultation with their respective Ministers, what conditions for the new loan were in their opinion "indispensable and practicable." The representatives reported on the 6th that negotiations with the Chinese authorities had been resumed.

On November 12 the bankers' representatives informed their principals that the Chinese Government had applied to Mr. Crisp for a further loan of £10,000,000; he had confessed his inability to comply, whereupon the Chinese Government informed him of their intention to apply elsewhere as they considered themselves released from their engagement to him. Three days later the representatives announced receipt of a joint letter from the Premier, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and the Minister of Finance, dated the 11th, expressing the desire of the Chinese Government to negotiate with the six groups and not with others; and reported an interview they had had on the 14th with the Minister of Finance at which the Minister was informed that an undertaking in writing from Mr. Crisp releasing the Chinese Government from their agreement with him would be a necessary condition of continuing negotiations with the

A conference of the bankers was called for December 13, and on December 9 their representatives were told that it would be necessary to know, before the conference, (1) what was the minimum amount that would satisfy the imperative needs of the Chinese Government up to December 31, and (2) during January, February and March; also (3) what objects the money was required for, and (4) what was the actual position as to the balance of the Crisp loan. These points were the subject of correspondence before, during and after the conference, resulting in the bankers offering, on December 21, to advance £2,000,000 in the second half of January, subject to force majeure, provided the Crisp loan agreement had previously been cancelled and the loan agreement with them had been signed. latter agreement was to be for £25,000,000 for reorganization purposes, but the Chinese had thus far objected to several of its features. six Ministers, furthermore, were not unanimous in regard to the terms of the agreement, as appears from the following telegram from Mr. Calhoun, the American Minister.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Peking, December 30, 1912.

Two points that may prove obstructive have been raised in the loan negotiations, which were apparently progressing to agreement. The French have insisted that losses incurred by foreigners during the revolution shall be paid out of loan proceeds; otherwise the loan will not be listed in Paris. The Minister of Finance disclaims authority to negotiate on the subject, and also refuses to accept the provision in the contracts for foreign auditors and foreign supervisors for salt gabelle. The bankers referred both questions to their six Ministers, who met this afternoon. Suggestion was made at the meeting that the amount of the revolutionary claims was not known; that many were doubtless exaggerated or without merit; that the question of liability in many cases was involved; that the amount of the proposed loan was not sufficient for claims and other pressing necessities; therefore the Chinese cannot be expected to make commitment on the subject at this time. Finally the French and Japanese Ministers were appointed a committee to discuss both questions with the Minister for Foreign Affairs with a view to making some arrangement for recognition of general principle of liability for claims and possibly for the appointment of an international commission to pass thereon and also for a commitment to the Ministers upon the subject of auditors and supervisors wherein their duties and authority will be specified. If this plan succeeds—which is doubtful—it is proposed to accept it in lieu of any provision therefor in the loan contract.

AMERICAN EMBASSY, London, January 7, 1913.

The following urgent memorandum from the Minister for Foreign Affairs just received. I respectfully request an early expression of your views since I am informed that a meeting of the representatives of the six groups is to take place here in a few days.

LAUGHLIN.

[Memorandum.]

The British Foreign Office to the American Embassy.

The United States Government are aware that at a meeting of the representatives six international financial groups held in London December 13-14, 1912, a draft agreement for a loan to the Chinese Government of £25,000,000 for reorganization purposes was considered.

In connection with the preference as suggested by the Chinese Minister of Finance with respect to the price on definite industrial enterprises to be specified for under Article 17, it was proposed by the groups to eliminate industrial leans from this clause of the draft agreement and to claim a preference merely for Government financial loans until the purposes contemplated under Article 2 of the agreement are completed. With this object in view it was further suggested that in addition to a general preference clause as in former agreements the following should be inserted:

Menus the ionowing should be inserted:

After the issue of the present loan of £25,000,000 and for a period of two years, should the Chinese Government proceed to issue a supplementing loan for the purposes specified in Article 2 of this agreement, or of other Government financial loans, a preferential right is granted to the six groups at blank per cent under the average price of the present loan, and this preference shall apply even for a further period as regards future loans secured on the salt gabelle. In any case, the Chinese Government will not, for a period of six months after the issue of the present loan, proceed with the issue of any other Government loan, or industrial loan with the guarantee of the Chinese Government, without the consent of the six groups.

In reply to these proposals the groups' agents in Peking reported that the Minister of Finance objected to any time limit, but was prepared to accept the

In the event of the Chinese Government desiring to issue further loans secured on the salt revenue or a supplementary loan for purposes of the nature specified in Article 2, preference will be given to the banks on the same terms of commission as those of the present agreement. The Chinese Government further undertake, for a period of six months after the issue of the present loan, not to issue any other loan concluded later than December 1, 1912, without previous agreement with the banks.

This stipulation would, however, admit the issue of the loan provided for in the agreement signed at Peking on September 24, 1912, for the construction by a Belgian company of a railway from Lanchow to Haichow.¹ This loan was to be for an amount of £10,000,000, a sum which would doubtless not be forthcoming from Belgium and would therefore have to be obtained, at any rate in part, elsewhere. It would seem unfair that any one of the powers of the sextuple group should profit by the abstention of the rest, and it would seem reasonable that there should be some understanding amongst the six allied powers with regard to a concession which was the direct outcome of the policy they have pursued in common since their declaration of the ninth July last year.

His Majesty's Government would therefore propose that the six Governments should pledge themselves to refuse their support to any of their nationals who might propose to finance this loan. This would probably in practice entail the cancellation of the contract and its internationalization by its being handed over to the groups on payment of compensation.

Chinese loans; your telegram January 7. The Belgian railway concession was taken up last October with the French Embassy here, with the intimation that this was business which, under the intergroup agreement, should be offered for participation by the six groups because of the identity of the French interests concerned. The French representative appeared to take this as a matter of The Legation at Peking at the same time advised the Department that the local representative of the Russian group, with which it is understood the Belgian concessionaires are affiliated, had given out that the Belgian contract would result in no conflict with the six groups, but on the contrary all interests would be taken into the new venture. The Department is not aware that any independent American capital is interested in this loan and considers it extremely unlikely that any will be. It therefore prefers to reserve its opinion as to the understanding proposed by the British Government until the two powers still more directly interested have expressed themselves.

As reported in my telegram of December 31, after the verbal agreement made by the Chinese Government with the French and Japanese Ministers in reference to liability for damages and appointment of foreign advisers, and while awaiting written confirmation of its terms by the Foreign Office, the Minister of Finance insisted that the groups make an advance of £2,000,000 this month to carry the Government over the Chinese New Year. The groups, under instructions from London, refused to make advances until the issue price was agreed upon and negotiations between the six Ministers were satisfactorily The Foreign Office then wrote the six Ministers a note saying that the accepted liability for damages was limited to such as were incurred in the zone of military operations; and as to appointment of advisers, when the time came the six Ministers would be privately informed as to their names, duties and powers. This was not satisfactory to the Ministers but the French Minister assumed a very aggressive attitude and said his Government would not approve the loan unless the contract was first submitted to it for its approval and the French advisers were named and their powers prescribed by the interested Powers. He also intimated that the nationality of the appointees should be proportionate in number to the issue of bonds made in the respective countries. The Russian supported the French, and the Russian bankers reported that the issue price must be varied in the several countries and intimated that the loan would not be internationalized. The Minister of Finance then sent a note to the groups saying that as the latter would not agree to make the advance required he was compelled to get money elsewhere, and broke off the negotiations. The British and German Ministers thereupon both said their interests in the country were too great to be jeopardized either by the loan going to pieces, or by the intrusion of other finance elements, and their respective bankers have gone to the Chinese and notified them they will make the advance required and are prepared to accept the contract as it now stands, independently of the other members of the groups.

If this ends the consortium I suggest that our country recognize the Chinese Government at once.

The German Ambassador claims that an agreement to internationalize Chinese loan was made two years ago and strongly urged adherence to the agreement. I have seen the Minister for Foreign Affairs and argued that since internationalization would make securities more liquid and valuable for all groups, and since French group strongly urged internationalization, the Minister of Finance should withdraw his objection. The Foreign Minister finally admitted that the real reason was fear of Chamber of Deputies' refusal to consent on account of Germany. British Ambassador protested against French demand for six foreign advisers as contrary to original plan. I said that I thought insistence on six foreign advisers might cause failure of loans. The real cause of the refusal, I believe, is Russia.

(I) The six Governments shall agree not to support their nationals in any undertaking not conforming to conditions to be agreed on;

(II) For the protection of investors, the conditions should provide proper guaranties for the payment of principal and interest;

(III) Control over expenditure of the proceeds of the loan in order to prevent the Chinese Government receiving, either by deposit or otherwise, money free from control;

(IV) The concession to be subject to the approval of the Legation concerned,

The Chinese Government today informally notified the six Ministers of the following appointments: Oiesen, a Dane, chief salt inspector; Rumpf, a German, director foreign loan bureau; and Rossi, an Italian, advisor to audit department. First named reported good character and ability; second known by and acceptable to bankers; third now member Italian Parliament, recommended by Italian Minister. The first position is important to the security pledged for the loan; the second relates to expenditure of loan proceeds; the third is not directly connected with the loan but is of general importance.

The six Ministers met this evening and I said rehabilitation of China's finances and improvement of her revenues being the most important matter, I would accept the nominations made; or, in view of the fact that a German was already nominated, I would accept a representative of France and of England for the two remaining places. I was indifferent to nationality of appointees if good men. French and British Ministers naturally accepted suggestion. Russian Minister objected; said his Government had largest proportion of Boxer indemnity secured on salt revenue and therefore was entitled to representation in its administration. Finally we agreed to submit to our Governments the question of nationality of these appointees. Please instruct.

Emergency again approaches wherein British and Germans may break off and make advance which the Chinese sorely need.

No change in the situation. Bankers doing nothing. Ministers reticent, apparently awaiting instructions. Chinese received £750,000 Crisp loan, being advance on payment due February 15. This gives relief for the present. Prior to meeting of February 4 it was understood that the Chinese would name the Dane and the German. Ministers and bankers alike awaited such action. Within the last day or two I have noticed change in British Minister, who shows preference for appointees from nationals making loan on the ground it is necessary for latter to have direct support of Legations interested in loan service. His present attitude is apparently in accord with French and Russians. German Minister privately says that if British have both customs and salt administration it will give them undue influence; he also suspects French and Russian purpose is to force a situation that will make rupture with the Chinese inevitable and thereby terminate consortium; that British, French and Russians will then make new alignment excluding Germans and Americans but allow Japanese to trail along. This will secure French market and extend triple entente to China. There is much in the situation to justify belief that a big diplomatic game is on which may or may not be reflected here.

As has already been stated, this Government in the interest of an early adjustment of the question has been willing to accept as foreign advisers connected with the loan either the nominations made by the Chinese Government or nominees from the lending powers. In view, however, of the difficulties that have arisen as to appointments from the lending powers and the information it has just received of the unwillingness of the Chinese to accept the various extensive changes in the program that have been suggested, the American Government would suggest as a compromise solution that the original nominations of the Chinese Government to the posts of chief superviser of salt administration (a Dane) and director of the national loan bureau (a German) be accepted and that the interested Governments propose for the third post, that of director of audit de-The American Government would point out that it partment, a Frenchman. has thus far made for itself no claims in this connection although the American group will issue on their own account their full share of the loan, preferring that the appointments be made on a basis of efficiency rather than of nationality. The present insistence of the French Minister on four appointees from nationals making loan, including two audit advisers, as reported in my telegram of February 4, is substitute for his former demand for six general advisers. He evidently expects foreign intervention in near future, in which event advisers named would constitute international commission for administration of China's affairs. At meeting of February fourth he suggested double appointment all around which included American but I took position reported in my telegram of February 4 and refused to be party to his proposals. I said I asked for no representation in loan appointments. The Japanese said he would support proposition if colleagues gave him moral support for adviser in another department, on theory American wanted no representation. The proposition was made today for French and Russian auditors with British and German appointments. The Chinese, I am credibly informed, will never consent to proposed change. This may end both the negotiations and the consortium. In that event I prefer to occupy position I have taken; but if the other Ministers unite with the French Minister in demand for four appointees, shall I support them? Or, whether I do or not, is it necessary for me to safeguard American interests by notifying colleagues I reserve right for American adviser in other departments as do the Japanese?

AMERICAN EMBASSY, Berlin, February 12, 1913—4 p. m.

Your February 10, 6 p. m., reached me only last night. The German Foreign Office is disposed to view sympathetically the compromise suggestion contained in the Department's aide mémoire, but is inclined to believe that under existing conditions the safest way is to urge the sextuple group to accept the Chinese proposal. This view is apparently shared by the English, but they as well as their French friends have unfortunately been forced by ententes and alliances to support propositions quite contrary to their own ideas. Russia, with a view to furthering her own political plans, is no doubt responsible for existing complications and would doubtless be pleased to see sextuple group disrupted as she fears money may be used to strengthen China's position in Mongolia, and there are persistent rumors of China again being on the eve of making independent loans. The German Foreign Office, acting on a suggestion of the British Ambassador, whose Government had just declined to accept the German modification of French proposal, inquired whether our Government for the sake of harmony would be willing to step aside in the matter of currency-reform adviser in favor of a Frenchman, which might facilitate acceptance of Chinese proposition by sextuple group. I replied that it seemed to me dangerous to allow any new subject matter to enter into the case that might lead to further complications, and declined even to transmit such a proposition to the Department. But I added that in case the Imperial German Ministry should later assure me that the sextuple group had unanimously and unequivocally agreed to accept the Chinese proposition, with the single provision that the American Government agree to the appointment of a Frenchman as currency-reform adviser, I would recommend that plan to the Department. I beg to be further instructed. LEISHMAN.

[Inclosure-Translation.]

FOREIGN OFFICE, Paris, February 12, 1913.

In a note of yesterday, February 11, the Ambassador of the United States was pleased to make known his sentiment as to the advantage there would be, from the American Government's viewpoint, for the purpose of expediting the conclusion of the Chinese reorganization loan, in accepting the three advisers nominated by the Chinese Government with the reservation that the first two being a Dane and a German, respectively, the third one should be a Frenchman; an increase in the number of advisers would involve a claim of the United States in behalf of its nationals.

The French Government, which is not seeking exclusive advantages and never ceased to look upon the Chinese loan question in the light of the accord of the six powers and the interest of all, that is to say with the condition that real guaranties for the lenders and efficacious supervision of the disbursements should be secured from China, does not change its position, though it is ready to accept any method that would not affect the merits of the case.

In order to secure the guaranty and supervision that the powers unanimously demand, it is necessary and sufficient that the foreign advisers' appointment be agreed upon by the powers and China, and that their powers be clearly defined in an incontestable instrument. It is logical, on the other hand, that the advisers should belong to the lenders' nationality and that, in order to prevent difficulties among the six powers, the offices to be filled should number six, in which the Chinese Government has repeatedly declared itself disposed to concur. If the six Legations would arrive at an agreement on these very simple principles without discussing beforehand the distribution of the six officers, the Chinese Government would soon adopt them, as it is not practically in position to procure, outside of the consortium, the funds it urgently needs.

Admission of the Chinese Government's pretension to select and appoint advisers, whether or not qualified, without assuming any precise engagement as to their powers, would in truth be tantamount to a failure of the six powers' policy.

The essential principles once settled, the French Government has assented and continues ready to assent to any combination that may be proposed.

The latest, put forth by the Minister of the United States at Peking, consisted in proposing to the Chinese Government advisers belonging to the nationality of the lending powers (neutrals being no better qualified and less able to enforce observance of the Chinese engagements); the contract as offered by the groups implying the appointment of three advisers connected with the loan, the said advisers would be selected in the order of the quotas of the loan issue, that is to say: France, England, Germany, it being understood that the Legations would later endeavor to obtain from the Chinese Government three other adviserships in the departments, in accordance with the propositions that might be offered, which office would be assigned, in order, to the United States, Russia,

The American proposition was adopted by the other five concerned with an amendment providing that a fourth office of adviser should be asked in behalf of Russia, which invoked a formal engagement on the part of the Chinese Gov-The six Legations having thus ernment in connection with the 1895 loan. reached an agreement, reported to their Governments; the English, French, Japanese and Russian Governments have accepted the distribution (an Englishman in the salt administration, a German in the loan bureau, a Frenchman and a Russian in the audit department); the German Government has expressed a desire to have the German adviser placed in the salt administration rather than in the loan bureau, which is a question that may be arranged through an agreement between the two countries concerned, England and Germany.

If the Government of the United States would also concur in the above stated propositions, the six Ministers of the powers at Peking could shortly resume with China the interrupted pourparlers and secure from her the supervision of the security and disbursements which from both the financial and political standpoint constitute the indispensable condition of the reorganization loan.

The American Ambassador to Russia to the Secretary of State.

[Telegram-Paraphrase-Aide mémoire.]

American Embassy, St. Petersburg, February 15, 1913—4 p. m.

Department's February 10, 6 p. m. Ministry of Foreign Affairs replies as follows:

By an aide memoire of January 30/February 12, 1913, the American Embassy proposed to the Imperial Government, as a compromise, that the number of foreign advisers which will be appointed in China in connection with the agreement in regard to the reorganization loan should be limited to three, of which the post on the board of the salt monoply should be offered to a Dane, in the loan bureau to a German, and in the control department to a Frenchman.

In all the negotiations connected with the Chinese reorganization loan the Russian Government has always had in view the purpose of establishing a control over the finances of China, which are at present in a state of confusion. The numerous interests winch Russia has in China and her rôle of one of the chief creditors of that country fully justify similar position taken by us in this question.

It is obvious that such control can be effective and successful only if the foreign advisers who are to take charge of it are appointed by the interested powers, not by the Chinese Government, which has always known how to deprive foreign officials in its service of all influence in current affairs. On the other hand when the loan of 1895, guaranteed by Russia, was concluded, the CHINA. 159

Chinese Government informed the Russian Government that it would not give any foreign power any rights or privileges of any kind relative to the supervision of the finances of China or the management of such if such rights were not likewise extended to Russia (St. Petersburg declaration June 24/July 6, 1895; article 4). The Imperial Government therefore does not see any reason why it should relinquish the right guaranteed to it by the said declaration, namely to have a Russian adviser in the financial management of China if the representatives of other powers are to take part in it.

In view of these considerations the Russian Government promised to support a project which was approved by the conference of the Ministers concerned in Peking on the initiative of their French colleague to the effect that the appointment in China of four foreign advisers be insisted upon, of which one Russian and one Frenchman should be in the control department, leaving the choice of an adviser in the salt monoply to England and in the loan department to Germany.

The Imperial Government has no doubt that if the interested Governments will agree between themselves in regard to submitting this combination to China, the Government of the latter, whose pecuniary difficulties are increasing hourly, will not be able to avoid foreign control over the expenditure of money and the security of loans, the necessity of which is unanimously admitted in the interests of the creditors of China as well as in those of the country itself.

the interests of the creditors of China as well as in those of the country itself.

The delayed payments in connection with the "Boxer renunciation" could serve as the means of pressure on China for this purpose, as the powers could demand that any loan concluded by China outside the six-power group should serve first of all to pay these arrears; and they could propose to the Chinese Government a delay of these payments only in case it should agree to the appointment of those advisers which will be suggested to it.

Shall I ask if by the above it is intimated that Russia would object to advisers from all six powers of which one should be American?

At a meeting of the six Ministers today, all proved to be instructed, except the German Minister and myself, to support British for salt, German for loan director, French and Russian for audit advisers. French Minister said his Government desired to add currency reform to the duties of French audit adviser. British Minister asked that this request be not now pressed. French Minister withdrew from then on. German Minister, being pressed to say whether he approved four appointments, said that his Government favored Chinese schedule except that Frenchman might be substituted for Italian. Beyond that he had no instructions. I was asked to declare my position. I replied I had regarded loan as a financial transaction only; that I favored Chinese appointments but because latter were not satisfactory to my colleagues I suggested alternative proposition reported in my telegram of February 4, and that I still adhered thereto; when they sought to create extra places for other nationals it gave loan a political cast which I much regretted. I was not prepared to say what the attitude of my Government will be. I said further, as they were creating positions for the possible political exigencies, I reserved right of representation therein for my Government if it wanted same. They all consented. French Minister said he had assurances from Chinese they will accept pending proposition; British and Japanese confirmed. It is evident from [this] that the powers have agreed to stand on this proposition. British have broken with Germans and joined Russians and French and brought Japanese along. German will probably come in. Shall I favor or oppose any appointments above specified?

We are confronted with a situation wherein we must join or go out of the consortium. In consenting thereto I am influenced only by the desire to save China. The political conditions are bad and threaten peace of the country. I believe the other Ministers think intervention in some form is inevitable. This loan may save the

[Memorandum.]

The Department of State notes the suggestion of the Italian Government communicated in the memorandum of February 16th, that the Federal Government cooperate to support the nomination of Mr. Luigi Rossi as one of the foreigners to be employed by China in connection with the reorganization loan, which nomination the Italian Embassy remarks the Russian Government would be disposed to support and adds at the same time an expression of the opinion that the nomination of a delegate from a country not interested in the sixpower loan would appear to afford a substantial guaranty of impartiality in the work of ameliorating the financial condition of China.

The Department of State would be very happy to give the most sympathetic consideration to this suggestion if the present circumstances were such as to make possible its favorable consideration. the beginning of the discussion of the foreign personnel to be employed in connection with the reorganization loan the Government of the United States expressed itself as satisfied with the original Chinese proposal, namely, the nomination of a Dane, a German, and an Italian. It was found with regret, however, that this plan encountered difficulties due to the conflicting claims of different Governments, thus unfortunately injecting into the situation semipolitical considerations fruitful of delay. Lately the discussion has proceeded rather rapidly and a number of counter proposals have been made. While reserving in the premises all rights and notably those in relation to the appointment of its own nationals, the Government of the United States has expressed willingness to accede to whatever decision should be agreeable to the Chinese Government and acceptable to the other powers interested in the loan within certain limits due reluctance to overburden the Chinese Government with the em--proyment of unnecessarily numerous persons and certain other con-

Having assumed this position and refraining up to the present from insistence upon the employment of one of its own nationals, the Italian Government will readily perceive that the Government of the United States could not at this juncture well make a point of the employment of a national of any other country and thus run the risk of itself participating in the prolongation of a discussion which it has been sorry to see injected into a situation where the paramount desideratum is the consummation of the loan which is expected will redound alike to the advantage of China and to that of all other powers commercially interested in that country.

The Chinese Government has notified the representatives in Peking of the six powers participating in the loan consortium of its intention to choose in connection with the reorganization loan the following foreign advisers: For the salt monopoly, the Dane Oiesen; for the control department, the Italian Rossi; and for the bureau of loans, the German Rumpf.

This proposition, however, did not meet with the unanimous approval of the six Envoys of the interested powers, who decided to recommend to their respective Governments the following scheme: an Englishman for adviser in the salt monopoly; a German for the bureau of loans; the control department to be provided with two advisers: one Russian and one Frenchman, invested with equal rights; and furthermore to compensate Russia and France by appointing a greater number of their respective subjects as district inspectors in the salt monopoly.

The Imperial Russian Government considers the above-mentioned scheme suggested by the representatives of the six interested powers to be satisfactory as far as its own interests are concerned, but would like to know, before instructing in this sense the Russian Minister in Peking, the point of view of the Federal Government in regard to this matter.

The Russian Ambassador to the Secretary of State.

[Memorandum handed to the Secretary of State by the Russian Ambassador, February 19, 1913.]

The Imperial Russian Government considers that it would be to the benefit of China and to the interest of her creditors, among whom Russia occupies a prominent place, to have a control established over the Chinese finances.

It seems of first necessity, however, that this control, to be efficient and not a mere formality, should be confided into the hands of foreign advisers chosen by the powers and not by the Chinese Government, who would easily deprive those advisers of all real influence as has been proved by past experience.

Furthermore the Russo-Chinese declaration, signed in St. Petersburg in 1895, stipulates that China should not invest any country with rights of supervision of any branch of her revenue without extending the same rights to Russia.

Therefore the Imperial Government insists that Russian subjects should be included in the number of foreigners who will have to serve the Chinese Republic and has already given its support to the scheme suggested by the representatives of the six interested powers in Peking, who proposed the nomination of four foreign advisers.

Imperial Government believe that this scheme, if endorsed by all the interested powers, would certainly be accepted by China. At the same time, in order to prevent the Chinese Government from contracting a new loan not subject to the above-mentioned conditions of control, the Imperial Government recommends that the powers should claim that the effective sums raised by such new loan should be employed in the first line to cover the remainder of the Boxer indemnity.

Peking, February 21, 1913—7 p. m.

Your February 20, 6 p. m. Latest development was meeting of Ministers on the 19th, called to hear answers of German Minister and myself to proposed plan reported in my telegram of February 17, 10 p. m. I expressed assent on conditions named in your telegram February 17, 6 p. m. German Minister said he was instructed to support Chinese nominations, and expressed great dissatisfaction with proposed plan; he thought German financial and commercial interests here justified more important post than one offered Rumpf, the duties of which were temporary; Russian Minister then recommended position of Rumpf be made permanent with enlarged powers. British Minister assented and recommended another office be created called deputy inspector general of salt gabelle and that a German be appointed thereto. German Minister manifested no sympathy with counter proposals offered him, but said he would ask for specific instructions. Today he informs me his Government is again in communication with the British Government. Everything indicates a readjustment of relations of England, France and Russia on lines of triple entente; otherwise complete volte face of British cannot be explained.

As to what China will do, reports differ. If Yuan attempts to put through loan contract as modified by foreigners' demands, without the consent of National Council, then opposition may grow into disorders approaching civil war. I believe Russian motive is unfriendly to China and has for its immediate purpose the enforcement of Mongolian demands. The French are cooperating with Russia and together they have forced England into line. The outlook is such that there can be no hope of early signature. To my mind it is no longer a question of friendly international cooperation to help China but a combination of big powers with common interests to accomplish their own selfish political aims.

Department's February 17, 6 p. m. and February 23, 10 p. m. German Foreign Office is awaiting the reply of British Government regarding appointment of German deputy inspector of salt gabelle at Shanghai, and is inclined to view the various proposals as mere subterfuges to cause delays with a view to eventually forcing foreign control in all departments. Advices received from German Minister at Peking indicate that the Chinese Government never definitely intimated its willingness to accept original French proposal and consequently not apt to accept extended form now under consideration. Reports have reached Foreign Office that the American group has recently decided not to issue their full quota as stated in Department's telegram February 10, 6 p. m. This if true would be very regrettable, as it would place the Government as well as American banking group in a position of inferiority.

[Aide Mémoire.]

In the two memoranda handed to the Department of State on the 19th of February the Imperial Russian Government expressed a desire to know the views of the Government of the United States as to the proposal of the Ministers of the six powers at Peking with reference to the appointment of foreign advisers in connection with the reorganization loan. According to this proposed arrangement, the chief inspector of the salt revenue is to be an Englishman; the director of the national loan bureau, a German; and the advisers to the accounts and audit department, a Russian and a Frenchman. In expressing appreciation of the courtesy of the Imperial Russian Government in placing its views so fully and frankly before the Department, this Government is happy to state that on February 17 the American Minister at Peking was instructed to inform his interested colleagues of the readiness of this Government to accede, within certain limits due to a reluctance to overburden the Chinese Government with the employment of unnecessarily numerous persons, to the above-mentioned arrangement, should it be agreeable to China and acceptable to his colleagues. This Government also reserved in the premises all rights, notably those in relation to the appointment if its own nationals.

As to the recommendation of the Imperial Russian Government that the powers should claim that the proceeds of any new loan contracted by China and not subject to the generally accepted conditions of control should be employed first of all to repay any unpaid balance of the Boxer indemnity, this Government could not but regret the injection into the situation at this juncture of any new considerations which might be fruitful of further delay in the consummation of the loan which is expected to result alike to the advantage of China and of all other powers commercially interested in that country and begs, therefore, to reserve an expression of opinion until apprised of the views of the other Governments and of the various financial groups.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE. Washington, February 27, 1913.

Sir: The present situation in Peking as reflected in the Legation's telegram of February 21, 7 p. m., seems to the Department to call for a renewed expression of its views for your guidance.

Your previous instructions will have made clear to you that the Department has greatly deprecated the apparent introduction of political issues into the loan negotiations. Its sole aim has been, in pursuance of the uniform policy of this Government toward China, to assist the latter in procuring, without undue embarrassment, the funds required at this critical period for reorganization and rehabili-As you are well aware, experience has shown the wisdom of surrounding such loans to China with adequate safeguards of supervision, not only as a reasonable measure of protection for the interests of the lenders and of the ultimate bondholders but also as a necessary means of upholding China's credit and avoiding the possible consequences of default in her financial obligations, which are already pressing. The Department has, however, consistently held that the Chinese Government must be left free to accept or decline a loan on the conditions proposed, and the American group of bankers interested in the loan negotiations have likewise held the same views.

The Legation was accordingly instructed on February 17 to approve the proposal then under consideration as to foreign advisers connected with the loan on the understanding that, as represented in the Legation's telegram of the same date, the Chinese Government had already expressed its acceptance of the proposal and that the loan was of vital necessity to China. You should make it clear to your colleagues, as occasion may require, that this Government, while continuing to insist upon what it considers reasonable and general measures for the protection of the interests of all its nationals, including adequate guaranties for the lenders and efficient supervision of disbursements, is not prepared to join in any coercive steps designed to compel China's acceptance either of the present loan or of any par-

A careful review of the whole correspondence on this question leads the Department to believe that the difficulties in the way of the loan negotiations may not be as serious as some of the reports, taken by themselves, would seem to indicate. As a matter of fact, the points still at issue so far as the Governments are concerned seem to be reduced to the one question of the chief adviser to the salt gabelle, which lies between Great Britain and Germany alone and which those two Governments are making serious effort to solve. The suggestion of ulterior motives and deliberate efforts to impede the negotiations, referred to in certain reports, do not seem to be borne out by an impartial examination of the correspondence as a whole. On the contrary, the statement of the position of the Governments as contained in the inclosed memorandum from Paris seems eminently practical, candid, and convincing. Under the circumstances, therefore, while it is quite possible that the completion of these peculiarly intricate negotiations may yet require considerable time, the Department is convinced that the only consistent course just now open to this Government is to maintain the position it has so deliberately assumed and, while awaiting results, to make from time to time such opportune suggestions as may commend themselves or may be recommended by your Legation.

Peking, February 28, 1913—4 p. m. Legation's telegram of February 17, 10 p. m., and your reply of February 17, 6 p. m.

The British Minister yesterday informed me that the German Government had made suggestions which the British Government had definitely declined because they had no bearing on the loan. The Minister believes the British Government will not wait much longer but will conclude the loan in cooperation with such of the groups as are desirous of participation. He said that when the Chinese Government saw the money available they would accept; that Konovalof, already in the Chinese customs, would be the Russian appointee to whom China could not well object.

Am I authorized, provided the Chinese Government accepts, to agree to appointment of German assistant inspector general of the salt gabelle and in proposal to make the post of German director of the bureau of loans permanent with added powers?

> AMERICAN EMBASSY, Paris, March 8, 1913.

It seems to me evident, on reviewing the history of the Chinese loan negotiations, that with the increase of the consortium from four to six powers began a persistent effort to disrupt the consortium, and that China is excluded from making loans in the world's financial markets as long as the six powers hold together.

The desire, the interest and the policy of the United States have been to maintain the integrity of China and further her rehabilitation. In order to extricate ourselves from the false position in which these dilatory negotiations place us and to continue that policy, does it not seem proper to attempt to relieve China from this embargo of financial exclusion?

To obtain this relief, the loan should be concluded forthwith or the six-power group should be dissolved and China be given a free hand to borrow where she will.

If the Department should find that a new group desirous of aiding China and of making an immediate loan could be formed, or that an adequate loan could be financed in America, would it not be a friendly act of great assistance to China and most gratefully appreciated by her, if the United States should announce to the five other powers that the loan must be immediately concluded or the United States would withdraw, reserving to itself all rights in the premises? It seems certain that such an action would force an issue one way or the other.

[Inclosure—Translation.]

The Minister of Finance of China to the Sextuple Group.

MINISTRY OF FINANCE, Peking, March 11, 1913.

SIR: For almost a year negotiations for a loan made necessary by China's financial requirements have been in progress with your groups. The terms of the agreement have been frequently discussed in Cabinet meetings and the controlling principles have been arranged satisfactorily. With the exception of the changes regarding the rate of interest and the discount, which I assumed responsibility for, all matters have been referred to the Advisory Council and have been approved. During the negotiations I endeavored by all possible means to preserve good relations with the groups. Adhering to this idea I gave way to the utmost in respect of the demands made by the groups in the hope that a settlement would be reached at an early date, that order would be maintained and lasting peace be secured.

The period of negotiations included the end of the old and the new calendar years and on these two occasions I was placed in a position of great difficulty as there was most pressing need of funds. I would recall that at the end of last year, new style, believing that a method of meeting the urgent conditions would be approved by the Advisory Council, I succeeded in getting the Cabinet to take the responsibility for altering the rate of interest from 5% to $5\frac{1}{2}\%$. Then again in your letter of January 26th you stated that with the exception of the issue price in London and the alterations to article 13, which were to be discussed, nothing else in the terms of the agreement would be different from the copy of the agreement sent on January 15th. You further said that prior to the signature of the agreement you should receive from your Ministers information that satisfactory foreign advisers had been engaged for the salt administration and the bureau of audit and a director for the loans bureau and that satisfactory agreement had been made with them et cetera. I at once took steps to engage able and intelligent men, three in number, to fill these positions. I expected that men who had been selected for the [their?] ability, irrespective of nationality, with such great care, would surely be accepted by the groups but on the 4th of February, when the agreement was all in order and the groups had agreed to sign the agreement at once and to make advances, suddenly other complications came up and you could not keep your word. On the 5th I wrote you declaring that prior to the signature of the agreement I reserved the right to borrow else-Subsequently a reply was received from you saying that so far as the groups were concerned everything was ready for signature and that the delay mentioned by me was clearly beyond your power to control and that you could not take the responsibility. I replied to this on the 6th declaring that I could not take the responsibility for anything outside the scope of the agreement and that, as it was difficult to see how the matter could be brought to a satisfactory conclusion, [I] could not do otherwise than go elsewhere for the funds so urgently needed. But I still remained inactive, hoping that your statement that all was ready for signature would materialize at an early date. More than a month has passed since the date set for signature and on the 3rd of March my Government received the information that the six Governments had decided at a meeting that nationality was to be the controlling factor as regards the engagement of foreigners in connection with the loan agreement; that one Englishman with one German as vice should be appointed to the salt administration; that in the loans department a German should be engaged as director; that as regards the number and functions of the foreigners in the audit department great changes had been made so that, instead of one foreigner, one Russian and one Frenchman were to be appointed. Such essential changes in the original understanding as these had not been calculated upon at any time during the negotia-

In the negotiations for this loan there were first frequent delays and secondly successive changes of the terms of the agreement and I have been forced into an unimaginably difficult position. The foreign press for the most part calumniates my country. Foreign nations blame us for not paying our debts but at the same time every move they make tends to stop our sources of supply and they do not allow us to pay our debts. Foreign Governments blame us because the new régime is not established but their actions are such as to prevent our raising the funds and they do not allow us to make progress. Our Government is subjected to enormous loss in every way by these delays and it is truly impossible to delay any longer.

As regards the negotiations for this loan I am deeply grateful for the good intentions of the groups. Unintentionally all these complications have arisen so that now the agreement, all ready for signature, has no more substantiality than a picture cake and cannot be put into effect. I deeply regret that the conditions are actually such as described by you in your letter of the 5th February, i. e., beyond control. Responsibility therefore cannot be undertaken. Kindly take note accordingly.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 19, 1913-9 p. m.

Only for your information and guidance, I quote the following statement issued by the President:

"We are informed that at the request of the last administration a certain group of American bankers undertook to participate in the loan now desired by the Government of China (approximately $125,-000,000). Our Government wished American bankers to participate along with the bankers of other nations, because it desired that the good will of the United States toward China should be exhibited in this practical way, that American capital should have access to that great country, and that the United States should be in a position to share with the other powers any political responsibilities that might be associated with the development of the foreign relations of China in connection with her industrial and commercial enterprises. present administration has been asked by this group of bankers whether it would also request them to participate in the loan. representatives of the bankers through whom the administration was approached declared that they would continue to seek their share of the loan under the proposed agreements only if expressly requested to do so by the Government. The administration has declined to make such request, because it did not approve the conditions of the loan or the implications of responsibility on its own part which it was plainly told would be involved in the request.

"The conditions of the loan seem to us to touch very nearly the . administrative independence of China itself, and this administration does not feel that it ought, even by implication, to be a party to those The responsibility on its part which would be implied in requesting the bankers to undertake the loan might conceivably go the length in some unhappy contingency of forcible interference in the financial, and even the political, affairs of that great oriental State, just now awakening to a consciousness of its power and of its obligations to its people. The conditions include not only the pledging of particular taxes, some of them antiquated and burdensome, to secure the loan, but also the administration of those taxes by foreign agents. The responsibility on the part of our Government implied in the encouragement of a loan thus secured and administered is plain enough and is obnoxious to the principles upon which the government of our people rests.

"The Government of the United States is not only willing, but earnestly desirous, of aiding the great Chinese people in every way that is consistent with their untrammeled development and its own immemorial principles. The awakening of the people of China to a consciousness of their responsibilities under free government is the most significant, if not the most momentous, event of our generation. With this movement and aspiration the American people are in profound sympathy. They certainly wish to participate, and participate very generously, in the opening to the Chinese and to the use of the world the almost untouched and perhaps unrivaled resources of China.

"The Government of the United States is earnestly desirous of promoting the most extended and intimate trade relationship between this country and the Chinese Republic. The present administration will urge and support the legislative measures necessary to give American merchants, manufacturers, contractors, and engineers the banking and other financial facilities which they now lack and without which they are at a serious disadvantage as compared with their industrial and commercial rivals. This is its duty. This is the main material interest of its citizens in the development of China. Our interests are those of the open door—a door of friendship and mutual advantage. This is the only door we care to enter."

The American Group to the Secretary of State.

NEW YORK, March 19, 1913.

Sir: We beg to confirm our telephone conversation of today in which the Department advised us that the statement of yesterday issued to the press by the President in regard to Chinese loan negotiations was to be considered as the Government's reply to the request of the American group in our letter of March 5th that the Department indicate its desire as to our future conduct in this matter.

We beg to enclose herewith a copy of the telegram which we have today despatched to the groups with whom we have been associated, and to our representative in Peking for communication to the Chinese Government, announcing our intention to withdraw from the six-group agreement and to give notification of our withdrawal from the four-group agreement in June next, in accordance with the provisions of article 14 thereof.

We would, however, call to the Department's attention the fact that, as shown by your records, we are now committed to certain transactions entered into by us with the Chinese Government at the instance of the Department, notably the Hukuang Railway loan agreement; our one-fourth share in the £400,000 advance made on May 23rd, 1911, under the currency-loan agreement, signed on April 15th of that year; and our one-sixth share in the advances made to the Chinese Government on February 28, March 9, May 17, June 12 and June 18, 1912, for which we now hold Treasury bills, and which China intended to repay from the proceeds of the proposed reorganization loan.

In this connection we would beg to call to your attention the fact that the Chinese Government has not as yet redeemed the Treasury bills held by the six groups falling due on February 28 and March 9 respectively, of which the American group's share is-

Bills due February 28, 1913, $237,894.13. Bills due March 9, 1913, $128,828.84.

The telegram proposed by Mr. Addis, contained in Messrs. Morgan, Grenfell & Company's communication of the 13th of March, a copy of which was transmitted to the Department with our letter of the same date, was on that date forwarded to Peking.

As is shown by telegram received by us to-day from Messrs. Morgan, Grenfell & Co., copy of which is enclosed, the representatives of the six groups in Peking have officially addressed the Minister of Finance reminding him of obligations due February 28 and March 9, and asking for early information as to arrangements made for payment. In reply, the Minister of Finance has stated his inability to pay owing to non-conclusion of the reorganization loan, and has requested an extension of six months or one year at 7½% interest per annum.

The Peking representatives add that as the reply from the Minister of Finance fails to give definite information as to the arrangements for repayment, they have notified the Legations in accordance with their instructions contained in the telegram of March 13 above referred to, that the Chinese Government is in default, and requested the Legations formally to notify the Chinese Government that its obligations are overdue.

We beg to request that the Department may be pleased to instruct the American Minister in Peking to cooperate with his colleagues in making such representations to the Chinese Government as may be necessary to secure an early adjustment of this matter.

Very truly yours,

The Japanese Ambassador to the Secretary of State.

[Memorandum.]

The attention of the Japanese Ambassador has been called to a statement recently appearing in the press and claiming to have emanated from the White House, in pronouncement of the new policy of the American Administration on the subject of the Chinese loan. Assuming the authenticity of the statement, it is expected that such disavowal by the United States Government of the policy of concerted action, established in common accord among the six powers, will be officially communicated to all the other parties to the understanding, and more especially to Japan which, at the invitation of the American Government, was persuaded to take part in the international financial consortium respecting the China reorganization loan. In the meantime, the Japanese Ambassador should feel particularly grateful if he could be favored with an exposition of the views of the American Government on the subject, for his own information.

It will be remembered that the plan of the six-power loan was actuated by a sincere desire to supply China with requisite funds conformably to her request, and to render her necessary assistance, with a view to successful reorganization of the country, consequent upon the recent revolution. Such assistance, which was designed to meet China's pressing financial need and to contribute to the restoration of order and the establishment of authority in that country, has naturally a close connection with the question of recognition of the new Republic. That question was already under serious consideration of the Japanese Government as early as February, 1912, when they suggested to the United States and other great powers the advisability of holding to the principle of concerted action in the common interest of all parties concerned. The suggestion met a ready and favorable reception at the hands of those powers, including the United States, which replied under date of February 28 [27]. July and August following, further correspondence passed between the American and Japanese Governments on the same question.3 It was understood that at an opportune moment, the powers should, in mutual consultation, proceed to the formal recognition of the new Republic. In pursuance to that understanding, the Japanese Government have been looking forward to an early opportunity when the desired recognition could be properly and conveniently accorded, and immediately upon being satisfied that the situation in China warrants such action of the powers, they will be happy to enter into further communication with the American Government freely and frankly upon measures to be taken in common with the other Governments interested. It is confidently hoped that having regard to the history of the question in the past, and appreciating the importance of the relations of good correspondence among the powers, especially in the matter of recognition, the American Administration may find it possible to deal with the situation upon free exchange of views with the Japanese Government.

Sir: * * Your telegram of March 19, 9 p. m., containing the full text of the statement was not received here until yesterday (March 24th) having been delayed by transmission through Paris and Tokyo. * * *

A meeting of the diplomatic representatives of the six powers concerned in the loan has been called for tomorrow morning, but in view of the statement of the President communicated in your telegram I have informed my colleagues that I shall not be able to take any further part in these negotiations.

As indicating the effect which the statement of the President and Cabinet has had upon the Chinese I have the honor to enclose a copy of an editorial published in the Peking Daily News of today's issue.1

On the whole the Chinese are greatly pleased by the action of the American Government and I have the honor to report that yesterday after conversation upon other matters the President of China said to me: "I am very grateful to the American Government for its action of a few days ago. It will be of great assistance to us."

The Acting Secretary of State to the President.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 25, 1913.

Mr. President: I have the honor to enclose herewith a memorandum of a conversation I had to-day with the Chinese Minister. I informed the Minister that I would take great pleasure in transmitting to you the substance of the message from President Yuan Shih Kai but that I understood that it was your intention to defer any discussion of your recent statement with the foreign representatives in Washington until the return of the Secretary of State.

The Minister expressed his entire satisfaction with this arrangement, and I gathered from the conversation that on the return of the Secretary the Minister may request an opportunity of presenting the text of the message to you in person.

Very respectfully,

ALVEY A. ADEE.

[Inclosure-Memorandum.]

The Chinese Minister called at the Department today and informed the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Adee, that he had received special instructions from President Yuan Shih Kai to make formal expression of the thanks of the people of China and of their appreciation of the just and magnanimous attitude of President Wilson indicated in the public statement recently issued by him which was accepted by the Chinese Government as an expression of sincere friendship toward the Republic and people of China whose aims and aspirations in the establishment of liberal institutions find such ready response in America.

The Minister further expressed the belief of the Chinese Government that the friendship now so happily existing between the two countries will be further strengthened as a result of this policy.

Sir: Replying to your favor of March 19th, the President directs me to say that, in view of the fact that China was expecting to se-

¹It is headed "America and the Sextuple Group" and concludes as follows: "The consortium may or may not survive in a quintuple or even a quadruple form, but one thing at least is certain: China, except under compulsion, will never contract a foreign loan under the conditions recently demanded by the powers. And if financial assistance should ultimately be forthcoming upon less enerous terms much of the credit will be due to President Wilson."

cure from the six-power loan the money with which to take up her short-time obligations, he thinks it would be unfair to demand of China the immediate payment of the advances made, and suggests' the propriety of considering favorably the request made by China for a six months' extension.

For this Government to urge immediate payment or to act officially in calling attention to the demands of the American financiers would arouse just criticism in view of the fact that it was this Government's refusal to renew the request made by the preceding administration that terminated the prospect of your participation in the loan and thus gave the excuse for the immediate demand. This Government's obligation to urge fairness upon the part of American creditors is as binding as its obligation to ask fair treatment of Americans by foreign governments, and the President feels that in view of all the circumstances of the case the request of China for six months' time is not unreasonable. The security, it may be added, is not lessened by delay and the interest is two per cent higher than that which you asked for the long-time loans.

Before taking action upon your request, the President would be glad to have a reply to this suggestion.

Very truly yours,

W. J. BRYAN.

The American Group to the Secretary of State.

New York, March 31, 1913.

Sir: We have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 28th, in reply to ours of the 19th, of March. In deference to the President's suggestion we are forwarding today to Messrs. Morgan, Grenfell & Company a cable, a copy of which is enclosed, stating that the American group is willing to accede to the request of the Chinese Minister of Finance that an extension of six months at 7½% interest per annum be granted, upon the Treasury bills which became due on February 28th and March 9th, respectively.

It is our wish in so far as consistent with the principles of sound business to conform to the wishes of our Government. But we would emphasize the fact pointed out in our letter of March 19th that these advances, which the Chinese Government intended to repay from the proceeds of the reorganization loan, were made by the American group jointly with the British, French, German, Russian and Japanese groups.

While, therefore, we ourselves are willing, in deference to the President's wishes, to agree to an extension of the term of these obligations, we do not feel free in this matter to act independently of our former colleagues, nor, having withdrawn from these negotiations, are we in a position to press them to grant the accommodation which we ourselves are willing to extend.

In your letter under acknowledgment you observe that the Chinese Government offers $7\frac{1}{2}\%$ interest per annum if the extension of the term of these Treasury bills be granted, or 2% more than the interest agreed upon for the large loan. We would call your attention, however, to the fact that the interest of $5\frac{1}{2}\%$ was to be paid on a loan the term of which is fifty years, evidenced by bonds which we as Lankers would of course expect to sell to the public, while the interest of 7½% is offered upon short term Treasury bills already overdue, and as to the repayment of which, as shown by the telegram from Peking, transmitted to you with our letter of March 19th, the Chinese Government has now no definite plan.

Very truly yours,

WILLARD STRAIGHT.

The Secretary of State to the Ambassador of Great Britain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 1, 1913.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to appraise your excellency of the present attitude of the Government of the United States in the matter of the pending negotiations for effecting a foreign loan to the Government of China.

It is unnecessary to recite the circumstances under which those negotiations were set on foot, or the course they have taken. As you are aware, the financial groups of four powers, including the United States, acting with the acquiescence of their respective Governments, took up the matter with the Government of China. Subsequently the financial interests of two other powers took part in the negotiations. The matter was still pending and undecided when the present Administration of the United States took office on the 4th ultimo.

On the 10th ultimo the American financial group, which had theretofore taken part in the negotiations at the request of the late Administration, asked whether the request for the cooperation of the American bankers would be renewed, and intimated that they would not be justified in continuing the negotiations unless they were requested anew to do so.

In response to that inquiry, the matter was considered by the President, whose decision was communicated to the American group and made public for the information of the people of this country. A copy of that publication is hereto appended.2

The American group replied, announcing their withdrawal from participation in the negotiations at Peking, in the following language:

We beg to enclose herewith a copy of the telegram which we have today despatched to the groups with whom we have been associated, and to our representative in Peking for communication to the Chinese Government, announcing our intention to withdraw from the six-group agreement and to give notification of our withdrawal from the four-group agreement in June next, in accordance with the provisions of article 14 thereof.

The telegram referred to, after quoting the public statement, continued as follows:

In view of the foregoing the American group is with great regret obliged to announce to the other groups its complete withdrawal from negotiations for the reorganization loan. We sincerely trust that our action will in no wise prejudice the position of the other groups. We shall gladly consider any suggestions other groups may be pleased to make as to action they desire us take in order that our withdrawal may cause them least possible embarrassment. We shall delegate International Banking Corporation to carry on such routine business as may be necessary in view of the commitments already undertaken. We trust that you will appreciate the circumstances which have made our action imperative, and that you will realize our regret at severing our associations with the combination which we like yourselves believe to have been in the best interests of China and of the investing public in our respective markets.

In communicating with British, French and German groups please add following:

The International Banking Corporation will act for us as regards the Hukuang agreement and the currency loan. We presume in view of amended reorganization-loan agreement, currency loan will be merged therewith, but if other groups wish proceed independently we shall gladly do everything in our power be of assistance. We would further notify you that as at present advised we shall in June give notification of our intention withdrawing also from four-group agreement in accordance with article fourteen thereof.

The matter having thus been determined, it becomes appropriate to acquaint you with the facts in the case, for the information of your Government, in view of the interest it has testified in the negotiations conducted with the Government of China by the financial groups of the six powers.

Reorganization. We have received from C. S. Addis following letter:

I have communicated your letter of March 20th to other members of the six-power consortium, who share regret of the American group at severance of associations and will do their best give effect to desire American group that their withdrawal should be complete. For the American group to relinquish participation in reorganization-loan and currency-loan contracts would not appear to present any great difficulty. As regards sextuple agreement, however, there are no means of releasing any of the signatories until reorganization loan has been issued or abandoned or period of five years has elapsed. It would appear therefore that American group remains bound by provisions sextuple agreement until one or other of these events has taken place, but remaining five groups trust they are correct in assuming that neither American group nor any of its individual members will enter into competition with them for Chinese business during that period.

We have already assured C. S. Addis informally that we are sure it is not intention of American group or its members to enter into competition with their late colleagues in the consortium, but we would be glad to be able to convey to him officially your confirmation of this.

Reorganization. Refer to your telegram of today. Although because of circumstances over which we have no control we have withdre a from negotiations for reorganization loan, we shall, like all other parties to sextuple agreement be bound by provisions thereof until the agreement is terminated and we trust that you will at once advise Mr. Addis for communication to other groups that neither American group nor any of its individual members would consider undertaking any Chinese business either directly or indirectly in competition with other parties to sextuple agreement as long as that agreement remains in force.

We should be glad to hear what steps, if any, British, French and German groups desire us to take with regard to currency-loan negotiations. Right of groups issue this loan was extended to April 14th and we assume that unless further extension is requested by us and granted by Chinese Government contract will lapse subject always to repayment of £400,000 advance. We should also like as soon as possible to settle our share of joint expenses account of reorganization and Hukuang loans to date and receive from British, French and German groups their share expenses incurred by us in connection with currency loan.

Quintuple reorganization loan signed this morning over protest of certain senators who claim that approval by the Assembly is necessary and who threaten to boycott the banks.

File No. 893.51/1427.

The American Chargé d'Affaires to the Secretary of State.

No. 845.]

American Legation, Peking, May 6, 1913.

SIR: Supplementary to my telegram of April 27th, 10 a. m., I have the honor to report that the reorganization-loan contract, the negotiation of which has occupied over a year, was signed by the representatives of the Chinese Government and those of the Quintuple Group of Bankers on Sunday morning, May 4th, between three and four o'clock, at the local office of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation.

The amount of the loan is £25,000,000; the term 47 years, and the interest is 5 per cent per annum. Amortization is to begin in the eleventh year. The issue price to the public is to be not less than 90 and the amount to be paid to the Chinese is to be not less than 84. £500,000 was to have been paid over to the Chinese Government im-

The contract provides for a British associate chief inspector of the salt gabelle, for a French and a Russian adviser to the bureau of audit, for a German director of the bureau of foreign loans, and for a German deputy inspector of the salt gabelle to reside at Shanghai.

The first-named position will be filled by Sir Richard Dane, who has been inspector general of salt excise for India since 1907. Russian adviser to the bureau of audit is to be a Mr. Konovalof, a commissioner of customs in China for some years past and now stationed The French adviser who will be recommended to fill the proposed position in the audit bureau will be M. Padoux, a former member of the French consular service and is now ranked as Minister Plenipotentiary and is legal adviser to the Siamese Government. understand, however, that there still remain a few minor conditions to be settled before M. Padoux definitely accepts the appointment. The German director of the bureau of foreign loans will be Herr Rumpf of the Chinese customs service, who was employed in a similar capacity during the expenditure of the advances made by the sextuple group last year. Mr. Rumpf is in Peking ready to assume office as soon as the initial payment has been made by the bankers. The German deputy inspector of the salt gabelle with station at Shanghai has not been selected. I am confidentially informed that the candidate of the Chinese for this position is a Mr. Arnold of the Reichsbank, Berlin. He knows nothing about China or the Chinese, nor has he had any experience in salt administration. The Chinese state, however, they favor him for his financial experience. Herr von Strauch, who has been in the Chinese customs service since 1899, and is now commissioner of customs at Chungking is the German preferred by the German Legation here for the position.

The signing of the loan at such an unseemly hour as three a. m. was evidently due to the fear of the bankers that delay might result in the conclusion of a loan or loans with other banks. It was known that other loans were under consideration. One, a six per cent £3,-200,000 loan with an Austrian syndicate, or an Austro-Belgian syndicate, had already been signed; and one for £30,000,000 with certain

British banks was said to have been initialed.

When the bank representatives connected with the quintuple loan learned of the last mentioned loan they began at once to urge the Chinese to sign the contract with them, and the interested Governments also brought pressure to bear upon the Chinese officials. In the meantime, the Minister of Finance, as reported in my number 827 of April 25, 1913, disappeared, and rumors of flight caused by fear of assassination became current. It appears, however, that Mr. Chou had gone to Tientsin to negotiate other loans. Among these, it is said, he signed one with an American syndicate for £6,000,000 at 5 per cent and to be secured upon the wine and tea taxes. I am unable to confirm this report at present. The same American syndicate is reported to have undertaken the negotiation of a large loan, namely £20,000,000.

The Minister of Finance returned by special train to Peking on Friday night, May 25th, and the next day resumed negotiations with the quintuple group. When the contract was about to be initialed he presented a list of outstanding loans, as he was required to do, and this created such consternation among the bankers that for a time it seemed possible that the contract might not be signed. The group representatives were not at all pleased with the evidence that the Minister of Finance had signed loans with other banks while negotiating with them. Eventually, however, the group representatives yielded and the contract was initialed. It was then arranged that the instrument should be formally signed at ten o'clock that evening.

When the President and the Vice-President of the newly organized Senate, both members of the Kuomintang, heard, on Friday night, of the return of the Minister of Finance, they sought an interview with President Yuan, but they were told that the President had retired and therefore was unable to receive them. These two officers of the Senate then wrote letters to the President and to the Minister of Finance protesting against the signing of the loan contract before it had been submitted to the National Assembly for approval.

The next morning the President sent his Secretary, Mr. Liang Shih-yi, to labor with the two presiding officers of the Senate, in an endeavor to dissuade them from making further trouble regarding the completion of the contract. Mr. Liang said that the loan contract was already signed and that the Government was badly in need of the money. It was also pointed out that the loan contract was substantially the same as the one which had already received the approval of the Advisory Council, whose obligations had now passed to the National Assembly. This, however, did not satisfy the two senators. Later, when it developed that the contract had not been signed, but had been initialed only, the two senators were furious. They called at the offices of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at 10 p. m., and urged the bankers not to sign a contract which without the approval of the Assembly would be unconstitutional, but the bankers refused to be moved by these protests.

The President and Vice-President of the Senate then went away and gathered a delegation of senators of their own party with whom they returned, to make further objections. They were, however, refused admission to the bank, and, as a measure of precaution, the bank telephoned for extra police. There was really no need of such action, since the visitors were gentlemen, unarmed, and they had no intention or desire to create disorder. At about 3.40 a. m. the contract was signed and the crowd dispersed.

The leaders of the opposition, namely, the Kuomintang, promptly telegraphed to their party associates throughout the country, and the next day telegrams denouncing the Government for its alleged unconstitutional action began to arrive. This action apparently made no impression on the central authorities. They appeared to be ready and willing that the terms of the contract should be fulfilled.

I am informed that the £500,000 which was to have been immediately advanced to the Chinese has not yet been handed over. reason given for the non-fulfillment of this feature of the contract is that the Chinese Government has already received $5,000,000, local currency, from the Austrian or Austro-Belgian syndicate, and will receive two more weekly installments of the same amount. The group representatives, fearing that this six per cent loan will be placed on the market ahead of their own five per cent loan, to the detriment of their loan, desire to reach an understanding which will delay the issue of the six per cent loan.

Another reason advanced is that the quintuple syndicate is awaiting the outcome of the Balkan situation before making any advance what-

With reference to the attitude of the south towards the loan, the Legation learns through the several consulates that, with the exception of Canton, the opposition seems to be confined to the political leaders of the opposition party. The Consul General at Canton telegraphs that the loan meets with much opposition officially.

Since writing the above, I have been confidentially informed that on account of the delay of the quintuple group in making the initial payment of £500,000, the Chinese have resumed secret negotiations with the local representative of the group of British banks outside of the consortium, for the loan of £30,000,000, mention of which is made earlier in this despatch. My informant states that if the British banks are able to make an immediate payment of the £500,000 required, that no further efforts will be made by the Chinese to satisfy the conditions of the quintuple group which require the shelving of the Austrian or Austro-Belgian loan until the quintuple loan has

On account of the opposition to the loan in the south, and since both the Senate and the House of Representatives have disapproved of the irregularity on the part of the Government in signing the loan without referring it to the Assembly, it is possible that the Government will be glad of an opportunity to break with the quintuple group, and seek funds elsewhere.

File No. 893.51/1457.

The American Chargé d'Affaires to the Secretary of State.

No. 929.]

American Legation, Peking, July 11, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to request instructions as to the attitude to be taken by this Legation towards financial transactions between American capitalists and the Chinese Government.

I have several times recently been approached by prominent Chinese, officials and others, with inquiries for American financiers who might be willing to make loans to the Chinese Government for industrial or administrative purposes.

The Vice President of the Senate, Honorable C. T. Wang, called one morning to say that the friendly attitude of the American Government was greatly appreciated by the Chinese and to ask if there were not some way in which China could requite the kindness shown. He suggested a concession for a railway line. He had no definite proposition to make, however. I reminded him that a representative of Dr. Sun had visited the United States and endeavored to interest American capitalists in his plans for railway construction, but had not so far been very successful. Mr. Wang promised to call again and talk the matter over, but has not done so.

Two days ago I learned, on excellent authority, that a contract for the construction of the most important trunk line offered by Dr. Sun has already been signed with Lord ffrench, the representative of Messrs. Pauling & Company, a British firm. Messrs. J. G. White & Company, of New York, are said to be interested in the contract, but in what way and to what extent I am unable at present to say. The line is to connect Canton with Chungking, in Szechuen, probably passing through the Province of Kweichou, which is rich in minerals. The contractors have, also, a seven years' option on an extension of the proposed line from Chungking to Lanchou, in Kansu Province. Funds are to be provided by a loan, bearing five per cent. interest, security for which will be the railway itself. The contract guards against misappropriation of funds by a provision which places them entirely under the control of the foreign engineers. The materials needed from abroad will be purchased in Great Britain. The contract has yet to be approved by the National Assembly, but inasmuch as it has been signed by Dr. Sun, it is believed that his party, the Kuo Min Tang, will support it and will be able to control the votes needed for approval.

Two or three days ago Judge King, formerly a Justice of the Chinese Supreme Court, called to say that a representative of the Vice President, Li Yuan-hung, was in Peking and would like to get in touch with some American capitalists who would be willing to make a loan for the rebuilding of Hankow. He thought that some twenty million (probably Chinese) dollars would be required. security would probably be the provincial taxes. This loan was offered last year to the Robert Dollar Company, of San Francisco.

* * Judge King stated further that Mr. Sheng Hsuan-huai, Minister of Posts and Communications under the late Imperial Government and principal owner of the Ping-hsiang Colliery, the Ta-yeh Iron Mines, and the Hanyang Rolling Mills, was anxious to raise a loan upon the security of these works. They are heavily mortgaged at present to Japanese capitalists and a good part of the output of the iron mines and the mills is sold to Japan at very little above cost. The proposed loan would be used to pay off this indebtedness and improve the works. I inquired whether the lenders would be allowed to operate the mines and mills. Judge King thought not, but said that they would be allowed supervision of the accounts.

A third loan in contemplation is one sought by the Province of Chekiang upon the security of the silk tax. The production of silk is one of the chief industries of that province. The manager of the Peking branch of the International Banking Corporation, which is American, informs me that his bank refused this loan because it was intended for political purposes only and because the security was considered to be inadequate.

The Military Governor of Mukden also is looking for another loan for administrative purposes.

In discussing these proposals with American business men, I have been asked whether the American Government would give its support to these enterprises. In reply I have reminded the inquirers that bona fide American business interests have always received the protection of our Government and that a large part of the work of the Legation consists in endeavors to adjust difficulties related to such business interests. I have referred also to the statement, issued by the President and communicated to the Legation in your telegram of March 19, 9.00 p. m., to the effect that the American people "wish to participate very generously in the opening to the Chinese and to the use of the world the almost untouched and perhaps unrivaled resources of China" and that "the Government of the United States is earnestly desirous of promoting the most extended and intimate trade relationship between the United States and the Chinese Republic." At the same time the objections set forth in the President's statement to the conditions of the recent reorganization loan contract have not been overlooked.

I have the honor to inquire whether I am to understand that the Department does not desire the Legation to encourage loans to the Chinese national or provincial Governments, secured upon national or local taxes.

It is evident that financial transactions between American citizens and the Chinese Government are altogether different from such transactions between individuals or business firms. When difficulties occur in connection with the latter, suits may be brought by American plaintiffs in Chinese courts in which our consular representatives have a right to sit as associates to see that justice is done and the treaty rights of their nationals protected; and in cases where Americans are defendants the American consular courts or the United States Court for China have jurisdiction. Should the Chinese Government, however, default in its engagements with American financiers, it might become necessary to take possession of the revenues pledged as security for the loans made and this, as the President points out, might require "forcible interference in the financial and even the political affairs of China."

This contingency is even now at hand; China is on the verge of bankruptcy and, in my opinion, can not much longer escape from international control of its finances. I assume, therefore, that the Department does not intend to give its support to any loan contracts with conditions similar to those to which objection has been made in the case of the reorganization loan. If I am correct in this, such loans as those solicited for the rebuilding of Hankow and for the provincial administrations of Chekiang and Shengking, if made by American financiers, could not expect the support of the United States Government.

On the other hand, industrial loans, like that desired by Mr. Sheng Hsuan-huai to be secured upon the mines and mills concerned, as I understand the policy of the Department, would be looked upon with favor by the Department and would have the right to expect such protection as has always been given to American commercial interests.

In the case of loans made for the construction of railways, the Legation is not quite clear as to the attitude which should be taken. Where the loan is secured upon the railway itself, I assume that the support of the United States Government will not be withheld, even though these lines are owned by the Chinese Government and the contract is made with a representative of the Chinese Government, as has been the case in nearly all railway construction in China. The Hukuang Railway contract, however, provides for a loan which is secured upon provincial taxes. While the Department would discourage the making of such contracts by Americans in the future, I assume that since this particular contract has received the approval of our Government, the Legation can not refuse to take such action as may be necessary to protect the American investment already made.

The questions raised here are practical and of pressing importance.

In the case of the Hukuang Railway Loan, the fear of the bondholders that the provincial likin was no longer adequate as security led, in March last, to considerable discussion and to the temporary pledging of the property and materials of the railway as a guaranty that the likin was unimpaired. Other questions in connection with this loan are not unlikely to call for action by the Legation.

I am now asked by the local representative of the International Banking Corporation to ascertain whether or not the Department will give support to a loan for the construction of one of the lines offered by Dr. Sun and for which his bank may be disposed to negotiate. I have asked him what he means by "support." His reply is that, should the Chinese Government or its representative fail to carry out the terms of the contract, he would like to be assured that the Legation will exercise its good offices to see that a just settlement is made. I have already stated in a preceding paragraph my understanding of the Department's policy in such cases.

The peculiar conditions prevailing in China, where so many industrial enterprises are either wholly or partially owned by the Government, make it desirable that American business men should know how far the Legation can go in encouraging investments for the development of such official or semi-official enterprises.

The future of American trade is concerned because concessions obtained now will secure for the nations obtaining them the Chinese market for the machinery and other supplies needed in the development of the concessions. Once supplies of a certain type are introduced, they tend to become standard and the sale of other sorts becomes very difficult. In this connection, I have the honor to inquire whether the Department's instruction of October 21, 1905, still holds good, in which the Legation is authorized to forward without comment to the Chinese Foreign Office the applications of reputable American citizens for privileges and concessions.

The Legation is desirous of avoiding any misunderstanding of the Department's policy in regard to the questions raised herein, so that it may carry out that policy. I have the honor, therefore, to request that I may be instructed accordingly.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, September 11, 1913.

Sir: In reply to the Legation's despatch No. 929 of July 11, 1913, in which instructions are requested as to the attitude to be taken by the Legation toward financial transactions between American capitalists and the Chinese Government, I have to state that the Legation is right in assuming that the Department is extremely interested in promoting, in every proper way, the legitimate enterprises of American citizens in China and in developing to the fullest extent the commercial relations between the two countries.

It may be stated, in general, that this Government expects that American enterprise should have opportunity everywhere abroad to compete for contractual favors on the same footing as any foreign competitors, and this implies also equal opportunity to an American competitor to make good his ability to execute the contract by showing his responsible standing or giving appropriate security for the execution of his contract. This Government does not do this for him. This Government is not the endorser of the American competitor, and is not an accountable party to the undertaking. It, however, stands ready, if wrong be done toward an American citizen in his business relations with a foreign government, to use all proper effort toward securing just treatment for its citizens. This rule applies as well to financial contracts as to industrial engagements.

A clear statement of this general principle will be found in the instruction of Mr. Olney to Mr. Denby, of date December 19, 1896 (see Foreign Relations 1897, page 56) which, together with the Department's instruction of October 21, 1905, to which you refer in the despatch under reply, the Department considers still generally applic-

With reference to the question of the nature and degree of diplomatic support that may be given to any particular financial enterprise in China the Department must, in accordance with its uniform practice, exercise the right to decide each case independently as it arises, according to the circumstances and conditions that may exist at the time, always with the understanding, however, that, as made explicit in the President's public statement of March 18th last, the support of this Government could in no case be expected to involve or imply forcible interference in the financial or political affairs of China.

Within these broad lines much must necessarily and may to advantage be left to the discretion and experience of the Legation and particularly to the initiative and enterprise of the individual Americans interested, who should at every opportunity be reminded that in seeking, developing and safeguarding business opportunities in China they must rely primarily upon their own efforts, looking to this Government only for such assistance and protection as are ordinarily given to legitimate and beneficial American enterprises in foreign countries.

American Legation, Peking, September 25, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to submit the following observations upon the present political conditions in China.

The suppression of the insurrection in the south has undoubtedly strengthened the hands of the present administration and there is some prospect of an increase in the revenues of the Central Government from the more direct control which Peking will now have of the fiscal administration of the southern provinces. Nevertheless, the financial condition of the Government at present is well-nigh desperate. The proceeds of the so-called Reorganization Loan are about exhausted, except that some £4,400,000 remain to be used for the improvement of the salt administration and certain other purposes, and which will not be paid over until the Government is ready to carry out these reforms. It is stated by a native journal that the Government has already a deficit of $20,000,000.

Already the Government is talking of another loan, and since, according to the terms of the reorganization loan contract, no loan can be made by the Government for six months after the last instalment of the reorganization loan is paid, the quintuple banking group is the only one at present with whom the Government can deal.

Should the quintuple group be approached for another loan, it is more than likely that much harder terms will be made than are found in the last contract, more especially since the claims of the Government with respect to the income from the salt gabelle do not appear to be supported by the facts. In my No. 916 of July 1, 1913, I called attention to the budget for the first six months of the year as showing a revenue of but $1,867,000 from salt. The real amount received by the Central Government is said to have been much less than this and by some it is estimated at no more than $200,000.

Much offense was given, too, to the banking groups by the attempt of the Government to place a salt commissioner over the Chinese director-general and the British co-director-general of the salt gabelle, who under the contract were supposed to have full authority to reorganize the gabelle. The creation of the new office was doubtless intended to prevent the carrying out of any reforms not approved by the Government. A strong protest by the representatives of the five powers concerned led to the abolition of the new post and the Chinese Government has reluctantly consented to the plans of Sir Richard Dane, British co-director of the salt gabelle. Whether these plans will prove practicable or not is somewhat problematical. Sir Richard Dane has had experience in India, but he is not well acquainted with conditions in China. I enclose a clipping from the Peking Gazette, of September 25th, translated from the Asiatic Daily News, which comments unfavorably upon the proposed plans.

I have several times, in previous despatches, referred to the extravagance and corruption of the present Government. The opinion generally expressed by foreigners in Peking is that there is far more corruption under the Republic than under the Manchu régime. There are many more officials to be satisfied now, and the commissions upon contracts that are approved are necessarily much larger. In one instance it is credibly stated to have been thirty-five per cent.

The amount of paper money in circulation is constantly increasing and is a serious hindrance to trade in some parts of the country. The amount of the provincial notes outstanding is given as $150,000,000. To this must be added $9,000,000 issued by the Bank of China and the Bank of Communications. In a conversation which I had with Mr. Liang Ch'i-ch'ao, Minister of Justice, on the 24th instant, I was informed that it was proposed to redeem the provincial notes now at a considerable discount by issuing Central Government notes payable at a future date. The Peking Gazette reports that one-tenth of the issue, to be determined by lot, is to be redeemed each year, so that the whole of the $150,000,000 would be redeemed in ten years. This does not appear to be a very practicable solution since the notes will not bear interest and the scheme would really amount to a loan without interest. Since the present provincial notes are at a discount of from twenty to forty per cent, however, it is not impossible that if they are exchanged for the new notes, dollar for dollar, the holders might be willing to part with them under the proposed arrangement.

The Premier, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and the Minister of Justice have all repeatedly, within the past two weeks, expressed their regret that the American bankers had withdrawn from the currency-loan agreement. They recalled the deep interest shown by the United States in the reform of China's currency, the work done by Professor Jenks, and the initiative taken by the Americans in negotiating the currency-loan contract, and seemed very desirous of having American assistance in this reform, so greatly needed. I do not doubt, however, that their desire for American assistance is largely due to their dissatisfaction with the pressure being exerted by the five governments whose nationals are included in the quintuple group.

The present Premier, who is also Minister of Finance, seems to realize the critical condition of the country's finances and is endeavoring to enforce greater economy in the administration. * * *

The whole situation is affected, too, by the rather strained relations existing between China and Japan. * * *

File No. 893.51/1477.

The American Chargé d'Affaires to the Secretary of State.

No. 1067.]

AMERICAN LEGATION, Peking, October 21, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to report that I called by appointment upon the Premier and Minister of Finance, Mr. Hsiung Hsi-ling, on the 18th instant to inquire about the negotiations at Yunnan Fu between an American, Mr. T. G. P. Pierson, and the Yunnan Provincial Government for a loan of $2,500,000, as already reported in my No. 1064 of even date.

After Mr. Hsiung had denied any knowledge of such negotiations, he broached the subject of a loan by American capitalists to the Chinese Central Government. This is the third time recently that he has introduced the subject, but the first time that he has stated the amount and purpose of the proposed loan and definitely requested any action upon my part. Three other Cabinet Ministers have also recently approached me upon the same subject. The Premier said he regretted that the American bankers had withdrawn from participation in the currency loan, that the currency of the country was in a very bad condition, and that its reform was urgently needed. He said the Chinese Government would be glad if the American Government would give such assurances to American capitalists as would induce them to resume the lending of money to China.

I assured the Minister that the American Government was not only not opposed to the investment of American capital in China but on the contrary would be glad to see such investment made, whether for industrial or purely financial purposes, but that it was not the desire of the American Government to conduct the negotiations for such loans, which should be taken up with the American

I called attention, however, to China's pledge not to make or guarantee any loans for six months after the last payment upon the recent reorganization loan. The Minister replied that the six months would expire in February next and that the time between the present and next February was but too brief for the negotiations of a new loan, and that even if negotiations should be completed before that date no bonds would need to be put upon the market until the six months' period should be completed.

I inquired as to his plans for the improvement of the currency. He stated that there was a vast amount of paper money afloat which had been issued by the provinces, that it was now at a heavy discount and he proposed to replace these notes with notes of the Bank of China which it was intended to secure by the loan requested. The total amount of provincial loans afloat is estimated at Chinese $200,000,000. Mr. Hsiung said that it was thought that if a loan of, say, £5,000,000 or £10,000,000 could be negotiated in the United States, a further loan from the quintuple group could be avoided: a result much to be desired by the Chinese Government. Such a loan for the reform of the currency, he considered, would be for the general benefit and would in effect be an industrial, not a political loan, since it would encourage industry and commerce by giving a stable medium of exchange and removing the danger of financial loss from a depreciated currency. The Chinese Government would benefit greatly because the revenues now being sent up from the provinces are paid in this depreciated currency, which must be received at its face value by the Central Government but which can be paid out at no more than its market value.

The Minister pointed out that if China should have to turn again to the quintuple group for a loan of another £25,000,000 each of the five nations interested would have an investment of £10,000,000 in these two loans, and that if the United States had no share in them its interests were likely to suffer correspondingly. He did not explain this statement, but I presume he meant to imply that the conditions of supervision, etc., without which the loans cannot be made, would place these five powers in practical control of China's finances and enable them to dictate its fiscal policy, while at the same time their numerous advisers and supervisors would place them in an advantageous position when purely industrial loans were to be made or railway, mining, or other concessions were to be granted.

I raised the question of security for such a loan as he desires, but he replied only vaguely that there were plenty of revenues that could be given as security. CHINA. 191

I did not encourage him to hope that American capitalists would be attracted by the proposed loan, but, on the contrary, pointed out that American capital could find such remunerative investment at home as to make it undesirable to enter into competition with that of Europe, which was content with low rates of interest. In reply to this remark he asked whether the bonds for such a loan could not be floated in the United States, in which case he would be willing to pay a higher rate of interest inasmuch as the quotations of Chinese securities in Europe would not be affected thereby. I expressed the opinion that if the rate of interest were high enough the bonds could doubtless be sold in the United States.

At his earnest solicitation I agreed to report to you his request for the good offices of the American Government with American capitalists, but at the same time I suggested that the proper channel for the communication of such a request was the Chinese diplomatic representative in Washington.

In making this report it is scarcely necessary to do more than call attention to the desperate condition of China's finances, of which the Legation has already on various occasions advised the Department. I enclose a clipping from the Peking Gazette of October 15th, which quotes an estimate of China's indebtedness made by the Osaka Mainichi, from which it appears that her foreign debt is not less than Y1,715,751,728, or United States $857,875,864. These figures are believed to be substantially correct. Taking a conservative estimate of the population at 320,000,000, the indebtedness amounts to United States $2.68 per capita, which seems very light when compared with Japan's $25.00 per head.

But China's finances are in such disorder that it seems impossible for her to continue long to meet her obligations without foreign interference, and that possibility must be given due weight in considering the advisability of an American loan to this Government. Undoubtedly, the Chinese would like competition between American financiers and those of the quintuple group, since the latter might in such case be induced to moderate their demands, and I am disposed to believe that this is the principal motive prompting the Cabinet to ask for an American loan at the present time.

THE POWERS IN CHINA.

Dealing with the economic position of the Powers in China the Osaka Mainichi points out that the economic invasion of China is a matter of history, and has now reached a stable condition. The following table shows the details of the investments of the Powers in China:

	Government loans.	Provincial loans.
England Germany. France. Russia Belgium United States. Japan. Other powers	334, 548, 250 240, 763, 250 147, 837, 361 106, 737, 361 29, 066, 666 16, 000, 000 69, 670, 000 643, 153, 840	23, 480, 000 16, 000, 000 4, 620, 000 210, 000 37, 380, 000 3, 420, 000 2, 870, 000
Total yen	1,627,871,728	87,880,000

As shown by the figures Britain comes first on the list, supplying one-fourth of China's requirement; and next comes Germany, which supplies one-eighth of China's whole national debt. Japan's total investments in China stand at 73,000,000 yen, which is only a sixth of Britain's investments and a fourth of Germany's. China has also floated a large amount of loans in the domestic market, which are practically foreign debts. When these loans are taken into account, the amount supplied by Britain and Germany is still further increased, and the percentage of Japan still further lowered.—Japan Daily Mail.

Extension of £400,000 Advance on Currency Loan: Minutes of a conversation between Mr. McKnight and the Minister of Finance on October 1, 1912.

[Extract.]

On October 1st Mr. McKnight called upon the Minister of Finance by appointment at 3:00 p. in. Mr. McKnight explained that the American group had all along taken the lead in matters connected with the currency-reform loan and that he came to-day informally to call to the Minister's mind the fact that the advance of £400,000 fell due for payment on the 15th of this month, and to ask the Minister whether he had taken steps to provide for repayment at due date or whether he desired to request an extension of time. The Minister replied that he had this matter under consideration and had brought it to the notice of the President, and hoped that it would be possible to secure an extension of time, for China was in financial difficulties. He feared that if payment of this advance was pressed for he would have to borrow to meet the demand.

Mr. McKnight asked the Minister whether or not in his opinion the advance could be repaid if an extension of time till next April were agreed to by the groups. The Minister replied that it was impossible to say, but he hoped that conditions by that time would be so much improved as to make repayment possible. He desired to ask Mr. McKnight whether the currency loan could be floated *

Mr. McKnight replied to the Minister to the effect that while he hoped it by April next. would be possible for China to obtain from the groups funds for the currency reform when needed, yet he personally did not think that it would be possible to float the currency loan by April next on the conditions called for in the agreement; he further said that much would depend on the general financial policy of the Chinese Government, for this would determine China's credit on the foreign markets.

The Minister stated that he knew full well that in the matter of China's credit everything depended upon whether or not China could make great advances toward a settled condition and embark upon a sound progressive policy during the intervening months. He expressed the hope that this would be done and requested Mr. McKnight to do his best to secure an extension of time for repayment of the £400,000 advance.

Mr. McKnight informed the Minister that in case he desired to ask for an extension of time it was important that a letter should be sent to the groups as soon as possible in order to give time for consideration; he assured the Minister that such a letter would have most careful consideration and that a reply to it would be made as soon as possible.

The Minister said that he expected a reply from Mukden within one or two days and that no time would be lost after its receipt.

The Chinese Minister of Finance to Mr. McKnight.

MINISTRY OF FINANCE, Peking, October 2, 1912.

SIR: With reference to the currency-reform and Manchurian-industrial loan concluded between your group and the former Manchu Government on April 15th, 1911, £400,000 of which have already been advanced in accordance with clauses 4 and 5 of article 8 and is due for repayment on October 15th of this year, and with reference to the enquiries made by Mr. McKnight at his visit yesterday, I find that the agreement stipulates that these funds shall be repaid out of the $(x_1, \dots, x_n) \in \mathcal{N} X = \{x_1, y_1, x_1'\}$ proceeds from the sale of the first issue of the bends. In view of the fact that these bonds have not been issued for sale and that the Republic in this its initial stage of reconstruction has an enormous expenditure to meet and has no other funds upon which it may draw for repayment at once, I have to request that the time for the repayment of this sum of £400,000 be extended until the 15th October, 1913. Or that it be paid from the first proceeds of the sale of the currencyloan bonds.

In view of the good feeling that has characterized the relations with your group in the past, I trust that this request may be granted.

Trusting to receive your reply. Compliments [etc.]

Peking, October 11, 1912.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of October 2nd in regard to the £400,000 advance upon the "Currency-Reform and Industrial-Development" Loan.

The clause of the lean agreement which governs repayment of this advance provides that it shall be repaid "from the first proceeds of this loan when issued, or in any case within eighteen months from the signature of this agreement unless otherwise mutually agreed between the Board of Finance and the Banks." Repayment is clearly due, therefore, on the 15th of the present month, since the loan agreement was signed on April 15th, 1911.

In view, however, of the fact that you acceeded very promptly to our request for an extension of the time of the "Currency-Reform and Industrial-Development Loan Agreement" to April 14th, 1913, and also having in mind the unusual circumstances now prevailing in this country as mentioned in your letter, which may very well make it difficult for you to make repayment of this advance when due, my colleagues and myself have thoroughly considered your request for further time and have decided that we can extend the time for repayment to April 14th, 1913, which is the date to which the Currency Loan Agreement itself has been extended—this extension being subject, of course, to repayment of the advance from the first proceeds of loan if issued before the date mentioned. We are unable at this time to consider an extension to October 15th, 1913.

If an extension to April 14th, as above suggested, is satisfactory to you, I suggest that you make an appointment to call at my office before October 15th and formally extend the bond by mutual consent and by joint signature.

Sir: We enclose herewith, for your information, a copy of a letter received by us from Messers. Morgan, Grenfell & Co., dated February 14th, together with a copy of the memorandum referred to therein; relating to a meeting of the representatives of the four groups and Dr. Vissering in London, on January 11th, 1913.

Very truly yours,

WILLARD STRAIGHT.

[Inclosure.]

Morgan, Grenfell & Co. to the American Group.

London, E. C., February 14, 1913.

DEAR SIRS: We inclose herewith 6 copies of a memorandum made by Mr. Whigham of the conversation between Dr. Vissering and the representatives of the four groups at their meeting with him on Saturday the 11th January.

The memorandum was made by Mr. Whigham next day from memory and cannot therefore be considered in any way a complete record of Dr. Vissering's statements, but it has been submitted to Dr. Melchior and Mr. Addis, who were both present, and who have agreed that it gives a fair account of the main points covered in the discussion.

Personally we consider that the meeting with Dr. Vissering was very disappointing. Without venturing to criticise the views of such an expert in currency matters, it appeared to us that his statements were mostly those which might be found in any text-book on currency reform, but that he evaded the whole practical problem, viz., whether the results which had been found to obtain in states and communities with strong governments, which can to a certain extent enforce their wishes in currency matters, would obtain in China where the Government is weak and the population are peculiarly governed by customs and prejudice.

Yours very truly,

Morgan, Grenfell & Co.

[Subinclosure—Memorandum—Summary.]

Dr. Vissering explained that he had originally been invited by the former Manchu Government to act as financial adviser to China in connection with the currency-reform proposals as outlined in the currency-loan agreement. Owing to the revolution, the matter was suspended. Thereafter the Provisional Government asked him to act as its financial adviser and in August or September, 1912, he went to Peking, conferred with a currency-reform committee composed entirely of Chinese, and concluded a contract as Adviser.

previously prepared a pamphlet fully explaining his currency-reform proposals, which was presented to the Chinese committee and to the banking groups, and he now explained his incomplete further plans, relating to the organization of a requisite central bank. He considered China not yet ready for a completely gold basis; a gold exchange basis would best solve the present problem, similar to those adopted in British India and some of the Dutch colonies; for this solution a central bank would not at first require a considerable gold reserve but would issue notes against first-class financial bills payable in gold in European and American centers, thus gradually accumulating a gold reserve in those centers. Neither would a central bank at first undertake ordinary or financial business but would confine its operations entirely to monetary matters. At first it would issue its notes only against gold or gold values and not for services, etc.; the notes so issued would thus go readily into and remain in circulation side by side with the existing silver coinage, gradually becoming a part of the circulating medium.

Messrs. Urbig, Addis and Simon, practical bankers in China, thought Dr. Vissering's proposals impracticable, but their differences with him seemed matters of opinion rather than of principle. They thought the notes issued as indicated by him would not remain in circulation but would at once be presented at the central bank for payment in gold, thus rendering the whole scheme inoperative and forcing the bank soon to close its doors as, being debarred from commercial business, it could make no profits and must eventually

LEGATION OF CHINA, Washington, April 11, 1913.

Dear Sir: I am in receipt of a cablegram from the Ministry of Finance, requesting me to invite your attention to the currency-reform and industrial-loan agreement of April 15, 1910 [1911], to which the American group were parties, and to inquire whether arrangements have been made in accordance with the said agreement for the sale of bonds. As the agreement was entered into with the four groups under the leadership of the American Group, the Ministry is particularly desirous to be informed of the position of your principals in the premises.

Yours very truly,

CHANG YIN TANG.

NEW YORK, April 12, 1913.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: Referring to your letter of April 11th, we beg to say that, owing to circumstances with which your excellency is familiar, it has been impossible to arrange for the issue of the currency loan, and, under the arrangements with your excellency's Government, the period in which the loan may be issued will expire on April 14th next, a date before which, of course, it will be impossible to make the issue.

În response to your excellency's inquiry as to the position of the American group, I have the honor to inform you that we have been obliged to withdraw from Chinese business, and have therefore cabled our representative in Peking that the American group will not request any extension of the period within which the loan may be issued.

We trust that this is an adequate answer to your excellency's communication.

Very truly yours,

Currency. Refer to your cable of today. We have cabled McKnight today as follows:

The American Group to their Representative.

Currency. Being obliged withdraw from Chinese business we will not for ourselves request extension option on currency loan and have so advised Chinese Minister Washington in reply to enquiry from him. It is our strong desire to serve other groups. We have therefore advised them if they should wish extension of option, which they may, in view of reorganization loan not being yet completed, we would be willing extend with them our interest in advance but would not retain interest in option. You will therefore on April 14th cooperate with representatives of other groups to secure extension if requested by them to do so after making our position as above clear to them and Chinese Government. If not so requested you will on April 14th advise Chinese Government that the American group will not request extension of option, thereby relieving American group of any responsibility moral or otherwise in currency loan, advance made by us thereby becoming due and payable under terms of agreement. In view however suggestion State Department regarding reorganization-loan advances we will consider reasonable extension payment of advance if Chinese so desire. We have been unable to definitely learn attitude other groups on this question and they may therefore communicate instructions direct to Peking.

[Extract.]

New York, March 31, 1913.

Sir: Supplementing our letter of March 19th covering transactions with the Chinese Government in which we referred to certain arrangements already made by us jointly with the British, German. French, Russian and Japanese financial groups, we beg now also to call your attention to the two loans which we separately have made to the Chinese Government for the maintenance of its organization for the education of Chinese young men in the United States under the arrangement made following the remission by the United States of a portion of the Boxer indemnity. * * * We authorized Mr. F. H. McKnight, our representative in Peking, to contract to lend to the Chinese Government for the purposes mentioned above the sum of $200,000. This agreement, which was approved by the American Minister at Peking, was signed on the twenty-sixth day of November, We have now advanced to the Provisional Government of China $160,000 on account of this loan of $200,000 contracted for on November 26th, 1912. In accordance with the request of the Chinese Government, communicated through Mr. McKnight, our representative in Peking, we shall, on the first of April, pay $25,000 in Washington to the order of Director Wong Ting for the account of the Chinese Government, and transmit the sum of $15,000 to Peking, which advances will constitute the final installments on account of this loan.

Under a further contract dated January 14th, 1913, the American group agreed to loan the Chinese Government the sum of $185,000 to repay the advance obtained by it from the International Banking Corporation for the maintenance of students as described above.

* * January 17th, we deposited * * * with the International Banking Corporation in New York $185,000 to the credit of the Provisional Government of China and to the order of Mr. Wong Ting.

The agreements above mentioned were concluded with the approval of the American Minister in Peking, and copies thereof were filed with the American Legation at the capital and, we assume, were transmitted to the Department of State and are now included in your official records. These agreements provide that the loans above mentioned shall be paid from the portion of the Boxer indemnity which is refunded to the Chinese Government by the Government of the United States as each payment of the indemnity is made by the former to the latter.

It is our understanding that with the consent of the powers Chinese indemnity payments have been deferred since November 1911. It has been our understanding, moreover, that these arrears would be liquidated from the proceeds of the reorganization loan. Inasmuch as we have withdrawn from the negotiations therefor, as we stated in our letter to the Department on the 19th instant, we now lay this matter before you and beg to request that at such time as you shall deem convenient you will take such steps as may be necessary to arrange for the payment of these obligations by the Chinese Government.

Very truly yours,

WILLARD STRAIGHT.

The Acting Manager of the International Banking Corporation to the General Manager.

PEKING, May 13, 1913.

DEAR SIR: In view of the fact that the outstanding arrears of the Chinese indemnity due to the American Government will be repaid from the proceeds of the reorganization loan as soon as arrangements are completed for this flotation, it is our intention to request the American Legation here to remind the proper authorities at Washington of the lien held by the American group upon that portion of the indemnity, and its arrears, to be returned to China by the United States Government. This hypothecation is covered by loan agreements between the American group and the Ch'ing Hua College dated the 26th November 1912 and the 14th January 1913. We consider it advisable to take this precaution for fear that the portion to be returned might be paid over to the Chinese Government either in Europe or America, when the parties receiving these funds may inadvertently apply them to other purposes before satisfying the rights held by the American group.

But as it is quite possible that the State Department may take no action upon such a telegraphic request from the American Legation here, we will wire you direct as soon as we send in our letter to the American Charge d'Affaires, with the idea that you may take such action with the American Treasury Department. as you deem necessary. At the same time we will, of course, communicate in the above sense with both the Ch'ing Hua College and the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Finance.

Yours very truly,

D. A. MENOCAL.

NEW YORK, August 27, 1913.

DEAR SIR: We beg to advise you that we have now been fully reimbursed by the Chinese Government for the two loans made by the American group to the Chinese Government and Chinghua College, for $200,000 and $185,000 respectively, together with accrued interest to August 21, 1913, inclusive. It seems to us fitting at this time to express our keen appreciation of your services on our behalf in the settlement of these loans.

You may be gratified to learn that we are this day in receipt of an official communication from the Chinese Legation at Washington, from which we quote as follows:

I avail myself of this opportunity to express to you, for your friendly aid to Chinghua College in time of stress, the grateful appreciation of my Government, to which I beg to add my own.

CARNEGIE STUDENT LOAN.

Note.—On June 10, 1913, the Director of Chinese Students in the United States, Doctor T. T. Wong, informed the Department that Mr. John W. Foster had requested Mr. Andrew Carnegie to lend the Chinese Government $200,000 for the support of the Chinese indemnity students, and that Mr. Carnegie had consented to do so. On June 12 Doctor Wong sent to the Department a memorandum, prepared by Senator Root, of the basis for arranging advances by Mr. Carnegie, one feature of which—the only one of interest to the Department—was that "Whenever the funds of the Republic of China become available to resume the payment of indemnity, the amount advanced under this arrangement is to be reimbursed from the first installments." (File No. 893.51/1452.)

On July 4, 1913, the Chinese Government authorized the loan and gave notice thereof to the American Legation. (File No. 893.51/

AMERICAN LEGATION, Peking, January 27, 1913.

SIR: I have the honor to report that the question of applying the surplus maritime customs receipts to the payment of accrued indemnity installments has been the subject of earnest discussion among the members of the Diplomatic Body.

Before stating the issue involved, I will briefly recite the history of the events which lead up to it. As you doubtless know, a number of foreign loans were negotiated by the Chinese, before the Boxer trouble of 1900, for which the receipts of the maritime customs were pledged as security. This indebtedness remains in force, less the annual payment of amortization and interest charges. In addition, under the Protocol of 1901, the indemnity payments were also made a charge upon the customs receipts, but the lien of the latter is subordinate to that of the prior loans.

Under the old régime the customs receipts were paid direct to the local customs Taotai, a Chinese official, and became a part of the general funds of the Imperial Government. When payments on the loans and indemnity matured, the Chinese paid them out of their general funds without reference to the source from which they were derived; so that no question ever arose as to the relative rights of the loans and the indemnity, and no accounting of the customs receipts in reference thereto was ever made.

Soon after the revolution broke out, some of the treaty ports passed under the control of the revolutionists and others remained under the control of the imperialists. This condition of affairs threatened to demoralize the customs revenues and to divert the receipts, in whole or in part, from the payment of the debts for which they were pledged. The Diplomatic Body made an arrangement with the Imperial Government, whereby the current customs receipts were collected by the inspector general of customs and by him held and deposited in certain foreign banks in Shanghai for the account of the maturing payments on prior loans and indemnities. The revolutionists were not parties to this arrangement, but they respected it by their non-interference with the customs authorities or with the revenues collected. Under this arrangement the inspector general collected the revenues and deposited them in the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation, the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank, and the Russo-Asiatic Bank, at Shanghai.

At the time, it was thought that, by reason of the disturbed conditions through which the country was then passing, the customs receipts would fall off; and a contingency might arise wherein they would not be sufficient to take care of the maturing payments of the prior loans; and the three banks aforesaid were made depositaries for the customs receipts by common consent, because they were interested in the service of the loans as well as in the indemnity. No official report of the customs receipts for the year 1912 has yet been made, but it is unofficially reported that the increase over last year amounts to some Hk. Tls. 3,500,000.

The three banks aforesaid paid the loan obligations for the year 1912, as they matured, out of the receipts of that year, and on December 31st had on hand a surplus of some $10,273,682.09. banks continued to hold this surplus, on deposit, in practically equal amounts, which gave them a marked advantage in the local financial This fact excited some unrest on the part of the other banks which are interested in the service of the indemnity, but are not interested in the prior loans. These banks claimed that the continued deposit of the surplus in the three depositary banks gave the latter a predominance in the local financial market to which they were not Therefore the dissenting banks complained to their respective Ministers and asked that the surplus be divided among and deposited with the indemnity banks, so-called, including the three depositary banks, in proportion to the respective national interests therein.

The French, Japanese and Belgian Ministers especially were active in supporting this demand of their banks, and at their suggestion a meeting of the Diplomatic Body was convened on January 16th to consider the question.

The discussion continued through three several protracted meetings and, for a time, it seemed impossible to reach an agreement. it was agreed to distribute the surplus reported on hand on December 31st, or as much thereof as will cover an even number of months, together with four per cent compound interest thereon, and leave the procedure for the year 1913 the same as it was during the year 1912; that is, the inspector general of customs will continue depositing the customs receipts in the three depositary banks as The British Minister said he thought that by September, or soon after, the accumulations will be enough to take care of the loan obligations for the year, and the subsequent receipts may be deposited, as collected, among the indemnity banks for the indemnity

We then formulated an identic letter to be sent to the respective banks and also a communication to be sent to the Foreign Office by the Dean, asking its consent to the arrangement and that an order be given the inspector general to distribute the surplus to the indemnity account in the manner agreed upon. My letter was sent the International Banking Corporation on January 18th, and on January 23rd I was notified by the Peking branch of the bank that a deposit of $757,900 had been made therein at Shanghai for the account of the American Government. I have since received a reply to my letter to the International Bank at Shanghai. * * *

Peking, December 31, 1912.

At a meeting of the French and Japanese Ministers with the Chinese Minister for Foreign Affairs and the Minister of Finance this morning the Minister for Foreign Affairs admitted in principle his Government's liability for damages caused to foreigners by the revolution, and agreed that claims should be settled by the Government of China with the diplomatic representatives of the interested Powers. In case of disagreement about disputed claims they will be referred to arbitration. The Government of China is willing to borrow two million pounds sterling to pay these claims. The French and Japanese Ministers reported the above to their colleagues this afternoon.

American Legation, Peking, April 17, 1913.

Sir: Referring to the Department's instruction No. 290, of October 4, 1912, requesting the Legation to report what action, if any, had been taken by the commission appointed by the Diplomatic Body to classify the claims of foreign residents of China arising out of the revolution and to make recommendations in regard to them, I have the honor to send enclosed a copy of the commission's report, which was presented to the Diplomatic Body at its meeting held April 7th. The diplomatic representatives, after some slight amendments, adopted the report and decided to recommend its approval by their

Mr. Calhoun was chairman of the commission mentioned, and the report was practically completed before he left. Upon his departure, at the request of the commission, I accepted a place thereon, but there was only one meeting held thereafter: that for the final reading and adoption of the report.

The principle of liability was admitted by the first Premier of the Republic, Tong Shao-yi, in his address at Nanking on March 29th, 1912 [before the so-called National Assembly, at Nanking]. Practical recognition of the liability was also given by the settlement of certain claims of French citizens in the Province of These, however, were probably settled by the provincial A general admission of the principle of liability was made also by the Minister of Finance in his letter of February 1, 1913, to the six Ministers.

But to dispel all doubt in regard to the matter a committee consisting of the Ministers of Great Britain, France, Germany and Italy was appointed by the Diplomatic Body on April 7th to call upon the Minister of Foreign Affairs and discuss the subject with him. * * * As will appear from the report of the committee, enclosed, the Ministers mentioned called upon the Minister of Foreign Affairs on April 10th and stated that they had been appointed to discuss with him the question of foreign claims arising out of the revolution and to propose that the Foreign Office should appoint representatives to meet representatives of the different Legations to go into the claims and agree upon the amounts due.

The report of the committee came up for consideration at the next meeting of the Diplomatic Body, April 16th. It was decided to agree to the proposal of the Minister of Foreign Affairs that representatives of the Ministries of Finance and the Interior, if so desired, should take part in the joint examination of claims and to propose that the meetings be held at the Foreign Office three days each week. It was further agreed that the order in which the Legations should present their claims should be determined after the Chinese Government should have appointed its representatives. * * *

The Diplomatic Body further agreed that the head of each Mission, in transmitting to his Government the report of the commission on classification of claims, should point out the desirability of approving the report without amendment, if possible, in order to secure uniformity in the treatment of claims by the several Powers and prevent delay in their consideration. Amendment by one or more Powers may lead to further prolonged discussion and consequent loss of time.

It was decided to be advisable, furthermore, to call attention to the statement made in the second paragraph of the report on classification of claims to the effect that the commission did not consider it within their province to express an opinion on the subject of indemnities to foreign governments for military and naval expenses, and to suggest that the foreign offices of the Powers concerned should consult together and agree upon a uniform policy in regard to such expenses. I have the honor, in reporting this suggestion to the Department, to express the hope that the impoverished Government of China will not be compelled to bear the heavy burden of compensation for such expenditures, and that the Department may be disposed to use its good offices to induce the other Powers concerned to accord the young Republic of China a generous treatment in this regard. * * *

In transmitting this report, I have the honor to request that if it shall meet with the approval of the Department, I may be instructed by cable to that effect so that the Legation may at once proceed to classify American claims accordingly and formally present to the Chinese Government those that fall within the categories A and B.

Diplomatic Circular No. 58.

PEKING, March 14, 1913.

The Dean has the honour to circulate a report which he has received from the Commission appointed by the Diplomatic Body to investigate the question of foreign claims arising out of the Revolution and would suggest that it should form the subject of examination at a meeting of the Heads of Missions.

REPORT OF THE CLAIMS COMMISSION.

The Commission entrusted by the Diplomatic Body with the examination of the principles relating to foreign claims arising out of the revolution have in the first instance examined each case communicated to them by the various legations. They then grouped the claims according to their general character and subdivided them in convenient categories. The object of the Commission in so doing was to furnish the Diplomatic Body with a common basis for estimating the acceptability of the claims which have been or will be submitted by those interested to their respective Legations.

The Commission did not consider it was within their province to express an opinion on the subject of indemnities to foreign Governments for military and naval expenses as the decision whether or not to present such claims rests, in the view of the Commission, with the Governments themselves.

It will be seen then that the Commission have divided the claims into four general classes. Class A covers those which, in their opinion, must be regarded as arising directly and immediately out of the Revolution, and the responsibility for which the Chinese Government cannot disclaim. Class B embraces claims which, while legitimate in principle, are probably not in every case attributable to the Revolution and are therefore open to discussion. Class C covers claims for losses in respect of which the Commission do not consider that an indemnity can fairly be demanded from the Chinese Government. Class D includes claims which the Commission do not consider can properly be classed among the Revolutionary claims.

The accompanying minutes of the meetings will be found to illustrate the views of the Commission on the several questions which arose in the course of discussion and the Commission confine themselves here to drawing attention to the following points in particular:

In the case of merchandise destroyed or looted, it is understood that the owner ought to be entitled to compensation equal to the market value of the goods prevailing at the time of loss, or in the case of export goods, to the contract price.

In determining the rates at which compensation should be paid for death or injury the Commission have the honour to suggest that the principles adopted by the Crown Advocate of His Britannic Majesty's Government in adjudicating the Boxer claims might be followed. An extract from Mr. Wilkinson's report is enclosed for the convenience of the Diplomatic Body.

In the case of damages caused to foreigners by the destruction, deterioration or loss of property held by them as security, it should be understood that the indemnity payable on that account cannot exceed the amount of the debt for which such security was given.

It should be explained that in the use of the words "Chinese Government" or "Chinese authorities," the Commission have drawn no distinction between the Imperial and the Revolutionary or Republican authorities.

The Commission recommend that interest payable on claims admitted should not exceed five per cent. on personal claims or seven per cent. on commercial claims from the date of loss to the date of payment.

CLASS A.

Indemnities to Municipalities:

1. Destruction and loss, as the direct result of the Revolution, of movable and immovable property belonging to foreign municipalities.

2. Expenses for protection and self-defense, including loss caused by the deterioration and [sic] unused provisions recognized as of a municipal character.

Indemnities to Societies, Firms and Individuals:

3. Destruction and loss of movable and immovable property, including goods, personal effects, money and documents of commercial value belonging to foreign societies, firms and individuals, whether in the capital, a treaty port, or in the interior: (a) in the course of or as a direct result of warlike operations, or by the act of looting soldiers or other undisciplined troops; or (b) by the act of robbers or pirates or as a result of acts of an anarchical character.

4. Goods under transit pass imported or destined for export, the property of foreign merchants, looted or destroyed by Chinese soldiers and robbers in the interior.

6. Compensation for: (a) foreigners who lost their lives or were injured physically and incapacitated as a result of the Revolution; and (b) Chinese in foreign employment similarly affected in the performance of their duty to their foreign employers.

7. Salaries and other payments due under contract to foreigners in Chinese Government service or institutions unpaid owing to the Revolution.

8. Actual loss for non-fulfillment or delay in execution, owing to the Revolution and through no fault of the foreign claimants, of contracts and other engagements entered into by foreign firms and individuals with the Chinese authorities; such loss includes freight, reshipment, storage, insurance, and loss or deterioration of goods.

9. Traveling expenses of foreigners in Chinese official or semi-official service to an adjacent place of safety and return journey. Extra living expenses during absence, and rent of houses.

10. Deposits of money or investments in Chinese Government Banks or other Government Departments, not recovered. 11. Actual loss in industrial enterprises such as damage to and deterioration of machinery and materials, resulting from unavoidable suspension or delay in working owing to local Revolutionary disturbances.

12. Rents not recoverable and rents paid in advance where occupation and use were actually prevented by military operations or the acts of Chinese soldiers.

13. Damages caused to foreigners by the destruction, deterioration or loss of property held by them as security.

CLASS B.

Indemnities to Societies, Firms and Individuals:

1. Expenses incurred in protecting movable and immovable property belonging to foreign societies, firms and individuals in the capital, in a treaty port or in the interior.

2. Fees and expenses incurred in determining the amount of damage sustained, of whatever nature.

3. Loss of personal effects, including money, of Chinese employees of foreign firms and individuals.

4. Demurrage caused by the detention of ships or prohibition of voyage: (a) under orders of the Chinese authorities; (b) as a measure of precaution or necessity taken by the foreign consuls or others in authority.

5. Actual loss for non-fulfillment or delay in execution, owing to the Revolution and through no fault of the foreign claimants, of contracts and other engagements entered into by foreign firms and individuals with: (a) other foreign firms and individuals; (b) Chinese firms and individuals. Such loss includes freight, reshipment, storage, insurance and loss or deterioration of goods. Also forfeits actually paid.

6. Traveling expenses of foreigners (not in Chinese official or semi-official service) to adjacent places of safety, but not the expense of the return journey.

7. Debts and professional fees recognized as valid, which can no longer be recovered, owing to the death, flight or insolvency of Chinese debtors or clients traceable to the Revolution.

8. Usual salaries of foreign employees of foreign firms whose services could not be turned to account.

9. Diminution as the result of pillage in the value of guaranties given by compradores to foreign firms.

CLASS C.

Indemnities to Municipalities:

1. Diminution of municipal income caused by the Revolution.

2. Rents of houses paid in advance where occupation was prevented.

3. Salaries and wages of employees whose services could not be turned to account owing to the Revolution, Indemnities to Societies, Firms and Individuals:

4. Telegrams and such like charges necessitated by the abnormal state of affairs.

5. Prospective profits not realized owing to the nonfulfillment or delay in the execution of contracts and other engagements entered into by foreign firms and individuals with: (a) the Chinese authorities; (b) other foreign firms and individuals; (c) Chinese firms and individuals.

6. Extra living expenses incurred by foreigners owing to enforced absence from the usual place of residence, e. g. rent of houses and temporary accommodation of business. All similar expenses incurred in respect of Chinese servants and employees.

7. Expenses of removing property of whatever kind to a place of safety and replacing it.

8. Expenses incurred for reduction of staff. Extra wages for foreign and Chinese employees.

9. Freight, insurance and storage of stock-in-trade which could not be realtzed or suffered depreciation and expenses through congestion of stock.

10. Interest on capital which could not be utilized owing to the troubles.

11. Loss of prospective profit owing to partial or wholesale deterioration of stock-in-trade.

12. Loss owing to fluctuation of exchange, appreciation or depreciation of market prices and appreciation of freight and transport.

13. Additional wages necessitated by the rise in the price of labor.

CLASS D.

1. Claims for principal and interest on provincial loans unpaid.

2. Loss owing to inconvertibility or depreciation of Chinese Government and provincial bills and paper money attributed to the Revolution.

3. Claims in respect to alleged illegal and unwarranted imposition of taxes during the disturbances.

Extract from Mr. Wilkinson's Report.

Claims for compensation for the death of relatives fall naturally into two classes: Claims on behalf of the children of murdered parents and those by other relatives for loss of support, total or partial, actual or reasonably prospective, rendered or undertaken by those killed.

Death claims on behalf of children were dealt with as follows: The children's ages and the station of life of the parents being ascertained, a sum equivalent to the present value of an annuity at three per cent. of whatever sum was necessary and fitting for the education of each child for the number of years to elapse before attaining the age of twenty-one was calculated and allowed. In addition to this, such sum was allowed as would, invested at compound interest at three per cent. for the same number of years, provide for each child at twenty-one a necessary and fitting sum for his advancement in life.

In dealing with death claims on behalf of relatives, the age of the beneficiary was ascertained and also the actual or average annual sum received from the deceased. The average expectation of life of a person of the claimant's age being taken, a sum equal to the present value of an annuity for such number of years at three per cent. of such annual sum was awarded. In case of prospective benefit to have been received if the murdered person had lived, the sum promised or reasonably expected to be paid by the deceased was taken as a basis of calculation.

In case of partial disablement I adopted, where practicable, the following method of assessment: I obtained evidence as to the extent to which the life of the claimant was, from an insurance point of view, damaged; that is to say, the amount of extra premium which an insurance office would demand on the claimant, if otherwise sound, applying for a policy on his life, the extent of which they would "load" the policy. The principal sum on which my calculation was based being that in which the claimant would naturally, from his position in life, take out a policy if about to marry, I then allowed the capitalized value of these extra premia as compensation for the injury received.

PROCES-VERBAL.

The Ministers of Great Britain, Italy, Germany and France called on Mr. Lu—with whom was Mr. Wang—at 4.30 p. m. on Thursday, April 10, 1913.

The Ministers informed Mr. Lu that they had been deputed by the Diplomatic Body to discuss with him the question of foreign claims arising out of the Revolution. The Diplomatic Body had appointed a Commission to examine the principles relating to these claims and this Commission had now completed its task of classifying the claims communicated by the various Legations in accordance with the principles agreed upon. The report of the Commission having been presented to the Diplomatic Body, the latter now desired to propose to Mr. Lu that the Wai Chiao Pu should appoint representatives to meet representatives of the different Legations to go into the claims and agree upon the amounts due with a view to future payment.

Mr. Lu said that the Chinese Government accepted the principle of liability for losses arising out of the Revolution and he welcomed the proposal of the Diplomatic Body; he presumed that the latter would arrange the order in which the claims of the different Legations should be dealt with.

The Ministers replied that they would report Mr. Lu's answer to the Diplomatic Body who would then make further suggestions as to the procedure to be followed.

Mr. Lu added that he would inform the Cabinet of the result of this interview the following day and as it was possible that other Ministries—such as the Ministry of Finance and the Ministry of the Interior—might desire to ne represented at the joint examination of claims, he would be glad to learn how a request for such representation would be viewed by the Diplomatic Body.

The Ministers replied that, speaking for themselves, they had no objection to the proposal, which would probably tend to facilitate matters; they would lay the matter before the Diplomatic Body and would communicate further with

Mr. Lu on this and the other points raised at an early date.

Mr. Lu suggested that the place of the proposed conference should also be considered at the same time and concluded by expressing his desire to do all in his power to promote an early and satisfactory solution of the whole question. (Signed)

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, Peking, February 1, 1913.

YOUR EXCELLENCIES: With reference to the reorganization loan at present under negotiation, there are certain points which require elucidation. January 9th I received your excellencies' joint memorandum on the subject and after consultation with the Minister of Finance I have decided on the following arrangement in two articles:

(1) The Chinese Government agrees to grant just and equitable indemnities for the loss and damage suffered by foreigners during the recent revolution.

To this end the Chinese Government will set aside a sum of two million pounds sterling out of the proceeds of the present loan of £25,000,000 for the purpose of meeting the indemnities above referred to.

(2) The admissibility of the claims and the amount of the indemnities to be paid shall be jointly determined by the Legations and the Chinese Government. In case of disagreement, recourse shall be had to arbitration.

The above two articles being of a satisfactory nature, the arrangement therein contained can be adopted, and I have the honor to inform Your Excellencies accordingly.

With compliments,

EXCELLENCY: With reference to the claims submitted by foreigners on account of losses sustained in the Revolution I have the honor to observe that in the minutes of the first meeting of the International Claims Commission on September 30, 1913, it is recorded that the Chairman of the Commission, His Excellency Ts'ao Ju-lin, Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs, stated that all claims submitted after December 31, 1913, would fail of consideration by the Commission, and it is further recorded that the Acting American Claims Commissioner made the statement that the American Legation was unable to agree to this time limitation.

In confirmation of the above statement I have the honor to inform your excellency that owing to the very careful scrutiny to which American claims are being submitted by the Department of State there is a possibility that these claims may not be ready for presentation to the Chinese Government until after December 31, 1913. At the same time I am unable on that account to waive their consideration, and I am compelled to insist that these claims shall receive the same attention that they would were they presented before Decem-

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note stating that in the matter of the claims for losses suffered by foreigners during the Revolution, it was recorded in the minutes of the first meeting of the International Claims Commission that claims presented after December 31, 1913, would fail of consideration by the Commission; but you went on to state that owing to the very careful scrutiny to which American claims are being submitted by the Department of State there is a possibility that these claims may not be ready for presentation to the Chinese Government until after December 31, 1913; you stated, however, your inability on that account to waive their consideration, and you requested that these claims should receive the same attention that they would were they received before December 31, 1913.

I have the honor to point out that if no time limit is set within which the claims for losses as stated above must be presented, there is danger that their consideration will be unduly protracted, thus delaying indefinitely the indemnifying of foreign merchants and other citizens for their losses in the Revolution. The Ministry could not but feel great regret at such a result, and at the time of the first meeting of the Claims Commission the various Commissioners offered no objection to the plan; hence it seemed very feasible.

However, since you have on these several occasions consulted with regard to a slight modification of the procedure in your case I cannot but accede to your desires. I have the honor to suggest, therefore, that previous to December 30, 1913, the number of the claims to be presented, the names of the claimants, the localities where the losses occurred, and the amount of the claims, be set forth in writing for record. The details of the claims, the proofs to be submitted and the method of investigation can all be brought up for discussion at the time of settling the claims. This seems quite practicable, although an exception made in your favor, and it is hoped that you will realize the good faith that prompts it and do all in your power to further the plan.

Message from the President to the Congress transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State.2

TO THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

In transmitting the accompanying report from the Secretary of State, I most strongly urge not only the immediate appropriation of the sum of $20,000 which is asked, the absolute necessity for which is so apparent, but also the enactment of the requisite anti-drug legislation to which this Government is pledged internationally.

It is a source of gratification to me personally, and it will always be, I am confident, a subject of gratification to the nation, that this Government, realizing the extent of the opium and allied evils, should have initiated the world-wide movement towards their abolition. At this vital period of the movement, to fail to take the few final steps necessary definitively and successfully to conclude the work would be unthinkable, and I therefore trust that there may be no delay in the enactment of the desired legislation, and the consequent mitigation if not suppression of the vice which has caused such world wide misery and degradation.

THE PRESIDENT:

Since the early days of our relations with China and other Oriental countries it has been a constant policy of this Government to aid such countries in their efforts to prevent the development of an opium evil within their borders, or to assist them towards the eradication of such an evil where it already existed. In conformity with this established policy, and as early as 1833, in the various treaties negotiated with China, Japan and Siam, American citizens were absolutely forbidden either directly or indirectly to engage in the opium trade, or were permitted to engage in the trade only in conformity with the laws of those countries.

In the autumn of 1906, when this Government learned that China had set on foot earnest efforts to crush out the opium evil within her boundaries, it initiated an international movement which aimed to secure on behalf of the Chinese effort the cooperation of those Western Powers having territorial possessions in the Far East and who were concerned therefore in the economic, diplomatic and other controversies arising from the Far Eastern opium traffic. The international movement inaugurated by this Government was not only fully justified by the fact that it had since its earliest contact with the Orient forbidden American citizens to engage in the opium trade, but because it was found necessary to protect the population of the Philippine Islands against the effects of the traffic. In furtherance of its purpose this Government in September, 1906, entered upon a correspondence with the Governments of Great Britain, France, Germany, Japan, the Netherlands and China to ascertain if the time had not arrived for the interested Governments to determine if the entire Far Eastern opium traffic could not be brought to an end. The above mentioned Governments willingly offered to cooperate with the United States, and agreed to a joint investigation of the question. Thereupon six other nations, namely Russia, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Portugal, Persia and Siam, particularly interested in the Orient, were also invited to join in the investigation, and in February, 1909, there met at Shanghai, China, the International Opium Commission. That Commission thoroughly examined the opium question in all its bearings, and arrived at nine unanimous conclusions which in substance condemned the evils associated with the production and use of opium and morphine, and contained recommendations as to the measures to be taken to bring such abuses to an end.

But the International Opium Commission was not empowered to negotiate a convention binding the participating powers. It was a commission for the purpose of study, consideration and recommendation. To obtain a more positive result, a further step was necessary: an international convention to be agreed upon in conference by delegates of the interested Governments, such a convention to provide not only international rules under which opium should be produced and the traffic therein conducted, but also the general rules by which opium should be confined to strictly medicinal purposes in the territories of the different countries. Accordingly, in the autumn of 1909 this Government issued a proposal 1 to those Governments which had been represented in the International Commission that there should be a conference composed of delegates with full powers to meet at The Hague or elsewhere to conventionalize the conclusion arrived at by the International Opium Commission and the essential corollaries derived The proposal contained a tentative programme which proved to be generally acceptable. The Netherlands Government very promptly and courteously requested that the Conference meet at The Hague, and on December 1, 1911, on invitation of the Queen of the Netherlands, a conference of the powers represented in the Shanghai Commission, assembled there,2 and the delegates thereto were authorized by their Governments to formulate and sign an international convention.3 In the correspondence between the United States and the several Governments which led to the assembling of the Conference the necessity for the consideration not only of the opium evil, but also of the morphine, cocaine and Indian hemp drug evil was developed, and it was agreed by the interested Governments that those questions were to be included in the programme of work, and by convention were to be placed under the same limitations as opium.

On the 23rd of January, 1912, the delegates to The Hague Conference signed a Convention 4 composed of strict stipulations as to the production and the international and national traffic in opium, morphine and cocaine; and, an important point, it confirmed to China all that had been agreed upon between that country and Great Britain by virtue of their agreement of May 8, 1911. (See Senate Document No.

That the questions dealt with by the Shanghai Commission were not only humanitarian and moral but also questions of great economic importance, had been partly realized and was steadily developed during the sittings of The Hague Conference. Since it was found that they affected not only the revenue and economic interests of the twelve powers with Oriental relations whose representatives had assembled at The Hague but also the major part of the other nations of the world, the Conference came to the conclusion that to make its Convention effective it was necessary to secure adherence thereto by the other nations of the world. Therefore the Convention was so drafted that it was not to become effective until thirty-four other nations named in Article 22 of the Convention should add their signatures to the instrument by means of a Protocol of Supplementary signatures to be opened at The Hague.

The necessary supplementary signatures to the Convention were to be secured by December 31 last, the Netherlands Government and the United States cooperating to that end. In the event of failure to secure all thirty-four signatures the Netherlands Government engaged immediately to call a final conference of all signatory powers, that conference to determine upon the deposit of ratifications of the Convention. Up to the 31st of last December, the two Governments had secured the signatures, or been assured of the signatures, of all of the Latin-American States except one; while but three of the European States had declined to sign. Since a few of the necessary thirty-four signatures have not been subscribed to the Convention, a second and final conference has now become necessary, and the Queen of the Netherlands has therefore invited all the signatory Governments to send delegates with full powers to The Hague in June next to agree upon the deposit of ratifications of the Convention, which it is to be hoped will definitively bring to an end the deplorable and ruinous abuses connected with the production and traffic in opium, morphine and cocaine.

This, Mr. President, is a movement which I have closely followed for the past six years. I have examined all the essential facts and documents relating thereto, and have been gratified to review the growth of this humanitarian, moral and economic movement from a consultation between this Government and five or six of the great powers of the world to one which now embraces the cooperation and has the sanction of almost the entire group of civilized states, and this in spite of the fact that it means past and future financial losses to the powers concerned of over fifty million dollars aggregate annual revenue. The entire movement illustrates a principle abroad in and stamped with the approval of the world to-day, namely, that the peoples are now agreed that an evil such as the opium evil is never wholly national in its incidence, can never be suppressed by two nations alone, as was supposed to be the case with the Far Eastern opium traffic, but that such an evil as it appears in one State is a concomitant or reflex of a similar evil in other States, and therefore is international in its moral, humanitarian, economic and diplomatic effect; further that few evils can be eradicated by national action alone, and therefore that there must be cooperation of all the states directly or indirectly interested before such an evil is mitigated or suppressed. This movement, in which the United States has taken so large a part, was thought at first to concern only those countries of the Far East or those Western nations having territorial possession in the Far East, five or six in number. has proceeded by way of a sober international Commission of inquiry composed of Commissioners representing thirteen nations, and by a Conference composed of delegates with full powers representing twelve of these nations. Those delegates having formulated and signed on behalf of their Governments a Convention containing strict pledges for national legislation and international cooperation, it was presented to the remaining states of Europe and America, thirty-four in number, for their signature; and so far only three of the thirty-four have hesitated.

I have seen in the Orient and elsewhere the havoc wrought by the abuse of opium, and I feel a pride that our Government has been in the forefront of a progressive movement which by the cooperation of the other nations of the world, has been carried to the point where but a final step is necessary effectually to put an end to the misuse of drugs which, while of inestimable benefit to humanity when properly used, are such a curse when abused.

That this international movement for the suppression of the opium traffic has been of incalculable benefit to China, and has been one of the chief factors in her modern rehabilitation cannot be denied, and there can be no doubt that the civilized world has rallied to the support of that country in her opium crusade, because of the fact that that crusade is not spasmodic and a matter of authority, but genuine, and of and by the will of the Chinese people.

The economic burden imposed upon China by the abuse of opium was well-nigh unbearable. It has been stated on the highest authority that up to the time the opium reform movement began the Chinese people expended over 150 million dollars a year on the consumption of foreign and native opium; that the value of the land given over to the production of native opium, were it planted with wheat or other more useful crops, would yield to the Chinese people an annual return in the neighborhood of 100 million dollars; that the average earning capacity of the millions who were addicted to the habit of opium smoking was reduced one quarter, resulting in an annual loss in productive power of nearly 300 million dollars, or a total annual loss to China of about 550 millions of dollars. In this calculation no account is taken of the capital loss involved.

It would be easy for me to point out that the release of China from her opium evil will redound to the credit of all nations concerned and leave a vast number of her people free to spend their energies in the development of internal and foreign commerce to an extent that our commercial bodies have long realized, to the material benefit of China and of those nations who have so loyally assisted her in her great internal movement for reform, and should soon enable the Chinese people to stand as economically free as any other people in the world.

I regret, however, that there is one feature of the international and national effort for the suppression of the opium evil that should be disquieting to the Government and people of the United States. has been stated that a reflex effect of the initiation by the United States of the international movement for the abatement of the opium evil took the form of improved legislation in nearly all countries concerned, and of very drastic legislation in some. Yet, despite this, this Government since February, 1909—the time of the passage of the Federal Opium Exclusion Act—has taken no further definitive action for Federal control of the opium and allied traffics in the United States. The passage of the Opium Exclusion Act was the first step which the Congress took to put our own house in order. There were three bills introduced in the last Congress which aim to supplement and perfect that act. I understand they are to be introduced in the early days of the present session, and will be pressed to enactment, thus placing this Government in a rightful position before the This is greatly to be desired.

The necessity for our representation at the forthcoming Conference at The Hague is so apparent that I need not enlarge upon it, and I therefore have the honor to recommend that the Congress be asked immediately to appropriate the sum of twenty thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable this Government to meet expenses incidental to and in continuity of its efforts to stamp out the opium evil through the forthcoming final Conference at The Hague, and otherwise to make effective the results heretofore accomplished, this sum to be expended at the discretion of the Secretary of State and to continue available until the object appropriated for is accomplished.

Since the forthcoming Conference will meet in the coming June, and the necessary and extensive preparations must be made for it by this Government, it is very important that the appropriation be made immediately available.

Respectfully submitted:

W. J. BRYAN.

Senate Doc. 157, 63d Cong., 1st sess.

Message from the President to the Congress transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State accompanied by a report from the American delegates to the Second International Opium Conference at The Hague, July 1-9, 1913.

[Read August 9, 1913; referred to Committee on Foreign Relations.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanied with a report prepared by Mr. Hamilton Wright on behalf of the American delegates to the Second International Opium Conference, which met at The Hague on the 1st of July last and adjourned on the 9th of the same month.

The First Opium Conference assembled at The Hague on December 1, 1911, and adjourned on January 23, 1912. The convention formulated by this conference has since been signed by all of the Latin-American States and by a great majority of those of Europe, and all but three of the States that have signed have already agreed to proceed to the deposit of ratifications.

The results of the conferences should be regarded by the Government and people of the United States with great satisfaction. An international convention imposing the obligation to enact legislation strictly to confine the trade in opium and allied narcotics to medical purposes has been signed by all but 10 nations of the world, and there is reason to believe that by the end of the present year, through the action of the recent conference, all the nations of the world will have become signatories of the agreement.

It remains for the Congress to pass the necessary legislation to carry out the stipulations of the convention on the part of the United States. Such legislation has recently passed the House of Representatives without a dissenting vote, and I earnestly urge that this measure, to the adoption of which this Government is now pledged, be enacted as soon as possible during the present session of the

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 9, 1913.

The Secretary of State to the President.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 7, 1913.

The PRESIDENT:

I have the honor to submit herewith a report prepared by Mr. Hamilton Wright on behalf of the American delegates to the Second International Opium Conference, which sat at The Hague from the 1st to the 9th of July last.

The report summarizes the steps leading up to the call of this conference by the Netherlands Government and reviews the questions submitted to the conference and the conclusions arrived at by the delegates thereto, representing the following countries: Germany, United States, Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Spain, France, Great Britain, Haiti, Italy, Japan, Luxemburg, Mexico, the Netherlands, Portugal, Russia, and Siam.

The report also covers the period intervening between the adjournment of the First Opium Conference, which sat at The Hague from December 1, 1911, to January 23, 1912. By this conference an international convention was adopted which emphasizes the obligation to adopt legislation strictly to confine the dealing in opium and allied narcotics to medical channels. This convention has been signed with the greatest good will by all but 10 nations of the world, and an agreement to ratify it has been made by nearly all of the signatory powers. Among the signatory powers are all the Latin-American States and a great majority of the States of Europe; and an agreement to proceed to the deposit of ratifications has been entered into by all but three of the signatories. The report states that there is every reason to believe that by the end of the year, through the action of the recent conference, all the nations of the world will have signed the convention, and that it will become universally effective a short time thereafter. As a party to the international convention, the Government of the United States is pledged to the enactment of legislation to carry it into effect. A bill drawn for that purpose has recently passed the House of Representatives without a dissenting vote and it is hoped that it may be enacted into law during the present session of the Congress.

W. J. BRYAN.

Report to the Secretary of State on the Second International Opium Conference by the American delegates: Hamilton Wright, Lloyd Bryce, Gerrit John Kollen.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 31, 1913.

Sir: The following report, made on behalf of the American delegates to the Second International Opium Conference, held at The Hague from July 1 to July 9, 1913, is in continuation of reports of January 1, 1910, and of May 15, 1912, [the former] made to your predecessor by the undersigned on behalf of the American commissioners to the International Opium Commission, which met at Shanghai in February, 1909, and [the latter on behalf] of the American delegates to the First International Opium Conference, which assembled at The Hague on December 1, 1911, and adjourned January 23, 1912. (S. Doc. No. 377, 61st Cong., 2d sess., and S.

Doc. No. 733, 62d Cong., 2d sess.²)

The above-mentioned reports should be carefully consulted, as the first contains the conclusions and recommendations of the International Opium Commission; a wide range of data embracing treaties affecting citizens of the United States in regard to the opium traffic; statutes controlling Americans engaged in the foreign opium traffic; tariff, internal revenue, and other statutes covering the opium trade in the United States and its possessions; projected Federal legislation, etc.; while the second report is mainly composed of instructions to the American delegates to the first Hague conference, and a careful analysis of the International Opium Convention formulated in that conference of twelve powers, representing the civilization of America, Europe, and Asia.

For a proper understanding of what the American Government has accomplished in cooperation with the other nations of the world during the past six years for the obliteration of the special and general opium and allied traffics, it might be well to consult certain articles on the commission and First Conference in the Journal of International Law of July and October, 1909; and of October, 1912, and January, 1913. These articles state very thoroughly the status of the world-wide opium problem before the United States initiated in the autumn of 1906, the international movement for its suppression; and contain information which shows beyond doubt that all nations concerned have heartily rallied to the support of the United States for the achievement of an intercontinental humanitarian, moral, economic, and diplomatic reform. I beg to suggest that these articles be printed as an annex to this report.

With the above-mentioned documents accessible for consultation, it is unnecessary that an exhaustive report be made on the recent conference. The salient facts in regard to the preliminaries of that conference are about as follows:

By article 22 3 of the International Opium Convention of the First Conference, formulated by delegates of twelve powers, it is provided in effect that the powers not represented at that conference shall be permitted to sign the convention; that to this end the Netherlands Government shall invite all the States of Europe and America who were not represented at the conference to sign the instrument. There then follows an enumeration of 34 powers of Europe and America who are to be invited to sign.

During the first conference an informal agreement was made between the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Netherlands Government and the American delegates thereto that the United States should especially concern itself in securing to the convention the signatures of the Latin-American States. This understanding was reinforced by a formal request made on the United States by the Netherlands Government, which appears as follows:

²Contains the report of May 15, 1912, referred to in footnote 2 on p. 221. This document also contains the texts of the Opium Convention and the Protocol de Cloture. To the text of Article 13 of the Opium Convention as there printed and as printed in For. Rel. 1912, p. 260, the words "shall not take place" should be inserted after the word "powers."

No. 218. ROYAL LEGATION OF THE NETHERLANDS GOVERNMENT, March 7, 1912.

Mr. Secretary of State:

By virtue of article 22 of the International Opium Convention, concluded January 23 last, an additional protocol of signature has been opened at the Department of Foreign Affairs at The Hague for the powers that were not represented at the conference.

His excellency, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, being convinced of the special interest taken in this question by the American Government, desires me to express to your excellency the hope that you will kindly lend your invaluable assistance to cause the powers of Latin America to sign the said protocol at the earliest possible date.

Be pleased to accept, Mr. Secretary of State, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

J. LOUDON.

As the result of the understanding between the American delegates and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Netherlands Government, and the formal request of the Netherlands Government upon the Government of the United States, The Department of State issued April 15, 1912, a circular instruction to American diplomatic officers accredited to the Latin-American States. In substance that instruction was about as follows:

Attention was called to the fact that during some 30 years a powerful and extensive public opinion had developed which aimed to secure the abolition of the evil associated with the opium traffic as seen in Far Eastern countries; that this public opinion expressed itself not only in the United States, but in those other countries having intimate commercial association with China; that for a number of years much pressure had been brought to bear upon the Government of the United States to induce it to take the initiative in an international movement for the eradication or mitigation of the evil; and that after a thorough examination of the question by the Department of State the Government of the United States in the autumn of 1906 approached several of the interested powers to see if there could not be assembled an international commission of inquiry to study the moral, scientific, economic, and diplomatic aspects of the The Governments approached heartily responded to the proposal of the United States, and in a short time it was agreed among them that an international commission of inquiry should meet at Shanghai, China. That commission met on February 1, 1909, and adjourned on February 26 of that year.

After a searching study of the opium question in all its bearings, the international commission unanimously decided that the opium evil, though most obvious in the Far East, was really present in the home territories of the several countries represented in the commission. The commission then adopted nem. con. nine resolutions, which may be found on page 65, Senate Document No. 377, Sixty-first Congress, second session. The instruction further declared that although no formal conclusion was arrived at, it was a matter of discussion, and was recognized by the international commission, that its resolutions, however important morally, would fail to satisfy enlightened public opinion unless by subsequent agreement of the powers they and the questions involved in them were incorporated in an international convention. Impressed by this fact and the desirability of divesting the opium problem of local and unwise agitation, as well as by the necessity of maintaining it upon the basis of fact as determined by the international commission, the Government of the United States issued a proposal to the interested Governments on September 1, 1909, to the effect that an international conference be held at The Hague, composed of delegates of each State, and that such delegates should have full powers to conventionalize the resolutions of the Shanghai commission and their necessary consequences. This proposal contained notes as to a tentative program (p. 73, S. Doc. 377, 61st Cong., 2d sess.), and to this program, by the proposal of the British Government, was added the question of the production, use of, and traffic in morphine and cocaine, and by proposal of the Italian Government the production, use of, and traffic in the Indian hemp

The Latin-American States were informed that it was the earnest desire of the United States that in the prospective conference there should be as wide a representation as possible, and that this desire was strengthened after the proposals of the British Government in regard to the morphine and cocaine traffics had been made, for it was promptly recognized by the United States that several of the Latin-American countries were interested in the production of the raw material of the coca leaf from which one of these drugscocaine-was derived. However, it was explained that it was not possible in the short period which elapsed between the time of the British proposals and the assembling of the international conference at The Hague for the Government of the United States to make its desire known to the Latin-American Governments; that it seemed wiser at the moment that the prospective conference should consist of those countries which took part in the Shanghai Commission, and that that conference should decide whether its convention should become immediately effective as concerned the signatory States, or wait ratification and effectuation upon the signatures of those other countries of Europe and America not represented in the conference. When the conference assembled, it was stated, there was a general agreement that the signatures to the convention by the Latin-American States was essential; that it was with pleasure that the American delegates accepted article 22 of the convention, which provided for the supplementary signatures of the Latin-American States, amongst others, as it undoubtedly enhanced the value of the work of the conference and directly settled an important diplomatic question, namely, that in the future all Hague conferences dealing with questions moral, humanitarian, and economic, of world-wide interest, such as the opium and allied questions, could not be finally determined upon by a minority of nations of the world, but must include delegates of all States directly or indirectly interested. The American representatives accredited to the Latin-American States were then instructed to bear in mind that this Government had steadily pressed for international action for the solution of the opium problem; that it had done so only after a frank recognition by twelve of the powers of the world that separate national action alone could not solve such problems, and after the receipt of assurances from them of their desire to cooperate; that the interest of the American Government and people was great and earnest to secure the humanitarian and practical object to which twelve powers had already given their consent, and for which several of them had made great financial sacrifices. Assurances were made that this Government would be highly gratified to learn that the Latin-American Republics would enter into full sympathy with the international movement for the settlement of the opium and allied questions initiated by this Government as they had sympathized with and supported similar international movements of the past.

Acting promptly on this instruction, the American diplomatic representative met with a hearty response from the Latin-American nations, and by the end of 1912 all of the Latin-American States except Peru had notified the United States that they had signed or would be pleased to sign the International Opium Convention, and paid high compliments to this Government for its initiative and continuous leadership in a high purpose.

If the Netherlands Government and the United States had been able to secure the signatures of all of the powers mentioned in article 22 of the International Opium Convention, the Second Conference recently held at The Hague would not have been necessary. Apprehending the failure of the United States Government and the Government of the Netherlands to secure all of the necessary adhesions, the convention provided in its article 23 that in case the signatures of all of the powers mentioned in article 22 were not secured by December 31, 1912, the Netherlands Government should immediately invite all of the powers who had signed by that date to designate delegates to proceed to The Hague to examine into the possibility of depositing their ratifications of the instrument.

Owing to the economic difficulties which confronted Peru, it was not possible for the United States to secure the signature of that power by December 31 last, and owing to the complicated diplomatic and warlike conditions in the Balkans and their effect upon Turkey, it was not possible for the Netherlands Government to secure the signatures to the convention of Turkey and several of the Balkan States; Austria-Hungary, Switzerland, Norway and Sweden misunderstood the terms of the convention and showed a reluctance to sign it until a second conference of the signatory powers had met and determined upon ratification. Therefore, by virtue of article 23 of the International Opium Convention, the Netherlands Government issued the following notification to the signatory powers:

No. 145.

Legation of the Netherlands, February 4, 1913.

Mr. Secretary of State:

In continuation of my note, No. 1384, of December 10 last, I have the honor to forward herewith to your excellency on behalf of the Queen's Government two copies of a table showing what signatures have been affixed up to December 31, 1912, to the International Opium Convention of January 23, 1912, and to the protocol of signature of powers not represented at the conference, referred to in the penultimate paragraph of article 22 of the convention; the table further mentions the powers whose signatures had not been obtained by the 31st of December, 1912.

I further venture to invite your excellency, on behalf of the Royal Government of the Netherlands and in accordance with article 23 (second paragraph) of the International Opium Convention, to have delegates designated to take up at The Hague the question whether it is possible to deposit the instruments of ratification.

I may add that Mr. van Swinderen (Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Netherlauds Government) intends to call the conference for the month of June next, with the hope that in the meantime several of the nine States whose participation is still wanting shall have signed. His excellency reserves for a later communication the precise date.

Be pleased to accept, Mr. Secretary, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

J. LOUDON.

In a later communication from the Netherlands Minister to yourself, dated May 19, 1913, you were informed that the Second International Opium Conference would be opened at The Hague by the Netherlands Government on the 1st of July, 1913.

The above explanation and reprint of documents explain as concisely as possible the call for the recent conference, and I may now proceed to report on the conditions which confronted the delegates of the signatory powers when that conference assembled, and the results which were attained by the plenipotentiaries of the powers represented thereat.

Your instruction to the American delegates was as follows:

HAMILTON WRIGHT, Esq.,

American Delegate, International Opium Conference.

Sir: I take pleasure in informing you that the President has appointed you a delegate plenipotentiary to represent the United States of America at the final international opium conference, which, at the instance of the Netherlands Government, is to meet at The Hague on the 1st of July, 1913.

The other delegates plenipotentiary of this Government are Mr. Lloyd Bryce, American Minister at The Hague, and Mr. Gerrit J. Kollen, of Michigan Mr. Butler Wright, secretary of legation at Brussels, has been designated as secretary to the American delegation, and Mr. Gerald B. Seldomridge as assistant secretary.

A brief review of the various steps leading up to the convocation of this conference may be helpful. In February, 1909, the international opium commission, upon the invitation of this Government, met at Shanghai, China, where the opium question in all its bearings was examined and certain unanimous conclusions arrived at which in substance condemned the evils associated with the production and use of opium and morphine and contained recommendations as to measures to be taken to bring such abuses to an end. As the commission was not empowered to negotiate a convention binding the participating powers, it was deemed necessary that an international conference, composed of delegates with full powers, should be convoked not only to conventionalize the conclusions arrived at by the commission, but to provide rules under which opium and other narcotic drugs should be produced and the international traffic therein conducted, as well as national laws by which such drugs should be confined to strictly medicinal purposes in the territories of the different countries.

Accordingly the International Opium Conference met at The Hague on December 1, 1911; and on January 23, 1912, the delegates thereto signed a convention containing stipulations as to production and the international and national traffic in opium, morphine and cocaine. As it was found that the questions dealt with by the commission and the conference affected the economic interests not only of the powers having treaty relations with the Orient but also of the other nations of the world, the conference concluded that to make its convention effective it was necessary to secure adherence thereto by all the nations, if that were possible. Therefore, the convention was so drafted that it was not to become operative until the nations named in article 22 of the convention should add their signatures to the instrument.

The necessary supplementary signatures were to be secured by December 31, last. In the event of failure to secure all the signatures, the Netherlands Government engaged to call a second conference of all the signatory powers to examine the possibility of proceeding none the less to ratification of the convention. Since a few of the requisite signatures were not subscribed, a second conference became necessary, which the Netherlands Government has therefore called.

It is assumed by the Department that the discussions and conclusions of the conference will, except by general consent of the interested Governments, be properly confined to the stated purposes, as to which it would seem unnecessary to give you detailed instructions. Should, however, the question of economic disturbances, resulting from the antiopium movement in China, with its bearing on treaties, be raised, you will be guided by the tenor of the Department's instructions of October 18, 1911, to the American delegates to the International Opium Conference, which met at The Hague on December 1 of that year. You may agree to deposit ratifications on the part of the Government of the United States (subject, of course, to the advice and consent of the Senate), provided a majority of the delegates present likewise agree on behalf of their respective Governments. Should occasion arise during the course of the deliberations for special instructions you will communicate concisely with the Department by telegraph.

Throughout the deliberations of the conference you should bear in mind that the international movement for the suppression of the opium evil was initiated by this Government, with the primary object of assisting China in her energetic effort in that direction.

It is the President's desire, and one in which I warmly join, that this conference, through the harmonious consideration and accomplishment of the purpose for which it is convened, may mark a distinct advance in stamping out the opium and allied evils.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. J. BRYAN.

Pursuant to the invitation of the Netherlands Government, delegates of the signatory States assembled at The Hague July 1 last, and the conference was opened on the afternoon of that day in a most felicitous manner by his excellency Marees van Swinderen, Dutch Minister for Foreign Affairs. On the motion of his excellency Monsieur Marcellin Pellet, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Government at The Hague and Dean of the Diplomatic Corps, the Honorable J. T. Cremer, chief of the Dutch delegation, was elected president of the conference. The Netherlands Minister for Foreign Affairs was elected honorary president. Organization was rapidly completed, the conference deciding to adopt the rules of the first conference for its guidance so far as they were applicable. A general secretariat was established, of which Dr. J. A. A. de Beaufort, chief clerk of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, was secretary general, and Mr. J. Butler Wright, secretary of the American delegation, was a secretary.

It was immediately announced by the Netherlands Government that the following powers had signed the International Opium Convention: Germany, the United States of America, Argentina, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Spain, France, Great Britain, Guatemala, Haiti, Holland, Honduras, Italy, Japan, Luxemburg, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Persia, Portugal, Russia, Salvador, Siam, and Venezuela; that all were represented in the conference except Bolivia, Cuba, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Persia, and Venezuela; and the following statement was submitted for the information of the conferees:

POWERS THAT HAVE NOT SIGNED THE INTERNATIONAL OPIUM CONVENTION, WITH REASONS THEREFOR.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

From a communication of the Imperial and Royal Ministry of Foreign Affairs at Vienna, dated March 11, 1913, it appears that the question of signing the opium convention, which would be done by Austria-Hungary for humane motives only, was still under discussion. Inasmuch as the provisions of the said convention and the Austrian and Hungarian laws on the subject had to be harmonized, adhesion could not be declared for some time.

BULGARIA.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs at Sofia informed the Minister of the Netherlands at Constantinople, under date of August 6/19, 1912, that Bulgaria would sign the International Opium Convention. This, however, has not as yet been done.

GREECE.

On September 7, 1912, the Royal Ministry for Foreign Affairs at Athens informed the Legation of the Netherlands there that the Hellenic Government did not intend to sign the International Opium Convention.

MONTENEGRO.

The Montenegrin Government has not yet made any reply to the reiterated request of the Government of the Netherlands that it sign the convention.

NORWAY.

The Ministry for Foreign Affairs at Christiania informed the Minister of the Netherlands on October 8, 1912, that the Norwegian Government, while earnestly desirous of joining in that humane endeavor to suppress the improper use of opium and its derivatives, regretted its inability to sign the convention for the present, as its adhesion would make new legislation necessary. The Minister added that the Norwegian Government proposed, nevertheless, to take under advisement, at the earliest possible moment, the question of enacting new laws that would permit of its adhering to the aforesaid convention.

PERU.

The Peruvian Government has not, as yet, made any reply to the reiterated request of the Government of the Netherlands that it sign the convention.

ROUMANIA.

By a note of February 25, 1913, the Minister for Foreign Affairs at Bucharest informed the Minister of the Netherlands at that city that the acts of the International Opium Conference had been referred to the proper Roumanian department for examination in order to enable the Royal Government to decide whether it would be expedient for it to sign the convention. The Minister added that the Roumanian Government was unable at that time either accurately to state when the examination would be completed or to prejudge its decision.

SERVIA.

The Servian Government has not as yet made any reply to the reiterated request of the Government of the Netherlands that it sign the convention.

SWEDEN.

The Swedish Government has not yet officially answered the Netherlands Government's invitation to sign the convention.

SWITZERLAND.

See the letter of October 20, 1912, from the Federal Council.

See letter of November 30, 1912, from H. E. Mr. Gabriel Noradounghian.²

URUGUAY.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs at Montevideo informed, under date of February 1, 1913, the Minister of the Netherlands that the Government of Uruguay would sign the convention. This, however, has not yet been done.

Note.—During the sittings of the conference both Peru and Uruguay, at the earnest solicitation of the United States, agreed to sign and ratify the convention.

The immediate work before the conference was to decide whether the signatory powers represented were prepared to agree to a deposit

BERNE, October 25, 1912.

MR. CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES:

MR. CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES:
With a note of February 26 last, H. E. Mr. van Panhuys was pleased to transmit to us the text of the International Opium Convention concluded at The Hague on January 25, 1912, by the representatives of twelve Powers, viz: Germany, China, the United States of America, France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, Persia, Portugal, Russia, and Siam. At the same time we were requested by the Netherlands Government to have Switzerland adhere to the convention and designate a delegate to sign the protocol of signature which is kept open at The Hague by virtue of article 22 of the convention.
We acquainted ourselves with and took the most lively interest in the documents that were submitted to us, and we admit our high appreciation of the moral and social motives that led to the conclusion of the new convention. We hold, nevertheless, that the cooperation that Switzerland could afford to the contracting States would amount to next to nothing, and we consider this circumstance as making it superfluous for us to adhere to the opium convention.

next to nothing, and we consider this circumstance as making it superfluous for us to adhere to the opium convention.

Indeed, Switzerland, not being an opium-producing country, does not export the drug, and therefore has no occasion to regulate and supervise the trade; besides, the use of opium otherwise than as a medicine has not as yet found its way in our midst, and the habits of our people do not leave much room for foreseeing a change in that respect. Finally, the use of opium and its alkaloids—as also that of cocaine—as medicine is strictly regulated by our National Pharmacopæia and cantonal laws. So much so that we do not think that any one can go further in that direction than we have. As for the few chemical works that are preparing morphine and cocaine, their supervision is within the province of cantonal authorities, and the Federal power is at present without authority to regulate the matter. regulate the matter.

We therefore hold, as we said above, that Switzerland's adhesion to the opium convention could serve no useful purpose under existing conditions, and we beg you so to inform your Government while conveying to it our very warm thanks for the invitation it was pleased to extend to us.

Be pleased to accept, Mr. Chargé d'Affaires, the assurances of our high consideration.

In the name of the Swiss Federal Council.

FORRER. President of the Confederation. SCHATZMANN, Chancellor of the Confederation.

MR. MOSSELMANS.

Chargé d'Affaires of the Netherlands, Berne.

SUBLIME PORTE, November 30, 1912.

MR. ENVOY:

I have had the honor to receive the two notes, Nos. 400 and 1445-41, dated March 4 and October 4, 1912, in which your excellency expressed the hope that the Ottoman Government would give its adhesion to the International Opium Convention of January 23, 1912.

I regret to have to inform your excellency that the reasons of a financial character which prevented the Imperial Government from participating in the conference held at The Hague for that purpose also prompt it not to adhere to the convention there drawn up in which it did not cooperate.

Be pleased, etc.,

GABRIEL NORADOUNGHIAN.

His Excellency Mr. Jonkheer van der Does de Willebois, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands.

of ratifications according to article 23 of the International Opium Convention. At the first session there was a tendency on the part of a majority of the representatives of the powers to proceed at once to that question. But on a plea from the American delegation that an informal discussion of other aspects of the International Opium Convention might lead to something more than a mere agreement to ratify, the conference adjourned for 24 hours to enable the delegations to consult with each other.

Immediately after the adjournment of the first session, there met in the American office the following delegates: His Excellency Felix de Müller, of Germany; Dr. Hamilton Wright, of the United States; M. H. Petipied, of France; Dr. C. Th. van Deventer, of Holland; and His Excellency M. A. Swetchine, of Russia. After two days of thorough study of the documents laid before the conference by the Netherlands Government, the delegates of these five powers drafted and determined to present to the conference as a whole a projet, the main object of which would be to request the Netherlands Government to explain away difficulties to those powers which had not signed the convention, at the same time inviting them to immediately sign the instrument and agree to its ratification, this request to be supported at the capitals of the nonsignatory powers by the diplomatic representatives of the signatory powers.

This projet was considered by some of the delegations to be beyond the scope of the conference and wholly without precedent. But it was urged by the delegates of the above-mentioned five Governments that the time has passed for international conferences to assemble, go through the usual formalities, to then disperse and leave outstanding questions concerning its convention to prolonged misunderstanding and struggle in the ordinary diplomatic channels, and that as the present conference was of almost world-wide representation, it should use its weight as a conference in being to secure all the results which so many nations had agreed to by convention and to the deposit of ratifications of which they were about to proceed.

While this projet was being informally discussed, a second session of the conference was held, at which the president read the following telegram from Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands:

I am happy to see at The Hague the representatives of the nations assembled for the Second International Opium Conference. While thanking you, Mr. President, for the sentiments which you have interpreted, I express to you my good wishes for the humanitarian goal of the conference.

VILHELMINA.

On the previous day the president had addressed the following telegram to the Queen on behalf of the conference:

The representatives of the countries assembled at The Hague for the Second International Conference have the honor to express to Your Royal Majesty their appreciation of the gracious reception extended to them in your country, as well as the homage of their respectful devotion.

By the 7th of July, as the result of almost continuous informal conference between the above-named representatives of Germany, the United States, France, Great Britain, the Netherlands, and Russia, and as the result of consultations between these representatives and the other delegations, the following projet was presented to the conference for discussion:

PROPOSED RESOLUTION PRESENTED BY THE DELEGATIONS OF GERMANY, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, FRANCE, GREAT BRITAIN, THE NETHERLANDS AND RUSSIA.

PREAMBLE.

The First Opium Conference, in which twelve States participated, requested the Government of the Netherlands to invite the thirty-four powers of Europe and America, enumerated in article 22 of the international convention of January 23, 1912, to sign this convention. Of these thirty-four powers twenty-two have signed the "Protocol of signature of the powers not represented at the conference." There remained, therefore, twelve powers who, for different reasons, have not considered it possible so to do. It appears from the replies received by the Netherlands Government and communicated to the conference that but three powers of these twelve have declined to sign the convention, i. e., Greece, Switzerland, and Turkey.

While Greece and Turkey have not given the reasons for their refusal, Switzerland has observed that, while fully recognizing the motives of moral and social order which led to the conclusion of the convention, the cooperation that Switzerland could lend to the contracting States would amount to almost nothing. The Federal Council based its opinion upon the facts that Switzerland, not being a country which produces opium, does not export this drug, and that, as yet, opium was not used there other than medicinally. It added that the use of opium and of its alkaloids—and also the use of cocaine—for medicinal purposes is strictly regulated by the National Pharmacopæia and by the district laws. It was also of the opinion that it was not possible to proceed further in this connection than had already been done. As regards certain producers of chemical products established in Swiss territory and manufacturing morphine and cocaine, their supervision appertained to the district authorities and the Federal Government was in no way authorized at present to regulate this matter.

Three powers: Austria-Hungary, Norway, and Sweden have replied that as the stipulations of the convention necessitate new legislation, they must withhold their signatures.

Two countries, Bulgaria and Uruguay, have agreed to sign but their signatures have not as yet occurred.

The Roumanian Government, having as yet not concluded its examination of the findings of the conference, is not able to respond. Montenegro, Peru, and Servia have not replied to the repeated invitation of the Government of the Netherlands. The replies of some of the powers indicate that misunderstandings exist regarding the stipulations and the object of the convention which will not be impossible of clarification.

The delegations of Germany, the United States of America, France, Great Britain, the Netherlands, and Russia, inspired by their desire to facilitate these clarifications, and hoping not only to elicit replies from such Governments as have not as yet responded, but also to induce the Governments who have heretofore refused to sign to reconsider their refusal, have the honor to propose the following resolution:

RESOLUTION.

Desirous of following up in the path opened by the international commission of Shanghai of 1909 and the first conference of 1912 at The Hague, the progressive suppression of the abuse of opium, morphine, cocaine, as well as of drugs prepared with or derived from those substances, and deeming it more than ever necessary and mutually advantageous to have an international agreement on that point, the Second International Conference-

1. Utters a wish that the Government of the Netherlands be pleased to call to the attention of the Governments of Austria-Hungary, Norway, and Sweden the fact that the signature, ratification, drawing up of legislative measures and putting the convention into force constitute four distinct stages which permit of those powers giving their supplemental signature even now.

Indeed, it is seen from articles 23 and 24 that a period of six months is allowed to run between the going into effect of the convention and the drawing up of the bills, regulations, and other measures contemplated in the convention. Furthermore, the third paragraph of article 24 gives the contracting powers the liberty to reach an agreement, after ratification, upon the date on which the said legislative measures shall go into effect. Besides, we can not refrain from remarking that the difficulties foreseen by Austria-Hungary, Norway, and Sweden with respect to their legislation were not unknown to the delegates of the signatory powers and were subjected to thorough consideration on the part of the twelve contracting powers. Nearly all the signatory powers are in the same situation as the above-mentioned Governments and have not yet elaborated all the bills contemplated by the convention.

2. Utters the wish that the Government of the Netherlands be pleased to communicate to the Governments of Bulgaria, Greece, Montenegro, Peru, Roumania, Servia, Turkey, and Uruguay the following resolution:

The conference regrets that some Governments have refused or neglected to sign the convention as yet. The conference is of opinion that the abstention of those powers would prove a most serious obstruction to the humane purposes aimed at by the convention. The conference expresses its firm hope that those powers will desist from their negative or dilatory attitude.

3. Utters the wish that the Government of the Netherlands be pleased to point out to the Helvetic Government its error in deeming its cooperation to be of hardly any value. Contrary to what is said in the Federal Council's letter of October 25, 1912, the conference holds that Switzerland's cooperation would be most serviceable in its effect, whereas her abstention would jeopardize the results of the convention. As to the question raised by the Federal Council concerning the respective powers of the Federal and Canton Legislatures it is to be noted that similar difficulties were already considered by the first conference which took them into account in wording the convention.

4. Requests the signatory Governments to instruct their representatives abroad to uphold the above-indicated action of their Netherland colleagues.

5. Utters the wish that in case the signature of all the powers invited by virtue of paragraph 1 of article 23 shall not have been secured by the 31st of December, 1913, the Government of the Netherlands will immediately invite the signatory powers on that date to designate delegates to take up the question whether it is possible to put the International Opium Convention of January 23, 1912, into operation.

This projet met with immediate favor, and was referred to a Comité de Redaction, composed of Dr. Hamilton Wright of the American, Dr. C. Th. van Deventer of the Dutch, Sir William Collins of the British, and Baron Alberic Fallon of the Belgian delegation, for final revision. Such final revision was made with the invaluable assistance of His Excellency Monsieur van Swinderen, Netherlands Minister for Foreign Affairs. On behalf of his Government Mr. van Swinderen expressed a willingness to see that the terms of the projet were immediately laid before the 10 nonsignatory powers, the Dutch representative to those powers, as required by the projet, to be supported by the representative of the signatory States at the capitals of the nonsignatory States.

A roll call as to deposit of ratifications of the International Opium Conference was made, and all of the powers represented immediately agreed to proceed to the deposit of ratifications except Great Britain, Germany, and Portugal. The representatives of Great Britain and Germany made a very sympathetic statement in regard to, and put on record the entire agreement of, their Governments with the International Opium Convention, but held that it was the desire of their Governments to see the signatures more particularly of Austria-Hungary, Switzerland, and Peru added to the convention before they agreed, on the 9th of July, to sign and ratify the convention. This announcement did not reach the American delegation until a few hours after the adjournment of the conference, but in time to have the desired effect, and demonstrate that North, South, and Central America were in absolute unison in regard to the terms of the International Opium Convention and the necessity for its ratification and enforcement. There can be no doubt also that the determination of Peru to join her Latin American sisters in support of the United States in this great humanitarian movement demonstrated the solidarity of interests of the nations of the three Americas. During the sitting of the conference the Department was also able to announce to the American delegation that Nicaragua and Uruguay, which were already signatories, would agree to ratification; Venezuela also as soon as her Congress had taken the necessary preliminary action to that end.

During the sittings of the conference, as the result of representations which the Department of State made to Peru, that country

With Peru signatory to the convention and with the special effort to be made by all of the signatory powers jointly with the Netherlands Government to secure the signatures of Austria-Hungary, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, and the Balkan States, the ratifications of Great Britain, Germany, and Portugal are shortly ex-

The above-named projet of the five powers was embodied in a protocol de clôture of the conference and signed by representatives of the powers at the conference at 3 o'clock on July 9, thus bringing to a practical conclusion the five years of effort of the United States to secure comprehensive international action for the suppression of the abuses connected with the production and distribution of opium, morphine, cocaine, and other narcotic drugs. The conference was then adjourned sine die by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Netherlands Government and the delegates proceeded to signature.

The spirit of international comity which it was expected would govern and which did dominate the recent conference is well set forth in the report on the opium question which you submitted to the President on April 21 last, and which was transmitted by the President to the Congress on the same day. (H. Doc. No. 33, 62d Cong., 1st

The most remarkable single feature of the recent conference was the unanimous adoption by the conference of the projet by which the whole force of the signatory powers represented in the conference is to be brought to bear through the Netherlands Government to induce the signature to the convention of the nine lagging powers. But it was also remarkable that a convention formulated and signed by twelve powers and subsequently signed by twenty-four other powers which had taken no part in its formulation was accepted by those powers and an agreement made for its ratification without a suggestion from any delegate that the instrument should be altered in any way.

The result of the recent conference in regard to signatures and

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECRETARY OF STATE ON THE PRESENT STATUS OF THE INTERNATIONAL OPIUM CONVENTION SIGNED AT THE HAGUE January 23, 1912, and on Agreement to Deposit Ratifications at THE HAGUE, MADE JULY 9, 1913.

The following powers have signed the convention:

Germany.1 United States.1 Argentina.2 Belgium.2 Bolivia.2 Brazil.2 Chile.2 China.1 Colombia.2 Costa Rica.2 Cuba.2 Denmark.2

Dominican Republic.2 Ecuador.² Spain.2 France.1 Great Britain.1 Guatemala.2 Haiti.2 Honduras.2 Italy.1 Japan.1 Luxemburg.2 Mexico.2

Nicaragua.2 Panama.2 Paraguav.2 Netherlands.1 Persia.1 Portugal. Peru.2 Russia.1 Salvador.2 Siam.1 Venezuela.2 Uruguay.2 and 3

(Total, 36.)

Of the foregoing nations the following have agreed to deposit ratifications, in accordance with article 23 of the convention:

United States. Argentina. Belgium. Brazil. Chile. China. Colombia. Costa Rica. Denmark.

Dominican Republic. Ecuador. Spain. France. Haiti. Honduras. Japan. Luxemburg.

Mexico. Netherlands. Russia. Siam. Guatemala. Nicaragua. Venezuela. Peru. Uruguay.3

(Total, 27.)

The following signatory powers were represented at the conference, but reserved ratification until Austria-Hungary, Peru, and Switzerland have agreed to ratification. The chief difficulty of German ratification—Peru—has been removed. It was the general view of the conference that Austria-Hungary and Switzerland would sign and ratify in the near future, and that Great Britain would then agree to ratify. Portugal will undoubtedly agree to ratify.

Germany. Great Britain. Portugal.

The following signatory powers did not have representatives at The Hague, but are expected shortly to agree to deposit ratifications:

Bolivia. Cuba.

Panama. Paraguay. Persia. Salvador.

(Total, 6.)

That is, the great majority of the signatories have agreed to ratify, and soon all signatories—36—will have agreed to ratify.

The following countries have not signed the convention, but by direction of the recent conference will be pressed to do so by an identic note to be presented at their foreign offices by the Netherlands Minister supported by the ministers of the powers represented in the conference:

Bulgaria. Greece. Turkey. Switzerland. Austria-Hungary. Norway. Sweden. Roumania. Montenegro. Servia.

Note.—All the powers who have signed and agreed to proceed to ratifications will do so without waiting upon the nonsignatory powers. It is expected by the Netherlands Government that all those nations which have agreed to ratify will have deposited their ratifications by December 31 next, and that before that date the most important of the nonsignatory powers will have adhered, thus enabling Great Britain and Germany to agree to ratification.

Thus, as the result of five years' leadership on the part of the United States, an international convention imposing strict international, and requiring equally strict domestic, laws for the relegation of opium and allied narcotics to strictly medical channels has been signed in the greatest good will by all but ten nations of the world and agreement to ratify the instrument made by nearly all of the signatory powers. There is every reason to believe that by the end of the year, by the action of the recent conference, the entire world will be signatory to the convention, and that it will become universally effective a short time thereafter.

Shortly before the assembling of the recent conference Great Britain showed her good will toward China and her good intentions in regard to the rest of the world by bringing to a close on the 7th of May last the Indo-Chinese opium traffic which had officially existed between India and China since 1767, when Clive, general for the British East India Co., won the battle of Plassy.

There are some who, from an apparently studied disregard of the facts, pretend to believe that this Government has accomplished nothing during the past five years by its leadership in this great movement. I feel that it is not improper to quote from a report on this question made by you to the President on the 21st of last April:

This, Mr. President, is a movement which I have followed for the past six years. I have examined all the essential facts and documents relating thereto and have been gratified to review the growth of this humanitarian, moral, and economic movement from a consultation between this Government and five or six of the great powers of the world to one which now embraces the cooperation and has the sanction of almost the entire group of civilized States, and this in spite of the fact that it means past and future financial losses to the powers concerned of over $50,000,000 aggregate annual revenue. The entire movement illustrates a principle abroad in and stamped with the approval of the world to-day, namely, that the peoples are now agreed that an evil such as the opium evil is never wholly national in its incidence, can never be suppressed by two nations alone, as was supposed to be the case with the Far Eastern opium traffic, but that such an evil as it appears in one state is a concomitant or a reflex of a similar evil in other states, and therefore is international in its moral, humanitarian, economic, and diplomatic effect; further, that few evils can be eradicated by national action alone, and therefore that there must be cooperation of all the reference of the state of the tion of all the states directly or indirectly interested before such an evil is mitigated or suppressed. This movement, in which the United States has taken so large a part, was thought at first to concern only those countries of the Far East, or those western nations having territorial possessions in the Far East—five or six in number. But it has proceeded by way of a sober international commission of inquiry composed of commissioners representing thirteen nations and by a conference composed of delegates with full powers representing 12 of these nations. Those delegates having formulated and signed on behalf of their Governments a convention containing strict pledges for national legislation and international cooperation, it was presented to the remaining States of Europe and America, 34 in number, for their signature.

As the above table will show, not only have the majority of the 34 signatures been secured, but nearly all of those who have signed agreed at the recent conference to proceed to ratification, while the recent conference put into operation the necessary diplomatic machinery for the securing of the remaining signatures and ratifications of the international convention.

It remains for the United States to demonstrate the sincerity of its leadership in this movement by passing the necessary Federal legislation required by the terms of the convention. It is very gratifying to be able to state that the action of the House in unanimously passing the three antinarcotic bills approved by the President, yourself, and the Secretary of the Treasury, had a most beneficent effect on the recent conference, for it was regarded as a pledge that the Senate would shortly act on the legislation, and that the United States proposed to remain in the forefront of the humanitarian movement which it had inaugurated.

Before closing this report I wish to evidence my appreciation of your great personal interest in this world movement, a real and lasting peace movement. It was expected throughout the country by individuals, peace societies, religious bodies, and commercial organizations, that the President and you would directly interest yourselves not only in the international aspects of this movement, but also in its domestic aspects. That expectation has been fully justified, and is widely appreciated, as the records show. Personally, as the one in charge for the past five years on behalf of the American Government of the international and domestic phases of this question, I can not refrain from joining with those many others in my thanks to you for your active and sympathetic interest in the question.

One other matter and I must bring this report to a close. The delegation which represented the United States at the recent conference was most happily constituted. As chairman of the American delegation I could have had no more loyal and able associates than Mr. Lloyd Bryce, our Minister at The Hague, and Dr. Gerrit J. Kollen, of Michigan, and the delegation was heartily supported in every way by its two secretaries, Messrs. J. Butler Wright and Gerald

B. Seldomridge.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant, HAMILTON WRIGHT,

American Delegate, International Opium Conference.
The Secretary of State.

(Part 1.)

The International Opium Commission, proposed by the United States and accepted by Austria-Hungary, China, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, Persia, Portugal, Russia, and Siam, convened at Shanghai on the 1st of last February, completed its study of the opium problem throughout the world, and based on that study, issued nine unanimous declarations. The commission adjourned on February 27.

The commission's work is interesting from several points of view. It was the first step toward the solution of the opium problem by international action. It was the second commission of its kind to meet since the formulation of The Hague rules of 1899 as to the function of such commissions. Its organization, its rules of procedure, the spirit in which it attacked its problem, avoided a majority and minority report, and declared unanimously, establish a precedent for the guidance of all future commissions of inquiry. The world at large, and even many of those who have agitated the opium question in the past, have regarded the problem as one that concerned Great Britain and China alone. The work of the commission demonstrated beyond a doubt that it is a problem of almost world-wide extent, and that the United States has a large and increasing interest in it.

Before dealing with the commission and its deliberations, it will be well to glance as rapidly as possible at the opium question as it appeared between the issue of the Report of Her late Britannic Majesty's Royal Opium Commission in 1895, and the beginning of the new movement against opium which resulted in the calling of the International Commission. To take the United States first:

THE UNITED STATES.

The attitude of the United States Government toward the traffic in opium beyond its borders has been on the whole admirable. When China was protesting most vigorously against contraband opium from India, the United States contracted one of its earliest treaties with an Eastern country—that with Siam in 1833. Reference to that treaty (vide supplement) will show that Americans were forbidden to engage in the opium traffic with Siamese except at the risk of being dealt with by the Siamese authorities.

In the next treaty with Siam, that of 1856, the United States somewhat relaxed its attitude in the matter of opium. Reference to Article VII of that treaty will show that Americans were permitted to import opium free of duty, but that they could sell it only to the opium farmer or his agents. So far as it can be learned this was not against the wishes of the Siamese Government. The revenue of Siam was in part derived by farming out the sale of opium. Siam produced no opium, and therefore had to import it. The importation was legalized by the Siamese authorities, and Americans were permitted to engage in the trade.

The most important declaration of the United States in regard to the opium traffic is contained in its first treaty with China—treaty of Wang Hea, of 1844. By reference to Article XXXIII of that treaty it will be seen that the United States entered into an obligation to prevent her citizens from trading in opium or any other contraband article of merchandise, and that those of her citizens who violated the treaty were subject to be dealt with by the Chinese Government, without being entitled to any countenance or protection from the United States. Article XXXIII certainly marked the official attitude of the American people toward the Chinese opium traffic, and it had the effect of driving Americans out of the trade. For it was no light matter to fall under the Chinese law against trade in opium. In our next treaty with China—that commonly known as the Tientsin treaty of 1858—the official position of the American Government relaxed, and we accepted, along with France and Russia, the tariff arrangement as contained in the British tariff agreement of the Tientsin treaty. Beyond a doubt the American minister of that time largely influenced the position of the Government. The views that he held have been alluded to in Lord Elgin's position toward opium in 1858. His important letter will be found in the supplement.

Following the Tientsin treaty Americans were free to engage in the opium traffic, and beyond a doubt they did so. But I think it may be stated that the attitude of the American Government toward opium, as evidenced by the treaty of Tientsin, was only a temporary lapse from the position it has constantly held toward the traffic, for, in the American-Chinese commercial treaty of 1880, the United States recovered by binding itself in the matter of the opium trade. By reference to Article II of that treaty it will be seen that a pact was entered into which forbade American citizens from engaging in the importation of opium into any of the open ports of China or to transport it from one open port to another open port, to buy and sell opium in any of the open ports of China. Chinese subjects were also prohibited from importing opium into any of the ports of the United States. The American Government could not, of course, engage with China in this or any other treaty to forbid her own citizens from importing opium into the United States. That was a matter of United States municipal law. Article II was made effective in 1887, when Congress passed a statute which fixed the penalties for its violation. It was held by Mr. Edmunds, who introduced the bill, which afterwards became a law, that American citizens were prohibited from the opium traffic in China by the treaty of 1858, or at least that they were subject to the jurisdiction of the Chinese courts and authorities for trial and punishment in the event of engaging in the trade. Edmunds further stated that-

"By the treaty of 1858, negotiated by Mr. Reed, it was provided in Article XI that citizens of the United States committing any 'improper,' i. e., illegal act in China should be punished only by the authorized officials of the United States and according to their law, and that arrests in order to trial might be made by the authorities of either country. This provision in this treaty may perhaps be fairly considered as superseding the provisions in the treaty of 1844 remitting to the jurisdiction of the Chinese authorities the violators of the opium laws of the Empire, although, as the former provision was special in regard to one topic, it may not be clear that the latter provision just referred to would supersede or

The fourteenth article of the same treaty states that 'The open ports which the citizens of the United States should be permitted to frequent are the ports and cities of Canton * * * and any other port or places hereafter by treaty with other powers or with the United States open to commerce, and to reside with their families and trade there, and to proceed at pleasure with their vessels and merchandise from any of these ports to any other of them. But said vessels shall not carry on a clandestine and fraudulent trade at other ports of China not declared to be legal, or along the coast thereof; and any vessel under the American flag violating this provision shall, with her cargo, be subject to confiscation to the Chinese Government; and any citizen of the United States who shall trade in any contraband article of merchandise shall be subject to be dealt with by the Chinese Government without being entitled to any countenance or protection from that of the United States."

Mr. Edmunds in quoting these articles relating to improper, clandestine, and fraudulent trade appears to have overlooked the fact that by the commercial agreement of the American-Chinese treaty of Tientsin of 1858 the importation of opium into China was no longer a clandestine or fraudulent trade, but a legalized trade on the payment of duties.

The last treaty of the United States with China in which opium or its derivatives is mentioned is the "Treaty of Commercial Relations," October 8, 1903. In the supplement it will be seen that by Article XVI of the commercial treaty of 1903 the Government of the United States consented to the prohibition by the Government of China of the importation into China of morphia and instruments for its injection, except for medicinal purposes and on payment of a tariff duty. By the same article the Chinese Government undertook to adopt at once measures to prevent the manufacture in China of morphia or instruments for its injection. A similar article is contained in the British commercial treaty of 1903. These articles in regard to morphia became effective on the first of last January, all the treaty powers having acceded to the morphia articles of the American and British treaties.

A treaty similar to that of 1880 with China was negotiated with Korea in 1882. Article VII of that treaty is practically the same as article 2 of the commercial treaty of 1880 with China. But so far Congress has not made it effective by appropriate legislation, as was done in the case of the treaty with China. Owing to the altered status of Korea it is not now necessary to effectuate the treaty by statute.

In our early relations with Japan the attitude of the American Government on the opium question was correct, for in Article IV of the treaty of amity and commerce of 1858 the importation of opium into Japan was prohibited to American citizens. That article remained in effect until Japan assumed her full sovereign rights, and was thereby able to forbid or not the importation of opium.

Though not an international pact, the attitude of the American Government in regard to opium is well illustrated in the act of February 14, 1902, which prohibits anyone subject to the authority of the United States to sell or otherwise supply opium to any aboriginal native living within certain parallels of latitude and certain meridians of the Pacific Ocean.

As will be pointed out later, the United States found itself confronted by a serious opium problem when it occupied the Philippines. The outcome of the investigation of that problem and its effect on the opium question as a whole is discussed further on,2 and will be referred to, completing the study of the American opium question. In regard to that question as it affects the United States, it will be briefly stated that a large amount of Turkish opium has been annually imported into the country, and there is abundant evidence that the morphia derived from it has corrupted a large percentage of the population. The importation of opium prepared for smoking had been legalized, and the Pacific ports had drawn on the Portuguese colony of Macao for over 150,000 pounds per annum for many years past. Eighty per cent of this form of opium was absorbed by Chinese smokers, the balance by degraded white and black Reliable estimates place the needs of the American people for opium at 100,000 pounds at most. The annual importation of medicinal opium has been over 500,000 pounds for several years past; that is, over 550,000 pounds of opium are annually imported into the United States and used illicitly.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY AND ITALY.

There is no home opium problem in Austria-Hungary. The poppy is not grown for opium. All opium imported comes from Turkey, and the use of it for other than medicinal purposes practically is unknown. What is said of Austria-Hungary may be said of Italy.

CHINA.

It is a common error to suppose that China depends on India alone for the opium consumed by her habitués. Since the middle of the eighteenth century there has been a progressive increase in the internal production of opium in China. Until a few years ago it was estimated to be in the neighborhood of 350,000 piculs. Mr. Leech, the councillor of the British Legation at Peking, estimates that in the year 1906 it was 330,000 piculs, and that the revenue derived from it by the Chinese Government amounted to £6,500,000; but that only £1,750,000 reaches the central government, the remainder being employed in the provinces. Of the total production of Chinese opium, 4,730 piculs were in 1906 exported to foreign countries: 4,013 piculs, French Indo-China; 147 piculs, Hongkong, en route probably to Formosa, or to be smuggled into the Philippines.

China imports an average of about 51,000 piculs of Indian opium. This may be tabulated for 1906 as follows:

or 50,599,333 pounds weight or 22,588 tons, of which about one-seventh comes from India.

These figures will show what a tremendous problem the opium question is to China, for she not only has to deal with the importation of foreign opium, but with the much larger amount of native produced by her own people and used by them. One of her great difficulties in stamping out the opium habit amongst the Chinese population has been this internal growth of the poppy, and the bad example set to her people by the continued importation of foreign opium.

China is bound by several treaties and agreements in regard to foreign opium. Although the treaty of Nanking, negotiated after the so-called opium war of 1840, left opium as before the war, contraband, there is certain justification in calling that war an opium war, for by Article IV of the treaty, "The Emperor of China agrees to pay the sum of $6,000,000 as the value of opium which was delivered up at Canton in the middle of March, 1839." Opium had for many years before that war been contraband (since 1796), and was so regarded by the British Government and the agents of the East India Co. at Canton. The contraband trade in opium was one of the immediate causes of the war. The opium that was seized and destroyed by Commissioner Lin was contraband opium. By compelling the Chinese Government to pay for it, there was fixed in the popular mind at any rate the idea that that war was an opium war. From the treaty of Nanking onward, trade in opium to China was contraband, although the opium war had left China in rather a weak position to enforce her views.

The treaty of Tientsin was negotiated in 1858, following the Arrow War. In the tariff annexed to the treaty of Tientsin the importation of opium was legalized by the Chinese Government, and admitted officially for the first time since the prohibitory edict of 1796. It was made to pay 30 taels per 100 catties (or picul). There is no evidence that the British plenipotentiary, Lord Elgin, forced the Chinese Government to officially recognize the importation of opium. It is known that Lord Elgin himself considered the Arrow War a deplorable adventure, and regarded the trade in opium with horror. He has stated that he had-

"A strong if not invincible repugnance, involved as Great Britain was in hostilities at Canton, and having been compelled in the north to resort to the influence of threatened coercion, to introduce the subject of opium to the Chinese authorities" — and it has been stated by an eyewitness that-

"For the first 8, 9, or 10 months Lord Elgin never referred to opium as a possible item of negotiation at all, but referred to it as a thing deplorable, from what he saw in the streets; from the emaciation and wretchedness of the opium smokers he came across."

241CHINA.

As an indication of Lord Elgin's attitude toward opium it may be stated that during an interlude in the Chinese negotiations that ended in the treaty of Tientsin, he visited Japan to arrange the first treaty between that country and That treaty prohibited the importation of opium into Japan. Great Britain. Lord Elgin appears to have been largely influenced in his conduct toward the Indo-Chinese opium question by a letter addressed to him by Mr. Reed, who was then the plenipotentiary of the United States in China. Mr. Reed had gone to China strongly opposed to the opium traffic. During the Arrow War he seems to have been greatly affected with the hollowness and danger of the entire opium business as it then existed, and he urged on Lord Elgin that there seemed to be but two courses which he could pursue; that he must either urge the Chinese authorities to interdict the opium trade and to assure them that the British Government would neither directly nor indirectly aid anyone who engaged in it, and that the British Government should prohibit the cultivation and export of opium from India. His only other course was to urge the Chinese to admit opium under a tariff. Mr. Reed further states:

"No one doubts it is very pernicious and demoralizing. I am confident your excellency will agree with me that its evils, as the basis of an illegal, connived at, and corrupting traffic, can not be overstated. It is degrading alike to the producer, the importer, the official, whether foreign or Chinese, and the pur-

The entire letter of Mr. Reed is worth reading.²

Lord Elgin seems to have been well enough informed to know that should he urge prohibition of the growth of the poppy and the export of opium from India it would be hopeless. The second alternative was the only course open to him. Mr. Lawrence Oliphant, Lord Elgin's delegate in the transaction of the commercial treaty, has given an account of the circumstances which led to the Chinese admitting opium into this commercial agreement.3 There is no doubt that the Chinese were opposed to the legalization of the traffic, but what could they do? The British official report states:

"China still retained her objection to the use of the drug on moral grounds, but the present generation of smokers, at all events, must and will have opium. To deter the uninitiated from becoming smokers, China would propose a very high duty; but as opposition would naturally be expected from us in that case, it should be made as moderate as possible."

Lord Elgin wrote to Lord Malmsbury: "It is hoped by this arrangement (the legalization of the opium traffic), on the one hand, a term will be put to the scandals and irregularities to which a contraband trade at the ports necessarily gives birth; and, on the other, that occasion will not be furnished for the still greater scandals and irregularities which would inevitably arise if foreigners were entitled under the sanction of treaties to force opium into all districts of the interior of China." 5

As will be seen by a reference to other Tientsin treaties of the same date, America, France, and Russia followed the British lead on opium so far as it is affected by the British treaty.

The opium trade was regulated by the Tientsin treaties until the "additional article" to the Chefoo agreement was signed at London, 1885.

Under the "additional article" to the Chefoo agreement of 1876 the tariff on opium remained at 30 taels per chest of 100 catties, but was made to pay a sum not exceeding 80 taels per chest as likin.6 The additional 80 taels per chest did away with the likin or transit duties in the interior of China. After the opium had paid the 30 taels duty and been released to the merchants from bond transit certificates were issued to the owners and such certificates freed the opium from the imposition of any further tax while the opium was in transport in the interior, providing that the package had not been defaced or tampered with. The certificates had validity only in hands of Chinese subjects and did not entitle foreigners to convey or accompany any opium into the Since this "additional article" was signed at London in 1885 opium has been admitted to China under its terms. It may be terminated at 12 months notice by either party, when the import of opium into China would revert to the terms of the "commercial agreement" of the treaty of Tientsin.

Until the recent movement against opium was instituted the opium trade in China was governed by this "additional article" to the Chefoo agreement of 1876. It is now under the operation of the "ten-year" agreement, which will be referred to later.

FRANCE.

In France there is no poppy culture for opium. Attempts have been made to grow it for the extraction of opium, but they were not successful. Opium is imported into France chiefly from Turkey in the crude form for medicinal purposes only. There does not seem to be any ground for the statements so frequently met with in the press that the use of morphine is widespread in France. In Paris, Toulon, and Bordeaux there is probably a large illicit use of morphine and considerable smoking of opium, but it seems to be confined to these few cities. In French Indo-China only a small amount of opium is produced, and it may only be imported by the official administration of customs and excise. The manufacture of smoking opium in French Indo-China is a Government monopoly or regie, with a single factory at Saigon. The crude opium is imported from Calcutta and the adjoining Chinese province of Yunnan. The import for 1903 was 251,771 kilos. As the result of recent antiopium legislation the 1907 imports show a decline of 45 per cent. In 1903 the official sales of opium prepared for smoking amounted to 122,941 kilograms; but since the new antiopium movement and the recent regulative legislation this has been reduced about 25 per cent. France has several treaties with China in regard to the importation and exportation of opium. In 1858 the French followed the lead of the British, as expressed in the Tientsin treaty, and French subjects were permitted to import opium into China on the payment of the specified duty. The French treaty of Tientsin covered the opium trade between French Indo-China and China, until the "Convention of Tientsin of 1886," when the contracting parties, in Article XIV, interdicted commerce in opium between the frontiers of Tonkin, Yunnan, Kwangsi, and Kwangtung. But in Article V of the additional Commercial Convention of 1887 the trade was reopened under certain specified conditions.2 . The trade by land was allowed on payment of an export duty taels 20 per picul, but French merchants and persons under French protection were restricted as to the place of trade. There were also restrictions as to reimportation of Chinese opium by the coast ports. This, shortly, was the state of the opium question in French eastern possessions, and the conditions under which the trade was carried on with China until quite recently. The present-day conditions will be referred to later.

GERMANY.

In Germany the poppy is not grown for opium. All opium is imported, chiefly from Turkey. Under the imperial ordinance of October 22, 1901, opium could be only imported, manufactured, and sold for medicinal purposes. In Germany's eastern possession, Kiao Chao, the cultivation of the poppy is prohibited, and, as will be seen by the treaty and ordinances in the supplement, opium can be imported or sold only under strict regulations. The object of the Colonial Government is first to control and finally to suppress the use of the drug except for medicinal purposes.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The opium problem of India needs to be stated from two points of view. There is the problem as it concerns British India and the problem as it concerns the native States of India. In British India the Government has full control of affairs; in the native States only an advisory control, or a control secured by treaty. In British India the growth of the poppy, the manufacture of opium, and its internal distribution and consumption is a Government monopoly. In the native States the cultivation of the poppy and the manufacture of opium is free. Under the monopoly, established in 1773, two agencies have been set up in Bengal, one at Patna and one at Benares, to handle the opium business for the British Indian Government. When sowing time arrives these agencies make a cash advance to the cultivator according to the amount of land he proposes to put under poppy cultivation. When the crop has ripened, a further advance is made to the cultivator, and he is finally settled with after his opium has been tested, graded, and valued by the agencies. The monopoly opium, after being graded and packed, is divided into two parts-one known as excise opium, which is reserved for internal consumption in British India and dispensed under excise regulations; the other known as provision opium, which is sent to Calcutta and sold by auction to the highest bidder. When the provision opium is in the hands of the successful bidders, it is beyond the control of the British Indian Government, and it is trafficked in according to the laws of supply and demand. In the native States, the poppy is freely grown and opium produced without restriction or control by the British Indian Government. It then passes by certain specified routes to Bombay ports, where it is sold for export, except a certain amount retained for consumption in the Bombay Presidency. The control of the British Indian Government over this kind of opium, known as Malwa opium, is limited to imposing the routes by which the opium reaches the merchants at the seaports of the Bombay Presidency and by the collection of a transit tax on it as it passes from the native States to British Indian territory. After the sale of the provision and the collection of the transit tax on Malwa opium, the Indian Government washes its hands of the drug. It then passes by ordinary channels of trade to China, the Straits Settlements, Formosa, and other eastern countries. The total average exportation from all India for the five years 1901-1905 was 67,000 chests of about 140 pounds each. Of this, China annually imported in the same years an average of 51,000 chests. The difference, or 16,000 chests, passed to other eastern countries, to Mexico and the United States. Until the recent prohibitory legislation, the United States absorbed a total of about 250,000 pounds annually, after it had been converted into smoking opium at the Portuguese colony of Macao. It should be clearly understood that the revenue derived by the Indian Government from opium consists of the transit duties levied on opium known as Malwa opium, produced in the native States of India; from the profit on provision opium over and above the cost of its production and from a tax on excise opium consumed in British India. The Indian opium revenue is large, but is a steadily diminishing factor in Indian finance.

The Indian argument for the continuation of the opium trade was a very potent argument—revenue.

However, it-

"Was not to be relied upon. In the 14 years ending 1894 the average revenue was £5,000,000; in the 11 years, 1894-1905, it fell to £3,000,000. In 1880 it represented 14 per cent of the aggregate revenue of India. In 1905 it represented only 7 per cent."

In Great Britain itself no opium is produced. The chief supply is from Turkey and is devoted to ostensibly licit medicinal ends. The "Act to regulate the sale of poisons" of 1868 is said to effectively prevent the illicit use of opium and its alkaloids.

SELF-GOVERNING COLONIES.

Australia.—Australia has a large Chinese population, and therefore an opium problem. Opium smoking was widely indulged in by the Chinese and at one time threatened to spread to the white population. As an index of the large amount of opium consumed it will be only necessary to state that in 1903 42,429 pounds were imported and some 60-odd thousand pounds of gum opium for medicinal purposes. Part of the latter was undoubtedly surreptitiously manufactured into smoking opium by the Chinese and others. In addition, a considerable amount of smoking opium was smuggled in from Macao, Vancouver, and other places of manufacture. In the Commonwealth customs act of 1901 it was enacted that the following are prohibited imports: "All goods, the importation of which may be prohibited by proclamation." The effect of this legislation will be referred to later.

Canada.—In Canada, previous to the prohibitory act that went into effect July 20, 1908, opium was imported from Turkey for medicinal purposes. Indian opium was imported into the West Coast cities, where it was prepared for smoking, sold, and consumed by the Chinese and others, while a large part was smuggled into the United States. The Hon. McKenzie King has stated in a report on the subject that the factories manufactured between $600,000 and $650,000 worth of smoking opium in the year 1907 and that much of the product was smuggled into the United States and Canada. Little or no smoking opium was imported into Canada, it being more profitable to import the crude drug from India and then prepare it for the pipe.

New Zealand.—New Zealand has never had an opium problem, and since 1890 has vigorously prohibited its importation and use except for medicinal purposes. South Africa.—South Africa had no opium problem until the introduction of indentured Chinese coolie labor to the Rand. The opium habit was confined amongst them and kept alive by undesirable whites, and it tended to spread to the black population. Much of the crime that is committed by these coolies is attributed to the use of smoking opium.

BRITISH CROWN COLONIES.

In Hongkong, the Straits Settlements, the Federated States, British North Borneo, Ceylon, a large revenue was derived by farming out the manufacture and sale of smoking opium. Such opium is made from imported Indian opium. In Ceylon the spread of the practice of smoking opium has been rapid, the imports jumping from 1,562 pounds in 1840 to over 23,000 pounds in 1900. In the Straits Settlements the revenue derived from opium is almost 50 per cent of the total revenue of the colony. In 1898 it was 2,332,186 Mexican dollars, representing 45.9 per cent of the total revenue. In 1904 the revenue derived from opium was $6,357,727, or 59.1 per cent of the total revenue of the colony. The growth in the revenue derived from opium in this colony is a fair index of the extent to which the opium smoking is indulged in, and of its tendency to spread amongst the Chinese members of the community. In the neighboring Federated Malay States, where the opium farm is sold to the highest bidder, the States derived in 1896 about $1,500,000 from it. By 1904 the revenue from the farm had increased to over $2,597,000. At Hongkong, where the farm system is in vogue, the sale of opium represented 28.42 per cent of the total revenue of the colony for the year 1904. The British treaties covering the trade in opium have been referred to.¹

JAPAN.

The Japanese Government and people have from time immemorial regarded the misuse of opium with horror. In all the early treaties with foreign States it was stipulated that the trade in opium was to be restricted. Since Japan regained her status as a sovereign power most stringent laws have been enacted covering the importation and manufacture of opium, and it may be stated that Japan has a prohibitory law against the misuse of opium which is effective. On acquiring Formosa the Japanese authorities found that the smoking habit had been confirmed under Chinese rule, and that it could not be immediately got rid of. The policy of gradual suppression was accordingly adopted. Investigation showed that there were over 200,000 opium smokers in Formosa, and it appeared to the Japanese authorities that it would be difficult for the smokers to break off the habit at once. There was also a danger that the people would be alienated in the event of the Japanese applying their own strict home laws to the island. The Government therefore determined to put the importation, manufacture, and sale of smoking opium under Government control. The Formosa opium ordinance was promulgated in the year 1897, and the regulations for the enforcement of the ordinance were issued later on in the same year. On inquiry it developed that the importation of opium into the islands before the Japanese occupation had averaged about 400,000 pounds per annum. Under the system of Government control licenses are granted to the Formosa Chinese, who are the only members of the population addicted to smoking. It is claimed by the Japanese that by the system of Government control they can gradually suppross the use of the drug. No opium is produced in Formosa. It is imported from India. Persia, Turkey, and China. The importations have averaged about 225,000 pounds per annum since Japanese control of the island was made effective. In spite of her strong stand against the misuse of opium Japan has entered into no special pact with China to restrain her citizens from engaging in the opium trade.

THE NETHERLANDS.

In the Netherlands itself the poppy is not cultivated for opium. Neither is it cultivated in her East Indian possessions. The importation of opium and its manufacture into smoking opium and the distribution of the latter is a Government monopoly, or regie. The opium sold by the regie is manufactured in a factory especially built for the purpose. Both Indian and Turkish opium are used, but chiefly the former. The factory is managed by a chemist as director, who is assisted by two colleagues, an engineer as deputy director, and by a technical and administrative staff. There is a large native staff and an inspector in chief, with a staff of subinspectors. There are certain prohibited areas in the Netherlands islands, where the use of opium is prohibited. None of the regie opium is exported. For the years 1889–1893, taking the population of 24,119,136, the annual consumption of smoking opium per head in tahils was 0.042, a tahil being equal to 1½ ounces avoirdupois. The net revenue from the regie for the year 1907 was 13,317,000 francs. The Government of the Netherlands India professes to aim at the control and gradual extinction of the vice of opium smoking by means of the regie. By the treaty of Tientsin of 1863 Dutch subjects could legally import opium into China.

PERSIA.

Persia is a large opium-producing country. The poppy is cultivated quite freely and there is no attempt by the Government to monopolize the manufacture and sale of opium. The amount of opium produced in Persia can not be stated accurately, but it ranges from 1,000,000 to 2,000,000 pounds. The habit of smoking opium either alone or with tobacco is fairly common, and it is estimated that from 200,000 to 300,000 pounds were consumed in Persia annually. The balance of the drug is exported to foreign countries, the high-grade opium going to Europe and America for medicinal purposes and the rest to Hongkong and the Straits Settlements to be manufactured into smoking opium. The Persian Government derives a large yearly income from an export duty on the drug. In 1901–1904 the opium revenue amounted to about $350,000. Persia has no treaty relations with China, and for that reason China may forbid the importation of the Persian drug into the country. As will be seen later, an arrangement has been made whereby the imports of her Persian opium are to be reduced by one-tenth per annum.

PORTUGAL.

The poppy is not grown in Portugal for its opium, nor is it grown in her African and Indian or Chinese possessions. In the colony of Macao alone has Portugal an opium problem. In that colony the vice is widespread among the Chinese population. Until the year 1820 Macao was the principal depot of opium from India, but it gradually lost its hold on the trade after Hongkong was taken from China by the British, as the result of the so-called opium war. In 1878 Macao ventured into the industry of boiling crude opium into smoking opium and shipping it abroad, as well as supplying her own people. It was carried on by private individuals for some time. In 1887 a Government monopoly for the importation, manufacture, distribution, and exportation of opium was established. The sole right to manufacture smoking opium was granted to a Chinese syndicate. By the last contract, signed May 4, 1903, they paid $334,000 to the Government at Macao for the privilege. From 1908-1909 the onium revenue at Macao represented 38.8 per cent of the total revenue of the colony. The trade in opium between Macao and China was subject to the tariff annexed to the Anglo-Chinese treaty of Tientsin of 1858. This remained in force until 1887, when a "treaty of amity and commerce" was negotiated, which, among other things, calls for the cooperation of the Portuguese Government to prevent a contraband trade in opium. By Article IV of that treaty Portugal agreed to cooperate with China in the collection of duties on opium exported from Macao into China ports, the basis of this cooperation to be established by a convention appended to the treaty. By Article I of the appended "convention and agreement" the rules were defined under which the opium trade is carried on between the Portuguese colony of Macao and China (vide supplement). This agreement operated until lately, when a new agreement was entered into, which will be referred to later.

was garan to as a RUSSIA. The later of the first first

There is no evidence at hand that would show that Russia has an opium problem in her home territories. Amongst the Mohammedan population opium is used combined with tobacco, and in Siberia, where there are Chinese, opium smoking exists to some extent.

The Russian treaty of Tientsin, June 13, 1858, followed the British lead in regard to the opium habit with China. By Article XV of the treaty of St. Petersburg opium was declared to be contraband, and the trade in it prohibited (vide supplement.)

TURKEY.

Alhough Turkey was not able to send a delegation to Shanghai, still the opium question can not be stated without taking into account the opium production of that country. The amount of opium raised in Turkey fluctuates. Only once or twice during the last 40 years has the entire production of all Turkey exceeded 8,500 cases, while in many years it has not reached 4,000 cases. In 1907 that production was only 2,300 cases. It is estimated that an average crop of poppy will yield 5,000 to 6,000 cases. It is probable that sufficient poppy seed is annually sown in Turkey to produce 100,000 cases of opium. But it is a very susceptible crop; too much or too little rain, too early or tardy showers, frost, cold, wet, drought, locusts, and other pests, either singly or jointly, play havoc with it. The Turkey opium has always been a high-grade opium, containing a large percentage of morphia, and for that reason it passes largely to Europe or America to be used for medicinal purposes. A very small quantity onlyand that a low grade—enters into the Far Eastern trade, to be ultimately manufactured into smoking opium. As in other opium-producing countries, the poppy has another value aside from the opium which it yields. Poppy seed is a staple nourishment of all the poorer classes, and its oil furnishes them with light. The seed is made into cakes, and is a regular article of diet. When the oil is extracted from the seed the residue passes as a food for cattle in the winter months. Latterly the Turkish Government has encouraged the growth of the poppy by exempting for a period of three full years all dues and taxes of new localities in which the poppy is raised. In 1905 the value of the opium export amounted to 730,000 pounds Turkish, from which the Government derived a small revenue from an export tax. As the Turkish Government publishes neither accounts nor estimates of revenue and expenditure, it is impossible to state the revenue tariff from opium. Turkey, like Persia, has no treaty relations with China, and the Chinese are in position to contract for or forbid any traffic in opium. It will be pointed out later how the traffic is now restricted and must cease by 1917 (vide supplement).

SIAM.

The poppy is not grown in Siam. The crude drug is imported from India and was until recently manufactured and distributed through an opium farm which the Government sold to the highest bidder. For the last 20 years the importation or sale has been a Government monopoly.

It has been mentioned under "The United States" that broad rights of importation and trade with Siam were granted to American citizens by the treaty of 1833, but that an exception was made of opium. The Siamese Government derives a large part of its revenues from the manufacture and sale of smoking opium. In 1901 and 1902 the revenue was 14.2 per cent of the total, and 1902–3, 18.08 per cent.

LAST PHASE OF THE OLD ANTIOPIUM AGITATION.

The last phase of the old agitation against the Indian opium traffic was the publication of the report of the British Royal Commission on Opium. That commission concluded its labors and report in 1895. The commission was the result of a prolonged battle both within and without the walls of Parliament. By those who accepted its conclusions it was thought that the antiopium commotion was ended. It was intended that the commission should be judicial in character, but the evidence was taken and reported on in such a manner that it entrenched the Indian opium revenue as never before. It made nothing of the arguments and pleadings against the Indian opium traffic which were the immediate causes of its birth and it exalted the Indian opium revenue to a position from which it did not seem likely to be dethroned. There even seemed to be some narcotic principle in the report itself which had a soporific effect on the leaders of the antiopium movement. For they, too, ceased to trouble except sporadically and weakly and the entire question fell to the hinterland of the world problems.

India continued to produce vast quantities of opium, practically useless for medicinal purposes. Its opium revenue was saved for a time at least and its merchants continued to buy at the Calcutta and Bombay markets and to send Wherever there the drug not only to China, but to other oriental countries. was a Chinese population there Indian opium gravitated. The United States, Canada, Australia, as well as China, continued to be large buyers of the drug. The royal commission report was the last official act of the British Government to solve the opium problem until the new movement against it was initiated in 1903 and 1904. Lord Morley's opinion of the royal commission's report is worth quoting:

"He did not wish to speak in disparagement of the commission, but, somehow or other, its findings had failed to satisfy public opinion in Great Britain and to ease the conscience of those who had taken up the matter. What was the value of medical views as to whether opium was a good thing or not when we had the evidence of nations who knew opium at close quarters. pine Opium Commission, in the passage of their report which he hoped the House of Commons would take to heart, declared that the United States so recognized the use of opium as an evil for which no financial gain could compensate that she would not allow her citizens to encourage it even passively."

Lord Morley's statement was made in May, 1906, while he was still in the House of Commons—that is, after the new movement against the misuse of opium bad been initiated by the publication of the Philippine report.

It will be observed from the foregoing rapid survey of the question that Turkey, Persia, India, and China are the great producers of opium. The Turkish opium is used largely in the West, ostensibly for medical purposes, but Persian and nearly all of the Indian and Chinese product went to supply a great vice. Trade in the drug was sacrosanct under treaties and other international pacts, and China, not being in full possession of her sovereign rights, was compelled to receive any and all opium sent to her from India. treasury was enriched by a tax on the home production that seemed to be beyond control and by a duty on that imported from India and other countries. The Indian exchequer was largely maintained by the income from her opium monopoly and the transit tax on the drug passing from the native states to British Indian territory. Morphia, the chief alkaloid of opium, had reached China, the Crown colonies of Great Britain, and India. The use of it had become widespread and had added a new terror to the opium problem. 1904 onward a rapid development of public opinion took place all over the world and before the International Commission met at Shanghai steps had been taken in the interested countries to control or prohibit the illicit and baneful use of opium.

THE RECENT ANTIOPIUM MOVEMENT.

It was debatable as to how far the British Government would have gone in suppressing the excessive production of opium in India had not the whole opium problem assumed a new phase by the entrance of the United States into the larger affairs of the Far East through the acquisition of the Philippines. Those who see no good in the American occupation of the islands should take comfort out of the fact that because the United States, too, had a vast problem there it gave new life to the antiopium movement, and took the initial step to raise the Indo-Chinese opium question from its narrow national confines and place it squarely before the international world for discussion and final settlement.

On taking over the Philippines it soon became apparent to the Government that opium smoking amongst the Chinese population of the islands was a widespread evil and that the vice was spreading to certain of the native Philippine Whole communities of natives had abandoned themselves to the practice, and as a consequence had utterly ruined themselves in health and The Government promptly took the question in hand, and preliminary discussions were entered upon in 1902. There were many conflicting views, and the question threatened to become confused. The Government then determined to investigate thoroughly, by a commission, not only the Philippine epium problem, but the entire problem as it then existed in the Far East. The commission was named in 1903. It visited Japan, China, French Indo-China, Formosa, Java, the Straits Settlements, and Burma. The result was a most compre-It led to restrictive measures and hensive, illuminating, and judicial report. finally to the total prohibition of the importation of opium into the Philippines except for medicinal purposes. The prohibitive legislation went into effect March 1, 1908. The Philippine Opium Commission reported in June, 1904, or just nine years after the report of the British royal commission. The effects of the two reports were entirely different. The royal commission report suppressed discussion of the opium problem. The Philippines report gave to it a renewed impetus. It aroused afresh the world's interest in the problem. The Philippines report was extensively distributed throughout China. Its effect was to revive in the minds of those Chinese interested in suppressing the opium vice hopes and desires that had slumbered for nearly 10 years. A new movement was immediately inaugurated by several Chinese leaders to stamp out the opium traffic,

The two most prominent leaders in the renewed effort of China were their excellencies Yuan Shi Kai and Tong Shao Yi. In the summer of 1906 Mr. Tong visited India, and as Sir John Jordan, the British Minister to Pekin, states in a dispatch of September 30, 1906:

"His excellency Tong Shao Yi seems to have been much impressed by the views he heard expressed on the subject of opium during his recent visit to India. From conversations which he had with Mr. Baker, the financial secretary, and other members of the Government of India, his excellency came to the conclusion that India was prepared to dispense with the opium traffic. On his return to China he informed his own Government that it was the Chinese craving for the drug, and not England's desire to force it upon China, which was now responsible for the continuance of the traffic. Mr. Tong could supply little information as to the steps which China proposed to take to suppress the opium habit. He seemed, however, to think that there would be a gradual reduction of the area of cultivation of native opium pari passu with a corresponding decrease in the import of the foreign article. Smokers of the drug, if officials, were to be given a term of about six months in which to break off the habit, and the ordinary people were to be dealt with on a time scale, graduated according to the degree in which they may have become addicted to the habit."

Shortly before Mr. Tong's visit to Calcutta a remarkable debate had taken place in the British House of Commons after the long period of inattention to the opium question which followed the publication of the report of the royal commission. The subject was brought up for discussion on the 30th of May, 1906, when Mr. Theodore Taylor moved "that this House reaffirms its conviction that the Indo-Chinese opium trade is morally indefensible, and requests His Majesty's Government to take such steps as may be necessary for the bringing it to a speedy close." Part of the speech of Mr. Morley, the Secretary of State for India, on this resolution has been quoted, and it will be seen that the publication of the Philippines report influenced him considerably. This resolution was carried nem con, and the Chinese Government most naturally construed it as an invitation to them to prove the sincerity of their desire for the cessation of the import of Indian opium. Almost coincident with Mr. Tong's visit to Calcutta and the House of Commons resolution the Right Rev. Charles H. Brent, who had been a member of the Philippine Opium Commission, and had since the publication of the report been closely watching the opium problem in the Far East, wrote to President Roosevelt calling his attention to the new movement against opium. In that letter he suggested that the moment was opportune, considering her interests in the Philippines and the stand she had taken there, for the United States to call for some international action in regard to the opium traffic. The matter was promptly taken up by the State Department, and on the 17th of October, 1906, the American Ambassador to Great Britain informed Sir Edward Grey that—

"The American Government was much concerned with regard to the question of opium which had been raised in connection with the Philippines, and that he was instructed to ask me what view we should take for a commission for the joint investigation of the opium trade and the opium habit in the Far East, to be undertaken by the United States, Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, Germany, China, and Japan—that is, by those countries having territorial possessions in the Far East."2

Sir Édward Grey replied that he could not tell him at once, but that, though an interference with the import of opium into China would involve a great sacrifice of Indian revenue; that would not prevent the Government from considering the question or imposing some sacrifice if it was clearly proved that the result would be to diminish the opium habit. The Chinese were understood to contemplate measures for stopping or restricting the importation of opium in China, and if they were really to be taken it would be a thing which Great Britain should encourage. After considerable diplomatic correspondence the above-mentioned Governments signified their willingness to join the United States in a joint investigation of the opium problem, and January 1, 1909, was appointed as a date for the meeting of the international commission at Shanghai. The original idea was that the opium traffic and habit as it existed in the Far East was to be investigated. But during the passage of the diplomatic correspondence it developed that the opium habit was no longer confined to Far Eastern countries, and that the United States especially had become contaminated through the presence of a large Chinese population. Further, that the morphine habit was rapidly spreading over the world. It was also seen that as Turkey and Persia were large producers of opium it would be necessary to invite them into the commission if the subject was to be thoroughly ventilated. Portugal was also a factor in the situation, through the possession of her colony of Macao, on the China coast, where considerable quantities of crude opium were annually imported from India, converted into smoking opium, and shipped to United States, Canada, and Mexico. Siam, though having no treaty relations with China, was nevertheless a factor in the problem on account of her long established government monopoly for the manufacture and distribution of smoking opium; Russia also, because of her contiguity in China. Although neither Austria-Hungary nor Italy had territorial possessions, except concessions in the Far East, yet it was thought desirable that they should enter the commission. Upon the development of the fact (as the result of the work of the American Opium Commission in 1908), that the opium question was no longer a question concerning oriental peoples, it was decided to widen the scope of the work of the commission so that it should include reports on the home States of the various countries concerned, as well as on their territories and possessions in the Far East. This program was notified to the various countries concerned in July, 1908, and they were asked to have a report prepared on the opium question as it affected the home States as well as their Far Eastern possessions, so that it might promptly be laid before the commission as a whole when it met at Shanghai. As a result of the broadening of the scope of the international commission, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Siam, Persia, Turkey, and Portugal were invited into the commission. Turkey failed to send a representative, but, in all, 13 nations were represented at Shanghai when the commission met. Owing to the death of the Empress Dowager and the Emperor of Japan the commission was postponed to the 1st of February, 1909. HAMILTON WRIGHT.

THE INTERNATIONAL OPIUM COMMISSION.

GOVERNMENT ACTION SINCE THE PUBLICATION OF THE PHILIPPINES REPORT.

Following the issue of the Philippines report, and as the diplomatic correspondence proceeded, which led to the international commission, action after action was taken by the interested Governments to control or stamp out the misuse of opium. The Chinese Government was prompt, and her leaders and people enthusiastic. January, 1906, saw four of her great viceroys publish a manifesto on the subject. Part of it ran: "As Great Britain is the friend of China, she will shortly be called to assist the Chinese Government to stamp out the evil." The Chinese Government prohibited, without qualification, the use of opium in the imperial colleges and schools and in the recently created army. The Peking Gazette of September 20, 1906, published the following decree:

"IMPERIAL DECREE.

"Since the restrictions against the use of opium were removed, the poison of this drug has practically permeated the whole of China. The opium smoker wastes time and neglects work, ruins his health, and impoverishes his family, and the poverty and weakness which for the past few decades have been daily increasing amongst us are undoubtedly attributable to this cause. To speak of this arouses our indignation, and, at a moment when we are striving to strengthen the Empire, it behooves us to admonish the people, that all may realize the necessity of freeing themselves from these coils, and thus pass from sickness into health.

"It is hereby commanded that within a period of 10 years the evils arising from foreign and native opium be equally and completely eradicated. Let the Government council (Cheng Wu Ch'u) frame such measures as may be suitable and necessary for strictly forbidding the consumption of the drug and the cultivation of the poppy, and let them submit their proposals for our approval."

Late in November 11 articles were made public for the enforcement of the

Article 1.—To restrict the cultivation of the poppy in order to remove the root of the evil.

The effects of poppy cultivation on the agricultural interests of the country have been disastrous. Throughout China the chief sources of opium production are the Provinces of Szechuan, Shensi, Kansu, Yunnan, Kueichou, Shansi, Kiangsu, and Anhui, but in the remaining Provinces it may be said generally that there is hardly a place from which it is absent. The term of 10 years has now been fixed for the complete prohibition of its use. It is therefore necessary first to limit its cultivation, in order that the complete prohibition of its consumption may be successfully carried out, and with this end in view, all governors general and governors of Provinces should direct the departmental and district magistrates to make an accurate investigation of the acreage in their respective jurisdictions hitherto devoted to the growth of the poppy, and to make an official return of the figures. It would then be forever forbidden to bring under poppy cultivation any land not hitherto used for that purpose. Certificates would be issued in respect of all land already used for growing the poppy, and the proprietor be compelled to reduce the growth each year by oneninth part and to substitute other crops suited to the particular soil.

It will, moreover, be incumbent on the magistrates to make personal inspection at unexpected times of such lands. The certificates, too, will have to be changed each year, till within the period of nine years the whole cultivation is rooted out. Noncompliance with this rule will entail confiscation by the State of the land in question.

Any local authority who succeeds in less time than the statutory 10 years in giving effect to the prohibition in respect to the land in his jurisdiction given up to the poppy, and in completely substituting in place thereof the cultivation of other crops, should, after due inquiry into the facts, be recommended to the throne for recognition.

ARTICLE 2.—To issue licenses to smokers in order to prevent others from contracting the habit.

The vice of opium smoking is of long standing, and it may be reckoned that some 30 to 40 per cent of the population are addicted thereto. The interdict must therefore be extended with some consideration for what is past, while being applied in all strictness for the future. All persons of the official class and the gentry, literary graduates, and licentiates resident at their homes throughout the Empire must be the first to be compelled to give up the habit, in order that they may serve as an example to the common people. All smokers, whether of the gentle or lower class, together with their wives and female servants, must without exception report themselves at the yamen of the local authority of their native place or place of residence. If they reside at a distance from such yamen or any police station, they may send their names in collectively, through the headman of the village.

Proclamation will be issued in advance by the local authorities giving the necessary directions, and forms will be supplied which smokers will have to fill in, giving their names in full, age, address, occupation, and daily allowance of opium; and a limit of time will be fixed for them within which they must report themselves as having given up smoking, due consideration being paid in this regard to the element of distance.

As soon as all the smokers have reported themselves, a register will be drawn up and a copy thereof be sent to the higher authorities for purposes of record and reference. At the same time printed licenses under the official seal will be prepared, and every smoker will be obliged to have his license. These licenses will be of two classes—(a) and (b). Persons over 60 years of age will get licenses under class (a), while those under 60 will be enrolled under class (b), provided always that no person who has held a license under class (b) shall be entitled to the issue of a license under class (a) on subsequently attaining the age of 60.

The license will contain the holder's name in full, age, address, daily allowance of opium, and date of issue, and will constitute the permit to consume and buy opium. Any person consuming opium without a license, or purchasing the drug, shall on discovery or information duly laid be subject to such penalty as may be called for. After the first inquisition, inspection will proceed on the basis of the register, and no fresh applications for licenses will be entertained, in order that the number of smokers may be strictly limited.

Article 3.—To reduce the craving for opium within a limited time, in order to remedy chronic addiction thereto.

After the licenses have been issued, and putting out of consideration persons over 60 whose constitutions are already undermined, and in whose case the question of giving up the habit need not be pressed, all persons under 60 holding licenses under class (b) shall have a limit set on the quantity of opium which they consume, to be reduced each year by 20 or 30 per cent, and to be totally given up within a few years. On becoming total abstainers, they will have to produce a bond signed by a relative or near neighbor, which will be presented to the local authority, and if found in order, the name of the party will be erased from the register, while the license will have to be surrendered Returns of all such proceedings will then be made quarterly for cancellation. to the higher authorities. But if, in spite of the liberal period of years allowed under this system, there should be individuals who fail to become total abstainers within the allotted time, they must be regarded as willful victims to selfabuse, and nothing remains but to expose them to punishment for not abstain-In the future, therefore, if any holder of a class (b) license exceeds the time limit without giving up the habit and surrendering his license for cancellation, he shall, if an official, resign his office; if a graduate or licentiate, he shall be deprived of his rank and diploma; and if he be of the ordinary people, his name will be recorded by the local authority as an opium sot. A special list of such names will be kept, and a return thereof be made to the higher authorities. Besides this, such names, with the person's age, will be affixed in a public place for general observation, and also be exhibited in the town or village where such person lives, that all may know his condition. Such persons will, further, not be allowed to take part in any annual or periodical meetings which may be convened for any purpose by the local notables, or in any respectable concern of life, so that it may be clearly shown that they are outcasts of society.

ARTICLE 4.—To prohibit opium houses, in order to purify the abodes of pollution.

Before the time limit is reached upon which the prohibition becomes absolute it would naturally be hard to suddenly prohibit the existence of shops for the sale of opium. But there is a class of opium dens which offer a continual temptation to youths and the unemployed to frequent. These places are in every respect noxious, and should be prohibited by the local authorities, one after the other, a term of six months being fixed for the complete cessation of this calling, and the substitution of another trade. If the time limit is exceeded they should be compulsorily closed.

Eating houses and restaurants must also not be allowed to furnish opium for the use of guests, nor must guests be permitted to bring smoking appliances with them, under penalty of a heavy fine. Shops for the sale of pipe stems or bowls, opium lamps, or other smoking appliances, must also be given one year's time by the local authorities within which to close business, under penalty of a heavy fine. In any place where an excise is levied per lamp in opium dens, such levy must be discontinued within one month.

Article 5.—To closely inspect opium shops in order to facilitate preventive measures.

Although it is not possible to forbid at once the existence of opium shops, steps must still be taken to compel their gradual disappearance, and under no circumstances can any new shops be allowed to open. All shops in any city, town, or village which sell the raw drug or prepared opium must be severally inspected by the local authorities, who will draw up a list of them in the form of a register, and issue to each license which will constitute their permit to carry on this trade. Once the inspection has been made, no additions to the number of shops will be allowed.

Whenever persons come to such shops to buy opium, raw or prepared, the shopkeeper must examine the customer's license before he serves him, and without so doing must not sell any of the drug.

At the end of the year these shops must make a bona fide statement, in writing, to the local authority of the amount of opium, raw and prepared, which they have sold. The local authority will register these returns, and reckon up the total amount sold in his district by all the shops together, so as to show the amount of decrease in each year and for the purposes of comparison, provided always that within the period of 10 years the sale shall be entirely stopped. If the time limit be infringed, the shops will be compulsorily closed and the stock in hand be confiscated, besides the imposition of a fine of at least double its value.

Shops which from time to time drop out of the business must surrender their licenses for cancellation. The license must not be kept, under penalty of a heavy fine.

ARTICLE 6.—To manufacture remedies for the cure of the opium habit under official control.

There are many good remedies for curing the opium habit, and the high provincial authorities should appoint efficient and experienced medical officers to make a careful study of these, with a view to the selection of a number of prescriptions (suitable to the natural conditions of each particular locality) and the manufacture therefrom of pills or medicines, provided that such pills or medicines shall not contain opium ash or morphia.

Such remedial medicines should then be bought by the local authorities, who will distribute them among the local charitable institutions or medicine shops for sale at the original price, while poor persons will be allowed to obtain them free of charge.

The gentry and tradesmen will also be allowed to manufacture such remedies according to prescription for free distribution with a view to spreading this benefit more widely; and any person who can be shown to have promoted such distribution by his personal exertions or exhortation, and to have succeeded in breaking others of the opium habit thereby, shall be awarded honorary recognition by the local authorities.

Article 7.—To allow the establishment of antionium societies in order to promote this good movement.

There have recently been several instances of public-spirited individuals who have combined with others of their own class in founding antiopium societies, and in mutually assisting in exhorting the abandonment of the habit. Such enterprises deserve the highest praise; and the high provincial authorities should direct the local officials to take the lead among the respectable men of standing in each place and develop the establishment of such societies, so that with each addition to the number there will be an additional center of activity. But such societies must only be allowed to concern themselves with the single question of giving up opium, and must not discuss current politics or questions of local government, or other subjects not related to the abandonment of the opium habit.

ARTICLE 8.—To charge the local authorities with the duty of leading the movement among the local gentry and heads of guilds, in order that it may prove really operative.

The present measure depends entirely on the local authorities taking the lead among the gentry and heads of guilds in giving proper effect to its provisions.

Success can only be attained by a loyal and conscientious effort in this direction. The high provincial authorities must therefore carefully examine each year into the reports of their inferiors, and study the returns of the number of consumers originally recorded and the number of abstances, besides seeing whether due activity has been shown in the supply of antiopium medicines, and in promoting the formation of antiopium societies. By comparing these various records, they will be in a position to apportion praise and blame as due. They should also draw up an annual report for transmission to the council for State affairs, and to serve as a basis for examining the operation of this measure.

As regards the city of Peking, the officers in charge of all police stations, the captain general of the Peking gendarmerie, and the governor of Peking (Shuntien-fu) will be responsible for the due execution of these provisions.

If, before the expiry of the term of 10 years, it can be shown that there are already no opium smokers in any particular jurisdiction, the local authority shall be recommended for promotion.

In carrying out the survey of opium-bearing land, the inspection of opium dens and opium shops, and the issue of certificates and licenses, as well as in the registration of smokers, the strictest injunctions must be imposed on the official assistants, clerks, and servants, that no exactions whatever will be permitted, under penalty for infraction of this rule, and upon information duly laid of the punishments prescribed for extortion.

Article 9.—To strictly forbid the smoking of opium by officials, in order that an example may be set for others to follow.

The complete prohibition in 10 years of the use of opium applies to the general population. But the officials must set an example to the people. If they have such a vice, how can it be expected that they shall lead the people straight?

Now, it is desired to make this measure effective, and, with this end in view, it is absolutely necessary to start with the officials, and make the time limit for them more severe and the penalties for noncompliance more heavy, so that, as grass bends to the wind, the people may comply with their example.

From henceforth all metropolitan or provincial civil or military officials of high or low grade who are over 60 years of age, and who are so strongly addicted to the opium habit that they can not break it off, will be put out of consideration, as if they were of the common people, and treated leniently.

All princes, dukes, and other hereditary nobles, presidents and ministers of boards and metropolitan yamens, Tartar generals, governors general and governors, military lieutenant governors, deputy lieutenant governors, provincial commanders in chief and brigade generals holding substantive appointments are the recipients of the imperial favor to no small degree, and of exalted rank and standing. No deception or pretense on their part must be permitted in this matter. Any of these who have been in the habit of smoking shall be permitted to memorialize the Throne direct, praying for a limit of time to be fixed for them within which to give it up. During such period they will for the time being not be removed from office, but a substitute will be appointed to act for them. When they can show that they have given up the habit they will be allowed to resume office, but it must be clearly understood that no excuse of illness will be entertained as necessitating the further use of the drug beyond the appointed time. All other metropolitan and provincial officials, civil or military, substantive or expectant, of high or low grade, who are addicted to opium, shall be placed under the supervision of a delegate appointed by their superiors, and be directed to present a true statement of the facts of their case; and without consideration as to whether their craving for opium is heavy or slight, they will be given six months within which to give up the habit altogether. At the expiry of this period they must apply for an officer to be appointed to examine them again, and enter into a bond, which will be filed. become seriously ill and fail to break off the habit within the stipulated time, they may represent the facts to their superiors, in which case any hereditary title they may possess will be transferred according to the proper rules of succession to another to hold, and, if they are officials, they will be retired with whatever rank they may be holding. If it be discovered that they are holding back the facts and infringing this rule by means of deception, they must be impeached and degraded as a warning against any such trifling and deceit.

If the superior authorities are lax in examining, they shall be reported to the Throne for the determination of a penalty.

Further, all teachers and scholars in any schools or colleges, and officers and warrant officers of the army or navy, who are addicted to opium shall be dismissed within three months.

ARTICLE 10.—To enter into negotiations for the prohibition of the import of foreign opium in order to close the sources of supply.

The prohibition of the growth of opium and of its consumption is a measure of internal policy which we are justified in taking without further circumspection. But the question of foreign opium, which is imported from other countries, impinges on our foreign relations, and the imperial commands should therefore be sought to direct the board of foreign affairs to make a satisfactory arrangement with the British Minister with a view to effecting an annual decrease within the next few years of the import of foreign opium parl passu with the decrease of native opium, so that both may be absolutely prohibited by the expiry of the time limit of 10 years.

Besides Indian opium, the drug is also imported from Persia, Annam, and the Dutch Indies in no small quantities. In the case of treaty powers negotiations should similarly be entered into with their representatives in Peking to effect the prohibition of such import, while with nontreaty powers we can exercise our own prerogative in strictly forbidding the import.

All Tartar generals, military lieutenant governors, governors general, and governors should also direct their subordinate authorities and commissioners of customs to take preventive measures along the trade routes and frontiers to stop smuggling.

As regards morphia and the instruments used for its injection into the skin, the effects of which are even more injurious than those of opium itself, proper effect should be given to the stipulations laid down in Article XI of the British commercial treaty and Article XVI of the American commercial treaty, and instructions be issued to all customhouses to disallow the import of any morphia and instruments into China which are not for medical use; while a strict prohibition must be enforced against any shops in China, whether native or foreign, manufacturing morphia or instruments for its injection.

ARTICLE 11.

All Tartar generals, governors general, and governors of provinces should direct the civil and military authorities in their jurisdiction to issue proclamations promulgating these rules for general observance.

In January of 1907 another forward step was taken when the Chinese Government made certain proposals to Sir John Jordan, the British Minister at Peking, for the gradual abolition of the Indian opium traffic. After much discussion, the "ten-year agreement," as outlined in the supplement, was accepted by both Governments on January 27, 1908, and went into effect on the first day of the same month. This "ten-year agreement" forms the present basis of the Indo-Chinese opium trade. By it Great Britain agreed to reduce the total exportation of opium from India (67,000 chests per annum) by one-tenth of the then average Chinese importation of the drug (51,000 chests). The Chinese at first contended for a reduction by one-tenth per annum of the direct export of Indian opium to China. Had this been accepted the Chinese importation of Indian opium would have fallen off by 5,100 chests a year. The British proposition that the total export from India should be reduced by one-tenth of the actual export to China leaves 16,000 chests wandering about in the Far East and ready to pour into the country where the demand is greatest. This places the Chinese Government at a disadvantage, for in the suppression of poppy cultivation in China, and the consequent scarcity of opium, the demand for and the price of Indian opium has risen, and without doubt part of the loose 16,000 chests will find their way to China, and so tend to defeat the object of Chinese statesmen.

On February 7, 1907, a second imperial decree was published by the Chinese Government as a reminder to all officials that it is in earnest in its antiopium grusade.

"IMPERIAL DECREE.

"A memorial has been received from the board of the interior devising general arrangements for the prohibition of opium; and whereas opium is injurious to the public health, we have already issued an edict commanding every Province to fix a limit of time for its strict prohibition. The board having now recommended in their memorial the extension of branch antiopium societies, and that the opium dens throughout the Provinces should be uniformly closed and prohibited as laid down in the new regulations, it is hereby commanded that all Tartar generals, viceroys, and governors shall take part with their subordinates in concientiously carrying out these steps. But strict as must be the prohibition against smoking, it is even more necessary to forbid the cultivation of the poppy, in order to sweep away the source of evil. The responsibility is, therefore, placed upon all Tartar generals, viceroys, and governors to see to it that cultivation is diminished annually, as prescribed by the regulations submitted to us, and that within the maximum term of 10 years the supply of foreign and native opium is completely cut off. There must be no laxity or disregard for this beneficial measure, which the throne so ardently desires.

The war against opium moved apace. On April 17, 1907, as the result of a suggestion of Sir John Jordan to Sir Edward Grey, a movement was set on foot to compel the British municipal councils in China to close the opium dens in the British concessions and settlements. So great an impetus had the new movement contracted that by August 9, 1907, Sir John Jordan again suggested to his Government that both the export and import trade in prepared or smoking opium between Hongkong and the Chinese mainland be prohibited, and that both Governments should take measures to prevent smuggling into their respective territories. This was afterwards agreed upon between the two Governments. June 26 of the same year saw another imperial edict directed against opium:

"IMPERIAL EDICT.

"Opium is in the highest degree detrimental to the people. In an edict of last year prohibiting the use of it, the council of government were commanded to frame regulations and to direct all yamêns throughout the country to put a stop to it.

In the third month of this year (13th April-11th May) a further edict was issued, commanding that general instructions be given to act in strict accordance with the regulations which had been submitted to the throne, alike in respect of the cultivation, sale, and consumption of opium.

"The welfare of the people is a matter of great concern to the court, and this is a matter which must positively be put through. The governor of Peking and the Tartar generals, viceroys, and governors of the Provinces are commanded to issue strict instructions to their subordinates to put the prohibition into actual effect, to make it a matter of familiar knowledge in men's houses, to get completely rid of the evil The maritime customs should keep a strict watch on the foreign opium which is imported, and the places in the interior which cultivate native opium must annually decrease the amount cultivated, in accordance with the dates sanctioned. It is further commanded that the relative merits of officials in this respect must be recognized. If the instructions are zealously carried out by an official in his own jurisdiction, it is permitted to memorialize the throne, asking for some encouragement to be shown him. If an official merely keeps up appearances and, while outwardly obeying, secretly disregards these commands, he is to be denounced by name for punishment.

"It is also commanded that an annual return of the land under opium cultivation be made, by way of verification and to meet the desire of the court to relieve the people of this evil."

On November 27, 1907, Sir John Jordan was able to send a most important memorandum to his Government, showing that the edicts against the cultivation of the poppy and the use of opium by the Chinese had been most effective in many of the Provinces.³ On May 19, Mr. Morrison, the Times correspondent, was able to write from Peking:

"The first six months following the issue of the antiopium regulation expired on Friday, when the last of the opium dens in Peking was closed. All the restaurants and houses of bad character where formerly the use of opium was universal some time ago, ceased to permit smoking on the premises. Tang Shao-yi, the moving spirit in the campaign at Peking, assured a foreigner that the antiopium sentiment was constantly gaining force. He was satisfied with the effect of the new regulations, especially in this Province, where the public use of opium had almost disappeared, and in his own Province of Canton—with one or two exceptions he knew of no new office given to a known opium smoker—it is added the movement is certainly popular, and is supported by the entire native press, while a hopeful sign is that the use of opium is fast becoming unfashionable."

In a later survey of some of the Chinese Provinces, especially Yunnan, Mr. Morrison was able to speak in high terms of the energy of the viceroys in stamping out poppy cultivation. During 1907 measures had been taken to close out the opium dens in the Japanese concessions. In the Russian concessions at Hankow and Tientsin opium smoking had been prohibited by order of the municipal council, and in the leased railway territory the administration came to an agreement with the Chinese to enforce the opium regulations in the near future. The French closed all of their dens in the French concessions at Tientsin, and in the French settlement at Shanghai steps were taken to close part of the dens there. Great Britain had closed all opium establishments in her concessions in China, and part of those in her settlement at Shanghai. Italy had closed out all the opium dens in her concessions of Tientsin by January, 1907; Austria also, in her concession of Tientsin by the 8th of August of the same year. having no treaty relations with Persia and Turkey, was able, early in 1908, of her own free will, to regulate the opium trade with these two countries on the basis of the "ten-year agreement" with Great Britain. On April 17, 1908, an imperial decree was issued appointing imperial commissioners for the enforcement of the prohibition of opium. Under this decree Prince Kung, the Assistant Grand Secretary Lu Ch'uan-lin, and the associate directors of the Senate, Chinghsing and Ting Chen-to, were named the imperial commissioners for the enforcement of the prohibition of opium. They were to engage skillful physicians. Chinese and foreign, and forthwith establish a special investigation office for the eradication of the opium habit. All officials in public office known to be addicted to opium smoking are to be reported to the president and vice president of the board concerned, for punishment. If minor officials are found addicted to opium, their superior officers must be reported to the board for punishment. The commissioners must put aside all personal feelings and perform their duty ceaselessly and fearlessly. Should the prohibition of opium still fail to show satisfactory results, the commissioners will be held to account. Thirty thousand taels were provided out of the revenue from the taxes on opium for expenses connected with establishing the office, and 60,000 taels for annual expen-

March 22, 1909, saw the issue of an imperial decree, especially thanking foreign philanthropists and governments for aid in the battle against opium.

On the 23d of May, 1908, the following imperial rescript was issued. It provides supervisory regulations for the prohibition of opium:

PROHIBITION OF OPIUM—SUPERVISORY REGULATIONS.

Section 1.—Diminution of cultivation.

ARTICLE 1. Returns of the amount of land under opium cultivation, the names of the owners, and the amount of opium produced shall be made by all local officials within six months to the high provincial authorities, who shall forward collective reports to the board of finance and board of the interior.

ART. 2. The 10-year period within which opium is to be abolished shall be reckoned from Kuang Hsu (1906–7), and the cultivation of opium is to be diminished in accordance with the regulations laid down by the grand council. No opium must ever be grown on land not hitherto under opium cultivation, and in the case of land already under opium cultivation the amount must be annually decreased by one-eighth, taking as a basis the figure given in the returns for Kuang Hsu 34 (1908–9). The cultivation of opium will thus cease entirely in Kuang Hsu 41 (1915–1916). Returns shall also be made from time to time as to what crops are being grown on the land withdrawn from opium cultivation.

Art. 3. Permits, sealed by the provincial authorities, shall be issued by the local officials to opium growers, the permits being altered annually. Any person growing opium without a permit shall be liable to punishment. A fee of 15 cashmou shall be levied on each permit, but no further charge whatever may be made.

SECTION 2.—Public hongs.

ART. 4. Since the inauguration of a consolidated tax on native opium, the Provinces of Anhui, Honan, and Shansi have already established a system of public hongs for the sale of native opium appointed by the branch consolidated tax office and the local official. These public hongs are responsible for the payment of the tax on native opium, and the grower must sell and the dealer purchase opium through them. The warehouseman must also report all purchases and sales of opium to the public hong, which sees that the taxes are paid. This system will now be extended to the other Provinces, and these public hongs shall keep a daily record of all sales of opium, giving the names of the purchasers, and shall report to the branch consolidated tax office. A general report, setting forth the reductions effected by each public hong, shall be furnished annually to the board of the interior by the directors-general of native opium taxation. In the case of Szechuan, Yunnan, Kweichow, Turkestan, and Manchuria, where there is no consolidated tax on native opium, the provincial authorities shall take action on the same lines.

Native opium warehousemen must hold permits from the local consolidated tax bureau and local official. Without such permits they will not be allowed to purchase opium either through the public hong or from the grower.

Section 3.—Opium shops.

ART. 5. Returns shall be furnished within six months by the local officials, through the provincial authorities, to the board of the interior of the number, situation, capital, etc., of opium shops in their jurisdiction. No new opium shops must be opened.

ART. 6. Opium shops must have permits issued by the provincial authorities and changed annually. Fees of from $2 to $6 will be charged for these permits, according to the capital of the shop.

ART. 7. Monthly returns shall be furnished by every opium shop of the amount of opium sold. No opium must be sold except to persons provided with permits. A general annual report shall be furnished by the provincial authorities to the board of interior.

Art. 8. All opium shops should endeavor to establish some other line of business apart from the trade in opium, for this trade must cease entirely within the fixed time limit.

Section 4.—Opium divans.

Art. 9. Under the instructions issued by the Government council in Kuang Hsu 32 (1906-7) all opium dens were to be abolished within six months. Should there still remain any opium divans or tea-houses, wine shops, etc., providing facilities for opium smoking, they must be closed at once under pain of severe punishment.

Section 5.—Utensils for opium smoking.

ART. 10. Instructions have already been issued in Kuang Hsu 32 (1906–7) for the closure of all shops selling utensils for opium smoking. The local officials must now investigate whether any shops for the manufacture or sale of such articles still exist, and, if any are discovered, they must be closed and the proprietors fined.

Section 6.—Opium smoking.

ART. 11. The authorities of each Province shall fix a time within which returns shall be furnished by each local official of the name, residence, and age of every opium smoker within his jurisdiction. An annual report embodying these returns shall be made by the provincial authorities to the board of the interior.

ART. 12. Opium smokers must obtain a permit from the local officials, stamped by the provincial authorities, and renewable annually. Only those holding such permits may purchase opium. The amount of opium required for daily consumption shall be entered on the permit, and not more than that amount can be purchased.

SECTION 7.—Cure of the opium habit.

ART. 13. Offices shall be established by local officials for the purpose of issuing to medicine shops and philanthropic institutions antiopium medicines recommended by the board of the interior. These medicines shall be sold at cost price or given free to poor persons. Provincial authorities should send to the board, for investigation, samples of any good antiopium remedies discovered by persons in their jurisdiction.

ART. 14. Local officials should encourage the foundation of societies for the ART. 14. Local officials should encourage the foundation of societies for the cure of the opium habit, the publication of antiopium literature, etc., but such societies must not be allowed to concern themselves with anything apart from the abolition of opium.

ART. 15. Local officials shall investigate whether any of the medicines sold by drug shops or other establishments in their jurisdiction are compounded with morphia, and shall take steps to prevent the illicit sale of that drug.

Section 8.—Rewards and punishments.

ART. 16. A local official who has furnished by the proper date all the returns called for under these regulations may be recommended for favorable notice to the board by the high authorities of his Province.

ART. 17. A local official who has enforced within the fixed limit of time all the prohibitions specified in these regulations may be recommended for favorable notice to the board by the provincial authorities.

ART. 18. If a local official succeeds within the space of one year, and without inflicting undue hardship on the people in his jurisdiction, in reducing the amount of land under opium cultivation, the number of opium shops, and the number of smokers by more than three-tenths, the viceroy or governor may present a memorial recommending that he should be granted some special mark of approbation by the board, ART. 19. A local official who fails to furnish the proper returns by the proper date or who makes false returns shall be reported to the board for punishment.

ART. 20. A local official who fails to enforce within the fixed limit of time the various prohibitions specified in the regulations shall be reported to the board for punishment. A false return under this article will involve still more severe punishment. The superior officials will also, if they were aware of the circumstances, be liable to the same punishment.

ART. 21. A local official who fails to effect within his jurisdiction in a year a decrease of at least one-eighth in the amount of land under opium, the number of opium shops, and the number of smokers shall be reported to the board for punishment.

Art. 22. The present regulations shall be carried out in accordance with those laid down by the Government council. Details shall be arranged by the provincial authorities in accordance with local conditions.

ART. 23. The amount of fees collected under these regulations must be reported periodically to the board, and will go to meet the expenditures connected with the prohibition of opium. No other charges beyond the fees fixed by these regulations may be levied, and should it afterwards appear advisable to increase the amount of these fees a joint memorial on the subject will be submitted by the board of revenue and the board of the interior.

REGULATION OF IMPORT OF PERSIAN AND TURKISH OPIUM.

It has been mentioned that China having no treaty relations with Persia and Turkey, was able to impose her will as to the importation of opium from these countries. In regulating the Persian and Turkish opium trade, she followed the lines of the Anglo-Chinese 10-year agreement. The regulation is as follows:

From the 1st of January, 1909, any merchant wishing to import into any open port of China any Persian or Turkish opium must apply to the commissioner of customs at Kowloon for a special permit—one for each chest of opium. This permit shall state that the opium may be shipped to any open port in China, and that, on its arrival, duty and likin will be paid in accordance with the regulations. Any Persian or Turkish opium shipped to China for which this special permit can not be produced shall be confiscated.

Taking 1,125 piculs as the mean annual import of Persian and Turkish opium, this quantity shall be reduced every year by one-ninth, i. e., 125 piculs. Thus in 1909 special permits will only be issued for 1,000 piculs, and by making a similar reduction annually the import will entirely cease in nine years.

After 1916 no more special permits will be issued, and the import into China of Persian and Turkish opium, as well as that of Indian opium, will be completely suspended.

The special permits will only be issued to merchants who have hitherto, to the knowledge of the imperial maritime customs, been engaged in the trade in Turkish and Persian opium. In fixing the number of special permits to be issued annually to each merchant, the total import during the two years 1906-7, and the quantities imported by each merchant during those years will be taken as a basis, the number of permits being annually decreased. It may well be asked at this point, What has been the effect of the edicts and regulations issued by the Chinese Government? The movement against opium in China operates over so vast a territory and affects so large a population that it would take up too much space to detail the whole extent of the reformatory movement. It is always difficult to reform a people by legislative enactment. Moreover, apart from this difficulty, the fiscal side of the opium question is a very important factor to China. The Chinese central and provincial governments have been in receipt of over £7,000,000 from a tax on the internal production of opium, and duty and likin on that imported from India. This must be replaced, and the matter is now being considered by the board of revenue. It is to the credit of the morals of the Chinese authorities that they are pushing the crusade against opium even though in their wisdom they have not yet found a means to replace the disappearing opium revenue. Beyond a doubt, in the near future the question of replacing the opium revenue will be put on a satisfactory basis.

A few instances will illustrate the vigorous manner in which the provincial and municipal authorities are attempting to carry out the spirit of the edicts and regulations.

"Foochow, with a population of 650,000, was one of the first great cities to be dealt with. The date fixed was May 12, 1907. Several days before a thousand threatened traders, conscious that their craft was in danger, met in one of the temples, drafted a remonstrance, and subscribed a large sum of money wherewith to defend their interests.

"They met in vain. The man who presented the petition was locked up. The resistance collapsed, and on the 12th 3,000 shops in Foochow city and suburbs ceased to traffic in opium. One man who held on, trusting to his influence with officialdom, was summarily lodged in jail and his property confiscated. Two or three others were marched through the streets in chains. So far as is known, there did not a week after exist a single opium den in the city. Strong vigilance committees helped the officials. The day of closing was a day of general rejoicing. Flags floated everywhere, and processions of students paraded the streets with banners; 'unbounded joy' was shown over the victory won. Months after, it is said, 'Bands of students frequently go about the streets in order to see that the edict is complied with. Several hundreds of citizens have been fined or otherwise dealt with. There are three opium refuges in the city and four others on the island of Nantai. These are financed by the gentry. There are in addition many private refuges." 2

The correspondent of the Morning Post observed, June 28, 1906:

"The closing of the opium shops in the native city (Shanghai) is apparently effective. The extraordinary precautions taken by the native authorities prevented the expected trouble. Two Chinese cruisers were anchored in front of the Chinese Bund to protect the opium hulks, while parties of soldiers and native volunteers and police patrolled the streets and visited the shops."

Officials who have disobeyed the edicts have not escaped, for on October 10, 1907, an imperial edict appeared ordering Tsai Kung, Prince of Chuang, First Order; Lu Pao-chuang and Chen Min-Kan, president and vice president, respectively, of the Censorate, Kwei Pin, Prince of Jui, First Order, to resign their offices because they had not broken off the opium habit. As a result of these enforced resignations, large numbers of the various ministries and the metropolitan departments were awakened. Sick leave was granted to opium-smoking officials at the rate of three or four per day. The places of those taking sick leave were kept open for three months, and if at the end of that time they had not effectively broken off the habit, their positions passed to others. The late Empress Dowager gave the inmates of the palaces three months to get rid of the opium habit. Those who did not do so were punished with 100 blows and expelled the palaces. Dr. Morrison of the Times stated on the 19th of May,

1907, that in the capital Province of Chihli-

"The results of the antiopium movement are wholly satisfactory. In Canton Province and in Kwang-si also they are satisfactory, and to a less degree in Szechuan, Che-kiang, Nganwhei, and Shansi. Unsatisfactory are Shantung and Shanghai; but in Nanking, while practical effects as regards the general public are not apparent, effective measures have enforced the suppression of the habit among the military and student classes. Especially unsatisfactory are the Yangtsze Provinces under Chang Chih-tung, who formally wrote against opium. Hsu Chih-chang, the new viceroy of Manchuria; Tsen Chun-hsuan, the new president of the ministry of communications, and Duke Tsai-tse, the new president of the ministry of finance, are all strongly against opium, as are the new viceroys of Yun-nan and Sze-chuan, two of the greatest opium-growing Provinces."

Correspondents of the European and American papers have for the past two years been telling of bonfires made of opium pipes and the disgrace of officials who have not got rid of the opium habit, and of the closing up of the opium dens in all the large centers of population. Mr. Leech, councilor of the British Legation at Peking, reported on June 24, 1908, that there was some apathy amongst the provincial authorities. He cites two principal reasons for this, i. e., the fact that so many public officials are still addicted to the drug, and the question of provincial finance and the finding revenue to replace that at present derived from opium. But he observes that-

"On the whole it may be said in regard to the antiopium regulations that officials showing sufficient force of character to uphold them are almost sure of support from the people, prompted as the latter are by the force of public opinion, a force formerly unknown in China and of recent growth, but which is well upheld by the native press and incipient moral education of the nation and the awakening of a national conscience. The Times correspondent has aptly used the expression 'bad form' in describing the view of the educated Chinese toward opium smoking in public, and should this sentiment gain in moral force there seems no reason why it should not develop into 'losing face,' that most powerful of all rules of conduct in China, corresponding either to

'dishonorable' or 'ungentlemanlike,' as the case may be." 1

Mr. Leech then reviews the question of opium suppression in the various Chinese Provinces. On the one side of the account we have such Provinces as Shansi, where the dens and shops may be said to be generally open and uninspected, and the poppy cultivation has been slightly reduced. In the Province of Shensi there is no lack of proclamations; but the officials take no material steps to stop the use of the drug. In some districts poppy cultivation has been reduced by means of high taxation. On the other side, we have a Province like Kansu where the use of the drug is restricted by proclamation, and the restriction is enforced, causing heavy losses to merchants. In the south of Shantung Province the cultivation of the poppy has been reduced 5 per cent, wheat being substituted. Kiangsu Provinec continues to be amongst those foremost in combating the evil; a stigma has been attached to opium smoking which it has not previously possessed. In Fukhien Province the area of cultivation of the poppy has been reduced about one-fourth. In Hunan Province a Wesleyan missionary, who had recently traveled 2,000 miles in the eastern part of the Province, reported to Mr. Leech that he had found that in some places it was impossible to purchase opium, and the provincial treasurer, who was a warm supporter of the antiopium movement, was prepared to guarantee that no poppy would be grown in the Province in 1909. There is no doubt that a substantial decrease in poppy cultivation has taken place throughout China. To what extent it is impossible to state, for the Chinese Government has no scientific system of record. Morse 2 has estimated that the total production in all China for 1905 was 376,000 piculs. For the year 1906 an estimate, based on customs reports, places it at 584,800 piculs. Mr. Leech * estimates that for 1907 the total production was 331,000 piculs. An estimate, based on customs reports gives the total production for 1908 at 367,250 piculs. The Chinese themselves accept the estimates for 1906 and 1908 as based on the customs report. Although these figures are estimates only, still they will have to be taken as the official estimate of the Chinese Government. If so taken, there appears to have been a reduction since 1906 of 217,550 piculs in the internal production of opium. This reduction, or a fair part of it, indicates that China is capable of acting up to the "Ten-year agreement."

As the time for the meeting of the commission approached, Great Britain not only expressed sympathy for the Chinese Government in its effort to suppress the misuse of opium, but carried out practical measures to that end, and at the same time in regard to her problem in India and the Crown Colonies. In regard to India, it has already been pointed out that the British House of Commons passed a unanimous resolution condemning the Indo-Chinese opium trade (vide supra, pt. 1), and Lord Morley's speech in support has been partially quoted. Since then Lord Morley has stated the position of the Indian Government not only in regard to China, but to the whole question of the Indian opium trade, and in a way not to be misunderstood. In August, 1907, Lord Morley authorized the following statement:

"The first concerning his insistence that China must fulfill her part of the agreement founded on her own proposals, if England is to do the same. Morley explained that from his point of view such insistence was intended, not as a threat to China, but rather as a help to her to hold fast to her obligations, and to go forward with their fulfillment.

"The second point concerned the action of our (i. e., the British) Government in case China should fail to carry out her own proposals—was it to be understood that the present movement for the gradual extinction of the Indian opium export should, in that case, come to an end? Mr. Morley did not see that that There were two broad grounds for the present movement; one, was implied. the proposals of the Chinese Government, the other the resolution of the House of Commons on the 30th of May, 1906. If the first should fail, the second did not necessarily cease to be a ground of action.

"The third point concerned a possible plea on the part of China that the process of reduction might go on more swiftly than her own first proposals contemplated. Would Mr. Morley be prepared to consider such a plea if deliberately put before him by the Chinese authorities? In reply Mr. Morley said that he could only refer to his statement on May 30, 1906, that any deliberate proposals from the Chinese Government on the subject of opium would meet

It will be seen that the British Government in contracting the 10-year agreement with China intended that it should be a help to her to hold fast to her obligations, for the Indian side of the opium question was, under certain circumstances, a question by itself, and would be treated quite apart from any action of the Chinese Government on its own internal opium problem, and if China wished for further assistance from Great Britain, her proposals would be There can be no doubt that this is the confirmed sympathetically considered. view of the British Government and of a large majority of the British nation. To substantiate the British position, the House of Commons took a step further on May 6, 1908, when the following resolution was proposed and adopted unani-

"That this House, having regard to its resolution unanimously adopted on May 30, 1906, that the Indo-Chinese opium trade is morally indefensible, welcomes the action of His Majesty's Government in diminishing the sale of opium for export, and thus responding to the action of the Chinese Government in their arrangements for the suppression of the consumption of the drug in that Empire; and this House also urges the Government to take steps to bring to a speedy close the legislation licensing the opium dens now prevailing in some of her Crown colonies-more particularly Hongkong, the Straits Settlements, and Ceylon."

Col. Seeley, the under secretary of state for the colonies, accepted the resolution on behalf of the Government and announced that the following telegram had already been sent to the governor of Hongkong:

"His Majesty's Government has decided that steps must be taken to close opium dens in Hongkong, as they recognize that it is assential in dealing with the opium question in Hongkong that we must act up to the standard set by the Chinese Government."

That this was no mere party resolution is proved in that it passed unanimously and that it was strongly supported by the Right Hon. Alfred Littleton, secretary of state for the colonies in the late Conservative government.

As completing the position of the British Government, the chief of the Indian administration may be quoted in regard to the opium traffic. Lord Minto said, in speaking on the Indian budget, March 27, 1907, that-

"The Indian government is not entitled to doubt the good faith of the Chinese Government as to the objects of their proposals (i. e., the '10-year agreement'). There is, no doubt, throughout the civilized world a feeling of disgust at the demoralizing effect of the opium habit in excess; it is a feeling which we can not but share. We can not with any self-respect refuse to assist China on the ground of loss of revenue to India.

The self-governing colonies have not lagged, for Canada prohibited the importation of opium, except for medicinal purposes, in July, 1908. The Governor General of Australia, by virtue of the Commonwealth customs act mentioned above (pt. 1), issued a declaration dated December 29, 1905, that after the 1st of January, 1906, the importation of opium, suitable for smoking, into Australia will be prohibited absolutely, and that opium shall only be imported for medicinal uses and by persons licensed. Anticipating the House of Commons resolution of May 6, 1908, in regard to the use of opium in the Crown colonies, the government of Ceylon appointed a committee on the 12th of June, 1907, to inquire into and report upon opium. The committee reported on the 5th of December, 1907, condemning the Ceylon opium trade, recommending that the importation, distribution, and sale of opium be made a Government monopoly and that the use of the drug, except for medicinal purposes, should be entirely prohibited after a definite period. On the 19th of July, 1907, the governor of the Straits Settlements appointed a commission of six members for the purpose of inquiring into the opium habit. On the 15th of June, 1908, the commission reported. The report may be said to have been profoundly influenced by the royal commission report of 1895. Its conclusions were about the But it is expected that the British Government will disregard it and order the closing of the opium business in the Straits and Federated Malay States.2 At Hongkong discussion has waged furiously as to the right and the wrong of the opium habit, but the local government has gone as far as to prohibit by ordinance the exportation of smoking opium to China and to French Indo-China. Although, by special pleading and otherwise, the Government is fighting hard for its opium revenue, the British colonial office has ordered the closing of the opium dens by March 1, 1910. This will mean a loss of revenue to the country of about $700,000 gold. But it is possible that the Imperial Government will make some sacrifice to assist not only Hongkong, but the Straits and Ceylon and the other colonies whose finances will be affected by the loss of the opium revenue. Thus history repeats itself. For having recognized the immorality of the opium traffic and its consequences, the British people have begun a determined effort to sacrifice a large revenue to the end that a widespread evil may cease. The historic parallel is the old British slavery question.

France has placed herself in line with the new movement. On the 22d of August, 1907, a commission was appointed to study measures to be progressively adopted for the gradual suppression of opium smoking in French Indo-China. As the result of the work of the commission, no new opium dens are to be authorized. The price of the drug is to be increased and officials known to be opium smokers are excluded from promotion. The minister of the French marine has issued a circular prohibiting opium smoking on board French menof-war. On October 5, 1907, the governor general issued a circular forbidding in the most formal terms the use of opium to all European civil servants and agents of all services and of all ranks. Anyone infringing this prohibition is to be denounced at once and rigorous measures will be taken against him. Culprits are to be deprived of all "inscription en tableau," and of all promotion. European officials who are such confirmed smokers that they can not abandon the habit at the end of three months, will be immediately dismissed the service. Of great importance has been the prohibition of the sale of Yunnan opium in Cochin China and Cambodia. The result of all these measures has been a decrease in the purchase and sales of opium by some 45 per cent. The very heavy tax which the French Indo-Chinese Government has imposed on the sale of opium has restricted its use to the wealthier Chinese. The only notable exception to this is the coolie population of the town of Cholon in Cochin China, where one-half of the male adults smoke. The French Government is hopeful that in the near future the entire traffic in and the use of smoking opium will come to an end.

In the United States public opinion was aroused as the result of the work of the American Opium Commission during the summer of 1908. Investigation showed that the use of morphine was a widespread evil, and that the habit of snoking opium was no longer confined to the Chinese population. On the 9th of last February a statute was passed making it a penal offense to import opium into the United States except for medicinal purposes. This statute went into effect April 1, 1909. The prohibitory legislation of the Philippine Islands went into effect March 1, 1908.

Japan can not be said to have made any step toward regulating her opium business in Formosa to final extinction, although it is her professed object to do so

On the 21st of September, 1908, the King of Siam declared that—"It was unquestionable that opium had an evil effect upon its consumers and easts degradation upon every country where the inhabitants are largely addicted to the habit of opium smoking. There is no reason to doubt that the most earnest desire of nearly every country in the world is to suppress this noxious habit."

The King goes on to discuss the financial difficulties confronting him in his desire to suppress the use of opium. But he continues:

"Notwithstanding these great obstacles which we see standing in our way, it is, nevertheless, our bounden duty not to neglect our people and allow them to become more and more demoralized by indulgence in this noxious drug."

Since that speech the Siamese Government has executed special measures in the administration of the opium monopoly whereby the spread of the habit will become gradually lessened until it is entirely suppressed. Thus Siam has joined the new movement against opium which began with the more active entrance of the United States into far eastern affairs.

This review of the movement against the misuse of opium in its later phases has made no mention of the efforts of the various antiopium societies to call the Governments to action. It should be mentioned to their credit that when the new movement began their interest in it was active, self-contained, and effective. Before dealing with the commission itself it is fair to plead that much of the antiopium legislation that occurred prior to the meeting of the commission should be placed to the credit of the commission. From the date of the original letter calling for the commission the United States Government made streamous efforts both by study and legislation to appear at Shanghai with clean hands. The other Governments taking part were beyond doubt animated by a like motive.

THE OPIUM COMMISSION ITSELF.

When the commissioners representing the various powers concerned met at Shanghai it was found that they had to all practical purposes followed the program as laid down by the United States Government—that is, each delegation came prepared to lay before the commission as a whole a report on opium as it affected their national, dependent, and protected peoples. On the American delegation naturally devolved the leadership in the commission. Organization was quickly completed, largely through the courtesy of the British and Chinese Governments in instructing their delegations to support Bishop Brent for the presidency of the commission.

The question that brings us together—the opium question—is an extremely difficult one, and I think the very first thing that all of us should do is to frankly recognize the fact and openly admit it. It is a great problem and we can hope to reach a successful

²Upon taking the chair Bishop Brent said: "Fellow members of the International Opium Commission, in electing me your chairman you have conferred an extraordinary honor on the Government which I represent. In behalf of the United States of America and also in behalf of my esteemed colleagues, I beg to thank you for this distinction. * * * *

The American delegation approached its work with some diffidence, for, although it had developed that the American people were more largely interested in the opium problem than was at first thought, still the revenue at stake was a small matter compared to that of Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, Siam, and other countries represented. However, the American delegation were animated by a few fundamental principles. It was assumed that the mere existence of the commission was tantamount to acknowledging that the traffic in opium and its misuse was immoral; therefore the American delegation determined to use the term "moral" as seldom as possible in any discussion. Then, again, it was decided that the opium problem should be regarded as a problem of to-day, and that no historical references should be needlessly made. It was agreed that the last century phase of the question was of interest to the historian, but that discussion of it would lead to no practical results and might considerably fog the issue. The American delegation concluded that the bane of all past reports on opium was the minority report or the dissenting opinion; that time after time such reports and opinions had thrown the opium question again into the melting pot. It was decided, therefore, that no conclu-solution of it only by facing facts and facing them squarely. We must have courage, and it seems to me that two principal features of courage are sincerity and thoroughness. All great problems go through two distinct stages. The first stage is what might be termed the emotional stage; it is based largely upon sentiment and ideals that are conceived in the inner self, sometimes more independent of facts than is warranted. In the problem before us for a long period we have been passing through this preliminary stage—what I have termed the emotional stage. The emotional stage finds expression in agitation. We have had agitation. Now I believe we are at least midway in the second stage, when men deal with ascertained fact, and on the basis of ascertained fact reach certain conclusions of a practical character that will enable those upon whom the responsibility rests to arrive at some final conclusion.

"The first steps toward this international commission were taken some time since by the Government which I have the honor of representing. The negotiations for the establishment of the commission have covered a considerable period of time. At first it responsibility rests to arrive at some final conclusion.

The first steps toward this international commission were taken some time since by the Government which I have the honor of representing. The negotiations for the establishment of the commission have covered a considerable period of time. At first it seemed wise to restrict the nations that would take part in this investigation, or commission of inquiry, to those which through territorial possessions, agriculture, or commerce were actively interested in the opium question in the Far East. Since that time the scope has been considerably widened. Countries that have not the problem in its more acute form, as in the case of my own country and that of other countries similarly situated, were by mutual consent included by the powers already interested, so that now I think we may say we are in a very real sense an international commission. Almost at the last moment—indeed, at the very last moment—two countries without a serious opium problem of their own were included by their expressed desire and by the ready acquiescence of all other countries that up to date had notified their willingness to take part in the inquiry. Last summer it was decided by the American commission—and notification was sent to all other Governments concerned—to study every phase of the opium question in their own territory, including the homeland. So that, presumably, in this international commission, as we are desirous to ascertain all facts that will enable us to come to some satisfactory conclusion, we shall agree in the desire to receive such information as is presented regarding the various aspects of the question in all the countries represented on the commission.

"It devolves upon me to pronounce with emphasis that this is a commission, and as those who are informed—as all of you must be in matters that pertain to international affairs of this kind—a commission is not a conference. The idea of a conference was suggested, but it seemed wise to choose this particular form of acti of immediate success. Further, this commission is a temporary commission as distinguished from some of the permanent commissions already in existence, and if we were to look for the source of our origin I think we would find it in the articles of the First Hague Conference, which provides for such international commissions of inquiry where points of difference on matters kindred to that which is before us arise between the powers. So that in all our deliberations and in all our committee work we must bear points of difference on matters kindred to that which is before us arise between the powers. So that in all our deliberations and in all our committee work we must bear in mind that we are to confine ourselves to facts that will enable us to reach, I trust, certain unanimous resolutions and perhaps some recommendations of a practical, broad, and wise character in connection with those resolutions. But, if I may be permitted to make a suggestion to this assembly, it seems to me that it would be extremely wise if we were to rule out of our deliberations what might be termed useless historical questions beneath which a great deal of controversy lies hidden and which would only tend to fog the issue. The one way to reach a satisfactory solution of a grave problem is to simplify as far as possible the elements of that problem, and I believe that history bears me out when I say that no great question has ever been satisfactorily settled until men have come to a realization of the fact that purely side issues and controversial matters which do not touch the main question must be set aside and ignored. They may be of interest, but they are of no practical importance, and, indeed, are impediments in the actual working out of the main question.

"I feel that I am speaking not merely for myself and my colleagues on the American commission but for this distinguished assembly when I say that we are here to do such work as will bring the utmost credit to our respective countries and the utmost benefit possible to mankind. We must study this question in its every aspect—moral, economical, and commercial, diplomatic also, if you will—and we must study it, as I have already said, with those two phases of courage which will bring us to a happy conclusion of our labors—with sincerity and thoroughness.

"Nothing more remains for me to say, gentlemen, except to announce that this International Opium Commission is now organized and ready for business."

sion would be urged that could not be carried by an overwhelming majority or unanimously. It was recognized, too, that the acts of the commission would be important as an historical precedent, and it was determined that the commission, so far as the American delegation was concerned, should strictly adhere to the rules in regard to commissions of inquiry as propounded by the First Hague Conference and that the rules under which the commission operated should, as nearly as possible, comply with the rules of the Second Hague Conference. As illustrating the spirit in which the American delegation entered the commission, the address of the president on taking the chair may be consulted.

Bishop Brent, on taking the chair, read for the benefit of the delegations the letter of instructions issued by Mr. Root to our conferees at the Second Hague Conference. That had a good effect in that it showed that the American delegation was not at Shanghai to take an extreme position, even though it was recognized by all the delegations that the United States Government and people stood for immediate and total prohibition of the misuse of opium. 35 or 40 delegates present, there was the danger that there might be much useless and perhaps emotional discussion. But this was avoided by according to each delegation but one vote, and thereby making the leader of each delegation on the floor the mouthpiece of his Government. This practically confined discussion and oratory to 13 delegates. The rules under which the commission worked may be of interest and are therefore included in a footnote.2

2 It is resolved—

(1) That the Chair shall be addressed as "Mr. President."

(2) That no delegate shall continue to speak until recognized by the Chair.

(3) That when a vote is taken each delegation shall have only one vote. On questions of procedure or discipline the president, in the event of a vote being equally divided, shall have a deciding vote. (4) That immediately upon the adoption of these rules, the president shall call for the presentation of reports concerning the various phases of the opium question in the territories and dependencies of their respective countries from the delegations taking part in the International Opium Commission.

(5) That each delegation in its turn (alphabetically) shall then lay a report covering its data on the opium question before the commission, without discussion or debate. It shall be within the power of the president to allow the presentation of any report to be

(6) That a copy of each report shall be supplied to each member of the commission, and a reasonable time allowed to members of the commission generally for the examination of the report presented; and that thereafter the president shall call upon the commission to discuss any report that may be ready for investigation.

(7) That one or more committees may be appointed for the purpose of studying the reports referred to under rules 4; 5, and 6, or any specific portion of them, when it is apparent that previous study by a limited number of delegates is necessary for arriving at a conclusion regarding any problem under consideration.

(8) That any committee so appointed for the detailed study of a report, or section of a report, shall, upon the termination of its labors, report the result of its examination to the commission in plenary session, whereupon a general discussion on the report of such committee will be in order.

Exception to this rule may be made in the case of a delegation of a country having no consular or diplomatic representative in China; but under no circumstances will other than bona fide secretaries be admitted. The names of secretaries to delegations shall be formally reported to the chair.

(16) That, except when otherwise decided by the commission, the hours of meeting of the commission shall be from 10.30 a. m. to 12.30 p. m., and from 2 to 5 p. m., on every day of the week except Saturday and Sunday.

It will be seen by rule 5 that each delegation was required to report on its own opium question without discussion or debate. That rule resulted in the first half dozen sessions of the commission being very businesslike and of short duration, and by the 22d of February each delegation had placed its report before the commission as a whole, and the entire opium question was in scientific form and open to discussion and debate. The United States Government being the conveners of the commission, the other delegations naturally looked to the American for a program. It was decided that it should be in the Such a program was drawn up by the shape of a series of resolutions. Be it resolved, therefore, That in the judgment of the International Opium Commission a uniform effort should be made by the countries represented at once or in the near future to confine the use of opium, its alkaloids, derivatives; and preparations to legitimate medical practice in their respective territories; and be it further Resolved, That in the judgment of the International Opium Commission each Government represented is best able to determine for its own nationals, dependent, or protected peoples, what shall be regarded as legitimate medical practice.

(2) That whereas the reports submitted to the International Opium Commission by the delegations present recognize that, as the result of inadequate knowledge in the past of the baneful effects of the unguarded and indiscriminate use of opium, alkaloids, derivatives, and preparations, there have arisen certain revenue problems which depend upon the production, sale, and use of opium, its alkaloids, derivatives; and preparations: and further, whereas in the judgment of the International Opium Commission these revenue problems remain and will require a certain time for solution.

Be it resolved, therefore, That in the judgment of the International Opium Commission to depend upon the production of opium, its alkaloids, derivatives, and preparations such revenue Resolved, That in the judgment of the International Opium Commission such revenue Resolved, That in the judgment of the International Opium Commission such revenue Resolved, That in the judgment of the International Opium Commission such that they should be settled as soon as possible; to the end that opium, its alkaloids, derivatives, and preparations should be relegated to their proper use in legitimate medical practice.

That whereas the reports submitted to the International Opium Commission by rivatives, and preparations should be relegated to their proper use in legitimate medical practice.

(3) That whereas the reports submitted to the International Opium Commission by the delegations present state that opium smoking is prohibited to their nationals; further, that some of the reports submitted state that opium smoking is prohibited to protected and dependent peoples of some of the Governments here represented:

Be th resolved, therefore, That in the judgment of the International Opium Commission the principle of the total prohibition of the manufacture, distribution, and use of smoking opium is the right principle to be applied to all people, both nationals and dependent or protected; and that no system for the manufacture, distribution, or use of smoking opium should continue to exist, except for the express purpose and no other of smoking opium should continue to exist, except for the express purpose and no other of smoking opium should continue to exist, except for the express purpose and no other of smoking opium should continue to exist, except for the express purpose and no other of smoking opium should continue to exist, except for the express purpose and no other of smoking opium should continue to exist, except for the express purpose and no other of smoking opium should continue to such a strict laws, which are aimed directly or indirectly to prevent the smuggling of opium, its alkaloids, derivatives, and preparations into their respective territories:

Be it resolved, thierefore, That in the judgment of the International Opium Commission by the delegations present indicate that the use of morphia, its salts and derivatives, and preparations, to any country which prohibits the entry of opium or of its alkaloids, derivatives, and preparations.

Be it resolved, therefore, That in the judgment of the International Opium Commission by the delegations present indicate that the use of opium itself: and that their use accompanies, or sooner or later supervenes, on the use of opium itself, and th abuse throughout the world, and more particularly after a specific study of the various reports laid before the commission in Pleno, had considered and drawn up a series of resolutions which they hoped might receive, along with others of similar sense, the unanimous approval of the international commis-In considering and drawing up the resolutions, the American delegation had kept in mind the magnitude of the question they were instructed to review, and the relative values of the economic, moral, and international interests of the different Governments represented in the commission, though it was distinctly stated that in spite of the sympathy and interest which the American delegation had for the difficulties, financial and other, they had concluded that the traffic in opium for other than necessary uses could not much longer continue, or there would still loom between the East and West a problem that in its magnitude and potentialities for strife would outstrip the magnitude and forces of the long since happily settled slavery question. It was pointed out that the American people were watching with admiration a repetition of history; that they saw the beginning of a determined, and they hoped a final, effort of Great Britain and others to sacrifice a great revenue to the end that another widespread evil might cease. They showed their appreciation of the effort that Great Britain particularly was making, and the large financial interests it involved; that the American people realized that, as in the slavery question so in the opium question, Great Britain was ready to sacrifice. It was pointed out that the American program was presented more in the shape of a skeleton which it was hoped that the wisdom and thought of the other delegations would be able to clothe.

Without going into particulars as to the debate which led to the modification of the American program, it may be stated that of the final resolutions 1 Nos. 4 and 9 are American and were accepted without material modification; Nos. 2, 3, and 6 were compromise resolutions of the American and British delegations: Nos. 1 and 5 were resolutions introduced by the British delegation and modified at the suggestion of the American delegation; and resolutions 7 and 8 were introduced by the Chinese delegation. Resolution 1 was a very necessary

Be it resolved:

1. That the International Opium Commission recognizes the unswerving sincerity of the government of China in their efforts to eradicate the production and consumption of opium throughout the Empire; the increasing body of public opinion among their own subjects by which these efforts are being supported; and the real, though unequal, progress already made in a task which is one of the greatest magnitude.

2. That, in view of the action taken by the government of China in suppressing the practice of opium smoking, and by other governments to the same end, the International Opium Commission recommends that each delegation concerned move its own government to take measures for the gradual suppression of the practice of opium smoking in its own territories and possessions, with due regard to the varying circumstances of each country territories and possessions, with due regard to the varying circumstances of each country territories and possessions, with due regard to the varying circumstances of each country concerned.

3. That the International Opium Commission finds that the use of opium in any form otherwise than for medical purposes is held by almost every participating country to be a matter for prohibition or for careful regulation; and that each country in the administration of its system of regulation purports to be aiming, as opportunity offers, at progressively increasing stringency. In recording these conclusions the International Opium Commission recognizes the wide variations between the conditions prevailing in the different countries, but it would urge on the attention of the governments concerned the desirability of a reexamination of their systems of regulation in the light of the experience of other countries dealing with the same problem.

4. That the International Opium Commission finds that each government represented has strict laws which are aimed directly or indirectly to prevent the smuggling of opium, its alkaloids, derivatives and preparations into their respective territories; in the judgment of the International Opium Commission it is also the duty of all countries to adopt reasonable measures to prevent at ports of departure the shipment of opium, its alkaloids, derivatives and preparations.

5. That the International Opium Commission finds that the unrestricted manufacture, sale and distribution of morphine already constitute a grave danger, and that the morphine habit shows signs of spreading; the International Opium Commission, therefore, desires to urge strongly on all governments that it is highly important that drastic measures should be taken by each government in its own territories and possesions to control the manufacture, sale and distribution of this drug, and also of such other derivatives of opium as may appear on scientific enquiry to be liable to similar abuse and productive of like ill effects.

6. That as the International Opium Commission is not constituted in such a manner as t ductive of like ill effects.

6. That as the International Opium Commission is not constituted in such a manner as to permit the investigation from a scientific point of view of anti-opium remedies and of the properties and effects of opium and its products, but deems such investigation to be of the highest importance, the International Opium Commission desires that each delegation shall recommend this branch of the subject to its own government for such action as that government may think necessary.

7. That the International Opium Commission strongly urges all governments possessing concessions or settlements in China, which have not yet taken effective action toward the expression of sympathy with China in her fight against the production and consumption of opium. Resolution 2 was a frank recognition of the action taken by the Government of China in suppressing the vice of opium smoking, and of other Governments to the same end, and calls upon the Governments for further action. Resolution 3 in spirit delegates opium to its proper use in medicine, but takes into consideration the difficulties to be encountered by the different Governments in determining what legitimate medical practice may mean. recognized by the American delegation that the strict regulations that obtain in western countries could not be made to apply to China and India, where medical education is on a low plane and where most morbid conditions are treated by heusehold remedies, opium being in most common use. But the resolution is a practical condemnation of the illiberal use of opium even in India. Resolution 4 was the most important resolution passed. It recommends for adoption a new principle in international law. In presenting it the American delegation urged that the time had come for opium-producing countries to control the export of their product to countries that prohibit its entry. It was pointed out that in our national pure-food law we had, without pressure from foreign Governments and as a matter of courtesy, placed the same penalties on a shipper of misbranded or adulterated foods and drugs abroad as on shippers in our interstate commerce, and that the time had come for an international recognition of the fact. It was urged, further, that in prohibiting the entry of opium into the Philippines and United States the United States Government was confronted by smuggling operations on a large scale, and that in addition to sacrificing a considerable revenue, especially in the Philippines, it would be necessary to add considerably to the budget for a preventive service, if the prohibitory laws were to be made effective. It is to the great credit of all the delegations present that this principle was accepted without demur. To the British delegation especial appreciation is due, for it was realized in the commission as a whole that the resolution aimed at the export of crude opium from India and of opium manufactured for smoking from Hongkong, the Straits Settlements, and British North Resolution 5 aimed at the international control of the manufacture and distribution of morphia. The American delegation, as will be seen by referring to the original American program, had drawn up a strict resolution in regard to morphia; however, it was at once withdrawn as a concession to the British delegation when it was found that they were to submit one of similar purport, except that it applied to China and far eastern countries alone. The British delegation accepted an amendment of the American, making their resolution international in application, and as amended it was passed unanimously. Resolution 8 aims at a striking evil that has supervened on the fight of China against opium smoking, for it was developed in the commission that that country has been flooded with antiopium remedies containing high percentages of morphine and opium and that the cure threatens to become worse than the disease. Chemists of all nationalities in the settlements and concessions in China have manufactured these antiopium remedies by the ton, and the well-meaning but gullible Chinese habitués have given up opium smoking in their favor, few of them realizing that they are taking opium in another form. No doubt many other Chinese who can not stand the odium now attached to opium smoking secure and use these remedies secretly. Resolution 6 must be considered an unfortunate one. It was precipitated by an attempt on the part of the American delegation to have the scientific and medical aspects of the use of opium thoroughly investigated. But the British delegation took the ground that the commission was not constituted in such a manner as to permit the investigation from the scientific point of view of antiopium remedies and of the properties and effects of opium and its products; that, too, in spite of the fact that there were several experts in the commission. It was urged by the American delegaclosing of opium divans in the said concessions and settlements, to take steps to that end, as soon as they may deem it possible, on the lines already adopted by several governments.

8. That the International Opium Commission recommends strongly that each delegation move its government to enter into negotiations with the Chinese government with a view to effective and prompt measures being taken in the various foreign concessions and settlements in China for the prohibition of the trade and manufacture of such anti-opium remedies as contain opium or its derivatives.

9. That the International Opium Commission recommends that each delegation move its government to apply its pharmacy laws to its subjects in the consular districts, concessions and settlements in China.

tion that the time was ripe for a fresh utterance on this side of the opium question; that the royal commission of 1895 had but one medical expert; that his report had colored to a great extent the final judgment of the royal commission; that, on the other hand, that expert's opinion had not proved to be satisfactory to the great majority of scientists who had examined it in detail; and that if one expert was enough for a royal commission two or three should be warrant for action by the international commission. The American delegation was strongly supported in this view by the Japanese, the German, the Chinese, and other delegations; but it was lost by a majority vote of 1. Resolution 7 was necessary as a reminder that the opium dens in the foreign concessions and settlements in China had not all been closed. Some were still open in the French and the international settlements of Shanghai and in the French and Japanese concessions in other parts of China. Resolution 9 calls for the application of the pharmacy laws of western powers to their subjects in the consular districts, concessions, and settlements in China. As matters stand at present it is within the power of anyone calling himself a physician to prescribe opium, morphine, etc., in any quantity he pleases to those who apply to him and has led to a widespread use of the internal administration of opium to combat or displace the smoking habit. Of course it will be recognized that these resolutions were simply declarations based on a study of the opium problem by the commission as a whole and have no force as international law, and will have no force except as they affect public opinion until they are conventionalized in an international pact. Undoubtedly this will be the next and final step in placing the entire production, manufacture, and trade in opium under an international convention. Considering what an inflammable subject the opium questio has been for a hundred years or more, it was remarkable and greatly to the credit of all powers represented that the commission succeeded in achieving results without a display of feeling. The delegations realized their responsibility and that disagreement on the part of the commission would throw the whole subject of opium open to a further emotional discussion. Most happily this was avoided. In calling for thorough reports on the opium question, not only of the Far East but of the entire world, and in placing it on a scientific basis where statesmen may deal with it the opium problem is near its final

Some of the most important points gained by the calling of the commission has been the willingness of China to consult with countries like Persia and Siam on her opium question, though with these countries she has no treaty relations. Again the question has been elevated from the narrow confines of dual agreements and treaties to a plane where every civilized nation may have a voice in its final settlement. One more question is before the world at large for final adjustment. In its broader effects it impressed China—both Government and people—with the fact that the western powers deeply sympathize in her effort to suppress an evil which undoubtedly lies at the bottom of her past It has shown that the western powers may consult on her territory on a problem which affects her relations to them, act in her interest, and not demand a guid pro quo. It has taught her that an international commission can meet on her territory, interest themselves in her welfare, and break up without demanding a Province or an indemnity. It has done more than the remission of the Boxer indemnity to impress on the Chinese that the American Government and people are sincerely friendly. The remission of the Boxer indemnity appealed to the official and educated classes as a generous act, but no more than was due, while the work of the International Opium Commission and the leadership of the United States in it has penetrated not alone the upper classes but into the humblest hovel in China.1

¹The author also desires to add that on looking further into the subject and after rereading Mr. Reed's letter that appeared in the supplement (p. 269) to the July number of the Journal the statements made on p. 641 of the journal (July) in reference to Americans not engaging in the opium trade after the negotiation of the treaty of Wang Hea of 1844 must be modified. It seems certain that the treaty of Wang Hea did not drive Americans from the opium trade. This was largely due to the conivance of Chinese port authorities with the traders. Had the Chinese Government attempted to effectuate the opium article of the treaty of Wang Hea by dealing with American opium traders under its own laws, these traders would not have received either countenance or protection from the United States.

THE INTERNATIONAL OPIUM CONFERENCE.

(Part I.)

This conference—the latest of The Hague conferences to which the United States was a party—was proposed by the United States on September 1, 1909, and convoked by the Netherlands Government on December 1, 1911. It dealt in a judicial manner with the varied and conflicting interests, diplomatic, moral, humanitarian, and economic, of those Governments represented and with the known similar interests of those not represented. Several of the Governments in making pledges for the obliteration of the opium evil did so in the face of an eventual large financial sacrifice, but this was done thoughtfully and generously.

The conference determined upon, and on January 23 last signed, a convention for the suppression of the obnoxious features of their national and of the international opium, morphine, and cocaine traffics, and for the regulation of that part of the production of and trade in the drugs which may be said to be legitimate. To China was confirmed much that she had contended for for a hundred years or more as to the vexatious export of Indian opium to This act, however, was but a broader recognition of what the her shores. British Government had, as between India and China, already yielded to China by virtue of the so-called 10-year agreement of 1907, and by the modification of that agreement signed at Peking on the 8th of May, 1911.2

To the United States is due the credit of having initiated an international and national movement of such wide scope, involving diplomatic and economic interests and difficulties that scarcely anyone foresaw. For in the autumn of 1906 the American Government, after repeated urging, and as the result of a pressure not easy to define, boldly ventured on a solution of the opium problem as seen in the Far East, a venture which has been extended by the cooperation of 12 other powers to a solution of the problem as it affects the world generally.

President Roosevelt and Secretary of State John Hay had held favorable, though judicious, hearings on the subject with many people representing humanitarian, moral, and economic interests; following these Mr. Elihu Root, the then Secretary of State, formulated a plan, the design of which was to bring the Far Eastern opium traffic to an end, it being plain that that traffic was generally regarded as deplorable, as one of the most serious causes of the first Anglo-Chinese war, and of repeated, if not continuous, friction between China and Great Britain, with adverse economic and diplomatic consequences felt by every power having intercourse with the former.

To secure the end sought for, it was essential that the United States obtain the support of those western powers having territorial possessions in the Far East, and of certain of the oriental States, more particularly China and Japan. The United States had become a Far Eastern power in the larger sense through the acquisition of the Philippine Islands, and having maintained a fairly high record of accord with China as to the viciousness of the opium traffic and having attempted, as far as this could be done by national and local legislation, to protect the population of the Philippine Islands from the opium vice, it was in the best diplomatic position to approach the interested Governments.

The cooperation of the major powers having treaty relations with China was early and willingly offered to the United States, but one may suppose not without some misgivings in European chancelleries at the temerity of this Government's venture. From that moment the design of the Department of State broadened and embraced several other Governments directly or indirectly interested in some phase of the problem. By the autumn of 1908, 12 States of Europe and Asia had ranged themselves beside the United States in international brotherhood, and up to the present moment have remained there.

Mr. Robert Bacon was Assistant Secretary of State at the time the American Government initiated the international movement for the settlement of the opium problem, and upon him fell the responsibility of the negotiations which led to the assembling of the International Opium Commission. If The Hague conference—with which this paper particularly deals—achieved a decisive resuit, it was largely due to the broad lines upon which Mr. Bacon encouraged and kept the negotiations for the International Opium Commission, and to the official support and confidence, which later as Secretary of State he accorded to the American representatives on that commission.

The International Opium Conference, composed of delegates with full powers, was a sequel of the International Opium Commission which met at Shanghai. China, February, 1909. That commission was, generally speaking, a commission of inquiry, somewhat conforming in action to such commissions as provided for by The Hague Peace Conference of 1899. What that commission accomplished, both directly and indirectly, was described in the journal for July and October, 1909, and the progress of the movement since the commission adjourned has been outlined in the editorial columns of the journal for

It is the purpose of this paper to continue the narrative of international cooperation to solve the opium and allied problems, and to demonstrate that by the steady, persistent effort of the United States, by a continuity of policy running from the hands of Mr. Root into the hands of Mr. Bacon and Mr. Knox, the world will shortly see the obliteration of the Indo-Chinese opium trade, the release of China from the bonds of her own unnecessary production and vicious consumption of opium, as well as the regulation of the legitimate opium and allied traffics of the nations of the four continents.

As stated above, the International Opium Commission met at Shanghai in February, 1909. Its conclusions that the opium vice should cease and that the illicit morphine traffic must be discontinued, were unanimous.2 But these conclusions were on their face only moral in effect. Nevertheless they cleared all doubt as to future action, and left it open to the United States to proceed to propose that a conference, composed of delegates with full powers, should meet at The Hague to conventionalize the conclusions of the commission. on September 1, 1909, the Department of State addressed a circular proposal 3 to the interested governments—that is, to those represented on the International Opium Commission—in which inter alia it was stated that the Government of the United States had learned with satisfaction of the results achieved by the International Opium Commission; that it was the opinion of the leaders of the antiopium movement that much had been accomplished and that both the Government and people of the United States recognized that the results were largely due to the generous spirit in which the representatives of the governments concerned approached the questions submitted to them. The American appreciation of the magnitude of the opium problem and the serious financial interests involved were dwelt upon, and it was pointed out that as the result of inquiries in the Philippine Islands and the United States itself, the opium problem was of great material as well as humanitarian interest to the American people and Government. Mention was then made of the fact that on February 9, 1909, during the sitting of the International Opium Commission, the Congress had passed and the President had approved of an act forbidding the importation of opium into the United States except for medicinal purposes, thus cutting out by a stroke of the pen a previous per annum importation of nearly 200,000 pounds of opium prepared for smoking, used mostly by Chinese residents in the United States, but also of over 150,000 Americans. Continuing, it was stated that the United States was not an opium-producing country, and that to enable it to effectuate the above-mentioned legislation, it was necessary to secure international cooperation and the practical sympathy of opium-producing countries. Further, that although no formal declaration had been made at the International Opium Commission, it was a matter of discussion by the commissioners that however important the commission's conclusions were morally, they would fail to satisfy enlightened public opinion unless by subsequent agreement of the powers they and the minor questions involved in them were incorporated in an international convention. Greatly impressed by the gravity of the opium problem and the desirability of divesting it of local and unwise agitation, as well as the necessity of maintaining it upon a basis of fact, as determined by the Shanghai commission, the United States proposed an international conference to be held at The Hague, and that the delegates thereto should have full powers to conventionalize the resolutions adopted at Shanghai and their necessary consequences. A tentative program, composed of 14 items, was submitted, nearly all of these items becoming a part of the definite program of the conference. They included such items of interest as follows: Effective national laws to control the production, manufacture, and distribution of opium; restriction of the number of ports through which opium might be shipped by opium-producing countries; prevention at the port of departure of the shipment of opium to countries which prohibit or wish to prohibit or control its entry; reciprocal notification of the amount of opium shipped from one country to another; regulation by the universal Postal Union of the transmission of opium through the mails; restriction or control of the production of opium by countries which did not then produce it to compensate for the reduction in production being made in British India and China; the restudy of treaty obligations under which the opium traffic was being conducted; uniform provisions of penal laws concerning offenses against any agreement entered into by the powers in regard to opium production and traffic; uniform marks of identification of opium in international transit; government authorization to be granted to exporters and importers of opium; reciprocal right of search of vessels suspected of carrying contraband opium; measures to prevent the unlawful use of a flag by vessels engaged in the opium traffic; the application of a strict pharmacy law to the nationals of the powers in the consular districts, concessions, and settlements in China; the advisability of an international supervisory commission to be intrusted with the carrying out of any international agreement concluded by the powers.

The proposal of the United States did not attempt to prescribe the scope of the conference or to present a program which might not be varied or enlarged; and finally the powers were asked that a delegate or delegates be appointed, furnished with full powers, to negotiate and conclude an agreement based on the conclusions of the Shanghai commission and other important questions in-

It is to the great credit of 11 of the powers to which this proposal was made that they promptly and heartily responded and offered to continue cooperation with the United States for final international settlement of the opium problem. By the middle of May, 1910, the American proposal had been almost generally accepted and the Netherlands Government had very courteously and quickly offered to assemble the conference at The Hague.

However, one power had regretted its inability to send delegates to the conference,2 and another had failed to respond definitely to the American proposal by May, 1910, namely, Great Britain. There has been considerable ill-advised criticism of this delay on the part of the British Government, but the delay, as will be shown later, was due not to a want of sympathy or to a determination not to cooperate with the other Governments, but partly because Great Britain was then negotiating a modification of the 10-year agreement made between herself and China in 1907—it being the natural desire of statesmen like Sir Edward Grey and Lord Morley that the opium question as between Great Britain and China should be advanced more nearly to the fulfillment of China's desires before the conference met. In addition to this, the British Government was greatly concerned over the morphine and cocaine traffics; for it had been shown beyond a doubt that immense quantities of these drugs were being smuggled into British India to take the place of opium, also that in China they tended to supplant the use of opium which the British Government had agreed that India should soon cease to export, and the production and use of which China on her part had agreed to suppress. But in September, one year after the American proposal was made, the British Government tendered its cooperation with the American and other Governments, laying down as a condition of its acceptance of the American proposal that the powers should agree before the conference met to study the question of the production of and traffic in morphine and cocaine, and pledge themselves beforehand to the principle of drastic legislation against such production and traffic equally effective

Had the British proposals in regard to the morphine and cocaine traffics not been made, there is little doubt that the conference would have assembled early in 1911, but it was recognized by all concerned that though the British proposals were sound and necessary, they required the grave consideration of several of the Governments whose subjects were heavily interested in the manufacture of and traffic in these drugs. They were particularly important to Germany, as one of the largest producers. Nevertheless, after due consideration, all of the Governments accepted the British proposals, and the date of the assembling of the conference was finally fixed by the Netherlands for December 1, 1911. In the meantime the Italian Government had proposed that the production and traffic in the Indian hemp drugs be included as part of the program of the conference.

It was stated above that the delegates to the International Opium Commission which met at Shanghai in February, 1909, felt on the whole that the conclusions of the commission as embodied in its resolutions would be only moral in their effect unless by subsequent agreement amongst the interested States the resolutions and their necessary consequences were converted to and given the force of international law and agreement. This, too, undoubtedly was the popular estimate of the work of the commission. Soon, however, this conclusion had to be modified, for within a few months from the adjournment of the commission several of the powers more particularly interested gave the resolutions of the commission a binding effect by legislating in accord with them. This was notably true of the British Indian Government, of the Governments of the British self-governing colonies, and of several of the Crown colonies; also of the French colonial governments. These actions were in accord with modern statecraft, which recognizes that moral conclusions unanimously arrived at by an authoritative international body of wide representation have nearly the force of distinct pledges entered into by a conference composed of delegates clothed with the full power of their States.

In former articles dealing with the International Opium Commission there was outlined the opium problem as seen in the home territories and possessions of the Governments represented in the commission, and an account was given of the different measures taken by the different Governments to put new restrictive or prohibitory opium laws into effect before the commission assembled.

The same plan will be followed in the present paper.

CHINA.

The first resolution of the Shanghai commission is as follows:

"That the International Opium Commission recognizes the unswerving sincerity of the Government of China in their efforts to eradicate the production and consumption of opium throughout the Empire; the increasing body of public opinion among their own subjects by which these efforts are being supported; and the real, though unequal, progress already made in a task which is one of the greatest magnitude.'

It will be noticed at once that, though the commissioners at Shanghai recognized the unswerving sincerity of the Chinese Government in its attempt to suppress the production and use of opium in China, there was prevalent, nevertheless, the feeling that China's effort to this end had been unequal. It may be stated that the commission contained many doubting Thomases who could not believe in the ability of the Chinese Government to accomplish the task to which it had set itself or to fulfill its part of the so-called 10-year agreement of 1907. There were a few, however, who believed that the Chinese Government and people had at last been aroused to the truth, that the individual Chinese, as well as his Government, could not command the entire respect of those powers having treaty relations with China until China had shown a capacity to secure the great moral and economic reform in view. It had become only too obvious that China's inertia both at home and abroad was due to the poppy, and that if she had been unsuccessful in some of her dealings with the western powers it was not because of any superiority of intelligence on the part of the representatives of those powers so much as the inability of a number of Chinese metropolitan and provincial officials to efficiently transact business and perform their duties after emerging from an atmosphere of opium smoke.

At the International Opium Commission the Chinese representatives made a strenuous effort to bring under discussion and secure a modification of the 10-year agreement between China and Great Britain such as would be more in accord with and more helpful to the Chinese Government in the task before There can be no doubt that the strong men at Peking and in the Provinces were in hearty sympathy with the efforts of their representatives in the commission, for the commission had no sooner adjourned than the Peking Government renewed its efforts to secure a modification of the 10-year agreement. The attitude of the British Government was not unsympathetic, for the world at large had had it from Lord Morley, who was then at the head of the India office, that Great Britain would meet China more than halfway in the event of her showing a determination and capacity to suppress what was now being generally recognized as the great economic as well as moral obstacle to the advance of the Chinese Government and people. Quite naturally, however, the British Government was loath to make further concessions to China in regard to the Indo-Chinese opium traffic until China had demonstrated beyond peradventure of a doubt her capacity to fulfill her part of a solemn engagement.

China was determined to show the world her latent energy. To this end the authorities at Peking, encouraged by the proposal for an international conference made by the United States, and aided by energetic, enlightened, and faithful viceroys in the Provinces, renewed their efforts to suppress the cultivation of the poppy and the use of opium in the Empire, expecting thereby to secure from Great Britain terms as to the Indian opium trade which would be more helpful. In this they were successful, as will be presently shown.

During the months from the end of February, 1909, to the spring of 1911, there were varying and sometimes contradictory reports from many observers as to what the Chinese Government and people were accomplishing toward the suppression of the production of opium and its abuse in the Empire. those who were watching the situation closely it was seen that decided progress was being made, and that China was more than carrying out her part of the terms of the 10-year agreement.

China is so vast a country, with so great a population and such varying local conditions that it would be quite impossible to give in this paper in detail the methods adopted and the results attained by the central and provincial authorities in achieving her reform, so that a statement of the case must be based on memoranda compiled from many sources by one of the highest authorities on the question, Mr. Charles D. Tenney, Chinese secretary of the American Legation at Peking, and one of the commissioners for the United States at the International Opium Commission.

Mr. Tennev's conclusions follow:

"It is now possible to make a general statement in regard to the progress of the crusade against the growth of the poppy and the production and use of opium in the Chinese Empire. By the agreement with Great Britain in 1907 the so-called 10-year agreement—China undertook to suppress the growth of the poppy within a period of 10 years, by gradual reduction, and Great Britain agreed, on her part, to reduce the amount of opium exported from India to all countries by one-tenth annually; this agreement was to continue only if after three years China was able to show that she had lived up to her part of the program.3 A great moral awakening had occurred in China before this agreement was entered upon. Upon the conclusion of the agreement a remarkable impetus was given to the movement both in Government circles and amongst the scholars and gentry throughout the Chinese Empire, and there arose a general determination to suppress entirely and at once the production of native opium without reference to the 10-year agreement. The difficulty of dealing with this question in so vast an area as that of the Chinese Empire and through a body of subordinate officials, many of whom are corrupt, must be evident, and the results that have been obtained, though somewhat uneven, are in the aggregate surprising and most gratifying. The evidence of both Chinese and other observers is conclusive that the growth of the poppy has been practically suppressed in the Provinces of Manchuria, Chihli, Shantung, and all the other central and southern Provinces of the Empire. In all this part of China other crops have taken the place of the poppy. The latter, if found, is only in small patches in remote and secluded places. Shansi, Szechuan, and Yunnan were the three Provinces largely given up to the poppy culture before the new awakening. But, on the evidence of many observers, practically no poppy has been planted in them this year, and very little was grown last year. There are of course remote spots where the prohibition of cultivation has not been made effective. A consequence of effective prohibition, and diminution in the supply of opium has caused the price of the drug to advance until it is worth four or five times its normal price, so that the temptation to grow the poppy This, however, has caused no general relaxation of the prohibitory Up to last year the reports from the two northwest Provinces, movement. Shansi and Kansu, were less favorable than from other parts of the Empire. The attention of the Central Government being called, stringent orders were issued that these Provinces should fall in line with the rest of the Empire. Such reports as are now available indicate that prohibition is generally effective in that region also. In view of the present conditions, it would seem probable that if China enjoyed full sovereign rights as to the control of the importation of foreign or Indian opium, the opium evil might be thoroughly stamped out of the Empire in a very short time. So much for the cultivation of the poppy and the production of opium. The present situation in regard to the use of opium is that wealthy Chinese victims of the habit continue to smoke in private, while the poor have been obliged to give it up on account of the high price of the drug and the difficulty of obtaining it. It is gratifying to be able to state that public opium-smoking shops have largely disappeared from Chinese towns, and that the use of opium is no longer fashionable; the habit, when indulged in, is kept as secret as possible. Wonder has been shown that the Central Government which, seemingly so weak on other lines, has been able to make so marked a showing in carrying out the opium reform. The explanation is that the conscience of the country has been awakened, so that the arbitrary measures taken by officials in many localities against those who have tried to produce opium for the pecuniary profits of the trade, have been supported by general public opinion and by the most influential members of society. It would seem that international justice now demands that China should be allowed to strike off opium from the list of her legalized imports, so that the Government may have full control of the situation and be able to carry to a conclusion the reform so well commenced unhindered by vexatious agreements with other powers."

This is a review of the situation up to June, 1910.

Another close observer of the Chinese opium reform may be quoted, namely, Sir Alexander Hosie, most learned in Chinese affairs, and one of the commissioners on the part of Great Britain to the Internatinal Opium Commission.

Sir Alexander's report was made on behalf of his Government, for the final determination as to whether or not China had carried out her part in the tentative period of three years of the ten-year agreement. There was little credible doubt as to what would be the conclusion. On June 15, 1911, the British foreign office published an official White Paper containing Sir Alexander Hosie's observations. It had been estimated by friendly observers of the opium reform that China had reduced her home production of the drug from 60 to 75 per cent during the three years following the issue of the antiopium edict in the autumn of 1906. The Hosie report applying only to the five Provinces of Shansi, Shensi, Hansu, Yunnan, and Szechuan—the most important being the latter which used to produce nearly half the opium grown in China—nearly confirms this estimate.

Sir Alexander Hosie's report on these five Provinces is, in brief, as follows: "Shartsi.—There is reason to believe that the poppy has ceased to be cultivated in this Province for the last two years.

"Shensi.—I have not the least hesitation * * * in saying that so far as my personal observations extended, the official claim that there has been a diminution in the cultivation of from 60 to 80 per cent is excessive. It may be as much as 30 per cent, but it is certainly much under 50 per cent.

"Kansu.—From what I have seen and heard, the conclusion which I have arrived at in regard to Kansu is that on the whole there has been a reduction in cultivation, and that reduction amounts to something under 25 per cent."

These three Provinces, however, are of relatively minor importance from the point of view of opium cultivation. In the Province of Shansi, for instance, the production of opium, even on the highest estimate, never exceeded 30,000 piculs (piculs=133½ pounds avoirdupois). But formerly the situation was entirely different in the Province of Szechuan and that of Yunnan. The former was for many years the greatest opium-producing Province in China—the production exceeding 200,000 piculs per annum, and Yunnan always ranked next to Szechuan in point of quantity, and first throughout the Empire in point of quality of its opium. The conclusion arrived at by Sir Alexander Hosie in regard to these Provinces may be stated in his own words:

"Szechuan.—As the result of my own personal investigation, extending over 34 days' travel overland, and of the testimony of others, I am satisfied that poppy cultivation has * * * been suppressed in Szechuan.

"Yunnan.—Taking the Province of Yunnan as a whole * * * it may, I think, be fairly assumed that the estimated production of 60,000 piculs prior to the introduction of the measures is correct. The suppression has been very materially reduced, and I venture to hazard the opinion that the output of 1910 and 1911 will not exceed 15,000 piculs. In other words, that there has been a reduction of about 75 per cent."

Commenting on Sir Alexander Hosic's report, the London Daily News, from which the foregoing statement is taken, said: "To appreciate the extent of the miracle (i. e., opium suppression in China) one must resort to analogy. It is as if the tobacco habit had come to an end in Europe a few years after decision to that effect by The Hague conference."

To accomplish this result the Chinese Government had issued numerous edicts and many regulations to be enforced by the central and provincial authorities. It is impossible to record all of these, but as an evidence of the thoroughgoing manner and of the high spirit which has animated the major and minor officials of China, attention may be called to the regulations adopted by the official antiopium commissioners shortly after the adjournment of the international opium commission. By these regulations it is provided that Princes Kung and Pu Wai are appointed antiopium commissioners to revise the regulations for suppressing the practice of opium smoking among the metropolitan and other officials and those who are in government service in the various yamens. They make it the duty of superior authorities to detect opium smokers among their underlings and subordinates, and those who have already given up the vice; to keep track of the latter class and deposit their certificates as to being nonsmokers in the antiopium bureau for inspection and examination, lest they impose upon their superiors. Commissioners are appointed as inspectors of opium smoking, whose sole duty it is to go about China inspecting and detecting with diligence and care those who are still deep in the opium-smoking habit; and those who are ingenious in concealing their vice, it having been discovered that there were many Chinese officials who having abandoned the opium-smoking habit fell into the vice again. It is further provided that should the latter class be detected in this offense they shall not only be cashiered but never be reinstated in their official rank. Moreover, no official post is to be given them by any provincial authorities. And then follow the 10 regulations providing for the suppression of the opium-smoking vice amongst officials.1

The above-mentioned regulations apply more particularly to officials, but many antiopium ordinances have been issued which apply to the people at large, one of the most recent being a part of the new criminal code for China, promulgated January, 1911. This ordinance not only prohibits and proscribes the cultivation of the poppy and the use of opium but the possession of instruments and apparatus used in connection with opium. In short, to prohibit anything and everything which tends to aid in or encourage the use of opium.²

Therefore, the Chinese Government having satisfied the British Government not only as to its willingness but also as to its ability to suppress the production and use of opium, chiefly as the result of Sir Alexander Hosie's report, the two Governments entered into a new agreement on May 8, 1911, the essentials of which follow:

1. The British Government recognizing the sincerity of the Chinese Government and their pronounced success in diminishing the producton of opium in China during the three years from January 1, 1908, expressed their willingness to continue the arrangement for the unexpired period of seven years on the following conditions:

2. From the 1st of January, 1911, China shall diminish annually for seven years the production of opium in China in the same proportion as the annual export from India is diminished until the total extinction of the Chinese production in 1917.

3. The Chinese Government having adopted a most rigorous policy for \mathbb{VO}-hibiting the production and the transport of native opium produced in Chiua, the British Government expressed their agreement with this policy and the \mathbb{V} willingness to give every assistance. With a view to facilitating the continuance of this work His Majesty's Government agree that the export of opium from India to China shall cease in less than seven years if clear proof is given to the complete suppression of the production of native opium in China.

4. His Majesty's Government also agreed that Indian opium shall not be conveyed into any Province of China which can establish by clear evidence that it has effectively suppressed the cultivation and import of native opium produced in China.

5. During the period of the new agreement China shall permit His Majesty's Government to obtain continuous evidence of the diminution of production of native opium by local inquiries and investigation conducted by one or more British officials, accompanied—if the Chinese Government so desire—by a Chinese official. The decision of these inspectors as to the extent of the production of native opium in China is to be accepted by both parties to the agreement.

6. By the arrangement of 1907 the British Government agreed to permit China to dispatch an official to India to watch the opium sales, on condition that such official would have no power of interference. His Majesty's Government now agree that the official so dispatched may be present at the packing, as well as at the sale, of opium on the same conditions.

7. The Chinese Government undertakes to levy a uniform tax on all opium produced in the Chinese Empire, while the British Government consents to the increase in the present import duty on Indian opium to taels 350 per chest of 100 catties, such increase to take effect as soon as the Chinese Government levy an equivalent excise tax on all native opium.

8. With a view to assisting China in the suppression of opium the British Government undertakes that from the year 1911 the Government of India will issue an export permit with a consecutive number for each chest of Indian opium declared for shipment to or for consumption in China. During the year 1911 the number of permits so issued are not to exceed 30,000, and shall be progressively reduced annually by 5,100 during the remaining six years ending 1917. His Majesty's Government undertakes that each chest of opium for which such permit has been granted shall be sealed by an official deputed by the Indian Government in the presence of the Chinese official, if so requested.

9. Both parties agree that should it appear on subsequent experience desirable at any time during the unexpired portion of seven years to modify the agreement, or any part thereof, it may be revised by mutual consent.

The agreement of 1911 has an annex providing for the release into China of some thousands of chests of opium held by traders. But the number of these chests are to be deducted from the annual exportation of 5,100 from India, the chests permitted by the agreement of 1907 and by the later agreement.

The agreement of 1907 between Great Britain and China and the modification of that agreement of May 8, 1911, just outlined, is perhaps the finest example of the comity of nations recorded in modern times. After a controversy sustained for over 100 years both parties to the Indo-Chinese opium trade have now determined upon its gradual and effective suppression, and one of them—Chinahas agreed, and has so far most effectively carried out the agreement, to suppress an internal production of opium seven times greater than the foreign traffic in the drug.

When the International Opium Conference assembled at The Hague on the 1st of last December representatives of the British and Chinese Governments were at last able to look one another in the face and without reserve show the representatives of the other Governments that a great reconciliation had taken

The negotiator in chief of the later agreement on behalf of the British Government was Mr. Max Müller, at one time counselor of embassy at Washington. Mr. Müller was a British representative at The Hague conference.

The Manchus have gone, but not before their distinguished representative at the conference i had signed on their behalf the international opium convention, which confirms to China on the part of the other treaty powers all that was conceded to her by Great Britain by virtue of the agreement of May 8, 1911. It was under Manchu sway that the Indo-Chinese opium traffic and the vice of opium smoking first seriously appeared in the empire.2 The early emperors of that dynasty fought against the traffic and its consequences in vain. the weakest of the later emperors of this house the Indo-Chinese opium traffic grew to enormous proportions and the opium-smoking vice took an apparently unrelenting hold of the Chinese people. The traffic became legalized by the Tientsin treaties, and the internal production of opium in China was given free rein. The Manchus were not to depart ingloriously, however, for there was the old Buddha who came to recognize the economic and moral degradation that was attendant on the opium vice. In the latter years of her reign there was a revival by her ministers of the old contest against the Indo-Chinese opium trade and the opium vice in China. The old Buddha died on the eve of the assembling of the International Opium Commission. Under her successors and the statesmen who served them the latest great acts of the contest were accomplished by the signing of the Anglo-Chinese agreement of last year and of the international opium convention of January 23.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Since the adjournment of the International Opium Commission Great Britain has set a splendid example in the putting of an end to the unnecessary production, traffic in, and use of opium and other narcotics. Her recent agreement with China in regard to the Indo-Chinese opium traffic has been mentioned at length, but in addition to that special agreement other actions have been taken by the London and the colonial governments which are of international significance.

For instance, the International Opium Commission had no sooner dispersed than the Crown colony of Hongkong adopted the principle of resolution 4 of that commission, and immediately prohibited the export of opium to countries prohibiting its entry, while in the summer of 1911 Sir Edward Grey informed the interested Governments that India would, quite independently of the prospective conference, forbid the exportation of opium to countries which prohibited or desired to prohibit its entry. Moreover the antinarcotic laws of Great Britain were strengthened, and a compulsory declaration of all importations and exportations of morphine and cocaine was put in force.

In the Crown colonies of Wei-hai-wei and Ceylon, where the number of opium consumers is small and the population more or less stable, it was found possible to institute a system for the registration of smokers of opium which is to be used for the gradual obliteration of opium consumption, whereas in Hongkong and the Malay Peninsula, where the Chinese population fluctuates and fresh immigrants are constantly arriving, the registration was not found to be practicable. As an illustration of what has been done in these Crown colonies, Ceylon and Hongkong may be taken as illustrations.

The situation in Ceylon was somewhat peculiar. Besides those persons who were habitual consumers of opium, the vederalas, or native doctors, who are trained in the traditional Ceylonese system of medicine, habitually used opium in their prescriptions. Some difficulty therefore, was encountered in the settlement of the question of what persons professing to be vederalas had any claim to knowledge of ancient medical tradition. The matter was, however, decided by careful inquiry, and those persons who were found to be qualified vederalas were registered, and are now entitled to use opium in treating their patients.

An ordinance which came into force on the 1st of October, 1910, regulates the general opium traffic. The right of importing opium, whether raw or prepared, is vested solely in the Government, and is delegated to the principal medical officer who has charge of the distribution of the drug. Opium for purely medicinal purposes may be supplied by the principal civil medical officer to qualified medical men and veterinary surgeons and to registered vederalas. It can only be supplied to other persons on their registration as habitual consumers.

No person may be registered except on production of satisfactory evidence that at the time when the ordinance was passed he was an habitual consumer, together with evidence of the amount of opium which he was accustomed to consume and the manner and form of consumption. Thus, the opium consumers in Ceylon are at the present moment a definite number, to which additions can not be made. The use of the drug, except for medicinal purposes, must therefore disappear in the course of time. Further precautions against undue use of the drug are taken by limiting the annual amount allowed to a registered consumer or vederala to 8 ounces. The importation, possession, or sale of opium except by the authorized officer—the principal civil medical officer—and for the purposes described above is illegal.

In Hongkong it has not been found practicable to take the monopoly of the importation, preparation, and sale of opium into Government hands, but since the adjournment of the International Opium Commission restrictions on the traffic have been made by the limitation of the farmer to a certain number of chests per annum-800 in 1911-by the suppression of the opium divans and by forbidding the sale of prepared opium to any person other than an adult male. The preparation and sale of opium is vested in the farmer, and raw opium can only be imported by him or by a person possessing a permit signed by a Government officer and countersigned by the farmer. By resolution of the legislative council which came into force on the 1st of September, 1911, the importation of any kind of raw Indian opium is forbidden unless covered by export permits from the Government of India to the effect that it has been declared for shipment to or consumption in China. This resolution does not apply to opium imported by or for the use of the farmer. The resolution of the legislative council just referred to was made to effectuate article 8 of the Indo-Chinese agreement of May 8, 1911. Hongkong has gone further and has forbidden the exportation of prepared opium or of dross opium—that is, a preparation of opium in which the residue of opium which has been smoked forms the main ingredient-to China, French Indo-China, the United States, the Philippine Islands, the Netherlands, Indies, Siam, and Japan, while the exportation of opium to those places which permit its importation can only be carried out with the written permission of the superintendent of imports and exports.

The British self-governing colonies have not lagged in the forward movement set by the mother country and its Crown colonies. The Government of New Zealand, which had prohibited by law the importation of opium in any form suitable for smoking, added a further restriction by statute No. 30, of 1910, which enacts that opium in any form which, though not suitable for smoking, may yet be made suitable, may only be imported by permit issued by the minister of customs.

Canadian legislation of 1908 declared the importation, manufacture, sale, or possession for sale of opium for other than medicinal purposes or of opium prepared for smoking to be an indictable offense. By act No. 17, of 1911, the law as to opium, cocaine, morphine, etc., is made more stringent. The importation, manufacture, sale, possession or offering for sale or traffic in Canada in these drugs, except for scientific or medicinal purposes, is a criminal offense. The smoking of opium, the possession of opium prepared or in preparation for smoking, and frequenting of opium dens are criminal offenses, while the exportation, without lawful excuse, of any of the drugs to any country which prohibits their entry is punishable by a fine or imprisonment, or both.

It may be stated that the author of the admirable Canadian law was the Hon Mackenzie King, Minister of Labor in the late Liberal cabinet. As a profound student of labor conditions in the Far East, as well as in Europe and America, he has lent the whole weight of his authority and knowledge to the suppression of the opium vice in Canada, and the law for which he was responsible was in part designed to enable the United States to protect its northern border from smuggled opium. It is an excellent example of the assistance which Canada and the United States may render each other in a great moral and economic cause, but which so far in this case has only been rendered by Canada.

The Governments of Australia and the Transvaal have strengthened laws which were in existence four years ago, and by these laws the use of opium and allied drugs, except for medicinal purposes, has been reduced to a minimum.

It has been stated above that the British Government laid particular emphasis on the morphine and cocaine questions on accepting the American proposal for an International Opium Conference. This emphasis was based on the necessity of the situation and on action which had been taken in British oriental possessions to prevent the opium habit being substituted by the morphine and There were previous restrictions on the importation and sale of cecaine habits. morphine and cocaine in the eastern colonies and protected States, but since the meeting of the International Opium Commission the legislation on the subject has been amended so as to impose greater restrictions, and it may be said that the morphine and cocaine laws of the eastern Crown colonies and protected States are noteworthy examples of restrictive legislation and will become wholly effective when the sources of supply of these drugs in Germany, France, Great Buitain, and the United States are under efficient control, as provided for in the International Opium Convention. The British Government was not only concerned about the morphine traffic from Europe to its own colonies and possessions, but also to China, where the use of this drug and cocaine threatened to supplant opium. A quotation from the address of the Hon. Murray Stuart, of the Hongkong Government, is of interest in this connection. On October 29, 1910, Mr. Stuart pointed out that two years before public attention had been drawn very emphatically to the increased consumption of morphia in China, although the Chinese customs statistics seemed to prove the contrary. For, whereas they showed in 1902 an import of morphia into China of 195 and odd pounds, only 120 ounces were Yet everybody knew that during the six previous years the inshown for 1904. crease in the consumption of morphia in China had been truly enormous. Morphia was being smuggled into China under some other name. When the antiopium movement in China reached the stage at which the Chinese Government threatened all opium smokers with heavy fines and penalties if they persisted in continuing the habit, there arose throughout the land a demand for an opium An antiopium pill made its appearance on the market, and an enormous demand for this antidote set in. But the cure proved to be simply another form These pills, on being subjected to analysis, were found to of taking the drug. centain an antidotal drug, no stimulant or scientific ingredients, but simply morphia made into a tabloid with ordinary household flour. Some time before Mr. Stuart had asked the legislative council for information as to the amount of morphine and compounds of opium imported into Hongkong. The answer given by the Government was that between the first of March and 30th of September, 1910, over 7,000 pounds of morphine were imported into the colony, the whole amount being shipped from London. It was very easy for Mr. Stuart to point out that, with a great show of virtue, the London Government had insisted on the colony marching in line with China in the suppression of opium smoking to the extent of .. large sacrifice of public revenue, and all the while the export of opium from England to China in the more deadly form, morphine, was permitted to flourish and increase, and he asked the council to pass a resolution humbly praying the secretary of state for the colonies to lay before the Parliament the propriety of assisting the government of Hongkong in its endeavors to discourage the opium vice in its most injurious form by restricting the export from England of the means-morphia-of gratifying it. On a later page it will be shown that the International Opium Convention contains the means whereby the exportation of morphine in unnecessary quantities will be brought to a stop.

In British India official opinion still leans to the view that opium eating is on the whole not injurious to those members of the Indian population who practice it. The vast majority of medical men hold the contrary view; but it will be some time before that view prevails. Meantime the Indian Government is strengthening its laws so as to confine the habit and keep it in channels which they regard as legitimate. But the considerations which have caused the Government of India to regard a certain amount of opium eating as legitimate in present circumstances do not apply to the smoking habit, which has never taken root in the country, and is strongly condemned by public opinion. The Indian Government have therefore endeavored for a good many years past to reduce it to a minimum by repressive action. Thus, while some 20 years ago there were some 600 shops for the sale of smoking preparations, the sale of such preparations was subsequently and still remains absolutely prohibited. Vigorous measures are enforced by the police and the excise preventive service for punishing infractions of the law, such as are occasionally attempted in large and metropolitan centers like Calcutta and Rangoon.

It will be seen from what has been stated under this heading that Great Britain had not only acted on the results of the International Opium Commission up to the time The Hague Conference assembled, but was prepared to go to the fullest extent in cooperation with the other governments to make the conclusions of that commission effective.

ITALY.

Italy is one of those happy countries in which the opium vice in any form does not exist, and despite the fact that the Italian Government has little material interest in the opium question, it has nevertheless continued to cooperate with the other Governments in the international phases of the question.

GERMANY.

The German Imperial and State laws in regard to opium and its allies are all that can be desired, and are effectively enforced. This may also be said of the German colonies and protectorates. In Kiaochou, on the China coast, steps have been taken which mark the sincere desire of the German Government to cooperate with the Chinese in stamping out the opium vice. But to Germany the morphine and cocaine questions are serious, not because of any abuse of these drugs in German territory, but because of the large financial investment in their manufacture. When the British proposals in regard to morphine and cocaine were made to the United States it was thought that the large German interest in the manufacture and export of these drugs would interfere to prevent German cooperation with the United States for their control. But this proved to be unwise thinking, and it will be shown later that Germany, by virtue of the International Opium Convention, stands ready with the other powers to solve this problem, even at considerable financial sacrifice on the part of her manufacturers and exporters.

HOLLAND.

The immediate concern of the Netherlands Government in opium is that a considerable revenue is derived by the Netherlands Indies Government from the importation, manufacture, and distribution of opium for smoking purposes; but it has been the high endeavor of both the home Government and the Governments of the East Indian islands to ultimately abolish the pernicious habit amongst the natives. Since the adjournment of the International Opium Commission, many ordinances have been passed by the Batavia Government aimed to extend Government control over the habit of opium smoking, and this has so far succeeded that the Netherlands Government and people look forward to the obliteration of the habit in the near future. No doubt there will be many difficulties to meet, as the net revenue from the opium régie last year was in the neighborhood of 18,000,000 florins. But that this revenue will shortly be abandoned in favor of a more legitimate revenue is clearly evidenced by the learty cooperation which has been extended by the Netherlands to the United States in its endeavor to secure international agreement on the opium problem.

PERSIA.

Of Persia it may be said, in addition to what was stated on page 664 of the Journal for July, 1909, that early in 1911 the Persian Government enacted legislation aimed to abolish opium smoking and other misuses of opium in Persia.

PORTUGAL.

Although in Portugal itself there is no abuse of opium, its colony of Macao on the China coast still continues to import large quantities of the drug and manufacture it into smoking opium, which is used locally, or exported for revenue purposes. This opium, however, has been practically outlawed by every country a party to the International Opium Convention, and by the provisions of that convention the trade should be speedily ended.

RUSSIA AND JAPAN.

Russia fortunately has no opium problem, nor has Japan, except in the island of Formosa, where an opium régie exists for the avowed purpose of finally suppressing the opium vice.

SIAM.

Although no opium is produced in Siam, large quantities are imported and manufactured into smoking opium under a system of Government monopoly for the use of Chinese resident in that country. But it is the purpose of the Siamese Government to gradually extinguish the vice, and ordinances aimed to this end have been passed since the adjournment of the International Opium Commission. The Siamese Government also purposes legislation for the control by the Siamese Government over the amount of morphine and cocaine which may be imported, and the rendering of account by sellers showing that they have disposed of their supplies in a legitimate manner.

FRANCE.

Since the adjournment of the International Opium Commission, French public opinion has been aroused on the question of the abuse of opium and morphine in the large seaports of that country, and the Government is making strong efforts to root out the evil. In French Indo-China the Government has control. It has taken strong measures to bring to an end the abuse of opium in the colonies, and it is earnestly believed that in a short time the abuse of opium will be reduced to a minimum. Further, the French Indo-Chinese Government has forbidden the exportation of opium prepared for smoking to those countries which prohibit its entry.

Upon the above summaries, it may be repeated that the resolutions of the International Opium Commission were more than moral in their effect. They created sufficient energy to enable the Governments concerned to enact practical, effective legislation. The United States is the exception, as will be shown later. With these preliminaries we may now pass to the International Opium Conference and its results.

Note. Appendix IV, which here follows, consists of a few introductory and concluding words accompanying the text of the report made to the Department of State on May 15, 1912, by the delegates to the First International Opium Conference (see For. Rel. 1912, pp. 207–221) with the omission of the digression in the report (For. Rel. 1912, pp. 216–217), concerning the British-Chinese agreements of 1907 and 1911.

Note. On September 1, 1913, the Netherlands Minister notified the Department that the Opium Convention had been signed on June 25, 1913, by Great Britain in behalf of the Commonwealth of Australia; by Chile on July 2, 1913; by Nicaragua July 18, 1913; and by Peru July 24, 1913; and that the Governments of Denmark and Siam had deposited their acts of ratification of the convention. (File No. 511.4A1/1422.)

The same Minister delivered to the Department on September 22, 1913, a certified copy of the Protocol de Cloture of the Second International Opium Conference; and on October 12, 1913, he delivered copies of the Proceedings of that conference. (File Nos. 511.4A1/1429) and 1438.)

On November 29, 1913, the Netherlands Minister notified the Department that the Opium Convention had been signed on August 27, 1913, by Sweden with the following reservation: "Opium not being prepared in Sweden, the Swedish Government will for the present content itself with prohibiting the importation of prepared opium, but at the same time declares itself ready to take the measures set forth in article 8 of the Convention if experience demonstrates the advisability thereof." Also that the Convention had been signed by Norway on September 2, 1913; and ratified by Denmark, Siam, Guatemala, Honduras and Venezuela. (File No. 511.4A1/1437.)

In the same communication the Minister gave notice that the Convention had not yet been signed by Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, Montenegro, Roumania, Servia, Greece, Switzerland, Turkey nor

RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES WITH COLUMBIA.1

File No. 711.21/64.

The Minister of Colombia to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

No. 10.]

Legation of Colombia, Washington, November 25, 1911.

Mr. Secretary: The necessity, which in the opinion of the Government of Colombia still exists, of settling as soon as possible in a just and honorable way the claims it has made and with untiring insistence maintained, resulting from the attitude and conduct of the Government of the United States with respect to the separatist movement of the Colombian Department of Panama in 1903, and the experience of recent years having demonstrated the utter unlikelihood of such a result being attained by means of a direct agreement, the Government of Colombia believes and has directed me so to declare to your excellency, that the time has come to urge anew upon the Government of the United States that—abandoning a course notoriously ineffective and adopting the one that the present administration of this country amid general applause advocates with so much zeal and success for the termination of all controversies of an international character—it assent to entering with us into a simple convention or treaty of arbitration under which the differences herein referred to shall be unappealably adjudicated, thus bringing to an end the present anomalous state of the relations between the two countries and placing them for the future and to their material honor and profit on a footing of the most sincere cordiality not only in their political but also in their commercial and economic aspects.

The outcome of the attempt that was made to regulate the situation by means of a direct agreement embodied in the treaties of 1909 was in truth most unfortunate. Let it be enough to say that it was on the point of causing a serious disturbance of public order in Colombia which was arrested only by the Government's withdrawing the treaties from the consideration of the National Assembly, whose debates on the question, even though they lacked a genuine popular origin, did voice the prevalent sentiment of the country and brought about a change in the personnel of the administration and the voluntary and hasty expatriation of the head of the Government. The Colombian plenipotentiary who signed those conventions had to keep out of the country thereafter and not until a few months ago did he think it safe, after failing in a previous attempt, to return.

The present Chief of the nation, without having to analyze the cause of the sentiment that is now practically unanimous, must, as the faithful representative of an honorable democracy, respect it and look to it in his decisions: a course the more sensible and praiseworthy the more evident it becomes, to all who are familiar with the antecedents of the case, that the sentiment is swayed by noble aspirations after justice which soar high above consideration of mere material advantages, evidence of which is found, despite the assertion of persons bent on injuring Colombia and the lack of authentic and bona fide information, in the fact that, neither at the time of the discussion and rejection of the Treaty of 1903 by the Colombian Senate nor when that of 1909 was discussed in the National Assembly without coming to a vote, could there be heard in committees, reports or debates any allusion worth mentioning to the pecuniary compensations which in both cases were stipulated in Colombia's favor. public statement recently made by the citizen who was the Chief Executive of the United States at the time of the secessionist revolution of Panama that he took a part of the territory of the friendly nation, failing in the performance of this act of war to observe even the constitutional requirement of previously referring the case to the Congress of his country, will have proved the least likely to allay that sentiment.

It having been demonstrated in practice that the desired settlement of the existing difference cannot be reached by direct agreement, my Government does not perceive the absence in this case of any of the circumstances which suggest, or rather impose, as between nations that have been bound during the greater part of their existence by the ties of traditional friendship, the expediency of resorting to the decision of an impartial tribunal as being the civilized and effective means par excellence of settling their disputes.

It is well known that those pending between the United States and the Republic of Colombia substantially grow out of the diverse interpretation put by each country upon certain stipulations of the treaty signed by their representatives in 1846. According to the Colombian Government's judgment—which seems also to prevail in the public opinion of the United States if the statements of the press are to be taken as a criterion—the conduct of the Government of the United States toward Colombia in regard to the separatist movement of Panama in 1903 and the proclamation of the independence of that Colombian department under the name of Republic of Panama, was not that which was clearly dictated by the specific obligations solemnly assumed under that treaty; it shattered, moreover, the invariable tradition of that same Government, it broke away from the doctrine that all its statesmen had proclaimed, and contravened elementary and incontrovertible precepts of the law of nations.

To establish the gravity of these facts and the anomaly of the situation they create, it suffices to observe that now, while the Treaty of 1846—observed by Colombia with indisputable fidelity, under which the United States in return for most valuable concessions by Colombia (then called New Granada) assumed the obligation to guarantee to her "the rights of sovereignty and property which she has and possesses over the territory of the Isthmus of Panama"—is still in full force and is the law of both nations, the United States is seen to guarantee, by a subsequent treaty which they consider to be also in force, the independence of another nation which on the sole strength of that guaranty holds in its power that same territory, the so-called Republic of Panama.

It would indeed be impossible even to conjecture what considerations could have led the United States to create this situation but for the remaining explanation that the United States practically put upon the existing treaty with Colombia in that emergency an interpretation in absolute conflict not only with that which Colombia holds to be the faithful and correct one and which it has placed upon it to this day, but also with that adopted by the United States until 1903.

It is a thoroughly well-known doctrine that if there are international disputes especially suitable for arbitration they are those arising from disagreement in the interpretation of public treaties: an aphorism which an ex-President of the United States expresses as follows in a recent publication: "In general the interpretation of a treaty is preeminently a matter for arbitration when the contracting parties disagree about its true meaning. Ordinarily this interpretation is a judicial act of the class especially adapted for submission to an arbitral tribunal." (Theodore Roosevelt: "A Proper Case for Arbitration." The Outlook, October 14, 1911.)

It is equally well known that the nations which were represented at the Second Conference of The Hague, in which the United States took so active a part, promptly proclaimed and made a solemn and permanent record of that doctrine when the contracting parties declared in article 38 of the Convention for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes that: "in questions of a legal nature, and especially in the interpretation or applications of international conventions, they recognize arbitration as the most effective and at the same time the most equitable means of settling disputes which diplomacy has failed to settle."

Although it cannot be denied that in the case of Colombia's claim there is no occasion to exert extraordinary efforts or resort to special circumstances in order to reach the conclusion that the case in hand is one of the ordinary cases which, because of their nature, are most proper subjects for the decision of an arbitral court, I cannot resist the desire of citing here as one of the many grounds upon which Colombia founds her hope of a fully equitable hearing on this occasion the following admirable remarks made by the present President of the United States to the American Peace and Arbitration League: "I find in our arbitration treaties some exceptions as to submitting questions of honor to arbitration. Personally I see no reason why such questions should not be referred to arbitral courts just as those relative to public or private property." Later and on a no less solemn occasion the same President said: "If we now should succeed in concluding with some great nation an express convention for the submission to an international tribunal of arbitration of any controversy that we could not settle by means of a negotiation, no matter whether it involved questions of honor, territory or money, we should take a long step toward demonstrating that it is possible at least for two nations to establish as between themselves the same system of legal procedure which exists between individuals under the jurisdiction of the same government." (Speech of President Taft before the American Association for International Arbitration.)

It may not be out of place to observe here that if this initiative which has already led to the signing of treaties of that scope with two of the most powerful European nations and has won for their author the applause of the world is meritorious and praiseworthy to a degree where powers of the first order are concerned, it cannot but be much more so, and in part of more importance and value to the example of magnanimity and rectitude thereby given, when the same hand is extended to a poor and real American Republic which in long years of friendship with the United States always acted with unquestionable loyalty and unhesitatingly complied, at times even at the cost of great sacrifices, with the obligations it assumed when it signed, sixty-five years ago, the treaty whose interpretation has given rise to the present controversy.

Colombia in this case has nothing but her right to bring forward in her behalf. But her people and her Government believe that to a Government that has taken that initiative and by that example has given evidence of its good faith that right is all the more entitled to consideration and respect as the claimant thereunder is forlorn; and the people and Government of Colombia feel assured that the people of the United States will never fail to emulate their Government when it becomes a question of turning into acts of uprightness and justice the spirit of Christian civilization to which it owes its highest con-

In conclusion I beg leave to condense this note in these few words: All that the Government of Colombia asks is that, all efforts toward arriving at a satisfactory solution of the controversy pending with the United States by means of direction negotiations having failed, the Government of this country will assent to its being decided by an impartial tribunal of arbitration.

The American Minister to the Secretary of State.

American Legation, Bogotá, February 5, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to enclose herewith a brief statement concerning the preliminary conversation about the suggestions which I was instructed to present to the Colombian Government for the purpose of securing if possible, an adjustment of the differences between the two countries. As I notified the Department by cable, the Colombian Government firmly refused to agree to the completion of the Tripartite Treaties, and after the second preliminary conference the Foreign Office informally notified me that the Atrato concession, the perpetual lease of the islands, and the arbitration suggestions were not acceptable to the Colombian Government. Believing that the objection to the arbitration suggestion might be overcome, I cabled the Department asking that the suggestion concerning the Atrato concession and the perpetual lease of the islands of San Andreas and Providencia might be changed into a suggestion for an option on the Atrato route and a privilege for coaling stations on the islands. The Department's answer to that cable was of such a character that I felt free to have a preliminary conversation along the lines suggested, always bearing in mind that a long time option must be granted if the sum of $10,000,000 were to be paid.

As the original suggestion of a "concession" for a canal on the Atrato route, and a "perpetual lease" of the islands of San Andreas and Providencia could not be considered by the Colombian Government I have eliminated those suggestions from the inclosed report and substituted the modified suggestions that are now under informal consideration. It will be noted that in my explanation of time limit of the option, I have used the term "seventy five years" simply as an argument to show to the Colombian Government what the revenue from such a large sum means when the interest on the sum is taken into consideration, and not that a seventy five years' option would be acceptable. The explanation of the "advantages" which would come to Colombia, should she propose the ideas embodied in this statement for our consideration, has been necessary in order to assist those directly interested to grasp the great value of the generous position taken by the United States Government in its desired adjustment of the pending differences.

What the outcome of these conferences will be is still uncertain. Beyond the peradventure of a doubt word has reached headquarters here from the United States that the Democratic administration "should have the prestige" of a settlement between the two countries and will make a much more generous arrangement than the present administration can possibly offer. I have tried to impress upon those in authority here that the policy of the Department on general principles is unaffected by a change of administration, that it always remains true to the broadest lines of treatment of all nations, and that, while I have no authority to speak for the incoming administration, still it is difficult to conceive of any plan it could adopt that would be more just and honorable and generous than the one now under consideration, and which, at the same time, would meet with the approval of the American people. Whatever happens the Department of State has now suggested a settlement which for liberality, practicability and deference to the susceptibilities of the Colombian people, must challenge the admiration and sympathy of all right thinking persons no matter what their nationality may be. hope that the Colombian authorities may find it possible to arrange a settlement on the lines now proposed, and I suggest that if the Department deems it proper the statement herewith inclosed might be published, provided Colombia refuses to treat along these lines; notice of such refusal would of course be cabled to the Department as soon as it is known here. It would prove to the world that the United States has made a sincere and honest endeavor along broad and generous lines to render every possible justice to the Republic of Colombia whose ancient friendship our country would rejoice to see renewed.

I am inclosing a statement which I may, if in the end I deem wise, present to the Foreign Office as purely an informal explanation of the advantages to Colombia contained in the suggestions.

I wish respectfully to call the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that the mention of the "option" and the "privilege" contained in the enclosed statements are simply and purely informal suggestions not to be seriously considered until I have the approval of the Department.

Statement of the American Minister regarding the preliminary conversations with the President and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Colombia looking to an adjustment of the differences between the United States and Colombia.

While the United States has for years earnestly desired to put an end to the ill-feeling of Colombia arising out of the loss of Panama, it has always been met on the part of Colombia by a demand for arbitration, but as the United States is unalterably opposed to submitting its political acts to the consideration of arbitral tribunals it has never been able to reach a settlement. On the 20th day of October, 1912, Minister Du Bois, while on a leave of absence, submitted to the Department of State a report which contained the welcomed information that Colombia was ready to enter into direct negotiations for the adjustment of her differences with this country. The Department of State promptly considered the new situation and feeling that the friendly relations established by Minister Du Bois with the Government and people of Colombia had created a good atmosphere in which to discuss an arrangement, he was instructed to proceed to Bogota and take up the question with the Colombian authorities. He was instructed to hold preliminary conferences upon five distinct suggestions.

The first was the completion of the Root-Cortes and the Cortes-Arosemena Both these treaties had already been ratified by the Treaties by Colombia.

United States Senate.

The second, an option to construct a canal over the Atrato route and the privilege of coaling stations on the Islands of San Andreas and Providencia, for which the United States would pay ten millions of dollars.

The third, the United States would offer its good offices to settle the boundary line and other disputes between Colombia and Panamá.

The fourth, the arbitration by a tribunal to be constituted for that purpose of the material claims of Colombia respecting the reversionary rights in the Panamá Railroad.

The fifth, a supplementary canal treaty, amendatory of the Root-Cortes treaty, removing all the features which were objectionable to Colombia in the Root-Cortés Treaty, asking of Colombia only the right of refuge for vessels in distress, which is an international right, and giving to Colombia extraordinary preferential rights on the Panama Canal.

Minister Du Bois was instructed not to enter into actual negotiations until the Colombian authorities had approved of the foregoing suggestions and the Department had been notified and had instructed him to proceed with the nego tiations.

Minister Du Bois arrived in Bogota on January 15, 1913, and was received by the Government and people with kindness and marked cordiality. Two days afterwards he called on Minister Carreño, Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs, accompanied by Mr. Leland Harrison, the Secretary of the Legation. After being kindly received by the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Du Bois expressed a wish to pay his respects to President Restrepo. On the 20th of January the carriage of the President of the Republic called at the American Legation and together with Minister Carreño, Secretary Harrison and Mr. Montejo, the American Minister went to the palace, where he was most cordially received by the President.

Minister Du Bois informed the President that if Colombia were inclined to enter upon direct negotiations with the United States for a settlement of her differences, he was empowered to take preliminary steps to that end. The President said that Colombia desired an honorable and just arrangement with the United States and was ready to consider the important question. The American Minister, in as informal and discreet a manner as possible, asked the President if Colombia had yet reached that point where she would be willing to complete the tripartite treaties. Without the least hesitation and with firmness the President said, "Those treaties could not be ratified by the Colombian Congress, and I cannot and will not recommend their completion." He thoughtfully added, "The recognition of Panama by Colombia, however, may follow an honorable treaty with the United States as a natural consequence."

A conference with Minister Carreño was then arranged to take place at the Foreign Office five days later, the 25th of January, for a preliminary consideration of the subject. In the meantime Mr. Du Bois notified the Department of the attitude of the Colombian Government toward the tripartite treaties and was instructed to proceed with the remaining four suggestions.

The first was that the United States would pay to Colombia $10,000,000 for an option giving the right to build an interoceanic waterway on the Atrato route and for the privilege of establishing coaling stations on the Islands of San Andreas and Providencia.

Minister Du Bois carefully explained the advantages to Colombia of these two suggestions as follows:

If the canal were ever built under this option, Colombia would have an interoceanic waterway within her own undisputed borders and over which her sovereignty would be absolute and inviolable. As the construction of the canal was left equally at the discretions of both nations, if the time should come within the limit of the option when the commerce of the world demanded the opening of this new waterway, a treaty as to the details of construction and operation would have to be negotiated, signed and ratified by both countries before it would be valid. If the canal were not constructed within the time limit of the option, Colombia would have received $10,000,000 which, with 5%interest during the option, say 75 years, would bring to the treasury of Colombia the large total of $47,500,000. Should the canal be built, Colombia would, in addition, be the recipient of an annual rental of a handsome sum as well as the beneficiary of liberal special privileges on the canal during its operation. a canal, if built, would bring both nations into intimate and important relationship, give to Colombia great advantages over all other countries, and afford her a strategic position of inestimable value by connecting her coast lines on either ocean with a great waterway.

In this suggestion, therefore, is much that made for the welfare of Colombia and nothing that could by the widest stretch of the imagination be justly considered as wounding the susceptibilities of the Colombian people.

The privilege of establishing coaling stations on San Andreas and Providencia would if granted and utilized result in important benefits to the Islands, which are situated one hundred and fifty miles off the coast of Nicaragua in the Carribean Sea and nearly five hundred miles from the north coast of Colombia. They are inhabited mostly by foreigners, who are engaged largely in the culti-

By granting to the United States the privilege of coaling stations, the absolute sovereignty of Colombia over the Islands would in no way be affected, while on the other hand the privilege if utilized would benefit commerce, increase the revenue to the Colombian Government and bring life and trade to the Islands. Should $2,000,000 of the $10,000,000 to be paid for the Atrato option and the coaling station privilege, be set aside for the Islands, it would, at 5%, produce an annual revenue for the Colombian Government of $100,000. The present revenue above the cost of administration is about five thousand dollars. As under this suggestion Colombia continues her absolute sovereignty and supervision of the Islands, it is impossible to conceive wherein this arrangement could in any way clash with the susceptibilities or patriotism of the Colombian people.

The "good offices" suggestion means that the United States, moved by a friendly desire to aid Colombia to settle at an early date the troublesome boundary question on its northwestern frontier, and other questions resulting from circumstances out of which the boundary dispute arose, and comprehending the peculiar difficulties which confront the Colombian Government in dealing with these questions, would, if Colombia so desired and requested, use its good offices in settling all differences between Colombia and Panama. treaty were made between the United States and Colombia, the former would take a sincere interest in the prosperity and development of the latter, which borders on both oceans and is contiguous to the canal country.

Notwithstanding the fact that the United States The reversionary rights. believes the reversionary rights of the Panama Railroad vested in the GovernCOLOMBIA. 291

ment of Panama at the time of its separation from Colombia, and has paid Panama liberally for those rights, still in its oft-manifested desire to settle its differences with the Republic of Colombia, the United States, mindful of the justiciable character of this difference of view, is willing to submit this question to an arbitral tribunal constituted for that purpose and under a convention which must clearly specify the points to be considered.

As Colombia for nine years has demanded arbitration, and as the United States, in harmony with the attitude of all the great powers, cannot permit the arbitration of a political act, it has decided, owing to its wish to secure a just and friendly arrangement with Colombia, to arbitrate the material claims of that country relating to the reversionary rights in the Panamá Railroad. Under the circumstances, these are the only claims that can be admitted to arbitration.

This suggestion should meet with the approval of the Colombian people, as there are many persons who believe that the claims of Colombia in this matter are legitimate and justiciable.

Preferential rights on the canal. The principal and most important feature of the proposed arrangement was the completion by Colombia of the tripartite treaties and of the accomplishment of this the Government of the United States was greatly in hopes. But as the Colombian authorities positively refused to accede to this suggestion, Minister Du Bois was authorized by cable to withdraw it and suggest an amendatory treaty that would remove all of the features which were objectionable to Colombia in the Root-Cortés Treaty. By this amendatory treaty Colombia was asked simply to grant the right of refuge for ships in distress, which all civilized nations permit, and was to receive all the preferential rights on the canal granted by the Root-Cortés

The peculiar position of Colombia with her extensive coast line on either ocean would make such special privileges far more valuable to her than they could be to any other Latin-American Republic. By the amended treaty Colombia would have great advantage over all other countries in both peace and war. In peace the products of her industry and soil would be admitted to the Canal Zone subject to only such duties as are paid by similar goods from the United States; her mails would have the same privilege as those of the United States at Cristóbal and Ancón, and her troops, materials of war and ships of war would have at all times special privileges on the canal. In the future development of Colombia these advantages would be of more value than it is possible to estimate at present. Colombia has five hundred thousand square miles of territory of all climates and all soils where may be produced every product known to or required by the human race. To develop these wonderful resources Colombia must obtain increased transportation facilities on a large scale and the Canal would be for all time the most important and useful of these facilities.

Memorandum which the American Minister may present to the Colombian Government.

The Government and the people of the United States honestly regret anything should have ever occurred to mar, in any way, the long and sincere friendship that existed for nearly a century between Colombia and the United States, and the latter country has for years earnestly desired to remove the ill feeling aroused in Colombia by the separation of Panamá. In all former efforts for a settlement Colombia has urged the arbitration of the political act of the United States in this matter, but the United States following in the footsteps of the older nations of the earth, has refused to submit its political acts to the consideration of any arbitral tribunal, no matter what was the character of the political transaction. It was not until the Minister of the United States at Bogotá, Mr. Du Bois, submitted his report to the Department of State, dated September 30, 1912, informing it that Colombia had reached a point where the Government saw its way clear to directly negotiate a settlement of their differences with the United States on just and honorable terms, that it found itself in position to act and with commendable promptness it considered the matter. Believing that the friendly relations of Minister Du Bois with the Government and the people of Colombia had created a favorable atmosphere in which to discuss an adjustment, the Minister was instructed to return to Bogota and take steps looking to a satisfactory settlement.

The Minister was instructed to present informally five propositions for the consideration of the Colombian Government.

They were as follows:

First. The completion of the tripartite treaties by Colombia.

Second. The payment of ten millions of dollars to Colombia for an option to construct an interoceanic waterway in the Atrato route and for privilege of coaling stations on the islands of San Andreas or Providencia.

Third. The good offices of the United States in the settlement of all disputes between Colombia and Panamá.

Fourth. The arbitration of the claims of Colombia to reversionary rights in the Panama Railroad.

Fifth. The granting of extraordinary preferential rights to Colombia in the Panama Canal.

The Government of Colombia promptly rejected the proposal to complete the Root-Cortés and the Cortés-Arosemena treaties, and the United States, deeply desirous of securing a friendly settlement, promptly withdrew this proposition although it earnestly desired the conclusion of these treaties by Colombia.

The second suggestion, that of an option for the construction of an interoceanic waterway on the Atrato route and the privilege of coaling stations on the islands of San Andreas and Providencia would result in the following advantages to Colombia. If the canal were ever built, Colombia would have a great interoceanic waterway within her own borders over which her sovereignty As the question of the actual construction of the would remain undisturbed. canal is left equally at the discretion of both nations, the United States would have to negotiate a treaty with Colombia if the increased commerce of the world demanded the opening of the canal within, say, seventy-five years, and at that time Colombia would have the right to dictate the terms upon which the canal should be constructed, such as administration of zone, rent, preferential If at the end of the option term the canal were not constructed, Colombia would have had the use of ten millions of dollars for, say, seventyfive years, which at 5% interest during that period would have, together with the principal, amounted to $47,500,000. Besides, Colombia would be sure of a perpetual revenue from the ten millions alone of $500,000 annually. If the canal were built, Colombia would not only have had the ten millions but from the day of the actual operation of the waterway she would commence to receive a rental amounting to a sum to be agreed upon by the two nations, which might be quite as large or larger than that paid for the Panama Canal. Such an interoceanic waterway would bring the two countries into close and valuable relationship, giving to Colombia extraordinary advantages over all other nations of the world and the prestige that would come to Colombia, if this canal were ever opened to the commerce of the nations under these conditions, would be of inestimable advantage to the Republic, which possesses extensive coast lines on both oceans with excellent harbors. In this second suggestion everything is favorable to Colombia and there is nothing which in the widest stretch of the imagination could wound the pride or susceptibilities of the Colombian people.

The privilege for coaling stations on San Andreas and Providencia would have this advantage to Colombia: that if there were set aside $2,000,000 of the $10,-000,000 for this privilege, this sum at 5% per annum would produce an annual revenue for the Colombian Treasury of $100,000, while the net revenue from the islands to-day is not more than five thousand dollars. The granting to the United States by Colombia of the privilege to maintain coaling stations on the islands would not in any way affect the sovereignty over or the superintendency of the islands by the Colombian Government, while on the other hand if the privilege were ever utilized it would enhance the value of the islands and increase the Colombian revenues by bringing a larger amount of business to their shores, as well as more life and people, and all the inhabitants would be the beneficiaries As Colombian sovereignty would remain absolute and of the new activity. inviolate over the islands there would be nothing in this arrangement that should in any way wound the feelings of any reasonable and thoughtful citizen of the Republic, and, besides, this arrangement would be another link to draw the two nations closer together in friendship, in trade and in com-

The third proposition was that of exercising the good offices of the United States to settle the disputes of Colombia with Panama, and incidentally with other countries if so desired. This means that the United States, moved by a cordial desire to aid Colombia to adjust at an early date the troublesome boundary and other questions in dispute between Panama and the Republic of Colombia, and comprehending the peculiar difficulties which confront the Colombian nation in dealing with these questions, would, if Colombia desired, act in its behalf to bring about an adjustment and thus minimize and possibly avoid direct negotiations with a state whose independence she denies. are many other disputes in which the United States would use its good offices, if requested by Colombia, but could not and would not use these good offices except at the request of Colombia and then only in the interest of harmony and justice. If a treaty were concluded between Colombia and the United States the latter would have an increased friendly interest in the former, whose territory lies next to the great waterway soon to be opened and is washed by the tides of the two great oceans which it connects. It would naturally desire to see Colombia develop and prosper and that peace should reign throughout her wide-reaching confines, and all disputes with adjacent countries adjusted upon lines of justice, equity and right.

Reversionary rights in the Panamá Railroad. Notwithstanding the fact that the United States believes that these reversionary rights vested in Panamá at the time of the separation, and notwithstanding that the United States has already compensated Panamá for these rights, still, with a sincere desire to renew the ancient friendship which it deeply regrets has ever been disturbed, the United States is willing to arbitrate the question with Colombia, who claims that she is the lawful owner of the reversionary rights in the Panamá Railroad.

Colombia, ever since the separation of Panama, has earnestly demanded the arbitration of the whole question before The Hague Tribunal; but as the United States, in harmony with the attitude of all the great powers, is unalterably opposed to the arbitration of any of its political acts, it has been impossible to comply with Colombia's demands. The Government of the United States, however, mindful of the justiciable character of the difference of views concerning the material claims of Colombia, is willing to submit these claims to an arbitral tribunal constituted for that purpose and under a convention that must clearly specify the points to be considered. This decision should meet with the warm approval of the Government and the people of Colombia, especially as the rights of Colombia in the Panama railway are considered by many as a perfectly legitimate and justiciable claim. Under the contract of 1867 Colombia ceded the trans-isthmian railway to the Panama Railroad for a period of 99 years, at a royalty of $250,000 a year; when the payments ceased at the time of the separation the contract had 64 years to run. This left 64 payments or a total of $16,000,000 to complete the contract. This claim might by mutual consent be submitted for arbitration. As Senator Bristow officially reported in 1906 that the value of the Panama railway was $16,446,000, the total amount that might be submitted for arbitration would be $32,446,000. sum there is the amount of the Salgar Wyse concession which was to expire in 1984, and for which the Colombian Government was to receive $250,000 per annum from the opening of the canal. Should the canal open next year this would make 70 payments that would have been due Colombia or $17,500,000. Should the arbitral tribunal consider this claim the total amount under arbitration would be $49,946,000.

This sum, which is possible, together with the $10,000,000 for the option and privilege on the Atrato and islands, which is certain, and the interest on this sum during the life of the option, say 75 years, of $37,500,000 make a total amount under consideration of $97,446,000. Of this sum Colombia is certain of $47,500,000 for the, say, 75 years option, and would probably be awarded the value of the railroad, say $16,446,000, and might receive awards in the other two claims amounting to $33,500,000 if they were admitted to the tribunal.

Preferential Rights.—The fifth suggestion considered in the preliminary conference was the preferential rights of Colombia in the Panama canal which was unquestionably the most important feature under contemplation. As Colombia positively refused to complete the tripartite treaties, and as the United States earnestly desired to remove the Colombian grievances, it withdrew that suggestion and proposed an amendatory treaty to the Root-Cortés Convention that does away with all features that were unacceptable to Colombia, leaving in the treaty only the right of refuge, which is an international right, and the special right on the canal which gives to Colombia extraordinary advantage over all other countries. The peculiar position of Colombia with extensive coast lines on each ocean makes such privileges far more valuable to her than they would be to any other country in South America. By the amended treaty Colombia will have not only superior advantages in times of peace, when she may enter all of the products of her soil and industries into the canal zone free, but in times of war her troops, materials of war and ships of war together with her agents and employees may pass freely through the canal and in addition her mails have special privileges at Cristóbal and Ancón. In the future development of Colombia these privileges will increase in importance and value. Colombia is a country containing 500,000 square miles of territory of all kinds of climates and soils in which may be produced every product and mineral known to or required by the human race. To develop these wonderful resources Colombia needs increased transportation facilities on a large scale and the canal would prove to be the most valuable of all these advantages.

Note.—On February 15, 1913, the American Minister informally presented the above-printed memorandum (inclosure 2 with his despatch of February 5) to the Colombian Government, and notified the Department thereof, by telegraph.

The American Minister to the Secretary of State.

No. 141.]

American Legation, Bogotá, February 28, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to enclose herewith clippings from the El Nuevo Tiempo of the 27th ultimo, consisting of the Spanish translation of the memorandum transmitted with my despatch No. 135 of February 5th, and of the minutes of my last conversation with Dr. Urrutia, together with an English translation thereof.

I also beg to enclose clippings from local newspapers commenting upon the informal suggestions submitted to the consideration of this

Government

The Department will note that while several newspapers deliberately misunderstand or mistake the bases offered by me, all endorse the action of the Government in refusing to accept any proposals which would affect the sovereignty of Colombia over any part of her territory.

I have [etc.]

James T. Du Bois.

[Inclosure—Translation.]

Minutes of the conference between the Minister for Foreign Affairs and the American Minister.

On February 15, 1913, there took place a conference at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs between Dr. Francisco José Urrutia, Minister for Foreign Affairs, and Mr. Leopoldo Montejo, Secretary ad hoc, on the one hand, and Mr. James T. Du Bois, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, and the Secretary of the Legation, Mr. Leland Harrison.

Mr. Du Bois expressed his desire that the conference should be considered informal, to which Dr. Urrutia replied that as Mr. Du Bois so desired it should be as he requested but that he wished to point out that this informal character would detract somewhat from the importance of Mr. Du Bois' propositions and from this conference.

Thereupon the American Minister reviewed the course of the present conversations looking to an arrangement acceptable to Colombia for the settlement of the differences pending between the two countries.

Mr. Du Bois concluded by saying that he had received a memorandum which Mr. Carreño had sent him by the Secretary ad hoc, Mr. Montejo, in which the Minister in charge of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, informed him, much to his regret, that the Government of Colombia did not consider acceptable the propositions submitted by the American Minister in the name of his Government.

Mr. Du Bois asked Mr. Urrutia if he had read his last memorandum, to which the Minister for Foreign Affairs replied in the affirmative, whereupon the American Minister asked Mr. Urrutia his opinion, and the latter replied that he was in complete accord with his predecessor and that this was also the opinion of the President of the Republic. Moreover Mr. Urrutia remarked that the acceptance of such bases as those suggested by Mr. Du Bois would result in an intense agitation throughout the people of Colombia.

The American Minister asked the Minister for Foreign Affairs to state the wishes of the Colombian Government in the matter, to which Mr. Urrutia replied that the desire of Colombia was to submit the questions pending between Colombia and the United States to arbitration and that the last note on this subject addressed by Mr. Ospina, the Colombian Minister at Washington, to the Department of State on November 25, 1911, was conceived in this sense. To this note Mr. Urrutia again called the attention of Mr. Du Bois. Notwithstanding this, however, if the Government of the United States was disposed to give Colombia satisfactory reparation for what had taken place, Colombia had no objection to consider it and was prepared to enter into some direct arrangement which would satisfy the national aspirations evinced on more than one occasion. Mr. Du Bois replied that this was exactly the purpose of his Government in sending him back to Colombia and with this in view he had presented the memorandum which contained the proposal. Mr. Urrutia answered as he had before, that is to say, that the Government of Colombia was not in a position to consider the proposal, because it did not think that it contained the just reparation which Colombia should receive for the immense damage suffered by reason of the separation of Panamá, neither did it consider that this proposal, if formulated into an agreement, would be approved by the Colombian Congress.

Mr. Du Bois pointed out that the Government of the United States could not submit to arbitration the question of the separation of Panama, considered in its political aspect, although it was prepared to arbitrate the material side of the question, as the people of the United Sates would never agree to submit its political acts to arbitration, which had never been done so far by any country in the world. Mr. Urrutia replied that at the bottom of the differences between Colombia and the United States was the question of the violation of a public treaty: that of 1846; that it was precisely to questions regarding the application and interpretation of treaties to which the Hague Convention referred relative to the pacific settlement of international questions; that the actual President of the United States had proposed and taken the initiative in the sense that arbitration should be extended even to include questions concerning national honor and territory; that the present controversy between England and the United States, for which arbitration was demanded by many illustrious North American jurists, referred precisely to the interpretation of a clause of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty. Mr. Du Bois carefully pointed out to his excellency the Minister that this example was precisely to the point, in that the arbitration proposed referred to a purely material claim, i. e. as to the amount of tolls to be paid by certain shipping passing through the Canal, and in no way comprised the arbitration of any political act whatsoever. Mr. Urrutia stated that he respected the opinion of Mr. Du Bois in this regard but that he could not agree with him; that the discussion of the application or violation of a public treaty, such as the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, fundamentally involved always a question of international policy, and he remarked in conclusion that if the American Minister found obstacles in the sentiments of the American people to submitting to arbitration the political questions relative to the separation of Panama, he, as Minister for Foreign Affairs of Colombia, could state that the public sentiment of the Colombian people would always refuse any arrangement whatsoever which, without being a just reparation to Colombia, might involve a diminution of sovereignty, a privilege or an unacceptable concession over any part of the national territory, such as were contained in Mr. Du Bois' proposals relative to the islands of San Andrés and Providencia and the Atrato canal.

Mr. Dubois said that in his opinion the proposition in its amended form did not contain any diminution of sovereignty. Mr. Urrutia replied that he abstained at the present time from deep discussion of this point and that he contented himself with assuring Mr. Du Bois that the Government considered any such stipulation as prejudicial to the national welfare ("inconveniente para los intereses nacionales").

Thereupon Mr. Du Bois asked the Minister for Foreign Affairs whether he thought that if the United States should offer $10,000,000 without asking any privilege on the islands or the option to build the Atrato canal but bearing in the other propositions, would the Colombian Government accept this offer. The Minister for Foreign Affairs answered, No; that the proposal in its entirety was refused by the Government, as not being of such a nature as could be accepted by Colombia.

Mr. Du Bois expressed his deep regret that the Government of Colombia refused to enter into negotiations on the proposed bases, and that it should insist upon an impossible arbitration. In his opinion the Government of Colombia was losing a propitious opportunity to settle the pending questions with the United States, an arrangement which he ventured to believe, as a good friend of Colombia to be most necessary before the opening of the Panama Canal. American Minister also regretted that the Government of Colombia did not see its way clear to completing an arrangement on the basis suggested before the 4th of March next, an arrangement which might be amended further to the advantage of Colombia after that date, but which if now refused by Colombia might never again be proposed by the United States in so favorable a form.

Mr. Du Böjs endeavored to obtain an expression of opinion from his excellency the Minister as to the bases which might be acceptable to Colombia. Urrutia replied that his Government, as he had already stated, demanded the arbitration of the whole Panama question, or a direct proposition from the United States to compensate Colombia for all of the moral and material damages sustained by her because of the separation of Panama. The American Minister inquired if that were the last word of Colombia, to which the Minister for Foreign Affairs answered, Yes.

Mr. Urrutia assured Mr. Du Bois of his deep regret that he was unable to enter upon any negotiations on these bases, and that he regretted it all the more as Mr. Du Bois was held in the highest estimation by the Government of Colombia.

The American Minister asked Mr. Urrutia if he thought that there was any objection to the publication by the press of the propositions suggested by him in the name of his Government, to which the latter replied that he would consult with the President of the Republic, but in the event of the proposal being published it would be necessary to make public the minutes of this conference.

Mr. Du Bois inquired of Mr. Urrutia if he considered that the refusal to accept the proposal terminated the negotiations initiated by him.

answered, Yes.

Mr. Du Bois thereupon informed the Minister that he withdrew his proposal from further discussion, and notified the Government of Colombia to consider them as never having been made.

H. R. Doc. No. 1444. 62d Cong., 3d sess.

Message from the President to Congress, transmitting a report by the Secretary of State on the subject of relations between the United States and the Republic of Colombia.

[Read March 1, 1913. Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.]

To the Senate and the House of Representatives: .

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress a report 1 made to me on February 20, 1913, by the Secretary of State, on the subject of relations between the United States and the Republic of Colombia.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, Washington, March 1, 1913.

The President:

In the report which I had the honor to submit to you on May 17, 1912, and which was transmitted in your message of May 22, 1912, to the Senate in response to the Senate's resolution of March 1, 1912, requesting the transmission of correspondence with the Government of Colombia, I stated that the possibility of finding any reasonable means to put an end to the remaining ill feeling between the Republic of Colombia and the United States had, by your direction, long been the subject of study by the Department. That study having culminated in the program approved by your letter of November 30, 1912, I deem it my duty now to report upon the outcome of the efforts which the Department had made to carry out that program and thereby to replace the relations of the two countries in a state of cordial friendship and mutual confidence. That program was the result of the exhaustive study and earnest endeavors which, by your direction, had engaged the attention of the Department from the beginning of the administration, in accordance with your conviction and that of the Department that, so far as consistent with the dignity and honor of the United States and with the principles of justice when applied to the true facts, no effort should be spared in seeking to restore American-Colombian relations to a footing of completely friendly

Before discussing the generous advances of this Government, which I regret have been, I think, so mistakenly rebuffed by the Government at Bogota, it will be convenient by way of recapitulation to sketch, in a measure, the antecedents of the recent attempts of the Department to reach the hoped-for adjustment. Inasmuch, however, as the present report is not submitted with a view to its transmission to the Congress, nor intended as a complete survey of the very extensive and complex historical background of this subject, I shall endeavor to confine it within reasonable limits, which would not be possible if the vast amount of material on the subject now on file in the Department were to be included or exhaustively summarized.

The necessity for some brief review of what had preceded is enhanced by the fact that the subject of arbitration, now again urged by Colombia, is intimately associated with political problems affecting the status of Panama, and the efforts of the Government of the United States to bring about an adjustment of concatenated questions in which, as a party directly interested because of its rights in regard to the Panama Canal, this Government is the more deeply concerned.

It seems obvious that, even assuming that any tangible issue for arbitration between the United States and Colombia could be made out, evidently no terms of arbitral submission could be entertained which might call in question the right of Panama to exist as a sovereign State.

At this point it should be recalled that Colombian proposals of arbitration, inadmissible for this and other reasons, have twice been rejected by this Government after full consideration by two former Secretaries of State, Mr. Hay and Mr. Root.

Mr. Hay, writing to General Reyes on January 5, 1904, said:

Entertaining these feelings, the Government of the United States would gladly exercise its good offices with the Republic of Panama, with a view to bringing about some arrangement on a fair and equitable basis. For the acceptance of your proposal of a resort to The Hague Tribunal this Government perceives no occasion. Indeed, the questions presented in your "statement of grievances" are of a political nature such as nations of even the most advanced ideas as to international arbitration have not proposed to deal with by that process. Questions of foreign policy and of the recognition or nonrecognition of foreign States are of a purely political nature and do not fall within the domain of judicial decision; and upon these questions this Government has in the present paper defined its position.

Mr. Root, writing to a succeeding Colombian minister on February 10, 1906, said:

The real gravamen of your complaint is this espousal of the cause of Panama by the people of the United States. No arbitration could deal with the real rights and wrongs of the parties concerned unless it were to pass upon the question whether the cause thus espoused was just—whether the people of Panama were exercising their just rights in declaring and maintaining their independence of Colombian rule.

We assert and maintain the affirmative upon that question. We assert that the ancient State of Panama, independent in its origin and by nature and history a separate political community, was confederated with the other States of Colombia upon terms which preserved and continued its separate sovereignty; that it never surrendered that sovereignty; that in the year 1885 the compact which bound it to the other States of Colombia was broken and terminated by Colombia, and the Isthmus was subjugated by force; that it was held under foreign domination to which it had never consented; and that is was justly entitled to assert its sovereignty and demand its independence from a rule which was unlawful, oppressive, and tyrannical. We can not ask the people of Panama to consent that this right of theirs, which is vital to their political existence, shall be submitted to the decision of any arbitrator. Nor are we willing to permit any arbitrator to determine the political policy of the United States in following its sense of right and justice by espousing the cause of this weak people against the stronger Government of Colombia, which had so long held them in unlawful subjection.

There is one other subject contained in your note which I can not permit to pass without notice. You repeat the charge that the Government of the United States took a collusive part in fomenting or inciting the uprising upon the Isthmus of Panama which ultimately resulted in the revolution. I regret that you should see fit to thus renew an aspersion upon the honor and good faith of the United States in the face of the positive and final denial of the fact contained in Mr. Hay's letter of January 5, 1904. You must be well aware that the universally recognized limitations upon the subjects proper for arbitration forbid that the United States should submit such a question to arbitration. In view of your own recognition of this established limitation, I have been unable to discover any justification for the renewal of this unfounded

It is important to note also that the Government of Colombia has never to this day presented anything even approaching a question justiciable by arbitration, it being a universally recognized principle that neither indefinite nor purely political matters are of a nature to be arbitrated.

It is perhaps useful to advert somewhat more to the background of previous events. On January 22, 1903, was signed at Washington the treaty between the United States and Colombia, known as the Hay-Herran treaty, for the construction of an interoceanic canal by the United States. This treaty, although essentially conforming to the proposals of Colombia, besides being eminently just and even generous, was enthusiastically welcomed by its direct beneficiaries, the people of the Panaman Isthmus. In Bogota it was coldly received. At the first signs of opposition in the Colombian Congress discontent and resentment were manifested in Panama. As the possibility of the treaty's being rejected at Bogota grew to a probability, the idea of regaining their historical autonomy awakened and became strong in the minds of Panamans. The contingency of secession was openly discussed and advocated. Months before the event the representatives of Panama in the Congress at Bogota raised their voices in unheeded warning. The certainty, which soon became evident, that the canal treaty would be rejected proved their warning true. The bloodless revolution of November 3, 1903, followed, with instant success. Within 48 hours from the proclamation of Panaman independence the last vestige of Colombian authority on the Isthmus had disappeared and the people of Panama, through the unanimous vote of their municipalities, had ratified the Republic.

Imbued with the inherited spirit of territorial nationality and the recollection of their ancient geographical entity, the keen interest of the Panaman people in the establishment of interoceanic transit through their territory is readily comprehensible and it is no cause for surprise that they were impatient of the obstacles set by the Government at Bogota, through its rejection of the Hay-Herran treaty, in the way of the accomplishment of the stupendous work of the The feelings of the people of Panama were early shown through the declaration made by their representative in the Colombian Congress and echoed by other farsighted members, that a failure to ratify the canal treaty would be followed immediately by a separatist revolution. It was a matter of common notoriety in the city of Bogota that such an outcome of the rejection of the treaty was inevitable. Although amply forewarned, the authorities at Bogota appear to have courted the impending result. The Colombian President contributed to bring it about by his amazing departure from the practice of nations in failing even to recommend for approval a treaty signed under the explicit direction of its President on behalf of the sovereign State by its empowered agent. In the light of the manifested spirit of the people of Panama, it is evidently quite superfluous to allege that this revolutionary sentiment was fomented by persons in the United States. Outside pressure, even by interested private parties, would seem to have been a work of supererogation, even if its existence were a fact. The separation became a patent certainty from the moment the Colombian Executive and Congress foredoomed the treaty to failure.

The Government of the United States, being satisfied that a de facto government, republican in form and without substantial opposition from its own people, had been there established, extended its recognition to the new Republic of Panama on November 6, 1903. From almost the very day in November, 1903, that Panama regained the attribute of self-government which that State had possessed without question from the time of emancipation from Spanish domination to the time of its incorporation by conquest into the centralized Government of Colombia, the Government of the United States bent its earnest efforts toward effecting a just and practical settlement to which Panama, equally with the United States and Colombia, should be a party.

The earlier representations of the Colombian Government, after the recognition of the Republic of Panama and the conclusion of the canal treaty, did not urge arbitration, except by way of alternative submission of pending questions to an impartial court should a diplomatic arrangement not be feasible. These representations were made up of complaints and charges against the United States with imputation of violation of treaty and general bad faith. Colombia then insisted upon reparation being made by the Government of the is shown by the correspondence heretofore This United States.

As an element of the proposed negotiation for a conventional settlement a suggestion of arbitration was made which looked to "the settlement of the claims of a material order which either Colombia or Panama by mutual agreement may reasonably bring forward against the other as a consequence of facts preceding or following the declaration of independence of Panama." This proposition, as formulated, was favored by Secretary Hay, together with the proposal that a plebiscite should determine whether the people of the Isthmus preferred allegiance to the Republic of Panama or to the Republic of Colombia (Mr. Hay to General Reyes, Jan. 13, 1904). Both these proposals were considered in the subsequent negotiations of the tripartite treaties, which aimed to settle all claims "of a material order" between Colombia and Panama and which were, in terms, largely responsive to the Colombian demands in this regard; but the only subject to be submitted to arbitration under the abortive treaty between Colombia and Panama signed by Messrs. Cortés and Arosemena was the boundary line in the long-disputed district of Jurado. No provisions for a Panaman plebiscite appeared therein. Even that proposed alternative of arbitration thus disappeared when the parties to the controversy reached the conventional accord formulated in the tripartite treaties of January 9, 1909.

The negotiations of these treaties with the United States and Panama for the adjustment of all questions between the three parties were proposed by the Government of Colombia itself.

The negotiations stretched over a period of some three years, being interrupted from time to time by fresh demands on the part of Colombia and hampered in their course by what seemed a very inconsistent reversion of the Colombian plenipotentiaries of the time to attempt to create issues any bases for which had in effect been set aside by Colombia's own proposal to settle the material questions involved. On one occasion the obstructive tactics of the Colombian plenipotentiary were virtually disavowed by his recall and the substitution of another more in accord with the policies of his Government.

The issue had thus been early narrowed to the question of compensation for the losses and injuries pleaded by Colombia, and, it being undeniable that Colombia had suffered by failure to reap a share of the benefits of the canal, the Government of the United States was entirely willing to take this consideration into account, and to endeavor to accommodate the conflicting interests of the three parties by the conventional fixation of a just measure of compensation, in money or in material equivalence. Throughout the whole discussion the course of the United States was marked by kindly forbearance and equitable generosity. The result was the signature on January 9, 1909, of three treaties, one between the United States and the Republic of Colombia, one between the United States and the Republic of Panama, and one between Colombia and Panama, all three being interdependent, to stand or fall together. The treaties between the United States and the respective Republics of Colombia and of Panama received the advisory and consenting approval of the Senate on the respective dates of February 24 and March 3, 1909. That between Colombia and Panama was ratified by the Republic of Panama January 27, 1909, while the treaty with the United States was ratified by Panama three days later.

It seems unnecessary for the purposes of this report to narrate the elaborate negotiations which preceded the signature of the "tripartite" treaties. The Senate, in executive session, was apprised of the processes by which the conventional results were reached and the nature of those results is made apparent by the text of the three instruments. That their provisions sought to deal, adequately, justly, and in the only practical manner so far suggested, with the international problems growing out of the secession of Panama and out of the assumption by the United States of the great work of constructing the canal, would appear to be evident to the unprejudiced mind. The interests and honor of the three countries were, throughout the negotiation, jealously guarded by their respective plenipotentiaries, and their agreement on all vital points was a confirmatory safeguard.

Nevertheless, negotiated as these treaties were at the instance of Colombia, and framed as they were with every desire to accommodate their terms to the just expectations of Colombia; and although they were accepted by the Colombian Cabinet, which made repeated efforts to bring about conditions favorable to their approval by the Congress, the treaties still remain unacted upon.

It thus remained for the Colombian Government to hold up the treaties, to propose the nullification of all the negotiations which had led up to their conclusion and which it had invited, and to suggest entrance upon new negotiations with the United States alone. This suggestion the United States then declined to accept, holding that the "tripartite" treaties must stand or fall together and that no such substitutionary arrangement could be considered without the harmonious agreement of all three parties. In the same attitude, the Colombian Government, without seeking the consent of the United States to enter, after these two rebuffs, upon a discussion of an entirely different character, sought to revert to its former proposal of some kind of settlement by arbitration.

The next proposal of Colombia, on January 5, 1910, was that the United States and Panama should agree to submit to a plebiscite the question of the separation of Panama with the promise that the interests of the United States in the Canal Zone should not be affected by the result.² This proposal as made was considered intangible and impracticable, although as late as March 26, 1910, it appears to have been the subject of an informal suggestion of the Colombian Minister, coupled with the promise that if the vote should be unfavorable to the status of Panama the Government of Colombia would formally recognize the acts of Panama in the canal matter.

Again the suggestion of arbitration in somewhat more tangible form appears in the shape of a confidential memorandum, under date of November 30, 1910, expressing the view of Señor Olaya, the Colombian Minister for Foreign Affairs, that, as the provision of article 35 of the Treaty of 1846 in regard to the guaranty by the United States of Colombian sovereignty over the territory of the Isthmus was differently interpreted by the two Governments, the question whether the acts of the United States on the Isthmus in 1903 were not in harmony with the engagements of article 35 appeared to be a judicial issue proper for arbitral determination. This informal suggestion appeared to involve proposals already rejected by Secretaries Hav and It did not, moreover, materialize in a shape admitting of discussion, and was lost to sight when, about the same time, a new turn was given to the matter by the suggestion of the Colombian Foreign Office that, with a few changes ("more apparent than real") the treaties might be approved. No tangible proposal was offered, however, as to the changes desired, although it was intimated in January, 1911, that they might import confirmation of Colombia's claim to the ownership of the Panama Railway and of alleged rights and interests in any canal contract or concession granted by Colombia. This intimation, like others put forward during 1910, never reached the stage of diplomatic discussion.

Still another phase supervened when, on March 28, in view of the statement alleged to have been made by ex-President Roosevelt in an address delivered at Berkeley, California, on March 23, to the effect that "he took the Canal Zone," the Colombian Minister, Señor Borda, construing this reported utterance as an admission that his nation had been "gratuitously, profoundly and unexpectedly offended and injured," demanded that the dignity and honor of Colombia should "receive satisfaction." No diplomatic discussion of this incident ensued.

At the end of May, 1911, Señor Borda took leave of the President, and returned to Colombia, being replaced by General Pedro Nel Ospina, who presented his credentials May 31, 1911.

No record exists of any effort by this new Minister of Colombia to reach an understanding in regard to the Panama controversy or the tripartite treaties until his note of November 25, 1911. In that note he recited, "the utter unliklihood" of a diplomatic settlement of the Panaman issues; characterized the attempt to regulate the situation by the direct agreement embodied in the tripartite treaties of 1909 as "most unfortunate," owing to the adverse sentiment of the Colombian people which had brought about the expatriation of the head of the Government and of the plenipotentiary (Señor Cortés) by whom they were signed; asserted that it had been demonstrated practically that the desired settlement of the existing differences could not be reached by direct agreement, and urged resort to the decision of an impartial tribunal as to the interpretation to be given to that part of the still existing Treaty of 1846, by which the United States, in return for valuable concessions, assumed the obligations to guarantee to New

COLOMBIA. 303

Granada (now Colombia) "the rights of sovereignty and property which she has and possesses over the territory of the Isthmus of Panama."

In conformity with usage, it was to be expected that the envoy would follow up such a communication by seeking personal conference with the Secretary of State to clear the way for formal treatment of a proposal alike so important and so vaguely comprehensive. As a matter of course, and as a part of the public duty of his office, the Secretary of State was and is, at all times, ready to hold such conference with a foreign representative, knowing the advantage to both parties in such a case, of thoroughly understanding each other's views before their expression in official correspondence. Moreover, a just regard for the sensibilities of a nation with which this Government sincerely desires to maintain friendly intercourse naturally made the Secretary of State averse to making a categorical refusal of the proposition, while on the other hand the vagueness of the proposal, like the nature of some of its implications, forbade its academic discussion without a more distinct understanding of its true scope. General Nel Ospina, however, held aloof from the Department of State.

Matters were in this posture when, on the eve of the departure of the Secretary of State on a mission of good will and earnest amity toward the several Republics of the Caribbean, a kindly personal intimation of the pleasure it would afford the Secretary to include Colombia in his itinerary was met by the assertion that such a visit would be "inopportune." Included in this reply to an urbane note were arguments and also accusations tending to impugn the honor and good faith of the United States. It is gratifying to know that this singular course of the Minister was taken on his own initiative and was reprobated by his Government. The incident was not of international moment, but it was closed by the spontaneous recall of the envoy by his Government, leaving nothing in the path of that good understanding which this country desires to maintain with its fellow Republic.

It is thus seen that the request of Colombia for arbitration has only recently advanced from the status of a suggested contingent alternative, as a resort in case of failure to attain a diplomatic adjustment, to that of a request predicated on the impossibility of such a direct settlement, an impossibility, if it be one, only because of the act of the Colombian Government in twice repudiating settlements already agreed upon on two occasions by the procedure usual in the intercourse of nations.

It is also to be seen that while the request takes the same form as the earlier suggested contingent alternative and appears to confine the subject matter of arbitration to ascertainment of the true intent of an isolated clause of article 35 of the Treaty of 1846, a decision in that regard would revive the old charges and bring them into the arbitral proceedings.

It does not seem timely or pertinent to the purposes of this message to discuss these charges, which were exhausted in the correspondence of 1904 and 1905, and which were necessarily laid aside

when the two Governments entered upon negotiations for a friendly adjustment of their differences, with the result of agreement upon conventional terms of settlement. It suffices to say that the thirty-fifth article of the Treaty of 1846 is necessarily to be construed as a whole, that the reciprocal obligations of the United States and Colombia were framed to enable this country to enjoy and maintain the enjoyment of the privileges of free uninterrupted isthmian transit, and that the transit was to be kept open by the United States upon occasion, free from disturbance from within or aggression from without. The stipulation which the Colombian Government isolates from its context and seeks to make the sole basis of its contention is in its essence a part of the rights reserved to the United States in order to secure to itself the tranquil and constant enjoyment of the advantages of the transit.

While it is styled as being in compensation for these advantages and in return for the general commercial privileges accorded by the convention, it is perfectly clear that, like the "perfect neutrality" of the Isthmus, the guaranty of the rights of sovereignty and property is to the end "that the free transit from the one to the other sea may not be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time while this treaty exists." And here it may not be out of place to observe that the neutrality of the Isthmus is not its international-law neutrality. The word neutrality has many meanings and shades of meaning besides its strictly technical sense of impartiality between alien belligerents, and is too often indefinitely or irrelevantly employed. In this instance, the obvious sense is that the territory covered by the transit is not to be allowed to become an arena of foreign assault or internal disturbance that may impair the tranquil enjoyment of its use. The United States has exercised the right to prevent such interruption in the past upon occasion, sometimes with the consent of Colombia, sometimes without it, sometimes at the request of Colombia herself in times of civil disturbance, and in the latter case not in fulfillment of any supposed duty to uphold the authority of the titular Government of the territory, but to prevent disorderly interference with the transit. Indeed, the very acts of the United States upon the Isthmus of which Colombia complained comport fully with the right and duty of the United States under the Treaty of 1846 to keep the line of transit free from the paralyzing disturbance of civil war, just as it would have been a right and duty to prevent its being a prey of alien rapacity in violation of the territorial rights of its own nationals.

When a new American Minister, Mr. James T. Du Bois, was sent to Colombia, in the latter half of 1911, he was informed of the desire of the United States to find some means consistent with its dignity and honor whereby an end might be put to the ill-feeling of Colombia. The view of this Government that, as a condition precedent to any real hope of this desirable result, there should be some modification of attitude in the direction of reasonableness on the part of the Colombian Government was explained, and much time was given by Mr. Du Bois to a careful study of the relations between the two countries. In the summer of 1912 he returned from Bogotá to confer with the Department of State as to how a just and fair settlement of our differences with Colombia could be reached.

A program having been evolved which was thought fully responsive to all the needs of the situation, as fresh evidence of the sincere desire of the United States to allay once for all the ill-feeling existing in Colombia, the Minister was given full instructions and proceeded to his post. In view of the experience of this Government in seeing adjustments carefully made twice shattered by the failure of their final acceptance at Bogotá, it was felt that any fresh formal proposals should certainly emanate from the Colombian Government. The Minister was therefore authorized simply to make known through informal and confidential conversations certain bases which, if reduced to the form of proposals made to the United States by the Government of Colombia, would receive sympathetic consideration by this Government as forming a practical means of complete adjustment of all existing differences with Colombia.

The program which the Minister laid before the Colombian Government in the tentative and informal manner indicated comprised the following points:

(1) That if Colombia would ratify the Root-Cortés and Cortés-Arosemena treaties as they stood, the United States would be willing to sign an additional convention paying to Colombia $10,000,000 for a permanent option for the construction of an interoceanic canal through Colombian territory and for the perpetual lease of the islands of St. Andrews and Old Providence. In the event that the Colombian Government felt that on account of their relationship with Panamá there existed difficulties in which they might desire the assistance of the United States the Minister was to intimate that there might be added a stipulation that the United States would be willing to use its good offices with the Government of Panamá for the purpose of securing an amicable adjustment by arbitration or otherwise of the Colombia-Panamá boundary dispute and of any other matters pending between the two countries. Again, if such a proposal by Colombia seemed impossible the Minister was instructed to intimate that in addition to the foregoing the Government of the United States would be willing to conclude with Colombia a convention submitting to arbitration the question of the ownership of the reversionary rights in the Panamá Railway, which the Colombian Government asserts that it possesses, and looking to proper indemnity should the Colombian contention be sustained.

(2) In the event that the Colombian Government should be strongly averse to making a proposal involving the ratification of the Cortés-Arosemena treaty with Panamá, then the Minister was to intimate that this Government would be willing to consider the foregoing proposal, even with certain amendments. These amendments were to be: First, the addition of a protocol whereby the United States would undertake to use its good offices on behalf of Colombia in the adjustment of boundary questions between it and Panamá; and, second, a convention whereby the Root-Cortés treaty between Colombia and the United States should be amended to the extent of eliminating its interdependence upon the Cortés-Arosemena treaty while preserving to Colombia the important advantages it would give that country in reference to the use of the Panamá Canal—one effect of this charge [change?] being that Colombia would have either definitively to forego the payment of $2,500,000 to be made it under the original tripartite arrangement, or at least to forego such payment until such future time, if ever, when the Colombian Government might find it convenient to ratify the Cortés-Arosemena treaty.

The Minister returned to Bogotá on January 15, 1913, and at once proceeded to carry out his instructions.

The foregoing constituted the complete program of the extreme limits to which, in the judgment of the Department, the Government of the United States would be justified, from any point of view, in going in the rather extraordinary efforts thus undertaken to eliminate once for all all causes of friction, whether justified or not, between the two countries.

The lease of Colombia's rights in two small Caribbean Islands was included as a possible safeguard in the matter of canal defense and for the purpose, regardful of Colombia's dignity, of clothing the discussion with a larger aspect of mutuality of consideration. option for an interoceanic canal through Colombian territory where there has been, from time to time, recrudescent discussion of such a possible canal project in the Atrato region was introduced in accordance with the same policy which actuated the Government of the United States in encouraging the recent convention with Nicaragua, although the probability of such an undertaking in that region is regarded as far more remote than is true with reference to the Nica-In pursuance of the same broad policy of setting at raguan route. rest once for all all talk of any rival interoceanic canal not controlled by the United States, the Department was convinced of the desirability of such a convention, which, like the lease of the islands above mentioned, offered further opportunity to give semblance of consideration for the payment proposed.

The remainder of the program is quite simple and offers to give to Colombia all the advantages given by the tripartite treaties and in a manner most considerate of the present Colombian feeling toward the Republic of Panamá, while, at the same time, as is of paramount necessity, jealously guarding the fixed rights and interests of the United States, which, of course, could not be permitted to be called in

On January 20, Mr. Du Bois had a preliminary conversation with the President of Colombia and informally discussed with him the first alternative of the program, viz, that including the ratification by Colombia of the tripartite treaties. He was informed by the President that he could not and would not consent to recommend to the Colombian Congress ratification of the Arosemena-Cortés treaty. In reply to an inquiry from the Minister whether he should proceed to offer the second alternative, he was informed by the Secretary of State that he could do so if and when he was absolutely satisfied that the decision of the Colombian President was final, it being understood that the United States could not consider any other or further concession than indicated in the second form of the program.

The Minister then proceeded further with his conversations, and on January 27, 1913, telegraphed to the Secretary of State that the proposition for the perpetual lease of the islands of Old Providence and St. Andrews was embarrassing to the Colombian Government, being regarded as practically a sale of the islands, which could not be ratified. Inquiry was made by the Minister for his information and guidance whether a liberal option for coaling, airship and wireless stations on one or both of the islands, together with a 60-year option on the Atrato canal route would be acceptable to the United States. The Minister in reply was cautioned to avoid making any proposals, which should logically come from the Government of Colombia, but was informed that if he could assure the Department of State that that Government would accept and the Colombian Congress ratify the agreement, without seeking any additional concessions, should this Government be willing to accept coaling stations instead of the perpetual lease of the islands, the proposal would be considered. With respect to placing a time limit on the canal-route option he was instructed that he should discourage positively any thought on the part of Colombia that a 60-year term would be acceptable if the United States were to pay any such figure as was named in his instructions.

The next information received from the Minister was contained in a telegram, dated January 31, 1913, and was to the effect that the Colombian Government seemed determined to treat with the incoming Democratic administration.

These friendly, considerate, and conciliatory efforts to put the relations between the United States and Colombia on a more cordial basis having thus failed, the Minister at Bogota was instructed by telegraph on February 7, 1913, to drop the matter after communicating to the Colombian President a personal note as follows:

Although your excellency will doubtless appreciate that those intimations which I have been able to give of the nature of a proposal which, if made by Colombia, would be considered by my Government naturally had reference only to the time at which I had the honor to make them, nevertheless, in order to avoid even a remote possibility of misunderstanding, I am directed to make it entirely clear to your excellency that nothing which has transpired in these purely personal and informal conversations is to be regarded as any indication of what may be the future disposition of the Government of the United States or as committing my Government in any respect whatever, my efforts to arrive at some definite conclusion having, to my regret, come to naught.

The Minister has informed the Department that after final discussion he has presented a note in the above sense.

The most recent telegrams from the Minister show that quite aside from his instructions and acting upon his personal responsibility, Mr. Du Bois, as a matter of curiosity, sounded the Colombian Government still further in order to elicit a clearer idea of its pretentions. it was intimated to the Minister that if the Colombian Government would make proposals in accordance with his informal suggestions a revolution would, in its opinion, result.

Continuing in his evident personal desire to sound, if possible, the limits of Colombian pretensions, the Minister also inquired whether an offer of $10,000,000 without the considerations which had been suggested would be acceptable. To this he was informed that it would not; that all his suggestions fell short by far of what Colombia could accept. To his inquiry, what terms Colombia would accept, the reply was: "The arbitration of the whole Panama question or a direct proposition from the United States to compensate Colombia for all the moral, physical and financial losses sustained by it because of the separation of Panama." This, it was intimated, was the last word of the Colombian Government.

The very latest telegram from Mr. Du Bois shows that in a subsequent interview he took it upon himself informally to ask whether if the United States should, without requesting options or privileges of any kind, offer Colombia $25,000,000, its good offices with Panama, the arbitration of the question of reversionary rights in the Panama Railway, and preferential rights of the canal, the Government would accept; to which he was answered in the negative.

Included in this most recent telegraphic correspondence is a statement of the impression of the Legation at Bogota that the Colombian Government cherishes the expectation that the incoming administration will arbitrate the entire Panama question, or will directly compensate Colombia for the value of the territory of Panama, the Panama Railway, the railroad annuities, and the contract with the French Canal Company.

I merely mention the results of these personal inquiries made by Mr. Du Bois, as I have said, in his personal capacity and without any authority, because they throw so much light upon the Colombian obsession with regard to this whole subject. This attitude resulting in the rebuff of generous overtures by the United States is undoubtedly due in a great measure to a radical misconception of real public opinion in the United States, engendered probably by reiterated criticism in certain uninformed quarters leveled at the policy of this Government at the very time it was bending every effort to adjust its relations with Colombia and required for such adjustment an atmosphere of calm instead of one of captious attack and unreasoning encouragement of an arbitrary attitude on the part of the foreign country with which it was dealing.

Feeling that this Government has made every effort consistent with the honor, dignity, and interests of the United States in its sincere aim to bring about a state of better feeling on the part of the Government of Colombia, it is with regret that I have to report that these efforts are thus far still met by a desire for impossible arbitrations, and so have proved unavailing unless, indeed, they may yet prove fruitful in the course of time of a more reasonable and friendly atti-

Meanwhile, the Government of Colombia would appear to have closed the door to any further overtures on the part of the United States.

Respectfully submitted.

Legation of Colombia, Washington, February 28, 1913.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to inform your excellency that, according to information which I have just received from my Government, the bases proposed by Mr. DuBois and the minutes of the last conference between the Plenipotentiary of the United States and the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Doctor Urrutia, were published today in Bogotá. Doctor Urrutia stated in the said minutes, in the name of the Government of Colombia, that, as the said bases were unacceptable, if it was not possible to obtain by direct negotiation the moral and material reparation which the country demands with perfect justice, no recourse remained except arbitration for the settlement of the question pending between Colombia and the United States.

Mindful of the solemn declaration which the illustrious Mr. Taft as well as his worthy Secretary of State and other eminent personages of this great country have made in favor of arbitration as a means of settling, in civilized countries, international differences of any character whatsoever, my Government hopes that when this means shall have been adopted the good friendship that for so many years existed between Colombia and the United States will soon be

LEGATION OF COLOMBIA, Washington, May 3, 1913.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's polite note dated the 15th ultimo, in which, referring to the questions of the highest importance unhappily pending between Colombia and the United States, your excellency is pleased to say:

"* * * There the honor to inform you that pending a full

"* * * I have the honor to inform you that pending a full study of this matter, which will be made at the earliest available moment, it will not be possible for me to enter into a discussion in regard thereto."

It is very natural for the new administration to desire to make a full and fundamental study of the antecedents of the said questions so as to obtain, from its own point of view, elements of judgment that will not be vitiated by passion or the influences of a system different from that which, as regards a policy with the Latin American Republics, the present administration has formed the wise purpose to establish.

Hoping to facilitate that study, my Government directs me to lay before your excellency a statement of the case in the light of facts fully demonstrated, so that your excellency may see that the differences between the two countries lie in the interpretation of the Treaty of 1846 and that none of the pending questions can involve, for the United States, matters of honor or vital interests which nations as a general rule refuse to refer to arbitration, even though that civilizing remedy may have already been advocated by eminent American statesmen, and among them ex-President Taft, as the means of settling all international disputes whatever.

Both the people and Government of Colombia have experienced profound satisfaction on hearing of the very noble purposes that animate your excellency to cultivate relations of sincere friendship with the Republics of Latin America by means of an elevated and just policy, of which your excellency had already given the formula in that beautiful sentiment of yours: "The Lord has made us neighbors; let Justice make us friends."

Who will deny that the beginning of a new era of justice must be marked by giving to my country the reparations that are her due? Her cause is eminently just. Colombia wants the fulfilment of sacred obligations assumed in a solemn compact, that of 1846, and bases that claim on a fundamental postulate of the law of nations which declares all states, whether great or small, to be equal in the family of nations. It may be said that Colombia's is a typical case in the international life of the world of Columbus, for according as it shall be decided will it be demonstrated whether or not the great Republic proposes to uphold, in its relations with the American States, the fundamental principles of international law.

A happy day for civilization was that in which the President of the United States, after declaring that "the time has come to take a step that may bring into play the good will and effective cooperation of all the nations of the western hemisphere, north and south, in the service of mankind and for the common good of the peoples," invited "all the independent countries of North and South America to attend a general congress that would meet on the twenty-fourth of November 1882 to consider and discuss the means of preventing war among the nations of America." The good work, thus started, was given great impetus when, on September 3, 1890, President Harrison said to Congress:

I send with this message a letter from the Secretary of State in which he incloses three resolutions adopted by the Conference of American Nations which recently met in Washington, relative to the question of international arbitration. The ratification of the treaties proposed in those very important resolutions would constitute one of the most happy and hopeful incidents in the history of the western hemisphere.

The delegates of North, Central and South America assembled at the Conference unanimously declared that,

Recognizing that the growth of the moral principles which govern political societies has created an earnest desire in favor of the amicable adjustment of international differences * * * solemnly recommend to all the Governments by which they have been accredited to conclude a uniform treaty of arbitration in the articles following:

Article 1. The Republics of North, Central and South America hereby adopt arbitration as a principle of American international law for the settlement of differences, disputes or controversies that may arise between two or more of Article 2. Arbitration shall be obligatory in all controversies concerning diplomatic or consular privileges, boundaries, territories, the right of navigation and the validity, construction and enforcement of treaties.

It matters not, for the prevalence of those immortal principles, whether or not the treaties in which they were set forth went through the ratification or other customary formalities. Those principles in themselves, because of their high moral dignity, will ever be the guiding rule of every justice-loving mind and of all governments that desire to promote the peaceful and fruitful advance of civilization.

From the noble declarations you have made as a statesman, I know that your excellency professes these same principles to the fullest extent, recognizing the necessity of loyally applying [them] to the relations of this great Republic with Latin America. hope therefore that the just claims of Colombia will be satisfied by the present Government of the United States.

On the basis of the principle above enunciated, it is necessary first to decide whether the differences existing between Colombia and the United States necessarily involve questions of validity, interpretation and enforcement of public treaties.

Among the jurists and statesmen of the United States there is not one of whom your excellency may have a higher opinion than [of] the Honorable Augustus O. Bacon, the present chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and in that capacity and as a jurist charged with the settlement of all cases of international law similar to that which forms the subject-matter of this note. I beg leave earnestly to call to your excellency's attention the famous speech delivered by Senator Bacon on the 29th of January, 1904, by which he proposed to demonstrate—and the demonstration reached the height of perfect evidence—that the solution of the differences unhappily existing between the United States and the Republic of Colombia necessarily involve the validity, interpretation and enforcement of the Treaty of 1846 between the two countries. In the development of his demonstration, Mr. Bacon said in the Senate:

The Colombian Government, through General Reyes, says that the United States, by the use of their powerful squadron and by the use of their armed forces, prevented Colombia from using her forces to suppress the rebellion in Panama, and that in the absence of such intervention on the part of the United States and the protection thus given to the Panama revolution the rebellion would have been speedily suppressed, and that, in fact, it would never have taken place; and that by reason of such forcible action by the United States in aiding and protecting the revolutionists in Panama the Colombian Government has been despoiled by that of the United States of its rights and sovereignty on the Isthmus of Panama, and that the United States are responsible for the dismemberment of the territory of Colombia.

Our Secretary of State, in his reply, admits that the United States protected the sovereignty of the Republic of Panama as against Colombia by armed force, and justifies the action under the Treaty of 1846 with Colombia, or New Granada which is the same thing. The contention of the Secretary is that whereas in the Treaty of 1846 the United States guaranteed the rights of sovereignty and property of Colombia in the Isthmus of Panama, so soon as Panama seceded and her independence was acknowledged all the rights of Colombia under that treaty inured to Panama, and that on the instant the United States became obligated by the treaty to protect the sovereignty of Panama in the entire Isthmus, even as against Colombia, with whom the treaty was originally made; that therefore the United States were justified in protecting the revolutionary government in Panama and in preventing by armed force Colombia from using her forces in suppressing the rebellion.

The clause in the Treaty of 1846 upon which the Secretary of State bases this contention is found in the thirty-fifth article and is as follows:

And in consequence the United States also guarantee, in the same manner, the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada (Colombia) has and possesses over said territory.

Under that clause of the Treaty of 1846 the Secretary contends that the United States were right in protecting the new Panama Republic against the effort of Colombia to suppress the rebellion which set it up. The statement made by him to this effect in the extract already quoted is as follows:

In recognizing the independence of the Republic of Panama the United States necessarily assumed toward that Republic the obligations of the Treaty of 1846. Intended, as the treaty was, to assure the protection of the sovereign of the Isthmus, whether the government of that sovereign rules from Bogota or from Panama, the Republic of Panama, as the successor in sovereignty of Colombia, became entitled to the rights and subject to the obligations of the treaty.

From this it is seen that Colombia claims that the United States, by forcibly preventing Colombia from suppressing the rebellion, caused the dismemberment of her territory. The United States admit the protection of the Republic of Panama as against Colombia, and assert their duty so to do under the Treaty of 1846, and thus the issue is clearly joined between the two.

Upon this issue thus presented the question whether or not the contention of the Secretary of State is correct is a question as to the correct interpretation of the Treaty of 1846.

Now, the point I am coming to is this: The Senator from Wisconsin asked me whether that claim of Colombia on the one hand, and the contention of the United States on the other hand, constitute an issue which is a proper subject-matter of arbitration. I lay down this as a proposition, that the question of the proper construction of a treaty, including the question of whether there has been wrong done in the violation of a treaty, is a question which, above all questions, is recognized as the simplest and most natural question for treaty negotiation, for agreement, if possible, and for submission to other parties for decision if such agreement cannot be had. If there can be any successful dispute of that as a correct proposition I do not know where to find the basis upon which to rest the argument.

Mr. President, the Government of the United States makes no claim of any right in Colombia, makes no argument in justification of anything which has been done there, which is not based on rights, duties and powers under the Treaty of 1846. The whole question at controversy is one which grows out of the question of the construction of that treaty. The message of the President of the United States is one which bases the acts of the Government of the United States upon the construction of that treaty; every argument which has been made in this Chamber in defense of what has been done has been necessarily based upon the question of the construction of that treaty; every argument which assails or disputes the propriety of the action which has taken place is based on the question of the construction of that treaty, and the question of the construction of a treaty is of all questions one which is a proper subjectmatter of adjudication and arrangement either by agreement of the parties or by arbitration where such agreement cannot be reached.

I repeat the proposition in brief. My proposition is that these documents contained in the communication sent to us by the President, show that there is a controversy between the United States and Colombia, and that even if for the purposes of the argument we admit that there is no sound basis for the claim of Colombia it is nevertheless a controversy, and the fact is plain that that controversy grows out of the construction of the Treaty of 1846.

✓ In the memorable speech I have just transcribed the present Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations has put in evidence, so clearly that nobody can ever deny them, the following facts:

1. That the controversy existing between Colombia and the United States deals, in its entirety and in all of its juridical aspects, with the interpretation of the Treaty of 1846.

2. That the interpretation of that treaty constitutes an eminently proper subject-matter of arbitration.

3. That the contention that the pending controversy involves, for the United States, vital questions of "interest and honor" that cannot be referred to arbitration is a mere pretext without any reasonable foundation.

Senator Bacon did not choose to touch upon the solution of the problems involved in the correct interpretation of the Treaty of 1846; he advanced no opinion whatever about them, for he said that it was for the arbitrator to solve them.

In compliance with the instructions that my Government has been pleased to give me, I will now lay before your excellency a brief statement of the antecedents, as they are recorded in the true history and in authentic documents, of that grave event which for a number of years past has been keeping the Colombian people in a most painful state of mind.

At the very dawn of her freedom, before the confusion of that great war of Independence had been dispelled, Colombia endeavored to cultivate the most cordial relations of friendship with Washington's noble country, the first-born child of Democracy in America, that to her sisters in the South was the pole star which was to guide them, by great examples of honor, purity and justice, to the attainment of high destinies.

I beg your excellency to be pleased to look over the set of public treaties of the United States I shall have occasion to cite in the course of this note. Your excellency will find in the first of those treaties, which was signed in 1824 by the two countries, the spirit of true friendship and genuine confidence that animated Colombia toward this great Republic. Those were always Colombia's feelings for the United States until one of its Presidents decided, as he publicly and deliberately confessed, to take the Isthmus of Panama, in flagrant violation of the Treaty of December 12, 1846, which placed upon the United States the formal obligation to New Granada (as Colombia was named) to uphold her rights of sovereignty and property over the Isthmus which Mr. Roosevelt took, in disregard of the express covenant and also of the powers and prerogatives of the American Legislature.

Vindication of the act has been sought in the sophism, above referred to by Senator Bacon, that the Treaty of 1846 had for its object, not what its very text says and clearly reveals to be the intentions of the contracting parties, but solely "to assure the protection of the sovereign of the Isthmus, whether the government of that sovereign rules from Bogota or from Panama." Rules of juridical interpretation justifying so arbitrary a construction of Article 35 of that treaty, whose existence and binding force are admitted by the United States, cannot be found. Nor is it necessary for a correct interpretation to resort to the grammatical, logical, historical and systematic criteria discussed by writers on international law; it is enough to read in good faith the text of that article which is worded as

Art. 35. The United States of America and the Republic of New Granada desiring to make as durable as possible the relations which are to be established between the two parties by virtue of this Treaty, have declared solemnly, and do agree to the following points.

1st. For the better understanding of the preceding articles, it is and has been stipulated between the high contracting parties, that the citizens, vessels and merchandise of the United States shall enjoy in the ports of New Granada, including those of the part of the Granadian territory generally denominated Isthmus of Panama, from its southernmost extremity until the boundary of Costa Rica, all the exemptions, privileges and immunities concerning commerce and navigation, which are now or may hereafter be enjoyed by Granadian citizens, their vessels and merchandise; and that this equality of favors shall be made to extend to the passengers, correspondence and merchandise of the United States, in their transit across the said territory, from one sea to the other. The Government of New Granada guarantees to the Government of the United States that the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama upon any modes of communication that now exist, or that may be hereafter constructed, shall be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States, and for the transportation of any articles of produce, manufactures or merchandise, of lawful commerce, belonging to the citizens of the United States; that no other tolls or charges shall be levied or collected upon the citizens of the United States, or their said merchandise thus passing over any road or canal that may be made by the Government of New Granada, or by the authority of the same, than is under like circumstances levied upon and collected from the Granadian citizens; that any lawful produce, manufactures or merchandise belonging to. citizens of the United States thus passing from one sea to the other, in either direction, for the purpose of exportation to any other foreign country, shall not be liable to any import-duties whatever; or, having paid such duties, they shall be entitled to drawback upon their exportation; nor shall the citizens of the United States be liable to any duties, tolls or charges of any kind to which native citizens are not subjected for thus passing the said Isthmus. And, in order to secure to themselves the tranquil and constant enjoyment of these advantages, and as an especial compensation for the said advantages and for the favors they have acquired by the 4th, 5th and 6th articles of this Treaty, the United States guarantee positively and efficaciously to New Granada, by the present stipulation, the perfect neutrality of the before-mentioned Isthmus, with the view that the free transit from the one to the other sea may not be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time while this Treaty exists; and in consequence the United States also guarantee, in the same manner, the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has and possesses over the said

2d. The present Treaty shall remain in full force and vigor for the term of twenty years from the day of the exchange of the ratifications; and from the same day the treaty that was concluded between the United States and Colombia on the third of October, 1824, shall cease to have effect, notwithstanding what was disposed in the first point of its 31st article.

3d. Notwithstanding the foregoing, if neither party notifies to the other its intention of reforming any of, or all, the articles of this Treaty twelve months before the expiration of the twenty years stipulated above, the said Treaty shall continue binding on both parties, beyond the said twenty years, until twelve months from the time that one of the parties notifies its intention of proceeding to a reform.

4th. If any one or more of the citizens of either party shall infringe any of the articles of this Treaty, such citizens shall be held personally responsible for the same, and the harmony and good correspondence between the nations shall not be interrupted thereby; each party engaging in no way to protect the offender, or sanction such violation.

5th. If unfortunately any of the articles contained in this Treaty should be violated or infringed in any way whatever, it is expressly stipulated that neither of the two contracting parties shall ordain or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor shall declare war against the other on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall have laid before the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proofs, demanding justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been denied, in violation of the laws and of international right.

6th. Any special or remarkable advantage that one or the other power may enjoy from the foregoing stipulation are and ought to be always understood in virtue and as in compensation of the obligations they have just contracted and which have been specified in the first number of this article.

As clearly stated in the first paragraph of the inserted article, the United States guaranteed not any sovereignty that might impose itself on the Isthmus but, as the quoted text says, "the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada (now Colombia) has and possesses over the said territory." And this solemn promise in which the United States pledged their public faith was not an onerous obligation nor a gratuitous protection of the rights of Colombia. On the contrary, the promise of guaranty was set down as a compensation, in payment of the immense advantages secured by the United States from Colombia through that treaty.

Your excellency is perfectly conversant with the history of your country and it is therefore needless to undertake to demonstrate to you that the great development of California and all the Western States was mainly due to the free and untrammeled transit across the Isthmus of Panama which, in return for the aforesaid guaranty, the United States secured in virtue of the Treaty of 1846.

In submitting that international pact to the approval of the Senate, President Polk said, with reference to Article 35: "The importance of that concession to the commercial and political interests of the United States cannot easily be surpassed."

In truth no other international pact can be found with so great advantages and benefits for one of the contracting parties as those which were secured by the United States and conceded by Colombia with the main object of gaining a substantial guaranty of her unquestionable rights of sovereignty and property over the Isthmus of Panama. Such was, on Colombia's part, the goal she had in view, the intention she harbored in concluding the Treaty of 1846.

But on the part of the United States, as appears from the texts inserted in this note, a different interpretation of the said pact has been advanced; hence the necessity of resorting to an arbitral tribunal to let it solve in the light of the law and decide the true interpretation of the Treaty of December 12, 1846. This was demonstrated with perfect clearness in the luminous speech delivered in the American Senate on January 29, 1904, by the Honorable Augustus O. Bacon, to which I have referred by quoting it in this note. There is also no doubt that there is, in the present case, no plausible exception that can be taken to arbitration on the part of the American Government. Quite to the contrary, there are precedents in which the United States accepted arbitration for the settlement of similar questions, as shown by the Treaty of 1863 with England and the Geneva Arbitration. The memorable Alabama case also supplies decisive arguments to show how the American Government always upheld and practiced the principle of international arbitration, one of the great and transcendent conquests of civilization.

The United States, keeping faith with the great deeds of its own history, signed the Convention of The Hague of October 18, 1907, for the peaceful settlement of international disputes, and, under Article 38 of that convention, all disputes over the interpretation, execution and violation of public treaties must be submitted to arbitration. This was precisely the civilizing doctrine always upheld by the United States and professed by its most notable jurists in accordance with the noble spirit of the American people. The same doctrine, which now has the approval of the civilized world, has been solemnly advocated by the Presidents of the United States, at all times, and even by Mr. Roosevelt who, speaking of international arbitration, said:

The interpretation of a treaty is preeminently a subject-matter of arbitration when the contracting parties do not agree on its true meaning. Generally that interpretation is a judicial act of the class especially proper for submission to an arbitral tribunal. (The Outlook; October 14, 1911.)

By virtue of the foregoing, my Government hopes that your excellency's Government will agree to submit to The Hague Tribunal the questions pending between Colombia and the United States, so that they may be determined by a final award.

In conclusion I beg your excellency to deign to read the Legation's notes dated October 21, 1905 and November 25, 1911 that have never been answered by the Department of State.

I gladly avail [etc.]

The Secretary of State to the Minister of Colombia.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 18, 1913.

Sir: Referring to your note of May 3d last, I am directed to say that this Government prefers to postpone, for the present, the consideration of the question of arbitration, in the hope that by direct negotiations the matter in dispute between us may be satisfactorily adjusted. I have been in conference with Mr. Hannis Taylor, the counsel and legal adviser of the Republic of Colombia, in regard to this matter, and shall be pleased to take the subject of direct negotiations up with you or him, jointly or severally.

Our nation has its own honor at stake in all matters which involve fair dealing toward other nations, and I speak for the President and, I am sure, for the whole people, as well as for myself, when I express the earnest desire that we may be able to remove every obstacle that stands in the way of perfect confidence and free intercourse between the two nations.

[Extract-Translation.]

In the memorial of the Minister for Foreign Affairs and in the annex thereto you will find a detailed statement of the memorandum¹ presented by Mr. J. T. Du Bois, Minister of the United States to our country, regarding bases for a statement with that country; also the minutes of the conference of February 15th of this year between the said Minister and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Colombia.² These most important documents are already known to our compatriots, and you will appraise them with all patriotism.

The Government of Colombia, for its part, deemed itself compelled to refuse these arrangements, in the belief that they were not in conformity with the sentiments of reparation and justice held by the nation.

In spite of the fact that this conference was declared to be informal by the American Minister, the President of the United States presented in his message of March 1st of this year to the Senate the report of the Secretary of State, which contains an account of the refusal of the propositions.

As the Government of Colombia did not find entirely exact the statement of historic facts presented by Mr. Knox, its Minister at Washington was instructed to make the necessary rectifications, which was duly done.

The advent of the new administration in the United States under leadership of two eminent persons, Messrs. Wilson and Bryan, caused the Colombian people to conceive great hopes that with their friendly support we should receive at an early date complete compensatory justice. As reasons for this flattering hope great weight is attached to the appointment of Mr. Thompson as Minister of the American Government to that of Colombia, as we have received the highest recommendations regarding this meritorious citizen; also the conduct of notable North Americans, like Senator Hitchcock and Representative Rainey, who have presented to the Congress of their country very significant resolutions which tend to favor the cause of justice and of Colombia.

We are awaiting the arrival of Mr. Thompson, confident that before the close of the sessions of this Congress, there will be submitted to your consideration the means of coming to a perfect understanding with the American Government.

The probability that the Isthmian Canal will shortly be ready for service, the desirability of cultivating frankly cordial relations with the United States, the conspicuous development and progress of our nation and the special requirements of our maritime provinces, render every day more imperative an understanding with the great Republic of the North.

Memorial of the Minister for Foreign Affairs to the Colombian Congress, July 20. 1913.1

[Translation of the passage relating to the United States.]

UNITED STATES.

During the last days of February, at the time when the administration presided over by Mr. William H. Taft was drawing to its close, the Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic in Bogota, James T. Du Bois, presented to the Government of Colombia the document which, owing to its importance, I take the liberty of quoting at length:

MEMORANDUM PRESENTED BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE MINISTER OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TO THE GOVERNMENT OF COLOMBIA.

[Text.2]

The Government of Colombia confirmed the refusal already given by my predecessor, Doctor Pedro M. Carreño, to the proposals of Mr. Du Bois. The reasons on which our reiterated refusal was based are stated in the minutes of the conference, which I likewise find desirable to quote here in their entirety:

MINUTES OF THE CONFERENCE BETWEEN THE MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS OF COLOMBIA AND THE MINISTER OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA CONCERNING THE ABOVE MEMORANDUM.

[Text.3]

In the annex to this memorial [File No. 721.000/5; p. 233] you will find the text of the note from the Plenipotentiary of Colombia, General Pedro Nel Ospina, to the Secretary of State, dated the 25th of November 1911,4 a very important document in our diplomatic history and which in a very precise manner condenses the national opinion of Colombia, which was faithfully recited previously in the Memorial of Grievances presented at Washington just after the spoliation of Panamá, and in the notes of the Plenipotentiary of Colombia, Dr. Diego Mendoza Pérez.⁵ The formal [sic] reference made to the note of General Ospina in the minutes of the conference with Mr. Du Bois, inserted here, and the character of the said conference, render unnecessary, in order to corroborate the request for arbitration, the extensive repetition of antecedents and causes which have been already stated so brilliantly in the above-mentioned docu-

²The text is that contained in File No. 721.000/5 at page 248; that is, the English text that was published in Colombia; and although not identical with the original presented by the American Minister (see ante, p. 291) the variations are due only to the use by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of a translation into English of a Spanish version instead of the insertion of a copy of the English original; the purport of the text used is the same as that of the original.
³The text is that contained in File No. 721.000/5 at page 253 et seq., which is the English text published in Colombia; and although not identical with the translation furnished to the Department by the American Minister (see ante, p. 294) the variations are due only to the independence of the two translations of each other, the content being substantially the same in both.

These antecedents and reasons have by their very nature been already confirmed by many pages of the diplomatic history of the United States of America, which show how that Republic had solemnly accepted arbitration for the settlement of disputes of a political and international order, as were those submitted on a memorable occasion to the Geneva Arbitration in 1871, in relation to acts analogous to those forming the basis of our protests, by the two great nations of the Saxon world.

The rejection of the propositions of the United States Plenipotentiary provoked the report which Secretary of State Knox presented to the Department of State [sic] on February 20th of this year. This report was transmitted by President Taft in his message of March 1st to the Senate and to the House of Representatives of the United States. It was greatly to be regretted that Mr Knox deviated on several points from the historic truth, in his statement of what had passed during the last ten years between Colombia and This circumstance obliged the Government of the United States. Colombia to instruct our Minister at Washington to make the necessary rectifications before the Department of State. This had already been done in another form, in a letter of the Consul General of Colombia in New York, which was given wide circulation by the American press.

After the rejection by the Government of Colombia of the proposals of the Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, certain acts of an important character have taken place in that country which may be the forerunners of a policy of justice and reparation to Colombia.

On the 4th of March of this year there again came into power the Democratic party, which has always prided itself on continuing the honorable international traditions of the founders of the Republic of the North and which has unceasingly condemned the imperialistic practice which culminated in the spoliation of Panama. party returned to power under the leadership of a scholar and magistrate of beneficent antecedents whose repeated declarations show him to be a partisan of the cause of social and international justice. At his side and in the high office of Secretary of State will stand Mr. Bryan whose prestige among the nations of this continent is derived from his lofty and just declarations and from his adherence to those principles which he is now in a position to practice and to affirm through the high authority with which he is invested.

Among the men of his party are to be found those who in Congress, in the press, in seats of learning, etc., have protested unceasingly against the offenses committed on Colombia and have demanded the reparation that is due her. These are circumstances which indicate that reparation in the form demanded by the Colombian people may be about to be granted us. It does not seem possible that those who have acted in this manner up to this date, can, after they have become members of the Government of the United States or exercise a decisive influence thereon, remain unmoved and permit the opening of the Panama Canal, a work so important in human progress, to signalize, from the point of view of international morality, the confirmation of a spoliation which signifies so lamentable a retrocession to the empire of force.

Although a painful experience shows us the precise limits in international affairs of even our flattering hopes, the truth is that nothing could be more significant as a favorable presage of a possible reparation for Colombia by the United States, than the presentation of bases for a general treaty by Secretary of State Bryan to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Senate. Those bases are as

The parties hereto agree that all questions of whatever character and nature in dispute between them shall, when diplomatic efforts fail, be submitted for investigation and report to an international commission (the composition to be agreed upon); and the contracting parties agree not to declare war or begin hostilities until such investigation is made and report submitted.

The investigation shall be conducted as a matter of course upon the initiative of the commission, without the formality of a request from either party; the report shall be submitted within (time to be agreed upon) from the date of the submission of the dispute, but the parties hereto reserve the right to act independently on the subject matter in dispute after the report is submitted.

Undoubtedly these bases comprise an important beginning in favor of international justice, and their acceptance, which apparently will be general, will become an effective guaranty for the weak nations. If, as indicated in the above-mentioned bases, the questions relating to the separation of Panama between Colombia and the United States had been submitted to investigation and report by an international committee, we should have had the way paved to a considerable extent for the reparation which we seek, because this investigation has been and continues to be implicitly demanded by Colombia in soliciting an international arbitration.

I must also mention, as significant proof of the sentiment of notable North American citizens, the resolutions introduced in the Senate and in the House of Representatives of the United States, relating to the pending questions between Colombia and the latter nation which propositions render their authors, Senator Hitchcock and Representative Rainey (you already know of the action taken by the latter some time ago) worthy of our gratitude. The proposition of Senator Hitchcock, unanimously approved by the American Senate on the 16th

[Text of Senate Resolution.] 2

The resolution presented by Representative Rainey on April 23rd to the House, and which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, is as follows:

On the 3rd of May of this year our Plenipotentiary at Washington, Mr. Julio Betancourt, presented to the Department of State the note 3 which you will find in the Annex to this Memorial.4 By means of this carefully considered and deliberately written document, as you will see, our just demand for arbitration was again laid before the new administration of the United States.

The Government of the United States has appointed as Minister Plenipotentiary to Colombia in the place of Mr. James T. Du Bois, Mr. Thaddeus A. Thomson, a distinguished member of the American Democratic party. It is to be presumed that the new American Plenipotentiary will come provided with full powers and instructions to treat here the pending questions and to find a solution which, in any case, the Government will require to be decorous and appro-

The resolutions approved by the Departmental Assemblies in their last sessions, growing out of the refusal given by the Government to the Du Bois propositions, and other similar expressions of approval show that the national sentiment was truly interpreted in making that rejection. Now, in the expectation of new proposals, I can say to you that the Government is convinced of the necessity of reaching an early, friendly and decorous solution of the questions existing between Colombia and the United States. I may, however, also quote the words of my predecessor, Doctor José M. González Valencia, in his memorial of last year, as follows:

If the occasion should arise, the Government is determined to proceed in this question in harmony with the genuine national sentiment and in accord with the Legislative Chambers, whose assistance is indispensable for the satisfactory settlement of a negotiation of this nature.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, September 29, 1913.

The Department has received your form of offer and substitutes the following by direction of the President. You will submit it immediately to the Colombian Government.

The Government and people of the United States sincerely desire that everything that may have marred or seemed to interrupt the close and long-established friendship between the United States and the Republic of Colombia should be cleared away and forgotten. My Government therefore desires now to set at rest once and for all the differences that have arisen between it and the Government of the Republic of Colombia in connection with the question of the proper reparation for the losses, both moral and material, suffered by the Republic of Colombia by reason of the circumstances accompanying the acquisition of the rights now enjoyed by the United States on the Isthmus of Panama. I am therefore instructed to offer the sum of $20,000,000 in full settlement of all claims and differences now pending between the Government of Colombia and the Government of the United States and between the Government of Colombia and the Government of the Republic of Panama. I hope that this offer will prove acceptable to your excellency's Government, and

American Legation, Bogotá, October 8, 1913.

Sir: In reference to your telegraphic instructions dated September 29, I have the honor to enclose herewith copies of the original Spanish text and English translation of the Minister for Foreign Affairs' note of the 6th instant in acknowledgment of mine dated October 1st, in which, pursuant to your instructions, I made a formal offer of twenty million dollars in full settlement of all our pending differences with Colombia, to include also any claims Colombia might have against the Republic of Panama.

I have reason to know that the terms in which my note was couched, made a most favorable impression upon the President, the Minister, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

With the help of the Committee and under the President's direction, the Minister will now proceed to draft a counter-proposition and in order that it may come as near being acceptable as possible to the Government of the United States, Dr. Urrutia will confer with me regarding the respective points to be contained therein.

I understand that the counter-proposition will consist of a note transmitting the essential conditions desired by Colombia in the form of a project for a treaty. This draft treaty will consist of at least four articles embodying the following cardinal points: one, moral reparation; two, preferential privileges in the Canal; three, fixation of boundary line; and four, money indemnification. In discussing these several features it will be my earnest endeavor to keep the Colombian demands within reasonable bounds.

The Colombian Minister for Foreign Affairs to the American Minister.

FOREIGN OFFICE, ' Bogotá, October 6, 1913.

Mr. Minister: I have the honor to refer to the courteous note of the first instant, by which your excellency has informed the Government of the Republic that the Government and the people of the United States desire that everything that may have marred or seemed to interrupt the friendship between the two nations should be cleared away and forgotten; that your excellency's Government therefore desires to terminate the differences which have arisen between it and the Republic regarding the reparation for the losses, both moral and material, which Colombia has suffered by reason of the circumstances accompanying the acquisition of the rights which the United States now enjoys on the Isthmus of Panama; and that your excellency therefore offers in the name of your Government the sum of twenty million dollars in full settlement of all claims and differences pending between our two Governments and between the Government of the Republic and Panama.

I have received instructions from His Excellency the President of the Republic to inform your excellency, as I have the honor now to do, that the Colombian Government duly appreciates the sentiments and desires of friendship and of justice expressed it your excellency's note.

In order to cooperate on its part in reaching that just and friendly settlement which is desired by your excellency's Government, my Government will proceed to communicate to your excellency, with the promptness and the attention which the matter requires, its ideas regarding the bases of a possible and convenient arrangement. One of these bases is the proper indemnity for damages and losses, which will be opportunely considered in connection with the other stipulations which the Republic deems necessary for the complete solution of the claims and differences to which your excellency refers.

The Colombian Government, in spontaneously concurring with that of the United States in favor of a direct settlement of this matter, hopes that it will prove feasible and effective and that in this way it will not be necessary to continue its efforts looking to the acceptance of other measures proposed by Colombia and which are still pending.

In expressing to your excellency these ideas and intentions of my Government, I have [etc.]

American Legation, Bogotá, October 22, 1913, 7 p. m.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs has informally communicated to me the Colombian Government's ideas regarding bases for a settlement, with the request that I transmit them for your consideration and in order that through an exchange of views he may approximate as far as possible Colombia's desires to what the United States is prepared to grant, before he submits formal counter-proposition. The Minister emphasized the fact that they were not to be considered as unalterable conditions to a settlement.

These ideas are expressed in the form of a preamble to and four articles of a treaty and are as follows: [The text that follows is the same as that of the inclosure with the Minister's despatch No. 14 of American Legation, Bogotá, October 23, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to enclose herewith the English text of the draft preamble and articles for a treaty embodying the Colombian Government's ideas regarding bases for a settlement, which have been informally communicated to me by Dr. Urrutia in accordance with the statement made in his note of the 6th instant, a copy of which was transmitted to the Department with my despatch No. 10 of the 8th instant.

These ideas comprise the views of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, composed of representatives of all political parties, and may, therefore, be considered as interpreting faithfully every national aspiration.

While the ideas may be deemed to constitute Colombia's maximum desires, I feel convinced that she will accept considerably less.

Dr. Urrutia on several occasions during our conversation laid stress upon the fact that these desires were to be treated as an informal expression of views only and were to serve as a basis for discussion, in the hope that the two Governments might reach some mutually acceptable ground before he presented Colombia's formal counterproposition.

I have used every effort to dissuade Dr. Urrutia from presenting, even informally, in my opinion such exorbitant desires, but he has earnestly requested me to transmit them and I have thought it best to do so, although, when my views have been requested, I have not hesitated to state frankly that I thought no good purpose could be served in requesting greater preferential privileges in the use of the Canal than those enjoyed by the United States and United States commerce, nor a boundary other than that based upon the New Granadan law of June 9, 1855, nor a greater indemnity than one of 20 million dollars, in consideration of the foregoing concessions.

I sincerely trust that the Department will see its way clear to approve the phraseology of the preamble and of Article I, and especially that it will find it possible to accept the word "regrets," which I am convinced would go far towards rendering any terms acceptable to this Government and the people of Colombia.

Draft Treaty embodying Colombia's proposals.

The Republic of Colombia and the United States of America, desiring to put an end to everything which may impair the good understanding between the two nations; and wishing therefore to adjust the situation created by the political change which took place in Panamá in November 1903 and to regulate as well the rights and interests of both nations relating to the interoceanic canal which the Government of the United States is now constructing across the Isthmus of Panamá; and earnestly desiring to restore the reciprocal relations of their long and close friendship, have resolved for this purpose to conclude a convention and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries, etc.

ARTICLE I.

The Government of the United States of America, in its own name and in the name of the people of the United States, sincerely regrets and invites the Government and the people of Colombia to forget anything that may have occurred to mar or to interrupt the close and long established friendship existing between the two nations, and likewise desires now to set at rest once and for all the differences which have arisen between it and the Government of the Republic of Colombia in connection with the question of proper reparation for the losses both moral and material suffered by the Republic of Colombia by reason of the circumstances which produced the situation enjoyed by the United States in the Isthmus of Panamá.

On its own part, the Government of the Republic of Colombia, in its own name and in the name of the Colombian people, accepts this declaration, confident that every obstacle to the progress of friendly relations between the two nations will thus disappear.

ARTICLE II.

The United States grants to Colombia the following rights in the matter of transit via the Interoceanic Canal and the Panama Railway:

1. Once the Canal is opened which is now in course of construction in the Isthmus, Colombia shall have the right in perpetuity to transport at all times by this route both its merchant ships and ships of war as well as its troops and materials for war without paying any duty to the United States, even in the case of an international war between Colombia and another nation.

2. Colombian products, whatever may be their destination, and merchandise destined to Colombian ports of the Atlantic or of the Pacific for consumption in Colombia, which pass through the Canal whether in national or foreign ships, as well as the Colombian mails or mails for Colombia, shall be free from all customs duties, tonnage dues, anchorage, lighthouse, wharf, pilot, quarantine dues, or any other duty or tax of every nature whatsoever, upon passing through the Canal; wherefore, after the respective invoices have been examined by the Consul of the United States stationed at the port of their destination, that part of the toll corresponding to the said mails, products or merchandise, paid by the boat on passing through the Canal, shall be returned.

3. Colombian citizens shall be exempt from every toll, tax or duty whatsoever on crossing the Canal Zone, upon proving their nationality to the employees of the Canal.

4. The products of the soil and industry of the Republic of Colombia such as cattle, provisions, etc., shall be admitted to entry in the Canal Zone, as well as in the Islands and mainland auxiliary or accessory thereto, provided that they are for consumption therein, without paying other duties than those paid by similar products of the United States.

5. During the construction of the Canal and afterwards, whenever traffic thereby is interrupted or whenever it shall be necessary for any other reason to use the railway now existing or any other railway to be substituted therefor, the troops, materials for war, products, merchandise and mails mentioned in the preceding clauses shall be transported by said railway, paying only the same freight or dues which are paid by the troops, materials for war, products, merchandise and mails of the United States.

6. The officers, agents and employees of the Government of Colombia shall be entitled to free passage at all times upon said railway across the Isthmus of Panama, upon proving their official character to the employees of the railway.

7. Colombian sea-salt and coal, destined to any Colombian port whatsoever and passing by the railway across the Isthmus of Panama from one ocean to the other, shall be free of any charge except the actual cost of transportation and handling, not in any case to exceed one half of the lowest ordinary freight charges levied upon products of the United States passing over the said railway and in transit from one to another port of the United States.

American Legation, Bogotá, October 25, 1913.

Sir: Referring to the Colombian Government's ideas regarding bases for a settlement of the questions now pending between this country and the United States, I have the honor to enclose herewith copy and English translation of memoranda, which were informally handed to me by the Minister for Foreign Affairs for my private information only. Dr. Urrutia said that they had been prepared by the Consultatory Committee of the Foreign Office and considered by the Committee in computing the size of the indemnity.

I have [etc.]

[Inclosure 1-Undated Memorandum-Translation.]

The Minister for Foreign Affairs to the American Minister.

In order to fix the amount of the indemnity due to Colombia, amongst other things the following should be taken into account:

The reversionary rights in the Panama Railway, which according to the official report of Senator Bristow amount to $16,416,000, from which there should be deducted a sum for advance payment.

The right possessed by Colombia to acquire the property of the Canal at the expiration of the 99 years of the concession, according to the contracts made with the Canal Company.

The right possessed by Colombia to receive during these 99 years an annuity of

The right possessed by Colombia to receive during 66 years an annuity of $250,000, in accordance with the terms of the Panama Railway contract.

The right to 8 annuities of $10,000 according to the terms of the contract with the Railway Company of 1880. These annuities are for the years between 1903 to 1910, which have not been paid to Colombia.

The value of the Isthmus of Panama, in other words of the "richest province of Colombia" as stated by Sir William R. Scott, in his work "The Americans in Panamá."

[Inclosure 2-Undated Memorandum-Translation.]

The Minister for Foreign Affairs to the American Minister.

MONEY INDEMNITY.

Respecting this article of the draft treaty a sum of fifty million dollars will seem very moderate if the following be taken into consideration: That

1. Colombia renounces the right to 66 annuities of $250,000 in the Panama Railway and to her exclusive ownership thereof at the conclusion of the concession, which represents an enormous sum, according to the calculations of ex-Minister Du Bois.

2. Colombia renounces the right to 99 annuities of $250,000 according to the terms of the Canal Contract and to her reversionary rights in the work at the expiration of the 99 years of the concession.

3. Colombia renounces her participation in the indemnity mentioned in the last part of Article II of the contract of 1876.

4. Colombia gives up "her richest province," as stated by Mr. William R. Scott in his book "The Americans in Panamá" (1912): a territory which affords the unique passage of the world for joining the two oceans, and which forms one of the most beautiful, safe and capacious bays of the globe, the Almiranto Bay.

5. Thanks to its occupation of the Isthmus, the United States have been able to construct the Panama Canal, far more advantageously, more economically and more productively than the Nicaragua or any other canal, as is shown by the report of Admiral Walker presented to the Washington Government on November 30, 1910. According to this report, the actual cost of building the Nicaraguan canal would have exceeded one via Panamá by $58,000,000, "without taking into consideration the cost of acquiring the last-named property." According to the same commission, "the Panama Canal, after its completion, would be shorter, would have fewer locks and a lesser curvature than the Nicaragua Canal. We can gauge these advantages by the time necessary for a boat to make the transit, which is calculated for a ship of ordinary size at 12 hours for Panama and 33 for Nicaragua."

In this regard two points should be also kept in mind: (a) that the occupation of the Isthmus by the United States permits of the opening of the Canal for traffic in 1914, thanks to the great works carried out there during a period of more than twenty years by the French company in accordance with its contract with Colombia; and that the Nicaragua canal, scarcely commenced, could only have been terminated many years later with an accompanying great industrial, economic and political loss to the United States; and (b) that the volcanic nature of Nicaragua and of Central America in general, would have endangered to a considerable degree the colossal work of the canal.

According to the Spooner Law of 1901, "if the President of the United States cannot acquire from the Republic of Colombia the control and territory for the opening of the Panama Canal, he shall obtain it from Costa Rica and Nicaragua to construct it by the route known by this name.

It is well known that this provision of the Spooner law has not yet been carried out, and it is only by means of this arrangement, now being discussed, that the United States can legalize the acquisition of the control which was ordered by the Congress of that Republic:

6. By virtue of the treaty of Nov. 18, 1903, between the United States and Panama, the Washington Government not only acquired the Canal Zone but also a multitude of other rights in the territory of that Colombian Department, which will never be perfected until the treaty now being discussed shall enter into force, and in the form established thereby.

7. Many voices in authority in the Congress of the United States, as that of Senator Bacon and that of Representative Lewis, have stated that the damages suffered by Colombia could not be indemnified by any sum less than one of $100,000,000 in gold;

8. As the Herran-Hay Treaty is still unratified, Colombia was certain to acquire the part of the Canal completed by the French Company, as long as that company was unable to fulfill its obligations. This right possessed by Colombia may justly be estimated at the sum paid to the Canal Company for the work completed by it and for the properties accessory thereto.

Note.—Owing to the illness of his wife, the American Minister was obliged to return with her to the United States. On November 5 the Department instructed him that the negotiations with the Government of Colombia should continue in his absence, conducted by the Chargé d'Affaires ad interim, Mr. Harrison. On November 8 the Minister informed the Foreign Office of the necessity for his immediate departure and of the continuance of the negotiations in his absence by the Chargé d'Affaires. The Minister for Foreign Affairs replied on November 10 (File No. 711.21/207) saying:

The Colombian Government, whose highest consideration has been won by your excellency, sincerely regrets that such a deplorable motive should necessitate your excellency's departure, and expresses the hope that upon the earnestly desired disappearance of the distressing events in your family, your excellency will again become the distinguished guest of Colombia.

The Government furthermore expresses the hope that the negotiations initiated by your excellency—which remain in the charge of the honorable Chargé d'Affaires, by direction of his excellency the Secretary of State, as your excellency has informed me—may be carried to a just and desirable conclusion, to which end your excellency can rest assured that the Honorable Mr. Harrison may count upon the same cooperation which your excellency has received.

The Minister departed on November 11. On November 24 the Colombian Legation at Washington requested that the American Chargé d'Affaires be instructed to continue at Bogotá the negotiations interrupted by the departure of the Minister. (File No. 711, 21/205.) The Secretary of State thereupon sent the following telegram to the Chargé d'Affaires:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 19, 1913-6 p. m.

You may present the following as a proposition for settlement of all disputes and controversies between the United States and Colombia.

The United States is willing to make the following treaty:

ARTICLE I. The Government of the United States of America, wishing to put at rest all controversies and differences with the Republic of Colombia arising out of the events from which the present situation on the Isthmus of Panama resulted, expresses, in its own name and in the name of the people of the United States, sincere regret that anything should have occurred to interrupt or to mar the relations of cordial friendship that had so long subsisted between

The Government of the Republic of Colombia, in its own name and in the name of the Colombian people, accepts this declaration in the full assurance that every obstacle to the restoration of complete harmony between the two countries will thus disappear.

ARTICLE II. The United States grants to Colombia the following rights in respect to the interoceanic canal and the Panama Railway:

1. The Republic of Colombia shall be at liberty at all times to transport through the interoceanic canal its troops, materials of war and ships of war, even in case of war between Colombia and another country, without paying any charges to the United States.

2. The products of the soil and industry of Colombia passing through the canal, as well as the Colombian mails, shall be exempt from any charges or duties other than such as may be payable on the products or mails of the United States. The products of the soil and industry of Colombia, such as cattle and provisions, shall be admitted to entry in the Canal Zone without paying other duties than those paid upon similar products of the United States.

3. Colombian citizens crossing the Canal Zone shall, upon production of proper proof of their nationality, be exempt from every toll, tax, or duty to which citizens of the United States are not subject.

4. During the construction of the interoceanic canal and afterwards, whenever traffic by the canal is interrupted, the troops, materials of war, products and mails of the Republic of Colombia, as above mentioned, shall, even in case of war between Colombia and another country, be transported on the railway between Ancon and Cristobal or on any other railway substituted therefor, paying only the same charges and duties as are imposed upon the troops, materials of war, products and mails of the United States. The officers, agents and employees of the Government of Colombia shall, upon production of proper proof of their official character or their employment, also be entitled to passage on the said railway on the same terms as officers, agents and employees of the Government of the United States. The provisions of this paragraph shall not, however, apply in case of war between Colombia and Panama.

5. Coal and sea-salt, being the products of Colombia, passing from the Atlantic coast of Colombia to any Colombian port on the Pacific coast and vice versa, shall be transported over the aforesaid railway free of any charge except the actual cost of handling and transportation, which shall not in any case exceed one-half of the ordinary freight charges levied upon products of the United States passing over the railway and in transit from one port to another of the United States:

ARTICLE III. The United States of America agrees to pay to the Republic of Colombia, within six months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, the sum of Twenty Million Dollars, gold, United States money.

ARTICLE IV. The independence of the Republic of Panama being acknowledged as an accomplished fact, it is agreed that the boundary between the Republic of Colombia and the Republic of Panama shall be based upon the Colombian law of June 9, 1855, and the line shall accordingly run from Cape Tiburón to the headwaters of the Rio de la Miel and following the mountain chain by the ridge of Gandi to the Sierra de Chugargun and that of Mali going down by the ridges of Nique to the heights of Aspave, and from thence to a point on the Pacific half way between Cocalito and Ardita.

It is not necessary to send formal introduction and conclusion. You will notice that the boundary is approximately that of 1855, but more clearly defined for the sake of certainty.

Sir: In confirmation of my telegram of the 17th and also of the 19th instant, reporting the arrest and deportation of Waldo C. Lawson, I have the honor to inform you that on the 17th instant Mr. W. E. Mullins, the general manager of the United Fruit Company, whose aid in trying to locate the fugitives I had requested, telephoned me that Lawson was at that moment in his office in Limon. Mr. Mullins said that Lawson came to him to ask for work and, recognizing him from his descriptions, he questioned him as to his identity. Lawson at once confessed to everything and said that he would be glad to give himself up and to be sent to America to face his charges and that he was tired of being a fugitive from justice.

Upon receipt of this news I immediately called upon the Minister for Foreign Affairs to ask for his arrest and extradition, which the President had informed me he would grant. Mr. Castro, however, said that it would be preferable to have Lawson arrested and deported as a "pernicious foreigner" (estranjero pernicioso), as the Central American Court of Justice would be sure to take an exception to the granting of extradition in the absence of such a treaty.

Report of the Secretary of the Special Mission.

[Extract.]

May 18. Arrived Key West 8 a.m. Met by Captain E. E. Hayden, U. S. N., Commandant of Key West Naval Station, and Mr. Hugh S. Gibson, First Secretary, American Legation, Habana, who had been sent over by Mr. Beaupré to meet the envoys. Arrived Habana 4:30 p. m. Salutes exchanged with Cabaña fortress. Met at ship by the Honorable A. M. Beaupré, United States Minister and Chief of Special Mission; Colonel Slocum, United States Military Attaché; Mr. F. T. Coxe, Second Secretary, United States Legation; Mr. Patterson, Sub-Secretary of State of Cuba; Senator Coronado, Secretary of Cuban Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, who came as the personal representative of the President-elect; Mr. J. L. Rodgers, American Consul General; and Señor Carrillo, attached to the Special Mission. Salute of seventeen guns fired as the Special Mission left the ship.

May 19. At 9:45 the Special Mission, attended by staff and attachés, called upon Sr. Sanguily, Secretary of State, and conversed for about twenty minutes. They then repaired by motor to the Finca América, Calabazar, about eighteen miles south of Habana, to call upon President Gómez. Mr. Beaupré, in presenting his colleagues made a short address to President Gómez:

Address of the Special Mission to the retiring President, José M. Gómez, and the reply of President Gómez.1

Mr. President: Acting in accordance with the wishes of the President of the United States, we are present today as an evidence of the intimate and friendly interest of the American people and their Government in the welfare and prosperity of Cuba. We take pleasure, therefore, in extending to you the good wishes of the people of the United States and the sincere compliments of their President that you have maintained and are handing over to your successor a Government of law and order and a form of republican government which the people of the United States will be glad to see develop and prevail to the lasting good of the Cuban nation.

President Gómez replied as follows:

Mr. Minister: I am very much gratified to hear from your excellency's lips in your quality as Chief of the Special Mission sent by the President of the United States of America in courteous reciprocation of that which I had the satisfaction of sending to Washington upon the occasion of a similar event, the gracious remarks which, in expressing the wishes and sentiments of the great citizen who is now the head of the American nation wisely and gloriously to guide its destinies, are the assurance of the noble interest which the people and Government of the United States of America so sincerely feel for the happiness and prosperity of the Cuban nation and the security of its republican institutions.

In transferring within a few hours hence the Presidency of the Republic to my illustrious successor, nothing can be more pleasing to me than the solemn and encouraging remarks which you have just made, and I pray your excellency will convey to President Wilson my grateful appreciation as a Cuban and my sincere wishes for his personal welfare and for the enduring prosperity and greatness of the American nation in the deserved and unalterable affection of her other sisters of this hemisphere, for the good of humanity and the glory of civilization.

Mr. Beaupré then introduced his colleagues and staff. Informal conversation followed and finally, champagne being served, President Gómez proposed a toast to the President and people of the United States, their progress, prosperity and peace. Mr. Malone proposed the health of the President of Cuba and the welfare of the Cuban people. The party then returned to Habana.

May 20. At 9:45 the Special Mission and staff, accompanied by Commander Scales of the U. S. S. Prairie, repaired to the Senate Chamber to witness the inauguration of Vice President Varona. Seats were reserved in front row. After this ceremony the Special Mission, staff, etc., went to the Palace, where they were received by President Gómez, and remained in conversation with friends till

The following congratulatory telegram from the President of the United States to the incoming President was received by General

Menocal:

The President to the President of Cuba.2

THE WHITE HOUSE, Washington, May 20, 1913.

Upon this anniversary of the independence of the Cuban nation and the occasion of Your Excellency's inauguration, permit me to add to the message of cordial friendship conveyed by the Ministers of the United States on Special Mission my own sincerest felicitation, and also to extend my best wishes that this Government's sister Republic of Cuba may, under your administration, have great prosperity. Pray accept my own cordial wishes for your continued health and happiness.

WOODROW WILSON.

To this General Menocal replied:

The President of Cuba to the President.1

HABANA, May 20, 1913.

.It has been for me special cause of congratulation, after the delivery of the noble message of cordial friendship by the Ministers of the United States on Special Mission, to receive the telegram by which Your Excellency sent me your sincere felicitations and wishes for the success of my administration and the prosperity of Cuba. Profoundly grateful to Your Excellency, I renew to you my sentiments of cordial friendship and my aim to have the ties that bind Cuba to the United States drawn closer and closer.

Accept, Excellency, my sincere wishes for your health and happiness.

At noon General Menocal arrived to take the oath of office. dent Gómez made a short speech turning over his office; General Menocal replied, and the oath of office was administered by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. President Menocal and General Gómez then repaired to a balcony overlooking Palace Square to receive the acclamations of the crowd. Colonel de la Torriente then took oath as Secretary of State. During the ceremonies the Special Mission and staff occupied a reserved enclosure immediately in front of the dais on which the President, retiring President, Supreme Court, etc., were standing.

On returning from the balcony, President Menocal retired with his Cabinet for a short consultation, after which he returned to the State Room and passed through to the Red Room. He thereupon despatched an aide-de-camp to invite the attendance of the Special Mission of the United States of America. On entering the Red Room, Mr. Beaupré in a few words informed President Menocal of the object of the mission:

Address of the Chief of the Special Mission to the President of Cuba, Mario G.

Mr. President: It is my distinguished honor to hand to Your Excellency the letters by which the President of the United States accredits me and my colleagues on special mission near your Government. At the same time I beg to extend to you our sincere congratulations and our good wishes for the welfare of your Government.

My colleague Mr. Malone will deliver to Your Excellency a personal message of congratulation and good will from the President of the United States, whose close friend and representative he is. The terms and significance of this message afford sincere gratification to me and to my colleagues.

He then presented the letter accrediting him and his colleagues:

Letter of credence from the President, accrediting the Special Mission to the President of Cuba.

GREAT AND GOOD FRIEND: Desiring to manifest the intimate interest of the United States in the welfare of the Cuban Nation and to emphasize the close and special relationship between the two countries, I have made choice of Arthur M. Beaupré, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Cuba, Brigadier General Enoch H. Crowder, Judge Advocate General of the Army, and Dudley Field Malone, Third Assistant Secretary of State, three of our distinguished citizens, as my special representatives, each with the rank of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, on the occasion of the inauguration of Your Excellency to the Chief Magistracy of the Republic of Cuba.

I have entire confidence that they will render themselves acceptable to Your Excellency in the distinguished duty with which I have invested them.

I therefore request Your Excellency to receive them favorably and to accept from them the assurance of the high regard and friendship entertained for Your Excellency and the Government and People of Cuba by the Government and People of the United States, and of my best wishes for your personal welfare and the prosperity of the Republic over which you have been called to preside.

Your Good Friend,

WOODROW WILSON.

By the President:

W. J. BRYAN, Secretary of State.

Washington, May 14, 1913.

Mr. Malone then read the President's greeting, as follows:

Address in behalf of the President, by Mr. Malone, Minister on Special Mission, to the President of Cuba.

Mr. President: We congratulate you on this significant occasion, when, following a closely contested election and an orderly and peaceful transfer of power from the party hitherto in control to an opposition party, you come to preside over the destinies of the Cuban people. This orderly transmission of authority is most gratifying and seems to indicate that the Cuban people have successfully undergone one of the severest tests of republican government.

We bring you a cordial message of good will and encouragement in the duties which now fall to you, and we wish to express the hearty sympathy of the American people with every element of good government in Cuba. It is the wish and purpose of the President of the United States and of the Government which he represents to support firm and just government as against all elements of disorder.

As was stated by President Wilson in March last in his declaration of the policy that would be followed by the United States in its relations with its sister republics in the western hemisphere, one of the chief objects of his administration will be to cultivate their friendship, to deserve their confidence, and to promote in every proper and honorable way the interests which are common to our respective countries.

The President earnestly desires the most cordial understanding and cooperation between the United States and Cuba. He believes that such cooperation is possible only when supported at every turn by just government based upon law, upon the consent of the governed, and upon public conscience. He will seek to make these principles and a firm opposition to all arbitrary or irregular force the basis of our mutual intercourse.

The American people are the friends of peace and can have no sympathy with those who seek to seize the power of government in order to advance their personal ambitions. There can be no lasting peace in such circumstances. As friends who prefer the interests of peace and honor, the protection of private rights and respect for the restraints of constitutional provisions, mutual respect must continue to be the foundation of the friendship which exists between us.

The United States has nothing to seek in Cuba except the lasting interest of the people, the security of popular government and the development of such personal and commercial relations between Cuba and the United States as will redound to the profit and advantage of both and interfere with the right and liberties of neither.

In reiterating to you, Mr. President, these friendly assurances of the President of the United States, we desire to emphasize the carnestness and sincerity with which the people and the Government of the United States, as represented by their President, desire that the future of the Cuban nation shall be one of uninterrupted advance toward peace, prosperity and security. Our message is one of cordial friendship and felicitation. May Cuba, under your guidance, rise yet another stage upon her progress towards settled peace, happiness and contentment.

General Menocal replied as follows:

Reply of President Menocal to the Address by the Minister on Special Mission.

[Translation.]

MESSIEURS ENVOYS EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTERS PLENIPOTENTIARY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA ON SPECIAL MISSION: It is a high honor to me to receive from the hands of your excellencies the letters of credence by which the President of the United States accredits you on special mission near my Government, and, while expressing my deep appreciation of your sincere congratulations, I pray for your personal weal.

In receiving from one of you—from Mr. Malone—the personal message of congratulation and good wishes from the President of the United States, whose close friend and representative he is, I cannot refrain from asking you to inform your President that the terms and significance of his message are the source of the greatest satisfaction to me and to my Government.

It is indeed a source of gratification to all who feel an interest in the future of the Cuban Republic, that, following a closely contested election in which both sides invariably showed profound respect for the laws, the transmission of power from the party hitherto in control to the party whose candidates triumphed at the polls and which, in cooperation with me, will henceforth govern Cuba, should have been accomplished in a manner so orderly and peaceful. The Cuban people have shown by this impressive act, so satisfactorily carried out a few minutes since, that they have successfully faced one of the most difficult trials of the republican form of government which we enjoy.

The happy fact that all the inhabitants of Cuba, and particularly their political organizations, have contributed to this normal transmission of the powers of government which your excellencies have just witnessed leads us to hope that the hearty sympathy which your excellencies express to me in the name of the American people with every element of good government in Cuba may never need be translated into the necessity for material support of the firm and just government which all Cutans, without distinction of political creed, now hope we may ever enjoy. The remarks which you have just delivered in the name of the United States persuade me and all Cubans, to an even greater degree than ever before, that the nation which so decisively contributed to the birth of the Cuban Republic has not for a single moment wavered in its interest in the welfare of our people.

The relations between the great and small nations of the earth cannot be enduring and cordial save as they are inspired in a common feeling of respect and justice and, principally, a willingness on the part of the strong to help the weak. Hence the great significance for Cuba of the assurance which you give in President Wilson's name that he desires the most cordial cooperation between Cuba and the United States and that he believes that such cooperation is possible only when supported at every turn by just government based upon law, upon the consent of the governed, and upon public confidence, wherefore he will seek to make these principles and a firm opposition to all arbitrary or irregular force the basis of our mutual intercourse.

The purpose of Cuba, and, in her behalf, of my Government this day inaugurated, to maintain the most cordial relations with all the governments of the world necessarily leads her to cultivate by the most honorable and appropriate means the interests which are common to the peoples who inhabit this western hemisphere, destined to such a large share in the great civilization of which we form part. And in order that all may cooperate for the accomplishment of the purposes which President Wilson announced in his statements of last March, it is also indispensable that all shall feel that they are protected in their rights as truly free and independent peoples who while conscious of their rights are equally cognizant and mindful of their international obligations. Such are the bases of that mutual respect if it is to endure. This respect fortunately already exists, and I am more than ever confident that President Wilson and I will jointly strive to augment it—he as the head of one of the greatest nations of the earth, and I as the head of one of the smallest, but equal in our common sense of right and duty.

The United States has already given to the world palpable proofs of her great concern in the lasting interest of my people and Government; and therefore President Wilson and I will, I am sure, during the terms of our respective administrations, find the means of developing, to a greater extent even than now, such personal and commercial relations between Cuba and the United States as will redound to the advantage of both countries and interfere with the rights and liberties of neither people.

I pray your excellencies will undertake to convey to President Wilson and the great and noble American people who did so much for Cuba in her days of greatest woe, along with our compliments, the most profound and cordial assurance of the sincere and loyal friendship of the Cuban people, of their Government, and of myself personally; and that at the same time you will express to President Wilson my best wishes for his personal happiness.

Mr. Beaupré presented his colleagues and staff; complimentary remarks were exchanged, and the Special Mission and staff retired.

At 7.30 p. m. Mr. and Mrs. Beaupré gave a dinner at the Legation in honor of the newly appointed Secretary of State, Colonel de la Torriente. Besides the Special Mission and staff there were present Mrs. Torriente, Mr. Montoro, appointed Presidential Secretary, and Mrs. Montoro, Mr. Patterson, Sub-Secretary of State, and Mrs. Patterson, Doctor Desvernine, of the Cuban Special Mission to the inauguration of the President, and Mr. Rivero, Chief of same and Cuban Minister to Washington.

May 21. At 9 a. m. Mr. Malone repaired to the Caballería wharf to embark. Besides the other members of the Special Mission and staff, Mr. Torriente, Secretary of State, and Mr. Patterson, Sub-Secretary of State, were present to bid him good-bye. On arrival on board,

Mr. Malone was rendered a Minister's salute.

President Menocal, desirous of expressing in the highest degree his appreciation of the sending of the Special Mission to his inauguration, attached on this day, his first in office, two officers as A. D. C. to the Special Envoys remaining in Habana: Captain de Cárdenas to Mr. Beaupré, Major Silva to General Crowder.

In the evening a gala performance was given at the Opera in honor of President Menocal, which he attended with the members of his family. The audience was large and brilliant and all the Cabinet, most of the diplomatic corps, and a great number of prominent Habanese were present. Two boxes were placed at the disposal of the Special Mission and the entire personnel thereof (except Mr. Malone) attended: Mr. and Mrs. Beaupré; General Crowder; Mr. Bell; Mr. Gibson; Colonel and Mrs. Slocum; Mr. Coxe; Major Silva; Captain de Cárdenas; Mr. Carrillo.

May 22. The only official function on this day was a banquet given by the Secretary of State and Señora de la Torriente at the Department of State to the Special Mission. Besides Mr. Beaupré, General Crowder and the staff of the Special Mission there were present the Vice President of Cuba; the retiring Vice President; most of the Cabinet and their wives; the retiring Secretary of State; the Sub-Secretary of State, and several Senators and Deputies; also the Mayor, the Speaker and the ex-Speaker—a thoroughly representative gathering of the most prominent people in official life in Cuba. There were no speeches.

May 23. General Crowder, accompanied by Mr. Bell, left on the P. & O. Mascotte for Key West. Mr. Beaupré and the staff of the Special Mission and the Legation were present to bid farewell to General Crowder, as well as the Secretary and Sub-Secretary of State of Cuba, several other officials, and a number of personal friends.

Sir: Referring to previous correspondence in regard to the so-called insurrectionary claims of British, French and German subjects against the Republic of Cuba, I have the honor to report that President Gómez has addressed a message to Congress in request of authorization to arbitrate these claims. There is little, if any, likelihood of action by Congress during the present session which, if the custom of former years is observed, will adjourn some time next month reconvening the first Monday in April.

Sir: Referring to my despatch No. 612, of January 29, 1913, reporting [etc.] I have the honor further to report that bills carrying out the President's recommendation have been drafted by the committees on Foreign Affairs, and Justice and Codes, and submitted to the House for consideration.

Both bills in effect contemplate authorizing the President of the Republic to enter into an agreement with the powers concerned for submitting to arbitration the principle involved, that is to say, whether the Republic of Cuba is responsible for damages to property of British, German and French subjects alleged to have been caused by Cuban revolutionary forces in the war of 1895–98. The bill of the Committee on Foreign Affairs authorizes the Executive to enter into an agreement with the interested powers, in the event that the arbitration is decided against Cuba, for the appointment of a commission to which determination of the individual claims shall be referred. This bill further provides that, after the commission in question shall have completed its labors, its findings shall be submitted to Congress for approval in accordance with the "first transitory provision" of the Constitution. The bill of the Committee on Justice and Codes provides that in the event of a decision unfavorable to Cuba, the Executive shall enter into agreement with the claimant powers for the determination of individual claims by a commission, which agreement shall be "submitted to the Senate for approval in accordance article 47 of the Constitution." It contains no provision for the ultimate submittal of the findings of this commission to Congress, as does the bill of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Sin: Referring to my despatch No. 654 of the 15th instant [etc.], I have the honor to report that at yesterday's session of the House the bill of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was approved and now goes to the Senate for action.

The text of this bill is as follows:

Article 1. The President of the Republic may enter into an agreement of arbitration with the accredited representatives of the Governments of Germany, England and France, for the purpose of determining whether the Republic of Cuba may be held responsible for damages to property of subjects of those nations alleged to have been caused by the revolutionary forces during the war of 1895–98.

Article 2. In the event that the tribunal of arbitration shall decide against the contention of the Republic of Cuba that the Republic is in no wise liable for the aforesaid damages, the President of the Republic is hereby authorized to enter into an agreement with the Governments of Germany, England and France for the formation of a commission to consider and pass upon claims filed in due time and form by subjects of those nations; the findings of which commission shall be duly submitted to the consideration and approval of the Congress of the Republic in conformity with the terms of the first transitory provision of the Constitution.

This Government cordially approves the measures pending in the Cuban Congress designed to create boards for the arbitration of claims of European citizens against Cuba. We are informed that the former administration indorsed similar bills and we are in harmony with the principle of arbitration. You will make a statement in the above sense to the Cuban Government.

Legación de Cuba, Washington, D. C.

MEMORANDUM.

In reference to the interview held yesterday between the Honorable Secretary of State of the United States and the appointed Minister of Cuba, the reasons are hereafter stated on which the Government of Cuba objects to submit to arbitration the claims presented jointly by the Governments of Great Britain, Germany and France for damages alleged to have been caused to properties belonging respectively to the subjects of those nations, by Cuban revolutionary forces during the war for independence:

First. Because recourse to arbitration can be advised only whenever there shall be apparent grounds for differences of opinion on the subject at issue, and not when the facts are so clear and such as make it reasonably impossible to differ in opinion on the question.

Second. Because in the case of the above-mentioned claims, the facts are so clear that they exclude all possibility of any differences of opinion as to the conclusions to be inferred from them.

Third. The facts are:

(a) That the Cuban forces which are alleged to have caused the damages were not granted belligerent rights either by Spain,

Great Britain, Germany or France.

(b) That the war for independence was followed, after the war of the United States against Spain, by a treaty of peace made in Paris between commissioners representing only the Government of Spain and that of the United States, no participation therein having been given to the Cuban Revolutionary Government.

(c) That pursuant to that treaty an American Military Government was established in Cuba, which lasted until the 20th of May of 1902.

(d) That the Constitution was framed by a Cuban Convention called together by the American Military Government in Cuba, and the United States approved the Constitution thus framed, and ordered that a republic be established under it.

(e) That the Republic of Cuba was recognized by all the foreign Powers, as established and regulated by the Constitution, against the provisions of which they made no protest.

(f) That the Constitution provides in one of its transitory provisions, that the Republic of Cuba did not recognize any debt of liability except that legitimately incurred for the benefit of the revolution by the Chiefs of Corps of the Liberating Army, after the 24th of February, 1895, and prior to the 19th of September of the same year, on which date the Constitution of Jimaguayú was promulgated, and the debts and liabilities subsequently incurred by the Revolutionary Government or its legitimate representatives abroad. Congress will determine said debts and liabilities, and resolve accordingly for the payment of those that are legiti-

(g) The properties for the damages of which the claims are made, were properties held and operated under the rule of the Spanish Government, to which taxes were to be paid according to law, and the products or crops of which were sent to and sold in Spanish cities, and accordingly those properties were under the control of the enemy, and served their interests. The principle of international law was announced by the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission (Principles 7th and 8th), and many other precedents and authorities, pursuant to which the property of alien residents like that of subjects or citizens of the country, when in the track of war is subject to war casualties, and whatever in front of the advancing forces either impedes them or might give them aid when appropriated, or if left unmolested in their rear might afford aid and comfort to the enemy, may be taken or destroyed by the armies of either of the belligerents; and no liability whatever is understood to attach to the government of the country whose flag that army bears, and whose battles it may be fighting because the destruction of property in war, where a military end is served, is legitimate.

(i) The Cuban military forces were not responsible belligerents at the time when the injuries to the properties were effected, and they could not be held responsible subsequently for acts for which they were not accountable when they were execucuted, and much less can the Republic of Cuba be held liable if it is borne in mind that it came to life as late thereafter as the 20th of May of 1902.

The present Government of the Republic of Cuba is legally unable to assent to arbitration of the above-mentioned claims, because it would infringe the constitutional provision whereby the liabilities of Cuba are limited to the debts expressly mentioned in the Constitution.

The claims now before the Cuban Government were originally filed with the Government of Spain, which was held then by the Powers now pressing the claims as alone responsible

(1) Article 7 of the Treaty of Paris relieves Spain of her liability for all damages caused to American citizens arising during the insurrection, the fact being that Spain did not disclaim her original liability for all those damages.

(m) The contention of the claimant nations that the former President of Cuba has committed himself regarding the arbitration of the claims cannot be sustained on legal grounds, for the reason that, even admitting for the sake of the argument that such has been the case, it would not bind the present Government or any government whatever; because, first, such arbitration is inconsistent with the above-mentioned provisions of the Constitution of Cuba, against which no government can go, and which are certainly well known by the claiming Powers; and, second, in such matters the present administration of Cuba is not concluded [sic] by the acts of its predecessor.

A bill was introduced, some time ago, in the Congress of Cuba, providing for submission to some kind of arbitration, of the claims which Great Britain, Germany and France have filed with the Cuban Government, for damages done to the properties belonging to citizens of those nations by the forces of the Cuban Revolution for Independence.

The bill has not ultimately passed, and accordingly has not become a law, so that now the President of Cuba is the one called upon to decide the future course that the Cuban Government should adopt in regard to those claims.

pursuant to Cuban law.

Confidential advices from the Secretary of State of Cuba suggest, though only tentatively, that the best course to pursue is to undertake, first of all, a close examination of each and every one of the claims, so as to determine: first, whether the claimants are really of English, German or French nationality; second, whether their claims are such as may be judged of and approved by Congress pursuant to the first Transient Provision of the Constitution of Cuba; third, whether the titles of the claimants to the properties are good titles

If the result of this examination should be, as it will most probably be the case, that some or many of the claims are not such as may be covered by the above-mentioned Transient Provision of the Constitution, the Government of Cuba will have to contend that it cannot assent to an acknowledgment and payment of those claims, and the European Governments will, on the other side, argue that Cuba must pay those claims, there arising accordingly a conflict of views between the Governments of the three claiming Powers and the Government of Cuba, and then will be the opportunity to consider whether the question at issue should be submitted to arbitration.

What the arbitrators would have to decide upon, would be whether in view that the Constitution of Cuba does not permit the payment of that class of claims, and in view that the only Cuban Government recognized by the above-mentioned Powers has been the Constitutional Government of Cuba as it was established when Cuba was constituted as an independent Power on the 20th of May of 1902, which Government cannot violate its own Constitution, and in view that the same Powers did never grant belligerent rights to the Cuban Revolutionists, and, on the contrary, accepted the assertion constantly made by Spain that there was no state of war in Cuba but only an uprising of a few or many rebel subjects of the Government of Spain, to which accordingly they favored with sales of arms and ammunition—whether in view of all this the above-mentioned Powers are justified in presenting now those claims for acts which took place before the advent and birth of the Cuban Republic which was established with its present status pursuant to a law of the Congress of the United States and by order of the President of the same country, who, in his letter of May 10th, 1902, and dated in Washington and addressed to the President and Congress of the Republic of Cuba, said: "On the 20th of the present month the Military Government of Cuba, complying with my instructions, will turn over to you the command and government of the Island of Cuba, so that you may thereafter exercise said command and government pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution approved by your Constitutional Convention, and as promulgated on that day, and he will at that moment declare that the occupation of Cuba by the United States has come to an end."

In case that the award of the arbitrators should be against Cuba, then and only then will the time come to consider and decide as to the appointment of a commission which may consist of one arbitrator for us and another for the three Powers, with a president appointed by a friendly Government not interested in any of the points submitted, which commission shall decide the cases in which Cuba should pay and the amounts to be paid, according, of course, to the principles of international law, but provided that the claims or that part thereof as may arise from damages caused in the course of or as a result of military operations or by the necessities of war or caused in properties of claimants who may have sided with the Spanish Government or given it any aid as, for instance, paying taxes to same or the like, shall be rejected.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

MEMORANDUM.

The desire of the Cuban Government for full information as to the ownership and nature of the claims which the foreign Powers desire to arbitrate seems to be altogether reasonable. It is doubtful, however, whether either in the preliminary examination of the claims by the Cuban Government or in their subsequent arbitration, if one should be agreed upon, the First Transient Provision of the Constitution of Cuba would play an important part. For so thinking there are two reasons. The first of these is that a government is not permitted to set up, as a final answer to demands for the performance of international obligations, provisions of its municipal law, either constitutional or statutory. This principle has been clearly established on many occasions, and very notably in the settlement of the so-called Alabama claims by means of the award of the Geneva Tribunal. In the second place, it is by no means clear that the First Transient Provision forbids the Cuban Government to recognize claims not therein mentioned. The language of the provision is that the Republic of Cuba "does not recognize" any other debts or obligations than those therein mentioned, and that the Cuban Congress "shall examine said debts and obligations and decide upon the payment of those which are found legitimate." The debts and obligations thus referred to are those "legitimately contracted in favor of the revolution" by commanders of the liberating army before September 19, 1895, and by the revolutionary government after that date. These words indicate that the object of the first transient provision was primarily to recognize and provide for the payment of a certain class of claims. It gave no recognition to other claims; but, in view of the principle above mentioned, it can scarcely be construed as having been intended to forbid the Cuban Government to recognize claims for which it might be liable under international law.

It may be doubted whether, as a matter of practical procedure, it would be desirable to have two processes of arbitration, one for the purpose of determining general questions of liability under international law and the other for the purpose of passing upon the actual claims. There is, however, something to be said in favor of such a course; and, if it should be thought best to adopt it, the immediate submission to arbitration of some or all of points (a) to (m) of the first memorandum of the Cuban Legation would seem to be a logical step. But it is conceivable that practical considerations may lead the Cuban Government to desire first to make a preliminary ex-

The Cuban Secretary of State to the French Minister to Cuba.

Foreign Office, Habana, August 18, 1913.

Mr. Minister: Pursuant to what was stated in my note of the 5th of June last , I hasten to inform your excellency of which is the view of the President of the Republic and its Government, in the matter of the claims of some English, German and French citizens for acts that took place during the war for the independence of Cuba, and of the best plan to be followed in order to reach a final decision of the questions arising out of those claims, which will be the means of strengthening, still more than they are at present, the good relations which happily exist between the Cuban Republic and the three claiming Powers ever since the former came into national life on the 20th of May, 1902, and its Constitutional Government was recognized, for the first time, by the three Powers.

Neither the first Government of the Republic of Cuba which was presided over by Señor Estrada Palma—to which in 1903 it was made known that there were French, English and German nationals who believed themselves entitled to file specific pecuniary claims arising out of the war of independence against Spain, notwithstanding that ¹This note was also sent to the Ministers of Germany and Great Britain. ²See Mr. Bcaupré's telegram of June 6, second paragraph.

their respective Governments did never grant belligerent rights to the Revolutionary Government, and for which reason those nationals could never be entitled to consideration as neutrals in that struggle, not only because they always maintained their allegiance to the Government of Spain and paid taxes to it, helping said Government to defray the expenses of the war, but also because Spain had always facilities of all kinds and of which the revolutionists were deprived of, to obtain loans, arms and ammunition and vessels in England, Germany and France, which Spain made use of in order to wage a war of extermination against the Cuban patriots-neither that first Government ever requested that the claims should be presented in due form, so as to be able to examine them, and find out in what they consisted, and separating and classifying them, neither did the Government of President Gomez ask to have same duly filed, for it confined itself only to denying the soundness of the majority of the said claims, until finally, and in view of the insistence of the claiming Powers that some solution be forthcoming, for which end they proposed in their joint notes of July 3rd, 1911, the submission of the claims to an international arbitration, it accepted in principle said arbitration in a note of the Secretary of State, Mr. Sanguily, of July 10th, 1911, and addressed to the Diplomatic Representatives of the three Powers, proposing the acceptance, as the sole arbitrator, of the President of the United States of America, Mr. Taft, and reserving to specify the matter which should be the subject of the arbitration.

The non-acceptance of that sole arbitrator by the three Powers, and their proposal of the 9th of August, 1911, that in view of the international importance of the decision, the arbitration should be entrusted to a commission in which the three Powers should be represented, caused my learned and honorable predecessor to suggest, on the 12th of said month and year, to the Representatives of the Powers that inasmuch as they had declined to accept the proposition of having recourse to a sole arbitrator, the Government of the Republic might judge itself free from the obligations that they wanted to impose on him, and the ground of which might have been the acceptance in principle of the arbitration proposition that was made to them, but as the Powers on the 7th of November 1911, again insisted that the question be submitted to an international arbitration, inasmuch as the Government of Cuba, when it proposed the arbitrator of a head of a nation had, in their judgment bound itself to adopt the principle of arbitration, although not to any specific procedure therefor, he stated on the 28th of February 1912 that the Government did not at that time reject in principle, as it had not rejected before, the recourse to arbitration, for on the contrary it reiterated its adhesion to that principle of deciding through that method the international conflicts of all of which there was unequivocal evidence in the Convention of The Hague of the 18th of October, 1907, which was signed by the Delegates and approved by the Senate on the 10th of March 1909, and in the other Convention of Rio de Janeiro of the 13th of August 1906, which by reason of the recess of the Senate of the Republic was approved and ratified by the Provisional Governor, on the 17th of March 1908, who hastened to declare in the name of the Government of the Republic of Cuba that this Republic was always disposed to pay what it may legitimately be indebted for and should be proved beyond any sort of doubt.

The Diplomatic Representatives of the three claiming Powers addressed again a new joint note to the Department of State on the 20th of December 1912, setting forth that they had carefully examined the reply of the Cuban Government dated the 28th of February 1912, and that inasmuch as the Government had in principle accepted the arbitration for the satisfaction of the indemnities claimed by the subjects of the three countries, they had the honor to renew their propositions on the 7th of November 1911 and, consequently, they submitted to the acceptance of the Cuban Government a plan for the arbitration which was annexed to their note, and on the 30th of that same month of December, the Secretary of State, Mr. Sanguily, informed the Representatives of the three Powers that the Government did not agree with the terms of the agreement on arbitration, and that it would draw, at the proper time, its objections and counter propositions, but that it would appeal to Congress for the request of the necessary authority to agree on the arbitration in regard to the claims for damages, notwithstanding and by reason of the circumstance, that these claims were not covered by the text of the First Transitory Provision of the Constitution which pointed out specifically which obligations and debts incurred into by the Revolution were accepted by the Republic and said Constitution had instituted, and that in case that Congress should authorize the execution of the agreement that might be stipulated, it should be submitted to the approval of the Senate—the Secretary of State reproducing in the memorandum in which he set forth the above, the assertion which he had already made on other occasions that it would always be necessary to appeal to Congress for the case included in the above mentioned Transitory Provision of the Constitution, and for the indispensable appropriation that the arbitration trial and its incidentals would demand—the President of the Republic having shortly afterwards sent a message to Congress describing the condition in which the matter stood, and asking authorization to stipulate, with the approval of the Senate, the agreement of arbitration that it might be necessary to arrange with the three powers.

The decision, which in its last sessions and before it adjourned in the last month of June was adopted in the Congress of the Republic in the direction of not giving its approval to the plan for submitting to a tribunal of arbitration the claims filed by the Governments of England, Germany and France, has left an open field for the President of Cuba to initiate again the negotiations in order to reach a decision which may be satisfactory, by its being founded on justice with or without arbitration, or with an arbitration which may have as a subject matter those points only which should be considered as essential in the matter, and which arbitration should at the proper date be set forth in an agreement which must be submitted to the approval of the Senate of the Republic.

It is a clear fact that the Government, moved as it is by its wish to reach a final decision, cannot but need to that end a full information of all the dates and antecedents of the claims referred to, especially in what it refers to the nationality of the claimants their property titles, and the exact and specific circumstance about the date of the fact on which the indemnity applied for rests, about the place in which they took place, and the verification of the exact amount claimed.

It is not possible, indeed, to advance a step forward in this matter of the claims, without knowing before their essential ground of facts in regard to the nationality and the other above mentioned circumstances because if those elements of nationality, of the title of such property as the claimants alleged to belong to them and the setting forth of the facts which, as the claimants allege, justify their claims and its amounts were lacking, it would not be possible to deal with the subject since it would not even have the foundation of fact set forth by the claimants themselves as the grounds for their allegations.

Up to the present time there are on the files of the State Department no other records in regard to these claims than the concise filed in regard to same, and containing the name of the claimant, the place in which it is alleged that the facts took place and the amount in which the claimant appraises his claim, with some other circumstances which do not complete the amount of information that the Cuban Government needs in order to consider, with full knowledge of causes, the problem that is in course of decision.

Accordingly, the Cuban Government believes that it is indispensable for the proper consideration of the matter, that the claims should be filed, together with the documents which should prove the nationality of the claimants, and with those that may also contain the title to the estate of property under discussion with a sworn statement of the fact on which the claim may rest, and of the evidence thereof, as also of such principles of international law as in the judgment of the claimant, may justify the claims, notwithstanding that it is positive that in the majority of the cases the facts have occurred in the course of war, and as a necessary military operation or for necessities of the campaign at the time in which the present Republic of Cuba had not come into existence and in regard to persons who were not neutrals, inasmuch as they lived officially under the flag of Spain when the latter was the sovereign of Cuba, and the respective Governments of the claimants had not granted belligerent rights to the revolutionary Government

I feel great satisfaction in communicating to your excellency that, with the data and antecedents at hand, the Cuban Government, within the natural and necessary and usual delay in those cases, be able to consider the matter so as to finally decide as to its attitude on those claims, and decide whether, if in fact, the Government of Cuba would be or not justified in accepting in principle and subjecting to evidence all such as may be proper, the propriety of claims of that kind, or in case it should not accept that propriety, whether it would be proper to submit the question of the responsibility of the Republic to an arbitration in the form and terms which might be agreed upon, and which would differ a great deal from the agreement proposed by the powers and with the understanding that if Cuba should acknowledge as liability in that respect or it should be declared by a Tribunal of Arbitration, then and only then would it undertake to decide specific ally each one of the claims in accordance with the evidence that may be produced, and with the principles of International Law on those

Nothing, however, of what is stated in the foregoing paragraph would be possible if the above mentioned data and documents of nationality, titles to property and facts causing the claims and its amount are not presented to the Government, for this is the basis which is under discussion and without that ground, even its consideration would not be possible, for it would be regretful to have to employ time and perhaps to have to defray the expenses of an arbitration on claims lacking even the elements of nationality, titles and the other before mentioned circumstances.

On the other hand, the filing of all data heretofore set forth will permit the Cuban Government to examine the claims and duly classify them in order that those governed by the First Transitory Provision of the Constitution of the Republic may be referred to Congress, pursuant to that legal rule, so as for its consideration on evidence that may be required and produced, and the voting of the appropriation necessary for its payment and in regard to the other claims, to decide in view of the merits of each one of them whether the Government of the Republic may go forward to consider them on the ground of their being no doubt as to the allegest nationality and property title, and because the damage which it is alleged to have been caused should be proved, with the purpose of specifying the reasons on which the Government may ground its refusal to pay in opposition to the assertion of the claimants, as sustained by his Government, all of this bringing about the divergence of views, which may justify the recourse to international arbitration as a means of deciding on said divergence, the Government of Cuba presided over by General Menocal showing thereby that it maintains, because it was thus expressed by the preceding Government, its adhesion to the principle of arbitration.

Although it may seem unnecessary, the Government of Cuba wishes that the Government of your excellency should take notice of the declaration which it now makes to the effect that the claims that are to be examined are those contained in the statements filed by the Representatives of the three Powers up to the time that Congress rejected the bill before mentioned, and that it could not admit or receive new claims arising out of acts occurred prior to the Independence of Cuba for in the course of the years elapsed since the advent of the Cuban Republic to international life, on the 20th of May 1902, there has been sufficient time to file the claims, and it is not possible that the Cuban State should be subject to an indefinite period of time to the troubles and inconveniences which will be brought about to its credit and tranquillity by new claims of the nature of such that are under the files of the Department of State, and which will be the ones to be examined at present on being filed in due form, that is to say, as it has been set forth in the foregoing paragraph of this Note.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 11, 1913.

Sir: Referring to your No. 571 of December 27, the Department desires to say that it submitted the agreement between the United States and Cuba for the enlargement of the Guantánamo Naval Station to the Secretary of the Navy. He points out a slight error occurring in the English text of paragraph 11 of article I.

You will perceive that this paragraph was correct in the draft furnished with your No. 477 of October 23 last, which reads:

"From the western extremity of this line, a curved line running in coincidence with the northeastern and northern shore line of Flamingo Cay," etc.

The present agreement substitutes the word "northwestern" for the word "northeastern," an evident error as is shown by the Spanish text, which is correct. It is not known, of course, whether this error also exists in the Cuban original, but I return the agreement forwarded by you in order that correction may be made in both originals if necessary. The correction may be made and signed by the initials of the plenipotentiaries in the margin of the text.

You will return the agreement as soon as possible after correction.

the Cuban Senate to defer action upon the recent agreement for the enlargement of the Guantánamo naval station. Some senators are said to pretend that they object to alienating such a large portion of the national territory. I visited the Cuban Secretary of State yesterday morning and discussed these rumors with him. Mr. Sanguily assured me that, while a disposition was indeed apparent upon the part of the Senate to delay action upon the agreement, there was no actual opposition to its terms—the various objections stated being merely pretext for deferring action. He believes that it is the purpose of certain senators to avoid any responsibility in the matter by leaving the approval of the treaty to the next Senate, which will come into office on May 20th, or, in other words, those whose terms now expire (none of whom were reelected) may be looking forward to an opportunity of making political capital among their constituencies out of the fact that they were sufficiently courageous to oppose the approval of a treaty alienating to a foreign power a considerable portion of the national territory. Mr. Sanguily is of the opinion that it is possible that they may succeed.

CUBAN AMNESTY BILL —ATTITUDE OF THE UNITED STATES.

File No. 837.13/2.

The American Minister to the Secretary of State.

[Extract.]

No. 560.]

American Legation, Habana, December 19, 1912.

Sir: I have the honor to inclose herewith the text, in copy and translation, of an amnesty bill passed by the House of Representatives on the 16th instant. * * * This bill, in addition to granting amnesty to all those participating in the recent negro uprising, includes in its terms persons guilty of certain minor offenses and (article 2) all public officials or employees guilty of crimes committed before August 12, 1912, in regard to which proceedings were instituted or conviction was had prior to that date. It is understood that this provision will affect only a few convicted officials whom the Executive can not pardon, as well as two or three against whom charges are pending.

The granting of an amnesty to the negro rebels would seem to be an unwise measure in view of the premium which it apparently places upon armed revolt, but there are so many negroes in jail that the Government is placed at considerable expense for their maintenance.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 6, 1913—7 p. m.

Including, as it does, other than political offenders, this Government fears that the amnesty bill, if enacted as passed by the House, would create an unfortunate impression that common crimes were allowed to go unpunished in Cuba, and that thus crime was not dealt with in the manner found necessary in all countries to the adequate protection of life, property, and individual liberty. You will make clear orally to the Government of Cuba this apprehension which arises from the friendly interest which the Government of the United States necessarily takes.

Sin: Referring to the Department's telegram of January 6, 7 p. m., I have the honor to report that I had an interview with President Gómez this morning regarding the amnesty bill recently passed by the Cuban House of Representatives and explained to him the fears of the Government of the United States that if the bill should become law, including, as it does, other than political offenders, an unfortunate impression would be created that common crimes were allowed to go unpunished in Cuba, and that thus crime was not dealt with in the manner found necessary in all countries for the adequate protection of life, property, and individual liberty. I made this apprehension quite clear to the President, and stated that it arose from the friendly interest which the Government of the United States necessarily takes in such matters.

The President said, in reply, that he thoroughly agreed with the views of the United States Government in this matter; that, as a matter of fact, he had never read the amnesty bill; that he would at once send for it, examine it, and then take such action as he could to comply with your expressed opinions, so that at any rate if the bill should pass it would grant amnesty only to political offenders.

I also called at the Cuban Foreign Office and made similar statements to Mr. Patterson, the Subsecretary of State.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Habana, March 4, 1913—12 noon.

In final form the amnesty bill covers, in addition to rebellion and incitement thereto, the following common crimes and misdemeanors when prosecutable by the State—that is to say, without formal complaint of alleged party:

ARTICLE 1. Those committed through medium of the press, engraving or other mechanical means, or by word of mouth; those committed by persons who have occupied or occupy the elective offices of provincial governor or mayor, crimes against property or honor and embezzlement excluded; simple or reckless imprudence, and coercion or conditional threats except when accompanied by demands of money or contemplating destruction of property; those committed in connection with workmen's strikes.

Art. 2. Public employees or officials, without prior criminal record, who are serving sentences, provided they make good any civil liability.

ART. 3. Unchanged.

ART. 4. Enlisted men of army and rural guard guilty of perjury.

Amnesty applies to crimes enumerated committed prior to Januarv 1, 1913.

PRO MEMORIA.

The Secretary of State of the Republic of Cuba has addressed a cablegram to the Cuban Minister in which he states that in his desire, which is shared by the majority of the members of the Cuban Congress, of avoiding any cause or pretext that may tend to alter the cordial relations which exist between Cuba and the United States he has been endeavoring to ascertain what are the features of the amnesty bill, pending of approval by the President, which have been found objectionable to the Government of the United States, with the view of procuring their elimination.

But the Secretary of State has not been able to glean from the numerous notes addressed to him by the American Minister at Habana what precepts contained in that bill are believed to cause injury in any manner to American or other foreign citizens, as no specific article or paragraph has been pointed out by the American Minister; and he therefore instructs the Cuban Minister to request of the Secretary of State of the United States that he indicate the terms of said amnesty bill that are understood to be injurious, and to that effect copy of the bill, and of the articles of the Cuban penal code referred to in the same, are herewith appended.

The Secretary of State of the Republic of Cuba instructs the Cuban Minister to assure the Secretary of State of the United States that this action is inspired by the earnest desire of the Cuban Government and the people of Cuba of strengthening the bonds of friendship and the cordial feelings that happily exist between the two countries, based upon international comity and respect for their mutual rights.

As the time within which the President of Cuba must sign or veto the above-mentioned bill has almost elapsed, while waiting for a specific objection from the American Minister, the Cuban Minister respectfully requests an early reply, so that the Cuban Government may be enabled to show its good faith and sincerity of purpose on the premises.

LAW OF AMNESTY.

ARTICLE I. Amnesty is hereby granted for the following crimes and misdemeanors prosecutable de officio:

(a) All crimes and misdemeanors committed by means of printing, engraving, or other mechanical method of publication, or by word of mouth.

(b) All crimes committed by individuals who have been occupying or who occupy elective offices of provincial governor or of municipal mayor. Crimes against property, against honor, and those of malversation are excepted.

(c) For crimes of disrespect or transgression against authority or its agents.
(d) Crimes of rash or ordinary imprudence, of coercion or conditional threats which have not had as their object the demand of money or damage to property, and of the crimes of prolongation or usurpation of office.

(e) For crimes and misdemeanors committed by reason of laborers' strikes. (f) All crimes of exciting rebellion, rebellion and crimes related thereto, and unlawful association, with the exception of those included in the first paragraph of article 186 of the penal code.

ART. II. Annesty is hereby granted for all crimes and misdemeanors committed by public functionaries or employees in the exercise of or in connection with their duties in respect to which criminal proceedings have been instituted or judgment rendered.

ART. III. Amnesty is furthermore granted for crimes of the discharge of firearms against an ascertained person and the discharge of firearms and wounds [sic], provided that they have not left incapacitated the wounded person and without prejudice to civil responsibility.

ART. IV. Those enlisted in the permanent army and in the rural guard who may have committed the crime of perjury are included in the amnesty.

ART. V. The amnesty which this law comprises shall include the crimes expressed therein committed before the 1st of January of the present year.

AIDE MÉMOIRE.

The Department of State acknowledges the receipt of the Cuban Minister's pro memoria, dated March 10, 1913, wherein reference is made to the amnesty bill recently passed by the Cuban Congress and wherein the Cuban Minister informs the Department that the Secretary of State of Cuba has not been able to ascertain from the numerous notes addressed to him by the American Minister at Habana what precepts contained in the amnesty bill are believed to cause injury in any manner to American or other foreign citizens, adding that no specific article or paragraph has been pointed out by the American Minister, and that the Cuban Minister has consequently been instructed to request of the Department of State that it indicate the terms of the amnesty bill that are understood to be injurious. A copy of the bill and of certain articles of the Cuban penal code accompany the pro memoria.

In reply the Department of State informs the Cuban Minister that the objections to the bill in its provisions other than those providing for the granting of amnesty to political offenders would seem to be manifest from the terms of the bill itself, quite apart from the statements made respecting it in the various communications hitherto addressed to the Cuban Government, as well as from the discussion which the American Legation has had with the Cuban authorities which earlier led to the declaration of the President of Cuba that in view of these objections he would in any event take such action with respect to the bill, if passed, as would cause it to grant amnesty only to political offenders.

It may at this time, however, be reiterated that the bill in its articles 1, 3 and 4 appears to grant amnesty for a large number of common crimes committed both by individuals and by Government officials. In its article 2 it grants without any limitation whatsoever amnesty for all crimes and misdemeanors committed by public functionaries or employees in the exercise of or in connection with their duties in respect to which criminal proceedings have been instituted or judgment rendered. (Reference, of course, is to be made to article 5, which limits the amnesty to crimes committed before the 1st of January of the present year.) Aside from the injury to American citizens and others by the denial of legal recourse for wrongs inflicted upon them by the persons whom these provisions would absolve from responsibility, specific instances of which are understood to have been called to the attention of the Cuban Government, it would appear that in general, as previously indicated, the bill as a result of practically all its provisions would create a situation with respect to the administration of law and the enforcement of justice in Cuba which would seem to evidence a failure of the Cuban Government adequately to protect life, property and individual liberty.

The objection of this Government, therefore, to the bill is that, in all its provisions, with the exception of those applying to political offenses, it would seem to threaten consequences which both Governments desire to avoid.

Amnesty is hereby granted for all crimes committed in connection with the rebellion of 1912; and for crimes of a similar character committed in connection with or in consequence of political or electoral struggles either by individuals or by the press when the penalty is not of the afflictive grade (as defined by code) excepting in the case of the press offenses against the law of nations. Such crimes in order to come within the terms of this amnesty shall have been committed prior to January 1 of the present year.

The so-called electoral offenses—including frauds and all preelection and postelection personal assaults, etc., which can in any way be connected with "political struggles"—are now introduced for the first time.

Speaker Ferrara, seconded by Oscar Soto, the Congressman who acknowledged authorship of libellous attacks on Legation which appeared in Cuban newspaper, introduced a resolution providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the behavior of the American Government.

Sir: Referring to recent telegraphic correspondence in regard to the amnesty bill, and particularly to my telegram of March 15, I have the honor more fully to report upon the motion presented by Speaker Ferrara and others to the House of Representatives on March 14.

This motion recites in preamble that it is currently reported in the press and elsewhere that in the past few days the Cuban Executive has received "repeated notes" from the Government of the United States affirming that the provisions of the Platt Amendment are opposed to the "measure of clemency" contemplated in the amnesty bill; and while the "representatives of the nation" have not been unaware that for some time one of the parties to the Platt Amendment has been giving it a "broad and erroneous construction," they believe, nevertheless, that if current reports about the notes concerning the amnesty are true, the action of the United States is a "patent violation of the national sovereignty" of Cuba.

"Be it therefore resolved", the motion continues, "that the House

"Be it therefore resolved", the motion continues, "that the House appoint a committee of its members, chosen from the several political parties, for the purpose of investigating whether the Government of the United States has formulated demands upon the Government of Cuba which might be regarded as harmful to the sovereignty of Cuba; and that the said committee shall, with the urgency which the question requires, report its findings to the House."

Another motion upon the same subject, signed also by Ferrara and others, was presented at vesterday's session. This motion recites that there is an insistent public demand in Cuba for an authoritative definition "of the true and rightful scope of the Platt Amendment", in view of the many "contradictory interpretations in its application" by the American Government, and cites in this connection the recent utterances of Senator Bacon on this subject in the United States Senate. The motion then provides for a resolution declaring—

First, that the Cuban people have always regarded the Platt Amendment compatible with their independence and self-government with certain restrictions, which in order to guarantee that independence, the several clauses thereof provide.

Second, that the [Cuban] Congress will oppose any act of a foreign power contrary to the lawful rights of Cuba, and will start a friendly propaganda before the American Congress and people in order to procure the definition and application of the Platt Amendment in the sense most favorable to the rights of the [Cuban] Government as recognized in the joint resolution.

Offenses committed by public officials in the discharge of their functions who shall have served three months of their sentences and made good the civil liability attaching to such offenses.

Offenses penalized by electoral laws.

Offenses committed by or through or connected with the public press, except personal libel and offenses against the law of nations.

Discharge of firearms resulting in bodily injury not permanently

File No. 837.6112/25.

No. 185.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 11, 1913.

Sir: Referring to instruction No. 159, of October 28th last,3 on the subject of the Zapata Swamp concession, you are informed that the Department has had a number of conferences with Mr. Isaac K. Champion, representing the Compañía Agricultora de Zapata, the concessionaire of the proposed concession for the reclamation of the Zapata Swamp, and has now concluded its study of the matter.

Mr. Champion, on behalf of the company, has stated that the company is willing and proposes to attempt to have the concession contract amended by the inclusion of new provisions in effect as follows:

(1) A provision attempting, in advance of the proposed survey, to define more exactly the boundaries of the swamp. This refers particularly to the southern boundary, which has been represented by Mr. Champion to be a ridge of high land extending from the eastern to the western limits of the swamp along its southern side, separating the true fresh-water ciénaga from the salt-water marsh to the south of the ridge in the Zapata peninsula.

(2) A substitute provision for the present provisions respecting the rights of the private owners of land within the territory of the swamp, the new provision to provide that the company shall have the right to drain such privately owned land, if not drained by the owners, for a price to be paid by the owners equivalent to the cost of the work of draining their land plus a profit to the company on this work of ten per cent. It is further understood that adequate provision will be made to protect the rights of the private owners with respect particularly to the assessment of this cost.

(3) A provision to the effect that, irrespective of the general grants of privileges to the concessionaire made by the cencession contract, all merchantable timber on Government lands drained or to be drained by the company shall remain the property of the Government of

Cuba.

As these proposed amendments seem, under the Department's present information gathered from the conferences with Mr. Champion and corroborated by the report of the Consul General's investigation, to obviate the principal criticisms of the measure hitherto made, their incorporation in the concession law and contract would serve to remove the Department's objections to the project communicated to the Cuban Government at the time of the issuance of the Executive Decree of June 18, 1912.

Mr. Champion has been informed of this present position of the Department in the matter and the observation added that this attitude by the Department should not, of course, be taken or used as an endorsement by the Government of the United States of the project as

The Secretary of State to Isaac K. Champion.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 4, 1913.

Sir: The Department acknowledges your letter of March 19, 1913, in which you enclose a copy of the Gaceta Oficial of February 4, 1913, containing a copy of Presidential Decree No. 83, which appears to put in force Decree No. 556 of June 18, 1912, by accepting the modifications in the latter decree proposed by the Compañía Territorial de Zapata.

The Department has noted your statement that "as agreed in discussing this matter with the State Department at Washington in accordance with my written communications to the American Legation at Habana, all the rights and actions acquired under this concession formerly held by the Compañía Territorial de Zapata, a Cuban corporation, have been duly and legally transferred and assigned to the Zapata Land Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Delaware." Regarding this statement it should perhaps be observed that the officers of the Department with whom you conferred have no recollection of the agreement you seem to allege between the Department and yourself that the concession rights should be transferred to an American company. This would appear to be a matter which concerns only the concessionaire and the Cuban Government.

Sir: Referring to my despatch No. 111 of February 15, 1912, to the Department's unnumbered instruction of March 24, 1911, and to previous correspondence, in regard to a concession granted to one Arturo Dworzak for building a bridge across Habana harbor between Habana and Casa Blanca, I have the honor to enclose herewith copy of a letter dated the 13th instant (received today) from the Havana Coal Company, concerning a proposed modification in the plans for this bridge, now pending approval by the Executive, and which, if approved, would, that company alleges, do incalculable harm to its property at Casa Blanca. The grounds upon which the Havana Coal Company objects to the proposed modification of the concession are fully set forth in its letter. The Havana Coal Company is an American corporation controlled by the Berwind-White Coal Mining Company of New York. Its coal-handling plant at Casa Blanca is a large and valuable property.

As it is reported in the press of this city that the President will, notwithstanding an unfavorable report of the Junta de Puertos, probably approve the modified project, I have ventured, pending the receipt of appropriate instructions from the Department, to request the Cuban Secretary of State to cause the matter to be held in abeyance until I should be able to ascertain the Department's wishes. Sanborn has suggested, and I have agreed, subject to your approval, to change the tangent of the bridge 430 feet to the westward along the wharf (of the Havana Coal Company), thus avoiding any damage to the coal business. The new tangent crosses (the channel) perpendicularly to the wharf (of the Havana Coal Company), cutting the tangent of the southern approach to 390 feet from the extreme end of the intermediate curve. The principal sections of the bridge are not to be changed. The northern approach turns to the right and towards the end again turns to the left and ends approximately 100 feet from the center of the water storage. The two central radia of the new curve measure 160 feet.

Habana bridge matter. Your despatch January 10, No. 587. This matter has been considered by the War and the Navy Departments in relation to the interests of the United States and of Cuba, irrespective of the controversy between the coal company and the bridge company. In an opinion recently submitted the Navy Department points out that even under the amended plans the bridge threatens seriously to congest traffic in the narrow harbor entrance and to embarrass the movements of the larger ships; and it emphasizes the consideration that if, either in peace or war, any part of the span were to fall, which could easily be effected with a charge of dynamite, it would close the harbor, shut in vessels on the inside and keep out vessels on the outside.

Inform the Cuban Government of the substance of the foregoing and add that the Department believes that upon consideration thereof the Cuban Government will not be willing to go on with a project so seriously threatening the trade and military interests of the two Governments.

If you find opposition to this view, you will request delay or suspension of action until the two Governments shall have further opportunity to discuss the matter.

You may reply to the Cuban note saying that the reasons already given would seem to demonstrate that from the standpoint of the mutual interests of both Governments the project is not advisable; nevertheless this Government hopes soon to conclude its study of the matter and will be glad to communicate further with the Cuban Government, and trusts that action will be suspended in the meantime. Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of the Department's telegram of January 28 in regard to the so-called Habana-Casa Blanca bridge concession, and to transmit herewith enclosed copy of a note which I today addressed to the Cuban Secretary of State on the matter. As the Department will observe, I have ventured to omit from this note any allusion to the precedent created by the suspension of the Zapata Swamp concession.

The Zapata Swamp concession was granted by the President in conformity with the power vested in him by the Law of Waters, a general body of legislation, and was in reality nothing more than a contract. The contract was not to become effective until thirty days after its publication in the Official Gazette, when, if no valid objections were made, the company might claim its contract. During this thirty-day period the Department made its objections to the contract and the President, acting within the authority granted him, suspended the effects of the decree to permit an investigation. Even under these circumstances he suspended his decree only with the consent and at the instance of the concessionary company which preferred to suspend the decree until the project could be made to conform to the wishes of the American Government, thus avoiding subsequent complications.

The bridge concession, on the contrary, was granted by a special bill in Congress which, upon signature by the President, became a law. The decree has been duly published and become a part of the law, and the company has begun work. The President could no more suspend this measure than he could repeal any other piece of legislation.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Habana, February 6, 1913.

Sir: Referring to my despatch No. 610 of the 29th ultimo, in regard to the Habana-Casa Blanca bridge concession, having looked into the question of the right of the Government to annul a concession of this character, I have the honor to report the following upon what I regard as sound legal authority.

It is a well-established principle of Spanish jurisprudence that the Government may at any time revolte or annul a contract or concession, not alone for infraction of any of its terms or conditions by the party or concessionaire but merely on grounds of public interest or convenience. The principle is founded on the rule that the Government may rectify its errors even at the cost or inconvenience of another, because, as distinguished from the errors of a private party, they affect the general public interest. There is such abundant and such a long line of precedent in support of the principle, both in Spain and in Cuba, that no one would venture to question it. The only question that could arise would be as to the authority of the Executive to revoke. Cuba has a constitution and a form of government closely modeled after our own. Many, or in fact nearly all, of the old Spanish laws are still in force in Cuba because no laws better adapted to the changed conditions have been enacted to take their place since the establishment of the Republic. These laws confer upon the Executive many powers that in the United States are legislative, and, in the spirit of the Cuban Constitution, should be so in Cuba. Cuban Executives have, however, largely continued to execute powers of doubtful constitutionality, and their right to do so has never been successfully challenged. In the case in point the concession was granted by Congress; the Executive decrees carrying the act into effect are merely reglementary. On the other hand, according to the practice which ordinarily obtains here in the granting of concessions of this character, Congressional action was necessary in this case only because of the grant of land attached to the concession, the granting of the bare concession being, under the Spanish law, vested in the Executive. Thus viewed, the special act of Congress in this case was merely an enabling act by which the Executive was authorized in this special case to exceed his usual power: his power to grant the bare concession, and consequently to revoke it, being unimpaired. This question is, however, more academic than practical, because it is hardly likely that there would be any opposition to an attempt upon the part of the Executive to revoke the concession.

In the case of annulment of a concession on the ground of public convenience, the established rule is that the concessionaire must be indemnified all actual moneys necessarily expended by him upon the object of the concession up to the time of annulment, with legal interest on each several amount from the date of disbursement to the date of indemnification, plus one year. The amount of the indemnity is usually settled by mutual agreement, or may, by either party, be referred to the courts for ascertainment. It is usual to allow, in addition to actual expenses of execution, if any, all reasonable lawyers' and engineers' fees and expenses legitimately incurred in procuring the concession and in preparing for its execution; but it is very doubtful whether any allowance could be made for "promotion" expenses (procuring capital, etc.) or for any liability that might attach to the concessionaire (abroad, for in Cuba there could be none) by reason of capital and like engagements, or contracts for materials and services. no case could the potential value of the concession as a prospective profit-earner be considered. When a controversy regarding the reasonableness of expenses upon which a claim for damages is based is referred to the courts for adjudication, the courts may pass freely upon the reasonableness of the alleged expenses however good a showing claimant might make as to their genuineness.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 8, 1913.

The War Department's report, now received, points out:

1. The bridge project is in conflict with a carefully studied and very desirable plan of harbor improvement projected by a board appointed during the Provisional Government and approved by the Provisional Governor on November 19, 1909.

2. The bridge project, apart from the objections already made by the Navy Department, is declared to be wholly objectionable from the standpoint of the interests of both Governments, principally for the following reasons: The height above the water is insufficient to permit the passage of the wireless masts of large steamers which must be expected to use the port of Habana after the opening of the Panama Canal. The placing of a bridge-pier in the now too small entrance to the harbor will endanger navigation and will prevent widening the channel, which must be effected in the not distant future. The land grant of the concession takes part of the existing military reservation which is required for military uses, including the field of fire required for the fortresses. New defenses for Habana harbor may be required on this reservation and consequently it is imperative that it should not be alienated from the possession of the State.

When communicating the foregoing to the Cuban Government you will say that this Government is so firmly convinced that the project is inadmissably detrimental to the vital interests of both Governments that it confidently expects that the responsible Cuban authorities will not permit its execution, whatever may be the technical difficulties now in the way thereof.

Department of State, Washington, February 13, 1913.

Sir: Referring to the Department's telegraphic instruction of February 8 concerning the Habana bridge project, I enclose a copy of a letter 'from the Secretary of War dated January 25 last, and a copy of its accompanying report 'made by Colonel Black of the United States Engineers, dated January 11, 1913, and its enclosures; also a copy of a letter 'from the Acting Secretary of the Navy dated December 27, 1912, and of the accompanying report of the General Board; also a copy of a statement 'under date of July 8, 1912, made by Colonel Black respecting the bridge project at the time of his report concerning the ports improvement project.

These reports are sent for such use as the Legation may find it necessary to make of them in connection with its representations to the Cuban Government in accordance with the instructions hitherto issued.

Respecting Colonel Black's observations concerning the force and effect of the adoption by the Provisional Government on November 19, 1909, of the plan of harbor improvement projected by the Government Board appointed in 1907, it may be observed that while under the circumstances, as understood by the Department, the Department is not now disposed to argue upon the question whether or not this project is now legally binding on the present Cuban administration and must be executed unless further formally modified under the laws of Cuba, the Department is of opinion that you might properly call to the attention of the Cuban Government the apparent advantages of the former plan and deplore any interference with it by anything such as the present objectionable project.

Regarding the suggested difficulties in the way of now preventing the consummation of the bridge project, it is to be observed that the Cuban Government in its note transmitted in your telegram of January 25 seems in substance to concede the possibility of suspending its execution and possibly the necessary steps to this end may be taken without great difficulty. However this may be, the Department desires you in your representations to the Cuban Government to leave no doubt as to the unalterable character of the Department's opinion that the project is inadmissibly detrimental to the vital interests of both Governments and as to the expectation that the appropriate measures will be taken to prevent its execution. Respecting the Legation's comparison of the present situation with the Zapata situation, it may be noted as of possible service that the law of December 21, 1910, which, according to the Department's information, is the only special law regarding the bridge project, while it looks to the construction of the bridge, seems in the main to be merely an authorization to the Executive to make the land grant which is a feature of the concession. On the other hand, Decree No. 80 of March 10, 1911, which seems to be the original definition of the bridge project proper, makes no specific reference to the law of December 21, 1910, and seems, like the Zapata decree, to rest for its authority on the provisions of general laws—in the present case the Law of Ports and General Law of Public Works.

You will keep the Department informed of the developments in the matter.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Habana, February 24, 1913.

Your Excellency: Referring to your excellency's confidential note No. 9 of January 24, 1913, in regard to a concession for a bridge across Habana harbor, I have the honor to inform your excellency that my Government has now completed its study of the matter, as a result of which it is convinced that the project is inadmissably detrimental to the vital interests of both Governments, and I am instructed accordingly to express to your excellency's Government the confident hope that appropriate measures will be taken to prevent its execution.

The project is objectionable upon the following principal grounds among others of less import:

1. Location of piers.—The channel of Habana harbor is already very narrow for existing traffic. The immediate effect on the location of bridge-piers in the shallower water on either side of the channel will be to divert to the main channel, and thus further congest it, small vessels which can now use the shallower water. The inadequacy of the channel will be further accentuated by the progressive increase in the volume of oversea traffic, and in the size of vessels calling at Habana, particularly after the opening of the Panama Canal. these reasons the widening of the channel will in all likelihood eventually be found necessary, but obviously could not be accomplished with bridge-piers occupying the space available for the purpose. In this connection attention is invited to a project formulated, after an exhaustive study of the matter, by a board of engineers appointed for the purpose, contemplating certain needed improvements in the littoral between La Fuerza and the Punta. This project was formally sanctioned by the Provisional Governor of Cuba on November 19, 1908. and is described on pages 348 and 349 of Governor Magoon's report for the period between December 1, 1907, and December 1, 1908, and a map is inserted opposite page 390 of the same document. These improvements would seem to be of greater moment to the public welfare than a bridge across the harbor of doubtful or unproven necessity.

2. Clearance under bridge.—It seems that as the bridge is now planned the clear (maximum) height from water-level is but 150 feet. While it is true that none of the vessels which regularly call at this port now require a greater clearance, there is a marked tendency to increase, and during the past two tourist seasons larger ships have come here than a few years before had been thought likely. The larger modern vessels plying between European ports and the United States have a mast height of from 156 to 212 feet, and there is a general tendency to increase the height of wireless-telegraph masts. After the Panama Canal is opened much larger vessels will regularly call at this port

3. Danger of bridge.—The possibility that the bridge might, through accident or design, be dropped into the harbor, and thus completely block egress and ingress, is regarded by my Government as one of the serious disadvantages of the project—a compelling consideration, in fact, which outweighs in itself any advantages which friends of the bridge might claim for it. In case of war no more effectual nor an easier method could be found to blockade the harbor.

4. Cabaña Military Reservation.—The alienation of the excellent military reservation back of Cabaña fortress must, upon mature reflection, seem to the Cuban Government, as it does to my own, very ill-advised. This is the only State land close to the city suitable for a military encampment, and it is necessary, moreover, as a field of fire for the Cabaña and Morro fortresses; for, while the fortresses themselves are out of date, new defenses for this harbor will eventually be required on this reservation, and none of it ought, therefore, to be alienated from the State.

There are other considerations scarcely less compelling than the foregoing—such, for instance, as the marring effect which a bridge across the entrance to Habana harbor would have upon its enviable and universally admired beauty and pictures guarantees.

and picturesqueness—into which I need hardly enter.

The friends of this bridge may cite, in attempted refutation of these arguments, the examples of bridges in other ports of the world; but they can hardly point to a bridge across the very entrance of a harbor of the commercial and naval importance of Habana.

It has been suggested that under the Constitution and laws of Cuba the Executive could not legally annul this concession. I understand, however, that it is a well-established principle of Spanish, and consequently of Cuban, jurisprudence that the Government may at any time revoke or annul a contract or concession, not alone for infraction of any of its terms or conditions by the party or concessionaire but merely on grounds of public interest or convenience; for the rule is universally accepted that a State may rectify its errors even at the cost or inconvenience of another, because, as distinguished from the errors of a private party, they affect the general public interest. The fact that in this case the concession was authorized by an act of Congress should have little or no bearing; for, after all, the Congress merely authorized the Executive to exceed a power already vested in him by the laws in force; that is to say, to grant, in addition to the bridge concession, certain public lands desired by the concessionaire. Thus viewed, this special act of Congress is no more mandatory than the Law of Waters or other general laws ordinarily applicable.

Sir: The attention of the Department has been called to a concession granted by the late administration to Messrs. Waddell and Harrington for the building of a bridge across the harbor at Havana. This matter was brought to the attention of this Government last spring, and both the War and Navy Departments set forth objections, which you will find in the records of your office.

It was not claimed at the time that the Platt Amendment gave this nation a right to do more than protest against such an enterprise, but the Department acted upon the theory that anything deemed inimical to the interests of both Governments was a proper subject for a frank exchange of official opinions, and expressed itself with great emphasis against the wisdom of permitting the construction of the bridge at the point mentioned in the concession.

Should the subject come up again for consideration you are at liberty to inform the Cuban Government that the objections urged by the War and Navy Department [Departments] under the last administration are still entertained by those Departments; and that this Government, while it does so with great respect and with a full recognition of the Cuban Government's independent rights, considers it its duty to reiterate very earnestly the objections then urged to an enterprise so manifestly inconvenient and threatening seriously and injuriously to affect the navigation and defense of the port of Havana and still wishes to express the confident hope that the Government of Cuba will find it consistent with the interests of Havana and the welfare of Cuba and with its own obligations to discontinue it.

Information received by Department forecasts an attempt to renew a project of British capitalists to rush through Cuban Congress concession for railroad from Nuevitas to Caibarién.

You will earnestly urge upon the President the desirability of postponing final action on this bill sufficiently to allow the fullest investigation and consideration, emphasizing the burden it would impose on the Cuban Treasury in favor of capital which is neither American nor Cuban.

The President of Cuba to the American Minister.

President's Office, Habana, May 23, 1912.

MY DEAR MR. MINISTER: When we talked some time ago about the subject matter of your note of today's date you were unable to explain why I should oppose the bill for the construction of the Caibarién-Nuevitas railroad as now passed by Congress. The constitution requires that when the President of the Republic vetoes an act he shall return it to the Congress with his reasons for not sanctioning it. I can find no ground whatever for disapproving an act of Congress providing for a work which is regarded as so beneficial to the country. I regret, therefore, that I am not able to please you, and beg that you will so inform the Department of State of the United States.

Yours very truly,

José M. Gómez.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Habana, May 25, 1912.

DEAR MR. MINISTER: I received with much pleasure your note of the 23d instant inclosing copy of a personal note of the same date addressed by you to the President of the Republic, in regard to the bill pending in Congress for the construction under subsidy of the Caibarién-Nuevitas railroad.

Undoubtedly there has, in my judgment, been an error in the statement contained in the note in question, that, as the Department of State of the United States now understands the circumstances, it cannot approve the bill in its present form; for bills pending in our co-legislative bodies become laws when passed by both bodies and approved by the President of the Republic, in whom alone the power is vested to veto them when he deems it appropriate; and therefore I cannot conceive that in the present legal status of the relations between Cuba and the United States any Cuban law, and much less any bill pending in our Senate or Chamber of Representatives, is at any stage pending the approval of the Department of State at Washington, or that it requires such approval to become effective.

Very sincerely yours,

MANUEL SANGUILY.

The Chargé d'Affaires of Great Britain to the Secretary of State.

British Embassy, Washington, May 31, 1912.

Sir: The Cuban House of Representatives has within the last few days approved the grant of a subsidy to the North Coast Railway Company (Compañía del Ferrocarril de la Costa Norte de Cuba) for the construction of a line from Caibarién to Nuevitas south of the Sierra de Bamburanao. I understand that the Cuban Senate may be expected to approve this subsidy very shortly.

On the 29th of February last the Cuban Railway Commission finally approved plans submitted by the Cuban Central Railways Ltd. for a line between these same two points, but by a different route, namely north of the Sierra. In view of this fact, when the question of the grant of a subvention for such a line was first raised in Congress, the Cuban Central Railways addressed a petition to that body asking that this subvention should be granted to them as being the only company which had complied with the requirements of the present railway law, as proved by the certificate from the Railway Commission. It now seems however that the claim of the company is to be disregarded, although the route projected by them is apparently the more practical and although, moreover, they are prepared to build it without the grant of any subsidy.

Your Government has, I understand, already received full information through the American Legation at Havana, regarding the objections raised by the Cuban Central Railways to the proposed subsidy to the North Coast Railway Company. It is therefore unnecessary for me to enlarge upon those objections or to point out the very grave prejudice which would result to the interests of that line, should the present proposal be carried into effect.

His Majesty's Government regard the action of the Cuban Congress as constituting a serious infringement of existing rights and under these circumstances feel themselves obliged to enter a strong protest against the unfair treatment of British interests and capital which appears to be contemplated by the Government of that Republic. His Majesty's Minister at Havana has accordingly been instructed to make such a protest.

I am at the same time directed by His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to acquaint you with these instructions and to express the hope that your Government will be willing to support the action of His Majesty's Government and to assist them in securing an equitable settlement of the present difficulties.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Habana, June 9, 1912.

I am convinced that the British Embassy has not been correctly informed. No vested rights in the country between Nuevitas and Caibarién belong to the Cuban Central, the company's interest lying wholly west and south of Caibarién. The "concession" referred to is merely the Railroad Commission's approval of plans for constructing a road from Nuevitas to Caibarien along a route chosen by the company, north of the hills. Any company or individual may upon fulfilling the simple requirements of the law at any time obtain such approval for any number of roads from Nuevitas to Caibarién. Cuban Central has not actually begun building, but has only broken ground, in order technically to set up this contention when it became evident that the bill would certainly pass. The Cuban Central people did not originate the project but became interested in it after the rival company had formulated it and a bill had been presented in Congress. They have merely been rival suitors for the subvention, but insisting that the road should be constructed northward of the hills as far as Morón through a narrow valley settled and occupied by an American railroad which has not received a subvention. Congress, keeping in mind the principal purposes of subventions, chose almost unanimously the route south of the hills, where the country was unsettled and needed development, in preference to the northern route through country already developed. The Cuban Central people have said that they do not want the southern route, because, on account of costly construction, the venture would be an unprofitable one. Their purpose, apparently, in drawing plans for the northern route, filing them with the Railroad Commission, and then breaking ground, has been to influence Congress into adopting that route.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 14, 1912.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge your note of the 31st ultimo in which you state that the Cuban House of Representatives has approved the grant of a subsidy to the North Coast Railway Company of Cuba and that His Majesty's Government regards this action as an unjust infringement of the existing rights of the Cuban Central Railways, Limited, a British company, and has accordingly instructed His Majesty's Minister at Habana to enter a strong protest.

In reply to your suggestion that the Government of the United States support the action of His Majesty's Government on behalf of the Cuban Central Railways Company, and referring to the several conferences between the Embassy and officers of the Department, I regret to inform you that the Department under the circumstances does not see its way clear to take the action desired.

I may say at the outset that upon its information it has been the Department's view that the merits of the respective pretensions of the British company and the North Coast Railway Company have constituted an open question. For example, it may be observed that from a report received from the American Legation at Habana in April last there appeared to be at least a serious doubt as to whether the British company's claim of priority was, under the facts and the applicable provisions of Cuban law, sustainable. In this view of the matter and in view of the further fact that it has been represented that the North Coast Railway Company, though a Cuban corporation, will be substantially an American enterprise, the action desired has appeared to be open to misconstruction and to place this Government on the surface of the matter at least in the embarrassing position of taking sides with a British company in a controversy with American interests, the merits of which are, at best, still to be determined. This difficulty has been further intensified by the controversy between the two companies as to the route to be adopted, in which connection petitions have been addressed to the American Legation at Habana by a number of American citizens who own and are operating railroads in the territory proposed to be traversed by the British line, protesting against the selection of the route chosen by the British company as detrimental to the interests and welfare

Finally, I may say that the Department's view of the facts indicated above would seem to be verified and its conclusions fully warranted by its latest information in the matter from the American Legation at Habana. Following the conference on the 7th instant between yourself and officers of the Department, the American Legation was instructed by cable to report on the present situation in the light of your information that the concession for the Caibarién-Nuevitas railway had actually been given to the Cuban Central Railways, Limited, and that this company had commenced construction and that the rival project was an enterprise directed in bad faith against the British company's vested interests. In response to this instruction, the Department has received a cable report from the Legation, of which the following is a paraphrase:

The complaint of the Cuban Central Railway Company against the Nuevitas-Caibarién project has been brought to the Department's attention by the British Embassy, accompanied by a request for this Government's investigation and for such action as the disclosed facts may warrant. It is alleged in the documents submitted by the Embassy that: (1) The decree accepting the proposal of the North Coast Company is illegal because it violates rights of the Cuban Central Company already possessed; provides in an illegal manner for the payment of the subvention; makes the award contrary to the law relating to bids; and ignores the proper formalities in making awards for lines other than the Nuevitas-Caibarién. (2) The award to the North Coast Company was financially and economically unwise because the subvention was at an essentially higher figure than was asked by the Cuban Central Company, which, moreover will build the line without any subvention whatever if given reasonable time; under the bid and award the North Coast Company may build the road with Government money and then withdraw the road from public service and make it a private road; the North Coast Company is newly organized and not heretofore engaged in railroad building and operation, whereas the Cuban Central Company is a successful going concern; and the conclusion that the Cuban Central project was the better one is corroborated by technical reports to that effect by the Inspector General of Railroads and by the Secretary of Public Works, which were ignored by the President in making the award. (3) According to the best information received by the Cuban Central the North Coast promoters have private assurances from a high Cuban official that the Cuban Government will undertake to guarantee the several million of bonds that the North Coast Company proposes to float, if such a guaranty become necessary in order to sell the bonds.

The legality or illegality of the Executive's action in awarding the contract is not one for this Department at this time; but you will observe that (2) and (3) above involve the use of the Government's funds and the possible increase of the Government's obligations; they are accordingly of immediate interest to this Government, in pursuance of the policy outlined in the Department's instruction No. 123 of August 15, 1912.

You will bring these allegations to the serious attention of the President of Cuba, pointing out that a proper disposition to avoid future trouble in the matter would seem to require his renewed and serious consideration of the question, in order that no action shall be taken either involving the Government of Cuba in future difficulties or constituting an improvident use of national funds and credit or increasing the national financial obligations. You will at the same time avoid giving the impression that this Government is espousing either project as against the other.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Habana, December 5, 1912.

I have [etc.]

The American Minister to the President of Cuba.

No. 431.]

American Legation, Habana, December 5, 1912.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: In pursuance of telegraphic instructions from my Government I have the honor to inform Your Excellency that the Embassy of Great Britain in Washington has called the attention of the Department of State of the United States to the complaint made by the Cuban Central Railway Company in relation to the proposed Caibarién-Nuevitas railroad, and has requested that my Government make an investigation of the matter and take such action as the facts disclosed should warrant.

In the documents submitted by the British Embassy with the complaint it is alleged:

First. That executive decree accepting the North Coast Company's proposal is illegal for the reason, among others, that it violates rights already possessed by the Cuban Central Company under early charters; that payment of the subvention contrary to existing law is provided by it; that the considerations under the terms of the law calling for bids upon which the award was based were not within the legal cognizance of the Executive; and that without proper formalities awards were made for lines other than the Caibarien-Nuevitas.

Second. That, financially and economically, the award to the North Coast Company was unwise and inexpedient, for the reasons, among others, that the subvention awarded the North Coast Railway Company was essentially higher than that asked by the Cuban Central Railway; that without any subvention whatsoever the Cuban Government [sic] will build the road if given a reasonable time; that by terms of the bid and award the road may be built with Government money by the North Coast Railway Company and then, by withdrawal from the public service, become a private road; that, whereas the Cuban Central Railway is a concern successful and of established standing, the North Coast Railway is a new concern never before having built and operated railways; and that technical reports made by the Inspector General of Railroads and by the Secretary of Public Works bear out the fact that the Cuban Central was the better project, these reports when making the award being ignored by the President.

Third. That according to the best information received by the Cuban Central, private information has been given by a high Cuban official to the promoters of the North Coast Railway that several millions of bonds which the North Coast Company proposes to float will be guaranteed by the Government of Cuba should such guaranty be necessary for selling the bonds.

While the question of the legality or illegality of executive action in awarding the contract does not appear to be one for my Government at this time, the foregoing points second and third, involving as they do the use of Government funds and the possible increase of the Cuban Government's obligations, are, pursuant to the policy outlined in Mr. Gibson's note addressed to Your Excellency on August 20, 1912, concerning the Zapata Swamp Concession, of immediate interest to my Government.

I am instructed to bring these allegations seriously to the attention of Your Excellency, and to point out that a proper disposition to avoid future trouble with reference to this matter would appear to require that Your Excellency give the question renewed and most serious consideration, in order that no action shall be taken which will either involve the Cuban Government in future difficulties or will constitute an improvident use of national funds and credit or an increase of national financial obligations. While earnestly pointing out the above considerations to Your Excellency, I desire to avoid giving the impression that my Government is espousing either project as against the other.

[Inclosure—Translation.]

The Cuban Secretary of State to the American Minister.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Habana, December 10, 1912.

Mr. Minister: With reference to the note dated the 5th instant which your excellency addressed to the President of the Republic, and of which you kindly sent a copy to this Department, I am instructed by the President of the Republic to reply thereto in his name as follows:

In the first place, the receipt of the note in question could not but have surprised the President, inasmuch as it was written at the instance of a friendly nation which has a duly accredited representative here, whose representations have always been heeded as far as possible, as in respect of this same matter when his request for postponement of the date of the subasta for the Nuevitas-Caibarién railroad concession was granted; and, moreover, because the only point which can be regarded as worthy of attracting the attention of your excellency's Government is as a matter of fact the most groundless, that is to say the statements attributed to a high Cuban official whose name is not mentioned and who in making them disregarded the fact that they are clearly repugnant to our laws, statements which are, even cursorily examined, so extravagant anxiety to your excellency's Government.

The British Embassy alleges, as the first ground of its complaint on behalf of the English company, that the latter had vested rights under prior concessions; but this statement is not correct, inasmuch as the Cuban Central cannot claim any concession of the new line to which the subasta referred; that company merely filed with the Railroad Commission a project for building a railroad from Nuevitas to Caibarién to the north of the Bamburanao hills, and the Commission reported that said project accorded with the necessary technical requirements, which did not vest any right in the company; indeed, the company itself withdrew the project in question upon the announcement being made that Congress had authorized a subvention for a line south of the hills, in which action the company was prompted by the purpose of taking part in the subasta and by the wish to remove any objection to the admission of its bid. Hence the Cuban Central, which took part in the subasta as a bidder and previous to that had asked for a postponement of the subasta, cannot now reasonably allege the incompetence of the Executive. The proposals of the Cuban Central were carefully examined and duly compared with those of the North Coast Railway Company, in the resolution by which the construction of the proposed railroad was awarded to the latter company.

It is also alleged that lines other than the Nuevitas-Caibarién line were granted without due formalities, reference being apparently had to the Camagüey-Santa Cruz del Sur railroad, in disregard, however, of the fact that the construction of this line was authorized by the act of July 5, 1906, and of the fact that article 6 of that act provides: "that after one year from the date this act becomes effective the Executive may contract for the construction of the railway lines enumerated" (there were others in addition to the line mentioned)
"if solicited by any person or company." Hence in conformity with the provisions of that law other lines were previously contracted for upon the mere application of some company without any protest in consequence thereof; and in the case referred to in the note the North Coast Company made application for building the Camagüey-Santa Cruz del Sur Railroad. That company was the only one that had applied therefor during the six years in which the offer was open without a taker, and there was no cause or reason for refusing said company the concession merely because application was made simultaneously for another line.

Up to this point I have referred to the first paragraph of the document embedying the complaint of the British Embassy. As to the second paragraph, in which it is alleged that the award is economically unwise because the subvention granted to the North Coast Company is higher than that asked for by the Cuban Central, it should be borne in mind that the first thing that the Cuban Government did was to make a comparative examination of the two proposals that had been formulated, as a result of which, as set forth in the resolution, the Cuban Government observed that the proposal of the North Coast Company offered, in free transportation and the creation of new sources of taxation, effective and permanent advantages to the State of far greater import than the saving of one thousand dollars per kilometer offered by the proposal of the Cuban Central.

The Cuban Central now states that it will build the line without subvention

if given a reasonable time in which to do it. This offer is untimely and cannot be taken into consideration. When that company went to the subasta, among the proposals that it made and which were the only ones that the Cuban Government could take into consideration, there was none offering to build the line without a subvention; and since the subasta has been held and the concession awarded, it is impossible to admit such offers, because they are too late and are inapplicable, particularly when the offer is qualified by the condition called "a reason able time", which is in itself a very elastic phrase that might readily give rise to constructions contrary to the text of the law which, in providing for the subvention of the line and directing an immediate subasta, sought to avoid delay in its construction and did not leave the question of time to the convenience of any company.

It is added that the concessionaire may build the railroad with the subvention and thereafter withdraw it from public service, which is a manifest error because such an outcome is absolutely impossible inasmuch as the concession was granted under the specific and unavoidable condition that the railroad should be for public service, to which may be added the fact that obligations of the company have been accepted giving the railroad that character.

The allegation of the Cuban Central that it is a going concern while its competitor, the North Coast Company, is a new concern and has never operated railways, is an argument that per se could not very well be taken into consideration. The Cuban Government could not take such circumstances into account but could only examine the respective advantages offered and the guaranties given in assurance of the fulfillment of the obligations to be contracted; particularly because, if such an argument were admitted as valid, the necessary consequence would be the institution of a kind of privilege—in every aspect unconstitutional and unjustifiable—in favor of companies already established, which would result in closing the doors to new companies, national or foreign, which might, to the advantage of Cuba, seek to invest capital in the construction of railroads.

It is also incorrectly stated that the Executive failed to take into due account the technical reports favorable to the Cuban Central, when as a matter of fact he did take them so carefully and intelligently into account that, finding the proposal of the North Coast Company too ample and favorable in relation with the bond prescribed by the law, the Executive demanded that that company double the amount of its bond.

It is stated in the third paragraph that, according to advices received from the Cuban Central, a high official of Cuba has promised that the Government of Cuba would guarantee the bonds issued by the concessionary company if necessary for their sale. It is a pity that so gratuitous an imputation should be made in respect to the Government of Cuba by a company of presumably reputable and sound standing, for such a thing is contrary to our laws, according to which Congress alone is competent to place obligations upon the Treasury, and Congress itself is competent only upon compliance with the provisions of the Constitution prescribed for that purpose, and also taking into account the prohibitions contained in the Appendix to the Constitution.

It is therefore clear that no official, however high his rank, can guarantee future obligations of that kind; and up to the present neither the Government nor anyone in this country has any knowledge of such a financial operation, which would, as stated, require the intervention of Congress, whose deliberations are public; there would in any event therefore be sufficient opportunity for observations which are now groundless and unreasonable.

The Government of the United States in transmitting through diplomatic courtesy the note in question states that in its eyes the allegations contained in the second and third paragraphs are alone of any importance, and in the opinion of the President [of Cuba] they are without foundation or reason, for the reasons herein given.

I have the honor to submit herewith a concise resumé of the entire question. The many reports made on this matter by the Legation from time to time have attained such bulk as to render their consideration a matter of much time and trouble. I venture, therefore, to submit the following statement of facts for the information of the Department, believing that it may be found helpful as offering in convenient form a thorough presentation of the essential points at issue.

An act of July 5, 1906, committed the Government of Cuba to the policy of subsidizing new railroad construction in Cuba. This act provided for a recurrent appropriation of $500,000 per annum for the purpose, and authorized the Executive to grant subventions in a maximum amount of $6,000 per kilometer for the construction of twelve lines enumerated in the act.

Between the ports of Caibarién and Nuevitas lies a vast region of virgin country, said to be incomparably rich in hardwood timber, ores and agricultural and grazing lands, which, except for the narrow valley north of the Bamburanao range, has never been settled or developed for lack of transportation.

The claims of the region in question were either overlooked or ignored by Congress in 1906, or were not adequately pressed by the interested communities. The need for the line was nevertheless felt and was remittently discussed, but nothing practical seems to have been accomplished until Mr. J. M. Tarafa and associates recognized the opportunity and procured the introduction of a bill in the House of Representatives, at the session which ended in February, 1911 (reintroduced April 28, 1911), for the construction, under the terms of the act of July 5, 1906, of a line from Caibarién via Morón to Nuevitas.

Just east of Caibarién begins a range of mountains comprising the Sierras de Bamburanao, Meneses and Jatibonico, and extending in an easterly direction up to Jatibonico river. Between this range and the sea on the north there is a fair and fertile valley averaging some ten or twelve miles in breadth, watered by numerous streams rising in the mountains. This valley, as far down as the Jatibonico river, has long been under cultivation; several sugar-mills are in active operation; and the transportation facilities, while perhaps susceptible of improvement, satisfactorily answer present needs; the coast is indented by numerous minor ports, reached by cartroads from within and by small coasting craft from without, and the vallev is traversed from a point very near Caibarién, at the western end, to Mayajigua, at the eastern end, by several connecting narrowguage roads largely owned and controlled by the North American Sugar Company. These roads, originally built by the several sugar mills in the valley for their private plantation service, were welded into a connected system and made a public service railroad, or common carrier, under terms of the railroad law of Cuba, which require that it shall within a given time be rebuilt on the standard guage; and construction into Caibarién is either contemplated or has actually been undertaken.

Here, then, we have, on one hand, a public railroad, largely if not entirely owned by American interests, built without State aid and which must, under the terms of its charter as a common carrier, be practically rebuilt (for conversion of gauge) without State aid; and, on the other hand, a bill in Congress contemplating the construction of a subsidized railroad from Caibarién to Nuevitas which would, through about one-fourth of its length, parallel the former. interests thus menaced promptly bestirred themselves, and brought sufficient public opinion to bear upon representatives from Santa Clara to induce Tarafa to abandon, perhaps reluctantly, the idea of traversing the valley in question, and to make a détour to the south of the range, although the country was not only undeveloped but the cost of construction would, on account of topographical conditions, be considerably greater. Accordingly an amendment was introduced providing specifically that the Caibarién-Nuevitas railroad should be built via Morón and south of the Cordillera (range) de Bamburanao, thus relieving the existing railroad north of the range of the threatened unfair competition. The wisdom of this amendment is at once obvious: the region south of the range is not only greater in extent and breadth, but, unlike that to the north, is unsettled and undeveloped; and it would be a waste of public money and unfair to existing interests for the Cuban Government to subsidize, under the circumstances, a railroad along the northern route.

In the meantime, the Cuban Central Railways had filed with the Railroad Commission, on May 10, 1911, a petition for permission to make preliminary surveys for a railroad from Caibarién to Nuevitas via Morón. Permission was duly granted, and the Cuban Central Railways made their surveys, and filed on January 31 and February 4, 1912, "definite plans, profiles, etc.," of the proposed line, which were in due course approved by the Railroad Commission. The project of the Cuban Central contemplated a route throughout the valley north of the range, necessarily paralleling the railroad of the North American Sugar Company and associated interests.

When the amendment was presented prescribing the southern route, the Cuban Central, which apparently had not theretofore taken any active part in the progress of the bill, took a hand in the matter, and by all manner of means at their disposal set out to force Congress to adopt the route (north of the range) which they had selected. At this time representations were made to the Department that were untenable and without foundation in fact. necessary to examine these representations at this time, for the matter has reached a more advanced stage where new grounds and contentions have arisen. However, as illustrative of the tenor of the representations made to the Department in the first stage of the controversy, the Cuban Central contended, in effect, that—inasmuch as, after a bill had been introduced and was being discussed in Congress for the construction of a certain railroad with State aid, they had, in anticipation of the needs of the community and of the country at large, surveyed a certain route which was duly approved by the Railroad Commission—the Congress was precluded from prescribing any route other than the precise route called for in their plans, and consequently that the subvention could be granted to no one other than themselves! The record is clear that they sought to have the Department believe that the approval of their plans by the Railroad Commission conferred upon them an exclusive concession by competent authority to build a railroad between Caibarién and Nuevitas; while they knew perfectly well, from their intimate knowledge of the railroad law and long experience, that the Railroad Commission could at any time approve any number of such projects, and that such approval in no case constituted a "concession" in the accepted sense. They alleged the infringement of "vested rights" which did not exist and which they knew very well could not under the circumstances exist. They alleged also that they had commenced the construction of the line, which was shown to be without foundation. And all this, not because the Congress contemplated or proposed even by inference to grant the subvention to a particular company or to favor any particular interest, but merely because that body was considering whether in the public interest the railroad it was about to subsidize should run to the south or to the north of a certain mountain range!

The contentions of the Cuban Central did not prevail. The Congress passed, and the President approved on June 5, 1912, an act reading in pertinent part as follows:

Article 1. The following paragraph is hereby added to article 1 of the act of July 5, 1906, published in the Gaceta Oficial of the Republic on that date:

"(13) A line connecting the ports of Caibarien and Nuevitas, passing through the town of Morón and to the south of the Bamburanao range.'

Article 2. The Executive shall invite proposals of companies desiring to build the railroad, and shall award it by subasta 1 to that company which makes the best propositions; but the subvention shall not exceed the amount prescribed 2 in the act of July 5, 1906.

On July 12, 1912, five weeks after the enactment of this law, an Executive decree issued, and was published in the Gaceta Oficial of the 15th, inviting proposals, to be filed not later than July 30th, for the construction of the railroad in question. The Cuban Central Railways objected that the time allowed prospective bidders to prepare and file their proposals was unreasonably short, and furthermore that no formality was prescribed to govern the opening of proposals, thus possibly affording an unfair advantage to any bidder which might enjoy illicit official favor. Accordingly a second decree issued (dated July 24, 1912, and published in the Gaceta of the 27th), calling for sealed proposals to be filed in the Department of Public Works up to 2 p. m., September 30, 1912; and providing that all proposals should be opened at that hour in the office of the Secretary of Public Works and in the presence of bidders. In the preamble to this decree it is expressly announced that no specifications beyond the general requirements of the Railroad Law and the Act of July 5, 1906, and the special requirements of the Act of June 5. supra (as to route, amount of bond, etc.), could in the nature of the case be formulated for the guidance of prospective bidders, and consequently of the granting authority in choosing between proposals, but that such prospective bidder should within these general confines make his own terms and conditions.

The subasta took place at the appointed time. But two proposals were filed, namely, by the Ferrocarril de la Costa Norte de Cuba and the Cuban Central Railways. The former company offered to build the railroad with a subvention of six thousand dollars per kilometer (the maximum amount authorized), while the latter asked for but five thousand dollars. The money difference between the two proposals, considering only the amount of the subvention, is roughly $300,000 (not, as claimed by the Cuban Central, $592,000). The proposal of the Compañía de la Costa Norte included, however, an elaborate plan of direct and related development, which the President believed to offset, in immediate and eventual value and advantage to the region and to the country at large, the apparent saving of $300,000 in the amount of the subvention. Examination and analysis of what may be called the collateral propositions of the Compañía de la Costa Norte convincingly bear out this belief; but they need not be examined in detail here, for the Cuban Central have apparently never attempted to destroy this argument except by the contention that as those propositions did not directly concern the announced object of the subasta, they could not, whatever merit they might otherwise have, legally be taken into consideration by the President.

This contention is the essence of the Cuban Central's protest; the other numerous contentions, mostly of a minor, and in some instances of a trivial, character, all hinge upon it and serve only to becloud the real issue.

The answer to this question of competence must be sought in the terms of the acts of July 5, 1906, and June 5, 1912. The former is a general act governing railroad subventions; and the latter (the text of which is in pertinent part quoted above) is a special act authorizing the construction with State aid of the Caibarién-Nuevitas railroad under the general terms of the former act and certain additional and particular terms of the latter.

The act of 1906 authorizes the Executive to "enter into contracts with one or more companies . . . without the necessity of subasta, for the construction and operation, in the order named," of twelve railroads enumerated (article 1). This was amended by the later act of 1912 in so far as it required (article 2) the holding of a subasta.

The act of 1906 further provides (article 6) that when "two or more indivduals or companies offer to build and operate any of the railroads enumerated above, the Executive shall give the preference to that individual or company whose plans and other technical and economic conditions are, in his judgment, the most advantageous to the general interests of the Republic." In the absence of any more specific provision in the act of 1912, or in any other law, governing the conduct of the subasta and method of award, or placing restrictions upon what may be considered "economic conditions... advantageous to the general interests of the Republic", the best judgment of the Executive must necessarily prevail without limitation (Art. 78, paragraph 1, Constitution of Cuba). If he chooses so to regard collateral railroad development in Camaguey, the building of sugar mills, and establishment of a bank for aiding colonizers, and other considerations, he would seem to be acting well within his powers. Had the Congress desired to limit his choice to the proposal contemplating the lowest subvention, it would have done so in terms; as it is, the intent cannot even be inferred.

¹The Cuban Central made alternative propositions, one of which was to utilize their existing line from Caibarién to Salamanca, 36 km. to the west, and thence to build into Zulueta, 20 km. to the east, without subvention; thus traversing 56 km. in a roundabout direction in order to reach a point due south of Caibarién, distant 20 km. or less. This "free line" of 56 km. is reckoned a saving to the State at $6,000 per km., whereas it could not possibly, however regarded, represent a saving except as to the actual distance between Caibarién and Zulueta. The other proposition (and obviously the more accept-between Caibarién and Zulueta. The other proposition (and obviously the more accept-between Caibarién to Zulueta directly and thence to Nuevitas, applying the subvention to the whole distance. The real effect of the former proposition would be to make the contemplated distance merely an extension of the Cuban Central's existing lines out of Sagua and consequently to make the line into Caibarién merely a branch with Zulueta as a junction, thus defeating, in spirit at least, the purpose of the act of Congress. (The Minister's footnote.) footnote.)

Moreover the proposal of the Cuban Central is vitiated by the failure upon their part fully to observe the route prescribed by Congress in the act of June 5, 1912. The prescribed route is "south of the Cordillera de Bamburanao," clearly meaning the "cordillera" (range) of mountains comprising the Sierras de Bamburanao, Meneses and Jatibonico. The modified route adopted by the Cuban Central after the passage of the act differed from the original (northern) route only in that the single Sierra de Bamburanao is detoured to the south, and the original route is entered through the break between the sierras de Bamburanao and Meneses, and is thence followed down to Morón. The route of the rival company is to the south of the mountains all the way, and is the route clearly contemplated in the act. The Cuban Central claim that "Cordillera de Bamburanao" as used by the Congress is a misnomer, because no such "cordillera" is shown on any map or other authoritative record of the region, each sierra being given a different name. The custom in Cuba and elsewhere is to refer to a range of mountains collectively, when they have no collective name and each group has its own name, by the name of the first component sierra or group; hence the range of mountains between Caibarién and the Jatibonico river is commonly called "Cordillera de Bamburanao," although each sierra is shown on maps with a different name, viz: Sierra de Bamburanao, Sierra de Meneses and Sierra de Jatibonico. The act was drafted by congressmen from the region acquainted with topographical names, and they undoubtedly used the word "cordillera" advisedly and with the full intent of reference to the range of three sierras named above. This is very clear from the controversy that arose in Congress concerning the selection of a route for the proposed rail-The Cuban Central deliberately sought to defeat this clear intent of Congress that this line should be built entirely to the south of the mountains. Their line consequently parallels the line of the North American Sugar Company and associated interests through the greater part of the length of the latter. In this connection I invite the Department's attention to my No. 148, of March 13, 1912, transmitting a copy of a letter from the President of the North American Sugar Company. It was the representations of this American company that first induced me to make an examination of this phase of the project.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Habana, February 20, 1913.

Sir: Referring to the Department's instruction No. 193 of the 8th instant, concerning the Caibarién-Nuevitas railroad concession, and the Department's telegram of February 18 on the same subject, I have the honor to report that the petition of the Cuban Central Railways, dated December 28, 1912 (of which a copy was enclosed with the above-mentioned instruction), was duly considered and formally denied by President Gómez; that the British Minister in a recent note to the Cuban Foreign Office requested reconsideration of this decision, the annulment of the concession, and its grant to the Cuban Central Railways; and that this note, too, has been answered.

The British Minister's note concluded with the ominous observation that in his opinion "the Cuban Government could hardly expect the British Government to be content with leaving the matter as it now stands, or to consent to a denial of that justice and fair treatment to which the Cuban Central Railways are entitled." In its reply, the Cuban Foreign Office, after regretting the "unseemly tone and forceful language" of Mr. Leech's note, states in effect that the protest of the Cuban Central Railways has already received full and careful consideration at the hands of the Cuban Government, whose decision is predicated upon "a strict observance of the law and the most upright principles of justice"; that the matter is now in the courts upon suit of the Cuban Central Railways; and consequently that the Administration could not under any circumstances take further action in the premises. As evidence that this matter has been considered by President Gómez personally I may add, upon unquestionable authority, that the note of the Foreign Office is based upon a draft in his own handwriting.

Under the circumstances, the Department's instruction would be of no avail for the purposes intended.

EXCELLENCY: Referring to my note to you of the 8th instant in which I informed you [etc.] I have now the honor to inform you that before this instruction could be carried out a request was received by the Department on behalf of the Compañía Ferrocarril de la Costa Norte de Cuba that further action in this matter be postponed until the contentions of that company in opposition to the petition of the Cuban Central Railway had been heard.

This request was complied with and an opportunity has now been given to the representatives of the Compañía Ferrocarril de la Costa Norte de Cuba to present its contentions in regard to the questions under consideration and upon a careful reexamination of the subject it has become evident that the controversy between these two rival companies is not of a character which requires this Government to give a preference to either one as against the other. The instructions to the American Minister in Cuba, therefore, with reference to the presentation, in compliance with your request, of the copy of the petition above mentioned to the Cuban Government will conform to this view.

Department's February 18. The contentions of the North Coast Railway Company have been heard by the Department. Upon a careful reexamination of the questions involved it has become evident that this company's controversy with the Cuban Central Railway is not of a character that requires this Government to give preference to either company as against the other, and the Department has today so informed the British Ambassador, who was also informed that the Department's instruction to you, in regard to presentation to the Cuban Government of the petition mentioned in Department's instruction of February 8, will conform to this view.

Therefore you will disregard said instruction of February 8. You will, however, bring the matter therein mentioned to the attention of the Foreign Office, pointing out that in the view of the Department the controversy between the rival companies is not of a character requiring this Government to take the side of either party as against the other.

Sir: I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 25th instant in which you inform me that owing to representations made to you by the Cuban North Coast Company, the United States Minister in Havana has been instructed to suspend action on the instructions previously sent to him.

These instructions were, as you informed me in your note of the 8th of February, to the effect that Mr. Beaupré should bring the matter again to the attention of the Cuban Foreign Office, and should point out that the positive and seemingly well-defined attitude assumed by Great Britain in this matter appeared to require that the questions involved should receive the most serious consideration by the Cuban Government.

Action on such instructions, the purport and effect of which were, as was understood from your note of February 8th, to convey to the Cuban Government the need for careful investigation of a grave question before final action was taken, would not seem to be prejudicial to the position of any parties having a legitimate and honest claim to have its interests considered and justly treated by the Cuban Government and it is with regret that I have to report to my Government the alteration which it has been thought fit to make in your instructions to the United States representative in Havana. I understand that His Majesty's Government has addressed a communication to the American Embassy in London upon the subject, and I cannot but express the hope that you will think fit upon further consideration to allow the instructions to be presented so as to intimate the advice of your Government that no action tending to create vested interests should be now taken, but that the matter should be reserved without prejudice until the coming in of a new President in Cuba who may be expected to deal with it in an impartial spirit.

American Legation, Habana, March 15, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to report that in pursuance of the Department's unnumbered instruction of the 3rd instant, I conferred with my British colleague, Mr. Stephen Leech, in regard to the Caibarién-

Nuevitas railroad matter.

Our discussion seemed to indicate that there was no substantial difference between us as to the facts and Mr. Leech admitted that the facts relating to the points now in controversy were correctly stated in my report to the Department, although we differed radically in our deductions; and he gave it as his opinion that the question now was purely one of construction, which should be referred to and decided by legal authorities. So it seems that we have "a common understanding of the facts in the case," and the "considerable difference of opinion" is not as to the facts. We do not and cannot agree as to the decision to be reached from a consideration of these facts, notwithstanding which I am still firmly convinced that my views heretofore expressed to the Department are correct. " "

I did not attempt to argue these contentions with Mr. Leech, for they have nothing to do with the essential facts, and Mr. Leech frankly said it would be futile.

With reference to the concluding portion of Mr. Bryce's note to the Department, dated February 27th, in which it is suggested that the United States Government might intimate to the Cuban Government that no action should now be taken "tending to create vested interests," in order that the matter might be "reserved without prejudice" for the consideration of the new Cuban Administration, I have the honor to submit that as a matter of fact the question is now before the courts, and in the circumstances no action on the part of the Cuban Government is conceivable tending to create any vested interests not already derived from the actual award of the concession to the North Coast Company.

Mr. Leech's knowledge of the questions involved is far from thorough, and he finally stated that it would be necessary for him to request the attorneys of the Cuban Central to prepare a memorandum for him covering the points at issue. He proposes to send a copy of this memorandum to the British Ambassador in Washington. He has promised to bring me this statement as soon as possible; and I shall then have the honor of reporting further to the Department.

Sir: Referring to the last paragraph of my despatch No. 653 of the 15th instant, in regard to the Caibarién-Nuevitas railroad concession, I have the honor to report that my British colleague has allowed me to read the memorandum prepared for him by the lawyer of the Cuban Central Railways and which he told me he should send to his Government and to the British Ambassador in Washington to be submitted by the latter to the Department. * * *

Despite Mr. Leech's previous admission to me, as reported in my despatch No. 653, that there was no longer any substantial difference between us as to the essential facts, this memorandum states that there "seems to be a wide divergence of opinion as to the facts" between us. I could not, however, discover in the memorandum any reference to a specific instance wherein we differ in any essential point of fact. * * *

Mr. Leech's memorandum also brings up again the question of what Congress intended by the term "Cordillera de Bamburanao," in connection with which, it is alleged, the Cuban Central attempted by an ill-taken technicality to evade the obvious intent of the act. This point is fully discussed in my despatch No. 626, of February 17, 1913, and requires no further comment.

Although the Legation has heretofore relied entirely upon itself to investigate and prepare its reports upon this matter, I have, since Mr. Leech announced that he would have a memorandum prepared by the lawyer of the Cuban Central to refute my previous arguments, thought it expedient to have Mr. Tarafa's lawyer prepare a memorandum for this Legation refuting specifically the British contentions. I have, therefore, the honor to enclose two memoranda —one referring to the specific contentions of Mr. Leech as stated in my despatch No. 653 (page 3), and the other to exceptions taken by the Cuban Central Railways predicated upon the alleged infringement by the President of article 103 and other articles of the Reglamento de las Secretarias del Despacho,—and venture to recommend their careful perusal and consideration by the Department.

In an article covering the full front page of yesterday's issue, the newspaper "Cuba" made a specific accusation that Gibson and I, through the levying of blackmail and graft, have enriched ourselves in various local enterprises. The article is unspeakably scurrilous, of an inflammatory character and calculated to incite to further violence against the members of this Legation. Failure to proceed against this

Sir: Referring to my telegrams of February 6 (1 p. m. and 2 p. m.) in regard to abusive articles concerning the Legation published in the newspaper "Cuba," I have the honor to transmit herewith enclosed copies and translations of the two articles in question. Judging from the tenor of the articles already published, it is to be presumed that they will be followed by others of a similar nature.

The Department is in possession of the facts concerning past offenses of this newspaper in its attacks upon Mr. Gibson last August and upon the President at a later date. I therefore deem it superfluous to enter into a discussion of the matter, but venture to confirm my earnest recommendation already made that I be authorized to present a formal request to the Cuban Government that action be taken against this newspaper for criminal libel.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Habana, February 7—4 p. m.

This afternoon's edition of "Cuba" devotes its entire front page to abusive articles and alleged Washington despatches concerning its attack on this Legation. The editor, Oscar Soto, declares his intention to introduce this afternoon in the House of Representatives a resolution calling upon the President for copies of all notes from this Legation to the Cuban Government since the foundation of the Republic; copies of all warnings and admonitions addressed by me to the Government, and statement of the reasons therefor; and a detailed statement of Mr. Gibson's acts and conduct in relation to collection of the Reilly claim. Commenting on newspaper statements to the effect that the Cuban Government might be asked to deport its editors, "Cuba" declares that its one responsible manager cannot be deported as he is a Cuban citizen, and strongly intimates that he cannot be prosecuted because of his Congressional immunity.

American Legation, Habana, February 10, 1913.

Sir: Referring to my despatch No. 619 of the 6th instant and to other correspondence in regard to the libelous campaign being conducted by the newspaper "Cuba" against this Legation, I have the honor to report more recent developments in the situation as follows:

A few minutes after the receipt of the Department's telegram of February 7, Dr. Patterson, Sub-Secretary of State, called at the Legation and I took occassion to impress upon him with great earnestness the gravity of the present situation and the imperative necessity for the Cuban Government to proceed with energy and effectiveness in the prosecution of those responsible for the libelous and slanderous statements concerning the personnel of this Legation. Dr. Patterson expressed great indignation at the character of the articles which have been published in "Cuba," and stated that both the President and Secretary of State had been shocked upon reading these articles and were prepared to do anything within their power to see that proper reparation was made. Dr. Patterson added, however, that there would appear to be some doubt as to how effective prosecution would be in view of the fact that the newspaper was protected by the parliamentary immunity of a congressman who was paid a salary, not for any work done on the paper, but simply for the protection gained by printing his name at the head of the editorial column. In response to this I pointed out very bluntly that there was no need to allow any such defiance of the laws to interfere with the proper course of justice; that congressional immunity was very clearly intended to cover nothing more than the official acts of a congressman and not to protect libelous and blackmailing newspapers from the consequences of their crimes.

I asked Dr. Patterson to say to the President for me that the leaders of the Conservative party had volunteered to instruct their congressmen to vote to allow the prosecution of this congressman, and that I was convinced, if he showed equally good feeling, he could, by the use of entirely legitimate and proper influence upon Liberal congressmen, insure a majority which would enable the Department of Justice to bring the guilty parties before the courts.

I immediately prepared a note (copy enclosed) which was delivered to Mr. Sanguily personally at 7 o'clock, making formal request for the prosecution of the responsible individuals in compliance with the Department's telegraphic instruction.

In conclusion I venture to express the belief that all elements of Cuban official life now realize the seriousness of the question and that both parties will cooperate to make the prosecution effective.

The Cuban Government has assured me that proceedings against the newspaper "Cuba" are being energetically pressed, but the Government evades making direct statements. Yesterday I insistently requested a definite statement of the steps that have been taken, and I am just now in receipt of a note transmitting a report from the Prosecuting Attorney showing that nothing has been done except to take the declarations of certain members of the staff of "Cuba" as to what they know regarding the authorship of the libelous articles. Soto was requested to appear and depose, but did not do so, alleging illness, although he has been attending to business and traveling about the island. No action can be taken against him until appeal to Congress has been made and granted. Eleven days have now elapsed without any such action and Congress may adjourn at any time. I respectfully recommend that the Department impress upon the Cuban Minister in unmistakable terms its real interest in prompt and effective action, and that it formulate, for presentation by this Legation to the Cuban Government, an expression of its views.

From reports received from the American Minister at Habana the Government of the United States notes with surprise that the Government of Cuba seems to be displaying apathy in the prosecution of those persons responsible for the recent scurrilous newspaper attacks on the personnel of the Legation.

It is with regret that the Government of the United States finds itself obliged to direct the attention of the Government of Cuba to this matter and to insist that the persons guilty of those attacks be adequately and speedily dealt with.

Since the date of the Department's telegram of February 7 I have repeatedly urged definite action, in conferences with the President, Secretary of State, leaders of both parties and other officials. They have promised to do whatever they can but there is manifest a pronounced disinclination to prosecute Soto. Three weeks ago, after long delay, request was made to Congress to permit prosecution, but the matter is being delayed on ridiculous pretexts. The committee to which the request was referred finally appointed one of its members to prepare a report. After several days delay he announced, yesterday, that he would have to be excused as he was not a lawyer and was therefore unfitted for the work; and that, being a Liberal, any report unfavorable to Soto, a Conservative, would be construed as party hostility. It is announced that the committee will "probably" meet again in the course of a few days to consider the question and appoint someone else to prepare a report. Congress will probably adjourn in the course of ten days, and the matter is evidently being delayed in the hope that if in the meantime no action is taken prosecution can be indefinitely deferred. A campaign by Soto and his friends is being made in Congress and the press to create belief that it is unnecessary to permit prosecution as the new administration at Washington will drop the matter in pursuance of an absolute handsoff policy which is being industriously attributed to it. I have exhausted the means at my disposal in the hope of securing action without calling on the Department, but am now convinced that no action can be hoped for unless the Department makes known to the Cuban Government in unmistakable terms its expectation that effective means will be found for dealing immediately with the libelers of the Legation. If respect for the United States and its representatives here is to be maintained, it is essential that the wholesale libels to which they have been subjected for months past be brought to an end by vigorous insistence upon effective prosecution. Failure earnestly to press the case would give encouragement to the worst elements here in their efforts to create anti-American feeling, and would leave the Legation in a deplorable situation.

Sir: Referring to previous correspondence in regard to the libelous attacks upon the personnel of this Legation by the newspaper "Cuba," I have the honor to transmit herewith enclosed, for the information of the Department, copy of a letter today received from Mr. Alexander W. Kent, an American attorney practicing in this city.

In this letter Mr. Kent expresses serious doubts as to the possibility of punishing those responsible for the libels in question; he withdrew to a large extent from the position taken in his letter to the Department of September 7, 1912, written in regard to the newpaper attacks on Mr. Gibson at the time of the Maza assault, wherein he was optimistic as to the facility with which the guilty parties might be brought to justice.

In the last paragraph of his letter Mr. Kent states that the courts are free to arrest and indict Soto as soon as Congress adjourns, but expresses the belief that no Cuban judge would hazard such a step. The right of the courts to take such action is based on a provision of Article LIII of the Cuban Constitution which reads as follows:

Senators and representatives shall be inviolable as regards their expression of opinion or their votes given in the exercise of their duties. Senators or representatives may be arrested or indicted only by authorization of the body to which they belong, if Congress should be in session, except in the event of being caught in the act of committing some crime. In this case and in that of being arrested or indicted when Congress is not in session, report shall be made to the body to which they belong for such decision as it shall make.

In the event that Congress adjourns without taking action in this matter, as now seems highly probable, I venture to submit that we might with entire propriety insist that Soto be arrested and indicted during the recess in accordance with the clear provisions of the Constitution.

The strong anti-American elements in Cuba are now momentarily refraining from open personal attacks upon members of this Legation while awaiting with interest an indication as to whether the Department is inclined further to press this case. By vigorous action we can probably end once for all the vicious practice of using Congressional immunity as a cloak for common crimes, and thereby not only serve our own immediate purpose but also render an important and much needed service to individuals and business interests in Cuba which have, by the ridiculous scope accorded to Congressional immunity, been subjected to every form of extortion, blackmail and libel. On the other hand, any failure earnestly to press the matter at this time will mean a relapse into conditions worse than those from which we have hitherto suffered; for those elements now held in check by a wholesome fear of being brought to justice will construe any wavering in our announced purpose to prosecute as a license to include in unlimited abuse of American representatives here, secure in the belief that they can do so with impunity.

While by no means as positive as a few weeks ago, there is still a general hope and belief among those most interested that the new administration in Washington plans to let the lawless elements here run riot unrestricted, and the slightest encouraging sign would be taken as confirmation of this belief.

From my own careful observation (as stated in my telegram of March 14) I am convinced that it is the intention of those in authority to evade, by every possible means, the responsibility of bringing the Soto question to a direct issue. The reason for this determination may perhaps be found in the fact that there are now pending before Congress thirty-five or more requests to prosecute members of Congress for crimes committed in Habana Province alone. In spite of repeated assurances from the Speaker of the House of Representatives and from other high officials of the Cuban Government, I fully expect that the matter will purposely be delayed so that it may not reach a vote before the end of this session of Congress, which may be looked for not later than the 27th instant.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Habana, June 16, 1913.

The Cuban Government, desirous that I "should leave Cuba with only pleasant memories," prevailed upon Congressman Soto to make public retraction of his charges in a speech before the House. As this speech was not adequate or satisfactory, the Secretary of State induced the newspaper "Cuba" to make more definite retraction and apology. This was done by the "Cuba" of its own motion, and is very gratifying in that it shows a desire to do such justice as the Cuban Government is in a position to secure unaided. It does not of course dispose of the question of congressional immunity. However, in view of the short time remaining before my departure, I trust that I may not be instructed to press the matter further. Personally I am disposed to accept the action of the Cuban Government in the way it is intended, and drop the matter. The Department should understand, however, that the principle involved is far more serious and important than the incidental phase which has affected me. The real question is whether congressmen can abuse their constitutional immunity as a cloak for vulgar crimes, libel, blackmail and character assassination. Past and present abuse of this immunity constitute a real and constant menace to honorable men, to reputable business and to other diplomats who are not so well able to defend themselves as we are. The Cuban Government and the best business elements, both American and Cuban, have looked confidently to the Government of the United States to put forth its best legal and diplomatic talent to secure protection of decent men against the outrages of the press. I trust that the Department, for the good of Cuba, will exert its best efforts to put an end to the present shameful conditions.

THE BEAUPRÉ-GIBSON-" CUBA" INCIDENT.

OUR LAST WORD.

In view of the magnanimous reception which the press and public opinion have accorded to the speech delivered day before yesterday by Sr. Soto in the House of Representatives in regard to this incident, we wish, on our part, in just interpretation of the sincere and highminded intentions of our editor, to throw further light upon the matter and explain what really happened in this unpleasant affair. Our editor has, in fact, already set it forth in his speech, in the following words:

I did not mean to wound the reputation of any person, nor to heap discredit upon any respectable representative accredited to our country; it could not occur to me, who fought on the fields of the Revolution and who am mindful of the timeliness of the assistance rendered us by the Americans in putting an end to the Revolution, to direct a wicked, cruel and unjustified attack against the representative of the American nation, which has always commanded our ulmost respect. I attempted merely, in the heat of journalistic fray, to defend something that I regarded as sacred and to put a stop to a state of affairs that seemed to me harmful to the interests of my country.

The articles published in our columns upon this regrettable affair were in defense of Cuban interests thought to be jeopardized by the conditions to which Sr. Soto referred in his speech: by the frequent intervention of the American Legation in our affairs—often due, we must confess, to the misconduct of our internal policy.

Subsequently we have become convinced that our fears for the Cuban interests mentioned were unfounded and that the data that had been furnished us for their defense were untrue. We ought to have so stated at the time, in all sincerity; but, as our editor said in his speech:

Unfortunately, when that struggle was begun and a satisfactory solution might have been found, there arose, not the anger, rancor nor malevolence of those whom I attacked, but the untimely, malicious and interested intervention of a compatriot of ours, who sought to take advantage of this little incident, perhaps to reap pecuniary profit from any triumph over me that he might obtain.

In view of the campaign started against us by certain of our contemporaries, had we then come out and made the statement that we now make, advantage would surely have been taken of the occasion to attribute our conduct to fear; and we continued pitilessly to fight. The journalist, who must feel human weaknesses more intensely than others because he feels them publicly, in the presence of all his readers and of public opinion, prefers, rather than have himself adjudged fearful of the consequences of what he writes, to face all dangers.

But now, with our liberty of action completely restored and the attitude of our editor—which is naturally the attitude of "Cuba"—viewed with justice and noblemindedness, first by the House of Representatives and afterwards by the press and the public, "Cuba" takes pleasure in making the foregoing statement and in recognizing the honorable character of Mr. Beaupré and Mr. Gibson, Minister and Secretary of Legation, respectively, of the United States in our country.

[Inclosure—Translation—Extract.1]

As the land customhouses of Comendador and Tierra Nueva were abandoned by the Assistants of the General Receiver in consequence of the state of war, the United States Government resolved to protect said employees by maintaining the Frontier Guard, in order to prevent the customs receipts allotted to the payment of the foreign debt from suffering any detriment.2

With this object, and in view of its contractual relations with the Republic and its position as mediator between the Dominican Republic and the Republic of Haiti in their boundary dispute 3 the United States Government determined to consider as a de facto provisional line between the two Republics, without prejudice to the rights and obligations of either country and pending the conclusion of a final settlement of the boundary dispute, the line indicated on the map of Haiti and Santo Domingo prepared by the Second Division (Military Information) of the General Staff, Washington 1907 and 1908, sheet No. 6, of Mente Cristi, and sheet No. 7, of Barahona, which you will find appended to the Report on Foreign Relations.

Said measure, taken in order that the customs receipts might be duly protected and that the provisional line thus determined might be guarded and temporarily respected, was never carried out, for the reason that the abnormal situation of the country and the circumstances which occurred afterwards rendered unnecessary the action of the American Government along this line.

The commission sent here by President Taft at the beginning of September, 1912, after studying the situation not only with respect to the official object of its mission—that is, the restoration of the customshouses and of the Frontier Guard—but also with respect to our domestic policy, withdrew some days before the resignation of President Victoria, without the troops who came with it on the Prairie having to land at any point on Dominican territory.

President Nouel advised me this morning of a plot to gain possession of the fort here by prominent Horacista generals. Horacio Vásquez himself denounced the plot and offered to place himself and some of his followers in the fort to maintain order.

The Archbishop [President Nouel] has for some time been urged arbitrarily to abolish the present Congress and make himself dictator. He has absolutely refused and is thinking of convoking Congress in extraordinary session to consider constitutional reforms and other matters.

He expresses himself as despondent over the probabilities of success in his efforts for good government unless the Government of the United States takes an active part in controlling elections and the establishment of a government expressing the will of the people. He therefore requests me to obtain from you if possible a statement that can be made public as to the necessity of such a step on our part if the disorders of the past should tend to recur.

You will do everything in your power to hold up the hands of the President, Archbishop Nouel, and to impress him with the necessity of patiently continuing in office. It would be well to advert in your conversations to the fact that under the present electoral law it is apparently almost impossible to accomplish much in the direction of free elections, however willing the Government of the United States might be to lend its aid; and that as a prerequisite to free elections it would seem indispensable to provide some form of previous registration and some form of voting that would prevent fraud. You might also suggest in informal conversation that besides the electoral law other reforms seem to the Department to be urgently needed, and that these might possibly be accomplished without reform of the Constitution. For instance, reform of the laws relating to provincial and communal governments, the law of conscription (so as to provide for an annual enlistment by lot instead of at the will of local military chiefs), and the creation of a right to question arrest by means of habeas corpus or other such proceedings.

arrest by means of habeas corpus or other such proceedings.

You might also point out to the President how much easier it would be for the United States to lend its aid if necessary to assist in the conduct of free and orderly elections if such reforms were realized.

Notwithstanding the obstacles which the former state of war and its consequences have caused, I earnestly trust—and I beg Your Excellency to share this trust—that the occasion may not arise for the Government of the United States to fulfill in a manner painful to the Dominican people its moral obligations and those imposed by the Convention of 1907.

Firm in its intention to cooperate with the legally constituted Government in order that revolutionary activity may cease, the Department of State makes known to the revolutionists and those who foment revolutions the following:

Under the Convention of 1907, the Dominican Republic cannot increase its debt without the consent of the United States of America, and this Government will not consent that the Dominican Government increase its debts for the purpose of paying revolutionary expenses and claims. Moreover, this administration would look with disfavor on any administrative act that would have for its object increase of the taxes, thereby imposing a burden upon the people, for the purpose of satisfying revolutionists. And should the revolution succeed, this Government, in view of the President's declaration of policy, would withhold recognition of the de facto government, and consequently withhold the portion of the customs collections belonging to Santo Domingo as long as an unrecognized de facto government should exist.

File No. 839.00/885.

The Minister of the Dominican Republic to the Secretary of State.

DOMINICAN LEGATION, Washington, September 20, 1913.

Mr. Secretary: The New York Herald, in its edition of the 17th instant, published a report that the steamship Seminole of the Clyde Company, disobeying the orders that Commander Ortori gave its Captain not to enter Puerto Plata because of the blockade that had been decreed and which the Dominican cruisers Independencia and Jacagua were rendering effective, entered the said port.

You will recall that the Department and this Legation had considered it unnecessary and even inexpedient to deprive the Seminole of entry into the blockaded ports, considering that she had left New York before the date of promulgation of the decree of blockade and that her entry would not cause much harm to the Dominican Government since it was certain that there were neither arms nor ammunition on board. But the commanders of the cruisers charged with making the blockade effective did not know of these circumstances, wherefore it is credible that if they did not use force to prevent the entry of the Seminole into Puerto Plata it was because they did not wish to act unpleasantly toward the North American Government which since the revolution began has showed that it had decided to aid the constitutional Government.

Therefore, and to avoid the repetition of similar acts which by disregarding the blockade would permit the introduction of contraband of war into the province in insurrection, and lest the ships charged with maintaining the blockade should fire on the merchant vessels that may fail to respect it, permit me to request of you, as one of the legitimate means offered by President Wilson "to assist the Government of President Bordas to reestablish order and prevent new insurrections," that the commanders of American war ships now in Dominican waters and those that may go there later be directed to warn every captain of an American merchant ship that endeavors to break the blockade of his duty to respect it, and to warn all captains of foreign ships who seek to proceed in like manner that the Government of the United States has decided to respect the measure decreed on the 4th instant by President Bordas as essential to the reestablishment of peace in the Dominican Republic.

The Dominican Government consents to cessation of hostilities pending answer of revolutionists to a change in the proposition I submitted, namely, that Céspedes should not be Governor but may name anyone he chooses, whom the President will appoint. This amendment is made because of the claim that the retention of Céspedes would be humiliating in view of his insults to the President.

The blockade interferes with commerce but the Government seeks to justify it on the ground that the rebels would otherwise secure supplies. I believe this position untenable because the Government of the United States has declared that constitutional authorities cannot be overthrown. I have wedged in our right to maintain peace and to expect non-interference, direct or indirect, with customs receipts. Please send text of formal note on this point.

In regard to Céspedes, to allow revolting governors to retain their posts would seem like rewarding treason; hence it is better that a friend of Céspedes be appointed in his stead in order to avoid a repe-

In the revolting provinces the President should appoint new military commanders of whom he is absolutely sure, since the retention of Horacista governors might otherwise jeopardize peace.

a non-interfering scrutiny by open agents appointed by the Department at the principal towns and polling-places, upon whose joint report the Department will decide as to the validity of the constitutional election, the Dominican Government to be informed of our purpose with the assurance from us that unless the election of December 15 expresses the will of the people as a whole the American Government will take full control of the presidential election that follows. The American agents should be at their posts not later than December 10. If this plan is acceptable to the Department the Legation will furnish list of polling-places.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 24, 1913-7 p. m.

Convey to the President the following in regard to the coming elections:

As the condition upon which peace was restored, free and fair elections were guaranteed by the Government of the United States. It is therefore incumbent upon this nation not only to use its good offices to secure such elections but from the standpoint of the Dominican Government it is also imperative that the election should be so conducted as to give no reasonable excuse for criticism. A free election is possible only when all qualified voters are permitted to vote and the votes counted as cast.

You will therefore confer with the President and urge such regulations as will permit free access to the polls of all qualified voters.

As to the counting of the vote, one thing above all others is necessary in order to give confidence, namely, that the minority party as well as the Government party shall have judges of its own selection at all polling-places. should therefore be at least two judges at each polling-place, and at least one of these should not only belong to the opposition but should be selected by the opposition. As three parties will present candidates, the greatest satisfaction would be given by an arrangement giving one judge to each party. But if you cannot secure this you should at any rate be able to secure the selection of the opposition judge from the party that has the greater strength in his own precinct or section. These judges should make a record of all contests, and the contests should be heard before a general canvassing board on which all three of the parties would be represented. It would be well for you to be present at the canvassing to give advice and lend your influence in behalf of absolute impartiality.

This Government is of course indifferent as to which party succeeds. merely desires the maintenance of constitutional government; and there, as here, constitutional government means that the people shall rule and have what they want in the matters of policies and offices.

I take it for granted that during the campaign freedom of speech will be allowed, so that each party can present its cause to the voters. If you observe anyone tending to interfere with freedom of speech, show him how essential freedom of speech is to popular government.

You have succeeded admirably in securing peace and we hope that your success will be as pronounced in securing the only guaranty of peace—a free and fair election. BRYAN. File No. 839.00/960.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 4, 1913.

Your December 2, 10 p. m., is partially answered by Department's December 2, but in addition you will say to the Government that wide publication and circulation of proclamations cautioning all orators and voters to moderation and avoidance of inflammatory and seditious utterances should be tried and the interest of all factions engaged by a call to register or the adoption of such other inoffensive measures as may divert and dispel tendencies to violence. While recognizing the difficulties confronting the Dominican Government, this Government believes recourse to coercive measures will raise suspicion of possible unfairness of election, which might precipitate a new revolution.

Endeavor to secure certified lists of registered voters and have them approved by the various factions or so modified as to be acceptable, pointing out to party leaders and to the President that this step constitutes the basis of all orderly elections and are in accordance with chapter III, article 12, of the election law of the Republic. Secure also a list of important polling-places and decide where scrutinizers should be stationed.

It is of course expected that the Government will place the telegraph system at the disposal of the electoral boards, commissioners and agents and will facilitate free communication in all ways. The hearty cooperation of the Government and all contending factions in support of the electoral boards and the commissioners and agents of this Government is naturally expected by the President of the United States.

[Telegram-Paraphrase.]

American Legation, Santo Domingo, December 5, 1913.

There has been a full Cabinet meeting attended by the President, to which I was invited. We discussed the commission, arriving at the following conclusions:

First, that the Dominican Government wants no commission to come, because the Government believes it would create revolution.

Second, that if the commission came the Government would give it no official recognition.

Third, that the Government believes that the Minister could report as to the character of the election and that the foreigners here could furnish such evidence in regard to the election as might be needed.

The Government at first claimed that the peace pact did not bind it, but withdrew this claim later.

It then claimed that when the Puerto Plata leaders signed the pact the interest of the United States ceased. This claim they found untenable on review of the facts.

One of the admissions made by the Cabinet was that the commission can come as individuals without any official capacity, like tourists. I held firmly to our rights in the premises as an interested party, our Government having solemnly promised a fair and free election, with the consent and approval of the Dominican Government; I asserted that President Wilson's declaration of principles concerning Latin America reserved the right to enter any Latin American country to see that the people's rights were not lost by force or fraud; I pointed out that the non-interfering features of our plan could not hurt the tenderest sensibilities and that such a commission as the President of the United States proposed, seeking as they would only information and lifting neither hand nor voice in interference, would be welcomed in any country; and I said that objection to the commission would naturally raise grave doubts in all concerned as to the intention of the Dominican Government.

The people have in the meantime caught the idea of freedom of speech and fair voting. The commission is bringing the great boon of freedom, and to have it stopped on its way would bring despair to the [omission in transmission] and also to the more enlightened elements, which now believe in us.

The Dominican Government, however, questions our right even to suggest what shall be done. Behind this stand is the purpose to use coercion. It does not deny that agents have the right to be onlookers but does not wish officially to recognize them.

I most earnestly recommend firm adherence to the plan agreed upon, believing that any deviation would render worse than useless all the work we have done here.

MEMORANDUM.

December 6, 1913.

In accordance with your desire, I have the honor to ratify, by this communication, the declarations which I made to you verbally in our interview of yesterday.

As my Government stated to me in a cable received three hours prior to our interview, the Hon. James M. Sullivan, E. E. and M. P. of the United States in Santo Domingo, recently announced that a Commission appointed by the Government of the United States would go to the Dominican Republic to supervise elections for Magistrates and Deputies, to be held on the 15th and 16th of the current month.

As a result of this statement, which is the culmination of a series of declarations made on many occasions by the Hon. Mr. Sullivan with regard to the attitude of the North American Government affecting elections in the Dominican Republic, which declarations have been the cause of excitement and comment in the press throughout the Republic, my Government directs me to lay before the Department its desire that in the event that President Wilson, in his laudable purpose of continuing to cooperate with the Government of President Bordas in the work which the latter proposes of cementing in morality and law the peace of the Dominican Republic, has considered it necessary and expedient to send the said supervisors as stated by his worthy representative in Santo Domingo,

President Wilson will modify his opinion in this regard, in view of the promise made by President Bordas and which I today solemnly reiterate: that during his administration elections in the Dominican Republic will be carried out with entire liberty of speech and action.

In transmitting this desire of President Bordas, I urge you to consider—taking into account the fact that the President has never given any reason for doubting the sincerity of his promises and purposes, and, further, the inherent tendency of professional revolutionists to convert every circumstance into a pretext for exciting the suspicion and arousing the patriotism of the masses-whether the announced despatch of foreign commissioners to supervise officially our elections may not prove:

1st. Without cause, since the declarations concerning free elections and the attitude of the United States made by the Hon. Mr. Sullivan were not the reason for the laying down of arms by the revolutionists, since they continued fighting many days after such declarations, and the rebels, after losing many battles and much ground, surrendered, according to the confession of their leader Gen. Horacio Vásquez (attached), nor was this effected as a result of any promise that the United States would guarantee elections, but by virtue of a pact the first clause of which is as follows:

Elections entirely free, guaranteed by the National Government, both for Constitutional Deputies and for President of the Republic; the Executive Power engaging to remove from office any authority not observing the strictest and most absolute neutrality in this regard.

2d. Unnecessary, since President Bordas has restored constitutional guaranties, has liberated many persons imprisoned during the late revolution, and nothing has been done thus far in violation of the said pact which can give rise to the belief that it will not be executed religiously;

3d. Useless, since elections are always celebrated publicly and may always be watched as much as is desired both by natives and strangers; therefore the pressure which might be exercised to nullify them could always be proved without the sending of a foreign official

4th. Counteractive, since the presence of strangers with the official mission of supervising our elections could be exploited by provokers of revolutions, who would endeavor to make the Dominican people believe that the Dominican Government had consented to the despoiling of our sovereignty, whereby either there would ensue the driving out of power a President-possibly the only one in our history who was elected by the free will of the representatives of parties who the day previous had been facing each other and disposed to go to war in order to effect the triumph of their respective candidatesor more likely would provoke a new loss of blood and money in a war which could only secure to the Government as its best result a sad triumph at a cost of the lives and interests of thousands of its

In view of these reasons, President Bordas, who is profoundly grateful to President Wilson for the effective support which he has given the Dominican nation in the efforts of its Government to maintain a sound constitutional rule, hopes that he may continue to merit this support and the confidence of the people and Government of the United States, and believes firmly that as the cooperation of that Government in weakening the last revolution was carried out with certainty and speed without the despatch of American soldiers to fight the Dominican rebels, in the same way, without the sending of American Commissioners, the same results may be obtained in regard to the ends of justice, so much desired by all, in order that we may hold free elections, through a mere declaration of principles and wise counsel, which will always be eagerly sought, and with any other indication of the exalted aspirations of His Excellency, President Wilson, which may not be interpreted by anyone as an attack upon our sovereignty.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Santo Domingo, December 7, 1913.

An imposing demonstration favoring the commission will be held this afternoon. Negotiations up to date have created a strong pro-American sentiment among the people and the country is for the first time enjoying a considerable measure of freedom of speech and of the press. All this is believed to be due to a better understanding of President Wilson's attitude, explained in the Mobile speech, which we had published here in full.

The Dominican Government's attempt to create hostility to the commission is therefore meeting with failure. A demonstration for this purpose was to have occurred yesterday but has been postponed until the Government can obtain mercenary attendants. The Government is misrepresenting our attitude by using the words "supervision," "intervention," "control."

In view of the misrepresentation by the Government, may I publish the open telegrams from the Department?

Say to President Bordas that the President of the United States has planned to send a number of Americans to visit the principal polling-places on election day, not as a "commission" for which this Government asks any official recognition but only as individuals, to lend by their presence moral support of the efforts that President Bordas has so freely pledged himself to make to keep the election free and uninfluenced in all respects, and in order that, if any question should arise as to the good faith of anyone concerned, undeniably impartial witnesses may be available.

Mr. Secretary: In accordance with your desire, I have the honor to ratify by this communication the declarations that I made to you verbally in our interview of yesterday.

[Here follows verbatim the memorandum of December 6, with the first paragraph omitted.]

To the foregoing statement permit me, Mr. Secretary, to add the

My Government does not seek to avoid public acknowledgment of its acts, much less to evade any opportunity of demonstrating its disposition to fulfill religiously its promise of holding free elections in my country; therefore the present occasion does not call for either an indication of distrust of its intention to execute its promises or an attempt to belittle the independence of the Dominican people. But I believe that the sending of commissioners from the Department of State cannot secure the information desired by the Department, because of the inability of those commissioners supervising all the polling-places embraced in the sixty electoral districts; and doubtless it will serve to encourage professional revolutionists who, besides spreading the impression that this step is an evidence that the Department of State has lost confidence in President Bordas, will also make the public believe that he has consented to a fresh derogation of our sovereignty.

This point of view of President Bordas, and the attitude which he consequently feels obliged to take, do not in any degree spring from hostility toward the people and Government of the United States. His friendly disposition toward them is daily shown in the various acts of his administration and especially in the frank resolution with which he executes in all its clauses the Dominican-American Convention of 1907. But in his capacity as Chief Magistrate of the Republic he is the exponent of the sentiment of all citizens of the Dominican Republic, who, if disposed fully to carry out the terms of that convention and kindly to receive such inspirations arising therefrom as benefit their civilization and welfare, regard all increase of foreign power in their country with the same dismay as that felt by a cripple who, using one crutch, contemplates the menaced amputation of his good foot so as to require the use of two.

For these reasons, and because your Department has confirmed to me the news in today's papers that the said commissioners have sailed for Santo Domingo, I fulfill in this note the instructions given me to protest for my Government in behalf of the Dominican people against this step, as without cause, unnecessary, useless and counter-active.

A most happy effect upon the Government and all parties has been produced by Department's December 7, into which each political element reads a victory for itself.

In official reply to my note embodying the said instruction the Government raises no objection to the presence of American observers as outlined but is nevertheless of the opinion that their presence may displease the people. Information received by the Legation, however, indicates general satisfaction.

Referring to my December 2, 10 p. m.: Emiliano Tejera, ex-Minister for Foreign Affairs, a respected citizen, published today an open letter to President Bordas demanding a public inquiry into the shooting of many present at the demonstration of December 2, and warning the President that unless he institutes such an inquiry the writer will start impeachment proceedings against the President in the next Congress. The Government's action was apparently unjustified and we therefore urged the Government to give a further opportunity for a full and free ballot, or some other remedy for the injury alleged to be done to the opposition; a full Cabinet meeting tomorrow will discuss the matter. In harmony with our friendly counsel, the Government has decided to call a special session of Congress for January 4 to consider protests of opposition parties and decide on the validity of the elections in contested instances. As Congress is not controlled by the administration but has an opposition majority, that appears to us a most honorable way of meeting the highly dangerous situation.

And in view of the admirable attitude of the Government in this matter, we earnestly recommend that the Department give immediate consideration to the financial situation, which is most embarrassing, for the Government is in critical need of ready funds to pay salaries and meet other just obligations. We authorized heavy war expenditures and by our support of blockade reduced customs receipts nearly one half, and hence have a direct responsibility in the matter. Without our assistance neither this nor any succeeding government can hope to survive long. Report to the Secretary of State made by the representatives of the Department of State appointed to observe the Dominican elections.

U. S. S. Dolphin, At SEA, December 20, 1913.

Sir: At the time of the recent revolutionary disturbances in the Dominican Republic the American Minister prevailed upon the leaders of the revolution to lay down their arms and submit their grievances to settlement through the ballot. In order to secure their agreement to this method of procedure he promised them that the American Government would use its best efforts to guarantee a free and fair election. The Dominican Government on its part promised to afford to all factions the rights of free speech, free press and free ballot.

In order to carry out its promise in the matter the American Government designated the undersigned to proceed to Santo Domingo City to cooperate with the American Minister and to observe the character of the elections. At the same time 29 agents, under the direction of Captain Walter St. Elmo (Chief, Bureau of Information, Police Department of Porto Rico), were ordered to Santo Domingo from Porto Rico to be stationed in the more important centres for the purpose of observing and reporting upon the character of the elections. The undersigned in compliance with your written instructions of the 6th instant left Washington on December 7th and proceeded to Santiago de Cuba where they boarded the U.S. S. Nashville and were conveyed to Santo Domingo City arriving on the evening of December 12th. Immediately upon the arrival of the Nashville outside the port the American Minister came on board and went over the situation with us in detail. He suggested that we go on board the Petrel in the harbor and give informal instructions to the Porto Rico agents in order that they might be despatched to their posts of observation without further delay. The agents had already received specific written instructions from Captain St. Elmo; the Minister and the undersigned, therefore, limited themselves to a few informal remarks, impressing upon the agents the limited character of their functions, warning them against exceeding their powers and informing them in general terms of the purposes of the American Government. Immediately upon the completion of this conference the agents were despatched in revenue cutters of the Dominican Government to their various posts of observation where they arrived before the date set for the election.

Although the Dominican Government had made strong protests against the coming of the Department's representatives and had declared that they would not be received, we were the recipients of most courteous attention throughout our entire stay. On the 13th instant we were courteously received by the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Señor Grullón, upon whom we called in company with the American Minister. On the following day we were received in audience by the President of the Republic.

The balloting began on the 15th instant and proceeded without incident throughout the day. At the close of the first day's balloting in Santo Domingo City the opposition party led by a majority of several hundred votes. The telegrams received from the agents throughout the Republic were most encouraging in character and indicated that with the exception of a few isolated and relatively unimportant instances the day had passed off in an orderly and satisfactory manner. Early on the morning of the second day of voting the Government imprisoned six leaders of the opposition party on the charge of conspiracy to seize the fortress at Santo Domingo City and assassinate the President. As these leaders were also the chief political directors of the opposition party in the matter of rallying the voters and getting them to the polls, this action on the part of the Government had a most demoralizing effect. The voters of the opposition, without efficient direction and intimidated by the action of the Government, abandoned the idea of going to the polls and returned to their homes in various parts of the province of Santo Domingo. The American Minister, after conferring with us, brought this matter to the attention of the President, pointing out to him the deplorable effect of the Government's action. The President assured him that the arrest of these individuals had been necessary for the maintenance of peace but that he had no intention of making further arrests and that the voters of the opposition need fear no interference or intimidation in exercising their right to vote. Upon receiving these assurances Mr. Sullivan got in touch with the leaders of the opposition who were not already in prison and urged them to rally their followers and make a systematic and orderly attempt to continue the election. After some discussion they informed him that it would be impossible for them to make any showing at the polls as their followers had scattered throughout the province and there was not sufficient time remaining before the closing of the polls at six oclock to get any considerable number of them into the city. Although there was some talk of violence, the opposition party confined itself to making formal written protests to the President against the action of the Government.

In order to remove the opposition's cause for complaint, Mr. Sullivan discussed with the Government several tentative remedies for the situation, such as continuing of the balloting for another day. This was discussed in Cabinet meeting on the evening of the 16th, and Mr. Grullón, Minister for Foreign Affairs, and Mr. Lovatón, Secretary of the Interior, called upon the Minister and the Department's representatives in order to discuss the question at length. Up to this time the Department's representatives had carefully avoided making any advances in the matter or giving any ground for complaint that they were interfering in any way. ference with these two members of the Cabinet was entirely at their They began by saying that although the Government had not exceeded its rights in making the arrests they recognized the regrettable effect this action had had upon the elections and were desirous of finding some remedy for the situation. They stated that the President and the Cabinet had discussed at great length the question of keeping the polls open for another day but that they had found this to be quite impossible from a constitutional point of view and that the idea must be abandoned. They were disposed to maintain that although they regretted the impossibility of this procedure its very impossibility relieved the Government of its obligation of seeking any further remedy and that the situation must be accepted by the opposition without further discussion. In the interest of a fair election and in view of the fact that this interview had been sought by two Cabinet members, the Department's representatives felt free to use further efforts to secure an adequate remedy for the situation. We therefore pointed out to the gentlemen in very frank terms the deplorable effect of any failure on the part of the Dominican Government to exhaust every effort to afford a fair chance to the opposition to cast its votes or to present its protests for hearing and decision by some competent authority. After several hours' discussion it was agreed that the only practicable solution of the problem was the convening of a special session of Congress in the early days of January to receive the protests of the opposition and decide as to the validity or invalidity of the election. Congress is not at present controlled by the Government but by an opposition majority and it was believed that the submission of pending questions to that body would insure a fair hearing to the opposition. On the 18th instant after further conference the President issued a decree calling a special session of Congress for January 4th and at the same time issued a proclamation to the Dominican people stating that the opposition would have every opportunity to present its protests before Congress.

The reports received from other parts of the island were in the main satisfactory. It appears that both sides exercised all the usual political tricks to influence the voters and that there was a certain amount of bribery, but we were unable to find any tangible evidence in the telegraphic reports received or in conversation with the agents who arrived before our departure that the Government had exercised intimidation or coercion to prevent voting by the opposition for their own candidates.

From the latest returns received before our departure it appears that the opposition has elected 17 out of 24 delegates to the Constitutional Convention and will therefore have a majority in that body of almost three to one. This would seem to preclude practical criticism of the Government's action before or during the election.

It will be remembered that the Dominican Government was strongly opposed to the sending of agents to observe the elections and that it endeavored to stir up anti-American feeling among all classes in order to turn us from the course which had been decided upon. We are gratified to be able to report that this attempt to create hostile feeling was almost entirely unsuccessful. At only two points in the Republic was any hostility shown, one of which was controlled by the opposition party, while during our stay in Santo Domingo we received only the most courteous treatment even from the rough crowds about the streets. Before our departure the President and Cabinet made frank admission that we had shown ourselves to be true friends both to the Government and to the opposition. The opposition repeatedly expressed their gratification at our presence and at the results obtained by the exercise of our good offices and counsel. We are firmly convinced that the Department's course in this matter has had the most happy effect; that never before in the history of the Republic has there been held an election so unhampered by coercion and that future efforts to insure fairness and freedom of elections will meet with a far more cordial reception from all classes.

While the Department's policy has in this instance met with complete success, we feel impelled to state that this is merely a preliminary step and that similar action should be taken in regard to the Presidential elections which will be held in the Spring when the Constitutional Convention shall have concluded its deliberations. While the holding of a fair and free election has had a happy effect it has not, of course, convinced the mass of the people that orderly elections are the natural and most practical course of procedure which can be depended upon with confidence. If, however, future elections can be held in an orderly manner a feeling of confidence will gradually be built up with each ensuing election and the people will, it is believed, come in time to regard the ballot as a more natural and satisfactory instrument and will look upon violence and disorder with growing distrust. This will not be accomplished in a short time but we feel confident that by persistence and patience the American Government can accomplish a great measure of good for these people and that more radical interference, humiliating to the Dominicans and distasteful to the United States, can be avoided. As regards the coming Presidential elections we venture respectfully to recommend that a definite plan be outlined well in advance for the sending of a body of trained observers to exercise much the same functions as those who have just completed their task. It is believed that the moral effect of the sending of some such body of men will be invaluable not only to the opposition but to the Dominican Government itself in any efforts it may make to maintain order and insure the fairness of its elections.

It is also our belief that it is imperative, for the stability of the present or any future Government of the Republic, that the financial situation now existing be investigated and remedied. As this situation is, however, outside of the scope of the Department's instructions to us, it will not be gone into.

Throughout our stay in Santo Domingo we had the most pleasant and cordial relations with Mr. Sullivan, the American Minister, and we desire to express in the most emphatic terms our admiration for his handling of the critical political situation. Under the most difficult circumstances he has maintained friendly relations with the Dominican officials and with the leading members of the opposition. He has shown great tact, skill and resourcefulness, and has accomplished a great deal in a practical way towards securing a fair election, prevailing upon both sides to carry out their promises and to abide by orderly processes. During a time of great excitement and partisan bitterness he succeeded in accomplishing definite results and at the same time admirably avoided giving any pretext for criticism to either side.

In conclusion we desire to express our deep sense of obligation to Captain Nulton of the U. S. S. Nashville, who has afforded all possible assistance to both the Minister and the Department's representatives. Captain Nulton has been in Dominican waters for some time and has met the situation with a keen sense of diplomatic values; he has formed friendship with a number of the higher officials of the island and has won their confidence. This was accomplished only at the cost of untiring effort and considerable personal expense. He has done a great deal of good through his friendship with these men and has accomplished a valuable work in convincing them of the nature of American ideals and aims in regard to such countries as Santo Domingo. We feel safe in saying that he has gone far towards changing in Government circles the atmosphere of suspicion and distrust which has so long prevailed. We respectfully suggest that the Secretary of the Navy be informed of our deep appreciation of Captain Nulton's courtesies and his able assistance in the work of our mission.

We have the honor to be, Sir, Your obedient servants,

JORDAN HERBERT STABLER, FREDERICK A. STERLING, HUGH S. GIBSON.

File No. 839.00/1041.

The American Minister to the Secretary of State.

No. 40.]

American Legation, Santo Domingo, December 23, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to inform you that the elections of December fifteenth and sixteenth were held in this country, under the helpful influence of the visiting delegates from the State Department, with a degree of success that was hardly hoped for by any of the parties concerned.

Although the election was general and held in every part of the country, the old Latin-American custom of withdrawing from the polls was resorted to in but few instances. In the small town of Seybo, in Sánchez, in San Francisco de Macoris and in the capital there were withdrawals; but the rest of the election was fought out to the closing hour. In two of these instances the struggle was carried on between two factions of the opposition. Whatever might have been said as to the interference by the Government and the use of force in some instances, the action of the President in calling a special session of Congress, made up of a number of members the majority of whom are hostile to his Government, to pass upon the validity of the election in all contested instances removes the last criticism of the Government by any fair-minded person.

This special session of Congress has been called for January fourth and there is a general feeling of satisfaction here at the American attitude toward the whole situation. It will be interesting to note that the Government will not control the constitutional convention unless it succeeds in making a combination with one of the other factions.

On Friday, December 19, 1913, after a previous conference with members of the State Department who were here, I issued the following statement in the press:

In the recent revolutionary movement the American Minister, acting under instructions from his Government, prevailed upon the leaders of the revolution to lay down their arms and resort to the ballot for the settlement of their grievances. The American Government agreed to exert its best efforts to ensure to all factions a fair and free election. The Dominican Government promised a free ballot, free press and free speech.

The freest, most systematic and orderly electoral campaign ever held in this Republic was carried on, all factions availing themselves of their full rights of free press and free speech. Elections throughout the country were held in an unprecedentedly free and orderly manner. In Santo Domingo City and some other places there were regrettable incidents which caused the opposition parties to withdraw from the polls on the second day of the voting. It has so far been impossible to form a final opinion as to where the responsibility lies for these incidents but the American Minister is gratified to learn that the Dominican Government has rendered the formation of such opinion superfluous by prompt and generous action. The President has determined to call a special session of Congress for January fourth and desires that anyone with complaints as to the recent election shall present them for the consideration and decision of the This honorable and unprecedented action affords striking proof of the President's desire to deal fairly with all factions, and it is the earnest hope of the American Government that the members of the opposition will meet this action in the same patriotic spirit of frankness and moderation. A calm and dispassionate settlement of party differences through the deliberate agencies of orderly government will be an achievement of incalculable benefit to the good name and credit of this Republic and all patriots will cooperate to that laudable end.

On the other hand any failure on the part of the opposition to avail of the peaceful remedies now offered would be a most unpatriotic and shameful performance which, it is confidently hoped, will not have to be considered. It is not doubted that every patriotic Dominican will labor with his whole strength to maintain the high standard already set in these elections and complete the triumph of the people by removing through orderly means the last elements of doubt in the situation.

The American Minister declares most emphatically that any one not availing himself of these remedies need hope for no support or sympathy from the American Government.

Permit me to thank the Department for the timely relief which the Delegates from the Department brought me. I believe that I had brought the situation up to the election in fairly good order, following the lines of my instructions; but it was the influence, vigor, experience and initiative of Messrs. Stabler, Gibson and Sterling that saved the situation during the days of the election. Had they not arrived at the psychological moment all my efforts might have turned to ashes.

I enclose herewith a copy of the report of Walter M. St. Elmo, who had charge of the twenty-nine agents from Porto Rico. I have on hand also the twenty-nine individual reports of these agents, to be placed on file in the Legation.

I believe that if this country can be tided safely over the Presidential election, its march will be toward better things. All is tranquil here now and no one claims seriously that the United States has not fulfilled its promise to the last letter; and there is a feeling of optimism throughout the Island that the Dominican Republic has entered on an era of peace and prosperity.

I have [etc.]

[Inclosure.]

Report to the American Minister by Walter M. St. Elmo, Chief of the Bureau of Information, Police Department, Porto Rico, in charge of the twenty-nine agents appointed to observe the Dominican elections.

> [Santo Domingo,] December 20, 1913.

SIR: In accordance with instructions received from the Governor of Porto Rico, Hon. Arthur Yager, the undersigned suggested the names of 29 employees of the Insular Government of Porto Rico, 6 Americans and 23 Porto Ricans, who reported to you on the 11th instant for the purpose of observing the elections held in this Republic on the 15th and 16th instant.

Under your direction these men were sent to different parts of the Island, as follows:

[Names of the men, and names of localities at which they were posted.]

The individual reports of the agents, which you now have or will receive, show that the elections in the places as named were held with comparative fairness, taking into consideration an extremely faulty election law and the heretofore prevailing custom on the part of the government in power of using force and coercion to insure results favorable to their interests.

Isolated cases of coercion, violence and fraud were observed, but which in no manner affected the final count of the ballots cast. Shooting occurred in La Vega, San Pedro de Macoris and San Cristóbal, and some disturbance took place in this city and in Moca. In the Capital the Government made a number of arbitrary arrests of leaders of the opposition party, which caused their followers to withdraw from the voting on the second election day, the 16th.

The general good order observed throughout the Republic during the elections was, without any doubt, brought about by the attitude assumed by yourself and the American Government in reference to these elections. The fact that the Commission appointed by the State Department arrived here prior to the elections had an assuring effect on the people; they appeared to be relieved and to feel that our Government meant business and that it intended to keep its promise made to them through yourself to guarantee a free election. The general consensus of opinion appears to be that that promise was kept and that they feel that a step toward a free exercise of suffrage has been made.

While some protests have been made in a number of towns against alleged unfairness and fraud, those protests will in no way affect the general result of the election returns. The fact that the opposition party elected a majority of their candidates appears to be sufficient proof that the Government used no great amount of undue influence, violence or coercion. This fact is all the more astonishing because of the oppressive measures heretofore employed by the government.

ernments in power on like occasions.

A most general protest is heard on every side against the present election law. It is faulty in every respect, works a great hardship upon the people and practically prevents a full and free expression of their will at the polls by making it very difficult for the majority to get to the polls to vote and by facilitating fraud through repeating. No entirely free elections can be hoped for in Santo Domingo until a census is taken and electoral lists prepared and an entirely new electoral law enacted; but those just passed were as free and orderly as could be expected under existing conditions and should be a matter of congratulation to yourself and the Government you so worthily represent for having so successfully brought them about.

The [omission] generally prevailing among the people appears to be that the recent elections were free and fairer than they expected and that the good order and absence of former coercive measures and of violence or oppression was almost wholly due to the unofficial intervention on the part of the American Government.

Some of the Horacista party now profess to believe that they were treated unfairly by the Government and that it wilfully sought by trickery and oppression to bring about the defeat of their political party. However, this sentiment is not at all general, even among members of that political faction.

While before our arrival in Santo Domingo, and during the first day or so thereafter, some comment was made in the local press and indulged in by a few irresponsible persons on the streets in protest against even non-official intervention in their affairs by us, I am indeed glad to report that no hostile action against any of us was in any way attempted and that in the majority of cases our stay in Santo Domingo has been without a single disagreeable incident and that in most cases Government officers and others assisted us in our work and tried in every way to make our stay pleasant.

Very respectfully,

WALTER M. ST. ELMO.

The Dominican Government today arrested Frederico Velásquez. I have seen intercepted letters that indicate his participation in a plot to overthrow the Government by force. Several have been detained, others expelled, and still others have voluntarily left the country. I have asked that the accused be tried. The country is tranquil and if the critical condition of financial affairs could be relieved there is hope of continued peace.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS—CONCLUSION OF A LOAN CONTRACT BETWEEN THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC AND THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK, WITH THE APPROVAL OF THE UNITED STATES.

American Legation, Santo Domingo, September 27, 1912.

Mr. Samuel M. Jarvis, representing the National Bank of Santo Domingo, informs me that the Dominican Government, being sorely pressed for money, has applied to the bank for a loan to be secured on all stamps and stamped paper for a period of years. The bank stipulates submittal of a statement of the Government's financial condition and approval by the Government of the United States of the loan. Unless a new order of affairs is insisted on by our Government the country will soon be utterly ruined.

My Dear Mr. Secretary: The following cablegram was received this day from the Deputy Receiver General of Dominican Customs:

Bill introduced Dominican Congress December 9 authorizes Executive to contract loan of $1,500,000 specifically recognizing article 3 of the treaty; 7 per cent interest; $30,000 payable monthly by General Receiver of Dominican Customs. This will probably be handled by local banks. Approval of American Government will not be requested until contract has been signed. In the meantime Santiago Michelena advances $2,500 daily to the Government.

Congress has passed the bill authorizing the Executive to make a contract for a loan as heretofore reported, and the bill has been signed by the President, who strongly advises that the approval of the Government of the United States be limited to approval of such sums as he may need from time to time, expenditures to be controlled by the Minister of Finance, the Legation and the General Receiver of Customs, and if his Government fall our approval immediately to cease as to any unexpended balance of said loan. I strongly recommend this course be approved by the Department, and as soon as possible.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 18, 1912.

Inform the President that this Government approves in principle the making of a loan by the Dominican Government to meet its present financial needs and hereby authorizes preliminary advances on this loan to be made to the present Government by the bankers of not to exceed $300,000. Sums so furnished must be at par, interest not to exceed 7% per annum from date of advances; and, provided they be disbursed under the control and supervision of the Legation and the Receivership, this advance to form part of the total of the proposed loan. Before, however, finally approving the loan contract this Government must know more of its terms, such as the price at which the loan is to be taken. Inform Department as accurately as possible as to the amount necessary to discharge the total recent indebtedness of the Republic and in detail the purposes to which it is to be applied. This Government could not approve the advance or loan of moneys to a Government that had not been recognized by the United States.

At the rate of interest required by law the local bankers do not find the loan attractive and each will include in his contract a provision that he be made Government depositary. They inquire what their position would be if the approval of our Government were withheld after the first or any subsequent advance, after they have subscribed for the whole loan.

The Royal Bank of Canada has made a proposal for the whole loan in accordance with a contract form prepared by it.

What is the position of the Department in regard to naming a

I suggest that the loan contract should be drawn up in Washington with express stipulations as to control of disbursements and that each advance should be approved as necessary up to the full amount of the loan.

SIR: At the request of the Chief of the Latin American Division of the State Department, I have carefully gone over the attached draft of a proposal for the $1,500,000 loan of the Dominican Republic.

I believe, under all the circumstances, that the proposal is fair and reasonable, and that if no proposals are received more favorable to the Government the Dominican Government might well be author-

[Inclosure.]

CONTRACT BETWEEN THE REPUBLIC OF SANTO DOMINGO AND THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK RESPECTING THE PURCHASE OF $1,500,000 PAR VALUE TREAS-URY NOTES.

The National City Bank of New York hereby agrees to purchase from the Republic of Santo Domingo, and the said Republic hereby agrees to sell to the said bank, one million five hundred thousand dollars par value Treasury notes dated January 1, 1913, any unredeemed balance due January 1, 1919, bearing interest at the rate of six per centum per annum payable January first and July first of each year, the said notes to be the direct obligation of the Republic of Santo Domingo and issued in coupon form of one thousand dollars denomination each, to be registered as to principal only, principal and interest to be payable at the National City Bank of New York in United States gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness. The notes shall be numbered from 1 to 1500 consecutively and shall become redeemable and shall be payable in their sequence and in such numbers on each interest date as the amount of the amortization fund available with the bank on such interest date will permit.

To guarantee the payment of the interest on the aforesaid notes and to provide for their retirement within the time specified, the Republic of Santo Domingo, subject to the terms of the convention between the United States and the Dominican Republic, hereby pledges of its customs receipts the sum monthly of thirty thousand dollars gold, which amount the Republic hereby authorizes the Receiver of Customs to deduct monthly, commencing January 1, 1913, from the customs receipts of the Republic, and immediately to deposit said amount with the National City Bank of New York for the service of the loan, such said monthly payments of thirty thousand dollars to be regularly continued by the Receiver of Customs until the total amount so deposited with the bank shall have fully served the requirements of this contract.

The National City Bank of New York hereby agrees to pay to the Republic of Santo Domingo ninety-six and one-half and accrued interest for not exceeding one million five hundred thousand dollars par value of the above described notes, five hundred thousand dollars of the purchase money to be available to the Republic immediately upon the execution of this contract, and the remainder to be payable to the Republic as required, upon three days' notice to the bank. the payments to be made in New York funds.

Any and all remittances on account of this loan, of coin, bullion or currency, or through the medium of exchange, made by the bank to Santo Domingo or elsewhere, as may be ordered, shall be made at the expense of the Republic, the bank agreeing to charge only the actual cost.

The bank hereby agrees to allow the Republic interest at the rate of two per centum per annum on the balance of its account, such interest to be credited semiannually.

The notes shall be executed in English, and if desired in Spanish, but the English wording shall govern and be acceptable to the bank.

The notes shall bear the facsimile signatures of those authorized to sign on behalf of the Republic and shall be certified to by the National City Bank of New York. All notes as redeemed shall be cancelled by the bank and surredered to the Dominican Republic.

Referring to your telegram of February 7 and previous correspondence in regard to the making of a loan of $1,500,000 to the Dominican Government, I desire to advise you that from the information before this Department it appears that in the competition to obtain this loan proposals were submitted to the Dominican Government by two rival American-owned concerns—the National Bank of Santo Domingo and the National City Bank of New York City—and that the Dominican Government has decided to accept the proposal of the National City Bank of New York. Both proposals appear to be within the requirements as they are known to this Department, and from a calculation made by the officers of the Insular Bureau of the War Department it appears that the proposal of the National City Bank of New York is somewhat more favorable to the Dominican Government. In view of all the facts and circumstances as known to the Department there appears to be no ground that would call for or justify the Department in any interference in the matter of the awarding of this contract.

The Government is in desperate straits unless some kind of loan is immediately consummated. The President has been compelled to pay out large sums for the expenses of the late war; these were proper expenses and the sums used to pay them were advanced by Michelena, to be charged to the loan. But owing to the uncertainty about the conclusion of the loan, Michelena absolutely refuses to advance another dollar.

The Department assumes that advance has already been made of $300,000 under the terms indicated in Department's December 18. If the Dominican Government anticipates the need of an additional advance before the conclusion of the loan, the Department hereby consents thereto, if not in excess of $200,000 and if under the terms recited in Department's December 18, to be refunded out of the proceeds of the permanent loan.

In regard to the protest of the National Bank of Santo Domingo, you are informed that the Department has concluded its study of the matter and has no observations to offer to the Dominican Government. Jarvis has been informed that both proposals seem to be within the legal requirements, and that the initial adoption of a loan contract to be submitted for this Government's consent, and acceptance of the proposal most advantageous to the Dominican Government, are matters for that Government's determination, and the Department does not feel called upon to interfere as between rival American bidders.

The Department is uncertain whether or not your February 13 means that the National City Bank proposal has been finally and irrevocably accepted. If it has been so accepted and when the Department has been so advised, it will promptly inform you of a minor change respecting procedure which it has to suggest as preliminary to its consent. AMERICAN LEGATION, Santo Domingo, February 21, 1913.

The Dominican Government has ratified to me its final and irrevocable acceptance of the proposal of the National City Bank of New York, after having duly considered the protest of the National Bank of Santo Domingo. The following is the text of the preamble of the contract:

Whereas the National Congress of the Dominican Republic has authorized, by a law approved by the President on December 14, 1912, the negotiation of a loan not to exceed $1,500,000 gold, at a rate of interest not to exceed 7 per centum per annum; and, considering that of the proposals submitted by various bankers for this loan the Dominican Government has accepted the proposal of the National City Bank of New York, an incorporated company with its principal domicile in the City of New York, United States of America, at No. 55 Wall

The Dominican Republic, represented in this contract by its Secretary of State for Finance and Commerce, party of the first part, and the National City Bank of New York, represented, by virtue of a special authorization transmitted by cable on January 23, 1913, by Mr. Santiago Michelena, banking concern, domiciled in the City of Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, party of the second part, hereby agree and contract as follows:

Department of State, Washington, February 26, 1913.

In regard to your February 23, the Department feels that the provision for the endorsement by the American Minister should be stricken out of the loan contract.

As to your February 21 and February 24, with the modification made as stated in the foregoing paragraph, this Government, in pursuance of the terms of the convention between the two Governments of February 8, 1907, stands ready to agree with the Government of the Dominican Republic that that Government contract a loan for $1,500,000 in accordance with the terms of the contract with the National City Bank of New York. In order to evidence this agreement on the part of the two Governments, it is proposed that formal notes be exchanged between the Foreign Office and the Legation.

Therefore when the Minister for Foreign Affairs shall have addressed to you a note enclosing a copy of the proposed contract, modified as above indicated but otherwise as laid before the Department, and shall have officially asked that this Government agree to the proposed increase of the Dominican public debt as provided in the said convention, and shall have informed you that the Dominican Government agrees that the proceeds of the loan shall be disbursed subject to such supervision as this Government may indicate, you will acknowledge receipt and say:

The Government of the United States, pursuant to the terms of the Convention between the United States and the Dominican Republic of February 8, 1907, hereby agrees with the Government of the Dominican Republic that the Government of the Dominican Republic may increase its public debt to the amount of one million five hundred thousand dollars in accordance with the terms of the proposed contract with the National City Bank of New York, a copy of which has been transmitted to this Legation; provided, however, that all advances or disbursements of the proceeds of this loan shall be made only by check or order of the Minister of Finance of the Dominican Republic specifically reciting the proposed application of the disbursement, such check or order to be countersigned as providing for a proper expenditure by the Minister or Secretary of the Legation of the United States in the Dominican Republic, and by a person designated for this purpose by the Receiver General of Dominican Customs.

You will withhold exchange of notes until a slight modification in the coupon note desired by the National City Bank shall have been cabled to you, today or tomorrow, for your information.

The Department is informed that the National City Bank is proposing the following modifications in the text of the loan note and has submitted them to the Dominican Government:

In paragraph 1 after the words "and to pay interest thereon" the paragraph as amended should read "from the date hereof until the principal of this note is paid at the rate of six per centum per annum semiannually on the first days of July and January in each year. Until the maturity of this note such interest shall be paid only upon the presentation and surrender of the annexed interest coupons as they severally become payable."

In paragraph 3 after the words "from 1 to 1500, both inclusive," the paragraph as amended should read "issued in conformity to the Convention between the United States of America and the Dominican Republic ratified July 8, 1907, the payment of the principal and interest of which notes is secured by the pledge by the Republic of its customs revenues subject to an existing charge thereon securing the $20,000,000 Five per cent Customs Administration Sinking Fund Gold Loan of the Republic under and pursuant to the terms of the said convention between the United States of America and the Dominican Republic." Sin: I have the honor to inform you that on March 1, 1913, the Minister for Foreign Affairs for the Dominican Republic addressed a note to the American Minister at Santo Domingo City, enclosing a copy of a contract made with the National City Bank of New York providing for a loan to the Dominican Republic of $1,500,000, and officially asked that the Government of the United States agree to the proposed increase of the Dominican public debt as provided in the Convention of February 8, 1907, between the two Governments, and the Minister for Foreign Affairs informed the American Minister that the Dominican Government agreed that the proceeds of the loan should be disbursed subject to such supervision as the Government of the United States might indicate.

The American Minister in acknowledging this note informed the Minister for Foreign Affairs, pursuant to the instructions of this Department, that:

The Government of the United States, pursuant to the terms of the Convention between the United States and the Dominican Republic of February 8, 1907, hereby agrees with the Government of the Dominican Republic that the Government of the Dominican Republic may increase its public debt to the amount of one million five hundred thousand dollars in accordance with the terms of the proposed contract with the National City Bank of New York, a copy of which has been transmitted to this Legation; provided, however, that all advances or disbursements of the proceeds of this loan shall be made only by check or order of the Minister of Finance of the Dominican Republic specifically reciting the proposed application of the disbursement, such check or order to be countersigned as providing for a proper expenditure by the Minister or Secretary of the Legation of the United States in the Dominican Republic, and by a person designated for this purpose by the Receiver General of Dominican Customs.

In view of the above, I have the honor to request that the appropriate telegraphic instructions be issued to the Receiver General of Dominican Customs.

The Department is now informed that the American Minister is bringing to the United States with him true copies of the correspondence exchanged between the Dominican Foreign Office and the American Legation, as well as a true copy of the loan contract as signed. Mr. Secretary: I have the honor to send you herewith a copy of the note I wrote today to his excellency Sr. Solon Ménos, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic of Haiti, and of the new draft protocol that I have submitted to his attention.

On the assumption that the Haitian Government will cooperate with the Dominican Government in expediting the proceedings necessary to a prompt arbitral decision, the said draft protocol contains a proposition contractually to accept the provisional [boundary] line between the Dominican and Haitian Republics adopted by the Government of the United States of America on September 24 last pending a decision of the Arbitral Tribunal as to what the final boundary line is to be. I am complying with my instructions in saying to you that this conditional acquiescence—which is given because the Dominican Government is convinced of the absolute necessity of adopting a frontier if cordiality is to be maintained in the relations of the neighboring peoples, and is satisfied that nothing but a profound desire for peace prompted the Government of the United States to adopt the said line—does not imply a renunciation of the territories in dispute on the part of the Dominican Republic, nor an acknowledgment that it did not possess in January 1911 the

The representation of the boundary on the eastern bank of the river, as shown on the map of Haiti and Santo Domingo mentioned in your communication, was due to the inpracticability of superimposing the convention for the boundary line on the single line representing the narrow bed of the river." This Department has also invited an expression of opinion from the War Department as to whether, as in the case of the Pedernales river, the thalweg or one of the banks of the rivers Artibonito, Libon, Capotillo and Massacre is indicated by the line shown as the boundary on the before-mentioned map, [and] has in reply¹ been informed by the Secretary of War that it is the opinion of his Department that "the thalweg of the Artibonito, Libon, Capotillo and Massacre rivers is indicated by the line shown as the boundary on the map of Haiti and Santo Domingo referred to in your communication."

During the present year we were at one time at the point of organizing the arbitral tribunal, for there appeared in this city Mr. Henry Janes, the arbitrator appointed by the then American President, Mr. Taft. As we, on our part, had appointed Doctor Alfredo Baquerizo Moreno, the tribunal seemed about to be organized.

It was not so, however: Difficulties arose regarding the constitution of the tribunal and while the discussion of this delicate matter was going on, Mr. Janes suspended his participation and returned to his country. We are, therefore, where we were before; but we hope that the new President of the United States, Mr. Woodrow Wilson, who has so outspokenly proclaimed his intense Pan-American spirit, will soon appoint some one to replace Mr. Janes on the tribunal.

I have presented to the Minister for Foreign Affairs the subject of your telegram of December 18. He appreciates our motives but feels that the situation does not warrant any negotiations with the revolutionists, basing his opinion (1) on the killing of physicians and nurses of the Red Cross by revolutionists in so brutal a way that his Government cannot treat with them with self-respect; and (2) on the Government's confidence in soon overcoming the revolutionists. There are two causes for the revolution: (1) the assumption that President Plaza was responsible for the killing of President Alfaro in 1912, and the intention of the revolutionists that the death of President Plaza shall follow; (2) the desire of the revolutionists to get their hands into the public treasury. These causes are probably not susceptible of compromise.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Quito, December 16, 1912.

Sir: I have the honor, with reference to telegram from this Legation dated December 14, to report that the Minister for Foreign Affairs requested an interview with me on the afternoon of December 14th for the purpose of discussing matters connected with the proposed arbitration.

The Minister desired to take up the contents of my note No. 122, enclosure in despatch to the Department No. 163, dated November 13, 1912, which embodied the Department's instruction dated November 9.2

The Minister stated that the Arbitral Tribunal of 1907–1908 had never rendered a decision. That the controversy at that time was settled by the contract of September 30, 1908, which was reached by direct agreement between the Government of Ecuador and the Railroad Company. This agreement was approved, with slight modifications, by the Ecuadorean Congress, November 6, 1908.

The point which the Minister for Foreign Affairs wished to make was the following: Has the Railroad Company carried out its part of the contract of September 30, 1908, or has it failed in some of its obligations?

The Minister stated that the Government of Ecuador was very desirous of having this question passed upon by the Arbitral Tribunal. If the Arbitral Tribunal decides that both the Government of Ecuador and the Railroad Company have complied with the stipulations of the contract of September 30, 1908, the other questions to be decided will be those of a date later than September 30, 1908; but if on the other hand either the Ecuadorean Government or the Railroad Company has failed to carry out the obligations imposed upon them by the above-mentioned contract, it is evident (according to the Minister) that these points can not be considered as being res judicata, and should be presented to the proposed Arbitral Tribunal for decision.

Therefore the Minister for Foreign Affairs informed me (Legation's telegram of December 14) that he had instructed the Ecuadorean Legation in Washington to request that the departure of Mr. Janes be delayed until receipt by mail of the note, copy and translation of which is enclosed herewith, by the Department, in order that Mr. Janes' instructions might be amplified, so that the Tribunal could pass upon the question of the fulfillment by the Railroad Company of its obligations under the contract of September 30, 1908.

It is not felt that the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ecuador has made the main point of his argument sufficiently clear in the note enclosed herewith. As the contents of this despatch was reached by the writer as the result of a long personal conversation with Mr. Dillon, it is hoped that it may serve to throw some light on the real feelings of the Government of Ecuador with regard to the proposed arbitration.

RUTHERFURD BINGHAM.

[Inclosure—Translation.]

No. 118.]

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS, Quito, December 12, 1912.

Sir: I have the honor to reply to your note No. 122 dated the 11th of last November, in which you state "that the Government of the United States cannot now regard as open for discussion matters involving the existence and validity of the fundamental contractual agreements between the Government of Ecuador and the Railway Company"; matters which, as you state, "were under discussion in a former controversy and were passed upon by the Arbitral Tribunal of 1907–1908, in an act having the status and value of an arbitral award, which has since not only been fully recognized but until the present time unquestioned by the Ecuadorean Government." Finally you add in the above-mentioned note that: "The status as to the fundamental agreements being thus, and the matters of present dispute between the Ecuadorean Government and the Company, as heretofore considered by the two Governments, having solely to do with the transactions between the Government of Ecuador and the Railway since September 30, 1908, the Government of Ecuador will perceive that the present proposed arbitration can have relation only to such latter matters and that in the discussion and decision thereof the status referred to must be accepted as a fundamental basis upon which to ground the determination of the questions involved."

With reference to what I have quoted, I shall begin by stating certain ideas which I consider of the greatest importance:

Regarding the arbitration, it is the President of the United States, individually, and not the Government of that Republic who possesses the character of Arbitrator, by reason of the contract entered into with the Railroad Company. Therefore I believe that the intervention of the North American Government in the matters treated of in this note can not be accepted.

Therefore I can do no less than deplore that your judgment in this matter differs materially from the opinion of the Ecuadorean Government and that this discrepancy may result in the postponement of the settlement, which the Chief of the State greatly desires to conclude in the shortest possible time.

In fact, theoretically as well as practically, the constitution of an Arbitral Tribunal whose members had not received ample and equal full powers for the discharge of their functions, would be unacceptable.

The reasons which in your opinion have determined the President of the United States to restrict the powers of his representative are based upon this false idea: that the difference between the Government of Ecuador and the Railroad Company previous to September 30, 1908, "were discussed and passed upon" by the Arbitral Tribunal of 1907-1908, it being the case that the said Tribunal, although it was properly constituted, did not pronounce any award, as appears from the evidence. These differences were arranged, it is true, but not by the Arbitral Tribunal above mentioned; they were arranged by the mutual agreement of September 30, 1908, approved with modifications by the Legislative Decree of November 6 of the same year: an adjustment which does not have the legal status peculiar to an arbitral award. The agreement is a contract, and bilateral contracts have the characteristic that they are null and void in case one of the contracting parties does not carry out his part of the agreement. It is not thus with arbitral awards, which have the character of finality or definitiveness independent of the accomplishment or non-accomplishment of the undertakings therein contained. In consequence, the only arrangement that exists between the Government of Ecuador and the Railroad Company, that is to say, the transaction of 1908, does not have the decisive character with which you desire to endow it in the note to which I am now replying.

On the other hand, the discussion as to what shall constitute the matters which the projected Arbitral Tribunal shall decide I consider irrelevant because the Tribunal is the only authority empowered to determine them, without further limitations than those established by the mutual obligations of the parties, obligations which in this case are no other than the contract of June 14, 1897, between the Government of Ecuador and the Railroad Company. The powers of the Arbitrators should have the scope that is indicated by Article 27 of the above-mentioned contract. It is not the attribute of one only of the Arbitrators to determine in advance the matters that shall fall under the jurisdiction of all the Tribunal, because, in the exercise of its functions, not even the Tribunal itself can amplify or restrict the limits of the pact that gives it life.

On account of what I have above set forth, I should appreciate it if you would suggest to His Excellency the President of the United States of North America the expediency of not limiting the juridical powers of his Delegate, in order that he may exercise them without restriction, whatever may be the claims of the Government of Ecuador or its disagreements with the Railroad Company, provided that these disagreements are those contemplated by article 27 of the contract of June 14, 1897. My Government considers it an indispensable condition for the perfect working of the Arbitral Tribunal that no one of its members have restricted powers, differing from the ample powers with which both Representatives should be invested, as the Representative of the Republic will in fact be invested.

Sir: I have the honor to report, with reference to my despatch No. 187, that the result of note No. 150, dated February 18, 1913, was a request from the Minister of Foreign Affairs to call at the Foreign Office for the purpose of discussing the contents of note No. 150 above mentioned.

Dr. Carrera then informed me that he had not yet received a reply from the Legation to note No. 118, dated December 12, 1912 (enclosure in despatch No. 170, dated December 16, 1912) and desired some statement from the Legation with reference to the contents of this note before replying to No. 150, appointing a time and place for the formal meeting of the Arbitrators for the purpose of exchanging credentials and full powers.

The point that Dr. Carrera seemed to have most in mind was the question of the scope of the powers granted to the American Arbitrator. He stated further that he had been informed by the Ecuadorean Legation in Washington that the Department of State had told Mr. Wither that the powers granted to the American Arbitrator were unrestricted.

The conference ended by Dr. Carrera requesting the Legation to reply to the note from the Foreign Office of December 12 last.

The note in question contained so much controversial matter, on the subject of which the Legation had received no instructions, that after a consultation with Mr. Janes it was decided to ignore the contents of this note, with the exception of that part dealing with the powers of the American Arbitrator.

Note No. 151, dated February 21, 1913 (duplicate copies enclosed herewith), was accordingly addressed to the Foreign Office, together with a certified copy of the authority under which Mr. Janes will act.

[Extract.]

Office of the American Arbitrator,

Quito, March 5, 1913.

Sir: Referring to Department's instruction No. 62 of January 21 last to the American Chargé d'Affaires at this capital, and to my telegram from Panama of January 2¹, I have the honor to submit a report upon the situation.

After some delay at Panama, I arrived at Guayaquil on the 9th of January, proceeding after a delay of one day at Huigra to Quito, where I immediately made the usual formal official calls and endeavored to cultivate the acquaintance of the members of the Government and to form the closest friendly relations with the circle of advisers surrounding the President. * * * The Ecuadorean Arbitrator reached this city on the 13th of February, about five weeks subsequent to my arrival in Ecuador. * * *

Immediately upon receiving official notice of the arrival of the Ecuadorean Arbitrator, Chargé d'Affaires Bingham courteously approached the Foreign Office suggesting the expediency of a meeting of the two arbitrators now present in Quito, in order that the Arbitrational Tribunal might at once be installed. In reply the Minister for Foreign Affairs transcribed a communication from the Minister of Public Works stating that it had been arranged between this official and Mr. Henderson, Manager of the Railway Company, that the arbitrators and the lawyers for both parties should meet at the Ministry of Public Works in order to discuss the preliminaries for the promotion of the organization of the Arbitral Tribunal without delay. Upon learning from Mr. Bingham of the tenor of this note, I called upon Doctor Baquerizo and agreed with him that it would be most inexpedient for the arbitrators to be present at the conference between the parties, inasmuch as it appeared probable that certain subjects might be broached initiating a discussion in the presence of inary negotiations between the parties.

Accordingly, during the past three weeks the attorneys for the Railway Company and the Government have been laboring to arrive at an understanding furnishing the bases for the work of the Tribunal. * * *

the members of the Tribunal regarding matters which would in due course be formally submitted to arbitral judgment. It further appeared to me most important that I should not permit myself to be drawn into any controversy between the parties which might give an erroneous impression as to my attitude on the questions at issue. Doctor Baquerizo readily assented to the view that the arbitrators in this matter should keep themselves severely aloof from the prelim-

The argument that has been put forward during the discussion over the terms of submission, between the attorneys of the parties at the Ministry of Public Works, tends, it is asserted, to show a purpose of the Government to insist upon the Arbitration Tribunal being organized in accordance with the provisions of the Ecuadorean Civil Code and subject to Ecuadorean laws and procedure, with the primary object of making any arbitral decision reviewable by the local courts. Article 27 of the contract between the Government and the Guayaquil and Quito Railway Company reads as follows:

All controversies or disagreements that may arise between the contracting parties shall be settled by arbitration; one arbiter shall be the President of the United States of America and the other shall be the President of Ecuador; should they not wish to act, they will each name an arbiter; and should these not agree, then the said President of the United States of America and the President of Ecuador will name a third arbiter to decide the question.

It would appear that it was the intention of the parties to the contract, in embodying this clause among its provisions, that all future controversies and disputes which might arise between them, growing out of these contractual relations, should be removed from the jurisdiction of the local tribunals and that an appeal for settlement should be made to the sense of justice of the Heads of States therein designated. It is submitted that even to a person casually perusing this clause of the contract it must occur that just such a stipulation should have most naturally suggested itself for adoption by persons pledged to an undertaking of such stupendous magnitude, in the completion of which the least of future difficulties to be reckoned with was certainly not the methods and procedure customarily encountered by foreign companies in the administration of justice by the local courts.

In spite of the difficulties that have been met with, the hope is felt that the representatives of the parties will, if a firm attitude is maintained by the Department in the matter, soon reach an agreement as to a compromise which will eventuate in arbitration. I am informed by the attorneys of the Railway Company that a satisfactory arrangement has been reduced to writing by the Government lawyers and should be signed tomorrow. Should, however, this not be the case, or should further and unreasonable delay be experienced, I would respectfully recommend that the Department intimate firmly to Minister Córdova that the Government of the United States cannot continue to regard as serious the expressed purpose of the Ecuadorean Government to submit the differences existing between the railroad and that Government to arbitration and is considering the advisability of the withdrawing of the representative on the Arbitral Tribunal designated by the President of the United States. I feel confident that a strong attitude in such an eventuality would bring about an immediate solution either in the direction of arbitration or a direct settlement between the parties.

With respect to the note from the Ecuadorean Foreign Office to the American Legation of the 25th ultimo, in reply to Legation's note of the 21st of that month enclosing a certified copy of the powers of the American Arbitrator, I have learned from Mr. Bingham that the grounds for the action taken by the Legation have been set forth in a despatch to the Department (No. 189, dated Feb. 22). It would appear evident that the expressed preparedness of the Ecuadorean representatives at this date to enter into a satisfactory arrangment covering the terms of submission had postponed the consideration of the controversial matters raised in the note from the Ecuadorean Foreign Office of December 12, 1912, until the time when the cases of the parties shall have been filed and issue joined. The course pursued was particularly recommended by the desire of obviating the loss of time through a discussion between the Governments of those points before the issue between the parties had become definitely joined, thereby affording opportunity for the elimination of many matters of an extraneous character and materially simplifying the It is therefore respectfully submitted that in consideration of all the elements of the present complicated situation, it would be better to await developments which may be of such a character as to make diplomatic representations on those points unnecessary.

Sir: I have the honor to report that through a confidential source, which I believe to be reliable, information has reached this Legation with respect to the instructions given to Dr. Gonzalo S. Córdova, newly appointed Ecuadorean Minister to Washington, by his Government.

With respect to the arbitration of matters relating to the Guayaquil and Quito Railway Co., Dr. Córdova has been informed that the Government of Ecuador will delay sufficiently over the preliminary details, so that the Arbitral Tribunal will not be formally installed until after Dr. Córdova's arrival in Washington.

Dr. Córdova is then instructed to direct all his efforts in a general way to persuade the new administration to abandon the attitude of protection, which the Department of State has so far maintained towards the Guayaquil and Quito Railway Co., this for the ostensible purpose of fostering and improving good relations between the United States and Ecuador.

Dr. Córdova is to be kept closely informed with regard to the progress of the arbitration and in case President Plaza is not satisfied with the attitude and the decisions of the American Arbitrator, or believes that any advantage may be gained therefrom, Dr. Córdova will be instructed to request the recall of Dr. Henry L. Janes and the appointment of some other person to replace him.

[Telegram—Paraphrase.]

American Legation, Quito, March 8, 1913.

Representatives of the Government of Ecuador and attorneys for the Railway Company have been discussing bases of submission for arbitration wherein the Government tentatively agreed, for the sake of courtesy, that the oath be administered to the arbitrators by the President of the Supreme Court and stipulated that the arbitrators should act as amiables compositeurs.

The said representatives suddenly changed in attitude on March 6 regarding the finality of the award to be rendered and the obligation of prompt payment of such sums as may be awarded, insisting that this is a question for determination subsequent to the award.

The fact that Ecuadorean law provides that an award is not final unless so stipulated in the submission makes clear the purpose reflected in the above-mentioned attitude of the Government.

Papers were served today on the Company in a proceeding to compel the taking of the oath before an inferior court and to oblige the American Arbitrator to submit to the jurisdiction of this local tribunal. This is apparently a repetition of the effort made by the Government attorney to cite the President of the United States to appear and act as arbitrator or to arbitrate a question in accordance with article 27 of the railway contract. At that time it was finally recognized by Ecuador that communication with the President should be made through diplomatic channels, which resulted in the appointment of an arbitrator.

In view of this, and of the evident intention of the Government of Ecuador to maintain that recourse to the local courts is still open in case of an award unsatisfactory to the Government, the American Arbitrator will refuse to recognize the right of any Ecuadorean court to compel him, acting in the matter instead of the President of the United States, to submit to their jurisdiction and procedure. Telegraphic instructions are requested.

The Arbitrator's despatch of March 5 is concurred in by the Legation.

I would respectfully recommend a firm attitude toward the Minister of Ecuador, about to arrive at Washington. A further delay may threaten the very existence of the railroad enterprise and I hope a settlement by arbitration may be speedily reached.

OI Fudilc Works sent to me:

The Minister of Foreign Affairs and Justice: I believe it proper to inform you, in order that you may bring it to the knowledge of the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of North America, that Dr. Manuel R. Balarezo, Government Attorney, requested the Judge (Juez de Letras) of the Province of Pichincha to administer the oath of office to Dr. Henry L. Janes and Dr. Alfredo Baquerizo Moreno, for the discharge of the important office of Arbitrators, to which they have been appointed respectively by the Governments of Ecuador and the United States of America, for the purpose of deciding the controversies between the Government of Ecuador and the Guayaquil and Quito Railway Co. This request was caused by the consideration that the Agents (having full power of attorney) and the Attorney of the Guayaquil and Quito Railway Co. have raised difficulties to having this oath taken before the Supreme Court.

The Government has designated the Senate Chamber as the office or meeting-place of the Arbitral Tribunal for the beginning of its labors.

The Government of Ecuador believes that the Arbitrators should take the oath of office in conformity with the motion made by Dr. Balarezo, the Government Attorney, but the Representative of the Railway Company states that he does not consent to the oath of office being taken in the manner indicated above. This opposition prevents the immediate organization of the Tribunal and commencement of its labors, which is what the Government of Ecuador has desired and continues to desire with eagerness.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Quito, Ecuador, March 17, 1913.

MR. MINISTER: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of the note of your excellency No. 249, of the 14th instant, in which you transcribe at the suggestion of the Minister for Public Works a communication from that Ministry stating that proceedings have been initiated before the Second Judge of Letters of Pichincha Province to the end that the arbitrators designated according to the terms of Article 27 of the railway contract of 1897 may enter upon their duties. The Minister for Public Works adds that this action has been made imperative because of difficulties, which he does not specifically indicate, raised by the representatives of the Guayaquil and Quito Railway Company in this important matter, preventing the realization of the original plans, which were, to have the oath administered as a befitting courtesy by the President of the Supreme Court of Ecuador.

It cannot but remain a matter of keen regret that there should exist such an apparent variance of views regarding the character and dignity of a Tribunal upon which the President of the United States has, in accordance with a request from the Government of Ecuador transmitted through official diplomatic channels, named his representative. The steps which the State's Attorney of Ecuador has now inaugurated before the local courts of justice appear strange in the light of the knowledge of the simple and direct methods which led to the organization of the previous arbitration in the month of October, 1907.

In view of the above, and with a desire to clarify the present situation, I hasten to inform your excellency that the disinclination of the American Arbitrator to take an eath of office as arbitrator in the present case before the Judge of Letters, was due to the natural fear that an erroneous significance might be attached to such act on his part, particularly by encouraging a possible misconception as to the generally accepted character of the arbitration expressly provided for under the contract for the final settlement of all differences and disputes arising between the Government of Ecuador and the Guayaquil and Quito Railway.

The American Arbitrator states to me that he has from personal conversation with his excellency the Minister for Public Works been greatly gratified to learn that the present action of the State's Attorney in petitioning the Judge of Letters in the matter is not to be construed as implying a submission on the part of the arbitarators to the jurisdiction of the court by whom the oath is by courtesy administered, that it is not the understanding of the Government that the Arbitral Tribunal about to be constituted will be governed by local laws and procedure. and that the award contemplated by Clause 27 is de natura unquestionably final. From this, it would appear that no insuperable obstacles had in fact presented themselves to the immediate organization of the Arbitral Tribunal. It accordingly gives me pleasure to inform your excellency that if the Foreign Office will formally renew this statement to the Legation, Doctor Janes will be prepared at any time to take the oath of office, before any officer who is by law empowered to administer oaths, upon the bases which it is understood by Doctor Janes from Doctor Peñaherrera the parties have already tentatively adopted for the guidance and assistance of the arbitrators in the discharge of their high duties.

You add that the Attorney and the agent of the Company had placed obstacles in the way of having the eath referred to taken before the Supreme Court. Upon informing me that the Government had designated the Senate Chamber as the office of the Arbitral Tribunal in the beginning of its labors, you invite me to present myself at this hall for the installation of said Tribunal.

I believe I can say to you, Mr. Minister, frankly, that nothing would give me greater pleasure than to see the immediate beginning of the labors for which I came expressly from a long distance and underwent an arduous journey, believing that the Tribunal formed by the delegates of two Presidents would act without delay. Before arriving in Ecuador I could not imagine any difficulty or ambiguity in the clear interpretation of the clause by which the contracting parties agreed to resort to arbitration as the sole means for deciding all controversies which might arise between them.

The representatives of both parties now assure me that difficulties have arisen relating to the character of the Tribunal which the Governments of the United States and of Ecuador have endeavored to start aright.

The conversation which took place in the Ministry last Monday to which you refer in your kind communication, gave me the impression that no real divergence existed between the desires and intentions of the representatives of the parties; that, as I had the opportunity of stating to you at your home the evening of the same day, it was a question merely of words and of finding a satisfactory formula which might enclose the purposes of the parties which really are not antagonistic. I still hope that the bases for the submission of the controversies will be found before long in the good-will of the parties, so that in this manner the prompt solution may be arrived at of a problem which cannot but present in the future new and more serious difficulties to the Ecuadorean nation and to this public utility, which should measure up to the growing necessities of the country.

I have delayed in answering this note, in the belief and hope that during these days I would receive the pleasing announcement of an arrangement of the question pending in regard to said bases.

Night before last the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States informed me of the contents of the note of the Ministry of Foreign Relations of the 14th instant, which appears to indicate the same status which existed on Monday, the 10th instant. The reply which the Honorable Mr. Bingham made to that note of the Ministry has as an object the assisting of the parties in so far as possible to come to an understanding without further delay and set forth the points which, without apparent reason, have appeared, under certain aspects, as stumbling blocks, when in reality that nature should not be given to them.

As unfortunately, dear Mr. Minister, these doubts have arisen regarding the scope and nature of the arbitration, it appears to me that the interests of the parties would be better served and that future difficulties would be avoided by arriving at once at an agreement (which does not appear to be difficult) which may make clear the relations established by the contract in this regard and may provide a ground of mutual understanding. I hope that your clear mind may deign to work to the end that the Tribunal may begin its labors without delay, or that the parties may decide with equal promptness to appeal directly to another means for fixing and securing their respective rights.

I write you thus privately with the strong hope of being able to register very soon a definite decision in regard to the present situation, and in order to tell you that I must therefore write to the Second Judge of Letters, informing him that various questions with regard to the organization of the Arbitral Tribunal, the elucidation of which properly belongs to diplomacy, are now being discussed officially, and that for this reason it is not possible for me to recognize his jurisdiction in the matter.

I am [etc.]

The American Arbitrator to the Judge of Letters.

Office of the American Arbitrator, Quito, March 22, 1913.

Honorable Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of the note dated the fifteenth instant, addressed to me by the Court, in which it is said that I have been ordered to take possession of the office of Arbitrator; and in order that this proceeding may be put into effect, day and hour being fixed, it is added that I make it known whether I am ready to take the prescribed oath before you as the Ecuadorean authority designated by the law and procedure of Ecuador to intervene in giving arbitrators possession of their offices.

In view of the fact that the Charge d'Affaires of the United States of America has informed me that he is now in communication with the Minister of Foreign Relations of Ecuador in regard to matters concerning the immediate organization of the Arbitral Tribunal, with the view of cooperating in so far as possible and proper towards this much-desired end, you will perceive that the only correct course which I can now follow is to await the result of this diplomatic exchange of ideas.

Naturally, I can only send you the above in a very private manner for your information, without accepting nor entering into discussion regarding your jurisdiction in the matter, upon which, of course, it is not within my province to pass.

The Minister of the Interior to the American Arbitrator.

No. 179.]

Ministry of the Interior, Section of Public Works,
Quito, March 31, 1913.

Mr. Henry Janes: I received your private communication dated the 17th of the present month, which you were pleased to address to me in reply to my note No. 140 of the 13th instant; and I permit myself to state to you that, while I applaud the desire which you make known to me, to begin the labors for which you expressly came from a long distance and after a rather weary journey, I regret, at the same time, that the objection of the Guayaquil and Quito Railway Company to proceed in accordance with that which we had agreed upon, and your fear, made known to the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, that there might be error in procedure, should be the cause of the delay in beginning the labors of the Arbitrators, a delay which is contrary to the earnest desires of the Government of Ecuador and causes the latter great injuries.

Clause 27 of the Contract of June 14, 1897 is the authority by virtue of which the President of Ecuador and that of the United States have proceeded to name respective Arbitrators to pass upon the controversies or disagreements which might arise between the two contracting parties; and the tenor of this clause is so clear that, in truth, there is nothing which forbids interpreting it in accordance with its literal tenor, which explains, at the same time, the manifest intention of the contracting parties. The railroad company finds no obscurity whatever in the meaning of said clause, but desires, as I made known to you, that it be amplified by introducing a declaration relating to the finality of the arbitral award, a declaration which it is impossible for me to make, for the incontrovertible reason, which also I made known to you, that it is not within my province to add to nor to modify the contract under pretext of interpreting it. If, having in mind the nature of the arbitration and its antecedents, the arbitral award is judged to be final, the parties do not have to so declare it; but if, by virtue of those same considerations, it is believed that it may be appealable, neither the representatives of the Company nor this Ministry would have the authority to declare the contrary. But this unfounded pretension of the Company is not, in my judgment, any reason why you should delay taking the oath, which you yourself consider indispensable in order that the Arbitrators may begin to discharge their functions.

I permit myself to call the attention of your enlightened and upright discernment to the fact that an error of judgment would be incurred by affirming that the Arbitral Tribunal is formed by the Delegates of two Presidents, that of Ecuador and that of the United States, if it should be desired to attribute to the delegation any characteristics of dependence upon those who are considered as delegators. Both you and Dr. Baquerizo have been named by the respective Presidents, by virtue of the powers which belong to them by Clause 27 of the Contract of June 14, 1897: the Presidents have not accepted the charge of Arbitrators, and for this reason each one of them has named the respective Arbitrator in order that the latter may pass upon all difficulties between the contracting parties; and by virtue of these antecedents your actuation as Arbitrator is not subject to the President of the United States nor to the hindrances placed by the railway company, as you intelligently explained to me in the agreeable conversation to which you refer in your esteemed note.

If you should discharge the duties of arbitro arbitrador or amiable compositeur, under shelter of that independence, seeking the truth and guided by the principles of justice and by good faith; and if, as you stated, diplomatic intervention had no reason for being invoked in this controversy, I find no satisfactory explanation why you should delay for a longer time in accepting the charge, influenced by the expectation of an arrangement between the Government and the Company, which has no reason for existence, since what was agreed upon in said Clause 27 is the legal and sufficient antecedent in order that the Arbitrators may accept the charge and begin their labor of justice.

In the last paragraph of your letter, you say to me: "I write to you thus privately with the strong hope of being able to register very soon a definite decision in regard to the present situation, and in order to tell you that I must therefore write to the Second Judge of Letters, informing him that various questions with regard to the organization of the Arbitral Tribunal, the elucidation of which properly belongs to diplomacy, are now being discussed officially and that for this reason it is not possible for me to recognize his jurisdiction in the matter." Permit me to state to you, that I consider lacking in foundation the statement that the organization of the Arbitral Tribunal should properly be elucidated by diplomacy and that said organization is being discussed officially. No, Mr. Janes, you know perfectly not only that the Government of Ecuador upon entering into the contract dated June 14, 1897, acted in its character as a legal person, leaving out absolutely the other characteristics belonging to the State, in regard to a contract for which any individual or legal entity has legal capacity, but also that the other contracting party is also a legal entity, which undertook the obligation of constructing a work in Ecuador. Contracts of this nature between two natural or legal persons which relate to acts which can be done by any natural person, are not subject to diplomatic intervention, except in the sole case of a denial of justice, as the foreign contracting party, Mr. Harman, recognized before the Contract of June 14, 1897, was reduced to public writing.

The contracting parties set forth the form of conduct by which they should be guided, and they can demand the fulfillment of the legal relations established by it under shelter of the principles which are implicitly contained in the contract by the act of its being entered into. In the present case, there is no question of conventions or treaties between nations, or that they owe their existence to diplomatic intervention; in the contract it is expressly agreed that the controversies or disagreements between the contracting parties should be decided by arbitrators; the provisions of the contract have been followed in your appointment and in that of Dr. Baquerizo as Arbitrators; there is no denial of justice; on the contrary, it is demanded by the Government of Ecuador that justice should be done by the persons who according to the contract are called upon to discharge that duty. What sound reason can induce you to await the diplomatic clucidation of a matter, which is in no sense submitted to it, before proceeding to discharge the function of arbitrator?

If there were any deficiency in the arbitral compromis, this should be supplied by the parties by virtue of their own will, and not by extraneous influences which might limit the free-will and independence of the contracting parties; but, in truth, there is no such deficiency, because, as I stated to you, the respective complaints of the parties and their means of defense will be presented before the Arbitral Judges and the Arbitral Judges are authorized to establish the procedure which may be the most convenient for the effective discharge of their duties.

You have recognized it more than once to be indispensable that the Arbitrators should take the oath before discharging their duties, and as the Judge who should receive the oath by virtue of the petition of the representatives of the Government of Ecuador is the Judge of Letters, you should take the oath before him, without this implying that the Arbitrators are subjected to the jurisdiction of the Judge of Letters, as they would not be either to the Supreme Court, if, according to what was suggested by the Bailway Company, the latter had presented its petition before the President of said Court.

I hope, therefore, that you, Mr. Janes, in whom I recognize merits of the highest value, will be pleased to cast aside difficulties which have no reason for existence, having in mind that the best method of properly looking after the just interests of the parties, is that the Arbitrators should begin their functions.

God and Liberty,

[inclosure-Translation.]

The American Arbitrator to the Minister of the Interior.

Office of the American Arbitrator, Quito, April 2, 1913.

My Dear Mr. Minister: I take pleasure in acknowledging receipt of your communication, dated the 31st ultime, which reached my hands yesterday morning, and to hasten to reply in order that any doubts that may have prevailed in your superior intelligence as to the conception I have of the nature of the high duties with which I have been charged by the President of the United States of America may at once be banished.

It is a matter of the deepest regret to me that I must beg to differ from you as to the chief points you urge regarding the character of the tribunal provided for the settlement of the disputes arising between the Government of Ecuador and the Guayaquil and Quito Railway Company. However, these are points which, both because of the importance as well as the intrinsic nature thereof, should be properly left for friendly diplomatic consideration and adjustment. I desire to make it quite clear that I do not regard it either as expedient or within my province to enter now upon a discussion with you of these matters, and of others which were mentioned in your greatly esteemed letter. I am convinced that this should be taken up through the diplomatic channels by way of which the present Arbitral Tribunal as well as that of 1907 came to be formed.

Nevertheless, before closing, I deem it my duty to correct an erroneous impression which seems to have been received by you and to be reflected in your counteous communication under acknowledgment, as to the nature and effect I ascribe to the oath which arbitrators before beginning their labor are, in accordance with the most common practice, wont to take. I have never at any time been of the opinion that such oath should be instrumental in placing me in possession of the charge of arbitrator; which, on the contrary, I have already received from the hands of the President of the United States of America, without the intervention of any judge nor through the act of contending parties. I do not consider that such oath can furnish more than a protocolar guaranty in controlling the conclusions of the Arbitrators or Umpire taking it.

In this connection it has given me pleasure, however, to note your personal assurance that the administering of the oath by a judicial magistrate of Ecuador can not be taken to imply "that the Arbitrators would be subject to the jurisdiction of the Judge of Letters, as they would not be either to the Supreme Court, if, according to what was suggested to the Railway Company, the latter had presented its petition before the President of said Court." So far as the constitution of the present Arbitral Tribunal is concerned, it is then a subject of entire indifference, in fact, whether the oath be taken before the Juez de be subscribed by the Arbitrators.

I therefore must beg leave to terminate this correspondence in order to await the result of the friendly diplomatic exchange of views already initiated, and to subscribe myself again,

Sincerely your friend,

HENRY L. JANES.

[Telegram—Paraphrase.]

American Legation, Quito, April 9, 1913.

Referring to my telegram of March 8, the Railway Company and the Government have reached an impasse in the organization of the arbitral tribunal. It appears that the Government holds the arbitration to be of a quasi-international character and the eventual decision to be final. On March 17 I inquired whether formal confirmation of the organization could be made by the Minister for Foreign Affairs. On April 1 the Foreign Office replied as summarized in the following:

As the original contract between the Government and the Company was a private agreement, the laws of Ecuador were by implication incorporated in it. Therefore any arbitration stipulated therein for settlement of differences arising thereunder must be such arbitration as the local code provides for, even if the persons specified as arbitrators should be Heads of States. Consequently the laws and procedure of Ecuador apply to the constitution of the tribunal as well as to the finality and enforcement of the award. In the preceding arbitration the American Arbitrator, on June 17, 1908, took oath before a local judge. Hence the present Arbitrators should also take possession of office before a local judge, who is later to execute the judgment and who is authorized to review their decision; hence, furthermore, diplomatic cooperation in the formation of the tribunal is unacceptable.

The Foreign Office submitted this statement to the representatives of the Railway Company in order that their views might be considered by the Department in connection with it. The Railway Company's brief—after considering the steps leading to the formal request of Ecuador for the appointment of an arbitrator by the President of the United States, when the usual local procedure had failed both in this case and in 1907—points out that the Government of Ecuador overlooks the very purpose of article 27, namely to remove disputes from the local jurisdiction and raise them above the recognized influence of the local environment.

Article 27 makes settlement by arbitration exclusive. The President is now acting through his appointee, who is entitled to the same consideration as the President. If local laws and procedure apply, the absurd result would be that the President of the United States and the President of Ecuador have been invited to act as referees whose decisions will be reviewed by a local court of inferior jurisdiction, because under the laws of Ecuador an appeal lies unless a provision against an appeal is stipulated in the protocol.

The organization of the tribunal in October, 1907, before the Minister for Foreign Affairs was eminently proper, as the arbitrators derived their faculties from the appointing power and needed no authorization from a local judge. The action of the American Arbitrator, in deferring to the wishes of the Government of Ecuador by taking an oath before the local judge eight months after the installation of the Tribunal, was doubtless upon the understanding that this could have no further legal effect than that derived from taking an oath before a judicial officer in the United States. In subsequent proceedings the local judge was ignored and the award was notified to the respective Presidents by each Arbitrator and was not submitted to any local court, as required by the code in local arbitrations. If the position of the Government were tenable, the Company would be stripped of every protection and of every hope of redress.

The American Arbitrator has held severely aloof from the preliminary negotiations relating to the constitution of the Tribunal. Since my telegram of March 8, he has made a careful study of the situation and has concluded from a conversation with the Minister of Public Works, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and the President, and an examination of the Legation's archives, that the Tribunal was intended by the parties to make a final award in settlement of the existing controversies.

By ratifying the provisions of the original contract, it appears that the Congress of Ecuador recognized the quasi-international character of the Tribunal by ignoring the express provisions of the code relating to local arbitrations, which prohibit the Executive from acting as arbitrator, forbid local arbitrations in which interests of the State are involved, and require that in the submission the parties expressly stipulate as to the powers of the arbitrators, the binding force of the decision and the finality of the award.

The American Arbitrator is of the opinion, shared by the Legation, that the parties are unwilling to proceed without some intimation from the Department of State as to the measure of protection that the Government of the United States is ready to afford. He requests that he be immediately instructed.

My 195 of March 6. The Legation is informed that Sr. Córdova, the Minister of Ecuador, has requested the recall of Doctor Janes, alleging partiality to the railroad, and has also requested appointment of another arbitrator. Doctor Janes' attitude toward the railroad has been strictly correct and formal and most patient and judicial. I am convinced that the request for his recall is prompted only by the desire of President Plaza to gain time. His recall would be serious to American prestige.

LEGATION OF ECUADOR, Washington, August 8, 1913.

Sir: It is highly satisfactory to me to confirm all that I had the honor to state to you verbally this morning at the conference in presence of Mr. Moore about the causes on account of which the Tribunal Arbitral, which must investigate and settle every controversy between the Government of Ecuador and the Guayaquil and Quito Railway Company, has not yet been organized. Omitting here the reasons on which I based my remarks, I stated to you:

That my Government had never believed any protocol or arrangement to be necessary previous to the organization and exercise of its functions by the Tribunal Arbitral;

That according to the constitution and laws of Ecuador, all conventions with another Government, no matter by what name they may be designated, are subject to the approval of Congress and to a long proceeding;

That my Government is very solicitous that the Tribunal Arbitral be organized as soon as possible, because every delay redounds to the prejudice of its interests and to the benefit of the Railway Company which administers and exploits the railroad from Guayaquil to Quito and uses its revenues arbitrarily as if it were the owner, sole and absolute;

That it desires, consequently, that the Honorable Judge A. L. Miller, the Arbiter named by President Wilson in conformity to the contract of June 14, 1897, may go as soon as possible to exercise his office in Ecuador;

That it is completely certain that the Arbiters will not have the least inconvienience on the part of the Government of Ecuador in the performance of their work, but on the contrary, every support and facility which are in its hands to give to them;

That now that the Arbiters are already named, they need do nothing except to present themselves at Quito and take possession of their office before the proper Ecuadorean judge;

That by virtue of this act they will become a Tribunal Arbitral independent of every authority or court of Ecuador or the United States;

That the Arbiters are Amigables Componedores and are not obligated to apply the laws of any nation to reach a decision, and must be inspired only by the dictates of justice and equity according to their conscience and best knowledge and judgment, taking as their basis the antecedents of the case;

That they are likewise competent to determine the form of the judgment, which will have to be final, according to what they shall deem convenient to know the controversies and the establishment of the truth. [Sic.]

That, in a word, they are invested with the most ample powers to settle whatever questions the contending parties may submit to them in accordance with the stipulation the contract [sic] of June 14, 1897.

That in the case of judges of the antecedents and character of Messrs. Miller and Baquerizo Moreno it is to be expected that, as soon as they meet and take possession of their office, they will commence to fulfill their mission, themselves removing and settling every doubt, difficulty or disagreement which may be presented to them, upon every point concerning the judgment, for which purpose they have sufficient power and authority.

And as consequence of what I have said, I conclude by expressing the security which my Government feels, that Judge Miller will not have any reason to postpone longer his trip to Quito. And the same security I again express in this note of confirmation which I finish by reaffirming to you the sentiments of my most distinguishing consideration.

The Secretary of State to the American Minister.

[Telegram—Paraphrase.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 13, 1913.

On July 1 the Chargé d'Affaires of Ecuador and officials of the Department, in the presence of attorneys of Ecuador and of the Railway Company, agreed upon a draft of a protocol for arbitration of the case of the Railway Company. The Department understood that the substance of this draft would be cabled to Quito and that the Chargé would be promptly authorized to sign. After more than a month had elapsed, desirous of learning the cause of this delay, the Department requested the Minister of Ecuador to call. Doctor Córdova came on August 8 and made a statement which on the same day he embodied in a formal note, which states that his Government believes a protocol to be unnecessary and if made would have to be submitted to the Congress of Ecuador, which would cause great delay; and that if the Arbitrators should enter upon their duties immediately, they would be given every support and facility. The note accepts the following positions: (1) After entering upon their duties before the proper Ecuadorean judge, the Arbitrators would, by virtue of that act, "become a Tribunal Arbitral independent of every authority or court of Ecuador or the United States." (2) They would act as amiables compositeurs, "not obligated to apply the laws of any nation in order to reach a decision" but "must be inspired only by the dictates of justice and equity according to their conscience and best knowledge and judgment, taking as their basis the antecedents of the case." (3) Their judgment should be "final."

These conditions embrace the essential points which the protocol was intended to cover, namely: (1) The Arbitrators' independence of local law and procedure. (2) Their power to determine the principles applicable to the decision of the various questions involved. (3) The finality of their award, which necessarily means that it is not subject to review by the Ecuadorean courts.

You will communicate the entire substance of this telegram to the Government of Ecuador and request its immediate confirmation of the understanding set forth.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 27, 1913.

Sir: Referring to your note of the 8th instant in relation to the arbitration of the case of the Guayaquil and Quito Railway Company, I have the honor to state that, in order to avoid delay, the Department cabled the substance of your note to the Minister of the United States at Quito with instructions to communicate the substance of our understanding to the Ecuadorean Government and request its immediate confirmation of our concurring views on the points set forth.

The Department has received in reply a telegram ¹ from the Minister of the United States at Quito in which it is stated that the President of Ecuador declines to make any response until he shall have received from you a report which your Government has instructed you to transmit.

As the delays that have taken place are very considerable and as you pointed out that your Government was very desirous to avoid further delay, I have the honor to suggest that the interest of the parties concerned might be promoted if you would be so good as to telegraph to your Government, confirming the statement made through our Minister at Quito of the points on which we reached an understanding. These points being as follows:

First, that the Arbitrators, after entering upon their duties before the proper Ecuadorean judge, would, by virtue of this act, become a tribunal arbitral independent of every authority or court of Ecuador or the United States;

Secondly, that the Arbitrators would act as amiables compositeurs, that they would not be obligated to apply the laws of any nation to reach a decision but must be inspired only by the dictates of justice and equity according to their conscience and best knowledge and judgment, taking as their bases the antecedents of the case; and Thirdly, that their judgments should be final.

In communicating these points of agreement to your Government, our Minister, under instructions of the Department, stated that the conditions set forth embraced the essential points which the protocol was intended to cover, namely:

First, the Arbitrators' independence of local law and procedure in the conduct of the arbitration;

Secondly, their power to determine the principles applicable to the decision of the various questions involved in the case; and

Thirdly, the finality of their work, which necessarily means that it is not subject to review by the Ecuadorean courts.

In view of what you stated in your interview at the Department on the 8th instant, as to the deep and substantial interest which your Government felt in the prompt resumption and speedy completion of the arbitration, the Department does not doubt that you will cooperate with it in everything that may tend to enable your Government promptly to proceed with the arbitration.

American Legation, Quito, October 28, 1913.

Congress has authorized the President to enter upon an agreement with the Railway Company specifying the questions to be considered and determined by the Arbitral Tribunal. This agreement will stipulate that the arbitral decision shall be final. Because of the expected early arrival of the American Arbitrator, I have called the attention of the Minister for Foreign Affairs and the Railway Company to the importance of completing the authorized agreement as soon as possible.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 30, 1913.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of the 28th instant in which, referring to the assurance which you had previously given that the phrase "juicio final" meant an unappealable judgment, you state that you have received from your Government a cablegram reading as follows: "Congress empowers Executive to accept unappealable award."

You are so good as to suggest that in view of the assurances which have been given, Judge Miller may be requested to proceed with the performance of his duties as arbitrator.

It gives me pleasure to advise you that the Department is writing to Judge Miller and requesting him to proceed to Ecuador at his earliest convenience.

> DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 30, 1913.

Sir: I beg leave to enclose herewith a copy of a note of the 12th ultimo from the Minister of Foreign Relations of Ecuador to the American Minister at Quito in relation to the Arbitration of the case of the Guayaquil & Quito Railway Company.

This note, as you will observe, incorporates textually the note previously addressed to this Department by Dr. Córdova, the Ecuadorean Minister at this capital, in which he confirmed certain assurances which he had on the same day given to the Department orally as to the powers of the arbitrators, their independence of Ecuadorean law, and the finality of their award.

On the 14th of the present month Dr. Córdova called at the Department and discussed with the Counselor the import of certain assurances given that the award was to be "final." The Department is now in receipt of a telegram from Dr. Córdova reading as follows: [the text of the Minister's telegram of October 28.]

In view of the assurance given in the note of the Ecuadorean Government and of the explanation made in the telegram of its Minister quoted above, I beg leave to advise you that the Department desires that the arbitration may be begun at the earliest practicable day. The Department will be glad to be advised, preferably by telegraph, of the date at which you may find it practicable to sail for Ecuador.

It is proper to add that the officials of the Railway Company have been advised of the situation and are desirous that the arbitration shall proceed.

AMERICAN LEGATION, Quito, November 7, 1913.

I informed the President of Ecuador to-day of the probable early departure of Judge Miller for Ecuador, and suggested to him the advisability executing a preliminary agreement between the Ecuadorean Government and the Railway Company, specifically stating the points of disagreement to be submitted to the Board of Arbitration, so that its labors would be greatly expedited. He said that such an agreement would not be necessary, as a memorandum agreement to the same effect had been signed by the Secretary of State at Washington and the Ecuadorean Minister during the past summer. No such paper is in the files of this Legation.2

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 11, 1913.

The President of Ecuador is correct in his statement that a memorandum was agreed upon in Washington last summer. This was done at a conference on July 1 at which the Department, the Government of Ecuador, and the Railway Company were all represented, Ecuador by her Chargé d'Affaires, Dr. Wither, and by her counsel. The memorandum, although it was not formally signed, embodied the views of and was concurred in by all the interested parties, and the Department is pleased to learn that his Excellency the President of Ecuador has confirmed this fact. A copy of the memorandum will be sent to you by the next mail.

[Inclosure.]

WHEREAS by a contract between the Government of Ecuador and the Guayaquil and Quito Railway Company, signed on June 14, 1897, and duly approved by the National Assembly of Ecuador, it was provided as follows:

Article 27. All controversies or disagreements that may arise between the contracting parties, shall be settled by arbitration, one arbiter shall be the President of the United States of America, and the other shall be the President of Ecuador; should they not wish to act, they will each name an arbiter, and should these not agree, then the said President of the United States of America, and the President of Egyador will name wish to act, they will each name an arbiter, and should these not agree, then the said President of the United States of America and the President of Ecuador will name a third arbiter to decide the question.

And, Whereas, by an award rendered under said article on November 24, 1908, by arbitrators duly appointed by the President of the United States of America and the President of Ecuador, all controversies and disagreements that had arisen between the contracting parties up to the date of said award were definitely settled:

The Government of the United States and the Government of Ecuador agree that all controversies and disagreements that have arisen since the date of the award, and particularly all controversies and disagreements as to the performance or fulfillment of the terms of said award, are referred to arbitration under Article 27 above mentioned and shall be definitely settled in conformity with said Article.

The Government of the United States and the Government of Ecuador further agree as follows:

1. The Tribunal shall be organized by the filing in its office, at Quito, on August 1, 1913, of a solemn declaration, in triplicate, by the Arbitrators, that they will impartially and carefully examine and decide, to the best of their judgment and according to public law, justice and equity, without fear, favor or affection to either party, upon all claims that shall be laid before them for their decision on the part of the parties to the arbitration and such declaration shall be entered on the record of their proceedings.

The Arbitrators shall meet in Quito on September 15, 1913, and shall proceed to the disposition of the business before the Tribunal.

The provisions of this section, except as to dates and place of meeting, shall apply to the third arbitrator, should one be named.

2. The proceedings of the Tribunal shall be conducted both in English and in Spanish.

3. Each party may name in writing an agent and not more than two counsel to present and support its claims before the Tribunal, to answer claims made upon it and in general to represent it in all matters connected with the investigation and decision of the said claims.

4. Each arbitrator shall appoint a secretary versed both in English and in Spanish to assist him in the transaction of the business of the Tribunal. The secretaries shall make and subscribe a solemn declaration that they will faithfully and carefully discharge their duties.

5. The secretaries shall each keep duplicate records of the proceedings of each session of the Tribunal, in English and in Spanish, so that one copy in each language may be supplied to each party. Said records shall be read at the next meeting of the Tribunal, and, if no objection be made, or when corrected, if correction be needed, shall be approved and subscribed by the Arbitrators and countersubscribed by the secretaries.

6. The secretaries shall each keep a docket, entering therein, by date, all documents filed by either party, giving each a number, and shall endorse on each document the date of filing and the respective number.

7. The secretaries shall be the custodians of the documents and books of the Tribunal and shall keep the same safely and in methodical order. They shall afford every reasonable opportunity and facility to the Agents and Counsel of the respective parties to inspect and make extracts from documents and records, but shall permit none to be withdrawn from the files of the Tribunal, except by the written direction of the Arbitrators duly entered of record.

8. The secretaries shall keep a notice-book in which entries may be made by the Agent of either party and the entries when so made shall be notice to the opposing Agent and to all concerned.

9. All documents and records shall be considered confidential, and no one but the Agents and Counsel of the parties shall be permitted to inspect them, except by the written direction of the Arbitrators duly entered of record.

10. Within fifteen days from the organization of the Tribunal the parties shall serve upon each other a detailed statement in writing of their respective claims, and shall file with the Tribunal four copies thereof, two in English and two in Spanish. Claims not presented in this manner shall not be considered by the Arbitrators, but shall be deemed to be forever waived and barred.

11. Within fifteen days from the filing of the said claims the parties shall serve upon each other their answers thereto, and shall file with the Tribunal four copies thereof, two in English and two in Spanish.

12. Within ten days from the filing of the said answers the parties shall serve upon each other their replications thereto and shall file with the Tribunal four copies thereof, two in English and two in Spanish.

Any claims and allegations of either party not controverted by the other shall be deemed to have been admitted.

The claims and pleadings may be amended [so] as to form at any time before final submission to the Tribunal of all matters in dispute, upon written leave of the arbitrators duly entered of record. [Omission?]

13. Within ten days from the filing af the replications as provided in paragraph 12, each party shall present in writing to the Tribunal the evidence on which it intends to rely. When an original paper can not be produced, a certified copy thereof or a copy stipulated to be correct may be received in evidence in Either party may call upon the other for the production of lieu of the original. papers and documents.

14. Within ten days thereafter, each party shall have the right to present in writing evidence in rebuttal. The reception of evidence shall then be deemed to have been closed, unless the Tribunal shall request further proofs, in which case either party may be directed to produce documents or information in its possession, or the arbitrators may interrogate witnesses orally. The testimony of such witnesses shall, however, be taken down in writing, and either party shall be entitled to cross-examine any such witnesses.

15. The arbitrators shall investigate the claims before them upon the evidence furnished by the Agents of the respective parties and shall hear, if requested so to do, the Agent and one of Counsel on each side on each claim.

16. The award or awards of the arbitrators, and in the event of their disagreement the award or awards of the third arbitrator, shall be in writing and shall be final and conclusive, and of immediate obligation, and shall be payable at Quito in American gold with interest at the rate current in Ecuador from the date of maturity until payment.

17. The arbitrators shall render their award or awards within six months from the day on which their first meeting took place; but should they find themselves unable to conclude their labors within that time, they may take three months longer, notifying the parties of the fact.

18. Should a third arbitrator be named, the Arbitrators shall deliver to him, within twenty days after he has made and subscribed the solemn declaration required by section 1, all papers, documents and evidence relating to the claim or claims on which they were unable to agree. Within thirty days after his receipt of such papers, documents and evidence, he shall hear argument as prescribed in section 15, and within thirty days after the conclusion of the argument, he shall render his decision.

19. The Government of the United States shall pay the compensation of the Arbitrator named by the President of the United States, and the Government of Ecuador shall pay the compensation of the Arbitrator named by the President In case it is necessary to name the third arbitrator, his compenof Ecuador. sation shall be paid jointly by the two Governments in equal proportions. All other expenses, including costs and fees, shall be paid as directed by the Arbi-

20. All matters relating to the proceedings of the arbitration not herein provided for shall be determined by the Arbitrators, to whom is reserved the right to make further rules as occasion may demand.

21. The proceedings of the Tribunal shall not be subject to the intervention of the courts of either country.

Note: It should be stipulated that Mr. A. Romo Leroux, who has been the local attorney for the Railway Company for a number of years and is familiar with its records and also with the laws of Ecuador, shall be allowed to return and act as one of the attorneys of the Railway Company in the arbitration, if the Railway Company shall so desire. desire.

Form of Declaration by the Arbitrators.

The undersigned, Arbitrators respectively appointed by the President of the United States of America and the President of the Republic of Ecuador to decide the questions between the Government of Ecuador and the Guayaquil and Quito Railway Company under the protocol concluded on the day of do solemnly declare that they will impartially and carefully examine and decide, to the best of their judgment and according to public law, justice and equity, without fear, favor or affection to either party, upon all claims that shall be laid before them for their decision on the part of the parties to the arbitration.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 1, 1913.

My Dear Mr. Secretary: I have the honor to transmit to you herewith the report of Colonel W. C. Gorgas in regard to sanitary conditions at Guayaquil, Ecuador.

Very sincerely yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON.

[Inclosure—Summary.3]

SUMMARY OF COLONEL GORGAS' REPORT REGARDING THE SANITATION OF GUAYAQUIL.

Colonel William C. Gorgas, accompanied by a sanitary commission of three other members consisting of Major Noble, and Messrs. Prince and McGuigan, was in Ecuador from December 8th to 24th, 1912, for the purpose of studying the sanitary conditions in that city and reporting what measures would be necessary to eliminate yellow fever and bubonic plague from that port, together with an estimate of the cost. Colonel Gorgas stated in his report that it was the opinion of the commission that Guayaquil could be freed from these two diseases and also from a great deal of the typhoid and intestinal diseases there prevalent at a cost of about $9,200,000, gold. The measures necessary to attain this end are as follows:
