[Washington,] September 26, 1950.

SUGGESTED POLITICAL ACTIONS TO BE TAKEN IN THE EVENT U.N. TROOPS MOVE NORTH OF THE 38TH PARALLEL

The necessity for offering terms for the restoration of peace and security in Korea in the near future, and for making an early decision on whether to move ground troops north of the 38th parallel, together with Malik's statement to the Baltimore group noted in this morning's papers,² all create a situation in which we must move not only firmly and decisively, but in a manner calculated to convey all possible reassurance to the U.S.S.R. and Communist China as to our real intentions.

It is therefore suggested that, if the decision is made to send ground troops north of the 38th parallel, we should take the following steps concurrently or slightly in advance:

(1) Propose formally before the General Assembly that (a) Korea should be neutralized, but not be demilitarized, either permanently or for a period of several years, such neutralization to be embodied in a consortium to which the U.N. powers and Communist China should be parties; (b) propose formally before the General Assembly that pending the execution of such a consortium or the holding of elections in Korea, whichever shall occur later, U.N. forces, in which U.S. forces shall not be included, shall remain in Korea for the purpose of assuring the implementation of the U.N. resolutions.

(2) Make known in some appropriate manner that the U.S. will insist upon provisions in the Japanese peace treaty guaranteeing the participants in the war against Japan against any future aggression by Japan.

The above suggestions are based upon the conviction that it would be imprudent if not genuinely provocative, if U.N. ground forces go north of the 38th parallel, unless at the same time we go as far as we can to convey to the U.S.S.R. and Communist China, in as substantive a manner as possible, assurance that the U.S. does not intend to use the Korean episode for purposes of aggression or to use Korea as a base to prepare later aggression.

change of views on the situation now existing in Korea, I am pleased to set forth briefly the views of my government which were then expressed to you. I trust that this expression may serve in some degree to assist in the attainment of the fullest of mutual agreement between the Governments of the US and the ROK on the issues involved in the present situation.

The views of my government on certain basic issues involved in the present situation in Korea may be briefly summarized as follows:

1. My government believes that the UN forces now fighting in Korea should proceed beyond the 38th parallel and continue their police action against the Communist enemy until the entire Korean nation has been liberated and reunited;

2. My government would oppose any proposal to settle the present fighting in Korea by negotiation or compromise with the aggressors, but believes on the contrary that unconditional surrender of the Communist forces and leadership comprises the only proper and effective basis for a just and workable settlement;

3. My government has always considered and now considers itself to be the only legitimate government of all Korea. Only force majeure has kept this government from exercising its authority north of the 38th parallel in the past, just as currently force majeure prevents it from exercising its authority in large areas south of the 38th parallel. Any ambiguity which may have existed in the views of the GA concerning the jurisdiction of the ROK over the total area of Korea should be resolved in favor of recognizing the sole jurisdiction of the Republic in all parts of the reunited Korean nation;

4. My government believes that there will be no difficulty in deciding, with mutual agreement, on the terms concerning the time and the methods for holding a general election in Northern Korea, after a free atmosphere has been established, under the observation of the UN Commission, in order to complete the membership of the National

Assembly of the ROK;

5. My government assumes that the principle and practice are already fully established that under no circumstances will individuals or groups of individuals purporting to represent Northern Korea be permitted to participate in any UN consideration of the Korean question, since no legal government exists or ever has existed independently in northern Korea;

6. It is the expectation of my government that no form of trusteeship or other limitations of Korean sovereignty will be accepted by the UN or by any nation or group of nations over any portion of

Korean territory;

7. It is the hope and expectation of my government that UN forces, perhaps comprising a portion of the permanent UN police force which has been envisaged by Secretary Acheson in his address to the GA, shall remain in Korea by agreement with the ROK until such time as the security of the nation may reasonably be assured by its own armed forces;

8. My government welcomes and desires the continuance of the UN Commission in Korea for the observation of elections at a proper time and under suitable circumstances in Northern Korea and for the observation and report of any threat to the peace in Korea;

9. My government urges prompt consideration and enactment of adequate relief measures to care for the millions of people who have been driven from their homes without adequate food, shelter, or medical facilities, whose homes have been destroyed in the fighting, and who face terrible deprivations and suffering in the winter weather which is already commencing;

10. My government is hopeful that adequate measures will be adopted by the UN providing for the reconstruction of devastated areas of the nation and for the rehabilitation of economic processes sufficient to provide a reasonable basis of continued stability and well-being;

11. Finally, it is the ardent hope and expectation of my government that a method will be found by which the ROK may take its proper and rightful place as a full and equal member of the UN.

Although our conference did not extend to further considerations than those which I have listed, it seems appropriate also to call attention to the fact that my government would be utterly unwilling to accept any settlement which necessarily involved the establishment of a coalition with Communists or which interferes with the free operation of the constitution.

With fullest appreciation for the noble role which the government of the US has played and is playing in the liberation and rehabilitation of the Korean nation, and with particular appreciation for the spendid efforts which you made as chief of the Delegation of the US in the UN to insure justice and helpful measures for the reconstruction of Korea, I am, (signed) Ben C. Limb,"

Second letter:

"In elaboration of certain views which I had the honor to express to you in our conference on the morning of September 25, I should like to present certain reasons why the ROK Government considers it essential that the jurisdiction of the Republic should be extended fully and immediately over the entire area of the nation, both north and south of the 38th parallel.

1. The Korean nation is an entity, as it has been for over 4,000 years, and this entity has never been divided by any international agreements or by any consent of the Korean nation or people:

2. The 38th parallel division has never been declared by either of the parties originally agreeing to it, the United States and the Soviet Union, as constituting any permanent political division of the nation;

3. The UN explicitly proposed re-unification of Korea in its resolution of 14 November 1947. The resolution of 26 February 1948 of the IC explicitly called upon the temporary commission of the UN to observe elections 'in all parts of Korea accessible to it', thus carefully avoiding any implication of recognition of a permanent or even temporary political division of the nation. In the resolution of 12 December 1948, the GA explicitly recognized the ROK as 'the only lawful government' in Korea. In the resolution of 21 October 1949 the GA once again reconstituted the Korea Commission with the function of seeking to extend free and fair elections throughout Korea;

4. Jurisdiction of the ROK over all Korea has been solemnly affirmed in the constitution of the ROK and has repeatedly been assumed in several actions of the ROK in reserving 100 seats in the National Assembly to be filled by elections in the north, and by the continuous efforts of the UN Commission to secure such elections.

Such considerations as are here set forth, Mr. Ambassador, are but a pale reflection of the indomitable Korean will to complete unity and independence, a will which has been staunchly and determinedly manifest during all the period during which Korean independence has been wholly or partly suspended. It would be tragically unfortunate if the noble efforts jointly and generously made to restore the unity of the Korean nation should end in conflict over the basic principle of whether the Korean people were, in fact, to exercise jurisdiction over their northern provinces under their own lawfully constituted government."

Subject: Korea

Korean Foreign Minister Limb's letter to you of September 26 ¹ raises in specific form certain questions which I believe should be resolved as soon as possible.

In paragraph 3 of Mr. Limb's letter he states "My Government has always considered and now considers itself to be the only legitimate government of all Korea." This position is in direct conflict with the position taken by the United States Government and by the other Members of the United Nations in the previous Resolutions and particularly in the Resolution of December 12, 1948 which says specifically that the Government of the Republic of Korea has "effective control and jurisdiction over that part of Korea where the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea was able to observe and consult . . .". Members of various delegations at the General Assembly have approached me within the last two days to make clear that they did not recognize the right of the Republic of Korea automatically to assume any jurisdiction in North Korea. Mr. Dening of the United Kingdom Delegation told me this morning that in discussing the draft United Kingdom Resolution with possible sponsors the chief difficulty was in connection with the desire of these possible sponsors to make clear that the Republic of Korea would not have jurisdiction in North Korea and that the Resolution should specifically provide for the holding of elections in South as well as in North Korea after the termination of hostilities.

Reference is to the first letter quoted in telegram 617 from New York, supra.

This latter point (the holding of elections) is dealt with in paragraph 4 of Mr. Limb's letter where it is made clear that the Government of the Republic of Korea will only consent to elections in North Korea. In his discussion with me this morning Mr. Dening went so far as to say that in his opinion it was probable that if it were insisted that no mention be made of elections in South Korea and if there were insistence upon the right of the Government of the Republic of Korea to function in North Korea, there would be no sponsors and no Resolution. I explained to Mr. Dening the reasons which led me to believe that it was important to leave the question of the extent of any elections to be decided by the United Nations Commission on the spot but he maintained that India, Norway and Australia were all insisting on making the matter clear in the Resolution.

I believe that an early opportunity should be found to make clear without any question to the representatives at the United Nations of the Republic of Korea that the fact of the matter is that their Government is not at present recognized as having jurisdiction throughout Korea and that whether or not it eventually receives such recognition will depend in large part upon how it conducts itself during the coming days and upon its cooperating wholeheartedly with the United Nations in achieving a solution of the Korean problem. We should continue to maintain that the Republic of Korea is a legitimate government properly elected and that in all efforts to reach a solution it should be consulted but we should leave no doubt in its mind that it cannot expect to take over North Korea automatically and that whether it does so rests upon the impression it makes upon the rest of the United Nations. If we do not have such a clear understanding at the outset I am afraid that there will be recriminations and charges of bad faith which will make our position difficult not only with the Koreans but with all of our friends in the United Nations.

Most of the other matters treated in Mr. Limb's letter of September 26 deal with points on which there is no disagreement and we can reassure him on those points.

The Ambassador in India (Henderson) to the Secretary of State

SECRET

New Delhi, September 27, 1950—5 p. m. [Received September 27—1:40 p. m.]

788. 1. During course conversation with Bajpai, Secretary General MEA, today I asked him if GOI had given any more thought to problem of advance of UN Forces North of 38th Parallel (see Embtel 755, September 23).

2. Bajpai said GOI considered question most difficult. It had reason believe there was real danger Peking might intervene if UN Forces should cross Parallel and that world war might result. UK had informed India in confidence that it was agreed among three Foreign Ministers there would be no advance beyond 38th Parallel until matter had been taken up again in UN.¹ Original resolution of course related only to return to 38th Parallel. In his opinion when North Koreans were driven out of South Korea military phase might be considered exterminate and phase of negotiations and discussions to begin.

3. I told Bajpai I was under no instructions to discuss matter and had no idea what my government's attitude might be. Nevertheless it seemed to me it might be necessary for decision to be made in near future and quickly. It was I thought general opinion of free countries that artificial division of Korea should no longer be tolerated and that under UN supervision plebiscite should be held for all Korea to decide its future. North Koreans thus far under influence Soviet Union had steadfastly refused permit UN plebiscite in their territory or even allow UN officials to cross 38th Parallel. I was wondering if Bajpai or GOI had any ideas as to how other than by use of force North Koreans could be prevailed upon to permit UN representatives to enter North Korea for purposes conducting plebiscite. I had some doubt that mere requests would have any more effect on North Koreans in future than they had in past.

I added there seemed to me no number of courses which might be pursued. One course would be for UN Forces to push into North Korea, before North Korea Forces had time to reform, and to place that territory under temporary UN control pending plebiscite.

Another course would be for UN Forces stop at 38th Parallel while efforts were being made to prevail upon North Korean regime agree to plebiscite under UN auspices. If such efforts should fail UN Forces would then move into North Korea. This course would naturally result in greater loss of life, particularly American, than course first mentioned, since North Koreans would have time prepare themselves against invasion. Another course would be for UN Forces remain along 38th Parallel until such time as through some means or other North Koreans could be prevailed upon permit UN plebiscite. This might well mean that UN Forces composed mostly of Americans would remain for indefinite period in South Korea and would be continually called upon to defend border against armed attacks from North. I was afraid that if such a course should be followed certain elements in Asia including some in India would tend to overlook origin of Korean trouble and would begin to criticize US for occupying section of Asian continent.

I pointed out that it was much easier for countries citizens of whom were not being killed in Korea to regard situation leisurely and philosophically. Feeling on subject in countries like US in which casualty lists were steadily lengthening were likely to be more tense.

- 4. Bajpai said he could understand that Americans would be more emotional on subject than Indians. Furthermore due deference should be given to US point of view since US was bearing brunt of fighting. He felt however that it would be mistake for UN Forces proceed into North Korea until matter had been thoroughly aired among members of UN. It would of course be impossible to obtain any decision in SC against North Koreans in view of Soviet veto. Nevertheless, informal discussions among UN members might be helpful. He was somewhat surprised in view of rapid developments in Korea that GOI had not already been approached by US Government on this subject. He hoped that approach would not be at last moment. There should be time for full discussion.
- 5. During conversation Bajpai was extremely cautious and continually insisted that his government had not made decision as yet re this matter. From my knowledge of him and of his relations with Nehru I am inclined to believe that it is Nehru's present intention at least not to support any military action North of 38th Parallel. Whether GOI would go so far as to vote against such action in SC or GA or merely abstain I cannot as yet hazard a guess. I am convinced however Nehru would like to maintain his freedom to criticize US for developments which might occur if UN forces should enter North Korea. He might also complicate problem by again introducing subject of right Chinese Commies to participate in discussion.
- 6. Judging from editorial appearing in Hindustan Times of yesterday and from informal conversations which we have had with various Indian leaders I am inclined to believe that there are influential elements in India which might be willing to agree to occupation all Korea by UN Forces provided the entire country should be placed under control UN pending plebiscite; that is, that Rhee Government should not be allowed to remain in control South Korea or Commie regime in control North Korea. It is barely possible Nehru might be persuaded to go along with solution this kind.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] September 27, 1950.

Subject: Conversations between Indian representative in Peiping and Chinese Communist officials

Participants: Mr. Hubert Graves, Counselor, British Embassy Mr. Livingston T. Merchant, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs

Mr. Graves came down urgently this afternoon to show me "in strict confidence" three telegrams which had been received from New Delhi. He said he was not authorized to leave us copies and that it was desired to keep secret that Bevin and Nehru had been in personal communication on this matter.

The first two telegrams were copies of two messages apparently received today by Nehru from Pannikar in Peiping. The first of these reported a conversation he had just held with General Nieh Jungchen, Chief of Staff under Chu Teh. General Nieh spoke bitterly of the Manchurian bombing by U.S. aircraft and said that "China would not take such provocations lying down". When Pannikar reminded him of the tremendous damage from bombing which involvement in war would bring to China, General Nieh stated that he did not believe the United States could spare combat troops to fight in China and that no war could be won by air bombardment alone. Pannikar then quoted a conversation he had held with the Polish Ambassador to Peiping 2 who had just returned four days earlier from Warsaw. The Polish Ambassador stated quite frankly that China would not endure further provocation and sit idly by with folded hands in the face of it.

In his second message, Pannikar concludes that on the basis of these interviews and a reinterpretation on his part of a conversation had with Chou En-lai on September 21 when Chou En-lai said that "since the United Nations had no obligations to China, China had no obligations to the United Nations", there is no doubt in his mind that China has now decided on a more aggressive policy and he is inclined to expect indirect intervention in North Korea. In closing, he urged Nehru to send a personal message to Chou En-lai though even this action "may be too late".

The third telegram was a personal message to Bevin from Nehru responding to Bevin's personal message asking Nehru's support of the UK draft UN resolution on Korea. Nehru cites the care with which he has studied Mr. Bevin's proposal. He reports that he has sent a personal appeal to Chou urging patience and moderation on the part of China. Nehru expresses the conviction, however, that any suggestion that UN forces cross the 38th parallel is likely to precipitate a situation in which "world catastrophe is more than probable". Accordingly, he urges no action whatsoever of this character on the part of the UN. Nehru concludes with the recommendation that the UN merely announce that its objective is to secure a unified Korea coupled with an offer to the North Koreans to discuss with them ways and means whereby this may be accomplished.

Mr. Graves says that they do not take too seriously Pannikar's fears, believing him volatile and an unreliable reporter. They do, however, have to take into account the effect of Pannikar on Nehru and the latter's resultant attitude. Earlier, however, Mr. Graves had given me as his opinion the belief that the UK delegation would plan still to go forward with their resolution even though the Indians did not support it.

Mr. Graves told me in leaving that he understood Mr. Rusk had already been shown copies of these telegrams in New York by the UK GA delegation.

Chinese Communist Intentions: Formosa, Korea Subject:

CA memorandum of August 17, 1950, "Present Situation in Respect to Formosa: Probable Nature of Hypothetical Communist Attack"1

Summary

The shift of the monsoon to the northwest [northeast] 2 in the last decade of September, added to current events in Korea, makes a Chinese Communist assault on Formosa less likely than heretofore. This situation may persist until spring. This conclusion is supported by the evidence contained in a Hong Kong telegram of September 22 3 quoting a Chinese Communist official to the effect that the invasion of Formosa has been postponed. It is unclear whether this postponement was with or against the advice of Moscow. In any event domestic tasks facing the Communists are keeping them very busy at home. There is nevertheless a background of reports indicating that important elements of Lin Piao's 4th Field Army have moved into Manchuria, with 3rd Field Army troops taking their place in Kwangtung. These reports are paralleled by another Nationalist item reporting the arrival of Soviet units in the North China-Manchuria area in early August. That those Chinese troops will participate in the Korean fighting is the most interesting possible explanation of their movement. Peiping has belatedly admitted that certain Korean personnel have returned to Korea "to defend it and take part in building up their country".4 If the Soviets were to permit the situation in Korea to develop to its logical conclusion, the extent of their political defeat would be clear for all Asiatics to see. If they feel that they cannot rely upon a veto to prevent any projected move of UN forces into North Korea, they may plan an intervention of either Chinese Communists, Chinese and Soviet forces, or Soviet forces in North Korea to restore the status quo ante Soviet withdrawal. If Peiping in some of its threatening statements may be trying to bluff us, it is nevertheless not yet safe to assume that the USSR has played all of its cards respecting Korea. In any event Chinese military activity continues strong, and if there seem clear indications that they have temporarily postponed their invasion attempt against Formosa, there is nevertheless no sure guarantee that the Chinese Communist effort will not be thrust forth in another direction, toward the north or south, or at least toward the occupation of Quemoy and Matsu. The Soviet "peace camp", if still unready for World War III, is presumably nevertheless straining all sinews in preparation.

C-64730. Reurmsg JCS 92762.1 I am in full concurrence with your suggestion. The broadcast will be initiated from Tokyo and Seoul 2 Sunday October 1st at 1200 hours Tokyo time. I have made minor modifications in the context of the proposed broadcast so that it will read as follows: "To the Commander in Chief, North Korean Forces: The early and total defeat and complete destruction of your armed forces and war making potential is now inevitable. In order that the decisions of the United Nations may be carried out with a minimum of further loss of life and destruction of property, I, as the United Nations Commander in Chief, call upon you and the forces under your command, in whatever part of Korea situated, forthwith to lay down your arms and cease hostilities under such military supervision as I may direct—and I call upon you at once to liberate all United Nations prisoners of war and civilian internees under your control and to make adequate provision for their protection, care, maintenance and immediate transportation to such places as I indicate. North Korean Forces, including prisoners of war in the hands of the United Nations Command, will continue to be given the care dictated by civilized custom and practice and permitted to return to their homes as soon as practicable. I shall anticipate your early deci-

PRIORITY

New York, September 28, 1950—12:43 a.m. [Received September 28—4:55 a.m.]

Secto 57. Personal for Webb from Rusk. Dening (UK) read to me tonight two telegrams from UK HICOM Delhi containing messages from Nehru to Bevin on Korea situation and, more particularly, on strong views expressed to Pannikar by Peiping authorities on present situation.

Chief of Staff, Chinese Communist Army expressed great bitterness to Pannikar about refusal UN to admit Peiping and about unyielding US attitude on Chinese seat. Pannikar quoted Chou En-lai as saying that since UN seemed to recognize no obligation to China, China had no obligation to UN. Communist Chief of Staff stated in strong language that China would not accept US aggression without resistance, making specific reference to bombings of China by US planes.¹

Chief of Staff stated that repetition such bombings by US planes, active support being given by US to CKS, attitude on UN membership had convinced Peiping that US attack on China is imminent and that Chinese must act accordingly. Pannikar got strong impression that Chinese intervention in Korea had become much more probable. Also obvious that Nehru has been strongly impressed by Chinese attitude and that he thinks present situation very serious. Nehru thus unwilling to sponsor UK resolution on Korea and urges no action beyond 38 since this might touch off more general hostilities.

Bevin has replied stating British view that Chinese attitude is predictable reaction to disappointment on UN seat, that India is probably being subjected to war of nerves and that British estimate is that Chinese intervention in Korea would be basically contrary to Chinese interests and not likely to occur.

Emphasis placed by Chinese on bombing incidents raises question whether we should not try to reassure India and Peiping by seeking basis settlement of any legitimate claims Peiping may have as result such incidents. We know that at least two US planes did in fact unintentionally attack targets in China in connection with Korean operations. Merchant can supply details.

When this Chinese charge came before UN Security Council, we stated such incidents might have occurred and proposed that commission of India and Sweden be established by SC to investigate and determine any damages for which we should be responsible. Soviets vetoed our resolution.2

I have discussed this situation with Secretary and Jessup. Secretary believes we should authorize Bevin to send message to Nehru along lines indicated below, as follow-up on position we took in UN, but believes you should clear such action with President earliest opportunity. Purpose would be to deprive Peiping of such genuine complaint as they might have, of any pretext for any moves they might be considering, and of at least one element of pressure on India. Believe effect on India would be good if no effect on Peiping. Substance of proposed message from Bevin to Nehru follows:

We have discussed with Americans the question of the accidental bombing of Chinese territory by US planes. The Americans are surprised and concerned that this should appear to be a major source of friction since a procedure by which the matter could be handled was vetoed in the Security Council by the Soviet Union. In any event, the Americans would be the first to regret such unintentional damage and continue to be agreeable to having the matter investigated and any damage assessed by competent neutral judgment. Mr. Acheson has authorized me to inform you that the Americans are quite willing to have a representative of India and of Sweden look into the charges and assess any damages which it should be found the Americans should pay. They do not insist upon UN machinery and would accept an informal arrangement on the side. I send you this information in the event you think it might help to remove an unnecessary point of irritation."

Please telephone me USUN as soon as you have President's views.3 [Rusk.]

Minutes of the Ninth Meeting of the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET

New York, September 28, 1950—9:15 a. m.

1. Korea (US/A/C.1/1902/Rev.2; 1 US/A/C.1/1911 2)

Mr. Rusk reviewed the results of our consultations with other Delegations on the Korean resolution. He noted that the Indian reluctance to go along appeared to turn on its uncertainty as to what the Chinese attitude would be if UN forces crossed the 38th parallel. Certain drafting changes had been made in the resolution to take account of various comments. In response to a question from Ambassador Austin, Mr. Rusk indicated that Romulo's several suggestions for revision of the resolution had been considered. The Delegation reviewed the text of the resolution in its present form.

Mrs. Roosevelt observed that the resolution appeared to provide for supervision of elections and then for the return of the Government to the Koreans. She wondered if a single election, held prematurely, to establish a new government might not result in a Communist victory. She hoped the plan would not permit anything of that nature to happen, since, in view of the American casualties in Korea, the American public would feel extremely bitter that so much had been lost in the interests of a democratic country which had been prematurely abandoned, to the advantage of the Soviets. She thought we should envisage supervision of elections by the United Nations for some time to come, until we were convinced that a truly democratic government was firmly established. Mr. Rusk replied that the wording of the resolution was intended to provide flexibility as regards elections. There would be special elections in South Korea to fill certain vacant seats in the legislature. In North Korea we might want a constituent election. Under the resolution any combination or pattern of elections could be held. Mrs. Roosevelt thought the time element would also be important and that individuals should not be elected for too long a period. She was glad to learn that the language of the resolution did not restrict us to a single election.

Referring to the language of the resolution, Mr. Dulles asked whether the language "all appropriate steps be taken" implied a mandate to send United Nations forces into all Korea for the purpose of establishing a unified Korean state. Possibly paragraph (b) qualified that objective, but he wondered who would make the final decision as to whether United Nations forces should move into the North and how far they should go. Mr. Rusk replied that if this resolution were passed, it would be permissive, but not mandatory for United Nations forces to cross the 38th parallel. The United States would have to make its own decision and then consult with other governments, especially those on the commission, as to whether troops should go beyond the 38th parallel.

The Secretary noted that the phrase "all appropriate steps" had been substituted for "all necessary steps". Mr. Rusk indicated this was an Australian suggestion which the British had taken because it gave greater flexibility to the resolution.

It seemed to Senator Lodge that the resolution authorized troops to cross the 38th parallel. He inquired whether our military authorities had expressed any recent opinion on this matter. Mr. Rusk said that the military believed that, in the absence of Chinese Communist and Soviet forces in the area, we should move north of the 38th parallel to bring about a united Korea. Senator Lodge observed we would also forestall future attacks by this action. Mr. Rusk agreed that preservation of the 38th parallel might lead to future difficulties and make more difficult a lasting conclusion of hostilities.

Mr. Dulles expressed concern at the use of the explicit phrase "whole of Korea" in the resolution. He felt that in all probability a united whole Korea could never be attained, and that we would have to compromise on some basis. The extreme northern and eastern provinces certainly could never be united. There should therefore, he believed, be greater flexibility in the resolution, perhaps by substitution of the phrase "in Korea". Even though military judgment favored crossing the parallel, he did not think we should necessarily go as far as the military suggested. In this connection, he referred to the military psychology of the preventive war. He believed this resolution gave too much authority to the military. Senator Sparkman suggested that "throughout Korea" might be another alternative phraseology. Senator Lodge observed that this resolution was not a mandate, but Mr. Dulles thought a recommendation of this kind for all practical purposes was a mandate. He believed the phrase "whole of Korea" would be interpreted by the Chinese and Russians as an attempt on our part to occupy all of Korea.

Ambassador Austin viewed the situation differently. He considered that the United States should do a complete job in Korea and not leave it half done. He did not interpret paragraph (a) as requiring that armed force be used to the end described, but as providing that the appropriate steps be taken. These steps might be quite different from garrisoning the northern provinces. He did not think the United Nations should flinch from its duties. Possibly stationing troops on the border would not be appropriate, but some other course of action would be. After all, Korea was involved and not China or Russia. He believed the resolution must cover all of Korea so that we would not find ourselves lacking authority to make decisions with respect to northern Korea. Mr. Rusk believed Mr. Dulles would be reassured by the position of the military people, who were very cautious about acting provocatively in North Korea. They believed that under no circumstances should United States forces be stationed in the two northern provinces, but that we should restrict our troops to certain key points while United Nations forces might take over in the extreme north.

Mr. Cohen thought the resolution would enable us to do or not to do whatever we thought best. What worried him was whether it would bring us United Nations support for what we might have to decide to do later. Possibly the resolution was too vague. He was also worried as to the way in which the Soviet would interpret our intentions. It was not so much a matter of the decision of going beyond the 38th parallel, but the situation involved a great many different factors. For example, what would happen if forces began to move on both sides of the parallel? Decisions would have to be made very promptly, and the resulting responsibility would be great and the decisions difficult. Mr. Rusk replied that this resolution represented only a part of the problem. We did not know the Soviet view, and among other things, the discussion of this resolution would clarify the Soviet attitude as to how to wind up the Korean situation.

The Secretary noted the need for swift action on Korea. Our resolution should authorize the taking of appropriate steps throughout all of Korea. Whatever we said, we actually meant throughout Korea. Mr. Dulles said he would not press his point in this regard although he would prefer to see the phrase in question omitted as it could be provocative. The Secretary noted that the present text used the phrase "of Korea" except in the one instance, and believed it would be very bad to start out with the phrase "whole of Korea" and then take it out later.

Mr. Cohen and Mr. Gross found some difficulty in the language in paragraph (d) which they suggested might be too artful. Possibly it could be restated simply to say "United Nations forces entering Korea would not remain, etc". Ambassador Austin observed that two-thirds of the delegations had already seen the resolution in its present text.

Senator Lodge said that if this were the beginning, he would favor the language change proposed by Mr. Dulles, but he did not think it could be changed at this stage. He wanted to be sure the resolution permitted us to go where we desired. Ambassador Austin said he would prefer to see the present text unchanged, and the Delegation could consider the matter further if some specific proposals or objections were made. Mr. Cohen thought this problem could be met by making the change throughout the resolution, perhaps by saying "a unified Korea" in all three paragraphs. Such a change could be explained on the basis we thought it desirable to use the same language throughout the resolution. Mr. Allison considered this suggestion would be difficult to apply to paragraph (c) as it related to the position of the Republic of Korea, which did not desire elections throughout Korea.

Mr. Cohen wondered whether changes in paragraphs (a) and (b) only would be appropriate. Mr. Tate suggested the possibility of dropping the word "all" in paragraph (a) which would give greater latitude in determining what was appropriate. Mr. Rusk believed "all" was better language for the United States, since it would constitute a stronger commitment for the United Nations.

The Secretary suggested that we might say to the British that this language was all right with us as it stood, but that if it encountered trouble from other Delegations, the language might be made to read "throughout a unified Korea" in paragraphs (a) and (b). This would permit a change without receding from the original position. However, we should not ask the British to make this change. This was agreed.

The Secretary thought a change might be made in paragraph (d), keeping the sacred language of the British Attorney-General [Solicitor-General] but changing "would" to "should". Ambassador Gross queried whether provision should not also be made for withdrawal of troops from South Korea. It might be better to say United Nations forces should not remain in Korea. The Secretary thought this was a good point. Mr. Rusk agreed that the resolution might be redrafted in terms of a general objective, providing that United Nations forces would not remain in Korea any longer than necessary. Mr. Thurston believed such a change would be very helpful in dealing with the Indians, as well as other delegations. Senator Lodge likewise thought this suggestion appealing. Mr. Dulles observed that the theory in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) called for a unified Korea, whereas paragraph (d) had the effect of re-establishing the 38th parallel. Mr. Rusk did not entirely agree, and Ambassador Gross considered that paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) were actually governing, and the provisions of paragraph (d) would have to be worked out jointly in the United Nations through the Assembly and the Korean Commission.

Mr. Bancroft said there was one unsettled aspect of the problem—hearing the Chinese Communists. The position paper recommended that, if the Chinese Communists requested a hearing, the United States should go along with a committee invitation to hear them. This recommendation was made on the basis that it would give the Chinese a chance to make their own position in respect to Korea clear, and it would also prevent the Indians from becoming the advocates for the Chinese. He inquired whether the Delegation wished to take a final decision on this point.

Ambassador Austin supposed the point was already settled. He reported that he had already told Tsiang yesterday that we were prepared to hear the Chinese Communists. Although Tsiang felt badly, he appreciated the situation. Ambassador Austin wondered if we would not also be confronted by an application for admission to the committee by the North Koreans. In this case should we take the same position of allowing a witness to be heard? The representatives of the Republic of Korea bitterly opposed such a step which they regarded as giving recognition to rebels, who where not a government at all.

The Secretary asked whether if the Chinese Communists were heard, they should be asked to accept the principles of the Charter. Mr. Bancroft recalled that Mr. Dulles had suggested that there might be some analogy to Article 35, but the staff would recommend that we not seek to impose any condition of this sort as the prerequisite of hearings. Such a condition would run contrary to the philosophy underlying the grant of a hearing. It might also mean a long controversy in committee.

Mr. Dulles referred to the point previously made by the Secretary to the effect that we should seek rapid action on Korea. He agreed with this, and believed it important in this case to demonstrate the capacity of the Assembly to function rapidly. If hearing the Chinese Communists and possibly discussing conditions for their participation would involve delay, he would be somewhat concerned since such delay might make the Assembly's action academic in view of the swift movement of events in Korea.

The Secretary suggested we might be able to say we were not interposing objection to such hearings, but wanted to be sure that no delay would be involved. He inquired whether there were any Chinese Communist representatives who could arrive here within twenty-four hours. Mr. Rusk was doubtful, inasmuch as no visas had been issued; he thought several days would be required. As regards conditions, he thought Ambassador Austin might simply declare when the Chinese Communists appeared, that in our view they were accepting the obligations of the Charter. He observed that in the Security Council the Soviets had dropped their request to hear the Chinese Communists on the Korean case, although they had pressed such a hearing as regards Formosa. He believed our main problem would arise by a request for a hearing from North Korea. This would afford an opportunity for dilatory tactics. In his view it would be absurd in the North Korean case to insist that they could not appear until they accepted certain conditions inasmuch as they were engaged now in a war against the United Nations.

The Secretary wondered whether the two matters could not be separated. The North Korean request should clearly be refused on the ground that North Korea was not representative of anyone, had defied the United Nations, and was killing soldiers in the forces of the United Nations. Moreover, the proposed commission would be empowered to consult with appropriate representatives of the North Korean people. Mr. Allison observed that if North Korean representatives should be brought here, it might tie General MacArthur's hands since he would need to have people on the spot with whom he could deal. The Delegation unanimously agreed that the United States should not yield an inch as regards any request for a hearing from North Korea; it should be denied. Mr. Rusk noted that this would be consistent with our policy respecting hearings for the North Koreans for the past three years.

Turning to the question of hearing the Chinese Communists, the Secretary suggested we proceed with the view that we are not going to interpose any difficulty to such hearing, but at the same time make clear that action on Korea must continue to go forward. He asked whether we might get into any other trap. Ambassador Austin inquired if this position might be construed as the admission or recognition of the Communists as the Government of China, particularly if the condition that the resulting decision would bind Communist China were attached. In other instances we had been extremely careful not to refer to the Chinese Communists as a government. Possibly it would be enough to state that the Chinese Communists were simply being heard as witnesses who had indicated they wished to be heard. Mr. Bancroft thought this was correct and believed it would be rather absurd to suggest that a private witness should accept Charter obligations.

Mr. Dulles asked on what theory the Chinese Communists would appear, since no direct charges, such as those in the alleged bombings, had been made. He could not see a similar capacity in this case, unless it was done on the theory that a neighbor of Korea was entitled to a voice. Mr. Rusk suggested such appearance would be comparable to that of the Arab Higher Committee or the Jewish Agency, as parties at interest. He believed it served a practical purpose to bring them to the Council table, since the Chinese Communists were the authority in China, and what happened here might have some effect on the policies of the Peiping regime.

The Secretary considered that the Chinese Communists had nothing to offer on the passage of the resolution. They could consult later with the commission. However, a hearing might reassure them with respect to our intentions in Korea. Mr. Cohen believed an additional reason in favor of a hearing was that a number of countries felt on the whole that it would make for better consideration of the question if the Chinese Communists were present. We would lose more by debating the hearing issue, which was confusing to the public, than we would gain by gracefully accepting hearings. Referring to the idea that the Chinese Communists should accept the obligations of the Charter, Mr. Cohen recalled that in the Greek case, Albania and Bulgaria had been asked to accept such obligations, but when they failed to do so, they were nevertheless allowed limited participation in the debate. This precedent seemed applicable in this case.

The Secretary expressed the hope that such a hearing would not hold up proceedings. Mr. Bancroft did not think this would happen; we could urge the necessity for prompt instructions to the Unified Command, although we might get into a debate on this point respecting the jurisdiction of the Security Council. He reviewed our present thinking on this point. Mr. Rusk thought we should not take the view that the Assembly was providing instructions to the United Nations commander in any case, but rather that we believed that the views of the General Assembly with respect to the outcome in Korea should be expressed as soon as possible. The Secretary suggested that Ambassador Austin might say that we're not going to make any difficulty about hearing the Chinese Communists but also that we had to get on with the decision on Korea. The Committee 5 would vote to let the Chinese Communists appear, Then, some delegate might raise the question whether action should not be postponed until the Chinese arrived; he wondered whether, if that situation arose, we would have enough votes to move right ahead. Mr. Rusk indicated other delegations supported prompt action.

Mr. Dulles wondered if it was likely that the Chinese Communists would come or whether they might not take the position that they would not come unless they were given the Chinese seat. Ambassador Austin observed that in the Security Council the Chinese Communists had demanded the Chinese seat. Ambassador Gross noted, however, that the Soviet motion on Formosa did not include that position; it seemed the Soviets were willing to have the Chinese come as witnesses, regardless of the fact that the Chinese letter had asked that they be permitted to join the Council.⁶

Senator Lodge asked why the question of hearing the Chinese Communists arose with respect to Korea. He thought it better to hear them on the charges of alleged American bombings and saw no reason why they had to be heard on Korea. The Secretary agreed that it was hard to find a logical reason for hearing them in this instance, although there was good reason for the proposed commission to hear them. It might be helpful, however, for us to be able to explain we were not fortifying the border and make clear our own intentions. We simply did not consider the issue worth fighting about since many other government, whose cooperation we needed, regarded the Chinese Communists as the Government of China, and if this issue were debated at length, we would lose more than we would gain. Obviously, we would not push for hearings, but if someone else proposed it, the Secretary favored our saying "yes", providing it did not delay the proceedings.

The Secretary inquired about the language in paragraph (a) regarding the functions of the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea. Mr. Rusk replied that it had been designed to state functions in general. On the relief and rehabilitation side, Mr. Lubin noted the language was intended to keep the Commission out of daily operational responsibilities. Mr. McKeever suggested that, so far as the public was concerned, it would be desirable to do away with the "jawbreaker" title. Mr. Rusk said this was one of Romulo's suggestions which we had been able to accept, and he did not think the title should be changed.

UNITED KINGDOM DRAFT RESOLUTION ON KOREA

The General Assembly

Having regard to its Resolutions of 14th November 1947, of 12th December 1948 and of 21st October 1949;

Having received and considered the Report of the United Nations

Commission on Korea;

Mindful of the fact that the objectives set forth in the Resolutions referred to have not been fully accomplished and in particular that the unification of Korea has not yet been achieved, and that an attempt has been made by an armed attack from North Korea to extinguish by force the Government of the Republic of Korea;

Recalling its Declaration of 12th December 1948 that there has been established a lawful Government (the Government of the Republic of Korea) having effective control and jurisdiction over that part of Korea where the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea was able to observe and consult and in which the great majority of the people of Korea reside; that this Government is based on elections which were a valid expression of the free will of the electorate of that part of Korea and which were observed by the Temporary Commission; and that this is the only such Government in Korea;

Having in mind that United Nations armed forces are at present operating in Korea in accordance with the recommendation of the Security Council of 27th June 1950, subsequent to its Resolution of 25 June 1950, that members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area;

Recalling that the essential objective of the Resolutions of the General Assembly referred to was the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic Government in Korea;

Recommends that:

(a) all appropriate steps be taken to insure conditions of peace and stability throughout the whole of Korea;

(b) all necessary measures be taken to accomplish the economic rehabilitation of Korea:

(c) elections be held and other constituent acts be taken under the auspices of the United Nations for the establishment of a unified, independent, and democratic Government in a sovereign state of Korea;

(d) should United Nations forces enter North Korea they would not remain otherwise than so far as necessary for achieving the objectives specified in (a), (b) and (c) above.

Resolves that:

(a) a Commission consisting of —— to be known as the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea be established to (i) assume the functions hitherto exercised by the present United Nations Commission in Korea (ii) represent the United Nations in bringing about the establishment of a unified, independent, and democratic Government of all Korea (iii) determine the general principles to govern United Nations activities in the rehabilitation and recovery of Korea and exercise general supervision thereof; the United Nations Unification and Recovery Commission should proceed to Korea and begin to carry out its functions as soon as possible;

(b) pending the arrival of the United Nations Unification and Recovery Commission in Korea, governments represented on the Commission should form an interim committee composed of their Permanent Representatives at the Seat of the United Nations to consult with and advise the United Nations Unified Command in the light of the above recommendations; the interim committee should begin to function immediately upon the approval of this Resolution by the General

The General Assembly furthermore,

Mindful of the fact that at the end of the present hostilities the task of rehabilitating the Korean economy will be of great magnitude;

Requests the Economic and Social Council, in consultation with the specialized agencies, to develop plans for relief and rehabilitation on the termination of hostilities, to recommend organizational machinery for implementing a relief and rehabilitation program, and to report to the General Assembly on or before October——.

NEW DELHI, September 28, 1950—1 p. m. Received September 28—9:52 a. m.]

791. 1. I have just returned from lengthy conversation with Nye, UK HICOM, during which he informed me in detail re his conversations yesterday with Bajpai, SYG MEA, and Nehru, and re his exchange of telegrams with Bevin on proposed UK resolution to be presented in First Committee UNGA on Korea. He told me copies of his report were being sent Washington and that Department of State undoubtedly had already been fully informed. I shall, therefore, not undertake set forth herein substance of conversations or of report.

2. It seems that several days ago, under instructions his government, he presented Bajpai document containing decisions three Foreign Ministers re Korean situation. During my conversation with Bajpai yesterday he referred to this document and expressed surprise that I had not been also supplied with copy.1

3. Early vesterday morning Nye received telegraphic instructions from Bevin to acquaint GOI with contents proposed UK resolution and to obtain GOI views with respect thereto. Few minutes after my conversation with Bajpai yesterday morning (Embtel 788, September 27) Nye called upon him, presented to him message from Bevin enclosing draft of resolution. Bajpai expressed considerable concern at passage in draft indicating UN forces might advance beyond 38th parallel and said two telegrams had just been received from Panikkar, Indian Ambassador Peiping; that Peiping angered at attitude displayed towards it by UN and at possible presence of US forces in near future in territory contiguous to China, was threatening to intervene in Korea; and that danger of Peiping intervention would be much greater if UN forces should enter North Korea. Baipai said that intervention Communist China in Korean struggle would almost certainly lead to third world war and that GOI would therefore probably not support UN military action north of 38th parallel. There was considerable discussion between Nye and Bajpai and Bajpai promised submit matter to Nehru. Bajpai gave substance Panikkar's telegrams to Nye who incorporated them in his telegraphic report.

4. In afternoon Nye had talk with Nehru who told him that GOI had definitely decided it would be unwise for UN forces to enter North Korea and that note on subject had already been agreed upon and would be handed to Nye later. GOI note immediately after receipt was telegraphed London and Washington. It is assumed that Department is acquainted with its contents.² I shall not, therefore, emphasize that language in it was quite strong in opposing extension conflict into North Korea.

5. Nye was also informed that message had been sent to Panikkar asking him to urge "moderation and restraint" upon Peiping Government.

6. Nye told me that during his conversation with Bajpai and Nehru, basing himself on information received from London, he had done his utmost to present American position in most favorable light. Among other things he had indicated that US did not wish to have its forces contiguous to Chinese and USSR frontiers and that therefore forces of some other powers would probably move into the frontier areas; that it was not present intention for UN forces to go beyond 40th parallel; and that the present idea was that the occupation forces of North Korea so far as possible would be composed of South Koreans.

- 7. Nehru in his note opposing entry of UN forces into North Korea suggested that they stop at 38th parallel and that negotiations be opened with North Koreans for purpose of prevailing upon northern North Koreans to permit plebiscite under UN auspices for all Korea (see paragraphs 3 and 4 of section numbered 3 Embtel 788, September 27).

Foreign Minister Bevin Secretary Acheson

Mr. Battle

In a conversation on several matters, Mr. Bevin and Mr. Acheson discussed the question of hearing the Chinese Communists on the Korean Resolution. The Secretary said that we would agree to hearing them, but that this must not be a move on their part to delay United Nations action. He said we could not hold up action on the Resolution until the Chinese Communists arrived. He said that he doubted that the Chinese Communists could contribute much on the Resolution itself, but said that they have a right to know whether the border is being fortified, etc. The Secretary emphasized his point that any hearings not be an excuse for delay.

Mr. Bevin asked if he could tell Mr. Nehru about this, to which the Secretary replied in the negative.

Mr. Bevin said that he had met that morning with representatives of the Commonwealths to discuss the Korean Resolution. He said that he was trying to get additional support for the resolution. He said that he had thus far gotten Canada, Australia and Pakistan. He thought that Pakistan was very important as there is a large Moslem population in China. He mentioned that Sir B. N. Rau was sending the Resolution to Mr. Nehru with a message from Mr. Bevin. He also expressed the hope that he would be able to get Holland and possibly Norway to join in. He indicated the Philippines is joining in also.

Mr. Barclay Mr. Battle

Mr. Bevin said that there had been some "alarmist reports about Korea." He said he hoped the United States would make some gesture to calm down the Chinese Communists. The Secretary handed Mr. Bevin the letter on compensation for bombing damage. A copy of this letter is attached.

Mr. Acheson told Mr. Bevin he would try to work out other things.

SECRET [New York,] September 28, 1950.

My Dear Mr. Bevin: In accordance with the conversation last night between Mr. Dening and Mr. Rusk about a possible message from you to Prime Minister Nehru I wish to inform you that the President has now approved of this action. I am therefore enclosing a suggested draft message which you may wish to transmit to Mr. Nehru. Obviously the actual language of this message is for you to determine in so far as there is no alteration in the commitment of the United States Government as contained in the enclosed draft.

It is our hope that a message along the lines suggested will be of real help in the present situation. Your willingness to transmit such a message is greatly appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

Dean Acheson

PROPOSED MESSAGE FROM MR. BEVIN TO PRIME MINISTER NEHRU

We have discussed with the Americans the question of the accidental bombing of Chinese territory by United States planes. The Americans are surprised that this should appear to be a major source of friction since a procedure by which the matter could be handled was vetoed in the Security Council by the Soviet Union. In any event, the Americans would be the first to regret such unintentional damage and continue to be agreeable to having the matter investigated and any damage assessed by competent neutral judgment. Mr. Acheson has authorized me to inform you that the Americans are quite willing to have a representative of India and of Sweden look into the charges and assess any damage which it should be found the Americans should pay. They do not insist upon United Nations machinery and would accept an informal arrangement on the side. I send you this information in the event you think it might help to remove an unnecessary point of irritation.¹

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. John C. Ross of the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET

[New York,] September 28, 1950.

US/A/C.1/1949

Subject: United Kingdom Draft Resolution on Korea

Participants: Dr. John Myun Chang, Ambassador of Korea to the United States

Mr. John C. Ross, United States Delegation

Dr. Chang and one of his associates buttonholed me for about a half hour at Flushing to express their great concern on the paragraph in the United Kingdom draft resolution concerning elections. Chang said in his conversation with Mr. Rusk the day previously Mr. Rusk had suggested that Chang draft the sort of language he would like to see on this point. Chang handed me the following text which I telephoned to Mr. Allison:

"(c) Election be held in the area where the United Nations Commission was prevented to enter, thus completing the national election and, there of [sic], a full jurisdiction of the Republic of Korea be extended over the said area, thereby constituting a unified, independent and democratic government in a sovereign state of Korea."

I told Chang that if any effort were made to introduce language along the lines of his suggested draft, this in turn would invite the introduction of amendments in the directly contrary sense, namely, that general elections should be held throughout all of Korea. I said I was certain that there were a number of Delegations that would insist on this formulation of the matter rather than the one which he and his government desired. I said if an effort were made to be specific in the General Assembly resolution as to where elections were to be held and where they were not to be held, a debate would be precipitated which, in fact, would be a debate not on the language of a resolution but on the status of his government. I said I thought this would be most unfortunate from every point of view. I then urged Chang to consider whether the language in the United Kingdom draft, which in effect would leave to the Commission to work out, in consultation with the Government of the Republic, the matter of elections, would not be the best course.

I am afraid that I did not convince Chang that there were in fact a number of Delegations, in addition to the Russians, who would have no hesitation in questioning the status of his government. It was quite apparent that other Delegations, and Chang apparently consulted many, are merely giving him double talk.

The British Embassy to the Department of State

SECRET

[Washington, undated.]1

Substance of a Telegram From the Foreign Office to Washington Embassy Dated 28th September

CHINESE REACTION TO DEVELOPMENTS IN KOREA

As in the case of the U.S.S.R., there appear to be three courses open to the Chinese Government:

(a) Military occupation of North Korea (presumably by invitation of the North Korean Government) either openly or by means of "volunteers".

¹ A copy of this document was delivered to Mr. Rusk at 10 a.m. on October 2 by messenger from Mr. Graves of the British Embassy and circulated in the Department of State on the following day. Also received and circulated was a similar note dealing with the question of Soviet reaction to developments in Korea. The latter document, not printed, concluded that, on balance, a crossing of the 38th parallel by U.N. forces would involve increased danger of a head-on clash with the Soviet Union, but stated that the Soviet leaders would probably not risk provoking a general war on this issue. (795.00/9–2850)

(b) The maximum political effort to influence United Nations and particularly Asian opinion in favour of a compromise that would leave intact an independent North Korean Communist buffer state.

(c) The strengthening of Chinese military dispositions on the Manchurian/Korean border without military or political intervention in Korea.

- 2. Action by Chinese forces under course (a) can by no means be excluded since the Chinese might well regard the crossing of the 38th Parallel by United Nations forces and the prospect of the elimination of the North Korean Communist buffer state as constituting a serious threat to China's own security. Moreover the Russians might well consider the risk of any extension of hostilities (if they do not want general war) considerably reduced if Chinese rather than Russian forces were to move into North Korea. It might also be argued that the U.S.S.R. would be reasonably well content to take the risk of seeing China embroiled (though perhaps not inextricably) with what are predominantly United States forces and in this way staging a bigger war by proxy. A move into Korea by Chinese forces would also be more consistent with Soviet tactics of leaving the leading part in the execution of Communist Asian policies (in appearance at any rate) to China as an Asian power. It should perhaps be noted that in Pannikar's talks with Chou En-lai, with Chu Teh as well as with the Polish Ambassador, the emphasis is solely on China's concern at United States aggressive intentions in Korea and all reference to any possible Soviet interest in the matter is carefully omitted. (As realists, the Chinese must of course be aware that the Soviet interest in the Korean issue is in fact as great as their own.)
- 3. The two following considerations might also be adduced as possible pointers towards Chinese action along the lines of course (a):

(i) Peking's propaganda both internal and external has put increasing, deliberate and violent emphasis on United States aggressive action both against Korea and China.

- (ii) Peking's notes to the United Nations might seem designed and worded not so much to secure her early admission as to demonstrate that United Nations action in Korea is illegal (and therefore not binding on China or anyone else) and that United Nations action serves to cloak United States plans for aggression.
- 4. Nevertheless on balance it would still seem unlikely that China would be prepared to take the risk of becoming involved in hostilities with the United States and possibly other Western Powers with no prospect of real benefit to herself and with the fate of Korea as a strong deterrent. Other arguments against China's intervention are:
 - (i) Her internal position has not yet been consolidated.

(ii) Her ambitious plans for economic reconstruction and industrialisation might have to be sacrificed. Her towns and communications would be liable to devastation.

(iii) Her military capacity to face major hostilities is doubtful although she may consider on the analogy of the war with Japan that her vast territory and population would ensure ultimate success.

- (iv) Her people overwhelmingly want peace not war. To judge by Chinese popular reaction over Formosa, there seems no real difficulty in restraining outraged patriotism. If anything the difficulty particularly in the case of Korea might well be to whip up any indignation at all.
- 5. Thus, however closely in some respects China's policy may be coordinated with that of the USSR there is likely to come a point beyond which China would not move unless her own interests were clearly served. In Korea, she would therefore be unlikely to intervene for the sake of the Soviet Union rather than for any tangible Chinese benefits, especially as her intervention would coincide with the destruction of the North Korean Forces. If, on the other hand, the USSR were prepared to launch a general war and themselves come in, then China might feel compelled to move.

6. It would follow that China would almost certainly prefer course (b), i.e. to do everything possible to achieve the survival in some form of North Korea by diplomatic means rather than by open intervention. The threat of open intervention might however profitably be used in this diplomatic context and talks with Pannikar in Peking would provide a convenient starting point for action under course (b).

- 7. The initial purpose of Chinese diplomatic pressure on the Indians may therefore be designed primarily to break the United Nations front against North Korean aggression, but in view of Chinese propaganda and threats, of possible Soviet pressure on China, of the fact that China has an estimated troop concentration in Manchuria of between 400,000 and 600,000 men, the possibility of a Chinese move into North Korea in the event of diplomatic pressure failing exists as a real danger. Pandit Nehru, in fact, on the 27th September, expressed the extreme and perhaps alarmist view presumably based on the recent reports of the Indian Ambassador at Peking whose own views on Chinese intervention have undergone a complete volte-face in the last few days that "any decision or even suggestion that United Nations forces will move beyond the 38th Parallel is likely to precipitate what might well be world catastrophe, is I fear more than probable".
- 8. As regards course (c) the strengthening of Chinese military dispositions in Manchuria has already taken place. If the Chinese conclude that the difficulties and dangers enumerated above of becoming embroiled are such as to outweigh the advantages, and this on balance would seem to be the case, then they would presumably concentrate on further defensive measures and adopt course (c).

9. To sum up, the prospect of control over North Korea by United Nations forces presents the Chinese with extremely difficult decisions. On balance, we consider they are not likely to intervene since they risk hostilities on an issue which would not appear to be vital to China. They would prefer to achieve the survival of a North Korean buffer state, by diplomatic means, but if this fails, the possibility of open Chinese intervention exists as a real danger. If there is intervention in North Korea Chinese forces are more likely to move in than Russian forces.

tion, said that he had told Dening in the meeting that if someone should raise a point of order in the Committee against the jurisdiction of the Assembly even to imply authority to cross the 38th parallel he would have to support such a point of order. I discussed this question of jurisdiction and authority with Freitas-Valle, calling his attention to the restoration of peace and security in the area language in the Security Council resolution and indicating our feeling that in the event of any challenge our authority was secure.

Freitas-Valle then developed a somewhat different line as a corollary to his first point. He said that the United States was about to be judged for all of its activities in Korea. He said that all of our friends and he thought a great majority of the Assembly wanted to defend us. It was essential, however, that we put them in the position to make the most effective defense of us. He said that if the British resolution were put on the table on Friday as planned this would create a great deal of difficulty for many of our friends in regard to the jurisdictional issue. In effect he said the tabling of this resolution would impose a strong inhibition against MacArthur moving across the 38th parallel. Our friends would be in the position of having to argue in support of a theory of dubious validity. He recommended in very strong terms, therefore, that the British should not table the resolution for the next few days, that the United States Government as the Unified Command should give MacArthur whatever orders might be necessary to enable him to cross the 38th parallel and take whatever action the military situation required. Thereafter, Freitas-Valle said, all of our friends would be able to argue in our support on the basis of the fact of Mac-Arthur's action. This, he said, he was sure would be very helpful to him, to many of his Latin American colleagues, and in general to the Asiatics including the Indians. Freitas-Valle asked that I communicate his views to Ambassador Austin with whom he said he hoped to have a chance to discuss the matter at Lake Success Friday afternoon.

I told Freitas-Valle that I would of course communicate his views to Ambassador Austin who I knew would be delighted to talk with him and I expressed our very great appreciation for his friendliness and frankness.

by US Government and referred to in immediately preceding telegram:²

1. Korea should be free, independent and united country.

2. Method of unification must be in accord with principles of UN Charter and a UN commission should be in Korea to consult with Koreans and Unified Command and make recommendations as to method of unification and part which can be played by members of UN.

3. Korean people to be consulted should be chosen by free elections, with secret ballot, on basis of universal adult suffrage, such elections to be held under auspices of UN.

4. In that part of Korea south of 38th degree parallel ROK is duly elected representative of Korean people, recognized as such by UN, and it should be consulted in all matters pertaining to future of Korea.

5. Just as Korea has been a symbol of resistance to aggression any UN solution should hope to make Korea "vibrant symbol of life" in words of Secretary Acheson.

6. This cannot be done by mere return to status quo ante bellum but only by carrying out of will of UN as expressed in previous GA resolutions of 1947, 1948, and 1949, and;

7. By marshalling of UN resources under UN guidance, to carry out great tasks of relief and rehabilitation in country devastated by war.

8. Aggressors must lay down their arms and submit to UN settlement which should not be settlement dictated by any single nation but only by UN in cooperation with Korean people.

9. It must be made clear in any settlement that free, united and truly independent Korea will pose no threat to its neighbors but will live in peace and harmony with them.

10. To this end Korea should be admitted to UN and thus assume obligations of Charter as well as its benefits.

11. In all this we must remember that Korea is in very special sense responsibility of UN and that in all it does UN is engaged in attempting to give small nation right to live in liberty and independence free from political domination by anyone.

shown you text of res. Bevin sent strong reply last night to Nehru stating British view that Chi attitude is predictable reaction to loss of UN seat, that India is probably being subjected to war of nerves and that Brit estimate is Chi intervention in Korea basically contrary to Chi interests and unlikely to occur. Present US info tends to confirm Brit position.

Present military situation in Korea emphasizes possibility that military necessity may require ground action across the thirty eighth parallel before Assembly can express its final opinion on general problem. Dept and USDel at UN believe essential that GA take early stand on Korean matter so there can be no doubt re attitude of free world on this problem. General attitude US Govt on essential elements of Korean solution are given in immediately fol tel.³

In view of emphasis placed by Chinese on bombing incidents and in effort to reassure India and Peiping by seeking basis of settlement of any legitimate claims Peiping may have Bevin has been authorized to send message to Nehru stating that US is quite willing to have Indian and Swedish Reps look into charges and assess any damage which US shld pay and that US does not insist upon UN machinery but wld accept informal arrangement. In taking this step it is made clear that US was surprised that this shld be major source of friction since a procedure by which matter cld have been settled was vetoed in SC by USSR.

In considering question of 38th parallel believed there has been confusion between military and political phases this problem. Obviously military task is to restore international peace and security in area which demands that aggressor abdicate its military power or that this be destroyed by UN forces. In absence aggressors laying down arms this may well require operations anywhere in Korea at any time and Unified Command should have power take all necessary measures achieve this military objective. Long-run future of Korea north of 38th parallel as well as south is concern of UN and subject to UN decision. For your info you shld know that MacArthur has instructions that while ROK troops, as elements of Unified Command, may take part in any possible military actions north of 38th parallel question of jurisdiction of ROK in that area is one for UN decision. US believes important that no action by GA cast doubts on present status of ROK as Govt ROK is unquestionably freely chosen govt established through elections observed by UN Comm and approved by GA. In addition democratic character of May 1950 Natl Assembly elections was certified by UN Comm and Natl Assembly opposition to Rhee shid be interpreted as healthy democratic development rather than basis for repudiation duly constituted govt described as lawful by GA. However US has no intention of forcing ROK down throats of its UN Allies but hopes that ROK can be persuaded to cooperate with UN and show by its conduct during coming days that it merits confidence and consideration of UN. Question of holding elections in south is delicate matter which US believes shld be left for study and recommendation by UN Comm on-the-spot and not spelled out specifically in res. ROK Reps at GA meetings have taken strong stand on this point and insist that in as much as UN-approved elections were held throughout south as recently as last May it shld not be necessary to do it all over again. In any event there is general belief among UN Dels in which US joins that any elections either north or south shid not be hastily held while scars of war are still uppermost in minds of people. It may be that cooling-off period might last as long as one year in which case it wld be close to May 1952 at which time Rhees term of office expires. US believes question of who shld govern Korea is matter for decision of Koreans and shld not be influenced from outside one way or another. Shld new elections under UN auspices result in election of Rhee we believe results shid be accepted, shid Rhee not be chosen again we wild maintain same attitude towards results.

Dept believes active support by India of UK Res wld be of tremendous significance and consideration is being given to postponing presentation of res for short time in hope that India may reconsider. You might stress to GOI that now is time to press toward its consistent objective of unified independent Korea. If NK regime is given time to regroup its forces north of three eighth parallel, it will almost certainly defy UN as in past. In this event UN wld be faced with hard alternatives of yielding to such defiance by ruthless aggressor or of attempting to bring about unification by renewed and more costly military action, UN members shld not be dissuaded from support of firm UN action at this critical stage by implied threats of those who have supported aggression.

Dept regrets speed of events has made it difficult keep you currently informed developments and commends your conduct conversations with Bajpai despite handicap of inadequate info.

792. My British colleague informed me yesterday that his government has learned from the Indians that Panikkar has reported strong sentiment among Chinese Communist leaders in Peiping favoring Chinese military intervention in Korean war if UN forces cross 38th parallel. Apparently Panikkar has reported that decision on intervention has crystallized since mid-September and that it is based on Chinese Communist conviction that basic aim of US, if its forces enter North Korea is to carry war to Manchuria and China in order return Chiang Kai-shek to power in China.

Confirmation of attitude Peiping leaders was received by an Embassy officer in conversation with Dutch Embassy officer who stated that Dutch Foreign Office has received report from its Chargé Peiping that it appears Communists are actually thinking of armed intervention Korea if US forces cross 38th line. Same report states those elements among Chinese intellectuals who remain sympathetic to US feel that we would make grave error to cross line in view Chinese Communist determination on intervention and that they (sympathetic intellectuals) would be obliged abandon their position favoring friendship with west based on US altruism. Our Dutch source here added that Dutch Ambassador on September 20 was told by Indian Ambassador Radhakrishnan that Panikkar had reported Chinese intervention intention in case line crossed by US forces. It appears report of Dutch Embassy here re this statement by Radhakrishnan prompted Dutch Foreign Office request special report from its Peiping Chargé, substance of which described above.

On balance, I find it difficult accept these two reports (Indian and Dutch) as authoritative analysis plans Chinese Communists. Moment for armed intervention was logically when UN forces were desperately defending small area Taegu-Pusan, when influx overwhelming numbers Chinese ground forces would have proved decisive factor. From here it appears probable Chinese Communists, thru press propaganda and by personal contacts with foreign diplomatic personnel Peiping, have taken strong line since Inchon landing hoping bluff UN on 38th parallel issue.

Nevertheless, prudence is indicated and I would much appreciate any information re Peiping attitude which may already have reached Department otherwise. September 23 speeches by Mao Tse-tung and Chu Teh which have not been published here in full conceivably may have been timed as warning that military situation now receiving top attention.¹

803. 1. Nye, UK HICOM informed me noon today of latest developments in correspondence and conversations between UK and India re Korea (Embtel 791, September 28).

- 2. I shall not furnish in detail what Nye said since I understand British are keeping Department fully informed. Nye gave Bajpai last evening message from Bevin in reply to Nehru's message to Bevin of preceding day. In this note Bevin expressed doubt Peking would be so foolish as to intervene in Korea at this stage and pointed out unless UN forces entered North Korea there seemed to be no way to effect unification of Korea. He also expressed hope Nehru would agree to and co-sponsor proposed British resolution, including passage relating to crossing 38th parallel. Later in evening Nye received reply from Nehru which he forwarded to Bevin with copy for Washington. This reply, though couched in friendly terms, indicated determination Nehru not to support at this time any move calling for crossing 38th parallel by UN forces. Nehru took position that it would be dangerous to assume that Peking leaders were bluffing when they intimated Communist China might intervene in Korean situation. He agreed to support resolution similar to that proposed by British provided it did not sanction entrance UN forces into North Korea. Note indicated that appeal to North Korea to cooperate with UN in carrying out purposes of resolution would not be appeasement and pointed out that if North Korea refused decision could then be made as to future course of action.
- 3. I called on Bajpai shortly after Nye's visit in order at his request to discuss another matter. Following this discussion Bajpai asked me whether I had anything to add to our conversations set forth in Embtel 788, September 27. I replied I had received nothing from Department which would permit me to discuss this matter further. I understood that British were taking lead in formulating resolution on Korea for GA and that it was my impression Department preferred that discussion with India re this resolution be conducted through British channels. Bajpai said that he had similar impression and then outlined conversations which had taken place between UK and India in Delhi during last two days. He showed me Nehru's latest reply to Bevin, asked if I had any comments, I replied in negative pointing out that I already, on personal basis, discussed matter with him on September 27 and it seemed to me that it was preferable without further instructions for me to allow conversations on this subject to continue through British channels.

Delga 50. For Rusk from Ross. Trygve Lie called me in yesterday afternoon and after complaining that British (by implication US) had not consulted him re Korean resolution, said he had been thinking that Jebb as President SC ought to go privately to Malik and ask Malik series of questions adding up to whether Soviet Union would wholly accept and use its influence to carry out all previous decisions of GA and SC re Korea. After oral approach Jebb would confirm in writing and insist on reply in writing (which Lie anticipated would be negative) so that negative attitude Soviets could be placed squarely on record at opening of GA debate. This, said Lie, would make clear to "little man" around world the position of Soviet Union.

I argued against this procedure, first on grounds that we wanted matter Korea dealt with broadly and openly by UN and not on basis private deals with Russians; second, on basis we wanted avoid confusion SC and Assembly action. I questioned whether, if it were desirable to ask Soviets series of questions to expose their position on all aspects Korean matter, this might not best be done in open debate in Committee One.

Lie did not press his point but agreed questions might appropriately be asked of Soviets in committee. He then gave me suggested terms of settlement quoted below which he said had been drafted by Feller. He asked if we would consider these suggestions very carefully, which I said we would do:

"Suggested terms of settlement of the Korean question (based mainly on principles contained in existing resolutions of the GA and the SC) a. The GA will, by resolution, demand that the North Korean authorities agree to the following conditions:

1. A general cease fire, withdrawal to the 38th parallel and demilitarization of North Korean forces, under UN supervision.

2. Entry of the UN Commission to North Korea and full opportunity for it to fulfill its functions.

3. Entry of UN relief personnel and full opportunity to supervise distribution of relief supplies.

4. A general amnesty for all persons who have taken up arms on behalf of the ROK and who may be in North Korean territory.

5. Agreement for a free election to be held in all of Korea within one year, at a date and under regulations to be promulgated by the UN Commission.

b. If the North Korean authorities accept the conditions under a, their de facto jurisdiction in the area north of the parallel will be preserved until after the election has been held. UN troops will not cross the parallel until after the election. After the election authority will be handed over at a date to be determined by the UN Commission to the new all Korean Government chosen in the election.

c. The ROK should be asked to agree to accept the conditions for and the results of the election, and to grant a general amnesty for all persons who have taken up arms against the ROK.

d. In the event of refusal by the North Korean authorities, the GA will recommend to the members that UN troops proceed to conduct military operations north of the parallel, with the objective of eliminating the North Korean authorities.

Upon the achievement of this objective North Korea will be placed under the jurisdiction of the UN occupation authorities (details of the appropriate UN political authority and of the composition of the occupying forces to be worked out), until such time as the Assembly or the SC decides that an election for all of Korea should be held."

Memorandum by Mr. Frank Ragusa of the Division of Security Affairs to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk) [Washington,] September 29, 1950—3:30 p.m.

Mr. Dulles had Miss Doyle dictate the following message to you by phone:

I hope we shall not give the impression of being disposed now with victory to ditch Syngman Rhee. He is far from perfect but he is a great patriot and anti-communist and organized his country so that they put up a good fight, and he is not as bad as Communist smear portrays him. If the Chiang Kai-shek episode is followed by what seems a similar treatment of Rhee, then it will seem to establish a pattern which would, I think, greatly discourage any Asiatic leaders from wanting to fight on our side.¹

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk) 1

SECRET

[Washington,] September 30, 1950.

Subject: Chinese Communist Troops—Korea

Reference: CA Memo 9/27/50: "Chinese Communist Intentions"

GHQ FEC reports: "An analysis of Korean PW reports reveals conclusively that the Chinese Communist 164th and 166th Divisions were moved into North Korea, via Sinuiju and Nanam, during Aug and Sep 49, and were redesignated as the North Korean 5th and 6th Divisions, respectively. These divisions, prior to their transfer to North Korea, were composed of Koreans serving with the Chinese Communist Army, and as the 3rd and 4th Independent Divisions, fought against the Nationalists in Manchuria." *

Although this transfer took place in 1949, this report can be related to the recent Peiping admission that Koreans had returned from China to their homeland to participate in its defense and construction. It is of course possible, as implicit in the Peiping statement, that other Koreans have returned home at more recent dates.

Note the further report† that Canton Deputy Mayor Ku Ta-tsun stated at a secret conference in Macao on Aug. 4 that if UN forces opened a second front in Korea Mao Tse-tung would invade Indo-China and probably attack Taiwan at the same time; and, "part of the Communist offensive would be the capturing of military materiel in Hong Kong . . .". A source comment cited by GHQ FEC was that the report that Chou En-lai had told a conference that if the Koreans were pushed back to the Manchurian frontier China's policy would be to fight outside her borders and not wait for the enemy to come inside, and other reports, "indicate that Chinese Communist authorities are deeply concerned over the course of events in Korea and would regard the advance of UN forces to the Manchurian border as a serious threat to their regime. The final decision on whether the Chinese Communists will resort to overt participation in Korea may not be made until UN forces threaten to cross the 38th Parallel."

¹The memorandum was also addressed to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant).

The vote was 1 (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) in favor to 9 (including the United States) opposed, with 1 abstention (Yugoslavia).

The First Committee of the United Nations General Assembly met for the second time on September 30 between 3 and 6 p.m.; for the record, see U.N. document A/C.1/SR.347. The Soviet draft resolution (A/C.1/562) inviting both representatives of North and South Korea to participate in the debate was rejected by a vote of 46 to 6, with 7 abstentions. The Chinese resolution (A/C.1/563) inviting a representative of the Republic of Korea to participate without the right to vote was accepted by a vote of 50 to 5, with 5 abstentions. The Committee then took up the eight-power draft resolution on Korea (A/C.1/558), the text of which is contained in telegram Delga 57. September 29, from New York, page 826. New Delhi, September 30, 1950—8 p. m. [Received September 30—9:43 p. m.]

- 812. 1. Bajpai sent for me late this afternoon in order to discuss further problems re Korea. He read to me latest communication received this morning from Bevin and Nehru's reply thereto.
- 2. Bevin referred to recent changes which had been made in text of proposed UK resolution and expressed hope GOI could now co-sponsor it. Bevin stated UK had not meant to convey in previous message belief that Peking was bluffing in making threats, but rather opinion that Communist Chinese leaders were too statesmanlike to push China into war with UN forces.
- 3. Nehru's reply indicated that although GOI might not oppose resolution, it would make clear in GA that it would be preferable for UN before sending armed forces into North Korea to give North Koreans opportunity to lay down arms and to undertake to cooperate loyally with committee proposed in resolution in carrying out aims of UN.
- 4. Bajpai undertook explain what present GOI position is along following lines:
- (a) GOI agrees that under SC resolutions of June, UN forces have right to enter North Korea for military purposes. It believes, however, that in interest of peace, UN forces before entering North Korea should give North Koreans chance to lay down arms and to undertake to permit UN to take jurisdiction over area for purpose of carrying out program set forth in draft resolution.

(b) Period during which this chance should be given could be so short that North Koreans would not be able to gain material advantage militarily for respite.

(c) It is not intent of GOI to oppose resolution. It may abstain or it may even vote for it. Its final decision depends upon facts brought out during discussions in GA and on international developments.

- 5. Rau has been instructed to make speech in first committee outlining India's views as set forth above. He is not, however, to undertake to propose any amendments to resolution. His speech will be confined merely to statement of how GOI considers matter might be most effectively handled in interest of peace.
- 6. Bajpai specifically requests that there be no indication to Rau or any other Indian official that US has knowledge of nature of instructions sent to Rau.
- 7. It will be noted that there has been a distinct shift in GOI position since my first conversation with Bajpai as reported in mytel 788.

Minutes of the Eleventh Meeting of the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET

New York, October 2, 1950—9:15 a.m.

1. Korea

Mr. Bancroft reviewed the committee developments on Korea. One question had arisen on a Chilean amendment (A/C.1/564) which proposed the addition of a paragraph reading "Also recommends the Economic and Social Council to expedite the study of long-term measures to promote the economic development and social progress of Korea and meanwhile to draw the attention of the authorities which decide requests for technical assistance to the urgent and special necessity of affording such assistance to Korea." He indicated our preliminary reaction had been to accept this amendment, but that the Department was a little concerned about it and had urged the Delegation to dissuade Santa Cruz from pushing his amendment on the basis that the resolution already sufficiently covered this point. It seemed to Mr. Bancroft that this position might detract from the approach to Korean reconstruction contained in the Secretary's opening speech, but he noted that the Department seemed to fear that too many promises would be made to Korea in this regard.

¹Received at 1:40 p. m. on September 27, p. 790.

The Secretary believed it was better to promise the same thing several times than to promise different things; the Chilean proposal did not add anything new. Mr. Ross recommended strongly that the Delegation support the Chilean proposal; in his position as President of the Economic and Social Council, Santa Cruz could help us; he already felt that the British had shoved him aside, and Mr. Ross feared he might think the same of us if we refused this amendment. Mr. Dulles thought it much better, from the purely technical standpoint, to accept the amendment. He referred to the fact that he was lunching with Santa Cruz to try to persuade him to withdraw the Chilean item on strengthening democratic principles and thought support of this amendment might be helpful. Mrs. Roosevelt also hoped we might support the Chilean amendment since she believed it would help obtain necessary Chilean support on our human rights position in the Third Committee. Mr. Dreier 1 considered, moreover, that support of this amendment would strengthen our position with all the Latin American delegations. Mr. Bancroft recalled that the Department had not suggested that the United States should vote against the amendment but merely attempt to dissuade Santa Cruz from pressing it; if it came to a vote, we would vote for it. Mr. Popper suggested that the points raised in the discussion might be brought to the Department's attention.

Mr. Dulles inquired whether the Chilean amendment differed from what the Secretary had said on Korean reconstruction in his speech. Mr. Bancroft thought that perhaps there was a difference in emphasis. Senator Cooper observed that Ambassador Austin's speech in the Committee had carried the same thesis. The Secretary requested that the matter be taken up again with the Department, which should be informed that the Delegation saw no particular harm in this amendment.

Senator Lodge asked under what authority United Nations forces were proceeding to cross the 38th parallel. The Secretary replied that the resolution of June 27, which referred to the restoration of peace and security in Korea, provided the sanction. Senator Lodge observed that the adoption of this resolution would not hamper the military operation; he hoped that had been made clear to General MacArthur, since it was not clear to the public. Mr. Ross believed Ambassador Austin's speech had helped to clarify this point.

Mr. Cohen thought it would be helpful for the Delegation to have some survey of the way other delegations interpreted the June 27 resolution for its own information and guidance. Mr. Ross stated that there was almost universal support for our position. Mr. Dreier said this was true of the Latin American states. Mr. Bancroft commented that there was also a general feeling that there should be expeditious Assembly action on Korea.

Senator Lodge asked whether there was any way under the Charter to find out who was guilty of starting the Korean war and to punish them as war criminals. Mr. Allison thought the item in Committee 6, dealing with the establishment of an international criminal court, might be helpful in this regard.

Senator Cooper wondered about the Indian reaction to crossing the 38th parallel. Mr. Ross thought India would probably go along. Mr. Bancroft explained that India believed we could cross the parallel for military purposes but that in the interest of peace also felt we should give North Korea a chance to lay down its arms; to date India was in agreement with the steps taken.

Ambassador Gross thought it unfortunate not to rush the Korean action through the Assembly and believed the Committee should meet three times daily until the resolution was adopted, unless there were major policy reasons against such action. The Secretary agreed action should be taken swiftly and asked how this might be ensured. Mr. Bancroft explained that some key states were not yet prepared to speak and had asked for the necessary time to complete preparation of their speeches. Mr. Dulles referred to the speed-up of meetings in Paris and thought it as important to end a war as to wind up an Assembly session. Mr. Bancroft cautioned that if we over-emphasized the necessity for speed, it might raise embarrassing questions as to whether we had authority to proceed as we were now doing. Mr. Dulles thought the Assembly should be geared to handle such matters expeditiously; he noted that Congress also wastes time, but believed that on questions of war and peace, it always acted promptly. In his opinion, a similar sense of responsibility should be developed in the Assembly. The Secretary agreed it was important to move fast. However, two things should be distinguished. On the military side, we did not need a resolution to proceed; the North Korean armies were disappearing. On the other hand, we would soon encounter the problem of what authority there is in the North and what happens in the future—this was the area in which prompt Assembly action was needed.

[Here follows the record of the discussion on the second agenda item: Human Rights in Bulgaria, Hungary, and Romania.]

Editorial Note

The First Committee of the United Nations General Assembly held the first of two meetings on October 2 from 10:45 a.m. to 1:30 p.m.; for the record, see U.N. document A/C.1/SR.348. No voting action took place during this session which was devoted mainly to a lengthy speech by the Soviet Representative (Vyshinsky), followed by a shorter statement from the Korean Representative (Limb).

The Committee met again from 3 to 5:25 p. m.; see U.N. document A/C.1/SR.349. The meeting was taken up principally by statements by the Polish, Byelorussian, and Czechoslovak Representatives speaking in opposition to the eight-power draft resolution and the work of United Nations Commission on Korea. A draft resolution (U.N. document A/C.1/567) on the Korean question was submitted by the Soviet, Ukrainian, Byelorussian, Czechoslovak, and Polish Delegations; for the text, see telegram Delga 63 from New York received at 7:24 p. m. on October 2, page 838.

In addition, two other draft resolutions were introduced by the Soviet Representative on October 2; one called for the cessation of United States bombing in Korea (A/C.1/568), the other called for disbandment of United Nations Commission on Korea (A/C.1/569).

Draft Memorandum by the Planning Adviser, Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs (Emmerson)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] October 2, 1950.

Subject: The Occupation of North Korea

A United Nations occupation of North Korea must be based on the concept that the purpose of the occupation is to establish peace and security in Korea and that to do this, unification of the country will be necessary. It should be recognized that the establishment of peace and security makes possible a solution of the Korean problem by the Koreans themselves. It should therefore not be the task of occupation forces to impose on the North Korean people a complete administration of government—staffed by non-Koreans. In the initial stages the occupation forces will concern themselves primarily with the restoration of law and order and the provision of emergency relief. Koreans will be used in these tasks to the maximum extent possible. The UN forces will act to restrain them from acts of reprisal and to assist them in re-establishing the minimum essential services. It should be recognized that during this interim period, while the Koreans will play the dominant role, the sovereignty of the Republic of Korea over the northern areas will not legally be extended until elections are held. During this interim period North Korea will therefore be in a status of occupation and will be subject to the authority of the Commanding General of the Unified Forces.

Three phases are envisaged in the post-hostilities period, as follows:

First Phase—From Cessation of Organized Resistance to Arrival of United Nations Commission.

1. Occupation of certain key cities in North Korea should be effected by units made up of UN forces, acting under the authority of the Unified Commander, who should consult with UNCOK to the extent practicable.

2. The composition of the units should be as follows:

a. The Commanding Officer should be a military officer of appropriate rank from one of the UN member countries supporting the UN action in Korea.

It will be preferable if as many as possible of these officers are not Americans. Efforts should therefore be instituted as soon as possible to invite UN members to select highly competent officers to fill these posts. It would be highly desirable if as many Asiatic countries as possible were represented.

- b. Components of UN units should in general maintain a proportion of one-half ROK troops to one-half UN troops.
- 3. The tasks of the UN units during phase one will be in general as follows:

a. Disarmament of North Korean forces.

b. Provision of immediate relief to the civilian population.

c. Re-establishment of essential public services.

d. Filling of minimum essential governmental positions.

It should be made clear that the appointment of officials to fill local governmental posts is purely temporary pending the holding of elections. Selection of Koreans to fill these posts will be made by the Commanding Officer of the unit.

Second Phase—From arrival of UN Commission to Holding of national elections.

1. Following its arrival in Korea the UN Commission established by the General Assembly under the UK resolution, should visit the areas of North Korea occupied by UN forces.

2. The UN Commission should inspect conditions in each of the occupied areas and make recommendations regarding relief, reconstruction, rehabilitation, etc.

3. The UN Commission should make recommendations with regard to the withdrawal of UN forces occupying North Korea.

4. The UN Commission should make recommendations regarding the holding of elections:

a. The Commission may recommend the holding of local elections in some areas pending elections to the National Assembly.

b. The UN Commission should set a date for elections to the National Assembly.

Third Phase—From the Holding of Elections to the Withdrawal of Occupation Forces.

1. Elections to the National Assembly should be held under the supervision of the UN Commission.

2. Upon holding these elections, the Republic of Korea should assume jurisdiction over all parts of Korea where elections have been held.

3. Security forces should be established in Korea as recommended by the UN Commission.

4. Efforts should be made to obtain the neutralization of Korea through agreements by UN members and by the Republic of Korea.

Mr. Wainhouse dictated the following sentences which sum up the result of this meeting:

"It was agreed that the Commission should be made up of neutrals and that we should stress the need for having top level representatives on it. If it is proposed that the USSR or a Soviet satellite be put on the Commission, then we should counter with the suggestion that the Soviet Union, United Kingdom and ourselves be put on it."

I asked Mr. Wainhouse what was meant by the word "neutrals". He informed me that it meant all states except the Big Five.

Minutes of the Twelfth Meeting of the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET

New York, October 3, 1950—9:15 a.m.

1. Composition of Korean Commission (US/A/C.1/1989)¹

The Secretary considered that there were three main choices with respect to the membership of the Special Korean Commission provided for in the British resolution.

1. The Department had recommended that neither the United States, the United Kingdom or the USSR should be on the commission. The British agreed with this view. He saw one great difficulty, however, in that such a commission might not be very vigorous and American leadership would be helpful.

2. The second alternative was to include the United States, but not the Soviet Union. While this would be highly desirable, if it could be done, it did raise certain difficulties in that it might result in loss of support for the resolution from states such as India.

3. The third alternative was to include the three Great Powers, although this would be almost certain to result in complete frustration of our own efforts, since a commission with Soviet representatives had never worked satisfactorily. There would inevitably be long speeches on the subject of American aggression and imperialism and the commission would never make any progress.

As the Secretary saw it, those were the choices open to the United States. After thinking it over and deciding that each of the three alternatives had disadvantages, his personal choice was to include neither the Soviets nor the United States. In his view, it would be almost impossible to explain including the Soviets to American public opinion, since it seemed inconsistent to fight a war and then to put the enemy on the peace commission. If we were not represented, he foresaw American criticism, but he thought the public would generally understand why we had not insisted on membership.

Ambassador Austin was moved by the Secretary's judgment. His own first thought had been that our stake in Korea was so great that we had to be on the commission. However, he had suggested to others that it was important to consult widely on this problem and consequently believed there was still time to canvass opinion with respect to the composition of the commission. Tentatively he favored the Secretary's viewpoint.

Mrs. Roosevelt believed it utterly impossible to include both the Soviets and ourselves on the commission. She thought the recommended slate of small states was the best which could be done, considered from the standpoint of trying to preserve the United Nations. At the same time, she thought there were a tremendous number of people who would feel that, because so many of our boys had been killed in Korea, if we did not achieve a democratic Korea it would be because we had shirked our duty and refused membership on the commission. For this reason, our position would be hard to get across. Possibly we could argue that this type of commission was the best way to achieve a democratic Korea. Nevertheless, she was nervous about the public reaction.

Senator Sparkman felt very much as Mrs. Roosevelt did. However, he would personally prefer to see a strong commission without the United States and the Soviet Union. If such a commission could do the job, that was the best alternative. However, if we did decide to eliminate ourselves from membership, he believed we should concentrate every effort on getting a strong commission that could and would do the necessary job in Korea.

From the Congressional standpoint, Senator Lodge had no doubt that the best arrangement would be the inclusion of the United States and the exclusion of the Soviet Union. Referring to the unhappy memories left by UNRRA, he considered that a number of Congressmen would go along with our policy more readily if the United States were included. He agreed with Mrs. Roosevelt that it would be difficult to explain our not being on to the American public. The situation might be helped, he believed, if a well-known American, who had the confidence of the Congress, could be included in the top staff of the commission. He still thought that it would be best to have the United States represented directly, both from the standpoint of Congress and the efficiency of the commission. From the overall political viewpoint, however, he saw the Secretary's argument for a commission of small states.

The Secretary thought this was correct. He went on to say that in any case the economic side of the Korean operation would be separately organized, probably under American direction. Senator Lodge thought it would be desirable to have an American in this post so that he could go before the Congress to explain the Korean program. If that could be accomplished without including the United States on the commission, he believed that we would successfully break the back of the public reaction to our exclusion.

The Secretary emphasized the fact that there would be operating in Korea the United Nations Commander, an American; a director of reconstruction; and the proposed commission, whose chief job would be to bring about the political unification of Korea. He observed that some [difficulty?] might be anticipated as the result of the Republic of Korea's insistence that it was sovereign in the area. He forecast that the Republic would announce that its authority covered North Korea.

Mr. Dulles asked whether the commission would have any authority over military operations. Responding in the negative, Mr. Bancroft indicated that the most important people in Korea would continue to be the Unified Command and the Economic Director. Mr. Dulles was uncertain whether the commission would interpret its authority in such a way that the military and economic officers were the more important. He noted that the resolution appeared to give the commission rather broad authority. He hoped that the debate and legislative history of the Korean resolution would clarify the authority of the commission. The Secretary recalled that General MacArthur would continue in command and did not foresee that he would have any difficulty in dealing with the commission. Mr. Dulles thought, nevertheless, that some friction might develop. Mr. Allison pointed out that the theory of the resolution was that the commission should not really begin to operate or have any authority to intervene until the military operations in Korea were concluded.

Mr. Cohen felt on balance that the recommendation of the Department was the best of the alternatives, though he agreed, like the others, that it had some drawbacks. He foresaw a real problem with respect to the authority of the Commission over the Military Command. The greatest difficulty would not be as regards authority over the military command in cases where it could be shown that action was taken under the Security Council resolutions, but in cases where question arose as to the authority of the military, where the advice of the Commission would become important. If the military were simply keeping order, he doubted whether the Commission would be in a position to interfere. The more difficult problem was that of coordination; there he saw room for some friction. He agreed that it would be desirable to get an American to head up the economic operation.

Senator Lodge asked whether it was true that the Commission would be carrying out some rehabilitation. The Secretary referred to the terms of the resolution and noted that the Economic and Social Council would be responsible for general planning in this area. The Commission might give some political guidance to this work. Senator Lodge observed that the Congressional reaction would partly depend upon whether the Commission would be empowered to spend money or not. Mr. Cohen noted that from the viewpoint of good administration, we would want to keep the commission free from the detail necessarily involved in the economic operation. Senator Lodge asked how the reconstruction plans would be developed. Mr. Cohen assumed we would try to get our ideas accepted in the Economic and Social Council. The Secretary thought we would wish to have a single person to administer the relief operation.

Senator Cooper thought it would not be acceptable to anyone to include the Soviets on the new Korean Commission. He favored the alternative supported by the Secretary, and believed that the fact that General MacArthur would continue to head up the military opperation and that an American would probably be selected to direct the rehabilitation program would outweigh other considerations. The Commission would have to consult both, and in that way, the United States would undoubtedly be able to exercise great influence. He accordingly did not fear not having the United States represented on the Commission. Also, he wondered whether this position might not obviate our difficulties with the Republic of Korea. He thought it would be desirable to have Canada on the Commission; its membership would be helpful in creating confidence in this country in the Commission. Senator Lodge believed it would be unfortunate if after the magnificent effort in Korea, anyone could ever say that the affair had fizzled because we set up a commission which was not sufficient for the task before it. He hoped this was an imaginary rather than a real danger.

Senator Sparkman considered there was still another viewpoint to be taken into consideration. The American people were pretty well sold on the idea that Korea was a United Nations affair; that had been difficult at first, but now the idea that the United Nations was handling Korea had been accepted. We should be careful not to give the impression that the United Nations belonged to the United States. He rather believed that the establishment of the Commission, without the United States or Russia, as suggested, with the assurance that people were included who will lend vigor to it, would be the better part of wisdom in carrying on the idea of the United Nations rather than the United States acting in Korea. Senator Lodge agreed if we could get representatives with vigor.

Ambassador Gross saw the primary advantage of our not being on the Commission in the fact that, at least superficially, we would not be blamed for everything which happened. Nevertheless, he leaned toward putting the United States on the Commission or at least making itself available for service on the Commission at the will of our colleagues. We should be ready for service if wanted, but suggested the matter should be left in the hands of our colleagues. He was troubled by the fact that when India, in the Security Council, proposed a commission of non-permanent members, it had been done on the theory that small states were neutral and thus synonymous with disinterested parties. When a commission of this sort was established, it meant that almost no member had any interest in the subject as a matter of national policy so success would depend on the individuals which actually served on the Commission. He concluded from this that the major powers-particularly the United States-could not escape their responsibilities. If the Commission fell apart because of lack of interest from the small states represented on it, we would get the blame, since the world would realize that we had been the determining element in this situation.

The Secretary said that he had not supposed we would refuse to serve if there were a general demand for us, and the Russians were not included. Senator Sparkman agreed absolutely with Ambassador Gross. The Secretary stated that what he had in mind was that there was no chance of our membership without the Soviets. The moment our inclusion was suggested the Soviets would insist upon being put on; there would be a great sense of fright and there would result the compromise of including both. He referred to Ambassador Gross' remarks about the Indians, and said he had understood the Indians were being very cagey about their interest. Mr.-Bancroft indicated that India would not wish to be included if the United States were represented.

Ambassador Gross did not trust that judgment on India. The Indians were playing the situation both ways. India wanted to be on the Commission and to serve as its chairman. However, he agreed it was difficult to know just what the Indians really wanted. He did not think we should permit the Indian position to deter us from being on the Commission. He thought we should simply let our general willingness to serve, if wanted, be known. The Secretary observed that the resolution's sponsors did not want the United States on the Commission.

Mrs. Sampson² was concerned about the possible reaction of the American people. She said that she would like to see an attempt made to have the United States represented; she thought the majority of the United Nations members would like to see us on the Commission and that we belonged there.

With all due respect to the various views expressed, Mr. Ross considered that it was wishful thinking to try to set up a neutral commission, full of vigor, since all our experience with commissionsparticularly when the United States was not a member-despite promises made of good personnel, showed that they simply did not work out that way. He believed that so-called neutral commissions were weak and generally lacked good members. If there were a general desire for the United States to be included on the Commission, in his opinion that definitely entailed the risk of Soviet membership. In this connection, he recalled that the Soviets had proposed a commission composed of states bordering on Korea. Other members might well regard that position as a reasonable one and wish to give the Soviets a seat—there would be a good deal of sympathy for that position. Senator Lodge thought this showed disregard for the Russians' role as war criminals. Mr. Ross said he was certain that if the United States wished to be on the Commission it would increase the desire of some members to include the Soviets. He recommended as the course we should follow the adoption of a neutral slate as an indication of the slate we would be prepared to accept, but at the same time we would make clear that if there were a strong desire for us to serve, we would accept, but would be opposed to the inclusion of the Soviets.

Mr. Sandifer observed that there was a calculated risk in not having the United States represented. The Department thinking was that we had taken a large part in the conduct of hostilities, and that subsequent action in Korea should be shared by other members. The Department was also interested in obtaining as much leadership in Korea as possible from the Asian members, particularly India, possibly as its chairman. Mr. Sandifer noted that there might be a question with respect to India in view of the present Indian attitude, but it still seemed to him, if it was possible to work it out, that it was desirable to have India, and that it would be the logical chairman. He observed that there was always a difficulty in getting states to appoint capable people to United Nations bodies. This had been especially true of the Korean Commission. India had not had an effective member. and neither had Turkey or the Philippines. The Department had thought it important to have a responsible state from Latin America; El Salvador had not delivered on the old Commission. When everything was balanced, he sympathized with Mr. Ross and Ambassador Gross, but felt almost bound to take the risk of not having the United States included, and to rely on our influence through the Unified Command and the Economic Director. He indicated that the Department's tentative thinking on the latter problem was in the terms suggested by the Secretary of a single United Nations administrator for the economic side of the operation. This could solve a very considerable part of the problem. The success of the Korean operation required responsible participation by other members, particularly by the neighbors of Korea.

The Secretary suggested that the matter be left in such a way as to make clear our determination to have a vigorous commission. The United States would be willing and glad to serve on such a commission if that was the desire of the members, but we were not seeking membership. We were absolutely opposed to any Russian or satellite being represented, and if any member felt considering membership for the United States required Russian inclusion, we would make it clear that we did not desire membership under that condition. We should do it in that way so as not to appear coy.

Senator Lodge observed that a rough test for the success of the Commission would be whether we could get a unified Korea. In the event we did not obtain a vigorous commission and it looked as if we were not getting anywhere, he wondered whether we had enough influence through General MacArthur and the "almighty dollar" to take care of the situation. The Secretary did not believe we could guarantee anything. The Commission would not provide the whole answer to the Korean problem. A good commission could do a lot to help, and a poor one could do some harm. An intermediate one would not do much either way.

Mr. Dulles thought that one of the practical problems would involve the relations between the Commission and General MacArthur. He foresaw the possibility of a frightful row between the two, if India, for example, was on the Commission, insisting upon policies which disagreed with what General MacArthur considered to be sound. The same situation might arise with the Philippines; in this connection Mr. Dulles recalled his attempt to get General MacArthur to permit Romulo to come either to Tokyo or Korea, which the General vehemently resisted because of the Baguio Conference and other matters. There had also been difficulties with Australia in the past; the Secretary commented that in that case it had been the individual involved. Mr. Dulles hoped the change in the Australian Government might improve that situation, though this had not yet been sufficiently tested to be sure what would happen. He thought that it would be unfortunate to have any clash between the new Commission and the Unified Command. He hoped everything would be done to make sure that there was a chance for their working together in harmony.

Mr. Cohen thought that if we could arrange to substitute Canada for one of the other states on the Commission and, by talking to Mr. Pearson, make clear that we were depending upon Canada to send their ablest man as representative, some of our difficulties could be met. Mr. Dulles suggested a Canadian chairman would be helpful, and Mr. Cohen concurred.

Senator Lodge did not want to hear the criticism that America had won the war but once again lost the peace. If we considered the choice of this Commission in the abstract, we might get into trouble. He believed it should be hand-picked so that we would know what we were getting. In his view this matter was as important in its way as the June 25 resolution had been with respect to the military aspect of the matter. Senator Cooper asked whether we might not insist on countries appointing able, well-known individuals; this would provide some insurance against the Commission's failure.

The Secretary asked when this matter would come to the vote. Mr. Bancroft replied this afternoon. He observed that Canada did not wish to serve on the Commission. Mr. Raynor suggested that we might talk to Mr. Pearson; he noted that Canada wished to see the Commission weighted with Asian states. Mr. Popper pointed out the difficulty of including both Australia and Canada. The Secretary said that he would speak to Mr. Pearson this morning to ascertain the Canadian reaction. Mr. Bancroft noted that it would be important also to determine the sentiment toward United States membership; if that was unanimously opposed by the sponsors of the resolution, there was nothing we could do.

Mr. Lubin said that, as regards the rehabilitation administrator, it had been tentatively thought that if we did not get a qualified American, we should look for a Canadian. He suggested this factor should be borne in mind in connection with consideration of Canada for membership on the Commission. Ambassador Gross thought someone on the Delegation should speak to the Secretary General about the necessity for including top-flight personnel on the staff of the Commission.

The Secretary said that it seemed to him that there was in the Delegation some strong feeling that the United States should be included on the Commission but at the same time there was an equally strong feeling that this should not be at the price of the inclusion of the Soviets or a satellite. Mr. Dulles agreed to this latter point, subject to the qualification that a strong commission could be established without the United States.

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

SECRET

[Washington,] October 3, 1950—10:30 a.m.

The present status regarding London's 1934 of October 3 follows:

- 1. At the Department's request this message was relayed to General MacArthur for information by the Department of Defense at 8:30 this morning. Captain Murdaugh is calling it to the urgent attention of the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff.
 - 2. Our Watch Officer repeated it to GA Del.
- 3. S/S is sending it to the President in his noon batch of important telegrams.
- 4. I have drafted a short Niact telegram to Loy Henderson asking for any further details and instructing him to point out to Bajpai the "inadmissible" character of the Chinese Communist threat.1
- 5. Park Armstrong arranged early this morning for an urgent query to Tokyo regarding this morning's AP radio report of a 100mile column, including artillery, stretching from Manchuria across the Yalu River into North Korea. The Telecon this morning has nothing on this point.
- 6. The telegram was discussed at Mr. Webb's 9:30 meeting which I attended. I expressed my belief that we should treat it with extreme seriousness and not discount it as a bluff. I also expressed concern over the lack of clarity in General MacArthur's outstanding orders in the present circumstances. My impression is that the majority present were inclined to regard it as a bluff pending more information. It was agreed that:
- (a) Before sending an evaluation of the report to the President, we should await confirmation from New Delhi and further information concerning the radio troop column report.

(b) This development should be urgently discussed in New York with the principal other Delegations concerned. I understand Doc 2 will discuss this with Jack Hickerson.

(c) This development should be urgently discussed at a high level with the Pentagon, which Doc will institute via the established General Burns channel.

Memorandum by the Deputy Director of the Office of Northeast Asian Affairs (Johnson) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] October 3, 1950.

Subject: Threat of Chinese Intervention in Korean Conflict.

Reference London's 1934 of October 3. Although the statement attributed to Chou En-lai undoubtedly contains a large element of bluff directed at forestalling decisive action on the UK resolution on Korea, I do not feel that we can assume it is entirely bluff.

For reasons which are not clear, unfortunately General MacArthur has not thus far committed across the 38th parallel any UN forces. If he had done so, the position vis-á-vis the Chinese would be much stronger. It appears that he may be testing ROK forces north of 38 with the thought that it might not be militarily necessary to commit UN forces north of the 38th. We are not openly committed to the use of UN forces across the 38th and it may, therefore, be well worthwhile further to explore the possibility of using entirely ROK forces for the subjugation of North Korea, of course, continuing our present logistic and tactical Air and Naval support, thus maintaining the UN umbrella. This would maintain the UN umbrella over the operation while reducing the grave risk of calling the Chinese bluff. Although this would extend de facto ROK control over North Korea, I do not think we would encounter serious difficulty in restraining Rhee from extending de jure control until the UN machinery had operated. While occupation by exclusively ROK units would be much more sanguinary than we had hoped, the UN Commission and American advisors attached to the ROK units should be able to exercise some restraining influence. This also has the added advantage of avoiding the great complexities of carrying out genuine UN occupation of North Korea.

I suggest that you recommend to Mr. Matthews that we immediately request Defense to ascertain (1) what General MacArthur's present intentions are with regard to the use of UN forces north of 38 and (2) his assessment of the capabilities of ROK troops to carry out this operation.

Although Chinese Communists, like Soviets, have consistently ignored UN character of operations Korea and although Indian Ambassador Peking may be convenient channel to communicate Chinese Communist views to US and other western powers, Embassy surprised that message of such serious nature as that contained London's 1934 to Department not conveyed more directly to UN or US as case may be. British Embassy concurs our speculation that Chou En-lai's statements to Panikkar may be last minute Chinese attempt to play upon Indian apprehension to point where maximum profit for China and USSR can be salvaged from North Korean reverses.

708. Full text important Chou En-lai statement October 1 1 not yet available here as NCNA English text still not released and Chinese text was published in local press with many characters missing in crucial sections.

Consulate General's initial impression based on incomplete accounts available is that Chou's saber-rattling probably intended primarily to present Communist Government as champion of Chinese (and Asian) nationalism and solidify public support behind its pro-USSR and anti-US policy. Maximum of public support is essential for sacrifices involved in building modern military machine which is basic aim of Communist program. Chou's reference to "prolonged war of resistance" by "Korean people" implies no early change in balance of military force in Korea such as would result from large-scale participation of PLA despite warning that China would not stand aside "should imperialism wantonly invade territory of neighbor".

Further comments on statement will be deferred until full text available for study.²

(China Monthly Review (November 1950), p. 103)

² Telegram 723, October 5, from Hong Kong, not printed, stated that a careful reading of the full text of Chou's statement confirmed the impression expressed in telegram 708. It went on to say that the most likely interpretation of the statement that China would not "supinely tolerate seeing their neighbours being savagely invaded by imperialists" was that the North Koreans could count on the Chinese Communists for diplomatic support and material assistance for their continued armed resistance to the forces of the United Nations. The Secretary of Defense (Marshall) to the Secretary of State

Washington, October 3, 1950.

Dear Mr. Secretary: The Department of Defense has considered the memoranda of 16 September 1950 and 22 September 1950 from Deputy Under Secretary of State Matthews to Major General J. H. Burns, dealing with matters relating to the termination of Korean hostilities.

The Department of Defense perceives no objection, from the military point of view, to those matters, in both of the letters, which are primarily within its purview. From the standpoint of execution by the field command, the proposals in these memoranda are entirely feasible and practicable.

With regard to the "Program for the Cessation of Hostilities," the Department of Defense notes the effort of the Department of State to gain as favorable a reception as possible in the General Assembly for all parts of this program, and is in accord therewith. The Department of Defense would like to offer for your consideration the following suggestions, which are based on study and comment by the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force:

1) A provision might be included in paragraph A for the reorientation of captured North Korean troops before their return to their homes in North Korea, insofar as this is practicable in view of local conditions. It is important to our long-term objectives, in accordance with paragraph 22 of NSC 81/1, to render these troops as politically harmless as possible and to rehabilitate the majority of them for reliable service in the post-hostilities period.

2) U.S. planning should allow for the possibility that North Korean civil authorities may not be able or willing to maintain law and order north of the 38°, pending the assumption of control by the Government of the Republic of Korea. In case of a complete breakdown of authority in areas north of the 38°, the U.N. forces should be prepared to assume direct responsibility for civil affairs.

3) In the light of the contingency mentioned in paragraph 2, and the responsibilities that may fall upon the United Nations' Command, the U.S. Government should seek the immediate creation of adequate U.N. organizations to handle the tremendous problems that will follow hostilities. It would appear that the present U.N. Commission for Korea is neither staffed nor equipped to meet all these problems. Therefore, the U.N. should create either one single combined or three separate agencies to handle the three major problems of relief and reconstruction, political unification, and the immediate and long-range security of Korea.

4) Paragraph 5B of the Program makes reference, by implication, to the possibility of war criminal trials. It is questionable whether the U.S. should commit itself to trying war criminals without the most careful consideration of the situation since, in any case, the real war criminals will not be reachable by any judicial process.

I wish to state, in conclusion, that the Department of Defense continues to believe that as few U.S. troops as possible should engage in the physical occupation and pacification of areas north of the 38°, once organized military hostilities have ended. It remains important, therefore, to increase the number of other U.N. troops sent to Korea, particularly from countries in Asia.

Faithfully yours,

G. MARSHALL

Draft Paper Prepared in the Department of the Army 1

SECRET PRIORITY [Washington,] October 3, 1950.

This radio is in two parts:

Part 1—General concept for occupation of North Korea. The purpose of the occupation will be to establish peace and security so that the Koreans themselves may solve the Korean problem. The occupation forces will not impose on the North Korean peoples a complete administration of government. However, it will be necessary to establish a substitute for the central government and also to establish and maintain supervision and controls over Korean de facto provincial and local governments.

Three phases are envisaged in this occupation. The first phase will begin with the fact of occupation and will last until guerrilla activities have been reduced to the point that they are no longer a major concern. The second phase will commence at the end of the first phase and will continue until national elections have been held. The third phase will commence when national elections have been held and the Republic of Korea has assumed responsibility.

During the first phase, conditions of security will be paramount and governmental actions will be limited largely to provision of relief and minimum assistance, the establishment and maintenance of law and order and the initial establishment or reactivation of de facto local and provincial governments. During the second phase, military security will be a matter of secondary concern and normal political and economic activity under the guidance of the United Nations Commission will be encouraged to the utmost. During the third phase, the United Republic of Korea will assume authority and all United Nations troops other than those required for the security of the country will be withdrawn.

It is contemplated that throughout the first phase the Commanding General of the Unified Command of the United Nations will be the supreme authority in North Korea subject only to control by the United Nations and the United States Government as their executive agent. During the second phase the Commanding General will retain complete authority as stated above but will, nevertheless, give the utmost consideration to the advice and recommendation of the United Nations Commission or Commissions so far as they do not interfere with military security. During the third phase the Commanding General will be responsible only for the military security of the forces under his command to the extent that such forces remain in North Korea.

Part 2—Proposed Directive. Quoted below is a proposed directive for your civil affairs activities in North Korea. State has concurred. Request your comments to include not only amendments but additional matters which should be covered.

"1. Purpose

It is the purpose of this directive to prescribe the broad policies which will govern the conduct of your occupation as the United Nations Commander-in-Chief and Military Governor of that part of Korea which lies North of the 38th Parallel (hereafter referred to as "North Korea").

2. Mission

You will occupy North Korea in the name of and as trustee for the United Nations. It shall be your primary duty to so administer your occupation as to facilitate public order, economic rehabilitation and the democratic mode of life in the area and to prepare the way for the unification of the free and independent Korea.

3. Command

The United Nations, through such agencies as may be designated by it, is the supreme authority over the occupation of North Korea. The Joint Chiefs of Staff of the United States have been designated as the executive agency through which you will receive your instructions and to which you will report. The Joint Chiefs of Staff will issue such interim and emergency instructions and guidance as are necessary in the interpretation or in the absence of the United Nations directives. Within the policies established by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, you will issue such implementary directives and orders as required for the fulfillment of your mission.

4. Relationships

a. The United Nations will establish in Korea one or more agencies to observe, advise and assist in the accomplishment of the United Nations objectives for a unified Korea. You will, to the extent permitted by your mission, give these agencies full cooperation and support and will follow their advice and recommendation so far as possible. You are not, however, subject to their direct jurisdiction.

b. In order to afford the individual nations of the United Nations opportunity to participate in the reconstruction, reorientation and rehabilitation of the area and subject to such controls as will permit you to coordinate their action or as are necessary for reasons of military securement or operation, anthority to enter and operate in the area will be granted by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, subject to your concurrence.

c. While the Republic of Korea has been recognized as the sole legally constituted government in Korea, its sovereignty over that part of the country North of the 38th Parallel has not been generally recognized. Although you are not authorized to recognize such sovereignty, it is desirable that in matters of national scope you consult with the Republic of Korea to facilitate eventual unification.

d. The Department of State will designate the American Ambassador to the Republic of Korea as your political advisor of North Korea in addition to his other duties. He will perform the normal functions of a political advisor with respect to your operations in North Korea.

5. General

All policies set forth hereinafter and all policies which you shall establish shall be so interpreted and implemented as to change as little as possible the conditions which you find when you enter North Korea. Land reform measures, nationalization and socialization of industries and similar matters having a serious impact upon individuals should be left in status quo. Any change should be made by the Korean people themselves after the unification has been accomplished, or on the firm recommendations of the United Nations Commissions. Similarly, your participation in the government of North Korea will be limited to the minimum necessary to assure law and order and tranquility. Any amendments or repeals of laws existing at the time of your entry will be limited to those necessary from the standpoint of military security and the success of your mission, or those recommended by the United Nations Commissions.

6. Governmental Organization

You will dissolve the Democratic Peoples Republic of Korea, its supporting communist party and all other subversive and totalitarian groups inimical to the occupation. You will not create a central government for North Korea other than as a part of your occupational control machinery. It is desirable that, to the extent practicable, native government be retained or reestablished at the local and provincial levels. You are authorized to retain, remove or appoint such officials, either native or United Nations, on all levels of government as you deem desirable and to make such changes in the political organization of the area as best to serve the occupational mission and to facilitate eventual unification.

7. Rights of Individuals

The mere fact that an individual is or was a member of the armed forces of the North Korean government, an official of that government or any local government or a member of any political party will not subject him to prosecution or reprisal and will not, by that reason alone, bar him from office or employment. You will apprehend and hold for trial by appropriate international tribunals, in accordance with the rules and customs of war and the precedents of the war crimes trials in Germany and Japan, all persons who are or may be charged with war crimes or crimes against humanity.

8. Economy

You will supply relief and assistance in goods and services in accordance with your judgment bearing in mind both United States humanitarian purposes and the desirability of dissemination of information through the entire world as to the promptness and effectiveness of United Nations relief. You will coordinate any additional relief, rehabilitation or assistance of other agencies which are authorized to function within the area. In your activities in connection with communications, transportation, health, welfare, reeducation, reorientation, taxation, banking, refugees and in all other proper and pertinent fields of endeavor, you will consult freely with the Republic of Korea, the various United Nations Commissions, and appropriate departments and agencies of the United States.

9. Jurisdiction

You will determine to what extent and for what purposes civilian representatives of United States and United Nations governmental agencies will be subject to North Korea jurisdiction or to the jurisdiction of tribunals established by you. Your determination of these matters will be transmitted to the United Nations for the approval of that body and thereafter all such personnel entering North Korea will thereupon be subject to such jurisdiction.

10. Control Organization

It is desired that so far as it is practicable, your occupational headquarters shall be separated from your tactical command; that it minimize the use of military personnel; that the maximum number of members from all friendly United Nations be utilized; that there be a minimum of United States and Republic of Korea personnel; and that it be susceptible without major reorganization to transfer in toto to a non-military agency, either of the United States or of the United Nations.

11. Re-education and Re-orientation

You will initiate and conduct an intensive re-education and reorientation program designed to establish in the people of North Korea the capability of choosing their own destiny and to expedite the unification of Korea under a freely elected government. This program will make maximum use of United Nations guidance and facilities.²

An amended draft was sent to General MacArthur on October 9, in telegram WAR 93721, not printed, for his guidance and comment. For the final text of the directive as sent to General MacArthur, see telegram 256, October 28, 7 p. m., to Seoul, p. 1007.

The Ambassador in the Netherlands (Chapin) to the Secretary of State

SECRET NIACT THE HAGUE, October 3, 1950—6 p. m. [Received October 3—5:54 p. m.]

490. Secretary-General Boon gave me today résumé all recent cables from Dutch Chargé Peking bearing Korean situation. Explained while no date fixed therein this most recent information and based largely Panikkar's observation although checked by Dutch language officers with such sources as still available. Boon believed reports correct although inclined believe might be some bluffing.

"(1) Chou En-lai said private conversation China would fight in case 38th Parallel were crossed; when pointed out events UNO-Assembly and SC seemed indicate more favorable tendency towards China and event war with USA Chinese industrial resources and equipment especially Manchuria bound be completely destroyed, Chou En-lai insisted China had defended herself against 'further aggression' by USA; crossing 38th would be considered such.

"(2) Chief of Staff Chinese Army private conversation made statement China no choice but fight if 38th Parallel crossed; although realized war with USA would set back China's development 50 years or more, Chief of Staff opinion if no resistance offered this time, China would forever be under American control.

"(3) Furthermore learned from Peking, Nehru cable personal message Mao stating: (a) Great Britain, France and US decided New York 38th Parallel would not be crossed until after matter been discussed UNO. (b) India against crossing 38th Parallel by military forces. (c) India bringing much pressure as possible on UK prevent crossings".

Boon said telegram appreciation foregoing information that moment in from Peking high points of which he translated allowing me take notes.

Dutch Chargé convinced Peking Government does not want war but there real danger in moment panic Chinese Communists might precipitate situation if our forces cross 38th and penetrate deeply Korea. Known Chinese Communists have approximately one million their best troops Manchuria. Dutch Chargé reports it clear Panikkar himself fellow traveler or highly sympathetic Chinese Communist regime and cited Panikkar quoted as evidence US determined, war-like course that it had retained service Matthews as Secretary Navy after "preventive war" speech.¹ Panikkar stated US promises it would withdraw troops Korea soon as stable government established all very well but not convincing and Dutch Chargé inclined however believe as Boon indicated (first paragraph this cable) some this belligerent Communist China attitude bluff although Chinese Communist feeling toward US still intensely bitter largely because arms, ammunition furnished Chiang Kai-shek during and after Chinese civil war.

Boon referred statement made me yesterday by Stikker that Indian delegation Lake Success at first strongly endorsed crossing 38th Parallel and UK peace proposals but when matter referred Nehru there had been complete about face. This would seem in line with numbered paragraph (3) above. Boon also made interesting statement he knewfor fact Panikkar had in June strongly advised Nehru have India oppose UN declaration of North Koreans as aggressors but that particular case his message due communications difficulties arrived subsequent positive action Indian delegation Lake Success on Nehru's instructions. In almost every other case, said Boon, Nehru accepted Panikkar's advice as against that of Benegal Rau.

Boon emphasized above information must be closely guarded since if any leak occurred, sources information would dry up completely.

Am not repeating this any other post.

Memorandum of Conversations, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] October 4, 1950.

Subject: Korean Operations

Participants: Sir Oliver Franks—British Ambassador Lord Arthur W. Tedder—British Embassy Dean Rusk—Assistant Secretary of State

Sir Oliver Franks called me at the office last night and asked if I could drop out to see him and Lord Tedder. He preferred not to come to the Department at that unusual hour in order not to arouse speculation if the press happened to get hold of it.

When I arrived at the Embassy, the British Ambassador, Lord Tedder and Mr. Graves were going over some telegrams from London. Their immediate concern was to provide the answers to some questions which London had raised on a most urgent basis about the operations in Korea. The Ambassador pointed out that he did not wish to raise any questions of policy nor to indicate that any difference of opinion existed, but merely wished to know how to reply to the specific questions on which London wished answers. He had no indication of what London might think about the matters involved.

The first question was whether South Korean forces are in fact north of the 38th parallel and whether they went north of the parallel in pursuance to a directive from the Unified Command. I replied that our information is that South Korean forces are in fact north of the 38th parallel along the east coast, that this advance had not penetrated initially as far as the first press reports had indicated, but that I did not know how rapidly they were moving and could not say exactly where they are. I stated further that I did not have precise information as to whether these forces crossed the parallel in pursuance to a specific directive from the Unified Command but that I supposed they were operating under general pursuit directives from the Unified Command.

The second question was whether any United Nations forces other than South Koreans were north of the 38th parallel. I replied that our present information is that no United Nations ground forces other than South Koreans are beyond the 38th parallel, that considerable resistance has been encountered by American forces between Seoul and the parallel, but that air and naval operations north of the 38th parallel were continuing and that raiding and demolition parties might of course be going ashore at any time as they had been throughout the operations.²

The third question was whether it is the United States view that operations by General MacArthur north of the 38th parallel are covered by the Security Council Resolution of June 27. I stated that we considered military operations by General MacArthur north of the 38th parallel to be covered by the June 27 Resolution, that there is a hostile army in the field which is still shooting at United Nations forces, that this army continues to operate throughout South Korea wherever it can do so, that it has refused to disgorge its American prisoners of war, and that it shows every indication of continuing the fight. In this circumstance we consider it militarily necessary for General MacArthur to continue the fight in whatever way seems appropriate to him and the 38th parallel would not itself impose a barrier, I stated, however, that we did not consider the June 27 Resolution in itself to represent a broad political-military objective looking toward the occupation of all of Korea for the purpose of bringing about a particular political result. This, we thought, would follow from further United Nations action of the sort now being considered by Committee 1.

¹ROK patrols crossed the 38th parallel on September 30, and the ROK army advanced past the frontier in strength during the next two days. On October 3, General MacArthur made the first public official announcement of the crossing of the parallel. (Appleman, South to the Naktong, North to the Yalu, p. 615)

The final question was whether General MacArthur had received instructions to go north of the 38th parallel and the nature of these instructions. The telegram from the Foreign Office stated that Gascoigne (UK) in Tokyo 3 had been informed by General MacArthur that he was under strict instructions not to operate north of the 38th parallel without a specific directive from the President. Sir Oliver then said he thought that I ought to know that he knew about certain plans which were in existence for execution within a "finite time", and that he was not clear how Gascoigne's report and this information fitted together. He outlined the content of such plans sufficiently to make it evident that he had received excellent information, although he did not disclose the source or the channel. I told him that General MacArthur had received an operational policy directive which permitted operations north of the 38th parallel, that he had been asked to refer his plans for such operations back to Washington for approval in order that Washington could take a good look at the situation in the United Nations and the Russian and Chinese aspects before the plans were executed. I told him that General MacArthur had submitted such plans and that he had been given general approval although I could not tell him whether it would be necessary for General MacArthur to get a final word from Washington before carrying out his plans. I told him this was a matter of ignorance on my part since the matter had been handled on a very high level while I was in New York, but I reminded him that the President and the Joint Chiefs of Staff exercised continuing responsibility and supervision for the source [course] of operations in Korea.

Sir Oliver stated that he thought the information I had provided would be helpful to London and would give them something to "chew" on pending the arrival of Mr. Bevin and Mr. Dening on Wednesday. I told Sir Oliver I felt that Mr. Dening had very considerable background on these matters which I had given him in New York and which would be most useful to the Foreign Office upon Mr. Dening's arrival.

Sir Oliver then asked me whether I could give him any further information on Wednesday morning on the particular point as to whether General MacArthur requires any further check with Washington before carrying out his plans. I told him that I would let him hear from me on Wednesday morning.

4 October 4.

³ Alvary Gascoigne, U.K. Political Representative in Japan.

After talking the above over with Mr. Matthews, I called the British—Ambassador on the morning of October 5 [4?] and told him—

(1) We do not know whether the South Koreans moved north of the 38th Parallel on specific order of the Unified Command but presumed the South Koreans had a general pursuit directive and that the Unified Command was responsible for their operations whether a specific directive was issued or not.

(2) We do not know whether General MacArthur would be required to make a last minute check with Washington before moving north of the 38th Parallel with United Nations forces, but that Washington was following the situation on a day-to-day basis; in any event, it might be useful for Lord Tedder to have a talk with General Bradley, to which the Ambassador agreed.

Minutes of the Thirteenth Meeting of the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET

New York, October 4, 1950-9:15 a.m.

1. Composition of Korean Commission

Mr. Ross reported that our slate was somewhat "unhooked". While Pearson had been personally inclined to accept a place for Canada, St. Laurent had refused on the basis that this was predominantly an Asian problem, although if India were not included, Canada might accept. It now appeared that India was not willing to participate in the Commission. There was still a possibility of adding India, Canada and Brazil to the six states now on the slate. Mr. Rusk had thought that it might be appropriate for the Secretary to talk to Sir B. N. Rau with respect to Indian membership, and a question had also been raised as to whether any further attempt to put pressure on the Canadians to accept membership should be made. It now appeared that Australia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Turkey, and Chile were definitely slated, and probably the Netherlands, although Romulo yesterday had begun to push Indonesia and the Dutch had drawn back. Mr. Ross thought it would be premature to give Indonesia such an assignment.

The Secretary thought it would be difficult for him to talk to the Indian Delegation; India believed that crossing the 38th parallel had been a mistake and was not now willing to share in the projected Korean effort. We had at least tried to get them to accept a seat on the Commission. Mr. Dulles was not inclined to press the Indians further. If India were included, he believed that the Commission would become a general forum for the discussion of Asian problems, and it was also important that India had not gone along with us in the committee.

After noting that six members were included on the commission, Mr. Dulles asked if it might not be better to have an odd number. Ambassador Austin believed this made little difference. The Secretary inquired whether it would be possible for the First Committee to report out a six-member commission and for the plenary to add others. Mr. Ross said this had been done in other cases. The Secretary thought this course would be preferable to anything which would mean holding up committee action. We could communicate this view to others, and perhaps this morning also talk further with the Canadians and with the United Kingdom, and perhaps India. The Secretary inquired what position we should take if Indonesia desired a place on the Commission. Mr. Ross thought we should agree, but Ambassador Austin did not like the idea at all; we wanted a strong constructive commission, and Indonesia would be a weak spot, exposing the Commission to vacillation and delay. Mr. Raynor suggested that if Canada were adamant in its refusal to serve. New Zealand might be considered. The Secretary agreed. He thought we should not favor Indonesia; we should conclude negotiations on the present slate, possibly adding India or New Zealand or Brazil, or all three later on.

Senator Lodge referred to a conversation which he had with Anne O'Hare McCormick 2 who felt it would be desirable to have some states from the Far East represented on the Commission. Mr. Thurston suggested Burma as a possibility; the Burmese delegate had made a constructive speech in the committee. The Secretary asked about Thailand. Ambassador Austin stated that the Republic of Korea had proposed Thailand and the Philippines. Senator Lodge thought it would be good politics to include a state from the Far East; Mr. Cohen concurred. Ambassador Gross remarked that neither India nor Pakistan, as he recalled, had recognized the Republic of Korea; their inclusion might embark the Commission on a course of mischief making. Referring to India, Mr. Bancroft said that the sponsors had wanted it and the Indian Delegation had requested instructions from Delhi; he thought we should simply sit back and let the Indian situation develop. The Secretary agreed that if India had been asked to serve that was enough for now. Otherwise he believed Thailand or another state in the area might be added.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] October 4, 1950.

Subject: Chinese Communist Threat of Intervention in Korea

Reference: CA memorandum of September 27, 1950, "Chinese Communist Intentions"

The following additional thoughts are offered respecting the Chinese Communist threat of intervention in Korea.

Note in the complete message received from the British Chargé d'Affaires at Peking, as provided by the British Embassy in Washington,¹ that: Chou En-lai summoned Panikkar at 0010 hours local time, October 3, thus indicating urgency; Chou En-lai referred to "American" armed forces crossing the 38th; and Chou while stating that Peiping was prepared to accept the Indian Government's position re Korea as set forth by Nehru in his September 26 [30] press conference,² said further that China would accept no settlement of the Korea question to which China was not a party.

The Chou En-lai démarche cannot safely be regarded as mere bluff, although (1) made after presumed receipt by Mao Tse-tung of message from Nehru stating 38th parallel would not be crossed until after UN discussion* and (2) designed admirably to support the Soviet resolution in UN. His démarche must be regarded as having been made with foreknowledge and support of USSR. The political and military stakes are considerable, and Moscow and Peiping may be prepared to take considerable risks.

If China and USSR are prepared now to accept the danger of clash with UN in Korea, that means that they are prepared to risk the danger of World War III, and feel ready to meet that danger, given present comparative military strengths. In such case, we cannot avoid danger either by retreating from it or by surrendering to the Peiping threat: either move would increase, not diminish, the danger inherent in the situation for us.3

Acceptance of either the Soviet proposition, or the Chou dictum that China must be party to any agreement affecting Korea, would obviously vitiate any arrangements for settlement of the Korean affair and rob the UN allies of fruits of their effort. The danger offered by North Korea in the first instance would thus continue in being. In the light of all of the circumstances neither Peiping's nor Moscow's suggestion seems to merit sympathetic consideration. The problem is, however, not one which, for reasons of either UN procedure or political expediency, we should endeavor to solve alone. Especially in view of the possible dangers inherent in the situation, we should proceed only with due regard to (1) our military position in the global field and (2) the political and military positions of our friends. We should continue to advance against the enemy in the world theater, but in the theater in question we should advance only if it is in accord with our own best interests and we have the general support of our UN allies. It would seem now that the North Koreans do not intend to surrender; at the best, therefore, we can evidently expect only (1) a costly military campaign, complicated by guerrilla warfare (as suggested in publicity in both Moscow and Peiping), during a time when our military forces perhaps had better be disposed elsewhere; (2) a likewise costly process of rehabilitation of sometime enemy economy; and (3) a possible further exacerbation of relations with hypersensitive and already embittered, xenophobic Orientals.

The Indian position should be taken into consideration. Conviction is best brought home to the Indians by maneuvers of the Chinese Communists and Soviet UN representatives themselves. It is evident that India itself desires a viable solution of the problem. It seems appropriate and politically desirable, particularly, to give full consideration to the Indian point of view (which is in any event so much closer to our own than the Russian) in these respects: (1) General MacArthur's surrender order could now be supported by a new order which, without repeating the demand to surrender, could give the Korean Communists a time limit of 10 or 15 days in which to accede to that surrender order and (2) the Indians could be asked to set forth on their own initiative concrete proposals respecting the procedure for unification of Korea and post-war rehabilitation of the country. Both of those aims have the support in principle of Sir Benegal Rau. If the Indian delegation is given more responsibility for working on the problem, they may be more respectful of our own position. Taking due note of Chou En-lai's exception in favor of the South Korean forces, an attempt might first be made to deal with the matter through use of the South Korean forces alone north of the 38th: after all, General Walker did state that the backbone of the North Korean army had been broken (although current intelligence does not quite bear this out). It would cost little as an experiment, but of course strong hopes should not be attached to such an experiment.

Apart from the political problem of getting India's support, procedure had best be based upon the majority position. The recommendations of Australian Foreign Minister Spender have much merit, but UN movement into North Korea should be on the basis of the consideration that the Chinese Communists might in fact intervene with armed force, and that if they did so intervene, the USSR might likewise intervene, and that the hostilities might not in such case be limited to Korea.

As practical steps it is recommended that (1) an urgent check be made through the Embassy at The Hague to get more details, if feasible, on the reason for Stikker's estimating that a major Chinese Communist military move was in the offing, (2) our missions at strategic points in different parts of the world be informed of the Chinese Communist démarche, its possible implications, and asked to report urgently any untoward developments which have recently come to their attention which might be relevant, (3) a close check be made on current movements and activities of Soviet Embassy personnel in Washington.

In view of the pertinency in this connection of NSC 81/1,⁵ new consideration to the problem in point is perhaps merited. In any event, however, our action in the present circumstances should be moulded to the framework of the UN—and we should advance and fulfill our obligations to the UN in accordance with the majority will. It is fitting, however, that if the task is to increase in size, our UN friends bear a more proportionate share of the burden.

⁴ In a statement before the First Committee on October 3, Mr. Spender, while rejecting the claim of the Republic of Korea to be the sole executive authority for all of Korea, said that U.N. forces must cross the 38th parallel to destroy the North Korean aggressor and prepare the way for a unified Korea under the auspices of the proposed U.N. Commission for Korea (U.N. document A/C.1/SR. 350).

1978. Prompted by concern over danger possible Chinese intervention in Korea following statement to Panikkar by Chinese Communist Foreign Secretary (Embtel 1934 to Department, repeated Moscow 67, New Delhi 46) Bevin has cabled Foreign Office from Queen Mary recommending that Franks and Younger consult urgently with US Government with view to a statement being made in course of General Assembly debate on Korea which will have the dual purpose of discouraging China from intervention and offering China prospect of being heard. Bevin states that if US agreeable he is prepared to have UK delegate propose hearing of Peking Government on Korean resolution. Message came somewhat garbled. Foreign Office interprets it to mean that proposed statement should be made by US in current debate in Political Committee and thereafter UK delegate should propose that Chinese Communists be given hearing if this can be arranged without undue delay.

Subsequent telegram from Bevin directs Foreign Office to inform me of suggested action and to convey message from Douglas to Acheson that unless there are factors of which he is unaware Douglas considers this action should deprive China of any excuse for military intervention in Korea without producing compensating unfortunate result. Armed intervention by China would be a great catastrophe.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. John M. Allison of the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET

[New York,] October 4, 1950.

Subject: Chinese Communist Participation in Korean Debate

Participants: The Honorable Kenneth Younger, M.P., Head of

United Kingdom Delegation

Sir Gladwyn Jebb, United Kingdom Delegation

Secretary Acheson

Mr. John M. Allison, United States Delegation

Mr. Younger requested an urgent interview this afternoon to make known the contents of a priority message just received from Mr. Bevin, on the Queen Mary, expressing his concern over possible Chinese Communist action in Korea and instructing Mr. Younger to get the personal opinion of the Secretary as to the desirability of making some statement in the course of the Korean debate for the purpose of discouraging Communist China from intervention and giving it a prospect of being heard. Mr. Younger said that his instructions were that if the United States was agreeable the United Kingdom Delegation would be prepared to propose or second a resolution giving the Peiping Government the hearing on the Korean matter. Mr. Younger pointed out that obviously when Mr. Bevin had sent the message he did not realize how far advanced the Korean debate had progressed. The Secretary stated that in his opinion it was too late now to raise the question of bringing in the Chinese Communists and that if such an attempt was made it would only serve to confuse the issue, would delay passage of the Korean resolution and might well endanger the lives of American and British troops now in Korea. The Secretary further pointed out that while he agreed there was a risk in going ahead in view of the Chinese Communists position as conveyed to the Indian Ambassador in Peiping, nevertheless there had been risk from the beginning and at present he believed a greater risk would be incurred by showing hesitation and timidity. The Secretary pointed out that the Chinese Communists were themselves taking no risk in as much as their private talks to the Indian Ambassador could be disavowed, that they had not made any statement directly to the United Nations or to the Unified Command and if they wanted to take part in the "poker game" they would have to put more on the table than they had up to the present. The Secretary further explained that forces were in motion and plans were being made and that the Unified Command after a period of regrouping would be advancing into North Korea and that it was too late now to stop this process. In the Secretary's opinion the only proper course to take was a firm and courageous one and that we should not be unduly frightened at what was probably a Chinese Communist bluff.

The Secretary admitted that the Chinese Communists did have legitimate interests in certain aspects of the Korean problem such as questions affecting power plants along the Korean side of the Yalu River which furnished considerable electric power to Manchurian industries. However, there was no reason why the Commission which was to be set up under the draft resolution of the United Kingdom should not consult all parties who might be concerned including the Chinese Communists and the Secretary said that this point might be made clear in the general debate on the resolution in the Plenary Session. It was agreed that no attempt would be made to bring in the Chinese Communists at this time and Mr. Younger seemed satisfied that he would be able to explain this to Mr. Bevin.

Despite information given me last evening by Nye (Embtel 828, October 3) I was not in position approach Bajpai Secretary General MEA on latest Chinese Communist démarche until receipt this morning Deptel 492, October 3. Nye and I have agreement never to take up matters with Government of India on basis exchange information between us.
- 2. I called on Bajpai this morning and told him of information which we had received through London and pointed out that if this information correct US Government was of opinion that démarche lacked legal or moral justification and threatened over defiance of expressed will UN.
- 3. Bajpai said he had been intending call me in to discuss latest telegrams from Peiping and would have done so if I had not requested appointment. He had given contents telegrams yesterday evening to Nye and he assumed their substance was being made available to US through British channels. He had acted through British channels since previous conversations re crossing 38th parallel had been carried on through those channels. He then read to me excerpts from two telegrams received from Panikkar yesterday and another received this morning. He said he was not making full text available to US Government because he feared that remarks of Chinese leaders derogatory to US would widen breach between US and Communist China which Government of India was attempting to narrow. Eventually, however, he gave me full text these three telegrams to read and also read aloud text Nehru's message of several days ago to Chou En-Lai appealing to Peiping not to intervene in Korea.

- 4. In reading Nehru's message Bajpai obviously omitted several passages. Nevertheless, I believe he gave me fair idea of contents. Nehru stressed Government of India's efforts on behalf Peiping in and out of UN. He expressed conviction that if Peiping would show restraint in spite of position in which it had been placed by failure to obtain admittance into UN and by developments in Formosa it would eventually be admitted into UN. Sentiment was even growing in influential sections in US to admit Peiping into UN, et cetera. Devastating consequences of war which might result from Chinese intervention in Korea were stressed. Nehru described how Government of India was endeavoring to prevail upon UN not to send UN forces into North Korea and referred to three power agreement that such forces would not enter without approval UN. In general appeal followed lines of endeavoring to show that Government of India had interests of Peiping at heart; that it felt that Peiping was being treated unjustly; that justice would eventually be done if Peiping would refrain from engaging in rash adventures; and that rash actions might lead to world conflict from which all people including Chinese would suffer.
- 5. Telegrams received yesterday from Panikkar contained statements from Chou En-lai that Peiping had decided that if UN forces should enter North Korea Peiping must consider such entry as aggression against friendly neighboring state and would meet this aggression with armed force. There was argumentation to effect that crossing of 38th parallel from south would constitute aggression unless Korean conflict from beginning should be considered as civil war. It was hypocrisy for US to claim that entry of North Koreans into South Korea was aggression whereas entry of UN forces into North Korea was not aggression. Messages also contained praise of Nehru's press statement of October 2 re Korea with which Peiping fully agreed.
- 6. In telegram just received this morning Panikkar said that Peiping officials had made clear that entry of South Korean armed forces into North Korea would not be considered as aggression and that therefore crossing 38th parallel by South Koreans would not necessitate Chinese intervention. Entry of forces other than South Korean into North Korea would be met, however, by Chinese intervention. There was nothing in this telegram, and Bajpai told me he had thus far received nothing whatsoever from Peiping, which would indicate that Peiping considered that US forces had already crossed 38th parallel (see Moscow telegram to Department 814, October 3).

7. In one of Panikkar's messages there was statement to effect that Peiping would not recognize any decision re future Korea taken by UN unless it was member of the UN Commission on Korea. I asked if Government of India was in favor of Peiping serving as member of contemplated new Commission on Korea. Bajpai said that if I was referring to commission proposed in UK resolution before first Committee General Assembly he could tell me that Government of India was maintaining negative attitude re that resolution and various parts of it. Under Nehru's instructions, for instance, he had yesterday instructed Rau that India would not be member this Commission. I expressed some disappointment at this news. I said that if India should refuse to serve on this commission other Asian powers might follow its example and authority commission could be greatly weakened. Bajpai replied that unless it was made clear that 38th parallel would not be crossed by UN forces India would be compelled to maintain negative attitude with regard to resolution. He was of opinion that India could be more useful in maintaining peace if it did not participate in any plan connected with or flowing from crossing of 38th parallel by UN forces.

8. Bajpai asked if I had any comments or suggestions to make at this juncture in world affairs. I replied that it seemed to me that although UN forces at great sacrifices had won military victory over aggressor, international Communism by cleverly playing upon divergent aims and ambitions of free nations appeared to be putting the free world in a position of choosing between losing all advantage of this victory and allowing aggression to take its course or to face danger of new world war in extremely unfavorable circumstances.

It seemed to me there was [no?] likelihood that any appeal to North Koreans to cooperate with UN in establishing united Korea would have any effect other than to give North Koreans opportunity to strengthen themselves, and Soviet Union and Peiping time, if they chose, openly to declare that any invasion of North Korea would be considered an aggression to be met by force. Subsequent entry UN forces into North Korea could thereby be widely acclaimed as a new war, not continuation of war brought about by North Korean aggression. In fact, brief pause which had taken place has almost placed UN forces already in this kind of position.

On other hand if UN forces should decide not to enter North Korea they might be compelled either to remain there indefinitely in order to defend South Korea from sporadic attacks made by North Koreans, strengthened by arms, other supplies, and leadership from Communist China and Russia, or to withdraw sooner or later and permit North Korea, backed by strength and prestige of its great Communist neighbors, to complete the work of conquest which UN had interrupted.

There was undoubtedly danger of expansion of hostilities if, regardless of Peiping's warnings, UN forces should proceed at once into North Korea. World war might commence with powers of West, at least in initial stages, differing among themselves re advisability taking steps in Korea which might involve Communist China, greatest Communist power of Asia, against free world; and with free countries of Asia led by India assuming position frankly unsympathetic with that of rest of free world. If Russia considered world war inevitable, it seemed to be managing well by playing on Asian feelings of nationalism, racial jealousies, on ambitions for Asian unity, and on outmoded suspicions of Asia of West, to introduce it with maximum disruption of free world.

I thought it great tragedy that leaders of Asian free world, instead of concentrating attention of free peoples of Asia upon merits of situation, were showing tendencies to criticise methods by which UN forces had been victorious in Korea and upon inadvisability of UN forces utilizing that victory in way which would most effectively discourage aggressors and potential aggressors. Little was being said by spokesmen for free Asia re dangers of permitting great Communist powers to prevent by threats peoples of small countries in their neighborhood from choosing for themselves the form of government which they were to have. If China would be permitted by mak[ing] threats to prevent collective action to be taken for preserving independence of united Korea there was grave danger that by similar threats, China or Russia could prevent collective action from being taken for security other nations lying in their shadow. If world was again relapsing into state where collective efforts to promote security of small nations would collapse in face of threats by great powers, then it might as well be frankly admitted that all efforts to preserve peace by means of collective security had been in vain and that international relations were to be governed by force—not by any code of international morality.

8. [sic] I told Bajpai that in talking to him in this frank manner I was not acting on instructions from my government, but I was sure that what I said must be views of many American officials who were faced with making in these trying days extremely difficult decisions. I said that the US deeply prized India's understanding and friend-ship. It did not like to launch on any course of international action which did not meet with India's approval. India's policy in opposing crossing of UN forces into North Korca was in my opinion placing US in most difficult position.

I hoped Government of India would understand that if US should decide that it must advocate entry of UN forces into North Korea this decision would have been made only after full consideration had been given to India's recommendations and it would probably be based on US conviction that for UN forces to halt just now at 38th parallel would represent capitulation to threats of aggression—capitulation which might more than offset such strengthening of cause of collective security as had been achieved thus far in Korea.

9. Bajpai was courteous in receiving my remarks. He indicated that Nehru was returning this evening to Delhi.

Editorial Note

The First Committee met from 3 to 7 p. m. on October 4; for the record, see U.N. document A/C.1/SR.353. At this meeting, the Committee discussed the Korean problem for the final time and voted on the various resolutions proposed, after which the question was referred to the General Assembly.

The Representative of India (Rau) submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/572) calling for the establishment of a seven-nation subcommittee to consider all draft resolutions and proposals and recommend to the Committee, before October 6, a draft resolution commanding the largest measure of agreement. This draft resolution was rejected by a vote of 32 to 24, with 3 abstentions. Ambassador Austin indicated that the United States would oppose the resolution before the voting took place.

The First Committee then, after voting separately on each paragraph and amendment, approved the eight-power draft resolution (A/C.1/558; see telegram Delga 57, received at 11:18 p. m. on September 29, page 826), as amended, by a vote of 47 to 5, with 7 abstentions. The text of the resolution as now approved by the First Committee (A/C.1/574) was virtually identical with the text as approved by the General Assembly on October 7 (see editorial note, page 903), except that under paragraph 2(a) the seventh member of the Commission was left to be specified by the General Assembly, which chose Thailand.

The five-power draft resolution (A/C.1/567; see telegram Delga 63 from New York, received at 7:24 p.m. on October 2, page 838), after separate roll-call votes on each paragraph, was rejected by a vote of 46 to 5, with 8 abstentions.

The Committee also rejected the Soviet draft resolution (A/C.1/568) condemning United States bombing in Korea by separate roll-call votes of 51 to 5, with 3 abstentions on each of the resolution's

3 paragraphs. Finally, it rejected the Soviet draft resolution (A/C.1/569) calling for the disbandment of the United Nations Commission on Korea by a vote of 54 to 5.

(1) As possible additional assistance in discussing this matter with Bajpai and Nehru, the fol is for your background info in addition to that given in Deptel 468.1 Since beginning of Kor affair, Chi Commies have in defiance of UN given polit logistic and mil assistance to North Kor forces. It has been apparent from US intelligence and reconnaissance reports that Manchuria is very important line of communication and source of supply for North Kors. In addition interrogation of prisoners has definitely established that major portion of North Kor spearhead was composed of Chi Commie troops of Kor racial origins who had been transferred since the summer of 1949 as organized units, numbering 20-30,000 troops. A Peiping broadcast of Sep 22 quoted a spokesman of Ministry of For Affairs to the effect that Kors residing in Chi have returned to their "Motherland" to defend it and seeks to justify this on specious plea that these Kors have a right to return to their "Motherland" though many have resided many years or all their life in Chi.

Therefore, it is not quest whether Chi Commie intend to intervene in Kor conflict, but only of degree of their intervention. Indirect, obscure Chi Commie statements at this time cld, therefore, hardly be interpreted except as an attempt to dissuade the GOI and perhaps indirectly other members from support of firm UN action at this critical stage. As Chi Commies have heretofore not shown any hesitation in communicating their views directly to UN, it is difficult to place any other interpretation on Chou En-lai's statement to Panikkar.

(2) You might again stress to GOI it is obvious that any action which cld result in giving time to North Kor regime to regroup its forces north of 38° cld only result in increased defiance of UN as in the past and make more difficult the bringing about of GOI's achieving its consistent objective in obtaining a unified Kor.

You may give GOI strongest assurances that UN operations in Korea will constitute no threat to Korea's neighbors, that we have no desire to extend the conflict, that we have no desire to establish U.S. bases there or to prolong UN occupation any longer than necessary for minimum security needs, and that we do not seek any special position whatever in Korea.

On other hand, GOI must appreciate that there is a hostile Army in the field which is continuing operations against UN forces, that it has given no signs of giving up the struggle, that it continues to fight wherever it can south of the 38° parallel, that it has been assured that it will be reorganized and re-equipped north of the 38° parallel, that it refuses to hand over UN prisoners of war and civilian hostages who are being brutally murdered in large numbers, and that the North Korean aggressor continues to receive political and military assistance from its northern neighbors.

It is at this moment uniquely and vitally important that we try to disabuse Chi Commies misconceptions they may hold as to US intents and purposes in Korea.

Up to now this Govt's sole channel communication with Chi Commies, except for public statements by officials, has been dubiously reliable intermediary Panikkar. Given latter's predispositions and free-wheeling proclivities, we cannot be sure what Chou-En-Lai says or hears in conversations with him.

Therefore, even though fol may consist to some extent repetition what you have already said to Bajpai and which presumably transmitted to Peiping, Dept feels you might seek some opportunity through Bajpai to meet Chi Amb and put directly to him this Govt's position re Korea. Shld this prove too difficult or impracticable to arrange, you might consider some alternative method, such as suggesting Bajpai or UK High Commissioner convey to Chi Amb summary US position.

Summary might take fol line:

As shid be abundantly clear, US has no desire whatsoever that hostilities develop between UN and Chi forces. Such eventuality would be tragedy for world and particularly for China. US wishes neglect no possible opportunity prevent misunderstandings which might lead to such result.

Therefore, fol facts shid be understood beyond shadow of doubt:

1) UN operations constitute no threat whatsoever to Korea's neighbors.

2) As evidence good faith US is prepared accept (by UN or through other less formal machinery) neutral unbiased investigation and assessment damages arising out of charges of bombing incidents brought by Peiping authorities.

3) US has no desire to extend conflict or to establish bases in

Korea.

4) US does not seek any special position whatever in Korea.

5) UN Mission in Korea is to repel established aggression and to bring about conditions of peace and security in which Korean people can determine own destiny.

In view these facts there shld be no doubt that mil intervention by another power in Korea in defiance of UN, or threat of such intervention, wld be act hostile to world opinion dangerous in consequence and unjustifiable by any standards international law or practice.

Memorandum by Mr. John C. Ross of the United States Mission at the United Nations to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

TOP SECRET

[New York,] October 5, 1950.

Here is the version of the story Hans Engen of the Permanent Norwegian Delegation here told me and I understand repeated later to the Secretary at Sunde's request.

Engen has apparently had a casual acquaintance with Vassili Kasaniev, a Soviet employee of the Trusteeship Division of the United Nations Secretariat. Yesterday Kasaniev invited Engen to lunch. Kasaniev initiated the conversation by asking Engen what the Norwegian Delegation thought about the U.S.S.R. resolution on Korea. Engen replied to the effect that the clause in the Soviet resolution concerning the withdrawal of troops demonstrated the obvious lack of sincerity of the whole resolution. Engen then countered by asking Kasaniev what the Russians thought of the 8-power resolution.²

Kasaniev replied that the 8-power resolution would permit United States troops to occupy North Korea. The Russians, Engen reported Kasaniev as saying, could not stand this. It was not only a question of their security but also a question of their prestige and standing in the area.

Engen then indicated to Kasaniev that it was not his understanding that U.S. troops wanted to stay in Korea but rather wanted to get out as soon as possible after the defeat of the North Koreans had been accomplished. Engen added, he told me, it was his understanding that possibly Asiatic troops (from Pakistan or India, for example) might be used for occupation duties in North Korea.

Engen's remarks apparently made a very strong impression on Kasaniev. The term does not make much sense in the context but Engen said that Kasaniev "paled visibly". Kasaniev asked Engen to repeat what he had said. Engen did so. Kasaniev then asked Engen whether he might repeat what Engen had said to Vishinsky.

Engen said that they were talking together as person to person and that he had no objection to Kasaniev repeating to Vishinsky what he had expressed as his personal understanding of the situation.

Kasaniev then asked Engen to repeat again what he had said which Engen did.

Engen then asked Kasaniev what the Russians had in mind. Kasaniev apparently replied along the following lines:

MacArthur should agree to stop at the 38th Parallel. The North Koreans would then lay down their arms and, third, a United Nations Commission would be allowed to go into North Korea to hold elections, et cetera.

Engen then said he asked Kasaniev how the Russians would feel about Asiatic occupation troops in North Korea. Kasaniev, to whom this was apparently a new idea, inquired about the possible composition of such troops. Engen replied by mentioning again by way of example Pakistan and Indian troops. Kasaniev then inquired whether the Philippine troops would be included. Engen said he replied to the effect that he would suppose so since the Philippines were, of course, Asiatics.

This was apparently the sum of the conversation. Engen said that immediately after they returned from lunch and before the Committee One meeting opened * he saw Kasaniev talking with Vishinsky in the corridor.

² U.N. document A/C.1/558; see telegram Delga 57 from New York, received at 11:18 p. m. on September 29, p. 826.

^{*} See the editorial note on the 353d meeting of the First Committee at 3 p.m. on October 4, p. 873.

Engen emphasized that the information he transmitted was a personal communication from him and not an official communication from the Norwegian Delegation, although he had reported the matter to Sunde who authorized Engen to transmit the information to us.

I gather that at Sunde's request Engen repeated this story to the Secretary late in the afternoon. Subsequently Engen came to me privately and very personally and said he was afraid that Sunde had given the Secretary an incorrect impression, namely, that the Norwegian Delegation had voted in favor of the Indian resolution to set up a subcommittee because of the conversation Engen had had with Kasaniev at lunch. Engen said this was wholly incorrect and that the decision to vote for the Indian suggestion had been taken by the Norwegian Delegation the day before. This tends to be borne out by the reports from our Area Officers which based Norwegian support for the Indian proposal on the statement made by the Norwegian Prime Minister a day or two earlier.

I am sending this to you in single copy and as indicated on the phone I would appreciate it if you would inform Hickerson. The only people I am informing here are Ambassadors Austin and Gross.

Memorandum by Mr. John C. Ross of the United States Mission at the United Nations to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

TOP SECRET

[New York,] October 5, 1950.

I read to Engen at Lake Success this afternoon the memorandum I sent you earlier today 1 (with the exception of the last two paragraphs) on his conversation with Kassaniev at lunch yesterday. Engen confirmed the accuracy of this report, adding the following comments:

Referring to the last sentence of the third paragraph of my memorandum Engen added the following comment: He said Kassaniev had used the phrase "our neighboring states". Although Kassaniev did not say so Engen interpreted his use of this term as indicating a preoccupation with Soviet relations with neighboring states in Europe as well as Asia. He interpreted Kassaniev as having in mind that the defeat of North Korea was the first example of a Soviet-established state being overthrown.

With regard to the fifth paragraph of my memorandum Engen amplified this somewhat as follows: He said that when he stated his understanding of the situation Kassaniev was so excited by what appeared to be to him a wholly new idea that he "paled visibly".

Engen said that the whole conversation and the fact, in particular, that Kassaniev asked him to repeat three times what he had said revealed a conviction strongly held by the Russians that the United States wanted to occupy Korea permanently. The understanding which Engen stated seemed to be completely at variance with Kassaniev's psychological attitude.

⁴ See the editorial note, p. 873.

Engen amplified paragraph nine of my memorandum as follows: Kassaniev apparently gave some indication that the United Nations commission would not only go into North Korea to hold elections but also to see to it that the North Koreans kept the surrender terms. Engen restated the point in this way: that Kassaniev indicated the North Koreans might accept the MacArthur terms if American troops stopped at the 38th parallel.

I asked Engen if Kassaniev made any distinction between "American troops" and United Nations forces. Engen said Kassaniev made no such distinction but talked only about American troops.

Engen also said that Kassaniev would not say anything at all about how the Russians would feel about having Asiatic troops in North Korea.

Engen told me that Kassaniev had today invited him to lunch again tomorrow, Friday.2 Engen has accepted, and he promised to give me a report of tomorrow's conversation at lunch, sometime tomorrow afternoon.

I emphasized to Engen that the information he had given me was being restricted to very few people in our Government. I asked him if he had communicated this information to anyone else. Engen said that he had told only Sunde and Stabell of his own Delegation and that he would, of course, tell Foreign Minister Lange when the latter returns from Chicago.

I told Engen I felt it would be very wise if he did not reveal to Kassaniev that he had passed on to us this information. Engen said that he would not do so.

I asked Engen if he knew anything about Kassaniev. Engen said he really hardly knew Kassaniev at all. He had met Kassaniev about a year ago at some reception or dinner and off and on he had had a drink with him in the Delegates' Lounge. Engen has a very vague recollection in the back of his mind of having heard that Kassaniev was at one time Russian Consul or Consul General in New York.

1. During my conversation with Bajpai yesterday we had a little exchange which I considered inadvisable to incorporate in Embtel 831, October 4, but regarding which I believe you should know.

2. When Bajpai read from one of Panikkar's telegrams statement that Chou En-lai heartily approved Nehru's press statement of October 2 on Korea I said I supposed that approval included also Nehru's remarks re Rhee.² Bajpai who is hot tempered flushed and told me my remark was unnecessary—that it appeared to reflect on Nehru and it was his duty to defend his Prime Minister. I told him I regretted making remark—that in trying times like this sarcasm was always inexcusable but that it was difficult to remain placid in the face of series of statements made by Prime Minister during recent days which it seemed to me could partially offset certain efforts made by US and other UN powers at the cost of much blood to discourage aggression. I said that public remarks of Nehru re our actions and policies in Korea could do great damage because he was not only Prime Minister of India but also outstanding leader of Asia. I was hurt the more by his remarks because of my personal deep admiration and respect for him. Bajpai's anger subsided and he said he regretted he had lost his temper. His own position was difficult. He was not responsible for what his Prime Minister might say spontaneously but nevertheless it was his duty to uphold his chief. He said he supposed I was referring to remarks made by Nehru on October 2 to effect that "one's saviors sometimes lead to one's ruin".

I said that this remark unfortunately was only one of many which Prime Minister had made recently. I had made no list of them and had had no intention to refer to them. Nevertheless since subject had come up I might say that it seemed to me that perhaps unconsciously the Prime Minister had for some time been more critical publicly of activities and policies of UN particularly of US in Far East than of those of aggressor. For instance, his remark regarding President Rhee who was legally head of ROK might well add to difficulties of UN in re-establishing stable government in South Korea and would certainly encourage Communist groups who were doing their best to undermine ROK. During recent press conference Nehru also had listened sympathetically to allegations of correspondents re inhuman treatment by US soldiers of North Korean prisoners and had indicated ¹ See footnote 1 to telegram 831 from New Delhi, received at 3:40 p. m. on October 4, p. 870.

At his news conference on September 30 (see footnote 1 to telegram 814 from Moscow, received at 12:23 p. m. on October 3, p. 851), Prime Minister Nehru was asked whether he agreed with President Rhee's view that the 38th Parallel no longer existed. Mr. Nehru replied that the 38th Parallel should ultimately disappear and no longer be a dividing line barring a united Korea. He went on to say that if Rhee meant that all kinds of military steps should be taken to further his (Rhee's) aims, the Prime Minister would have to disagree. He added that he was no great admirer of Rhee in any case. (Telegram 819, October 1 from New Delhi; 791.00/10-150)

he did not approve such "uncivilized" actions. Journalists at press conference could not but obtain impression that Prime Minister was critical of US treatment of prisoners whereas in fact UN forces in Korea were making every effort to live up to international codes of treatment of war prisoners although North Koreans were murdering Americans and other prisoners of war.

I said that when North Koreans had upper hand Indian press openly and many Indian officials privately were intimating that victories were due to sympathies of people of population with North Korea. Similarly victory by Chinese Communist Army in China had been interpreted by Nehru as expressive of will of Chinese people. On heels victory UN forces in Korea Nehru had now given lead to Indian press by referring to "militarists" and "military minds". In other words, impression was being given in India and Asia that UN victory in Korea was victory of militarists whereas there had been peoples victory in China. While condemning American bombing Nehru had not pointed out that all horrors of war in Korea had flowed out of acts of aggressors. He had at no time referred to atrocities of North Koreans.

- 3. Bajpai said Nehru was kindhearted man. He hated to see human suffering and he could not keep quiet in face of suffering brought about by US bombing in Korea. Nehru also had been upset by ceremonial entry of MacArthur into Seoul, which he considered provocative and unnecessary, and he had not been pleased at prominent role assigned to President Rhee, who in his opinion had already been discredited.
- 4. I said that it was unfortunate that when US or UN committed acts or pursued policies which Prime Minister did not like he did not give his views privately rather than present them in such manner as to strengthen cause of aggressors. Bajpai replied that it was Nehru's nature to give public vent to his strong feelings on certain subjects rather than to convey them privately.
- 5. It had not been my intention to discuss with Bajpai Nehru's systematic undermining of US prestige and character by public statements. It is extremely difficult, however, to remain silent while Nehru is carrying on his sometimes subtle and sometimes openly vindictive campaign against US. It might be useful for him to know that we understand what he is doing. Unfortunately, there seems to be no other chief of mission here who dares take exception to anything Nehru says or does. UK representatives are so anxious to keep in his good graces that unless important UK interests are involved and they are under instructions they are inclined to follow policy of flattery, cajolery and apology somewhat similar to that employed by Nehru in dealing with Chou En-lai. Canadian HICOM is even more supine and sometimes engages in anti-American statements to strengthen his position. Only diplomatic representatives accredited here who might in dealing with GOI loyally support US in these trying times are Australian HICOM and Italian Ambassador, both of whom are on home leave.

6. Nehru has not limited his campaign against US to public statements. He continuously attacks US for its various policies, particularly its Far Eastern policy, in private conversations with chiefs of missions, none of whom so far as I know, with exception Italian Ambassador, has had hardihood to disagree. That does not mean that chiefs of diplomatic missions here are in general anti-American. Most of them are people of small caliber who do not wish to risk displeasure Nehru by supporting policies and actions of US or UN to which he takes exception.

7. Since Nehru's personal victory in party congress at Nasik, other members of cabinet, although possibly not approving all that he does, no longer endeavor to restrain him in matters foreign policy. Cabinet foreign policy committee has apparently sunk into oblivion and he has free hand.

SECRET PRIORITY New York, October 5, 1950—5:25 p.m. [Received October 5—5:45 p.m.]

Delga 78. Von Balluseck, Netherlands permanent UN representative, called at his request on Gross. On instructions and stating he had personal doubts on subject, Balluseck read draft resolution which Netherlands is considering introducing in GA plenary statement on October 6 immediately after adoption 8 power Korean resolution.

In substance proposed draft called on North Korean Government to cooperate with UN in settlement provided by 8 power Korean resolution, and to indicate its willingness to comply on or before October 31.

It directs UN command to suspend all air, sea and land operations north of 38 parallel until October 31.

It provides that if North Korea indicates defiance or no intention to comply, Unified Command can resume all military action.

Balluseck stated that this resolution stems from his government's fear that military action north of 38 parallel may well involve Chinese Commies according to information from Hague. Hence such action has important political implications and North Korea should have a chance to back down. He added that due to predominantly US troops and US commander, UC emphasizes US interests in FE, and there is feeling it perhaps should reflect caution of other UN members such as his government.

After Gross strongly indicated danger and difficulty of Netherlands proposal and that same result could be accomplished by having commander UN forces widely publicize 8 power resolution, Balluseck stated this reaction confirmed his own views and he would advise his government not to introduce any such resolution. Gross took the line:

(a) US has watched carefully and studied reports including those from Hague on possible Chinese Commie involvement. Commies have not committed themselves by actual forces thus far and lack of vigor and decisiveness by GA now might be an invitation for them to do so.

(b) It would be a very serious interference with military decisions which could cost many American lives to attempt to make military decisions for the UN Commander, particularly to tie his hands. No one could be more sensible than we whose troops are committed to elements of risk and evaluating them.

(c) Proposed resolution would be in reality a re-examination of whole Korean problem with new debate in first committee at a time when delay and indetermination are most damaging. That was why we opposed Indian subcommittee proposal.

(d) Gross added he would recommend to Department that fullest use be made of Korean resolution disseminating it to North Korea and felt this would effectively carry out true purpose of Netherlands suggestion. Balluseck was inclined to agree.

401. Dept understands that Neth Rep been instructed introduce in Plenary Session GA tomorrow amendment to Resolution on Kor of which they a sponsor passed by Comite 1 on Oct 4 to effect that operation of Resolution be suspended for 2 weeks period in order further explore possibilities negotiated settlement and inferentially require suspension mil operations across 38th parallel during that period.

Accordingly Rusk called in Amb Van Roijen and spoke to him along fol lines. Fol successful landings at Inchon, North Kor forces have been withdrawing as rapidly as possible with obvious intent reforming and regrouping behind 38th parallel. They have shown no indication whatever of intent comply with Gen MacArthur's call upon them cease hostilities and are continuing hold UN prisoners and civilian internees. Supplies in very considerable quantities are continuing flow into North Kor from northern borders and there is every indication that they intend vigorously continue hostilities.

UN forces are now carrying out necessary re-grouping and reorganization in area around Seoul and while not expected will be in position renew attack northward for few days, obviously vital they do so as quickly as possible, there being direct correlation between length of period during which North Kors are able to re-group and re-equip and the subsequent casualties UN forces.

Re Chi Commie, it is our view that it is not quest of whether they are going to participate in Kor affair but only of degree of participation. Since beginning of Kor affair, Chi Commie have in defiance of UN given polit logistic and mil assistance to North Kor forces. Major portion North Kor spearhead was composed of Chi Commie troops of Kor racial origin and Manchuria is very important line of communication and source of supply for North Kors. Kor race of such troops no justification for such illegal assistance. Our estimate present indirect and implied threats of Chi Commie intervention directed at dissuading certain UN members from support UN action in Kor rather than genuine fear UN operations threat to Chi. We have used every possible method, public as well as indirect, to assure Chi Commie that UN operations no threat and that US has no desire for bases or special position in Kor, and if considered useful, Dutch Rep in Peiping cld so inform Chi. Obviously, with failure with Commie mil adventure in Kor, USSR and Chi Commie now hope to gain by delays, confusion and polit means what they were unable to gain by mil aggression.

- 1. Have appointment with Bajpai, Secretary General MEA, noon today and will discuss with him possibility of his arranging for me to have talk with Chinese Communist Ambassador.
- 2. Chinese Communist Ambassador has thus far followed stiff line in dealing with fellow-diplomats. He has not called on representatives of countries which do not maintain Ambassador or Minister in Peiping and has indicated in various conversations that he does not intend to have relations with such representatives. He, therefore, has no relations with UK High Commission.
- 3. I doubt that GOI will be prepared to endeavor arrange for me to see Chinese Communist Ambassador because (a) it might consider it embarrassing to be turned down, and (b) it rather enjoys its present monopoly on communications. I shall, therefore, ask Bajpai if it might be possible to arrange for such meeting, without making direct request. If he replied in negative, I would like approach Swedish Minister who appears to have better relations with Chinese Communist Ambassador than representative any other free country. I might ask Swedish Minister first if he would object to asking Ambassador if he would be willing to talk with me and if not, if he would be willing to receive message from me. Swedish Minister is man of discretion and fully trustworthy.

844. 1. In last paragraph Embtel 843, October 6 ¹ I stated that Bajpai started to tell me about proposed new move on part Nehru for purpose preventing hostilities Korea but was interrupted by his summons to Prime Minister.

2. Bajpai told me when he began discussing this topic that what he said was for my personal information and it was not to be conveyed to Washington. Nevertheless I must violate this injunction in this instance in view of what seems to me to be importance of scheme which Bajpai began to outline.

3. He said GOI disturbed and annoyed at resolution introduced by Rau into Political Committee of GA providing for subcommittee to sift out resolutions re Korea thus far submitted to political committee. Rau had had no instructions to present any kind of resolution and by his initiative he had made it appear for the moment that GOI was aligned with Soviet bloc in UN when GOI was anxious to be attached to no bloc.

4. Nehru believed that Far Eastern situation was so serious that he should not remain idle. He was therefore considering advisability of making suggestion (Bajpai did not say whether through GA or through diplomatic channels and I had no opportunity to ask him) that agreement be entered into with China by UN or great powers whereby (a) North Koreans lay down arms and cease hostilities; (b) all of Korea be occupied by UN forces other than those which had participated in fighting; (c) that with these forces in occupation and under supervision of carefully selected UN Commission plebiscite be held to determine future government of whole country.

5. Bajpai said he was sure US would not object withdrawing its troops in accordance with an agreement of this kind and permitting them to be replaced by troops of other countries including India.

6. I replied that US certainly would be happy to have no troops in Korea if it could be convinced that without such troops Korea would be secure from further aggression and Koreans could freely decide their future. I started to point out, however, that it would be illogical to accord precisely the same treatment to ROK as that accorded to North Korea when we were interrupted.

- 3. I replied that it seemed obvious to me from contents this memo that most effective course of action would be for every free nation opposed to aggression to give Commie China to understand that if it should intervene in Korea it would thereby lose any sympathy which it might have from any nations of the free world. It seemed to me that points in memo served to stress the fact that hesitation or equivocation at this time in the face of threats of Commie China might tend to encourage rather than to discourage intervention of Peiping in Korea. Bajpai said that Prime Minister was at this moment considering further move re which he would talk with me later. He started to give me in confidence an outline of proposed move when he was informed by telephone that the Prime Minister wished to see him at once. The Soviet Representative (Malik) proposed that the two Koreas be invited to participate in the discussions, but the proposal was rejected by a vote of 41 to 6, with 6 abstentions. This was the only voting action taken at the meeting which was devoted principally to discussion of the eight-power draft resolution (A/C.1/574) forwarded to the General Assembly with the First Committee's Report (A/1422) and the five-power resolution (A/C.1/567) which had been defeated in the First Committee but reintroduced into the General Assembly (A/1426). The United Kingdom Representative (Younger) recommended Thailand as the seventh country for the proposed Commission on Korea. Ambassador Austin spoke in favor of the eight-power resolution.

*Subject: Transportation and Logistic Support for Field Ambulance Unit Offered by Indian Government for Service in Korea

In reply to a letter outlining the political importance of the presence in Korea of a field ambulance unit offered by the Government of India, the Secretary of Defense has indicated in a letter to me dated September 27 that the Department of Defense will be prepared to furnish certain supplies and services to this unit without reimbursement. However, the policies governing the utilization in Korea of foreign offers of military assistance, which were established with your approval, require other nations participating in the military action in Korea either to reimburse the United States for logistic services or supplies furnished, or at least to agree at a later date to undertake settlement of the accounts through diplomatic negotiation. Since the Indian Government is prepared neither to make reimbursement nor later to undertake negotiations regarding settlement and wishes the United States to accept the field ambulance unit on its terms, the Secretary of Defense believes that necessary transportation, supplies, and other services should not be furnished to the Indian unit without your concurrence. The Secretary of Defense also suggests that if this assistance is provided, assurances should be obtained from the Government of India that these financial arrangements will be kept on a highly confidential basis in order that the principle of reimbursement or negotiated settlement may be preserved in the case of other members of the United Nations participating in Korea.

The presence of an Indian unit in Korea working with United Nations forces would be of great propaganda value in India and all other Asian countries, and the political benefits which the United States would derive from expenditures in this connection cannot be measured in terms of dollars. In view of the fact that certain Indian government leaders made the offer against considerable opposition in India, and the fact that the offer was made with the clear understanding that the Indian Government would not be in a position to furnish transportation and logistic support, it is quite possible that unless our Government provides the required assistance, the Indian Government may be compelled to withdraw their offer.

In view of the tremendous importance of our relations with South Asian nations today, and in view of the fact that our treatment of this Indian offer might well affect our relations with the Government of India, I strongly recommend that you approve this request.¹

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] October 6, 1950.

Subject: Discussion of Telegrams

Participants: Sir Oliver Franks, British Ambassador

Mr. Hubert Graves, Counselor, British Embassy

Philip C. Jessup, Ambassador at Large

Dean Rusk, Assistant Secretary

The British Ambassador came in to discuss four telegrams which he had been asked to discuss urgently with the Secretary. In the latter's absence, he took them up with Ambassador Jessup and me.

The first telegram (a copy of which was not left with us) contained three questions on which Mr. Bevin wanted an answer:

1. The first question was whether U.S. policy was still to localize the Korean fighting. We replied that it continues to be U.S. policy to localize the Korean fighting and mentioned to the Ambassador our efforts to settle the Yalu bombing incidents, the public statements we have been making to reassure Communist China and the Soviet Union as to our intentions in Korea, and indirect messages we have attempted to get to Peiping privately along the same lines.

2. The second question was whether General MacArthur had clear instructions not to attack targets in Manchuria and Siberia and that such attacks would not be delivered without full consultation. We told the Ambassador that such was the case.

3. The third question related to the gap between General Assembly action and any major move on the part of non-Korean UN forces beyond the 38th parallel. Mr. Bevin attached considerable importance to there being a gap in order not to bring into question the good faith of many delegations voting in favor of the resolution in the Assembly. We replied that we did not have precise information but that we understood that there would be some gap if the Assembly moved promptly to pass the resolution. The Ambassador said that General Bradley had confirmed to Lord Tedder that there would be such a gap, but "not a large one". It was agreed that the U.S. and U.K. Delegations at Flushing should use every effort to insure prompt passage of the Resolution on Saturday. (This was phoned to USUN at once and the Resolution was passed Saturday.)

The second telegram from Mr. Bevin is shown as Tab A and is self-explanatory as a covering telegram from Bevin to Franks.

The third telegram is shown as Tab B and was a covering telegram from Bevin to Nehru, and is self-explanatory.

The fourth telegram is shown as Tab C and is a message from Bevin to Nehru which Nehru might pass on textually to the Chinese in Peiping, if Nehru desired to. Ambassador Jessup and I confirmed that the line of this telegram accurately reflected our own attitude, although we suggested that the wording in the penultimate paragraph "to construct no new permanent military bases or airfields" might be modified to read "retain no bases or installations" in order not to bar any construction which the military command might have to do in connection with current operations.

Sir Oliver then said that if Ambassador Jessup and I thought that we were fully representing the Secretary's views he would not ask that we get in touch with the Secretary and he was confident that Mr. Bevin would accept our judgment on this. We stated that we were confident that we reflected Mr. Acheson's views and that we saw no reason to attempt to get in touch with the Secretary in New Haven.

DEAN RUSK

TAB A

Mr. Bevin to Sir Oliver Franks-6th October 1950

I have been considering sending a message to Pandit Nehru with a view to influencing Peking and I would like you to consult Mr. Acheson urgently on the general merits of these tactics and also to ask his views on the preliminary draft texts which are given in my two immediately following telegrams. Please make it clear that I would not send the message unless Mr. Acheson approved the idea and moreover that I am anxious to know whether he concurs in their terms or whether he has any suggestions for amendment.

2. My two immediately following telegrams contain

(a) Draft of a possible message from me to Nehru, and

- (b) Draft of a further message to Nehru from me in a form suitable for transmission at his discretion to the Central Peoples Government.
- 3. My purpose is to convey a message to the Chinese which may cause them to hesitate before taking precipitate action. If they have not already committed themselves to open support of the North Koreans, it may influence the Chinese if they can be assured that they will get a hearing from the United Nations Commission. If the message could also include some reassurance to the Chinese about the intentions of the unified command it would carry additional weight.
- 4. The action which I am suggesting may at the same time help to steady the Indians and perhaps to persuade them to join the Commission if that issue is still open when the messages arrive in New Delhi.

5. If the Resolution is strengthened to allow for consultation with the Chinese, i.e. amended to allow for a Chinese hearing or even for Chinese association with the work of the Commission, or if supporting speeches make it clear that it is the wish of members of the Assembly that Peking should be given a hearing by the Commission then paragraph 3 of the second draft message to Nehru could be strengthened accordingly.

TAB B

Following is draft of first message from Bevin to Pandit Nehru: I have been giving much thought to the recent reports which you have been good enough to send me from your Ambassador in Peking about China's misgivings about developments in Korea and the movement of United Nations Forces northwards. I know that both you and we are in complete agreement regarding ultimate objectives and I particularly regret that you have not felt it possible up to now to associate India with the Resolution sponsored by the United Kingdom and other powers now before the General Assembly. I fully share the concern you have shown regarding any extension of the conflict. Armed intervention by China would indeed [lead] to a great catastrophe, more particularly if this were to come about as a result of her misapprehension of United Nations intentions.

2. In view of the disastrous consequences which would follow from any precipitate action by China I feel that every endeavor must be made to remove any misunderstanding. I wonder, therefore, if you would consent to instruct your Ambassador in Peking to tell the Central Peoples Government what our intentions really are. These are set out in my immediately following telegram. I have no objection if you so desire to the text of the telegram being shown to the Chinese but naturally I leave this entirely to you.

3. As I am sure you will have realised I still hope that you may be able to see your way to associating India with our 8 Power Resolution and I hope in any event that you will be able to agree that India will be represented on the Commission constituted under the Resolution and thus exercise her great influence in a settlement which is of such vital importance to Asia. If you could see your way to joining the Commission, any message to the Chinese of which your Ambassador in Peking was a bearer would have greatly added force. This indeed might prove to be a decisive factor in persuading the Chinese of the integrity of our intentions.

TAB C

Following is draft of second message from Bevin to Pandit Nehru: We have been considering most carefully the statements of the Central Peoples Government re recent developments in the Korean situation. These show their concern about the future movements of United Nations forces in Korea and their fear that these forces may become a potential threat to China's security. We have also noted their wish to be a party to the final settlement of the Korean problem. In the light of this I feel it would be useful for me to take this opportunity to tell you how I—and I venture to believe many member States of the United Nations—view the present situation.

- 2. Our primary objective with which I know you are in agreement is to achieve as soon as possible a unified independent and democratic Government of the whole of Korea. We can make no real progress towards this until the fighting comes to end. This could be brought about at once if the North Koreans laid down their arms. If they will not do so then the United Nations Command has no alternative but to prosecute the campaign in order to prevent any recurrence of the threat to the peace of Korea. You will recall that the Security Council Resolution of June 27 imposed upon the Commander of the United Nations Forces the task of re-establishing international peace and security in the area. Whilst there can be no doubt that these necessary military objectives must be achieved there is no intention on the part of the Unified Command to take any action which could be construed as a threat to China's security. In fact it is the intention to withdraw all operational forces as soon as possible, to construct no new permanent military bases or airfields and to keep United Nations forces in Korea no longer than is necessary for the purposes of holding elections and setting up a new democratic Government for the whole of Korea. I also believe it to be the intention of the Unified Command that no troops other than Korean will be disposed near the China frontier.
- 3. I fully appreciate China's desire to be associated with all steps that are taken to secure a peaceful and final settlement of this problem. Her close historical association with Korea and her common frontier make this to my mind essential. I am sure that the United Nations Commission which is to be constituted under the 8 Power Resolution will accord the most careful consideration to the views of the Central Peoples Government.

[Annex 4]

[Here followed a telegram from the U.K. High Commissioner in New Delhi dated October 7, 1950, conveying Mr. Nehru's appeal to Chou En-lai to "hold his hand for the present." The Chinese Government stated that it had no intention of taking any action if American forces did not cross the 38th parallel but was determined to do so if American troops moved into North Korea.]

Memorandum by Mr. John C. Ross of the United States Mission at the United Nations to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

TOP SECRET

[New York,] October 6, 1950.

Subject: Engen-Kassaniev Conversations

The luncheon to which Engen was invited by Kassaniev today was not held because of confusion of place. However, Kassaniev came to Flushing this afternoon and talked with Engen along the following lines, reported to me by Engen late this afternoon at Flushing.

Kassaniev had reported to Vishinsky the first conversation with Engen. Vishinsky had expressed "very great interest". He also, according to Kassaniev, expressed regret that he had not heard previously (at an earlier stage) about the idea that other than American troops might be used for occupation duties in North Korea.

Vishinsky had apparently also expressed the viewpoint that by adoption by the First Committee and the GA of the Resolution on the Korean Question, this question was finished as far as the UN was concerned. Engen said that Kassaniev had stressed the underlined words. Engen went on to say to me that it was his clear interpretation (his feel) that the Russians want negotiations outside the UN. That is to say, he said, they are in a "bad way" about Korea and want to reach the best settlement they can.

Resuming Engen's report of this afternoon's conversation with Kassaniev, the latter said that he had a question he wanted to ask of Engen. Kassaniev then went on to ask whether Engen had considered whether the setting up of the Commission, under the Eight-Power Resolution, would block the setting up of arrangements for the kind of troops Engen had mentioned in his first conversation (Asiatic troops) to occupy North Korea.

The following point is not altogether clear to me. It is my understanding, however, that in discussion of the item mentioned in the foregoing paragraph, Kassaniev talked about occupation troops in North Korea being preferably troops from Asiatic countries.

Engen said he had replied to Kassaniev's question by saying that in his view the setting up of the Commission should not block anything but that the setting up of the Commission started a new phase.

Engen said that the foregoing was the gist of the conversation this afternoon. He said it went "back and forth" on these points. He said the conversation centered around the question of American troops in North Korea. Engen said he felt that the Russians were obviously convinced that the purpose of the whole undertaking in Korea was to give the U.S. a foothold in North Korea.

Engen said that although Kassaniev did not so state directly, the conclusion which Engen drew from the conversation was that in the Russian view the American troops and American Military Administration in North Korea would obviously produce an American puppet government which would involve the question of a threat to Vladivostok, etc.

Engen said that he had confirmed that Kassaniev was at one time Soviet Consul General in New York, thereafter for a time a member of the Russian Delegation here, and thereafter, in the Secretariat. He said that he thought it was quite obvious that Kassaniev must have some position of standing since he seemed to have quite free access to Vishinsky.

I asked Engen what he thought Vishinsky's position was. Engen said he thought that Vishinsky was simply a man sent abroad by his Government to present their case in the UN. I asked Engen if he meant by this that Vishinsky was simply an "advocate"—perhaps a very good one? Engen said he thought that was just the word to describe Vishinsky. He said that he felt that Vishinsky had little to do with the formation of policy. Engen added, parenthetically, that he thought that any fundamental change in Soviet policy would be reflected in the appointment of a Politburo member as a Soviet Foreign Minister.

In the course of my conversation with Engen, he asked me whether I thought the approaches of Kassaniev had any significance. I told Engen I felt that I was really not competent to judge this point. I said that I thought his conversations with Kassaniev were "interesting". I said that on the one hand Kassaniev might merely be a well meaning person and that the conversations might be of no importance whatever. I said, on the other hand, it was conceivable that his conversations with Kassaniev might have some importance. I repeated that I, however, was not competent to have a valid judgment.

In the course of the conversation, I took occasion to say that, expressing my own view, it seemed clear to me that the last thing the U.S. would want to do would be to become engaged in any kind of open conflict with the Chinese Communists or with the Soviet Union. I said that I thought Ambassador Austin's speech in the Plenary Session this afternoon had made quite clear that we had no ulterior objectives in Korea.

Engen said he had noticed what Austin had said. He said he thought it was very useful for us to keep repeating our objectives. He recalled a British diplomat who had once written that given the peculiarities of the Russian mind, one could never understand what they were after; therefore, the most important thing was to make sure that they understood what you were after.

Engen said he attached very considerable significance to the fact that this approach by Kassaniev had been made to him because before he came to New York (in April 1949) to serve with the Norwegian Delegation, he had been Foreign Editor of the Verdens Gang, an Oslo daily. He said that the Russians had very frequently approached him in Oslo when they had particular messages they wanted to communicate to Foreign Minister Lange, but which they did not want to pass through usual diplomatic channels. He said the Russians were aware of the fact that he, Engen, was a close, personal friend of Lange, of some years standing.

I reiterated to Engen my feeling that it was very important that the information he had given me be held very closely. I told him that if that kind of story got spread around it would almost certainly appear in the newspapers and publicity would almost certainly destroy any validity the conversations might conceivably have. Engen said that he fully agreed and was holding this information very close within his own Delegation.

I also suggested, and Engen agreed, that if either he or I should be questioned about our conversations together, we tell the same story, namely, that we had been consulting about the resolution on our united action for peace program.

Engen told me that Kassaniev had asked if he might see him again on Saturday ² and Engen had agreed to do so. Engen asked if I thought he were wise in continuing to see Kassaniev. He added that he had made quite clear to Kassaniev that their conversations were quite informal, personal, and unofficial. I told Engen that I saw no reason why he should not continue to see Kassaniev casually as he had been doing.

I asked Engen about his plans over the weekend. He said that he was going to meet Foreign Minister Lange Saturday night on Lange's return from Chicago. He planned to be driving Lange out into the country somewhere for a pleasant luncheon on Sunday.

There, in absence Van Zeeland who is in Paris on ECA matters, I asked De Gruben 2 whether he had any indications of possible Chinese reaction in face UN military action in North Korea (c.f. Embtel 490 September 283). He replied in negative adding he thought Chou En Lai's statements should be closely analyzed before jumping conclusions because Chinese evidently had to say number of things of an equivocal nature to please Russians but without definite commitment. Nothing he had seen would lead to conclusion that Chinese had any intention of direct military intervention in Korea and he believed present Chinese obligation so great and Chinese supply and economic situation so adverse that they would not risk such intervention. Chou En Lai might use various expressions to effect that "he would view with grave concern" and/or "would have to consider eventual Chinese course of action", etc. Belgium took all this with heavy grain of salt. Belgian Foreign Office has no information thus far of disturbing nature re Chinese intentions vis-à-vis Korea.

Subsequent check with desk officers in Foreign Office has revealed no telegraphic or other report from Belgian diplomatic missions indicating impending Chinese or Soviet hostilities.

De Gruben went on to say that he did not feel that Communist China wished to become involved in Korea, but that after the settlement of the Korean question the matter of Communist China's admission to the United Nations would have to be solved. Zehnder, Under Secretary, states that on contrary, intelligence reaching Political Department indicated that Kremlin continues to desire localization of Korean conflict and does not favor direct Chinese participation. Mao Tze-tung is reported to have informed Indian Ambassador Peking in this sense some time ago. He feels this is still the case in spite of Chou En-lai's statement. Kremlin, he thinks would like to have Korean struggle prolonged while it prepares indirect aggressive action elsewhere. Our reaction to Korean move caught Kremlin off balance and it will require some time to recover offensive. This, he figures, is the logic of situation based on his intelligence but he admits that emotional factors such as "face" might upset calculations.

Personally, I believe we should cross the 38th parallel when set to do so irrespective of whether Chou En-lai is bluffing or not.

The United Nations General Assembly met at 10:45 a.m. on October 7 to conclude its consideration of the Korean question; for the record, see U.N. document A/PV.294. The Assembly, on conclusion of the general debate, considered first the eight-power draft resolution. After voting separately on each paragraph and amendment, the resolution as a whole was approved by a vote of 47 to 5, with 7 abstentions. For the text, see infra. The Assembly then took up the five-power resolution (A/1426). Separate roll-call votes were held on each paragraph which, in each case, reflected a majority opposed to adopting the particular paragraph; as a result, the draft resolution as a whole was not put to a vote. The Assembly then rejected by a vote of 52 to 5, with 3 abstentions, the Soviet draft resolution condemning United States bombing in Korea (A/1427) and rejected by a vote of 55 to 5 the Soviet draft resolution calling for the disbandment of UNCOK (A/1428).

Resolution 376 (V), Adopted by the United Nations General Assembly, October 7, 1950

The General Assembly

Having regard to its resolutions of 14 November 1947 (112(II)), of 12 December 1948 (195(III)), and of 21 October 1949 (293(IV));

Having received and considered the Report of the United Nations

Commission on Korea:

Mindful of the fact that the objectives set forth in the resolutions referred to have not been fully accomplished and in particular that the unification of Korea has not yet been achieved, and that an attempt has been made by an armed attack from North Korea to extinguish by force the Government of the Republic of Korea;

Recalling the General Assembly declaration of 12 December 1948 that there has been established a lawful government (the Government of the Republic of Korea) having effective control and jurisdiction over that part of Korea where the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea was able to observe and consult and in which the great majority of the people of Korea reside; that this government is based on elections which were a valid expression of free will of the electorate of that part of Korea and which were observed by the Temporary Commission; and that this is the only such government in Korea:

Having in mind that United Nations armed forces are at present operating in Korea in accordance with the recommendations of the Security Council of 27 June 1950, subsequent to its resolution of 25 June 1950, that Members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area;

Recalling that the essential objective of the resolutions of the General Assembly referred to was the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic Government of Korea;

1. Recommends that

(a) All appropriate steps be taken to ensure conditions of stability throughout Korea,

(b) All constituent acts be taken, including the holding of elections, under the auspices of the United Nations for the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic Government in the sovereign State of Korea,

(c) All sections and representative bodies of the population of Korea, South and North, be invited to co-operate with the organs of the United Nations in the restoration of peace, in the holding of elections and in the establishment of a unified Government,

(d) United Nations forces should not remain in any part of Korea otherwise than so far as necessary for achieving the objectives specified at (a) and (b) above,

(e) All necessary measures be taken to accomplish the economic rehabilitation of Korea;

2. Resolves that

(a) A Commission consisting of Australia, Chile, Netherlands, Pakistan, Philippines, Thailand and Turkey, to be known as the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea be established to (i) assume the functions hitherto exercised by the present United Nations Commission in Korea, (ii) represent the United Nations in bringing about the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic Government of all Korea, (iii) exercise such responsibilities in connexion with relief and rehabilitation in Korea as may be determined by the General Assembly after receiving the recommendations of the Economic and Social Council. The United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea should proceed to Korea and begin to carry out its functions as soon as possible;

(b) Pending the arrival in Korea of the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea, the Governments represented on the Commission should form an interim committee composed of representatives meeting at the Seat of the United Nations to consult with and advise the United Nations Unified Command in the light of the above recommendations; the interim committee should begin to function immediately upon the approval of this resolution by the General Assembly;

(c) The Commission shall render a report to the next regular session of the General Assembly and to any prior special session which might be called to consider the subject matter of the present resolution, and shall render such interim reports as it may deem appropriate to the Secretary-General for transmission to Members;

The General Assembly furthermore,

Mindful of the fact that at the end of the present hostilities the task of rehabilitating the Korean economy will be of great magnitude;

3. Requests the Economic and Social Council, in consultation with the specialized agencies, to develop plans for relief and rehabilitation on the termination of hostilities and to report to the General Assembly within three weeks of the adoption of this resolution by the General Assembly;

4. Also recommends the Economic and Social Council to expedite the study of long-term measures to promote the economic development and social progress of Korea and meanwhile to draw the attention of the authorities which decide requests for technical assistance to the urgent and special necessity of affording such assistance to Korea; 5. Expresses its appreciation of the services rendered by the members of the United Nations Commission on Korea in the performance of their important and difficult task;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea with adequate staff and facilities, including technical advisers as required; and authorizes the Secretary-General to pay the expenses and per diem of a representative and alternate from each of the States members of the Commission.

Memorandum by Mr. John C. Ross of the United States Mission at the United Nations to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

[New York,] October 7, 1950.

On the basis of my telephone conversation with you at noon today I saw Engen and, making clear to him that these were all personal questions, suggested that if opportunity presented when he saw Kassaniev today he might raise the following points:

1. What is the purpose of the conversations? Is there anything that Kassaniev wanted Engen to do?

2. If there were in some degree an affirmative response Engen might indicate that it would be very difficult or embarrassing for him to do anything if there were not a genuine interest but the conversations merely a maneuver.

3. I suggested Engen might make clear that Kassaniev must realize there was no possibility of suspension of operations only to give extended time to the North Korean forces to build up their strength.

4. If the Russians were really interested in getting us out of Korea the best way would be for the North Koreans to lay down their arms. Otherwise the logic of the situation indicated that we would be likely to get further and further involved.

5. Since obviously the Russians do not believe public statements made by us and the British and the General Assembly Resolution concerning the purpose of occupation forces, what sort of assurances would they need?

Engen had lunch with Kassaniev after the Assembly meeting and gave me a full report as follows late this afternoon at the Vanderbilt. This report, as given below, is close to a verbatim record.

Engen said that Kassaniev initiated the conversation by asking Engen's opinion as to whether the point in the Soviet resolution regarding cessation of hostilities could be accepted subject to guarantees from the Soviet Government that the North Koreans would not start hostilities again.

Engen asked whether Kassaniev meant an immediate cessation of hostilities, the two sides resting on present positions. Engen used the phrase "under conditions existing today". Kassaniev replied in the affirmative. Engen said he stated his assumption that this meant before "United Nations" forces crossed the 38th Parallel. Engen said Kassaniev smiled at the reference to UN forces; it was apparent to Engen that Kassaniev had in mind United States forces. There was no mention of South Korean forces.

Engen then asked whether a United Nations "body" (commission) would get access to North Korea immediately. Kassaniev said that was his understanding.

Kassaniev then asked Engen's opinion. Engen said that the basis (starting point), he thought, would have to be the North Koreans laying down their arms. Engen said this was his opinion and he thought it would be the opinion of the "other side". Kassaniev made no comment but apparently shook his head.

Engen then asked Kassaniev what the latter thought about the assurances given in the Austin and Younger speeches in the plenary yesterday.¹ Kassaniev replied by referring to Vishinsky's speech,² saying that as Vishinsky had said in his statement the Russians did not believe in these assurances. He mentioned Vishinsky's examples from history to the effect that occupations always last longer than it is said they would.

Engen then asked Kassaniev, since the latter did not seem to believe in the assurances given in the Austin and Younger speeches, what kind of assurances the Russians might want.

Kassaniev asked Engen whether he asked this question for his personal information.

Engen replied that he asked the question for his personal information since, of course, he was naturally interested in the lack of belief Kassaniev had expressed in the public assurances given by Austin and Younger.

Kassaniev then asked whether Engen had contacted any other delegations. Engen replied in the negative.

Kassaniev then said if he should ask Vishinsky (put Engen's question to Vishinsky) it would make a lot of difference to know if the question comes from Engen personally or whether Engen would convey what Vishinsky might answer.

Engen then repeated that he had asked the question for his personal information but said to Kassaniev that if the latter wanted Engen to convey any answer Engen would, of course, be willing to consider it. Engen added that his attitude would depend on whether Kassaniev had an interest in Engen conveying an answer. Engen said that it would also depend on what kind of an answer it was, that is to say, whether Engen personally thought the answer had any value. Engen said that up to now he had considered their conversations on a strictly personal basis. Kassaniev then said that he would tell Vishinsky, that he could give Engen no answer, that he did not know what the Russians would consider acceptable assurances, or whether they would want to have an answer conveyed to "others".

(It seemed clear from Engen's report that Kassaniev referred to himself and to the Russians more or less interchangeably in the first person, singular and plural).

Kassaniev then asked Engen whether the latter, if necessary, would be available to see Vishinsky if Vishinsky desired it.

Engen replied to the effect that seeing Vishinsky would certainly put the whole matter on a different level. He said he did not think he would be entitled to do such a thing without being allowed to by the head of his Delegation.

(Commenting on this to me Engen said he did not like very much the idea of seeing Vishinsky. He said he thought it would be a little odd since there was no parity of level.)

Kassaniev then said that he would tell Vishinsky and he suggested to Engen that they meet again next week.

Engen said the foregoing was the substance of their conversation on this subject, the rest of his conversation with Kassaniev at lunch being of a general character.

After getting the foregoing report from Engen I explored with him his own estimate of the conversations he had had with Kassaniev as follows.

With regard to Kassaniev's own position in the matter Engen felt that Kassaniev probably had position enough to have freedom of conversation with a foreigner. I asked Engen whether he thought Kassaniev was holding these conversations on a permissive or on an instructed basis. Engen thought the basis was permissive rather than instructed. He thought that the purpose of the conversations was essentially exploratory on a permissive basis to see if anything might turn up.

Engen summarized his estimate of the conversations in two points as follows: (1) There is no way of telling, that is, there is no basis for valid judgment, whether the Russians have any desire to get into contact with the "other side", to try to achieve something (an arrangement). (2) If there has been any value in the conversations it has been that it was possible to become clear regarding a certain line of thought on the part of the Russians, that is, they are maybe trying to avoid by an "arrangement" access to North Korea of United States forces.

Engen amplified the second point as follows. He said he thought the main reasoning of the Russians was that they realize their attempt to unify Korea by force and the North Koreans taking over has failed. They are now, therefore, trying to cut their losses by having an arrangement which would allow the North Korean authorities to continue to exist in North Korea and play an active part in preparation for elections.

Engen said there were two primary things the Russians wanted to avoid: (1) occupation by American forces, and (2) elimination (liquidation) of the North Korean authorities.

In general Engen said he did not really think the conversations indicated a common basis for general negotiations.

I said to Engen that it seemed to me that two principal, related but separate, points emerged from his conversations, namely, the desire by the Russians to cut their losses, having suffered defeat, and possible fear on their part of a threat to their territory (Vladivostok).

Engen said that he thought the threat to Russian territory was the starting point in their reasoning. This, said Engen, was a military consideration. From the political viewpoint he thought the predominant consideration in the Russian mind must be that this was the first time since the war that Western troops would have penetrated into an area within the Soviet sphere of influence and overthrown a puppet government.

Engen said he thought the Russians were probably very concerned regarding the psychological effect of this development in other areas within their sphere of influence, in particular in Eastern Europe, not to mention Germany. As a third point Engen said he felt that the development, they fear, in Korea greatly touched their prestige in Asia and weakened the strength of Communist dominated authorities elsewhere in Asia, for example in Indochina.

From the foregoing Engen reasoned that the Russians might be willing to go very far towards an arrangement which to the fullest possible extent would continue the North Korean authorities.

On the other hand Engen expressed the view that it was conceivable that the Russians might be prepared to take a very great risk to resist elimination of the North Korean state. The worst risk they might take, he said, would be direct intervention; the next worst risk would be actively supporting the North Koreans with arms, et cetera.

Turning to another subject I asked Engen whether the question of Asiatic occupation forces in North Korea had come up in his conversation today. Engen said that this question had not come up and he had not thought it appropriate to raise it. He said that he could envisage a difficult problem in this regard from a military point of view, that is to say, where would these troops come from, how would they be organized, staffed, et cetera.

I recognized the existence of the problem he mentioned. Putting this problem aside for the moment, however, and supposing hypothetically that the problem could be overcome so that occupation forces in Korea would be predominantly Asiatic, if not exclusively so, I wondered what Engen thought would be the Soviet reaction. Engen replied that the answer would depend on what Asiatic troops would be involved. If, for example, Asiatic troops involved were Indian he said he thought very definitely that because of the prestige of India in Asia the Russians would look upon the occupation of North Korea by Indian forces as a lesser evil than occupation by United States forces. He said he thought it would be very much more difficult for the Russians to accuse the Indians of coming to North Korea for the purposes they now have fixed in their minds and accuse the Americans of seeking. He said he thought the Russians would not under these circumstances be afraid of elections in North Korea as an excuse for setting up an American puppet regime. Engen said he thought the main purpose of considering such an arrangement (Asiatic occupation forces) from our (Western) point of view would be to remove from the Russians the opportunity of capitalizing on the propaganda theme of American imperialism in Asia.

I asked Engen if he thought there was anything that should be done over the weekend. He said he thought not, that he had left matters rather loosely with Kassaniev that they would get together again next week.

I said I assumed the conversations having reached the present stage that Engen would wish to report fully to his Foreign Minister who returns from Chicago tonight and would wish to proceed, if at all, in accordance with his Foreign Minister's views. Engen said this was the case, again saying that he planned to drive Lange out into the country for dinner tomorrow when he hoped to have an opportunity to talk the whole matter over fully with Lange. I told Engen that he knew the high regard in which we held Foreign Minister Lange and that if Mr. Lange had any views on the matter which he wished to communicate to us I would be very glad to receive and transmit them. We left it that we would get in touch with each other Monday morning.³

Washington, 7 October 1950.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is forwarded herewith, for your approval, a draft directive to General MacArthur regarding possible Chinese military intervention in Korea.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have advised the Secretary of Defense that neither NSC 81/1, on United States courses of action in Korea, nor the implementing directive based thereon, which you approved on 27 September 1950, specifically provide for the action General MacArthur should take if the Chinese Communists intervene, without prior announcement, in Korea. The Joint Chiefs of Staff believe that such intervention is possible in the light of conditions obtaining presently in Korea, and that, therefore, General MacArthur should receive appropriate instructions for such a contingency.

³ October 9. See the memorandum by Mr. Ross dated October 10, p. 922.

The source text bears the manuscript notation: "Approved 10/8/50 Harry S. Truman".

The Joint Chiefs of Staff recommend that they be authorized to forward the attached directive to General MacArthur, subject to your approval, in accordance with NSC 73/4, "The Position and Actions of the United States with Respect to Possible Further Soviet Moves in the Light of the Korean Situation." ²

The Secretaries of State and Defense concur in this attached directive, and recommend your approval.³

With great respect,

Faithfully yours,

Hong Kong, October 7, 1950—1 p. m. [Received October 8—4 a. m.]

750. NCNA quotes October 5 Peking Kwangming daily as saying Korean war has "entered new stage". Daily elucidates "this will be drawn-out war of attrition". Implication this statement like those of Chu Teh and Chou En-lai, previously commented on by Consulate General, is that North Koreans will not receive open large-scale military support from Chinese Communists but will go on guerrilla resistance.

Consulate General and other American agencies Hong Kong have been unable obtain any reliable new information from Communist sources since dispatch of Congentel 684, September 29 1 which would shed light on Communist intentions re Korea. Majority British and Chinese opinion Hong Kong is that Chinese Communists will not intervene militarily there. Of representative group informed Chinese contacted by Consulate General officers during past several weeks, large majority expressed opinion neither Chinese people nor government desire become embroiled in foreign war, particularly war fought on behalf USSR and Chinese Communists would successfully resist presumed Soviet pressure on them to intervene militarily in Korea. Although British officials naturally concerned over possibility such intervention, prevailing view expressed in official circles is that it will not take place. However PolAd states Hong Kong Government has no actual information on Chinese Communist intentions.

Re Department's intel October 4, 5 p. m.,2 it seems most unlikely USSR could afford to risk political dangers involved in pushing its most important satellite into devastating war unless fully prepared to back it with Red Army, particularly in view of Sino-Soviet treaty. China, including important sections of CCP, would be certain to regard such action as betraval.3

ReDepcirtel October 5, 11 a. m. Opinion of Consulate General and other American agencies is that if Panikkar actually was told by Chou that Chinese would send troops over frontier if US forces crossed 38th parallel, Chinese Communists must intend carry out threat. However, since there are many indications to contrary, it seems more likely that threat was conveyed to Panikkar indirectly so that it would not have to be backed up if bluff called. If Chinese Communists are prepared to intervene militarily in Korea, would it not be much more effective deterrent to UN advance for them to issue public warning that they would act if US forces crossed 38th parallel? We cannot perceive any advantage to their permitting issues to remain in doubt until US forces have crossed and then intervening. Furthermore, such action would be entirely contrary to previous Chinese Communist practice of careful psychological preparation of people in advance of military action accompanied by advance announcement of goal such as crossing Yangtze or preparing to take Taiwan and Tibet.4 Communist propaganda on Korea has been decreasing rather than increasing in volume and public statements of Communist leaders have not appeared to be of type designed prepare Chinese people for involvement in major war. On contrary their repeated references to long-term war of resistance by Korea indicate the opposite.

Also on October 10, the Foreign Ministry of the People's Republic of China issued a statement which was quoted as follows in a Department of State memorandum setting forth a diplomatic roundup of Chinese Communist intentions:

"The American war of invasion in Korea has been a serious menace to the security of China from its very start . . . The Chinese people cannot stand idly by with regard to such a serious situation created by the invasion of Korea by the United States and its accomplice countries and to the dangerous trend toward extending the war . . .

"The Chinese people firmly advocate a peaceful solution to the Korean problem and are firmly opposed to the extension of the Korean war by America and its accomplice countries. And they are even more firm in holding that aggressors must be answerable for all consequences resulting from their frantic acts in extending aggression." (795.00/10–1250.)

view that such a meeting would be interpreted to foreshadow some major new American move in the Far East.

If it is true, as I believe it is, that both the Chinese Communists and the Russians really believe that we are intent upon maintaining a foothold in Korea, they will interpret this meeting as bearing upon our plans to that effect. I think it is reasonable to assume that the Chinese Communists fear that we are mobilizing forces in North Korea to invade Manchuria or to engage the Chinese armies there while Chiang Kai-shek makes a landing on the mainland to the south. If the proposed conference closely followed or closely preceded another amphibious landing, the fears and suspicions would be heightened. The Indians and probably a number of others would no doubt share these fears.

I do not suggest that the foregoing possibility should cause an abandonment of the project, but I think the President ought to be aware of the possible interpretations and repercussions of such a meeting. I suggest that the possible bad effects of such a dramatic meeting might be avoided through some very carefully prepared statement issued by the President in advance as well as by what he said in his California speech on his return.² An advance statement might emphasize again our desire to restore peace and security in the area, to localize the conflict, and to terminate the mission of our troops in Korea as soon as possible. It would be important to telegraph such a statement to various of our Missions in advance.³

241. For Rusk. Colonel Katzin proceeding UN headquarters October 8 for consultation re implementation UNGA resolution. I have suggested that he visit you soonest.

We have discussed implementation several times here. I am sending you my preliminary thinking on several points raised. This thinking predicated on desirability of bringing the UN into the Korea picture to the fullest possible extent:

(1) Foremost all delegates to 7 Nations Commission must be of the highest caliber.

(2) High Commissioner for relief and economic rehabilitation serving as executive under commission should be outstanding hard-hitting businessman who has had experience in dealing with Orientals. Advantage of an American versus non-American in this position hard to evaluate.

Right man probably more important than nationality. However, I am inclined toward non-American to give further impetus to the UN character of endeavor. In this regard Katzin is inclined towards American and also feels ECA should be continued (he possibly has an eye to influence thereof on Congress and US appropriations).

United States and UN command are now functioning in area of activity affected by UN resolution:

(a) During period of hostilities UN command will continue to undertake certain activities under disease and unrest formula and to further military operations, which will have long range economic benefit; such as, essential repairs of railroads, motor roads, port installations, and airfields.

(b) Some activities are joint army-ECA undertakings; for instance, admirable joint effort made in restoring power and water to Seoul within one week.

(c) Relief and sanitation has been assigned by UN command to Public Health and Welfare. There should be gradual transition to full-fledged UN endeavor.

(d) In view inevitable difficulties and delays in recruitment personnel and establishment functioning UN economic organizations in Korea, I feel that ECA should continue its program for this fiscal year and have its activities in Korea phased gradually into international setup. Continuation ECA operations during transition period could be a part of United States contribution to joint effort. This procedure would make available to international agencies individual talents and accumulated experience and capabilities of ECA mission and insure that there is no interruption of essential economic programs at this critical juncture.

(e) KMAG is now attached administratively to 8th Army. Post hostilities military advisory group should also be on international

- (3) I should also like to make the following remarks regarding general aims:
- (a) Rehabilitation should not be merely "pouring in" materials and goods to replace war damages. Any program must keep in mind Korean capacity to absorb without indigestion, particularly the capacity of ROK to furnish non-inflationary local currency financing for projects. Income from sale of consumer goods and raw materials furnished by international agency would be principal source of such funds.

(b) Greater emphasis than in the past-should be directed toward government administration on taxation, fiscal policy, and other intangible factors affecting economic stability and requiring as much attention and material aid.

(c) Special effort should be made in the field of education. We should bear in mind that the unpiloted unification of Korea including the liberation of North Korea from Communist domination places upon us a moral commitment of the first magnitude to remold the thinking of the Korean people along democratic lines. Communist indoctrination of North Koreans under the guise of public education has been extensive. Any less effort on our part would fail to restore the Korean people to sanity and would lay US/UN open to Soviet allegation that capitalist Democracies ignore educational aspirations of the masses. Embassy notes with pleasure Department's plans for greatly expanded USIE program in Korea, but believes that even this very large operation will not meet Korea's needs in school buildings and new text books. Since Department has again stated that Fulbright funds can be used only in accordance original terms of the act, I recommend that UN be advised of the magnitude of the educational problem in Korea and requested to take positive measures of assistance.

(d) The general scope of aid should be kept within realistic levels. The use of ECOSOC and UN specialized agencies might bring into this field such idealists, dreamers, and perfectionists that the operation would not result in practicable programs.

(e) Greatest progress may be expected by transferring functions and responsibilities to Korea soonest, making them aware of their responsibilities and at the same time keeping tactful UN supervision over them. Muccio

Draft Memorandum by the Acting Officer in Charge of Korean Affairs (Emmons) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)¹

Subject: Department Policy Towards War Crimes in Korea.

The purpose of this memorandum is to provide a basis for consideration of the attitude which the Department should adopt towards the assignment to persons in the North Korean Communist regime of war crimes responsibility for criminal aggression, and on this basis to determine what instructions should be sent to the United States Delegation to the United Nations.

The North Korean regime was established in September of 1948 under Soviet auspices and assumed the responsibilities of government following the alleged withdrawal of Soviet occupation troops from North Korea in December 1948. It inherited whatever authority it has exercised in North Korea directly from the Soviet Union and it has not in any sense been free from effective Soviet control. Not only did the Soviet Union assign numerous military "advisers" to the North Korean armed forces, but the evidence is strong that a large number of similar "advisers" were assigned to Korean counterparts within the administration. Indications are, furthermore, that these Soviet "advisers" have had the effective powers of command over their North Korean protegés, and it should be noted that General Shtikov, formerly military commander of the Soviet occupation forces, is currently the Ambassador of the USSR at Pyongyang. There is no doubt that North Korea was established and has been maintained as a typical Soviet puppet state.

While for political reasons the direct political, military and economic relationship of the USSR to the North Korean regime has been minimized by the Department in public, this relationship has nevertheless been a close one; it is inconceivable that the North Korean Communists could have initiated the attack upon South Korea which took place on June 25, 1950 without the approval of Kremlin. While it is not clear to what extent the Soviet Union may have exerted its influence in pushing the North Koreans into their military adventure, it is clear that the invasion could not have been carried out without Soviet acquiescence and active support in the military field. It is now notorious how extensive this support has been.

One of the most difficult basic problems to face the United Nations in unifying Korea is that of overcoming the hatreds and suspicions engendered by the present conflict. Unless these hatreds and suspicions can be kept at a minimum and prevented from pervading the future relations between the North and South Korean populations, the political integration of Korea will be rendered immeasurably more difficult.

A further matter for consideration is the fact that from the date of its occupation by Soviet forces in 1945, the people of North Korea have been effectively shut off from contact with the non-Communist world and, most significantly, from the southern part of Korea where a free, democratic government has been established. Undoubtedly, the aggressive and virulent propaganda of the Communists in North Korea against the ROK has had its effect upon the North Koreans themselves who, not being aware of the true motives and democratic ideas underlying the establishment of the ROK, have fallen victims to Soviet propaganda concerning the alleged aggressive intentions and vices of the ROK and of the Western Powers which have backed it. This does not condone the cynical and cold-blooded action of the North Korean regime in launching an unprovoked attack on the Republic of Korea. It does perhaps in some measure tend to relieve the North Korean leaders of what otherwise would have been their complete responsibility for what occurred.

It is the opinion of NA in the light of the foregoing considerations that a distinction should be drawn between the so-called war crime of aggression on the one hand and war crimes involving violations of the law and customs of war and atrocities against the civilian population on the other. These latter crimes are covered in a directive now being prepared for General MacArthur, which will instruct him to apprehend and hold for trial persons guilty of such crimes. As distinct from these crimes, however, the war crime of instigating and unleashing an unprovoked military aggression against the Republic of Korea involves significant political factors. Consequently, and since the crime was continued in defiance of the United Nations, it should be the United Nations itself which takes cognizance of the question of whether war crimes guilt should be assessed against the leaders of the North Korean regime.

In general, and although a precedent was set when the United States took an active part in support of the principle of trying persons responsible for the crimes of aggressive warfare (i.e., the International Military Tribunals at Nuremburg and for the Far East), considerable difference of opinion has subsequently arisen within the United States Government as to whether this policy was advisable or successful, and as to whether or not it may have had an unfortunate effect on our subsequent policy in Germany and Japan.

It is the view of NA that, in the light of the above circumstances, our Delegation should be instructed that the United States Government considers that the assignment of guilt against the North Korean leaders for war crimes of aggression is not desirable for the following reasons:

(1) The North Korean regime is not and has never been since its inception free from overriding Soviet control or influence. Therefore, primary responsibility for the aggression should be placed at the door of the Kremlin, against which at this stage, of course, no action can be taken. In this sense the North Korean regime may be considered as having acted only as an agent for Soviet policy.

(2) The Soviet Union prevented the North Korean regime and people from learning the true picture of the situation existing in the Republic of Korea. Consequently the North Korean leaders were not exposed to the moderating influences of the truth, but were subjected only to insidious and violent propaganda from Communist sources. An appeal to reason therefore probably would not have affected this course of action, once it had been determined for them.

(3) Any war crimes trials of a type such as that conducted before the International Military Tribunal at Nuremburg can serve only to intensify the hatred already unfortunately engendered between the populations of north and south Korea by intensive Communist propaganda and by the current hostilities, thus rendering the achievement of an effective and peaceful political unification of the peninsula much more difficult.

(4) As a practical matter, it is extremely doubtful that the North Korean Communist leaders primarily responsible for issuing the orders for the attack of June 25, 1950 will fall into our hands, since presumably they would be the first ones to flee the country and seek sanctuary in other Communist areas.

(5) Some of the effectiveness of punishing North Korean leaders for the crime of aggression, were they to fall into our hands, would be dissipated by the fact of Soviet influence over and connivance in the plan of aggression and its execution.

It is, therefore, suggested that our Delegation to the General Assembly be instructed to discourage the assignment, by the United Nations, of war crimes guilt in respect of aggression, to any North Korean leaders at this time. It is to be hoped that the question of such guilt in relation to the Korean conflict can be avoided or minimized in the United Nations.

General region Liaotung in Jap times was self-sufficient in electric power on basis thermal plants, majority of which looted by Soviets in 1945. Thus when Soviets cut off power in South Korea in 1948, they diverted supply to South Manchuria. In Dairen if not all Liaotung this power was distributed by Dalenergo, a Sino-Sov trust.

If Suiho is not a casualty from bombing, it doubtlessly will become a source of conflict involving Korean, Chinese and Soviet (Dalenergo) interests. Immediate problems are possibility of equipment removal by Communists to Manchuria, temptation to Chinese to guarantee their interest by physical occupation of plant and danger of incident between Chinese and UN troops. In long run, readjustment to restore to Korea its proper share of power may cause further Chinese antagonism. Astute handling this problem with recognition of valid Chinese claims without sacrifices of principle may well lay foundation for future Chinese-Korean relations, as well as draw attention again to the Soviet war booty operations of 1945 et seq.

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President

CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, October 11, 1950.

Subject: Proposed United States Action in the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council in Connection with Korean Relief and Rehabilitation.

Problem:

The United Nations by the resolution adopted in the General Assembly October 7 has in effect assumed responsibility for the relief and reconstruction of Korea. The General Assembly in its resolution requested the Economic and Social Council to develop plans for relief and rehabilitation on the termination of hostilities and to report to the General Assembly by October 28. It is necessary for the United States Delegation to the Economic and Social Council, which will meet October 12, to propose or support organizational arrangements for subsequent decision by the General Assembly.

Recommendations:

It is recommended that you approve the following measures:

1. Establishment by the United Nations of a United Nations Korean War Damage and Reconstruction Agency to be financed by member states in accordance with a scale of contributions under which the United States would pay up to 70% of the total contribution. Although no accurate estimates are available, it is believed that necessary total expenditures may range between $200,000,000 and $300,000,000 a year for approximately three years or perhaps a smaller annual expenditure for a longer period of time.

2. Appointment of an Administrator as the head of the Agency responsible to the General Assembly who would be a person commanding the confidence of the American Congress and the American people, and who would himself be an American or have as a Deputy an American citizen.

3. The establishment of an Advisory Committee to the Administrator on which the United States Government would be represented.

4. Provisions in connection with the Agency which would make it possible for the Economic Cooperation Administration personnel to be transferred or detailed to the Agency to work under the Administrator as part of his international staff and which would make it possible for the Administrator to use the Economic Cooperation Administration facilities in establishing economic programs and for making necessary arrangements for the procurement and shipment of services and supplies especially as relates to the utilization of the United States contribution and procurement of supplies in the United States.

5. The preparation of legislation to provide a United States contribution which would permit the President to apply funds appropriated by the Congress either as a contribution to the United Nations program or, if the President should consider it necessary to the achievement of United States objectives, directly for expenditures by the United States Government; and legislation which would permit funds presently appropriated to the Economic Cooperation Administration to be used in Korea as part of the United States contribution to the United Nations.¹

[Washington,] October 11, 1950.

Subject: Problems Relating to Korea Participants: The Secretary of State

Col. Ben C. Limb, Korean Foreign Minister Dr. John M. Chang, Korean Ambassador

Mr. Arthur B. Emmons, 3rd, Officer in Charge of Korean Affairs

The Korean Foreign Minister, Col. Ben C. Limb, and the Korean Ambassador, Dr. John M. Chang, called on the Secretary by appointment at five o'clock today. The purpose of the visit was to permit the Foreign Minister to pay his respects to the Secretary and to exchange views on the Korean situation.

The Foreign Minister opened the conversation by saying that on behalf of President Rhee and the Korean Government and people, he wished to express their heartfelt gratitude for the profound assistance which the United States Government had rendered to Korea through the United Nations in the present conflict. He continued by saying that his Government realized its obligations and responsibilities to the United Nations for the aid thus rendered, and stated that his Government was fully resolved to cooperate with and assist the United Nations to the maximum extent in the attainment of its objectives in Korea and to support the new United Nations Commission in its work. He pointed out that the Government of the Republic of Korea had betrayed certain weaknesses during its first two years of existence, but had also had successes and added that his Government was sincerely trying to improve itself and would continue to do so with such help and advice as might be rendered by the United Nations.

The Secretary pointed out the importance of such cooperation, that the present United Nations' solidarity in relation to the Korean problem must be preserved at all costs, and that the Korean Government had a most significant part to play in maintaining such solidarity. The Secretary added that there may be times when it will be difficult for the Republic to see eye to eye with the United Nations, but that a big effort should be made not to allow dissension to creep into the efforts to achieve a successful solution to the Korean problem.

Ambassador Chang remarked that he and the Foreign Minister felt very grateful that a new Commission was being sent to Korea by the United Nations, since the old Commission had left something to be desired. Both he and the Foreign Minister expressed enthusiasm for the presence on the new Commission of Pakistan as against former Indian participation, which they felt had tended to make their relations with the old Commission difficult in the past. The Secretary emphasized that the United States Government is endeavoring to impress upon the states represented on the new Commission the importance, in its view, of obtaining men of the highest caliber for the new Commission in Korea.

The Ambassador mentioned the concern of his Government that sufficient foreign military assistance be rendered to Korea at the end of the present conflict to ensure that an effective armed force can be maintained to defend Korea in the future. The Secretary replied that this was a matter which he understood was receiving very active consideration and that General MacArthur was even now in the process of strengthening the armed forces of the Republic.

The Foreign Minister next raised the question of a Pacific Pact and asked what the attitude of the United States Government was to such a Pact. The Secretary replied that we were in sympathy with the principle involved and would give encouragement to it. Thus far, however, we had been somewhat disappointed and discouraged at the lack of progress which the nations interested in such a Pact had made toward its establishment. The Foreign Minister remarked that he was gratified to hear this, that it was a matter to which his Government gave considerable importance and one which must of necessity involve its further attention.

In closing, the Foreign Minister mentioned that he would be in the United States until the middle of November and hoped that he would have an opportunity for another exchange of views with the Secretary.

UKDel says this has hearty approval of Australia, Netherlands, and Pakistan. Proposal has been made in hope that some such action would help to reassure Chinese Communist regime that it would have opportunity to express its views and that some such action might help to deter Chinese Communists from using force in Korea.

USUN pointed out paragraph in Ambassador Austin's speech on Korea in plenary ¹ in which he emphasized right and duty of commission to consult all interested parties and suggested that perhaps this particular paragraph might be brought to attention of Peiping authorities in lieu of special IC action. Sir Oliver came to see me this morning and left with me the attached message from Mr. Bevin.

Sir Oliver said that the only thing which he had omitted from the original message was a sentence at the end of paragraph 2 which left it to his discretion whether or not he should make the representation contained in the last sentence of that paragraph. The sentence in question requests that there should be prior consultation between the United States and British Governments before any authorization might be given to General MacArthur to take reprisals against the Chinese Communists outside of Korea in the event of active Chinese intervention in Korea.

Sir Oliver said that he felt that it was appropriate to make this representation about prior consultation not only on general grounds but also because technically they had a right to do so since General MacArthur is acting as U.N. Commander and the British have forces participating under his command. Sir Oliver wished to make it plain, however, that he did not want to put the matter on the basis of a "right" but rather on the basis of normal consultation between the two Governments on an important matter of common interest.

Sir Oliver also commented on paragraph 5 (b), noting that he had not changed the rather abrupt form of expression, although he said that he personally might have put the point a little differently. He concluded with the request that the U.K. Government's views be communicated to the President. I told him that I would be glad to do so.

SECRET

I have read an account of a broadcast by General Kim Il Sung, Premier of North Korea, in which, according to the translation, he said "The Korean People are not standing alone in our struggle and are receiving the absolute support of the Soviet Union, the Chinese People, etc." I have also seen a statement issued by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Peking on October 10th to the effect that the Chinese could not stand idly by in the event of the crossing of the 38th parallel on a large scale.

2. The North Korean statement seems to show that they have no intention of responding to General MacArthur's appeal for surrender. Both statements are no doubt intended mainly for internal consumption, in North Korea and in China respectively, but in view of President Truman's impending meeting with General MacArthur I consider it of the highest importance that there should be no doubt whatsoever in the mind of the United States Government about our view of the serious consequences that would flow from Chinese intervention in Korea. It is not possible to assess the prospects of such intervention. Whilst we cannot take Chinese statements at their face value, it is equally impossible to discount them completely. But should they in fact intervene openly I consider it vital that General MacArthur should not take reprisals against them outside Korean territory without express sanction from President Truman. I should of course like to be sure that this sanction would not be given without prior consultation between the United States Government and His Majesty's Government.

- 3. We hope and trust that the United Nations Forces are on the point of consolidating their brilliant military victory. No one can forestell how Korea will develop in the more distance future but if our military successes are consolidated and if there is no outside intervention by China or by Russia then the way will be clear for the United Nations to give Korea an opportunity to develop on democratic lines under a unified Government and with her economy restored and war damage made good. This will indeed be a great diplomatic victory for the United Nations, matching on the political front the striking successes achieved in the military field. But a false step on our part may force China into the war, with consequences which cannot be foreseen but which will certainly be of great gravity. India has done her best to restrain China and I think that the message from Mr. Acheson which Pandit Nehru transmitted to the Chinese about the bombing incident was wise and timely.²
- 4. It is, however, not quite clear whether the existing instructions to General MacArthur not to take action outside Korea would still stand in the event of Chinese intervention. We have complete trust in the President and rely on him to make General MacArthur aware of the great issues that hang on our conduct in Korea.
- 5. I am anxious that the views of His Majesty's Government on these points should be made clear to the President before he meets General MacArthur. These are:—

(a) the gravity of the situation that would arise in the event of Chinese intervention, and

(b) the need for categorical instructions to General MacArthur that even in the event of such intervention he is not to take action outside Korea without the express orders of the President.

Memorandum by the Central Intelligence Agency

[Washington,] 12 October 1950.

A. THREAT OF FULL CHINESE COMMUNIST INTERVENTION IN KOREA 1

I. STATEMENT OF THE PROBLEM

1. To estimate the threat of full-scale Chinese Communist intervention in Korea.

II. CAPABILITIES

2. The Chinese Communist ground forces, currently lacking requisite air and naval support, are capable of intervening effectively, but not necessarily decisively, in the Korean conflict.

III. FACTORS BEARING ON INTENT

- 3. Indications of Intentions. Despite statements by Chou En-lai, troop movements to Manchuria, and propaganda charges of atrocities and border violations, there are no convincing indications of an actual Chinese Communist intention to resort to full-scale intervention in Korea.
 - 4. Factors Favoring Chinese Communist Intervention.
- a. Intervention, if resulting in defeat of UN forces, would: (1) constitute a major gain in prestige for Communist China, confirming it as the premier Asiatic power; (2) constitute a major gain for World Communism with concomitant increase in Communist China's stature in the Sino-Soviet axis; (3) result in the elimination of the possibility of a common frontier with a Western-type democracy; and (4) permit the retention of sources of Manchurian electric power along the Yalu River.

b. Intervention, even if not resulting in a decisive defeat of UN forces, would: (1) enable the Chinese Communists to utilize foreign war as an explanation for failure to carry out previously announced economic reforms; (2) be consistent with and furnish strong impetus to anti-Western trends in Asia; and (3) justify a claim for maximum Soviet military and/or economic aid to China.

c. Intervention, with or without assurance of final victory, might serve the cause of World Communism, particularly the cause of the Soviet Union, in that it would involve the Western bloc in a costly and possibly inconclusive war in the Far East.

¹This document was included in a briefing book of background material prepared under the direction of Mr. Rusk on possible items for discussion at the Wake Island Conference. Copies of the briefing book were sent to the White House and to the other participants at the Conference.

- d. The Communist cause generally and the Sino-Soviet bloc particularly face the prospect of a major set-back in the struggle with the non-Communist world if UN forces are permitted to achieve complete victory in Korea.
 - 5. Factors Opposing Chinese Communist Intervention.
- a. The Chinese Communists undoubtedly fear the consequences of war with the US. Their domestic problems are of such magnitude that the regime's entire domestic program and economy would be jeopardized by the strains and the material damage which would be sustained in war with the US. Anti-Communist forces would be encouraged and the regime's very existence would be endangered.

b. Intervention would minimize the possibility of Chinese membership in the UN and of a seat on the Security Council.

c. Open intervention would be extremely costly unless protected by powerful Soviet air cover and naval support. Such Soviet aid might not be forthcoming because it would constitute Soviet intervention.

d. Acceptance of major Soviet aid would make Peiping more dependent on Soviet help and increase Soviet control in Manchuria to point probably unwelcome to the Chinese Communists.

e. If unsuccessful, Chinese intervention would lay Peiping open to Chinese resentment on the grounds that China would be acting as a Soviet catspaw.

f. From a military standpoint the most favorable time for intervention in Korea has passed.

- g. Continued covert aid would offer most of the advantages of overt intervention while avoiding its risks and disadvantages. Covert aid would enable the Chinese Communists to:
 - (1) Avoid further antagonizing of the UN and reduce risk of war with the US;

(2) Promote the China-led Asiatic peoples' "revolutionary struggle," while ostensibly supporting peace;

(3) Maintain freedom of action for later choice between abandonment of aid or continuing such covert aid as might be appropriate to Chinese Communist needs in Korea;

(4) Satisfy the "aid Korea" demand in Communist circles in China and Asia generally, without risking war with the US.

IV. PROBABILITY OF CHINESE COMMUNIST ACTION

6. While full-scale Chinese Communist intervention in Korea must be regarded as a continuing possibility, a consideration of all known factors leads to the conclusion that barring a Soviet decision for global war, such action is not probable in 1950. During this period, intervention will probably be confined to continued covert assistance to the North Koreans.

[Washington,] 12 October 1950.

B. THREAT OF SOVIET INTERVENTION IN KOREA 1

I. STATEMENT OF THE PROBLEM

1. To estimate the threat of direct Soviet military intervention in Korea during 1950.

II. CAPABILITIES

2. Soviet armed forces now in the Far East are capable of intervening overwhelmingly in Korea virtually without warning.

III. FACTORS BEARING ON INTENT

- 3. Indications of Intentions. The Soviet Union to date has given no indication that it intends to intervene directly in Korea. Since the beginning of hostilities the Soviet Union has sought in its official statements and in its propaganda to give the impression that it is not involved in the Korean situation. Moreover, the USSR has taken no political or military actions that constitute direct armed intervention in Korea. However, the Soviet Government for some months has been increasingly improving its military capabilities in the Far East as well as in other strategic areas.
- 4. Factors Favoring Soviet Intervention. The defeat of North Korea would constitute a major set-back for the USSR. It would involve:

a. The loss of a Satellite, and the establishment of a Western-oriented state on the frontiers of Communist China and the USSR.

b. Giving the Western Powers a potential strategic bridgehead which the Kremlin would always regard as a threat to the industrial, communication, and military centers of Manchuria and the Soviet Far East.

c. Weakening the Soviet military and political position vis-à-vis

d. A loss to Soviet political prestige in that it would demonstrate that the Kremlin is not willing to support its followers effectively in a Soviet-instigated action.

e. A loss to Soviet military prestige in that it would lead to a tendency, whether or not justified, to re-evaluate the effectiveness of Soviet military equipment and tactics.

f. A reduction in the prospects of the Soviet Union for expanding its political control by means short of war in that it would demonstrate the determination and capability of the non-Soviet world to resist effectively Soviet-inspired aggression.

5. Factors Opposing Soviet Intervention.

a. In weighing potential gains and risks of intervention, the Soviet leaders must calculate, as an overwhelming consideration, that their open intervention would lead to direct hostilities with US and other UN forces over an issue on which the Western world has achieved a new degree of unity. Soviet leaders would have no assurance that combat between Soviet and US forces would be limited by the US to Korea or to the Far Eastern theater. Consequently, a decision to intervene openly in Korea, in the ultimate analysis, involves a decision to risk immediate and probably global war with the US.

b. The Soviet leaders may estimate that it will be possible, without assuming this all-critical risk, to salvage some of the losses suffered from the Korean situation. US military activities could be obstructed by extensive guerrilla action, which might involve the US in an extended and costly occupation and which could contribute to Soviet efforts to develop in Asia a racial enmity toward the US and the Western Powers.

IV. PROBABILITIES OF SOVIET ACTION

6. It is believed that the Soviet leaders will not consider that their prospective losses in Korea warrant direct military intervention and a consequent grave risk of war. They will intervene in the Korean hostilities only if they have decided, not on the basis of the Korean situation alone, but on the basis of over-all considerations, that it is to their interest to precipitate a global war at this time.

795.00/10-1250

Memorandum by the Central Intelligence Agency

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] 12 October 1950.

- G. Conclusions Regarding a Possible Soviet Decision to Precipitate Global War ¹
- 1. The Soviet rulers are simultaneously motivated by Marxist-Leninist-Stalinist doctrine and by considerations affecting the position of the Soviet Union as a world power. They have made clear that their long-term object is to establish World Communism under the domination of the Kremlin. Their immediate concerns, however, are:
- a. To maintain the control of the Kremlin over the peoples of the Soviet Union.
- b. To strengthen the economic and military position and defend the territory of the Soviet Union.

c. To consolidate control over the European and Asian Satellites

d. To make secure the strategic approaches to the Soviet Union, and to prevent the establishment, in Europe and Asia, of forces capable of threatening the Soviet position.

e. To eliminate Anglo-American influence in Europe and Asia.

f. To establish Soviet domination over Europe and Asia.

g. To weaken and disintegrate the non-Soviet world generally.

The Soviet Union will try to pursue these objectives simultaneously. In case of conflict between one and another of these objectives, however, it may be expected that the Soviet rulers will attach greater importance to the first four listed, and in that order.

- 2. On the basis that the long-term object of the Soviet rulers is immutable and dynamic, and that the Western Powers are not prepared to succumb to Soviet domination without a fight, there is, and will continue to be, grave danger of war between the Soviet Union and its satellites on the one hand, and the Western Powers and their allies on the other.
- 3. The Soviet Union will continue relentlessly its aggressive pressures on the power position of the Western nations.
- 4. The Soviet rulers could achieve, and are in a fair way towards achieving, the first three parts of their object (see a, b, c above) without risk of involvement in direct armed conflict with the Western Powers.
- 5. Parts d, e, f, and g of their object are improbable of achievement without the employment of armed force, though there are still factors in the existing situation which might well lead Soviet rulers to consider that, in certain circumstances, and in the absence of effective armed opposition by the Western Powers, they might ultimately attain these parts of their object without the overt involvement of Soviet armed forces.
- 6. In pressing to achieve parts d, e, f, and g of their object, the Soviet rulers will, at certain stages, inevitably impinge upon the vital interests of the Western Powers and so incur the risk of involvement in a general war precipitated through the necessary reactions of the Western Powers.
- 7. In the belief that their object cannot be fully attained without involvement in a general war against the Western Powers, the Soviet rulers may decide deliberately to provoke such a war at a moment when, in their opinion, the strength of the Soviet Union vis-à-visthe Western Powers is at its maximum. It is estimated that such a period exists now and will extend from the present through 1954* with its peak at about halfway, i.e., 1952.†

- 8. From the point of view of military forces and economic potential, the Soviet Union is in a position to conduct a general war of limited duration now if Soviet rulers thought it desirable or expedient.
- 9. While intelligence is lacking to permit a valid prediction as to whether or when the Soviet Union may actually exercise its initiative and capability to launch a general war, in view of the foregoing it must be recognized that the risk of a general war exists now and hereafter at anytime when the Soviet rulers may elect to take action which threatens, wholly or in part, the vital interests of the Western Powers.

*1954 being the date by which it is assumed that North Atlantic Treaty Organization forces in Europe will be built up to such a strength that they can withstand the initial shock of surprise attack; and when the gap between the relative strength of the Western Union forces and those of the Soviet Union will have begun to contract. [Footnote in the source text.] † i.e., when the Soviet Union has made good some essential deficiencies in

† i.e., when the Soviet Union has made good some essential deficiencies in atomic bomb stock pile, and in certain types of aircraft; and before the North Atlantic Treaty Organization economy is fully geared to the war effort. [Footnote

Embassy considers it most desirable hold elections North Korea earliest possible time in accordance with security and popular understanding their meaning. Alternative would presumably be UN military government rule without reference to popular will. Believe US experience military occupation Korea, plus experience with ROK, has established that military government is inefficient, and largely ineffective in calling forth Koreans best efforts, and does little to develop understanding and experience of self-government, which ROK was great contrast, despite its deficiencies. While temporary period UN rule North Korea without elections acceptable for military reasons, consider most important that populace have earliest opportunity select candidates own choice for membership National Assembly. Delga 123. General statement of US ideas on general principles which should govern UN action in Korea was made this morning to interim committee on Korea by Ross in absence of Ambassador Austin who was indisposed. Text by next following telegram. Several members of IC expressed appreciation of contents of statement and said they would want to reserve questions on it until after they had an opportunity to study it more in detail. Santa Cruz of Chile asked two specific questions, but did not request answer today. These were: (1) In view of desire for early as possible withdrawal of UN forces, was the creation of a strong Korean army contemplated and if so, what would be the effect of maintaining such an army on the economy of Korea? Alternatively, was it contemplated that the frontiers of Korea might be guaranteed by the UN? (2) What was the thinking of the Unified Command on how a unified government of Korea should be constituted and specifically should there be elections throughout all Korea to set up a new constituent assembly or would the elections take place only in North Korea after which the present government of Korea would be extended to that area?

Ross stated that he did not wish to make a reply at this time, but that the importance of these questions was recognized and that while probably it would be necessary for the committee to work out the answers as they went along and learned more of the conditions on the spot, nevertheless an attempt would be made to obtain for the IC such information and ideas as might be useful in guiding their deliberations at this time.

After the meeting, Plimsoll of Australia stated privately that he did not believe the interim committee should go too deeply into such questions as Santa Cruz had raised, but that he personally would like any suggestions which the US Government might wish to make on the subject and which would help him in his duties as a member of the permanent commission. It is requested that USUN be provided with current Department thinking on these subjects for possible communication to members of the interim committee.

Subject: British Proposal to Accept Chinese Communists Participation in Actions Respecting Korea, Re Delga 107, October 11, Department Telegram to USUN 392, October 12, 1950

In view particularly of the overtly antipathetic attitude adopted alike by the U.S.S.R. and Communist China respecting UN action in regard to Korea, and in view likewise of Chinese Communist threats still to take action to influence the outcome of the fighting in progress, it would appear basically incongruous and impolitic in existing circumstances to invite the Chinese Communists to participate in the settlement of the question of Korea. In the opinion of CA, the Chinese Communists should be so invited only if and when they adopted a new, more reasonable attitude respecting Asiatic affairs, only when and if, in short, they show evidence of a willingness to contribute to the maintenance of international law and order.

The above observations are predicated upon the assumption that the Chinese Communists will not be seated in the UN at the time when the Commission for Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea goes into action. If the Chinese Communists are in fact then represented, they will naturally occupy the same position as other UN members. Neither China's geographical propinquity nor the widely advertised violent temper of the Peiping regime alone, however, should be taken as just cause for the Commission to give special consideration to the views of the Peiping regime, whether or not a UN member, inasmuch as that regime has a clear record of support of international lawlessness in connection with the Korean case.

It is granted that the Commission should not be limited by mandate prohibiting it from conferring with any person or any political group or regime.¹

Crossing of 38th parallel by American troops brought prompt reaction from Peking in form of renewed warning that Chinese people could not "stand idly by" with regard to "serious situation created by invasion of Korea by US and its accomplice countries in dangerous trend towards extending war". Although news caused flurry in hypersensitive gold market, it did not seem to alter generally-held Hong Kong opinion that Chinese Communist unlikely become militarily involved.

ADDENDUM TO NOTES ON WAKE CONFERENCE OCTOBER 14 1

Prior to the meeting between the President and General MacArthur,² Ambassador Muccio talked briefly with a group of us and to me privately, about the situation in Korea. The following points supplement the account of the general meeting.

Trial and Hope, pp. 364, 367.

Before the formal Wake Island conference (see infra), President Truman and General MacArthur met alone. For accounts of this private meeting, see Whitney, MacArthur, p. 387 and Truman, Years of Trial and Hope, pp. 364-365.

President Truman's party set out from Hawaii shortly after midnight on October 14 (Saturday) for the Wake Island conference, which was held early on Sunday, October 15, local time; see infra. Presumably, this memorandum was drawn up following the conference and after the departure of President Truman's party from Wake Island for Hawaii, which involved returning across the international date line. This meant a return to Saturday, October 14, for the participants, accounting for the date on Mr. Rusk's memorandum. See Truman, Years of Trial and Hope, pp. 364, 367.

1. Functioning of the Embassy

Ambassador Muccio is very anxious to get his essential requirements for restoring the Embassy to full operation as quickly as possible. He laid most emphasis upon personnel and furniture. He said the Army was being very helpful, but that he hoped the State Department could give most urgent attention to his recent telegrams on the subject.

2. Chief of ECA Mission

Ambassador Muccio feels very strongly that Mr. Earl Johnson is not a suitable Chief of ECA Mission ³ and that his appointment would create great difficulties in Korea. He also said that Johnson's idea of having four ECA staff sections in Korea run by Johnson in Washington was absurd.

3. Visit to Washington

I told Ambassador Muccio that we were anxious for him to come back to Washington for a visit not later than early November and suggested the possibility that he might come on back with us. He thought that it would be desirable for him to have a week or ten days in Seoul before coming to Washington, and it was left that we would let him know what our wishes are.

4. Colonel Katzin

Both General MacArthur and Ambassador Muccio spoke most highly of the competence and general attitude of Colonel Katzin, the Personal Representative of Secretary General Trygve Lie.

5. Elections in Korea

Ambassador Muccio obviously felt strongly about not undercutting the Government of the Republic of Korea and treating it "on a par with North Korean authorities". I explained to him some of the problems in the United Nations and the need to get patience and understanding both on the part of the United Nations and Syngman Rhee if such questions are to be handled without unnecessary friction. He told me of his repeated efforts to keep Rhee moving in the right direction, that he had made repeated and strong representations to him. He said that he had thought a great deal about an alternative to Rhee but had thus far not been able to think of anyone who could do the job. He said the new military leadership was about the only possible source for a successor.

6. Rice

Ambassador Muccio said that the rice crop would be excellent, that little damage had been done to the crop areas of the countryside, and that this would be the third year in which Korea had had a good rice crop. He said he thought this would make a considerable difference politically to most of the farmers, that much of the stability of the population during the fighting was based on the fact that they were having three good years of crops.

COMPILED BY GENERAL OF THE ARMY OMAR N. BRADLEY, CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF, FROM NOTES KEPT BY THE CONFEREES From Washington 1

The following were at the table:

THE PRESIDENT

General of the Army Douglas MacArthur

Admiral Arthur W. Radford, Commander-in-Chief U.S. Pacific

Ambassador John Muccio

Secretary of the Army Frank Pace

Colonel A. L. Hamblen

Ambassador at Large Philip C. Jessup

General of the Army OMAR N. BRADLEY Assistant Secretary of State DEAN RUSK

Mr. W. Averell Harriman

The conference opened at 0736.

THE PRESIDENT asked GENERAL MACARTHUR to state the rehabilitation situation with reference to Korea.

States: Harry S. Truman, 1950, p. 672.

¹The main portions of this document were issued as a committee print by the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the U.S. Senate, under the above title, in May 1951. In a letter of transmittal, dated May 2, 1951, to Senator Richard B. Russell, Chairman of the Armed Services May 2, 1951, to Senator Richard B. Russell, Chairman of the Armed Services Committee, General Bradley stated that the record was compiled on the return trip from Wake Island from the combined notes of General Bradley, Messrs. Harriman, Jessup, and Rusk, Col. A. L. Hamblen (Special Assistant for Occupied Areas, Office of the Assistant Secretary of the Army), Colonel Matthews (General Bradley's executive officer), and Miss Vernice Anderson (Ambassador Jessup's secretary). General Bradley indicated that in addition to those listed in the summary as present at the table were Colonel Matthews and General Whitney of General MacArthur's staff. Five copies of this report, according to General Bradley, were sent to General MacArthur on October 19, 1950. For President Truman's statement, issued on October 15, following his meeting with General MacArthur, see Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Harry S. Truman. 1950. p. 672.

General Macarthur: It cannot occur until the military operations have ended. I believe that formal resistance will end throughout North and South Korea by Thanksgiving. There is little resistance left in South Korea—only about 15,000 men—and those we do not destroy, the winter will. We now have about 60,000 prisoners in compounds.

In North Korea, unfortunately, they are pursuing a forlorn hope. They have about 100,000 men who were trained as replacements. They are poorly trained, led and equipped, but they are obstinate and it goes against my grain to have to destroy them. They are only fighting to save face. Orientals prefer to die rather than to lose face.

I am now driving with the First Cavalry Division up the line to Pyongyang. I am thinking of making up a tank and truck column and sending it up the road to take Pyongyang directly. It depends on the Intelligence we get in the next 48 hours. We have already taken Wonsan. I am landing the X Corps which will take Pyongyang in one week. The North Koreans are making the same mistake they have made before. They have not deployed in depth. When the gap is closed the same thing will happen in the north as happened in the south.

It is my hope to be able to withdraw the Eighth Army to Japan by Christmas. That will leave the X Corps, which will be reconstituted, composed of the Second and Third Divisions and U.N. detachments. I hope the United Nations will hold elections by the first of the year. Nothing is gained by military occupation. All occupations are failures. (THE PRESIDENT nodded agreement.) After elections are held I expect to pull out all occupying troops. Korea should have about ten divisions with our equipment, supplemented by a small but competent Air Force and also by a small but competent Navy. If we do that, it will not only secure Korea but it will be a tremendous deterrent to the Chinese Communists moving south. This is a threat that cannot be laughed off. Again I emphasize the fact that the military should get out the minute the guns stop shooting and civilians take over. Korea is a land of poverty. It has been knocked down for a long time and a little money goes a long way. Houses are made of mud and bamboo. When knocked down they can be put up in two weeks. An estimate was made by ECA of the cost of rehabilitation and it was estimated to be $900,000,000. Another estimate was made locally and it placed the cost at about 11/2 billion dollars. I believe these estimates are far too high. I do not believe that you can absorb and spend in Korea much more than $150,000,000 a year. I believe three years of that will place Korea on its feet and not only make Korea self-sustaining but give a higher living standard. I believe that half a billion dollars spread over three to five years will more than make up the destruction.

Ambassador Muccio: The General has made an important point. Korea's capacity to absorb is limited. This applies to the economic field and to other fields. We should emphasize the mental and psychological rehabilitation more than the economic. The northern area has been under complete domination for five years. This is the first time we have moved into an area that has been dominated by Communists. We have a challenging opportunity. I want to see more emphasis on the education and information field than in the material rehabilitation. The economy of Korea is basically a very simple one. I believe with the General that $150,000,000 a year is all she can absorb. (Turning to General MacArthur) Is the cost of the Armed Forces included in that estimate?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: No. Equipment and military forces are not included.

SECRETARY PACE: Is the directive THE PRESIDENT sent sufficiently comprehensive?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: Yes.

Secretary Pace: What, generally, are the critical and over-all requirements of the Army during this period? We are in a critical financial situation. Our day of reckoning is going to come in the form of a supplemental in December.

General MacArthur: You gave us 40 days, 60 if necessary. We will have that estimate in 60 days. That will be about 30 days from now. This, you understand, is going to be some speculative guess work, but will be accurate to within 25%.

Secretary Pace: When the Army's responsibility ends, could the Army provide aid in psychological rehabilitation? Should KMAG continue?

General Macarthur: The KMAG group has been wonderful. As far as the military mission is concerned, I think it should be continued indefinitely. I want to pay high tribute to that group. I believe that 500 officers and men should be continued indefinitely. At the start of rehabilitation the Army will have to continue until the civil rehabilitation is organized. It should be organized as rapidly as possible. The United Nations should take it over. You will have a hard job getting good men to serve in Korea. It is not a nice place.

Secretary Pace: In the period of rehabilitation General Walker can assess the leadership qualities of the ROK men to take over civilian leadership.

GENERAL MACARTHUR: Mr. Muccio knows more about this than I do and the Embassy has a thorough knowledge of the Koreans.

Ambassador Muccio: The Koreans are very obstinate. They have been pushed around so long they don't like it. They are convinced that we do not want Korea. The Mission has done a great job training the young Koreans. They have pushed aside the old Chinese and Japanese trained Koreans. There is no hope in the old Koreans, but in the young ones there is great hope.

Mr. Rusk: Is it undesirable to turn KMAG into a U.N. operation?

Would that spoil its effect?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: From a political point of view it would be O.K., but militarily there must be unity of doctrine. The others may have different doctrines than we have.

GENERAL BRADLEY: It didn't work in Greece. We had to take it all over.

Mr. Rusk: We might be able to work it out by using small numbers of other Nationals or by getting the U.N. to ask the U.S. to take it on a contract basis. The other question I had was that we would like to see military responsibility for relief and rehabilitation end, and would also like to see the U.S. operation moved over to the U.N. On the other hand, the U.N. is trying to do something it has never done before. It is going to have some responsibilities never before undertaken on the same scale. It may be necessary for an organization like ECA to stand by and resume some of the responsibilities. Is it fair for us to assume that the basic installations of the country—railroads, water, etc.—will be in adequate use before the U.N. take over?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: I believe a good deal of that will be done. I believe lots will remain to be done to put them back in good condition. The Army, the minute it takes a city, gets them going but it is only temporary. ECA is continuing to do that. The President sent a letter last week to Mr. Foster ² and told them to go ahead with the long-term rehabilitation. ECA should continue to function.

Ambassador Muccio: Heavy industries, railroads and utilities should be taken over by the Koreans and not wait for the United Nations to get in. The railroad from Pusan to Yongdungpo was put in operation within one week.

THE PRESIDENT: What about utilities and railroads?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: It will undoubtedly take time to put utilities back in operation. The ECA is continuing to function.

Ambassador Muccio: The Army has done well opening railroads. ECA has helped. The Army has had the means and has done a great job with ECA, putting water and trains in operation. A group of transportation men who have been with the railroad company have been most helpful. Fortunately, we had an ECA man who had worked on new development for water works and within a short while he had water running in Seoul. A considerable number of new locomotives have been brought in.

² Not printed.

Secretary Pace: Is there anything in terms of ECA and Army cooperation that we might do to help you?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: No commander in the history of war has ever had more complete and adequate support from all agencies in Washington than I have.

Ambassador Jessup: In regard to the figures which you suggested on the needs, does that include the cost of reconstructing industrial plants in the north?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: Yes, except munitions making. Those plants I would not include.

GENERAL BRADLEY: In regard to the reconstruction of the railroads, I had a lot of trouble in Europe, with pilots shooting up everything that moved and bombing the barracks that we were going to use later. Are you faced with the same thing?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: Me too (laughter).

Mr. Rusk: To what extent is the other side stripping plants?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: They have to some extent. In Inchon I saw at least 20 flat cars which were loaded up with crated factory gadgets which they had not been able to get out. The North Koreans were not in the south long enough to do more than ordinary looting. I believe, however, that industry has not been seriously damaged in North Korea.

Mr. HARRIMAN: Could we hear more about psychological rehabilitation?

Ambassador Muccio: Bring in the Koreans more. They know their own people better than we do. We should provide them with radios and text books and also scientific guidance. We could set up a very effective system with a radio or loudspeaker in every school and village center. I had sound trucks which were very, very effective. With no newspapers and radio service, we sent them out to rural districts and village centers.

THE PRESIDENT: I believe in sound trucks. I won two elections with them. (Laughter)

Mr. Harriman: What about the psychological differences between North and South Koreans?

Ambassador Muccio: Koreans are Koreans. There is no basic difference between them. 80% of them are farmers, anyway. There is no basic schism between North and South Koreans except for a few politicos and intellectuals.

Mr. Harriman: What about the 2,000,000 who came down south? Ambassador Muccio: They were, generally, people of some means. They will be going back to North Korea and will be very helpful to us.

GENERAL BRADLEY: What can you do with the 60,000 prisoners you now have?

General Macarthur: They are the happiest Koreans in all Korea. For the first time they are well fed and clean. They have been de-loused and have good jobs for which they are being paid under the Geneva Convention. I believe there is no real split, but their attitude is due only to the banner that flies over them. There is no difference in ideology and there are no North and South Korean blocs.

THE PRESIDENT: How will Syngman Rhee take the idea of the

GENERAL MACARTHUR: He won't like it.

Ambassador Muccio: The last election was an honest election, about as honest as any ever held in the Far East. How are you going to ignore that? I hope the new Commission will not interpret that as requiring a nationwide election. How you are going to ignore members of the National Assembly is a major problem. The resolution was so worded that it could be interpreted in different ways. There have never been local elections or elections for provincial governors. These could be held.

Mr. Rusk: We must not undermine the present Korean government. I think it may be possible to have your local and by-elections in the south and elections in the north, and then it will be almost time for the 1952 elections throughout the country. I think it will require a good deal of patience.

Mr. Harriman: How about the interim period between elections? General MacArthur: North Korea will be under military control. The U.N. resolution calls for the maintenance of local governments wherever possible. This will not be possible. We expect them to either flee or be killed. Local government will be maintained by appointing local officials recommended by ROK officials.

Ambassador Muccio: There is also the problem of currency to use and what land reform laws to retain in North Korea.

General Macarthur: In the interim the military will freeze land tenure, banks and currency. I will keep the North Korean currency in effect in North Korea without setting a rate to the dollar or ROK won until the civilian government can take over.

THE PRESIDENT: What are the chances for Chinese or Soviet interference?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: Very little. Had they interfered in the first or second months it would have been decisive. We are no longer fearful of their intervention. We no longer stand hat in hand. The Chinese have 300,000 men in Manchuria. Of these probably not more than 100/125,000 are distributed along the Yalu River. Only 50/60,000 could be gotten across the Yalu River. They have no Air Force. Now that we have bases for our Air Force in Korea, if the Chinese tried to get down to Pyongyang there would be the greatest slaughter.

With the Russians it is a little different. They have an Air Force in Siberia and a fairly good one, with excellent pilots equipped with some jets and B-25 and B-29 planes. They can put 1,000 planes in the air with some 2/300 more from the Fifth and Seventh Soviet Fleets. They are probably no match for our Air Force. The Russians have no ground troops available for North Korea. They would have difficulty in putting troops into the field. It would take six weeks to get a division across and six weeks brings the winter. The only other combination would be Russian air support of Chinese ground troops. Russian air is deployed in a semicircle through Mukden and Harbin, but the coordination between the Russian air and the Chinese ground would be so flimsy that I believe Russian air would bomb the Chinese as often as they would bomb us. Ground support is a very difficult thing to do. Our Marines do it perfectly. They have been trained for it. Our own Air and Ground Forces are not as good as the Marines but they are effective. Between untrained Air and Ground Forces an air umbrella is impossible without a lot of joint training. I believe it just wouldn't work with Chinese Communist ground and Russian air. We are the best.

Mr. HARRIMAN: What about war criminals?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: Don't touch the war criminals. It doesn't work. The Nurnberg trials and Tokyo trials were no deterrent. In my own right I can handle those who have committed atrocities and, if we catch them, I intend to try them immediately by military commission.

THE PRESIDENT: Another subject—What is your idea about a Japanese peace treaty ³ without including Russia and Communist China? General Macarthur: I would call a conference at once and invite them. If they don't come in, go ahead. After the treaty is drawn up, submit to them a draft of the treaty and if they don't sign, go ahead with the treaty. The Japanese deserve a treaty.

THE PRESIDENT: What would the effect on Japanese security be when our troops leave?

General Macarthur: Under the name of Police Reserve, we are organizing four divisions of Japanese troops to secure Japan. The present draft of the treaty by the State Department is very good. After friction with the Joint Chiefs of Staff it has been polished until it shines like a diamond. It will call for the security of Japan to be secured by the United Nations with the United States acting as the agency of the U.N. until the U.N. is in a position to do it itself.

THE PRESIDENT: Would we have to maintain three or four divisions in Japan until the Japanese can secure themselves?

⁸ For documentation, see vol. vi, pp. 1109 ff.

General Macarthur: I should say that they would have to be maintained there for several years. At the present time the Japanese, in accordance with the laws of war, furnish a great many things for those troops. They put up $300,000,000 a year. This includes barracks, lights, etc. When this treaty of peace is made I believe this should be changed. The troops should pay their way. We should pay rental, etc. The Japs would not object if they didn't have to pay the bill for the support of these divisions.

GENERAL BRADLEY: Will the Japanese who have kept the faith while our troops were gone expect to receive different treatment from the troops when they return from Korea?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: Omar, there is complete camaraderie between the troops and the Japanese. The Japanese like our troops. I think that the presence of the troops means prosperity. They spend money and bring in so much. The Eighth Army was pulled out of occupation in January. When they come back they will have nothing to do with occupation.

GENERAL BRADLEY: The Eighth Army is returning to Japan soon. We have the problem of getting additional troops to Europe. As it now stands it will be April before we can get a division into Europe. Could the Second or the Third Division be made available to be sent over to Europe by January?

General MacArthur: Yes, I will make one available by January. I would recommend that the Second Division be selected, as it is a veteran division, better trained, and would make a better impression.

Secretary Page: Would GARIOA end with the peace treaty? General MacArthur: Yes, Japan will be self-sufficient in 1952, treaty or no treaty.

Secretary Pace: Should SCAP continue after the treaty of peace? General MacArthur: SCAP should completely cease. I think these troops should be directly controlled by the Department of Defense, just like troops in the United States, and their relationship with the Japanese should be the same as garrisons in America. I don't think they should have anything to do with political aspects. SCAP should discontinue entirely. I told Mr. Dulles I believe I could sell that to the Japanese. Understand, if you skin them alive as Carlos Romulo, and some of the other boys want to, you won't be able to get anything from them. I think the text drawn up by the State Department is a very fine treaty.

Mr. Rusk: In connection with those troops moving back from Korea to Japan, ideally, we should have a peace treaty before military occupations in Korea wind up, but your operations in Korea are going faster than the diplomats can go in getting a treaty.

GENERAL MACARTHUR: I hope to get the Eighth Army back by Christmas.

Mr. Rusk: We cannot meet that. Should you let the Japs know we are going to have a peace treaty and make a statement to the Japs about the treaty to facilitate the return of the troops?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: Your thought is a good one. Last January I made some statement along those lines. This January I will scratch their backs again somehow.

Mr. HARRIMAN: Should we begin to pay some of the expenses of occupation on return from Korea?

General Macarthur: Averell, that is what we should do. If we do this we can stop the GARIOA. We are taking more out than we are putting in. It is not the Japs' fault that we do not have a treaty. It is an iniquitous thing that we are taking more out than we are putting in. It is a breach among the allies which prevents a treaty. Three years ago they did everything we asked and we have a moral obligation to them. If we pay our way in Japan for part of the cost of the troops in lieu of GARIOA funds, this might be a satisfactory arrangement if it can be worked out.

Secretary Pace: I certainly think it merits consideration and no doubt it would have great psychological benefits. We have both internal problems in the Department of Defense and also with the Appropriations Committees of Congress. This isn't a final view, but my personal opinion is that it should be given consideration.

General MacArthur: I am sure that you are right. Congress will not like it. All Congressional groups who came over wanted to swallow up more from the Japanese economy.

THE PRESIDENT: You and State get together and work it out and bring it to me for approval.

Secretary Pace: Or disapproval. (Laughter)

THE PRESIDENT: I would like to hear your views, General, on a possible Pacific pact 4 or some other arrangements similar to that in the Atlantic.

General Macarthur: A Pacific pact would be tremendous, but due to the lack of homogeneity of the Pacific nations, it would be very difficult to put into effect. If the President would make an announcement like the Truman Doctrine, which would be a warning to the predatory nations, it would have a great effect. It is not possible to get a pact, since they are so nonhomogeneous. They have no military forces. Only the United States has the forces. All they want is the assurance of security from the United States. The President should follow up this conference with a ringing pronouncement. I believe that at this time, after the military successes and the President's trip, it would have more success than a Pacific pact.

For related documentation, see vol. vi, pp. 1 ff.

Admiral Radford: I was in Manila last May during the conference Quirino called. I didn't attend the meetings but I spoke to a number of delegates. There was generally the same feeling that General MacArthur brought out. They didn't feel they could get together but they would like to know in advance of any announcement. I am sure they would heartily agree but would like to be consulted. I believe such a pronouncement could be included in the U.N. speech and if they could be consulted, they would feel they were in on the ground floor. The peace will be upset again in six months if you do not take steps to stop it. We just have to face the facts of life. We must continue the policy followed in Korea to maintain the peace. The situation in Indo-China is the most puzzling of all as to what we can do or what we should do.

Mr. Harriman: When you speak of the Truman Doctrine, do you mean direct external aggression or do you mean the type of thing that has been going on in Indo-China and has previously occurred in Greece to which the Truman Doctrine was directed?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: I am referring to direct aggression. The situation in Indo-China is puzzling.6 The French have 150,000 of their best troops there with an officer of the highest reputation in command. Their forces are twice what we had in the perimeter and they are opposed by half of what the North Koreans had. I cannot understand why they do not clean it up. They should be able to do so in four months yet we have recently seen a debacle. This brings up a question of far deeper concern. What is the capacity and caliber of the French Army? In the first world war they were excellent. In the second world war they were poor. The present French soldier is doubtful. If the French won't fight we are up against it because the defense of Europe hinges on them. They have the flower of the French Army in Indo-China and they are not fighting. If this is so, no matter what supplies we pour in they may be of no use. The loss of territory in itself is nothing, but the French failure is broader than this. I cannot understand it.

THE PRESIDENT: I cannot understand it either.

ADMIRAL RADFORD: The French seem to have no popular backing from the local Indo-Chinese. The French must train native troops. The rest of Southeast Asia—Burma, Siam—is wide open if the Chinese Communists pursue a policy of aggression. We probably have more chance of assisting in Indo-China than anywhere else. We must stiffen the backbone of the French.

For documentation on Indochina, see vol. vi, pp. 690 ff.</sup>

Mr. HARRIMAN: The French hold a key position both in Europe and Asia. I have been told by officers who were there that the French fought well in Italy. This is a matter to which we must give close thought. The French must change their attitude relative to Indo-China.

THE PRESIDENT: We have been working on the French in connection with Indo-China for years without success.

GENERAL BRADLEY: Some of the French fought well during the last war. I had under my command the Second French Armored Division and they fought very well, but they were selected people who had escaped from France to continue the fight. We cannot judge the fighting of all French troops by them.

THE PRESIDENT: This is the most discouraging thing we face. Mr. Jessup and others have worked on the French tooth and nail to try and persuade them to do what the Dutch had done in Indonesia but the French have not been willing to listen. If the French Prime Minister comes to see me, he is going to hear some very plain talk. I am going to talk cold turkey to him. If you don't want him to hear that kind of talk, you had better keep him away from me.

ADMIRAL RADFORD: Recently there were some French ships in Hawaii. I had the impression they were not anxious to go to Indo-China and were dragging their feet. They would have stayed in Pearl Harbor for six months if I had invited them.

THE PRESIDENT: I have talked at some length with General Mac-Arthur about the situation in the Philippines. The General suggested that Mr. Dodge 8 would be able to help out on this situation. I think if we could get him down there the job would be done.

Secretary Pace: Could he be spared?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: He is doing a job now in Japan and about two or three months after he is through he could be spared.

THE PRESIDENT: General MacArthur has suggested that I send for Quirino. Maybe I should send for him and tell him what we want done. I am not sure whether that is the right thing to do.

GENERAL MACARTHUR: If you are going to give him fifty million dollars, I think you should (laughter).

THE PRESIDENT: General MacArthur and I have talked fully about Formosa. There is no need to cover that subject again. The General and I are in complete agreement.

General Bradley: With regard to the offers of additional troops from the United Nations, are not some of them more trouble than they are worth militarily? Politically they are fine. Some of the offers are still in nebulous form. Some are due to arrive in Korea in February or March. In most cases it will be necessary for us to pay for their transportation, maintenance and training and inasmuch as General MacArthur expects to have concluded military operations by November, is it worthwhile to continue working on them or should we ask only for token forces?

GENERAL MACARTHUR: They are useless from the military point of view and probably would never see action. From the political point of view, they give a United Nations flavor. I think that the balance between these two considerations should be struck in Washington. I cannot do it.

General Bradley: Perhaps the United Nations flavor could be retained but the cost reduced by having only token units as, for example, from Canada, which had proposed to send a brigade to Okinawa for further training.

Ambassador Jessup: Mr. Pearson, the Canadian Minister of External Affairs, has said that the Canadians would prefer not to send troops to Korea but were willing to put them into international service, possibly to earmark them for Europe.

ADMIRAL RADFORD: The Canadians have some representation. They have three destroyers in Korea.

GENERAL MACARTHUR: Their services have been excellent.

MR. RUSK: Not long ago Bajpai spoke to Henderson about a suggestion Nehru was turning over in his mind. This would be placing Indian and Pakistani troops along the Korean-Manchurian and Korean-Soviet frontier to act as a buffer between these countries and the U.S. Forces in Korea. While they were talking, Nehru sent for Bajpai who returned shortly thereafter saying that Nehru had dropped the whole idea. We might think this over in case Nehru comes up with it or something similar in the future. I wonder if General MacArthur thinks such a plan would be dangerous.

General Macarthur: It would be indefensible from a military point of view. I am going to put South Korean troops up there. They will be the buffer. The other troops will be pulled back south of a line from 20 miles north of Pyongyang to Hamhung. I want to take all non-Korean troops out of Korea as soon as possible. They ought to move out soon after the elections. The ROK troops can handle the situation. The greatest calamity in Asia would be if the Koreans should turn against us as a result of some UN opposition to the Rhee Government. They are quite capable of handling their own military affairs. It would be a pity if we turned them against us. I have been shaking in my boots ever since I saw the UN resolution which would treat them exactly on the same basis as the North Koreans. As Ambassador Muccio has said, the Koreans are a sensitive people and we might easily turn them against us. It would be bad to turn out of office a government which had stood up so well and taken such a beating, and to treat them just like the North Koreans. We have supported this government and suffered 27,000 casualties in doing so. They are a government duly elected under United Nations auspices and should not be let down.

THE PRESIDENT: This cannot be done and should not be done. We must insist on supporting this government.

Mr. Rusk: We have been working and explaining our point of view in the United Nations but there has been an effective propaganda campaign against the Rhee Government which has infected some of the UN delegations.

THE PRESIDENT: We must make it plain that we are supporting the Rhee Government and propaganda can "go to hell".

No one who was not here would believe we have covered so much ground as we have been actually able to cover. We might break up to have luncheon at twelve o'clock and in the meantime a communiqué oculd be prepared and talks among the members of the staff can be carried on. Then I want to award a couple of medals to a couple of people and we can all leave after luncheon.

GENERAL MACARTHUR: If it's all right, I am anxious to get back as soon as possible and would like to leave before luncheon if that is convenient.

THE PRESIDENT: I believe this covers the main topics. Secretary Pace, did you have anything else to take up?

Secretary Pace: Yes, sir, but I can take them up separately with General MacArthur, and I imagine General Bradley has some also.

THE PRESIDENT: The communiqué should be submitted as soon as it is ready and General MacArthur can return immediately. This has been a most satisfactory conference.

The formal conference ended at 0912, Wake Island time. Informal discussions continued for one and one-half hours between various members of the two groups.

ADDENDUM TO NOTES ON WAKE CONFERENCE OCTOBER 14 1

Following the general meeting between the President and General MacArthur, Mr. Harriman and I had some further conversation with General MacArthur. The following points may be useful in supplementing the notes of the principal meeting.

1. French Problem in Indochina

During his discussion with the President, General MacArthur had made several references to General Carpentier ² as an officer who "enjoyed the highest reputation". Privately, we asked General MacArthur what he thought the essence of the problem was in Indochina. He replied, "They need to get an aggressive General". It was clear that General MacArthur felt that an aggressive General could clean up the Viet-minh forces with French Union troops now available in Indochina. He contrasted the Indochinese situation sharply with Korea and left the impression that our problem in Korea was more difficult from a military point of view than the problem faced by the French Commander in Indochina.

2. Relation between Popular Support and Military Success in Indochina

I asked General MacArthur how seriously popular opinion should be weighed as a military factor in such operations as Indochina and Korea. I asked him whether a hostile Korean population would have made any substantial difference to his Inchon landing. He replied that a hostile population could have, of course, made the task more difficult but it would not have been a decisive factor. He said that "armed men passing through a village in Asia are treated with the highest respect". He said the principal annoyance which comes from a hostile population is in the "logistic support which it gives to the enemy". He referred to furnishing food, water, care of wounded and, particularly, intelligence.

3. War Criminals in Korea

I asked General MacArthur whether the view he had stated in the principal meeting (that we should limit our action against war criminals to those guilty of military war crimes) was based upon the fact that political leaders in North Korea were puppets and really directed from Moscow or whether on general grounds he objected to the trial of political war criminals. He said his view rested upon general grounds. He said that the responsibility given him to try major Japanese war criminals was the most repugnant task he had ever had to perform. He seemed to have in mind senior military war criminals because he said that "military commanders obey the orders of their governments and have no option about waging war".

I asked him whether he had any information that Kim Il Sung had ordered military atrocities as a matter of policy. He said that, if that were the case and he could catch Kim Il Sung, he would try him and execute him by military commission but that he did not have evidence that that was the case. He said that the conduct of North Korean troops toward prisoners and civilians varied greatly from unit to unit and he therefore doubted that it was a matter of general policy.

4. Possible Chinese Declaration of War

I mentioned to General MacArthur the fact that the Chinese have threatened privately to enter the Korean war if UN forces crossed the 38th parallel. He said he did not fully understand why they had gone out on such a limb and that they must be greatly embarrassed by the predicament in which they now find themselves. I said that we assumed under great Russian pressure it might not be impossible (though improbable) that Red China might declare war on the United States. Such a declaration might cover merely a stepping-up of indirect support to North Korea. I asked General MacArthur whether he thought such a declaration should be treated with contempt or what he thinks our attitude should be. He said that he did not believe that Peiping would declare war on the United States without assurances of Russian support, that they would not declare war as a gesture, and that we should treat any such declaration with the "utmost seriousness".

5. South Korean Military Performance

General MacArthur expressed the greatest admiration for the ability of the South Koreans to reorganize their forces into an effective combat force during the period of general retreat and discouragement in the opening weeks of the war. He said that KMAG should have the highest marks for their part in this operation. He said that, had the South Koreans not pulled themselves together and fought well, the war might have had quite a different result.

Токуо [, undated.] [Received October 16—3: 45 a. m.]

CX66554. To President of the United States, the Honorable Harry S. Truman, information JCS and Secretary of State. I have just received the following message from President Syngman Rhee:

"United Nations' new committee's resolution 1 not acceptable. Korean people will insist on maintaining their inalienable right to hold elections and to set up any government according to their free will, under the observation of and in cooperation with United Nations Commission. But to allow any nation or nations, even United Nations, to interfere with the internal administration in cooperation with the existing Communist organizations imposed upon the people by alien power is impossible. After defeating the Communists at the cost of the precious blood of United Nations and Korean armies, the new committee's proposal to protect and revive Communism in the north is unthinkable. This government is taking over the civilian administration whenever hostilities cease by dispatching the governors appointed 2 years ago for 5 provinces of the north to restore peace and order. When the situation is ready for elections, the people will be allowed to elect their own governors in free atmosphere and the same civic rights and privileges enjoyed by the citizens in south will be extended equally to all people of the north. In deference to the desire of United Nations' new committee, I will resign in first opportune moment but must first settle the Communist problem which is the sole purpose of this war, and the will of people in north and south be carried out free from the influence of Soviet or any other outside power. Signed Syngman Rhee.

I am advising President Rhee that he should carefully avoid any action which might encourage further public controversy as to this matter pending the opportunity for a thorough review of the same in Washington. His message does, however, reflect that resentment of which I expressed my deep concern during yesterday's conference and I believe that every effort should be made by our government to reconcile the position of the United Nations' interim committee on Korea with the previous resolutions and commitments of the United Nations with respect to the establishment of the existing government of the Republic of Korea. As you pointed out in yesterday's conference, we must not unnecessarily alienate that government and the people it represents who during the past 3 months have displayed so determined and gallant a stand against aggression and in support of the US-UN principles, nor are we justified in ignoring decisions of the United Nations of the past 3 years, particularly as to the bona fides of the elections held on May 10, 1948 and May 30, 1950. To do so would be to create full legal and moral grounds for just such resentment. Ambassador Muccio fully concurs.

SECRET

New York, October 16, 1950—9:15 a.m.

1. Korean Relief and Reconstruction (US/A/2681/Rev 1)¹

Mr. Lubin explained that the paper before the Delegation was a draft resolution for action by the Economic and Social Council, containing a second draft resolution for adoption of the General Assembly, with respect to the establishment of a Korean War Damage and Rehabilitation Agency. The draft resolution had been worked out with the British, French, Brazilians, and Canadians. While it was not yet finally accepted by those delegations, they had given it tentative approval. It was the general trend of thinking within our own Delegation that we should have voluntary contributions to the Korean relief program based upon certain percentages which each country would agree to contribute after consideration of an assessment scale in the Fifth Committee.

Mr. Lubin summarized the provisions of the resolution regarding the establishment of the Korean War Damage Agency and providing for the designation of a United Nations Agent General and his deputy to conduct relief operations in Korea. He pointed out that the proposed Agent General would be assisted by an Advisory Committee which we thought should be composed of the five states making the largest contributions to the relief work in Korea. He noted that the question of funds and procurement of supplies would, under this plan, be handled by the Agent General who would be able to use existing agencies insofar as practicable.

Mr. Lubin raised several questions which the Delegation would have to take into account. The first was whether the Unification Commission should be given more authority in the relief field. He noted that the Australians insisted, for example, that the Commission should be the principal authority, and that the Agent General should be made more directly responsible to it. The second question was whether we should insist that the Agent General be an American or whether we would be willing to take an Asian as Agent General, with a capable American national to serve as his deputy. The third question was whether the Advisory Commission should be composed of the five largest contributors. In this connection he observed that this advisory body had virtually no real authority.

Mr. Dulles inquired where the money for the Korean relief operation was coming from. Mr. Lubin explained that Committee Five would consider this problem after information was available as to the probable cost of the contemplated program. The Committee could then work out an arrangement whereby each country would be requested to give a certain amount. Mr. Dulles observed that the United States would, in fact, be putting up most of the money. For this reason he questioned whether we should hide ourselves behind an Asiatic serving as the Agent General. After all, one of the purposes of the program was to put on a demonstration of what we could do and to make the Asian people realize what a contribution the United States could make to their economic well-being.

Mr. Lubin called attention to another point of view in this connection; that was that if an American were running the relief operation, we would be accused of imperialism in the Far East, and this would be taken as further evidence of the fact that Korea was our special party. He pointed out that we were not permitting others to play a dominant role in the administration of the Unified Command. In order to overcome this feeling the suggestion had been made that it might be preferable for the deputy to be an American. Mr. Dulles recalled that when he was in Korea, the Americans had been extremely well-thought-of and were doing well. He had seen no evidence that American assistance was regarded as American imperialism in Korea. Mr. Lubin agreed with him insofar as Korea was concerned, but considered it certain we would subject ourselves to criticism from other states in Asia.

Senator Lodge thought it was important to choose an American for the top post. Such a choice would be symbolical as regards the United States and the Far East. In the Far East, an American would be regarded as a symbol of the economic help which the Secretary had referred to in his speech. With respect to this country it would help quiet certain feelings in Congress. In his opinion, the question involved in this case was far larger than Korea. It involved the entire Far East and our policy toward that area. What we did in Korea would raise the question of our position throughout the area.

Mr. Lubin observed that the President, in approving the Korean relief program, had reserved for himself the right to decide whether all money should be channeled through the United Nations or whether some should go through ECA. This was contained in a statement which he signed. Our draft resolution looked toward working under the United Nations, but also through ECA. Senator Lodge observed that if every time the United States engaged in charitable activities, it was going to be accused of imperialism, it would make a great many people in this country terribly sad. He thought we should do things because they were right, and in this connection he referred to the statements coming from the Lucknow Conference.

Mr. Kotschnig ³ observed that as a result of the Korean victory won under United Nations auspices, there was a greater desire to carry through the relief program as a United Nations enterprise than might otherwise have been the case. He believed there was a very real chance of getting substantial funds from other countries for Korean relief for this reason. We would not probably have to pick up the entire check. He referred to his conversations with Colonel Katzin, the representative of the Secretary-General in Korea, who had said that whenever an American relief operation was started in a country, it was done on the most expensive basis. Katzin thought, for example, that the ECA operation in Korea was too large. He therefore felt it would be much cheaper to run the relief operation on a United Nations scale. Korea was a viable state, once it was united, and in his opinion $500,000,000 would carry the relief operation for the necessary three years. Mr. Kotschnig observed that our own experts talked in terms of a billion dollar relief program in Korea. Possibly these facts were in favor of a United Nations operation rather than a straight American enterprise as had been suggested.

Mr. Ross did not disagree with Mr. Kotschnig but wished to place a somewhat different emphasis on the situation. He recalled that while the Korean campaign had been conducted under United Nations auspices, the United Nations had been very glad to use the United States as the agent of the United Nations at that time. He would guess the United Nations would be equally glad to continue to use the United States as its agent in the relief operation. In his opinion the question whether the Agent General should be an American had been previously settled when the Delegation had discussed whether the United States should be on the Unification Commission. At that time we had decided against such membership, but it was thought that it would, under these circumstances, be essential to have an American relief commissioner, or failing that, a Canadian. He went on to recall that the Delegation had also discussed whether the principal secretary of the commission should be an American, and there too, we had agreed that if an American were not chosen, we should insist on a qualified Canadian.

Senator Cooper asked whether the problem before the Delegation was whether the relief operation should be done by the United States or the United Nations, or whether it was simply a question of the Agent General's being an American. Mr. Dulles thought the Delegation was considering only the appointment of the Agent General. He was personally concerned by the extent to which we seemed to be writing ourselves out of the Korean operation. Senator Cooper thought that by making the Korean relief effort one to which all the United Nations members would make contributions, any stigma of imperialism could be removed.

Mr. Kotschnig stated that the only serious candidate for relief administrator in Korea was Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar of India. His candidacy faced us with a real problem since he had great support in the United Nations and the confidence of many of the members. His Indian nationality did create a problem for us. Nevertheless, Mr. Kotschnig thought we would be faced with a very strong move for his appointment. Mr. Allison observed that if an Indian were appointed Agent General, there would be considerable difficulty with members of the government of the Republic of Korea, who had lost all faith in the Indians. He wished to associate himself with what Senator Lodge had said, and that was that we should find the right thing to do in Korea and then go ahead and do it. He thought it important to have an American as the chief relief administrator; a highly qualified Asian could be chosen as his deputy.

In response to a question from Senator Lodge, Mr. Lubin reviewed the composition of the Unification Commission in Korea, the plan for the economic relief operation, and the body which would be set up to administer it. Mr. Lubin went on to say that on the basis of our preliminary preference for an American to be chosen as Agent General, our draft resolution provided for the nomination of a candidate by the Secretary-General, which we thought would make it easier to put up a qualified American. However, he noted that other members might insist that this individual be appointed by the General Assembly in which case we might encounter difficulty.

Mr. McKeever felt that since Americans had been left out of other vital bodies in Korea, it was particularly important that an American head up the relief program. In his view the only way to disprove charges of imperialism was to have Americans in positions which would disprove these charges. The real issue was to find an American who understood Asian problems. He had one other comment. He wished to see the words, "war damage", removed from the title of the commission. It would be better, he thought, to call it the "Korean Relief and Rehabilitation Agency". He observed in this connection that Communist propaganda already tagged this country as being responsible for the greater part of the war damage in Korea, and he thought we should not point up the war damage ourselves in choosing the title for this agency.

Mr. Dulles observed that while it was technically true that Korean political decisions would be made by the Commission, nevertheless, local relief people also would make political decisions. There was the question of to whom the relief should go, for example. He thought the fellow on the spot would have tremendous political influence. He believed we would be flying in the face of reality to consider that the relief operation could be carried out by an Indian without any politics.

Mr. Kotschnig thought it would be unfortunate to delete the phrase, "war damage". This was the reason certain countries were ready to participate in the operation. It had to be made clear that this relief agency would be concerned with rebuilding and not with economic development. A suggestion was made that the origin of aggression in Korea could be clarified by the inclusion of appropriate language in the preamble. Mr. Kotschnig still felt that if this were done, a great many other countries would not be willing to participate in the operation. They had insisted on the use of the words, "war damage".

Mr. Bancroft called attention to the close analogy between this situation and the Palestine relief program. There, we had chosen a non-American administrator, assisted by an Advisory Commission on which the United States was represented. At that time we had not thought the choice of an American necessary. Mr. Ross, however, believed the particular situation of the United States in the Middle Eastern area distinguished the Palestine situation completely from Korea.

Mrs. Roosevelt inquired whether the emphasis should be placed upon war damage or upon rehabilitation. She could not see why both were not covered in Mr. McKeever's suggested language. Senator Lodge asked whether the Secretary's speech had not suggested that the Korean case would be something of a pilot project, or model relief operation, to show what could be done. Mr. Lubin thought the Secretary's speech more precisely suggested Korea might be an example of what countries could do if they got together and worked cooperatively. Mrs. Roosevelt said her own impression of the purpose of the operation was to bring Korea back to conditions before the war. She did not think there was any intention of the United Nations going in to make a demonstration of how an economy should be run.

Mrs. Roosevelt attempted to sum up the feeling of the Delegation on this subject. As nearly as she could see, the only major suggestion which had been made was that of Mr. McKeever to delete the words, "war damage". Mr. Kotschnig, on the other hand, felt that it should be included from the standpoint of the position of other members. Mr. Cohen thought that proper language in the preamble would be helpful in this connection. Ambassador Gross agreed. Mr. Kotschnig observed that many countries objected to the use of the words, "relief and rehabilitation". The name was too much like that of UNRRA which awakened certain unhappy memories. The suggestion was made that possibly the name could be changed to Korean Reconstruction Agency, or to Korean Relief Agency. Mrs. Roosevelt thought that the problem should be met in this way. She assumed the sense of the Delegation was to prefer an American as the Agent General, but to recognize the difficulties raised by the particular Indian candidate. Nevertheless, it was the feeling of the Delegation that for the present we should try to get an American. Such an American should have a remarkable knowledge of the Asiatic situation and be able to take advantage of the particular situation. She summed up the Delegation's decision as being in favor of an American as Agent General and of deleting the words, "war damage", in the title of the Agency. These decisions could be reviewed in the light of the developments growing out of our discussions and consultations with other delegations.

Senator Lodge said he was not prepared to agree without a convincing demonstration, that a large-scale, double barreled American effort would not be better than the suggested proposals. The fact that Americans did things in a big way and were not penny pinching was what had enabled us to be successful during the war. Perhaps this did not look wasteful to some, but our way cleaned up situations quickly, and we got better results in the end. Mrs. Roosevelt thought these observations were more applicable to a long-run relief plan. She said she would like to see any American reconstruction plan run in that way.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] October 16, 1950.

Subject: Extension of the Authority of the Republic of Korea into North Korea and the Holding of Elections

Participants: Colonel Ben C. Limb, Korean Foreign Minister
Mr. Arthur B. Emmons, 3rd, Officer in Charge of Korean Affairs

Colonel Ben C. Limb, Korean Foreign Minister, called me at 11 o'clock this morning from New York concerning his interest in sending of a Korean GI to the Herald Tribune forum in New York on October 24. I assured him that the Department was aware of the problem and would support in principle his interest in the matter.

Colonel Limb then stated that he was going to talk with the members of the Interim Committee on Korea tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock, and wished to give me certain impressions before so doing.¹ He stated that his Government was very perturbed over the attitude of a number of the foreign delegations to the United Nations (including Mr. Spender of Australia, with whom he had talked at length over the weekend) in supporting the thesis that new elections should be held throughout Korea. He also pointed out that the Republic of Korea was very concerned over the resolution of the Interim Committee of October 12 which would institute civil administration in North Korea under the Unified Command and apparently without consultation with the Republic of Korea. (In this connection, I referred to Seoul's telegrams Nos. 254 and 255 of October 13 2 sent to the Department for the Korean Foreign Minister.)

I pointed out to the Foreign Minister that, while the Interim Committee Resolution of October 12 did not specifically require consultation between the new UNCOK Commission and the Republic of Korea, the General Assembly Resolution of October 7 so provides, and that the latter resolution was, of course, controlling. I told the Foreign Minister furthermore that as we had stated (Ambassador Austin's speech to the General Assembly of September 30)³ the position of the United States Government was that the previous elections in South Korea should not be invalidated but that they should be considered to have full force and effect with respect to the status of the Government of the Republic of Korea south of the 38th Parallel, and that we had consistently argued for this position.

I then pointed out that as regards North Korea, it was our belief that since ultimate integration of Korea north of the 38th Parallel into the Republic was a United Nations matter, it was up to the United Nations itself to decide upon what steps would be taken toward the holding of elections in that area and the subsequent extension of the authority of the Republic of Korea north of the Parallel. I added that within this context, the position of the United States was in consonance with the Resolutions of the General Assembly of October 7 and of the Interim Committee of October 12, and that these resolutions were not mutually inconsistent. I pointed out that the Interim Committee would naturally be guided by the General Assembly Resolution of October 7, and that the Republic of Korea should not allow itself to become which they had evidently been misinformed.

I told the Foreign Minister that I believed considerable harm could be done to the cause of the Republic of Korea in the United Nations deliberations upon the scope of elections to be held in Korea, and on the question of the political integration of Korea into the Republic of Korea if, at this time, statements similar to those in body [embodied] in the Seoul telegrams, referred to above, were made the basis for official Republic of Korea protests to the United Nations or appeals in the press. I added that I hoped that the Government of the Republic of Korea would be patient and restrained in prejudging the actions of the United Nations at this time in respect to the integration of Korea and would await a full exposition of the position of the United Nations on this problem. I solicited his support in endeavoring to moderate any unduly precipitate reaction, at least publicly, of the Republic of Korea at this time, emphasizing that this particular moment was of great importance in United Nations deliberations on Korea, and suggested that he request his Government to refrain from "rocking the boat" at such a critical juncture. The Foreign Minister agreed to telegraph his Government along these lines immediately. (See Department's telegram No. 203, October 16, 1950.4) I assured him that the United States and its delegation at New York were fully in sympathy with the aspirations of the Koreans for a unified Korea, and that we felt that the best way to accomplish this was through a series of orderly steps under the auspices of the United Nations. I also pointed out that decisions on the future of Korea involved the participation and support of all other friendly delegations at Lake Success and that their views would be of vital consequence to his government.

The Minister thanked me for my frank exposition of the foregoing point of view, and stated that he would modify his approach to these questions in his conversations with the Interim Committee and other delegations at Lake Success. He said he would telegraph his Government requesting that moderation be shown in prejudging any questions relating to a future solution to the problem of unifying Korea. He added, however, that he wished that a clarification could be made of the Interim Committee Resolution of October 12 with respect to consultation between the Unified Command, the United Nations Commission, and the Republic of Korea, which would tend to ameliorate the natural fears of the Koreans that the United Nations contemplates arbitrary action in North Korea without reference to the views or desires of the Government of the Republic of Korea.

Memorandum by the Planning Adviser, Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs (Emmerson)

[Washington,] October 16, 1950.

KOREAN SECURITY PROBLEMS

The problem of Korean security divides itself into three parts, as follows: (1) the maintenance of UN forces in Korea, pursuant to the ⁴ Not printed.

General Assembly resolution of October 7, 1950; (2) the establishment of Korean military forces; and (3) the permanent neutralization of Korea.

The General Assembly resolution provides that UN forces should not remain in any part of Korea "otherwise than so far as necessary" for achieving the objectives of (1) insuring conditions of stability throughout Korea and (2) of taking all constituent acts, including the holding of elections, for the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic government in the sovereign state of Korea. It should therefore be the task of the UN Commission for Unification to recommend the withdrawal of UN forces when it has determined, after consultation with the Unified Command, that the objectives specified in the resolution have been achieved to the extent that UN forces are no longer required. If, in the meantime, a General Assembly resolution should be passed providing for the maintenance of national armed forces elements for service as United Nations units, the forces in Korea could be considered as such units and would provide the precedent for their employment in other areas by the United Nations.

With regard to the establishment and maintenance of military and internal security forces for the Republic of Korea, the UN Commission for Unification, pursuant to its authority to "represent the UN in bringing about the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic government of all Korea" should make recommendations to the Unified Commander for the establishment, in agreement with the ROK, of a UN Advisory Military Group in Korea. This group would in fact represent a continuation of KMAG but should be reconstituted to include personnel from UN member states. To effect this, the UN Commission on Unification should resolve that, in order to maintain its independence, Korea should be encouraged to establish a defensive military force under UN auspices and that, upon agreement between the ROK and the Unified Command, a UN Advisory Military Group would be made available to advise and assist the ROK in maintaining a defense force.

The problem of neutralization would apparently require further action by the General Assembly. NSC 81/1,¹ paragraph 30, provides that "the U.S. should recommend that the UN Commission should consider the desirability of permanent neutralization of Korea accompanied by political undertakings by the ROK and by other states separately, including the U.S.S.R., to refrain from any aggression. The question of a UN guarantee should be studied but no U.S. commitment on this point should be made at this stage".

It may be that if a "uniting for peace" resolution is passed by the General Assembly,² and if the Republic of Korea is admitted to the United Nations, the obligations thereby assumed might be considered as making unnecessary special international commitments with regard to Korea. It would be unlikely that either Communist China or the U.S.S.R. would participate in political undertakings to guarantee the neutrality of Korea and therefore an attempt to obtain such guarantee from Korea's neighbors would accomplish little more than a propaganda objective.

Since Mr. Santa Cruz of Chile has raised the question of a UN guarantee it seems that we might indicate our sympathy with a general discussion of this problem by the Interim Committee. However we might take the position that this is a question which will merit careful consideration and must be thought of in connection with other action which may be taken by the UN, such as the "uniting for peace" resolution, and the progress of the Commission's work in bringing about the unification of Korea.

1. With voluntary withdrawal Korean [People's] Army from Seoul

September 30 war entered new stage.

2. During initial stage Korean peoples army made splendid record annihilating over 70,000 American-Rhee bandit troops and liberating over 95 percent Korean population and territory.

3. Present stage analyzed as follows:

a. Korean war has become long and exhausting one from which American imperialists will be unable extricate themselves.

b. Korean Army unbeaten and remains powerful force gaining recruits at home and abroad. Although it has abandoned certain territory it has gained enormously in strength.

c. Almost all American military forces in Far East committed in Korea and US will be unable send replacements for some time. UN also unable send more troops so in long exhausting war aggressors bound to be defeated.

d. As war becomes more difficult all Koreans become more firmly united behind Kim II-sung.

e. Fighting will become more fierce every day. People's army will fight for every inch of ground but realizes outcome of war not dependent on possession or loss of a city. It can withdraw from Pyongyang as it did from Seoul. PLA abandonment Yenan is precedent this sort of action.

f. We predict Korean peoples army, with sympathy and support all peace-loving people, particularly people of China, will undoubtedly win final victory.

Comment: Document has ring of authenticity and strengthens opinion formed by Consulate General from study of recent public statements by Chinese Communist leaders that military support of North Koreans by Peking will be limited to covert assistance. Reference to recruits from "abroad" suggests assistance will include enlistment of Koreans from Manchuria.¹

With regard first point, UN and US are in agreement that jurisdiction GOK does not automatically extend over North Kor and. therefore, it is function of UN Comm to arrange for election and other constituent acts required to unify the country. For Interim Comite Resolution is essentially concerned with assignment provisional responsibility for govt those parts of Kor not hitherto recognized by UN as being under effective control GOK. My Dear General Burns: Officers of the Department have been in informal contact with your office concerning our views on the intentions of the Chinese Communist regime as interpreted by Indian observers, but I am confirming them in writing in reply to your letter of October 2, 1950.

It is difficult to reach firm conclusions respecting the intentions of the Chinese Communists with respect to Korea and Indochina. The Department has given consideration to the various views of other governments with respect to the reports coming out of Peiping, together with all information available from other sources. In brief, the Department believes that (1) it cannot safely be assumed that the Chinese Communists in their several recent statements—public and private—were simply bluffing; (2) they possess the military capability to intervene in Korea, and Soviet and Chinese interests (that is, the interests of world Communism) in that area are such that they may have determined to do so. However, the most favorable moment for such overt intervention seems to have passed; and current estimates of Soviet global intentions and the history of outside Communist military participation in revolutionary movements in other countries alike lead to the estimate that such intervention, if it occurs, will be (a) limited in amount and (b) nominally covert instead of overt. This last conclusion is supported by our assumptions, based on evidence received from various sources, that the Peiping regime wishes to be admitted to the United Nations, and that the defeats suffered by the North Koreans in their aggression will logically have reduced any desire of the Chinese Communist regime to clash head-on with the armed forces of nations united within the framework of the UN.

There has been some question regarding the political sympathies and biases of the Indian Ambassador in Peiping, Mr. K. M. Panikkar, and his accuracy and objectivity as a reporter are subject to question. The Department is bringing up to date its biographic report of June 20, 1950 respecting him, copies of which were supplied the Department of Defense. I shall send you a copy of the revised report as soon as it is completed.²

While telegrams the Department has received concerning the intentions of the Chinese Communists have already been made available to you, there is attached as of possible use a summary of such reports.²

Memorandum by the Acting Assistant Legal Adviser for Far Eastern Affairs (Snow) to the Planning Adviser, Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs (Emmerson)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] October 19, 1950.

Subject: Permanent Neutralization of Korea

1. You refer ¹ L/FE to NSC 81/1, September 9, 1950, paragraph 30 of which reads in part: "The United States should recommend that the United Nations Commission should consider the desirability of permanent neutralization of Korea accompanied by political undertakings by the R.O.K. and by other states separately, including the U.S.S.R., to refrain from any aggression. The question of United Nations guarantee should be studied but no United States commitment on this point should be made at this stage." You request a legal comment on this proposal.

2. The Meaning of Permanent Neutralization

The proposal is in effect that Korea be made a "neutralized state". A "neutralized state" is defined by Oppenheim as "a State whose independence and integrity are for all future time guaranteed by an international convention of the Powers, under the condition that such State binds itself never to take up arms against any other State except for defense against attack, and never to enter into such international obligations as would indirectly involve it in war". 1 Oppenheim 217. The terms "independence and integrity" of course imply inviolability of territory, and Oppenheim holds that it follows from neutralization that the neutralized State can neither cede a part of its territory nor acquire new territory without the consent of the Powers. The creation of a "neutralized state" should be distinguished from neutralization of parts of states, rivers, canals etc (such as the Dardanelles); from protection in time of war arranged in special conventions for certain establishments (as the International Red Cross); from unilateral declarations that a State will always remain neutral (Iceland and the Holy See); and from undertakings made by bilateral treaty for a State to remain neutral if another State engages in war.

3. Examples of Neutralized States

There are only three examples of "neutralized states" in modern history, -Switzerland, Belgium and Luxemburg. Switzerland was neutralized by the Congress of Vienna, March 30, 1815 (reaffirmed after Waterloo, November 20, 1815). Switzerland acceded on May 27, 1815, and has since always succeeded in maintaining its neutrality. Belgium was neutralized by the Treaty of London, November 15, 1831, renewed at London, April 19, 1839. Its neutrality was violated in 1914, when Germany attacked, and was abrogated by the post-war treaties of Versailles, St. Germain and Trianon, and by the Locarno Pact of December 1, 1925. Luxemburg was neutralized at the Conference at London, May 11, 1867. Its neutrality was likewise violated in 1914. The neutralization of the Independent State of the Congo in 1885 has been considered a fourth example, but appears to have been an undertaking to respect the neutrality of a territorial area rather than a State and embraced no guarantees. It was terminated by annexation on the part of Belgium in 1907.

4. Object and Effectiveness of Neutralization

The object of neutralization of states appears to have been peace between the Great Powers, by eliminating the neutralized State as 1) a potential enemy on the border, 2) an avenue of approach for a hostile Power, or as 3) territory available for geographic expansion on the part of adjoining Powers. The effectiveness of the device appears to have been in inverse ratio to its necessity. In other words, in the case of Switzerland, where the physical nature of the terrain and the resolute character of the State, determined to maintain by force its independence, its integrity and its neutrality, made neutralization by international convention unnecessary, it was entirely effective. In Luxemburg, on the other hand, where neither the terrain, nor the size and resolution of the State were of such a nature as to secure its own neutrality, international neutralization was entirely ineffective in the hour of crisis. Even in Belgium, where the resolution and military powers of the State in 1914 were sufficient to hold up the German invasion long enough to save the day for France, the nature and strategic location of the terrain was such as to invite violation of the international convention and to make the international neutralization nugatory. It must be concluded that neutralization, so far as history goes, has entirely failed of its purpose. It has not had any effective influence in maintaining peace between the Great Powers, or even in protecting the neutralized State from invasion.

5. Compatibility of Neutralization with the Principle of the United Nations

On February 20, 1920, a Resolution of the Council of the League of Nations affirmed that the conception of neutrality on the part of members of the League is incompatible with the principle that all members will be obliged to cooperate in enforcing respect for their engagements. Nevertheless the Resolution recognized that Switzerland was in a unique situation based on a tradition of several centuries that has been explicitly incorporated in the Law of Nations. Accordingly it was found that the perpetual neutralization of Switzerland was justified in the interest of general peace and compatible with the Covenant.

It is believed by L/FE that neutralization, as a system of conventional guarantee against war or the spread of war, is equally incompatible with the concept of the United Nations. The political and territorial security of nations today is being sought in the guarantees afforded by the collective force of all nations, brought to bear against an aggressor nation. The neutralization of a single potential member of the United Nations adds nothing to the security of that State against wanton aggression, which is already guaranteed by the United Nations, but subtracts from the power of the United Nations to enforce its guarantee. It not only removes the neutralized State from the roll of the United Nations that stand ready to oppose and punish an aggressor (unless the aggression happens to be directed against the neutralized state itself), but it may also hamper action against an aggressor State by preventing access to the aggressor across the territory and territorial waters, and the air above them, of the neutralized State. This would be potentially true of any proposition, for instance, to remove Belgium from the Atlantic Union and transform her again into a neutralized State. It may be equally obvious should the Soviet Union or China become an aggressor, and the United Nations desire to project their defensive action across Korea.

Wake and am confident this goes along with his thinking.

Since my return from Wake I have had protracted discussions with President Rhee and also with PriMin, HoMin and Chairman National Assembly. As a result I am satisfied that little disposition exists to question need retaining complete supreme authority North Korea in CINCUNC during occupation period. Mere thought that local North Korean civil authorities courts and police might be used for maintenance of law and order to maximum extent which military necessity permits has jarred Korean officials more than idea that Government ROK might be ignored by UN in achieving unification. However, I consider questioning UNC advisability retention local and provincial governments academic. Local and provincial governments in considerable portion of North Korea thus far liberated disappeared prior to arrival UN forces. As previously reported, I cannot conceive of any governmental machinery at national, provincial, or local levels being found anywhere in north. CINCUNC will therefore have to designate individuals to conduct necessary civil activities. Precise requirements for phases one and two cannot be foreseen and no attempt should be made to prescribe specific blue prints for such a complex operation. CINCUNC must be given widest latitude and discretion in establishment of peace and security measures without imposing on people of North Korea a complete governmental structure during this brief period.

I felt that understanding and spirit of mutual respect existing between Government of ROK, CINCUNC and this Embassy will facilitate eventual unification. President Rhee has agreed to avoid further public comment re authority in north and will send no officials or police north except as may be called forward by CINCUNC. Only police that have thus far gone north have been units attached to and operating with UN army organizations or such police detachments as have been required to safeguard fixed installations—all with concur-

GOI had acted in good faith in matter toward other friendly nations only to be placed in invidious position of cats paw for Soviet-CPR maneuvers. Dept does not favor introduction res this type at present for fol reasons: Res wld openly and irrevocably commit IC and UN to adopt detailed policies and course of action re future Korea as outlined. Furthermore, it foreseen res containing firm declarations along these lines wld further aggravate and strengthen ROK protestations and uncooperative attitude toward ultimate solution Korea proposed by UN. Open defiance by ROK of program continued [contained] in res fol its publication wld place UN and particularly IC in difficult position. While Dept generally supports principles outlined in res which are, in many respects, similar to those embodied in North Korea Civil Affairs Directive (WAR 93721 Oct 9), it believes res already passed on Korea gives ample authority for adoption necessary policies and actions looking toward solution to Korean problem without dangerous restrictions to freedom of action which proposed res wld impose upon future course in Korea. Although formal IC res along foregoing lines considered undesirable, suggest possibility advantage might be gained by Muccio providing Rhee and ROK privately with statement of principles involved and in seeking their acquiescence in and cooperation with such principles.

(1) GOK determined act accordance with UNCOK throughout.

(2) Impossible expect former refugees from North Korea not go home; in that case they should be expected play significant role North Korea, and they are ROK citizens.

(3) President does not insist on his appointment officials in North Korea. He does want some statement, either from me, from MacArthur, or UN Commission that UNCURK will come to Korea to observe conduct elections in accordance with desires Korean people in free atmosphere. He states he is entirely willing accept results such elections if they are not previously prejudiced by appointment Communists to positions power from which they can control eventual elections results.

(4) He is unalterably opposed to use by UN military authorities of Communists, former Communists, or former Communist government machinery for rule in North Korea, however temporary.

(5) As regards provincial governors mentioned in UP story, he said they were appointed long before war; if they go north they do so on own responsibility; for them to gain or maintain power they must secure support and approval of local inhabitants. He says they will not be going as GOK officials. President says he has ordered investigation what persons of North Korea origin would be acceptable for various North Korean posts, including governorships; that he relies primarily for such information on North Korean organizations long established in South; says are such organizations for every North Korean province. When he has this information he will supply it to CINCUNC, perhaps three names for each potential post, for selection and appointment.

(6) GOK should not be expected to act completely accord with UN Interim Committee decisions if GOK not previously consulted, since GOK obviously interested party.

(7) GOK unalterably opposed establishment any military government North Korea; Rhee alleges there are former USAMGIK officers in Seoul already engaged recruiting staff for such service from among persons formerly serving them who actually are hostile to ROK.

Subsequent conversation disclosed President possessed copy EUSAK top secret document re administration North Korea, dated October 9, "Civil Affairs Order 26 A".¹ Conversation disclosed his knowledge contents this document was chief source of concern and his fear Communists would be retained and possibly restored to power in some cases in North Korea, or that no attention would be paid to interests or desires of ROK. I believe were it not for President Rhee's knowledge contents this document, which Rhee said was generally known in Korean Government and whose contents he feared would speedily become known to Communists, that he would not have become so upset as to make declarations which have been construed as being defiance of principles laid down by UN looking forward towards proper solution Korean question.

Memorandum for the Files by the Acting Director of the Office of Eastern European Affairs (Reinhardt)

[Washington,] October 23, 1950.

Subject: Effort to Assist American and other UN Prisoners-of-war in North Korea.

Recent reports from Korea have indicated that United Nations prisoners-of-war were being subjected to the most brutal treatment at the hands of their North Korean captors. The latest reports indicate that many of the POW's were being forced to accompany North Korean units in their withdrawal toward the western and northern borders of Korea under conditions which have already caused many of them to lose their lives. The impending final collapse of North Korean resistance and the possibility that the POW's might either be exterminated by the North Koreans as a final gesture of defiance or alternatively taken across the frontiers into communist Manchuria or the Soviet Union have rendered it imperative that a serious effort be made to protect UN POW's at this critical juncture.

Despite the improbability that the Soviet Government would agree to exercise any influence in this matter and the probability that any approach to the Soviet Government by this Government would only meet with a crude rebuff, it was nevertheless felt that the circumstances outlined above dictated that these risks be run even if there were only a remote chance that thereby some amelioration in the situation of the POW could be achieved.

On Saturday, October 21, EE drafted a telegram for the Embassy in Moscow, instructing the Chargé d'Affaires to seek an immediate interview with the Acting Foreign Minister and to request of the Soviet Government, which had diplomatic relations with the North Korean authorities, its good offices in this matter. He was to point out the gross mistreatment which the POW was suffering and its sharp contrast to the treatment being accorded the POW held by UN forces, who were being detained under conditions as prescribed in the latest Geneva Convention, and to whom representatives of the International Red Cross have regular access. He was to refer to General MacArthur's surrender terms of October 1 and request that the Soviet Government use its good offices to the end that UN POW's would receive treatment equal to the humane treatment accorded North Korean prisoners.

This message was approved by Messrs. Matthews and Jessup. Mr. Lovett thought it was an excellent idea and perceived no objection to it himself but requested that before transmission it be cleared with the Joint Chiefs of Staff. General Bradley, whom it was not possible to reach until late in the afternoon, was of the opinion that such a direct approach to the Soviet Government would run a very great risk of rebuff and that in view of our general policy of handling matters of this kind arising out of the Korean conflict only through the United Nations, this démarche as well should be made through that channel.

Following consultation with USUN, in the course of which the Department stressed the importance that if this undertaking was to have any success it must be handled in the strictest confidence and with speed, the Department was informed that Senator Austin agreed that this was a matter which should be handled through the UN and was of the opinion that the Secretariat General rather than any other organ of the USUN would be the appropriate channel. In view of Mr. Lie's delicate position at the moment it was believed that M. Cordier, the Assistant Secretary General, would be the appropriate channel through which to approach the Soviet Delegation. Mr. Gross discussed the matter with M. Cordier Saturday night and the latter agreed to take it up the following day with Mr. Malik.

This morning Mr. Maffitt of USUN telephoned to report that Cordier had taken the following steps: Sunday morning he had telephoned M. Ruegger, head of the International Red Cross, Geneva, to ascertain whether the latter had any new information with respect to the POW situation in Korea. M. Ruegger said he had nothing beyond what was published in the press but that the IRC was very distressed and concerned by these reports and, since it had not succeeded in getting representatives into North Korea, was most desirous that the UN do anything it could to improve the situation. With this conversation as additional backing, M. Cordier proceeded to call on Mr. Malik, with whom he spent an hour and a half Sunday afternoon. He told him that although he was speaking quite confidentially and personally, he was conveying the earnest desire of the UN, the UN Command and the IRC that the Soviet Government, in view of its diplomatic relations with the North Korean authorities, use its good offices to improve the treatment of POW's in North Korean hands. This was a matter which world opinion took most seriously. After lengthy discussion, which included a good deal of Soviet fencing, Mr. Malik agreed to take the matter up with Mr. Vyshinski but refused to give any commitment beyond that. Finally, Mr. Maffitt stated that USUN would submit a full report 2 of M. Cordier's conversation with Mr. Malik and of course report any development which might result therefrom.3

India, Sweden

Retain the Swedish and Indian hospitals.

Iran, Italy

Cancel the Iranian and Italian hospital units, neither of which is in an advanced stage of preparation.

Latin America

They also would like us to cease and desist any further efforts to obtain any military units, particularly in Latin America.

The Defense representatives recognize that political considerations might make it inadvisable to execute, part or all, of their wishes on this matter.

We pointed out to them that not only did we have to consider the individual political consequences which would take place in each of these countries, but also the overall UN reaction. We stated that the Department would urgently consider this matter with a view to providing the Department of Defense with a definitive expression of its views as promptly as possible after receiving General Marshall's letter.

A further meeting was held this afternoon with representatives of EUR, UNA, NEA, and ARA present. At this meeting it was agreed that:

1. The military situation in Korea has changed radically in recent weeks and some redeployment or revision of past plans seems called for.

2. The overriding political consideration is still to maximize the number of flags flying in Korea under the UN.

3. There would be no political objection to cutting down the size of the large units, assuming that the countries in question were anxious or willing to do so.

4. There would be no objection to cancelling or transferring troops from Korea if there were more urgent military duties for them to perform elsewhere (i.e., possibly the Filipinos to fight the Huks).

5. Pressure should be removed in soliciting troops from countries where the organization and training of a unit was so distant in the future as to make it improbable that there would be any need for any UN troops in Korea at the earliest date the unit would arrive.

On the basis of the foregoing it is recommended that the Department of Defense be informed in answer to General Marshall's letter when received that:

1. We are prepared to discuss with both the Canadians and the Greeks a reduction in their troop contribution from brigade to battalion strength.

2. We are prepared to ascertain from the Philippine Government its views as to the desirability of returning the present battalion to the Philippines and to accede to any request from the Philippine Government that this be done.

3. We are prepared to inform the Australians that we are prepared to release them from their commitment to send forward a second battalion.3

4. We are prepared to tell the British that we are prepared to permit the withdrawal of their troops currently in Korea upon the arrival of the brigade from the UK.

5. We are strongly of the opinion that the Belgian, Netherlands, New Zealand, French and Colombian units should be permitted to go forward to Korea without change in present arrangements.

6. We are prepared to inform the Tranians and the Italians that the need is no longer foreseen for their hospital units.

All of the foregoing would be done in the name of the Unified Command (USG). Careful attention will have to be paid to the political aspects, including the following steps:

1. Arranging for General MacArthur in his next semimonthly report to the Security Council to include a statement to the effect that the rapid change in the military situation in Korea permitted the Unified Command to reconsider its requirements for military units.

2. The UN, through the Secretary General, should be informed of the decisions of the Unified Command in this regard after the decisions have been reached and communicated to the individual governments concerned.

- 3. No reduction in the present naval and air units contributed by other nations to the campaign in Korea would take place at the present time.
- 4. In the case of those Latin American and other countries (other than the Colombians, which are furthest advanced) on whom we have been putting pressure to organize and come forward with units, we would attempt to maintain their interest in such a program but transfer the frame of references from the Korean operation to the United States proposals for peace which include the designation of national units for future UN purposes.

Finally, it is recommended that the Secretary consider discussing the Department's views, when finally formulated, with the President in light of his continuing interest in this subject of UN military contribution.⁴

Subject: Advisability of Contacts with Chinese Communist Representatives Scheduled to Appear Before the UN ¹

Reference is made to the question, which was raised at the Secretary's meeting of October 24, of the advisability of approaching the Chinese Communist representatives at such a time as they may arrive in New York to appear before the UN.

CA is of the opinion that advantage should be taken of the presence in New York of representatives of the Peiping regime to endeavor to develop through them an unofficial channel for bringing, where desirable, our views to the attention of the Chinese Communist authorities with minimum distortion. It is recalled that we have on several occasions used the Indians as a means for transmitting our views to Peiping. This channel, while it has some obvious advantages, has the serious disadvantage that such views must pass through Mr. Panikkar, the Indian Ambassador at Peiping, who is believed to have a strong emotional bias with respect to the Chinese Communists. It was with this in mind that Ambassador Henderson was authorized to endeavor to establish an alternative channel of communication through the Chinese Communist Ambassador at New Delhi. Efforts by Ambassador Henderson to do this came to nothing owing to the unwillingness of the Chinese Communist Ambassador to meet Mr. Henderson or to transmit any expressions of U.S. views to Peiping.

⁴A manuscript notation by Mr. Matthews indicated his approval of this memorandum.

It is very possible, perhaps even probable, that an attempt to approach the Chinese Communist representatives in New York would meet with the same negative response as did Ambassador Henderson's attempt to approach the Chinese Ambassador at New Delhi. The early experiences of our representatives in China support this tentative assumption. On the other hand there would seem to be sufficient new factors in the situation to justify an attempt.

It is suggested that our approach be neither precipitous nor at a forced pace; ² that discussion of any substantive matters be preceded by general social contact; and that initial discussions relate to matters in which the Chinese Communists have a primary interest.

Initial matters for discussion might include U.S. aerial violations of the Manchurian frontier, Sino-Korean frontier problems such as the Yalu River Dam and hydroelectric plant, or perhaps some aspect of Chinese Communist charges of American aggression against China as the Chinese Communist case is developed in the Security Council. Such discussion would fall logically and normally within the jurisdiction of the Communist representatives' official mission. If it is found possible to discuss these matters of primary interest to the Chinese Communists we might then, if the way seemed open, take up matters of primary interest to the U.S., such as exit permits for American businessmen in Shanghai, the release of Mr. Buol,4 Chinese Communist treatment of American missionary and educational institutions and so forth. If, in turn, discussion of those subjects were possible on a satisfactory basis, we might then give consideration to discussion of political issues of more general interest—excepting, particularly, American recognition. It might, of course, become desirable at any time to use the Chinese Communist representatives in

toward northeast China. (U.N. document S/1870)

*Robert Lawrence Buol, a Civil Air Transport operations chief, in Mengtze, Yunnan Province, was seized by the Chinese Communists in January 1950 and held until 1955.

² In a manuscript notation, Mr. Merchant indicated his strong agreement with this suggestion.

⁸On October 26, Foreign Minister Chou En-lai forwarded to the Secretary-General of the United Nations a note complaining against violation of the territorial integrity of the People's Republic of China by U.S. planes on eight occasions between October 15 and 25. On two of these occasions, strafing took place and, in one instance, a bomb was dropped on Chinese territory. Chou demanded that the Security Council take action to stop this aggression, adding that the Chinese people absolutely could not tolerate this extension of the wartoward northeast China. (U.N. document S/1870)

New York as a channel for bringing our views to the attention of the Peiping authorities in connection with immediate problems which might arise, such as, for example, the release of American prisoners of war if they were moved from Korea into Manchuria.

Subject: Permanent Neutralization of Korea

I am much interested by the memorandum of October 19th on the question of permanent neutralization of Korea as referred to in NSC 81/1.

I do not quarrel with the exposition of the legal concept of permanent neutralization. I think it is pertinent, however, to recall the background of the suggestion which appears in NSC 81/1. When this provision was drafted, urgent consideration was being given to the problem of providing reasonable assurances to the Soviet Union and to Communist China that the United States did not intend to make Korea a base from which hostile operations could be carried on against either of those two countries. It was felt that some undertaking along these lines might be helpful in deterring communist intervention or promotion of guerrilla activities. As I recall the discussions at the time, thought was given to the possibilities of undertakings given by the Republic of Korea, restating its obligations under the Charter, and not to use force and not to engage in any aggressive action against its neighbors. As paragraph 30 of NSC 81/1 says, it was thought that parallel undertakings might be given by other states.

It is of course clear that we are not committed by the NSC paper to support such a solution, but I think we are obligated to suggest the idea to the UN Commission. In determining our policy on this matter, I think we can agree with the conclusions of Mr. Snow's memorandum that the neutralization itself will not by any means be a guarantee of peace or security in the long-run. It may still be possible that a gesture along these lines would be helpful in the short-run. The very fact of our suggesting that the UN take this under advisement would be a contribution toward the result which we had in mind.

Same source says Chinese Communists now have 2 divisions China (not Manchurian-born Korean) troops in Korea. Troops if captured will claim to be part of Korean army and Chinese Communists believe UN forces will not retaliate against China in absence intervention by troops openly part of Chinese PLA. However they have no intention of sending in more Chinese troops. Source also says in addition Hsiao Ching-Kuan, previously reported killed in Korea, Hsiao K E also killed there.

Consul General uninformed as to means by which above information reached sub source in Hong Kong and therefore feels it should not be rated too highly. However it would explain how there could be Chinese troops in Korea as reported today's press despite reliable reports that Chinese Communists have decided against open military intervention.

Sent Department repeated information Taipei 110.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

[Washington,] October 28, 1950.

Subject: Conversation between Mr. Hubert Graves, Counselor of the British Embassy and Mr. Dean Rusk.

Participants: Mr. Hubert Graves
Mr. Dean Rusk

Mr. Graves came in to bring the attached message from Foreign Minister Bevin to Sir Oliver Franks which Mr. Bevin had asked the Ambassador to discuss with Mr. Acheson.

I told Mr. Graves that the views of our two governments were very close together and that I saw no reason for the Ambassador to see Mr. Acheson personally. I said that I would call this to the Secretary's attention and inform Mr. Graves by phone that we could report that what I was about to tell him was in fact Mr. Acheson's view.

Regarding paragraph two of Mr. Bevin's message, I said our view was that the Government of Korea's authority does not extend automatically north of the 38th parallel, that this area will be under the military occupation of the Unified Command until the United Nations arranges for a political successor, and that General MacArthur would appoint civil authorities for North Korea with the assistance of Ambassador Muccio during the period of military occupation. I said that Mr. Syngman Rhee had made public statements which were not helpful from the United Nations point of view and would probably make some more, but that we would have to struggle through the situation and insure that the UN have an opportunity to work out the unification of the country. I said that I thought it was most unrealistic for governments around the world to expect the Korean government to be an ideal western democracy under present circumstances. I said I had little sympathy with certain instances where those who were inclined to be critical of Syngman Rhee had fallen far short of democratic processes in their own countries.

With respect to paragraph three of Mr. Bevin's message, I said that there undoubtedly have been South Korean atrocities, that the fighting in Korea has been furious on both sides but that the policy of the Unified Command has been clearly against atrocities and that our responsible commanders are trying to do everything that they can to curb such atrocities. I said that under war conditions, particularly where extremely bitter fighting has taken place, there might be instances of atrocities committed by members of any of the armed forces engaged. I said that it is not easy to curb troops who find their comrades tied together and shot but that everything possible was being done in this regard.

I stated that we are generally in accord with the policies indicated in paragraphs four and five and the last sentence of paragraph six.

[Annex]

Message From Mr. Bevin to Sir Oliver Franks Dated October 27, 1950

KOREA

I foresee difficulties arising in Korea and I want you to discuss them with Mr. Acheson.

2. I am concerned lest the United Nations Commission should be presented with a fait accompli. There are press reports that Syngman Rhee has appointed "Governors" and other officials from South Korea to proceed to the North, apparently intending to extend the authority of his government over the whole of Korea. If these reports are reliable, it means that decisions are being taken which the United Nations will be expected to support. I am not at all sure that this support will be forthcoming: the reaction may on the contrary be that the South Korean Government is usurping the responsibilities of the Unified Command and the functions of the Commission. I and my colleagues are disturbed about this. Public opinion in this country attaches much importance to the setting up of the Commission and would not accept derogation from its functions. I believe that opinion in Europe and Asia would take the same line.

- 3. Reports of atrocities allegedly committed by South Koreans are already being published here. We shall probably see many more such reports. These give opportunities for propaganda which the Russians will not miss, and this propaganda will have an effect. It would be a tragedy if the effect of military success and of resolute concerted action by the United Nations in defence against aggression were dissipated by mishandling the political settlement.
- 4. The South Korean Government has a very big task. It must cope with the immediate internal problem in South Korea, and its participation in the policing and garrisoning of North Korea in the interim period is indispensable. But the responsibility for the administration of North Korea, pending nation-wide elections and the formation of a new National Unified Government, does not lie with Syngman Rhee and his government—it lies with the Unified Command, advised by the United Nations Commission (and, I would hope, advised also by those nations with substantial military forces in Korea). That was what I had in mind when I addressed the Assembly and that was my intention in promoting the resolution of October 7th.
- 5. The issue at stake is even more than that of usurping the functions of the Unified Command and of the Commission. The Security Council were fortunate in securing the support of so many members for endorsement of the policy initiated by the United States Government of resisting aggression in Korea by military means. The South Korean Government may not be legally bound by the Assembly Resolution, but there is a strong moral compulsion on it not now, in the moment of victory, to brush aside the views of Members of the United Nations and not to settle the future of North Korea by arbitrary action. If it does so, not only the Korean Government but the Unified Command will be exposed to criticism.
- 6. I leave it to you how to make this approach, but you can assure Mr. Acheson that I have given much careful thought to the problem and that, in putting these views to him for the consideration of the United States Government, I do so in a spirit of cooperation. It is in the interests of both our countries that nothing should be done in Korea which might provoke adverse world reaction on the grounds that the Commission's functions are being usurped and world opinion ignored.

RESTRICTED URGENT Washington, October 28, 1950—7 p. m.

256. Following is text of directive for Occupation North Korea approved by JCS, Sec State and Defense and Pres being transmitted Gen MacArthur today.

"Part 1—Hereafter follows the general concept for occupation of North Korea.

"The purpose of the occupation will be to establish peace and security so that the Koreans themselves may solve the Korean problem with the aid and assistance of the United Nations. The occupation forces will not impose on the North Korean people a complete administration of government. However, it will be necessary to establish a temporary substitute for the central North Korean government and also to establish and maintain supervision and controls over North Korean de facto provincial and local governments.

"Three phases are envisaged in this occupation. The first phase will begin with the occupation and will continue until internal security has been established throughout the greater part of the area. The second phase will commence at the end of the first phase and will continue until national elections have been held, and the united Republic of Korea has assumed responsibility. The second phase will be followed by a third phase which will continue until all non-Korean UN forces are withdrawn, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the United Nations General Assembly resolution of October 7, 1950.

"During the first phase, conditions of security will be paramount and civil affairs actions will be limited largely to provision of relief and minimum assistance, the establishment and maintenance of law and order and the initial establishment of local and provincial governments. During the second phase, military security will be a matter of less immediate concern and normal political and economic activity under the guidance of the United Nations Commission will be encouraged to the utmost. During the third phase, the united Republic of Korea will assume authority.

"It is contemplated that throughout the first phase the Commanding General of the Unified Command of the United Nations will be the supreme authority in North Korea subject to control by the United Nations and the United States Government as their executive agent. During the second phase the Commanding General will retain complete authority as stated above but will, nevertheless, give the utmost consideration to the advice and recommendations of the United Nations Commission so far as they do not interfere with military security. During the third phase the Commanding General will be responsible for such missions as may hereafter be assigned.

"Part II—In light of the general concept outlined in Part I, hereafter follows your military government 1 directive:

"1. Purpose

It is the purpose of this directive to prescribe the broad policies which will govern the conduct of your occupation, as Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, of that part of Korea which lies north of the 38th Parallel (hereafter referred to as "North Korea").

"2. Mission

You will occupy North Korea in the name of and on behalf of the United Nations. It shall be your primary duty to so administer your occupation as to facilitate public order, economic rehabilitation and the democratic mode of life in the area and to prepare the way for the unification of a free and independent Korea.

"3. Command

The United Nations, through such agencies as may be designated by it, is the supreme authority with respect to the occupation of North Korea. The US Gov acting as exec agent for the UN will formulate your instructions and will transmit your reports to the United Nations. The Joint Chiefs of Staff of the United States have been designated as the agency of the Unified Command through which you will receive your instructions and to which you will report. On behalf of the Unified Command the Joint Chiefs of Staff will issue such interim and emergency instructions and guidance as may be necessary.

"4. Relationships

a. The United Nations will establish in Korea one or more agencies to observe, consult and assist in the accomplishment of the United Nations objectives for a unified Korea. You will give these agencies full cooperation and support and will be guided by their views to the extent permitted by your mission. You are not, however, subject to their direct jurisdiction.

b. While the Republic of Korea has been accepted as the only lawful government in Korea, its authority over that part of the country north of the 38th Parallel has not been recognized. Although you are not authorized to recognize such authority, it is desirable that in matters of national scope you consult with the government of the Republic of Korea through the United States Ambassador to facilitate eventual unification.

c. The Department of State will designate a representative as your political advisor for North Korea.

"5. General

Within the framework of the United Nations objectives in Korea and until the United Nations Commission is in a position to put forward its views, you will interpret your directives so as to change as little as possible the fundamental structure which you find when you enter North Korea. For example, land reform measures, nationalization and socialization of industries and other matters which have a serious impact upon individuals should be left in status quo. Any change should be made by the Korean people themselves after the unification has been accomplished, or in response to the firmly expressed views of the United Nations Commission. Similarly, your participation in the local and provincial governments of North Korea will be limited to the minimum necessary to assure law and order and tranquility. Any amendments or repeals of laws existing at the time of your entry will be limited to those necessary from the standpoint of military security and the success of your mission, or those on which the United Nations Commission has expressed firm views.

"6. Governmental Organization

You will dissolve the Democratic Peoples Republic of Korea, and prohibit all operations and activities of groups inimical to the occupation. You will not create a central government for North Korea other than as a part of your occupational control machinery. You are authorized to retain, remove or appoint such officials on all levels of government as you deem desirable and to make such changes in the political organization of the area as best to serve the occupational mission and to facilitate eventual unification.

"7. Rights of Individuals

The mere fact that an individual is or was a member of the armed forces of the North Korean government, an official of that government or any local government, or a member of any political party will not subject him to prosecution or reprisal and will not, by that reason alone, bar him from office or employment. You will apprehend and hold for trial by appropriate tribunals, in accordance with the law and customs of war, all persons who are or may be charged with atrocities or violations of the law and customs of war.

Pending the establishment of a responsible UN organization to deal with postwar rehabilitation problems, the following principles will obtain: You will supply relief and assistance in goods and services to prevent disease, starvation and unrest and to the extent required for the successful accomplishment of your mission. This assistance will be in accordance with your judgment, consistent with United Nations humanitarian purposes and the desirability for dissemination of information through the entire world as to promptness and effectiveness of UN relief. You will supervise any additional relief, rehabilitation or assistance on the part of other agencies which are authorized to function in your area. In your activities in connection with communications, transportation, health, welfare, re-education, re-orientation, taxation, banking, refugees and in all other proper and pertinent fields of endeavor, you will consult freely with the Republic of Korea, the various United Nations Commissions, and representatives of appropriate departments and agencies of the United States.

"9. Jurisdiction

You will determine to what extent and for what purposes civilian representatives of United States and United Nations governmental agencies will be subject to the jurisdiction of tribunals established by you, or to the jurisdiction of tribunals established by North Korean authorities under your control. Your determination of these matters will be transmitted to the United States Government for the approval of the United Nations, and thereafter all such personnel entering North Korea will thereupon be subject to such jurisdiction.

"10. Control Organization

It is desired that so far as it is practicable, your occupational headquarters shall be separated from your tactical command; that the maximum number of members from all friendly United Nations be utilized; that, consistent with efficient operations and availability of other nationals, there be a minimum of United States and initially of Republic of Korea personnel; and that it be susceptible without major reorganization to transfer in toto to a non-military agency of the United Nations.

"11. Re-education and Re-orientation

You will initiate and conduct an intensive re-education and reorientation program designed to facilitate the accomplishment of the United Nations objectives in Korea and to expedite the unification of Korea under a freely elected government. This program will make maximum use of United Nations guidance and facilities.

"12. Fund Requirements and Allocation of Costs

You will keep the Department of the Army fully informed concerning your requirements for funds necessary to discharge the above missions. In addition, you will maintain such records of expenditures made, costs of services furnished, and value of goods and services received as will permit you to report total costs in specific categories as may be necessary."

307. Deptel 249, October 27 on subject land reform.¹

1. Detailed investigation status farmland redistribution program in South Korea under way and special efforts will be made to ascertain facts situation North Korea during reconnaissance that area early November in connection with war damage survey.

2. Findings in Republic of Korea to date confirm soundness Republic of Korea decision to proceed implementation its land reform program south of 38th parallel. Republic of Korea program, in process implementation at time Communist occupation, provided for transfer farm ownership to tenants tilling individual farms except in special or unusual circumstances. Therefore tenant farmers who planted rice crop in spring 1950 were in process becoming owners land they planted. They had been assured they could make first of

5 annual installment payments of 30 percent of production from 1950 crop.

- 3. Republic of Korea areas occupied by Communists included: 60 percent farmers who already held title to their land; 40 percent tenant farmers almost all of whom were in the process of becoming owner-operators. Therefore despite Communist propaganda claims there is no evidence the Communist land reform program greeted with any enthusiasm by most of farmers in South Korea. Basic reasons Communist program was not popular as follows:
- a. Communist program in effect made former farm owner-operators (about 60 percent of total) tenants of the state, with only utilization rights their land. State in turn was to collect production tax in kind of 27 percent "paddy" field output or 23 percent output from upland fields. Since assessment tax percentages were arbitrary and often higher than provided by law, and since frequent additional assessments for special purpose were made, farm owner-operators opposed so-called "land reform." Same situation found [North] Korea, and reported as early as middle 1947 after visit Pyongyang area of American delegation joint commission.

b. Basic aspiration of tenant farmers is for security of tenure in situation where more farm families than farms promotes insecurity and promotes strong desire of farmers for titles to lands they farm. Utilization rights given by Communists dependent on continued favor ruling clique toward individual farmers. Security land tenure desired by farmers not provided by Communist program.

- 4. Preliminary evidence indicates Communists did not undertake wholesale dispossession of farm owner-operator or tenant farmers. Most of Communist-directed farm redistribution apparently politically motivated and involved dispossession strong Republic of Korea supporters in favor Communist sympathizers. Farmers dispossessed were usually independent owner-operators, who were relatively wellto-do and who frequently held positions of influence in their localities under Republic of Korea. Return of farms to these pre-invasion owners, who planted 1950 crop prior to dispossession, appears to be elemental justice. In case of tenant farmer under Republic of Korea who was dispossessed by Communists of farm he was in process of buving, fact that he planted 1950 crop appears to give him better claim than operator put on land by Communists during July and August. Usually these Communist sympathizers who were given farm land by Communist regime fled with retreat of Communist forces into mountains.
- 5. Reference Republic of Korea thinking on land program for North Korea. Following is part of statement (in translation) issued by President Rhee on October 23 through Office of Public Information: "The farmers must busy themselves in harvesting their autumn crops, of which they shall pay 20 to 30 percent to the government as land tax in accordance with the law now in force in South Korea (sic) and the remainder, they shall be permitted to possess for their free disposal. After the harvest, the land reform law shall be implemented: The farmers must return farm-lands to their former owners, who, in turn shall sell them to the government at a reasonable price. The government, in accordance with the law, will distribute the farm-lands to the farmers, who, after complete payment of their officially fixed prices for the lands thus distributed, will become the legal possessors of the farm-lands. On the other hand, the land owners shall, as prices for their farm-lands, receive from the government some national bonds, with which they will be able to run a factory or other business. However, it seems to be too late to carry out that reform this year. It will be carried out next year. As to the financial, commercial and industrial matters, and the matters concerning the vested properties, the government will apply the same policies that have been carried out in South Korea. It is hoped that any government plan or change to be made on these matters will be well observed."

6. Most Republic of Korea officials desire to extend into North Korea their program for transfer of title farm land owned by absentee landlords to tillers of soil. Some former North Korea landlords now in Republic of Korea area of course, hope to repossess lands north of 38th parallel. However, prevailing Republic of Korea sentiment does not consider this possible or desirable, but does consider proposed payments to former landlords whose lands were confiscated without payment by Communists to be fair and just.

7. Embassy feels Republic of Korea land reform program which developed after several years of widespread discussion of the subject reflects basic aspirations Korean farmers. On other hand North Korea farm redistribution program, which was announced and fully implemented within 25 days in March 1946, not highly regarded by farmers in either North or South Korea. Main criticism of farm population in Republic of Korea areas regarding Republic of Korea program is slowness in implementation laws already promulgated.

From discussions with Eighth Army it has been ascertained that to date 5 prisoners identified as of Chinese origin have been captured in Eighth Army area and 2 in Tenth Corps area. Eighth Army captives were seized in area north and northeast of Pyongyang. 2 or 3 of 5 wore complete North Korean uniforms while others wore part North Korean uniform and part civilian dress. 2 of captives under preliminary investigation asserted that they crossed from Manchuria on or about October 19 and were formerly attached to Fortieth Chinese Communist Army Manchuria. 1 prisoner is represented as stating he crossed into North Korea with unit of 2,000 Chinese troops.

Eighth Army Headquarters states its field units have not reported coming into contact with any sizeable numbers of Chinese troops. On basis current information Eighth Army is not inclined to accept reports of substantial Chinese participation in North Korean fighting.

PLAIN PRIORITY SEOUL, October 30, 1950. [Received October 30—4:59 a. m.]

311. Following is text of press release by President Syngman Rhee issued Seoul October 30:

"The United Nations Forces in Korea, under the inspired leadership of General Douglas MacArthur, are concluding the superb campaign of driving the Communists beyond our Northern borders. The political unification of our country and its economic rehabilitation now come to the fore as the most pressing problems.

"In this connection I desire to state categorically that the Government of the Republic of Korea is determined to act in accordance with the UN General Assembly resolution of October 7, 1950, and to cooperate fully with the UN Commission on Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea.

"I should also like to point out that there are special circumstances prevailing in Korea which must be borne in mind in seeking the best and wisest solution to future problems. The Korean people are a homogeneous people. The tragic division of the country at the 38th parallel was not of Korean doing or choice. Because the hated Communist regime oppressed our fellow countrymen in the north, beginning in 1945 millions of patriotic, law-abiding Koreans came south to save their lives and their self-respect. These fine citizens will now be going home, to their ancestral residences in the northern part of the peninsula. Having taken part, through the franchise and in some cases through holding public office, in the democratic developments of the Republic of Korea, they may be expected to play a significant role in the future affairs of Northern Korea.

"As [for] elections there, I sincerely hope they can be held as soon as a free atmosphere can be created to allow the once-Communist-ridden people to vote according to their conscience without fear. I must point out, however, that this free atmosphere cannot be established if any Communists or former Communists are allowed to remain in any public office or position of any responsibility. I am unalterably opposed to the use of Communists, former Communists or the former

"It has been said that I have already appointed many officials or even composed a slate of officials for North Korea. There was a time, long before this Communist aggression began, when I did name provincial governors for the provinces then under Communist rule. This was done to emphasize to the people of the North that they were not forgotten and eventually they would be a part of their native land. These appointments were made in conjunction with the appointments of governors for the southern provinces. If these or any persons who have been previously mentioned for positions desire to go north at this time, they do so on their own responsibility. For them to gain or maintain positions of authority they must secure the support and approval of the local inhabitants. They will not be going north as officials of the Republic of Korea. As soon as the situation is ready, which I hope will be a matter of few weeks after the cession [cessation] of hostilities, we should hold elections at the provincial level north and south, thus enable the people to chose their own governors, instead of appointing them by the Federal Government or the President. This question was raised in the National Assembly about a year ago and was agreed upon by the leaders of the Assembly and the Cabinet Ministers that this should be done when the nation has been reunited.

"Because of my great interest in good government throughout Korea I have ordered a preliminary investigation of what persons of North Korean origin would be acceptable for various North Korean posts. This information, in some cases, I plan to make available to General MacArthur and will be happy to transmit to the UNCOK as well. The information I receive comes from North Korean organizations long established in the south. These organizations, of course, have their roots in every province in the north. When the information I get is complete, we may find three able candidates from whom a choice can be made for every post. I shall forward all data to the proper UN authorities.

"As to the provisional resolution adopted by the UN's Interim Commission on Korea, I should have preferred to have had it conveyed to the Unified Command after consultation with the Republic of Korea and other interested groups here in Korea. Our government is obviously intensely interested in every decision reached regarding the Korean people and cannot automatically allow itself to be bound by programs made without reference to it or the citizens of Korea.

"Finally, I wish to extend the most cordial greetings to the new UN commission shortly to arrive here. Our government will work closely with it and will endeavor to be of service to its delegates, individually and collectively."

Subject: Telecon for October 31

I have not as yet seen the Telecon ¹ for today, but I did see Mr. Howe's summary of pertinent facts extracted from it which included the following information: The Third ROK Army captured 18 CCF prisoners and preliminary interrogation indicated that they are part of the 370th Regiment of the 124th CCF Division.* The strength of the Unit is unknown but the Telecon apparently included an estimate that its strength might be 2500 men. This Division, which was part of the Nationalist Army until April 1949, crossed the Yalu on October 16. The prisoners taken reported that they had had no food for three days.

Further interrogation of a prisoner captured last week revealed his belief that approximtaely 5,000 CCF troops had been selected from 3 divisions at Antung for duty in North Korea. According to the information obtained from these prisoners these troops were not integrated with North Korean units.

As indicated reference tels, Wash agencies recommended Oct 12 to CINCUNC that ROK currency be used North Korea by authority UN Cmdr. CINCUNC reported that he had already directed that North Korean currency only be used. CINCUNC was advised Oct 20 that use North Korean currencies only was consistent with broad political recommendations UN Interim Committee and was appropriate as interim measure if operational requirements satisfactorily met.

CINCUNC has now reported that Communists have removed all plates and means of printing North Korean currency and have removed or destroyed practically all NK currency held in local and central banks, and has recommended use of a special UN scrip to be printed in Japan (CINCFE's msg CX 67690 being rpted to you.)²

Ambassador Muccio will assist in presentation. Suggest that proposal for UN scrip be discussed as recommendation CINCUNC, but that endeavor be made obtain Interim Committee acquiescence in use ROK currency by order UN Command.

Foll additional points for your guidance:

1. Use ROK currency by order UN Command has no implications re future status ROK. No matter what government is hereafter recognized in United Korea, it will have to recognize validity of currency in circulation, and problems this government will be simplified and UN goal of unification will be served if fewer currencies in circulation.

2. No intent invalidate North Korean currency. It is recognized that equitable rate between ROK and NK currency will have to be fixed soon, to prevent further depreciation NK issues and loss to holders. Rate would have to be fixed soon even if UN scrip used because large amounts ROK currency being introduced. Use UN scrip would probably delay fixing status North Korean currency and lead to further depreciation.

3. Already three currencies in circulation (old ROK Bank of Chosun notes, new ROK Bank of Korea notes, North Korean notes).

Introduction of fourth will only augment confusion.

4. While technically UN scrip could be issued as occupation currency to be redeemed by future govt of United Korea without UN obligation, would represent precedent which should not be undertaken without serious UN consideration, which time does not permit.

Subject: Communist Intentions: Korea

Reference: CA Memorandum of October 4, 1950, "Chinese Communist Threat of Intervention in Korea"

The presence in North Korea of Chinese Communist forces is now confirmed. Although information is lacking respecting insignia borne by the troops in question, it is clear that in the event that they are participating as regular units of the Chinese People's Liberation Army the intervention cannot be conceived of as other than direct, even though there be a nominal attempt to keep it anonymous.

It seems unlikely that the Chinese Communists would be prepared to venture into the Korean theater in such a limited manner as would confront them with the danger of being promptly bloodied and thrown out by the force which they themselves have consistently characterized as "a paper tiger". The recrudescence of Chinese Communist propaganda whipping up enthusiasm of the Chinese people for "resistance to aggression in Korea" would appear to indicate that a larger effort may be involved. It seems unlikely in addition, however, that the Chinese Communists would be prepared to make that larger effort, or that the Soviet Union indeed would wish them to do so, without coordination and understanding from the side of the Soviet Union with respect to the Soviet contribution to the matter in point. The move of intervention would be designed, in short, to achieve some real measure of victory. Although firm information to reach conclusions is still lacking, therefore, it would be hardly safe to assume other than that (1) the Chinese Communists, if they are intervening directly in Korea, propose to do so in considerable force and (2) the Soviet Union would be behind that intervention in accordance with an overall military plan which presumably would purpose the springing of surprises and inflicting of defeats on the UN forces generally and perhaps U.S. forces particularly.

It is believed that the Chinese Communist intervention would not be limited in its purpose and objective to the protection of the Suiho Dam and Power Plant. In Communist ideology political factors generally are given precedence over the economic, and Chinese intervention in the present instance would not have been determined upon for economic factors alone—even where the economic factor was so important an element as the Suiho power installation. In the overall Moscow and Peiping alike object to the presence of a non-Communist political entity in Korea, and they presumably have decided upon intervention with the aim of redressing what they consider the present imbalance. The propaganda line in Peiping has as yet made no reference to the Suiho power installation so far as noted, but instead is based upon the general concepts that (1) it is desirable to render assistance to the North Koreans and (2) China must resist what is essentially threat of aggression against its own frontiers. The question arises, however, whether the Moscow strategy contemplates action at this time only in North Korea. It is to be noted that Vishinsky recently alleged in the UN that the United States was using Japanese troops in Korea, and that this charge was repeated subsequently by Radio Sinuiju.* This general allegation was repeated by the Peking radio, being [beamed?] to Japan in Japanese, on October 29, stating that a conference was held recently, with General Willoughby and former Lieutenant General Sakurai participating, with the aim of determining how to use Japanese military forces in case United States takes military action in the Far East or particularly in China.† That it may be a Soviet design to lay groundwork for citation of the provisions of the Sino-Soviet Alliance of February 14, 1950 in justification of Soviet intervention at some appropriate time must be given due consideration. It is likewise possible of course that the Soviets plan action elsewhere to equal the Chinese Communist effort. The presence of four Soviet armies southwest of Berlin and the current feeling that the Soviets may be about to undertake some move to effect the consolidation of Communist power in Berlin are not to be disregarded. In sum, there is to be considered the definite possibility that the Soviets plan at this juncture to extend the area of conflict.

In the indicated circumstances it would seem highly desirable as a minimum that (1) the UN be kept fully apprised of all confirmed developments in order that our present solid front should be maintained, (2) prompt consideration should be given to the question of what reaction the United States should propose subsequently to the UN to make to Chinese Communist intervention, and (3) we should remain fully alert to possible open involvement of the USSR in the struggle, such involvement resulting "naturally" from the present developments wherein the Chinese Communists have become involved.

Washington, 1 November 1950.

Subject: Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea.

Fresh, newly-equipped North Korean troops have appeared in the Korean fighting, and it has been clearly established that Chinese Communist troops are also opposing UN forces. Present field estimates are that between 15,000 and 20,000 Chinese Communist troops organized in task force units are operating in North Korea while the parent units remain in Manchuria. Current reports of Soviet-type jet aircraft in the Antung-Sinuiju area indicate that the USSR may be providing at least logistic air defense for the Manchurian border. In addition, a radio broadcast of 31 October from the emergency North Korean capital of Sinuiju announced that a "Volunteer Corps for the Protection of the Suiho Hydroelectric Zone" has been formed to protect that area from the advancing UN forces. The broadcast emphasized the importance of the Suiho hydroelectric system to the industries of Manchuria and pointed out that Chinese People's Liberation Forces are concentrated along the Manchurian side of the Suiho zone.

This pattern of events and reports indicates that Communist China has decided, regardless of the increased risk of general war, to provide increased support and assistance to North Korean forces. Although the possibility can not be excluded that the Chinese Communists, under Soviet direction, are committing themselves to full-scale intervention in Korea, their main motivation at present appears to be to establish a limited "cordon sanitaire" south of the Yalu River. Primary objectives of the Chinese Communists in attempting to establish such a no man's land would probably be: (a) to guarantee security of the Manchurian border from UN forces which the Chinese have labelled as invaders; and (b) to insure continued flow of electric power from the vital Suiho hydroelectric system to the industries of Manchuria. The preceding considerations, which are of direct concern to Communist China, would also be in line with the general desire to further international Communism by helping the North Koreans prolong their resistance.

The Chinese Communists probably genuinely fear an invasion of Manchuria despite the clear-cut definition of UN objectives. The reported evacuation of industrial machinery and civilian personnel from Mukden could be the consequence of such a fear although the possibility exists that this evacuation has been undertaken in an effort to anticipate possible retaliatory action by UN forces following Chinese Communist intervention in Korea. The Suiho hydroelectric system, with generator located on the Korean side of the Yalu River, provides a large part of South Manchuria's electricity and most of the power for the Port Arthur naval base area. To date, the UN has made no statement regarding the distribution of Suiho power after UN forces take possession, and Chinese Communist apprehension may have been increased by the recent statement of a South Korean general that all power to Manchuria would be cut off.

From a purely military point of view, I concur in their recommendations. There is no question but what early action on concellation of certain requirements will materially reduce expenses to all governments concerned and will ease the logistical burden on our Far East Command.

I am, however, deeply concerned about the possible political implications in the United Nations, attendant upon certain of these cancellations and want you to know that I am fully aware of the problem confronting you in this regard.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In my letter to you of 25 October 1 regarding a recommended reduction in the size of the Greek force to be deployed to Korea, it was mentioned that in view of the improved military situation in Korea, general reductions in forces to be deployed to Korea by member nations of the United Nations could now be made.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have reviewed the present and projected participation in Korea of other United Nations' ground forces, with particular emphasis on reducing the logistic burden on the United States while retaining the political advantages that derive from the participation of as many United Nations members as possible in the collective action in Korea.

As a result of their review, the Joint Chiefs of Staff propose the following operational decisions, in which I concur, and which I consider to be in consonance with the conclusions reached at the Wake Island conference:

A. Cancel the requirement for a Belgian infantry battalion.

B. Establish requirement for only one Canadian infantry battalion in Korea; cancel the requirement for the remainder of the Canadian Special Brigade.

C. Continue the requirement for the British 29th Group, now en route to Korea; terminate requirement for British 27th Brigade (from Hong Kong) upon the arrival of the 29th Brigade.

D. Establish a requirement for only one Greek infantry battalion in Korea; cancel the requirement for the remainder of the Greek brigade.

E. Cancel the requirement for the Netherlands infantry battalion

F. Cancel the requirement for the New Zealand artillery battalion.

G. Cancel the requirement for any additional Australian infantry units; retain the Australian infantry battalion now in Korea.

H. Terminate the requirement for the British Marine Commando unit now in Korea.

- I. Continue the requirement for the Thai infantry battalion, now en route.
- J. Terminate the requirement for the Philippine Infantry battalion (or the major portion thereof), now in Korea, at the earliest opportune moment.
- K. Continue the requirement for the Turkish regimental combat team now in Korea.

L. Cancel the requirement for the French infantry battalion.

M. Continue the requirement for the Indian Hospital Unit now in preparation for embarkation at Calcutta.

N. Retain the Swedish Hospital Unit in Korea.

O. Cancel any requirement for Iranian and Italian medical units.

P. Discontinue efforts to obtain contingents from Latin America, with the exception of the Colombian offer. I have been informed that negotiations with Colombia have proceeded so far that a cancellation of the Colombian offer at this time would be mutually embarrassing to both Governments. I therefore suggest that they be continued with a view to stimulating early Colombian participation in Korea.

Your agreement to the foregoing proposals is requested. If you agree, it is suggested that the Department of State obtain the concurrence of the foreign governments concerned in order that the necessary orders may be issued. The early implementation of these proposals will materially reduce expense both to the United States and to the foreign governments concerned.

Attached for your assistance in evaluating these proposals and their implications are a tabular list of current and projected offers of assistance and a statement of the logistic aspects in each case.²

Subject: Possible Measure to Lessen Tension with Communist China

CA notes with deep concern the present aggravation of hostilities in North Korea and the growing possibility that we may be drawn into warfare with Communist China. It is not necessary to list the military and political problems which such a development would create for us. Clearly, major hostilities with Communist China would be contrary to our interests and to the interests of the Chinese people; such hostilities could only benefit the USSR and the Chinese Nationalists. With this in mind it behooves us to leave no stone unturned in our efforts to avert what would be at least a tragedy to the American and Chinese peoples, and might lead to a disaster for the United States, should war with China spring World War III.

It is very possible that if hostilities spread to Communist China, this will be pursuant to a coldly calculated decision by Peiping and Moscow to provoke such action as a step toward furthering world revolution. However, we should not assume that this is necessarily the case. We should, accordingly, make sure that no failure by the U.S. or the UN to make crystal clear their intentions contributes to the spread of hostilities. By taking what may appear to us unnecessary or repetitive steps to make our own intentions clear, we may prevent the spread of hostilities; and if hostilities develop notwithstanding our every effort we shall most certainly stand in a stronger position for having made the effort.

It is understood that a bill of particulars of Chinese Communist intervention in Korea is being prepared for submission to the UN. It is recommended that after this move in consultation with friendly delegations and at the earliest possible date we seek to obtain a UN resolution specifically (1) calling upon the Chinese Communists to cease intervention in Korea and (2) assuring the Chinese Communists that if they do so their Korean border will be inviolate and their

Subject: Chinese in North Korea

Having appeared unduly disturbed over the Chinese in North Korea subject for several days, I'll now risk seeming really alarmist. Solely on the basis of the very unusual Chinese Communist propaganda campaign of recent days, it seems to us that:

- 1. At the very least the Chinese are building up to very large numbers (perhaps a hundred thousand or so) "volunteers" in Korea, with the probable purpose of keeping us bogged down in Korea for many months.
- 2. At the most they are building up to open employment of hundreds of thousands of Chinese troops in Korea with a full expectation that this will mean general war between the Chinese and ourselves (for which they are preparing their own people psychologically).

On the basis of propaganda alone, it would appear that they are not planning to limit their participation to anything like as small a force as the presently reported 18,000 "volunteers".

Mr. Campbell said that in reading this consideration would, of course, have to be given to the fact that Mr. Ronning had been in Nanking about 5 years, had been isolated for some time, and that his chief contacts were local Chinese. Mr. Ronning has spent most of his life in China.

In reply to my query Mr. Campbell said that the only other Canadian representatives in Communist China were George Patterson, Consul General, and his vice consul at Shanghai. He said that while the Canadians had code facilities, the amount of information sent in was not great. I took the occasion to tell Mr. Campbell that we were eager to receive any information which the Canadian Minister of External Affairs might receive on conditions in China and that we would be particularly interested in receiving spot information on Communist moves or activities which might be related to intervention in Korea, this being a mutual service since, if the Chinese Communists are actually intervening in a large way, it is of mutual interest to all the UN allies participating in support of the ROK. Mr. Campbell agreed that it would be useful and that he would give us anything that would be of interest.

SUMMARY OF TELEGRAM, OCTOBER 25TH, TO OTTAWA FROM RONNING IN NANKING

Re: Possibility of Chinese intervention in Korea.

Opinion in local Chinese official circles is that possibility of China being involved in the Korean affair, is not yet past. (Reference to large number of troops on the border and recent declaration of Peking leaders.)

China actually has apprehensions about U.S. intentions due to

1) support of Nationalists;

2) talk of possibility of third group overthrowing present regime; and

3) Formosa-MacArthur and Chiang talks.

There is also a feeling of frustration of loss of face over Formosa, and failure to be admitted to United Nations.

While there is now evidence of sour-grapes attitude with regard to U.N., prospect of admission to the U.N. would do much to off-set possibility of intervention.

Message From Mr. Bevin to Sir Oliver Franks, Dated 3rd November

[Re:] Your telegram Chinese Intervention in Korea.²

I do not favour taking precipitate action to refer this question to the Security Council. This might make it more, rather than less, difficult for the Chinese to climb down and avoid open commitment. I would have thought that there was everything to be said for ignoring limited Chinese intervention.

- 2. It is of great importance to establish the military significance of Chinese intervention. If the unified command are still confident that their plans can be executed despite aid from China to the North Koreans then there is everything to be said politically for not forcing the Chinese into a position from which they cannot withdraw. If, however, Chinese intervention gravely prejudices the success of the military campaign (whether this intervention takes the form of moving in substantial forces or of permitting the use of Manchurian airfields) then there would be no alternative to our taking the question to the Security Council. In that event we would also be in a much stronger position in doing so. Your telegram under reference indicates that we may soon reach this position and we are therefore working on a draft resolution as a possible basis for discussion in the first instance with the State Department.
- 3. The lines on which we are thinking are that the resolution whilst it condemns Chinese intervention and calls on them to withdraw at the same time should

(a) Recall the terms of the General Assembly Resolution of October 7th on which United Nations policy has been made

(b) Affirm the intention of the United Nations forces to limit operation to Korea itself

(c) Affirm the intention of the United Nations that their forces will withdraw from Korea as soon as possible

(d) Recognise Chinese interests in the ultimate settlement of Korea (e) Suggest that the United Nations Commission should take the views of China into consideration when considering the future of Korea in accordance with the Assembly Resolution of October 7th.

4. Such a resolution while calling on the Chinese to withdraw at the same time provides an outlet for the expression by the Chinese of their legitimate interest in the future of their neighbour Korea. We feel that it should be stern but objective, moderate and reasoned in character so as to command the maximum support.

5. You should speak to Rusk on these lines explaining that these are my preliminary recommendations and that I would welcome the comments of the State Department although a resolution on the above lines would presumably be vetoed by the Russians it might have some useful propaganda effect. There could of course be no guarantee that the Chinese would in fact cease their intervention and the direct effect on the military campaign might be negligible. The graver implications of measures to prevent effective Chinese intervention would then call for most serious consideration. The criterion however to my mind is the degree of military significance to be attached to Chinese intervention and on this in particular I would urgently welcome the views of the United States Administration. In the meantime our objective should be to continue to build up the United Nations forces so that they can deal effectively with any force that can be put against them.

Since October 29 there has been sharp increase in NCNA articles on Korea and distinctly more bellicose tone toward US. Especially significant are two articles from World Culture datelined October 29 and October 31 article from People's Daily October 29 and statement by Maphsu-Lun at departure of delegation to second world peace congress October 29. Line followed in all these statements is that US bent on world conquest that aggression against Korea will be followed by invasion of Manchuria and that Chinese must aid Koreans in order defend own territory. Article by Teng Chao emphasizes weakness US ground forces and states Communist strategy will be effort to annihilate US manpower through fierce long-drawn-out guerrilla warfare. Article concludes it is essential to give every help to Koreans who are playing vital role in containing American aggression.

Certain recent reports indicate Chinese Communists urgently preparing for possible war with US. USALO has received report from reliable source of recent heavy troop movements into Manchuria possibly including elements of first and third FA as well as fourth FA. Same source reported tension in Mukden and schools being moved from towns into surrounding villages (Hong Kong 257 USALO October 311)....large number reports from reliable sources that fortifications being rushed in Kwangtung coastal area during last two months and other . . . reports . . . state Swatow MCC early October ordered commercial goods administrative records and "military matters" moved out of city into nearby towns and that officials of Kokong MCC said if necessary evacuation south China would follow scorched earth policy. . . . report . . . that treasurer Hong Kong office CNAC stated . . . he had been ordered to Peking "in view of tense international situation" and that personnel of all Communist agencies here had been ordered gradually withdrawn. Source of unknown reliability . . . told ConGen Head of Bureau of Commerce and Industry Mukden had told his father they (Chinese Communist) would soon have to leave Mukden for unknown destination as Americans with aid of Japanese troops were coming into Manchuria. He gave father sum of money to tide him over and told him they would not destroy city as they expected to come back after period of guerrilla warfare.

It is extremely difficult to determine whether inspired statement by NCNA and scraps of information cited above mean (1) Chinese Communists genuinely afraid US intends invade Manchuria and help national government in South China and are taking appropriate defensive measures; or (2) Chinese communists intend intensify present limited intervention Korea and Indochina and are preparing for possible US retaliation; or (3) large scale military intervention by PLA in North Korea is imminent. From previous information forwarded Department we believed Chinese Communists probably would not openly send Chinese troops across border (Congentel 684, September 29).2 Chang Shih-hao mission Hong Kong (WEEKA 41, October 13 3) analysis of Korean war transmitted Peking CCP Municipal Committee (Congentel 814, October 17) and similar analysis in October 16 meeting of United Front Department CCP East China Bureau . . . all supported this view. However, suddenly increased bellicosity of NCNA and statement of CNAC official cited above tend to confirm Wang Cheng-po report (Congentel 945, October 31) of very recent decision increase support of North Koreans.

We are not yet prepared accept Wang's interpretation that decision means early all out war against US by PLA. Official statements indicate long term guerrilla war still chosen method of wearing down US forces but Chinese Communists undoubtedly fear time is running out for North Koreans and may well feel it necessary take risk of sending in more of own units as less dangerous in long run than permitting UN forces consolidate position in Korea and thus from Chinese Communist point of view posing permanent threat to their border.

(a) With formulation of principles upon which resolution of October 12 based that may guide UN Command in action in the light of the resolution pending arrival of UNCOK in Korea. In general, the principles will assert that, subject to UN command, South Koreans may properly be used north of 38th Parallel for technical and security purposes;

(b) IC would further like statement of military situation insofar

Cordier (SYG) reports that IC President Romulo has asked SYG to cable members of former UNCOK now in Korea for urgent report on military situation. USUN officer expressed personal view UC might be able supply some facts for Monday meeting and that request to UNCOK members might be premature. He also mentioned possible necessity for report to SC. Editorial Note

On November 4, General MacArthur, in response to a message from the Joint Chiefs of Staff on the previous day, provided an interim appreciation of the situation in Korea in the light of what appeared to be overt intervention by Chinese Communist forces. He indicated that it was impossible at that time to appraise authoritatively the actualities of Chinese intervention but indicated that full scale intervention appeared unlikely. In the last sentence of his telegram, he recommended against hasty, premature conclusions and added that a final appraisal should await a more complete accumulation of military facts. (The text of General MacArthur's message, telegram C-68285, is printed in Truman, Years of Trial and Hope, page 373; see also Appleman, South to the Naktong, North to the Yalu, page 762.)

Washington, 4 November 1950.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to your conversation, on or about 13 October, with the Secretary of the Air Force regarding the desirability of establishing a more explicit delimitation of air operations in the vicinity of the North Korean border, in order to ensure against a repetition of border incidents.1 The considerations which you presented have been conveyed to the Joint Chiefs of Staff with the request that they review the matter in an attempt to determine (a) the necessity for U.S. air and naval unit operations within a fixed distance from the Manchurian and Soviet borders; (b) whether there are adequate military reasons for conducting such operations in the area in the present circumstances and (c) whether the Joint Chiefs of Staff should not send an amplifying message to General MacArthur in the light of the political considerations as well as the changed military situation.

The Department of Defense has given full consideration to the above questions and holds the following views thereon:

(a) The need for air interdiction operations in areas contiguous to the international boundaries of Korea is sufficient justification for not further delimiting air operations.

(b) Further, in light of information currently available it appears that U.N. ground force (including U.S.) operations will be required up to the international boundaries of Korea. Therefore, it is not considered desirable, from the military point of view, to deny these ground troops air and naval support in these areas; nor would acceptance of the loss of life entailed by such denial be justified.

(c) Moreover, there will be a continuing requirement for aerial as well as ground reconnaissance in areas contiguous to the borders for an indefinite period.

(d) In the light of various directives from the Joint Chiefs of Staff and recent events, it is felt that General MacArthur and his subordinate commanders are fully aware of the necessity for avoiding any violations of Manchurian and Soviet territory. It would appear that a further directive on this subject is unnecessary at the present time.

Faithfully yours,

[Washington,] November 4, 1950.

Subject: Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea: Estimate of Objectives.

The Chinese Communist intervention in Korea must be viewed against the background of the earlier warning from Peiping that China would intervene in the event that UN forces crossed the 38th Parallel. The intervention was, that is, a calculated move for which preparations were made well in advance, and did not arise accidentally or through processes over which the Chinese Communists had no control. The Chinese Communists were well informed respecting UN objectives, and UN strength and capabilities, in Korea. They were thus in a good position to lay their plans accordingly, providing good margin for error, to the end that they might attain their ends—which are presumed to have been determined in consultation with the USSR side, possibly in the August conference at Peiping which has so frequently been reported upon.¹ It remains to determine the Chinese Communist objectives in their intervention.

I. Hypothetical Alternatives:

- 1. Protection of Chinese interest in Yalu power.
- 2. Establishment of a limited cordon sanitaire bordering on Manchuria and USSR.
 - 3. Restoration of the status quo ante June 25 in North Korea.
 - 4. Expulsion of UN forces from the entire Korean peninsula.
 - 5. Creation of an excuse for involvement of Japan.
 - 6. Offering of a springboard for World War III.

II. Discussion:

1. There has been no reference in Chinese Communist propaganda to the Yalu power-plant factor. The power installation, if important, is nevertheless not the only source of power for Manchurian industry. There are both hydro-electric and thermal plants which are probably adequate, in the main, for the supply of all Manchuria's needs, even though certain difficulties would undoubtedly be encountered in the first instance. The original Chinese threat of intervention had no reference to the Yalu River installation, the Chinese have at this juncture made no démarche respecting that installation, and the scale of their present intervention indicates clearly more than a desire to protect a local area.

- 2. The establishment of a limited cordon sanitaire does not appear envisaged in their propaganda approach to the Chinese people demanding support for the North Koreans and resistance to an alleged threat of aggression against China. The establishment of such a limited belt would militarily be difficult and, in the light of the North Korean refusal to surrender, from the political point of view does not appear approximate to the Communist minimum political objective.
- 3. The restoration of the status quo ante June 25 would perhaps have met the requirements implicit in Chou en-lai's earlier démarche to the Indian Ambassador—satisfaction of which would, however, have left Korea still in a divided and basically unstable state. It is doubtful whether the restoration of North Korean authority south as far as the 38th Parallel would now meet the present joint designs of the Chinese Communists and the Moscow strategists, particularly in view of the circumstance that the North Koreans nominally still maintain their original objective of establishing their authority throughout the entire Korean peninsula. It must be considered, nevertheless, as a minimum objective as determined by both political and military factors.
- 4. The expulsion of United Nations forces from the entire Korean peninsula could hardly be regarded as other than a desirable objective by the North Koreans, the Chinese Communists and by Moscow. The Chinese Communist forces now available in Manchuria number, according to SCAP, no less than forty-four divisions—with possibly more. No firm information is available regarding the number of Soviet troops in Manchuria (as distinct from the Dairen—Port Arthur area). Today's telecon refers to the presence of three Chinese Communist divisions identified as being in contact with the Eighth Army. Presumably the Communist strategists would contemplate expulsion of UN forces from Korea if it were considered within their capability to do so, by reason of the important benefit which would thus derive to the Communist camp in terms of both political and military factors. For them, time would be a less valuable commodity than for us. The mere tying down of UN forces might be considered a valid objective.
- 5. Both the Soviet and Chinese sides have already put on record the allegation that the United States is employing Japanese forces in the fighting in Korea. The Sino-Soviet Alliance of February 14 provides that one signatory shall go to war in support of the other if the second be involved in conflict with either Japan or a nation connected with Japan. Certain defense measures being undertaken in Manchuria would indicate a possible belief that Chinese action in Korea will bring a UN military reaction into China. It must be considered possible that, in the event UN military actions were carried over the Manchurian boundary, this would be taken as an excuse for invoking the provisions of the Sino-Soviet Alliance with the charge that the Japanese had been involved in the fighting in Korea and/or that a nation connected with Japan was involved in an intrusion into Chinese territory. If this development were in fact taken as the occasion for citing the treaty in question, a prompt Soviet attack on Japan could logically be expected. In that event, although the hostilities might nominally be limited in the first instance to the Japan area, the USSR indubitably could be expected to be in a posture of readiness to accept, if need be, the challenges of World War III.

It is appropriate to deduce that Moscow, in its estimate of world political currents will have judged that the UN will refuse to cross the boundaries of Korea into Manchuria. But they will not have neglected the possibility; nor should we neglect the possibility that they plan to expand the area of conflict—whatever the excuse.

6. The Chinese Communist drive into Korea was not accompanied by a like surprise move by the Soviet Union against the United States in a new Pearl Harbor, and it is therefore to be assumed in the first instance that the present move is designed to constitute at most and worst an intermediary stage which will lead to the outbreak of World War III. This assumption that the Moscow aim in the present move is limited in immediate scope is supported by the circumstance that there seems to be some effort to disguise the intervention, if only nominally. One suggested route for arriving at the particular point of World War III's outbreak would be, as indicated above, by way of involvement in Japan; another would obviously be by springing one or more of a series of moves elsewhere in the world, while the United States had its major available forces pinned down in Korea, until the conflagration had reached the explosion point. Germany is an obvious focus of political moves, and Moscow's démarche vis-à-vis the American, British and French Ambassadors on November 3 may have some not-distant relationship to events in Korea. World War III might be reached, in short, by either a fairly direct or somewhat round-about route with Korea as its starting point.

III. Tentative Conclusions:

On the basis of the above brief delineation of the alternatives—all of which must be taken in view—it is concluded:

1. The Chinese Communists interest is not limited to the Yalu power installation and/or other border factors, and the establishment of a limited cordon sanitaire therefore would be without major political or economic significance and is, therefore, probably less than the minimum objective.

2. The minimum Chinese Communist objective must be considered to be either the restoration of the status quo ante June 25 in North Korea or the expulsion of UN forces from the entire Korean peninsula.

3. It is not safe to assume, even so, that Peiping and Moscow together have not made plans which envision the possibility that, in given circumstances, the area of hostilities shall be extended first to Manchuria, second perhaps to Japan or alternatively to Western Europe, with the result in either case to be the outbreak of World War III, soon or late.

IV. Recommendations:

- 1. That the united UN front be maintained at all costs, with the UN military and political responsibilities in Korea to be distributed more equally than at present among the concerned member nations.
- 2. That the essence of the standing directive to General MacArthur be maintained at least until the military situation is further clarified, that is, that the UN forces continue action against the enemy in Korea (but in Korea only) for so long as it appears possible to achieve UN objectives: if a sound drubbing could be administered to Chinese Communist forces, with the war localized within Korea, this could only have a salutary effect in Asia.
- 3. That the factors favoring continued UN and US involvement in Korea, however, be weighed against any other factors determined to be operating against US and UN interests in other possible theatres of conflict throughout the world, to the end that such involvement shall not be carried past a point where it would result in our being exposed to vital blows elsewhere.

[Washington,] November 4, 1950.

General Loper of the Defense Department 1 came to the State Department today at my request to discuss the question of possible U.S. use of atomic bombs to counter Chinese Communist military action in Korea.

If the bomb were used in Korea it would be for tactical purposes against troop concentrations and artillery support positions. Against such targets it should prove effective. However, such targets would probably not come about normally; they would have to be created by tactical maneuvers of U.N. forces. Very few atomic bombs could be used as few targets could be created. In addition to the purely military effect, use of the bomb for these purposes might prove a deterrent against further Chinese participation. If the bomb were used for tactical purposes, it is unlikely that there would be large destruction of civilian life.

It does not appear that in present circumstances the atomic bomb would be militarily decisive in Korea, and there is a serious possibility that its use might bring the Soviet Union into the war. Furthermore, its use would help arouse the peoples of Asia against us.

If the bomb should be used for strategic purposes through attacks on such Manchurian cities as Mukden, Fushun, Anshan, Harbin and Dairen, this action would result in the destruction of many civilians and would almost certainly bring the Soviet Union into the war.

If we should consider the use of the atomic bomb in the Korean area, we should keep in mind that the military actions there are under U.N. auspices, that its use would have world-wide repercussions, and that there is a question whether we should use it only with U.N. concurrence. Obtaining U.N. concurrence beforehand might keep the moral forces of the world with us in the use of the bomb, whereas a unilateral decision to use it might leave us in a disadvantageous moral position. On the other hand, the publicity attending debate of this question in the United Nations would be of military value to our adversary.

"In order that there may be no misunderstanding the IC desires to clarify some points in its resolution of 12th October 1950.

"The IC on Korea wishes to ensure that the people of the northern part of Korea shall have the opportunity to participate fully and freely in the establishment of a unified and democratic government of Korea. It therefore advised the Unified Command on 12th October to exercise administrative functions in the north until the commission has considered means of consulting the Korean people and representatives.

"1. Any Koreans south of the 38th parallel who are used in the north should be appointed by, under the control of and responsible to the UC and not act as the representatives or agents of any other authority;

"2. Such Koreans should not be used in a manner which would enable them to bring political pressure to bear upon the local inhabitants or in any manner restrict the free expression of political opinions by the local inhabitants;

"3. Efforts should be made to use local residents wherever possible before using Koreans from south of the 38th parallel.

URGENT

476. FYI only. Following is text of draft special report from CG United Nations Command to UN now under consideration here. No action of any kind should be taken with regard to this draft report pending further instructions from Dept.

"I herewith submit a special report of the United Nations command operations in Korea which I believe should be brought to the attention of the United Nations.

"Introduction

"The United Nations forces in Korea are continuing their drive to the north and their efforts to destroy further the effectiveness of the enemy as a fighting force are proving successful. However, presently in certain areas of Korea, the United Nations forces are meeting a new foe. It is apparent to our fighting forces, and our intelligence agencies have confirmed the fact, that the United Nations are presently in hostile contact with Chinese Communist military units deployed for action against the forces of the United Command.

"The Fact of Intervention

"Hereafter, in summary form, are confirmed intelligence reports substantiating the fact that forces other than Korean are resisting our efforts to carry out the resolutions of the United Nations:

"a. 22 August: Approximately 50 bursts heavy antiaircraft fire from Manchurian side of Yalu River against RB-29 flying at 7,000 feet over Korea in the vicinity of the Sui-Ho reservoir; damage, none; time, 1600K; weather, 10 miles visibility, high broken clouds.

"b. 24 August: Approximately 40 bursts heavy antiaircraft fire from Manchurian side of Yalu River against RB-29 flying at 10,000 feet over Korea in the vicinity of Sinuiju; damage, none; time, 1500K; weather, 20 miles visibility.

"c. 15 October: Antiaircraft fire from the Manchurian side of Yalu River against a flight of 4 F-51's flying near the Sinuiju Airfield on the Korean side of the river; damage, 1 aircraft total loss; time, 1445I; weather, overcast at 8,000 feet; 8 to 10 miles visibility.

"d. 16 October: The 370th Regiment of the 124th Division of the Chinese Communist 42nd Army, consisting of approximately 2,500 troops, crossed the Yalu River (Korean border) at Man Po Jin, and proceeded to the area of Chosen and Fusen Dams in North Korea where they came in contact with UN forces approximately 40 miles north of Ham Hung.

"e. 17 October: Approximately 15 bursts heavy antiaircraft fire from Manchurian side of Yalu River against RB-29 flying at 10,000 feet over Korea in the vicinity of Sinuiju; damage, none; time, 1200I; weather, 8 miles visibility, low clouds 2,300 feet.

"f. 20 October: A Chinese Communist task force known as the '56th' unit consisting of approximately 5,000 troops crossed the Yalu River (Korean Border) at Antung and deployed to positions in Korea south of the Sui-Ho Dam. A captured Chinese Communist soldier of this task force states that his group was organized out of the regular Chinese Communist 40th Army stationed at Antung, Manchuria.

"q. 1 November: A flight of F-51's was attacked early in the afternoon by 6 to 9 jet aircraft which flew across the Yalu River into Manchuria. No damage was done to UN aircraft. A Red Star was observed on the top of the right wing on one of the jet aircraft.

"h. 1 November: Antiaircraft fire from the Manchurian side of the Yalu River directed against a flight of 13 F-80 aircraft was observed in the vicinity of Sinuiju at 1345 hours. This resulted in the total loss of 1 UN aircraft.

"i. 30 October: Interrogation of 19 Chinese prisoners of war identified two additional regiments of 124 CCF Division, the 371 and the 372 in the vicinity of Changjin.

"j. 2 November: Interrogation of prisoners of war indicates the 54 CCF unit in Korea. This unit is reported to have same organization as 55 and 56 units, but to be drawn from the 112, 113, and 114 Divisions of the 38 CCF Army.

"k. 3 November: Further interrogation of Chinese prisoners of war indicates 56 CCF unit organized from elements of 118, 119, and 120

CCF Divisions of the 40 CCF Army.

"l. 4 November: As of this date, a total of 35 CCF prisoners had been taken in Korea.

"The continued employment of Chinese Communist forces in Korea and the hostile attitude assumed by such forces, either inside or outside Korea, are matters which it is incumbent upon me to bring at once to the attention of the UN."

CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, November 5, 1950—8 p. m.

Gadel 95. ReDelga 232 Nov 3. With respect Par(a) urtel suggest that if IC desires to formulate such principles they be drawn in broadest possible term so as not to limit ability CINCUNC to make full use of all resources, facilities, services and personnel made available to him by all participating govts including Govt ROK in carrying out difficult task entrusted to Unified Command by IC resolution of Oct 12. Principle that South Koreans may be used north of 38° for only technical and security purposes raises difficult question of definition of terms "South Koreans" and "technical and security purposes". As IC is aware several millions persons unwilling to accept Communist domination moved from north of 38th parallel to south since 1945. Also, virtually without exception all personnel of the NK regime at all levels have left their posts. It would manifestly be impracticable and undesirable to require CINCUNC to use in other than technical or security positions only those elements of the NK population left in the area at the time of occupation by UN forces and prevent his use of former residents of the area who have now returned to their homes and who are sufficiently well qualified to assume positions of responsibility in civil affairs and who have intimate knowledge of the local population and problems of the occupied area.

It is believed that only limiting principle should be that all personnel, including Govt ROK personnel, used by CINCUNC in administration NK should be responsible only to CINCUNC and should in no way represent Govt ROK or exercise its authority north of 38th parallel. Govt ROK has already accepted this principle.

Any principles proposed by IC should be assessed in light of Civil Affairs Directive to General MacArthur which it is believed constitutes sound and workable basis for carrying out occupation consistent with views of UN as expressed by GA and IC resolutions. If considered desirable you are authorized to discuss in strict confidence full text of directive with IC. As it is view of General MacArthur that any public release of directive prior to cessation of major hostilities would possibly have adverse effect upon combat troops under his command as well as upon Govt ROK important that contents of directive not be directly or indirectly made public at this time.

Request that currency question (Gadel 84 Oct 31) be discussed with IC in light of principles formulated with view of immediately obtaining firm views of IC as urgent decision be reached Nov 6. In addition to points for your guidance in Gadel 84, another consideration favoring use of ROK currency is time element. ROK currency is immediately available while making of plates and printing of UN scrip would require at minimum several weeks.

Instructions on requested report to IC on military situation will present fighting in north.2 You will also have seen General Mac-Arthur's UN communiqué no. 11 dated November 4, 1950.3 Our latest information does not change the picture as set forth in the report, but it appears that the enemy is continuing his attack in northwest sector and is reinforcing his effort by substantial vehicular traffic across the Yalu.

The report does not contain sufficiently detailed information to permit an immediate estimate as to Chin intentions in present situation. We are giving this problem most urgent attention both in Washington and in Tokyo and will keep in close touch with you. We should greatly appreciate any info or views which you might have on this most important point.

We are trying to determine whether the Chin are acting on basis of one or more of following considerations:

(1) Since it became general knowledge that Peiping had threatened to take some sort of action if UN forces crossed 38th parallel, present intervention might be demonstration that they are not 'standing idly by'.

(2) Since Commies may have learned of UN desire to hold UN forces back and use Koreans in areas of Korea along frontier, they may have decided to occupy area along border in order not to lose any chance to salvage at least that much of Korea if their opposition proved to be limited to South Koreans.

(3) Chin may have in mind making large enough commitment to establish cordon sanitaire within Korea, even though such action would bring them into direct clash with UN forces.

(4) Commies may be seriously concerned over prospect of losing hydroelectric power and may be acting to defend power installations along line set forth in recent NK broadcast from Sinuiju.

(5) Chin intervention may be 'token' both with respect to NKs and with respect to possible Soviet pressure for assistance to Koreans.

(6) Chin may have come to believe that UN forces are in fact aiming at Manchuria and present intervention may be based on fear of

(7) Moscow and Peiping may wish pin down substantial UN forces in NK during coming winter, to produce strain and discomfort on our own military resources, to slow up readiness of expanding US forces by holding an important proportion of our trained officers and men in Korea, or to insure that these forces may not be available for use where other Commie adventures are already under way or planned.

³ See telegram 476, November 5, 5 p. m., New York, p. 1046.

(8) Chin may intend reoccupy Korea down to 38th parallel.(9) Chin may intend attempt expel UN forces from Korea.

(10) Chi action in Kor may be a part of more general military program hatched up by Kremlin affecting entire FE area (Indo-China or Japan) or even involving new moves in other parts of world.

We are not ready for a satisfactory assessment, but military and supply factors lead us to preliminary view that explanation for Chin action lies in some combination of first seven or eight factors.

Whatever our conclusion on the above proves to be, there is no doubt but that Chi military intervention is substantial, that there is no reason to suppose that it will not increase, and that very serious political and military implications are thereby raised.

I repeat, perhaps unnecessarily, that our own purposes in Korea are unchanged, that we wish to act wholly within the framework of a UN solution for an 'independent united and democratic Korea', and that we most particularly do not wish to have hostilities in that country spread elsewhere. While I have no doubt about our own joint purposes, we are concerned about the program of aggressive action now being carried out by Peiping, combining as it does activity in Korea, Indo-China and Tibet, with more indirect attacks on other countries in Asia.

I have seen your message of third Nov to Oliver Franks and have had it very much in mind in considering what we ought to do at this time about Chi action in Korea. Whether what we now do will seriously affect Chi intention depends to some extent upon what those intentions are. I agree that we should do nothing provocative. On other hand, I believe that Chi intervention is now serious and that it cannot be ignored.

It seems to me that the first and essential step is to give the basic facts to the UN, as set forth in text of special report. We have officially ignored Sov arms and advisers, 'volunteers' from Manchuria and other assistance in the past even though whole world knew facts. We did so in order to leave other side a way out. I doubt that is possible to treat organized Chi units on same basis, even though there has not been an official espousal of these units by Peiping regime. The world fully understands nature of intervention and greatly intensified propaganda campaign inside China indicates full espousal by Peiping. It seems to us, therefore, that we must send the special report to SC promptly. It will be immediately preceded or accompanied by regular periodic report of UN Command covering period Oct 16–31.

The next question which would arise is the action to be taken in SC in light of special report. The fact of Chi intervention is such that a report can hardly be left on table and ignored. Further if Peiping discovers that nothing at all happens in the face of its intervention it will be emboldened to act even more aggressively by what it might consider proof of weakness or nervousness on our part. On other hand we do not wish to extend the fighting in Korea to China by pressing and proving a case of aggression against Chi in such a way as to lead to full UN sanctions against mainland Chi—certainly not at this present stage. We believe that our purpose should be to emphasize that we are trying to limit the fighting to Korea and to do everything we can not to spread the hostilities.

It seems to us therefore that we should ask for an early meeting of SC, for not later than Wed of this week, to discuss the reports from the UN command. At this mtg, our debate shd be directed toward localizing the conflict and should be geared to a short and simple res along the lines of the res vetoed by Sov on same subject in Sept. A proposed draft res is being forwarded by separate message.

We welcome info that you are working on draft res and would be glad to give it most sympathetic consideration. I am sure that our purposes in the present situation are very close together.

You will notice that our draft res. takes into account a number of the points raised by your message of Nov 3. We have made only limited ref to Chi interest in Korea. We can see that Peiping has an interest in having a neighbor in Korea whose intentions are peaceful, with whom any border problems can be worked out with the help of UN, and in whose territory there are not established foreign military bases or installations constituting a threat to contiguous areas of Chi. We do not believe however that we should concede to Peiping any interest whatever in the internal affairs of Korea or in the unification and rehabilitation work to be carried out by the UN. The Balkan record seems to us entirely persuasive on latter point.

As to timing we wish to report facts to SC at once. We envisage a day or two's gap between the filing of the special report and the convening of a meeting of the SC. Members of SC will wish to get report of their govts and we do not wish to embarrass members on such matters as instructions. That would give us a brief period to concert our own views as to how we handle the case in the Council."

In addition to considerations mentioned Gadel 95¹ it is suggested you call attention IC to vital importance of giving full consideration effect proposed action on ROK armed forces and Govt ROK which have suffered grievously because of the aggression from north of Korea and whose continued high morale will be of utmost importance to successful conclusion hostilities and accomplishment objectives of occupation.

With foregoing considerations in mind it would appear preferable that statement of principles such as that proposed with attendant publicity in Kor be deferred in favor of informal understanding between IC and UC or that any such statement be treated as strictly confidential.

However with respect to draft contained urtel 236 paragraphs one and two are in general acceptable as principles. Para three is acceptable if it understood that term "local residents" includes former residents of areas who were dispossessed or otherwise forced to flee by Commie tyranny and have now returned to their homes. It would manifestly be unjust and destructive of morale to treat such persons other than on at least a basis of equality with persons who remained in area and willingly or unwillingly contributed to support of aggression upon their fellow countrymen.

Memorandum of Conversations, by the Secretary of State

MEMORANDUM OF CONFERENCE BETWEEN SECRETARY ACHESON, [DEP-UTY] UNDER SECRETARY OF DEFENSE LOVETT, AND MR. DEAN RUSK

Shortly after ten o'clock this morning Mr. Robert Lovett came over from the Pentagon with an urgent message from General Stratemeyer. This message reported that the Air Forces had been ordered to take off at one o'clock p. m. EST today on a bombing mission to take out the bridge across the Yalu River from Sinuiju (Korea) to Antung (Manchuria). They were to use radio controlled bombs and would attempt to bomb on the Korean side of the bridge.

Mr. Lovett expressed his view that from an operational standpoint he doubted whether the results to be achieved would importantly interrupt traffic and that the danger of bombing the city of Antung and other points on the Manchurian side of the River were very great.

Mr. Rusk explained that we had a commitment with the British not to take action which might involve attacks on the Manchurian side of the River without consultation with them. He also said that the British Cabinet was meeting this morning to reconsider their whole attitude toward the Chinese Communist Government and that ill-considered action on our part might have grave consequences. He also told Mr. Lovett that we had filed General MacArthur's report concerning Chinese intervention with the United Nations Security Council and had asked for an urgent meeting tomorrow or Wednesday at which we were going to present a resolution calling on the Chinese to cease activities in Korea, thus attempting to get UN support for any action which might be necessary in the event of their refusal to accept the UN action. He also mentioned the possibility of Russian involvement under the Sino-Russian Treaty.

After some discussion we all thoroughly agreed that this action should be postponed until the reasons for it were more clearly known.

Mr. Lovett telephoned General Marshall, who agreed that the action was unwise unless there was some mass movement across the River, which threatened the security of our troops. Mr. Lovett called Mr. Finletter and instructed him to tell the Joint Chiefs the facts which Mr. Rusk had stated, as set forth above, and to add that he had talked with the Secretary of State, who believed that the situation was so grave that the action should be postponed until the matter had been laid before the President and his instructions had been received. He was to add that this was to be done as soon as possible and that another message would be sent.

I then telephoned the President in Kansas City and laid the matter before him, as outlined above. The President said that he would approve the action if it was necessary because of an immediate and serious threat to the security of our own troops. I pointed out that we had no information on this matter beyond General MacArthur's report of yesterday, which contained no statement of any further movements across the river, but only of reserves on the Chinese side. The President suggested that I call General MacArthur and ascertain what the facts were. I thought, and he agreed, that communications on military subjects should be through the Military Establishment. The President told me to handle the matter until his return in the way Mr. Lovett and I thought best, adding that he would be available on the telephone if necessary and that the security of our troops should not be jeopardized. He agreed on the importance of postponing the action if that could be done consistently with the requirement above. I gave Mr. Lovett the attached summary of the President's position, and he left immediately to read it to the JCS.

Our conference terminated at 11:15 a.m., one and three-quarters hours before the planes were to take off for Korea. Mr. Lovett will inform me of the action taken by the JCS.

Mr. Rusk later called Mr. Lovett to inquire whether we had been discussing the bridge only or whether the rest of the mission in the Sinuiju area would be flown. Mr. Lovett said that the entire mission was being postponed and that a message went to Tokyo at 11:40 ordering General MacArthur not to attack targets within five miles of the Manchurian border and asking his estimate of the situation and reasons for the mission against Sinuiju and the Yalu Bridge in that area. The message also referred to our commitment to consult with the British in regard to operations affecting Manchuria.

Memorandum by the Secretary of State

[Washington,] November 6, 1950.

SUMMARY OF TELEPHONE CONVERSATION WITH THE PRESIDENT AT KANSAS CITY

The President recognizes the great international complications which may follow the proposed bombing of the Yalu River bridge. He is willing to face these complications if the step is immediately necessary to protect our forces.

He believes under the circumstances that the Joint Chiefs should know from General MacArthur what the pressing reasons are for the operation. If the operation can wait until our international commitments are fulfilled, that would put us in the best position.

2. Until further orders postpone all bombing of targets within five miles of Manchurian border.

See telegram JCS 95878, transmitted at 11:47 a.m. on November 6, infra.

3. Urgently need your estimate of situation and reason for ordering bombing Yalu River bridges as indicated in telecon this date.¹

General MacArthur's reply to this message was contained in telegram C-68396, November 6 (see Appleman, South to the Naktong, North to the Yalu, pp. 715-716). The text is here reprinted from Truman, Years of Trial and Hope, p. 375.

"Men and material in large force are pouring across all bridges over the Yalu from Manchuria. This movement not only jeopardizes but threatens the ultimate destruction of the forces under my command. The actual movement across the river can be accomplished under cover of darkness and the distance between the river and our lines is so short that the forces can be deployed against our troops without being seriously subjected to air interdiction. The only way to stop this reinforcement of the enemy is the destruction of these bridges and the subjection of all installations in the north area supporting the enemy advance to the maximum of our air destruction. Every hour that this is postponed will be paid for dearly in American and other United Nations blood. The main crossing at Sinuiju was to be hit within the next few hours and the mission is actually being mounted. Under the gravest protest that I can make, I am suspending this strike and carrying out your instructions. What I had ordered is entirely within the scope of the rules of war and the resolutions and directions which I have received from the United Nations and constitutes no slightest act of belligerency against Chinese territory, in spite of the outrageous international lawlessness emanating therefrom. I cannot overemphasize the disastrous effect, both physical and psychological, that will result from the restrictions which you are imposing. I trust that the matter be immediately brought to the attention of the President as I believe your instructions may well result in a calamity of major proportion for which I cannot accept the responsibility without his personal and direct understanding of the situation. Time is so essential that I request immediate reconsideration of your decision pending which complete compliance will of course be given to your order."

Sir Gladwyn indicated that he had received a telegram from the Foreign Office on the question. They had also received a copy of the Department's resolution.¹ Their attitude towards this resolution was favorable. The only comment he made was with respect to the last paragraph. He thought that after the word "authorities" we should add "notably the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China". He thought this would help to clarify the intent. I said I doubted we would be prepared to use the full title of the Peiping Government since this might involve some implication of recognition. I doubted that we would have any objection to making it clear that we had in mind particularly that regime.

Jebb also asked what the last clause meant—particularly the words "in the area". He suggested that we take out the words "in the area" and substitute "in Peiping". I said I thought that our purpose was to indicate that any contact that existed between the Commission and the Peiping Government should be utilized.

We discussed the question of sponsorship. I said that we certainly would be very glad if they would join us in sponsorship. The question of asking others to co-sponsor with us was entirely open. He suggested that it might be useful to bring in some other countries. He doubted that India would wish to. He thought Egypt was a question mark. He thought that probably France would be interested, and perhaps Norway. He seemed to feel that there was no advantage in having more than four.

As to the timing of the introduction, I indicated that our thinking was that it would be advisable not to introduce the resolution before the council meeting but to discuss the question and delay the introduction of the resolution until the debate was well under way. Jebb preferred this course, also.

Jebb raised the question of an invitation to the Peiping Regime. He said this question was certain to arise at the opening of the first meeting. He thought the same Members of the Council who had supported the invitation in the Formosa case would do so again. He thought there were great advantages in doing so in this situation. Since the Peiping Representatives were presumably about to arrive in New York for the Formosa case, they would be on hand very quickly. He thought the Council would do well to invite them and confront them point-blank with the present situation and find out directly from their own mouths what they were doing. He thought we probably would receive a tirade from them, including all the standard charges of fascist beast, etc. He thought, nevertheless, if that were the case we would know what we were up against and could then act accordingly.

I said I had no idea what our position would be on this but would raise the issue and let him know.

Draft Memorandum by the Planning Adviser, Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs (Emmerson)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] November 6, 1950.

UNITED STATES COURSE OF ACTION WITH RESPECT TO KOREA

PROBLEM

1. To determine what United States course of action with respect to Korea would be best calculated to advance the national interests of the United States.

ANALYSIS

2. The objective of the United States and of the United Nations in Korea is to bring about and maintain the independence and unity of Korea. Action taken by the United Nations in Korea, pursuant to the resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Security Council, has been dedicated to this objective.

3. Unless a massive intervention by non-Korean Communist forces takes place in Korea, the United Nations can proceed to establish the conditions of peace and security which will permit the maintenance of a unified and independent Korea.

4. In pursuance of NSC 81/1 ¹ the Unified Command has proceeded to the occupation of North Korea and the United Nations has established machinery for bringing about the unification and independence of Korea in fulfillment of decisions of the General Assembly and the Security Council.

5. With regard to the trial of war criminals, the Directive for the Occupation of North Korea approved by the President and transmitted to the Unified Commander, states as follows:

"The mere fact that an individual is or was a member of the armed forces of the North Korean Government, an official of that Government or any local Government, or a member of any political party will not subject him to prosecution or reprisal and will not, by that reason alone, bar him from office or employment. You will apprehend and hold for trial by appropriate tribunals, in accordance with the law and customs of war, all persons who are or may be charged with atrocities or violations of the law and customs of war."

6. With regard to the trial of persons charged with the crime of waging aggressive war, or so-called "Class A" war crimes, the following factors should be taken into consideration:

a) The North Korean regime was a Soviet satellite government and the responsibility for the decision to wage aggressive war cannot be fixed solely upon the North Korean leaders. We must assume that the USSR in actuality bears a heavy responsibility if not the major responsibility for the action of the North Korean puppet leaders.

b) Trials of North Korean leaders for crimes of aggression would prolong the psychological effects of the division of Korea and would increase the difficulties of a rapid unification of the country.

7. In view of the factors cited above and of the unlikelihood that any responsible North Korean leaders will fall into the hands of United Nations forces, the United States should not press in the United Nations for the holding of "Class A" war crimes trials in Korea.

8. It is expected that the restoration of "international peace and security in the area", within the meaning of the Security Council's resolution of June 27, 1950, will require continued action over a period of time by the Unified Command and by the agencies operating under the authority of the United Nations, that it will be necessary to maintain UN occupation forces in Korea for yet a temporary period, and that even when organized resistance ceases, the continuance of guerrilla activities will necessitate the carrying out of extensive counter-guerrilla operations.

- 9. In pursuance of NSC 81/1, it is expected that United States forces will be reduced as rapidly as possible and that forces of the ROK and those of UN members besides the United States, will be used to the maximum during the period of occupation, mopping up, and counter-guerrilla operations.
- 10. It is expected that, in pursuance of the General Assembly's resolution of October 7, 1950, UN forces (i.e. non-Korean) will be withdrawn from all parts of Korea as soon as appropriate steps have been taken to insure conditions of stability throughout Korea and all constituent actions have been taken, including the holding of elections, under the auspices of the United Nations, for the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic government in the sovereign state of Korea.
- 11. It may be assumed that the USSR will not permanently renounce attempts to effect Communist control of Korea and that, with Soviet assistance, preparations will be made by Chinese Communists and remaining Korean Communist elements for the reconquest of Korea by subversive means and by military invasion if necessary.
- 12. Following the withdrawal of UN forces, the security of Korea must depend upon the capability of Korean forces to defend the country.
- 13. It is in the interests of the United States, acting through the United Nations, to assist the Republic of Korea to maintain its independence and to provide for its security from outside attack and internal subversion. Military aid furnished by the United States will be dedicated to these ends.
- 14. The UN Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea should make recommendations as to the size and character of the military and internal security forces needed by the ROK, as required by NSC 81/1. The United States should propose that, upon dissolution of the Unified Command, the United States be authorized to act as agent of the UN in establishing a Military Advisory Mission to the ROK. Through this Mission, whose staff would include personnel from UN members participating in the Korean action, the United States would act to effect the most efficient training and buildup of ROK military, naval, and air forces which may be deemed necessary for the adequate defense of Korea.
- 15. At the request of the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations has considered the problem of relief and rehabilitation in Korea and has adopted the substance of a U.S.-

sponsored resolution to place the responsibility for these matters in the hands of an Agent General of the United Nations.² The economic, and in turn the political, stability of Korea will depend heavily on the success of a program of relief and reconstruction for an integrated Korean economy, which will take a number of years to complete and cost in excess of $500 million.

16. The ROK, in order to take its rightful place among the nations of the world and to bind itself to the obligations of the UN Charter, should become a member of the United Nations as soon as possible. To this end the United States should actively support the application of the ROK for membership in the UN and should endeavor to achieve its acceptance.

17. In fulfilling its mission to bring about the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic government of all Korea, the UNCURK will face complex problems arising out of the common boundary between Korea and its neighbors, Communist China and the USSR. These problems will include such matters as the control of electric power output from the Suiho plant located on the Manchurian border at the Yalu River, navigation rights along the Yalu and Tumen Rivers, the regulation of the coastal and river traffic in the Yalu estuary, the operation of through railroad lines between Korea and Manchuria, and various other problems of trade, communications, and security. The UNCURK might, for example, as a result of its investigation of various border problems, find it desirable to recommend the establishment of a neutralized or security zone along the Chinese and Soviet borders.

18. The United States should take whatever diplomatic action is deemed advisable in order to reduce the dangers of a repetition of Communist aggression against Korea. Pursuant to NSC 81/1, this should include recommendations that the UNCURK consider the problem of the neutralization of Korea. A proposal for "neutralization" might consist of an affirmation by the ROK of its acceptance of the obligations of the UN Charter and its commitment not to engage in any aggressive action against its neighbors. It should be proposed that parallel undertakings be entered into by other states including the USSR, Communist China, and Japan, the latter when a peace treaty is signed.

² ECOSOC had taken this action on October 30. For the legislative history of ECOSOC's handling of the question of Korean relief at its resumed eleventh session, October 12-November 7, see Yearbook of the United Nations, 1950, pp. 270-276. Concerning U.N. General Assembly Resolution 410 (V), December 1, 1950, on the establishment of the U.N. Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA), see the editorial note, p. 1297.

CONCLUSIONS

- 19. The United States should reduce its forces in Korea as rapidly as the military situation permits but should retain U.S. elements within the forces under the Unified Command so long as any UN forces remain in Korea.
- 20. Without prejudice to any position assumed in the past with regard to the assignment of guilt for the crime of waging aggressive war, the United States should not propose or support in the United Nations the holding of war crimes trials in Korea, except those of persons charged with atrocities or violations of the law and customs of war.
- 21. The United States should urge the establishment by the UN, on the basis of negotiations with the ROK, of a Military Advisory Mission to the ROK. The United States should propose the UNCURK ask the United States to act as the agent of the UN in establishing and maintaining the Military Advisory Mission. The Mission should come into being upon the dissolution of the Unified Command, and its staff should, so far as feasible, include personnel representing nations participating in the UN military action in Korea.
- 22. The United States should extend military and economic aid to the government of the ROK in accordance with programs to be formulated and approved by appropriate UN agencies. Military aid so extended by the United States should be administered by the Military Advisory Mission as part of the military aid program. Economic aid extended by the United States should be administered as part of the United Nations relief and reconstruction program by the UN agency established for this purpose.
- 23. The United States should be prepared to support up to the extent of 70% of the total cost, the United Nations program of relief and reconstruction in Korea. While not a development program, it should be consistent with the requirements of Korea's future economic development. The influence of the United States should be exerted in every tactful way to promote closer economic relations between Korea and Japan.
- 24. The United States should urge UNCURK to consider the various problems arising out of the Korean common border with the USSR and Communist China. These problems might include such matters as transportation, trade, communications, electric power and the possible establishment of a neutralized zone along the border. The UNCURK would be expected to use its good offices for negotiations which might be deemed necessary between the ROK on the one hand and the USSR and Communist China on the other.
- 25. The United States should press for the admission of the Republic of Korea to the United Nations.

26. The United States should suggest that the UNCURK consider, as an additional step toward the maintenance of the integrity and independence of Korea, the advisability of undertakings being entered into by the ROK not to engage in any aggressive action against its neighbors, and by other states not to engage in aggression against the ROK.

The United Nations Security Council met on November 6 from 3 to 6:10 p.m.; for the record, see U.N. document S/PV.518. At the beginning of the meeting, the United States Representative read to the Council the text of General MacArthur's special report of November 5 (S/1884; see telegram 476, November 5, 5 p. m., to New York, page 1046) and indicated that he would like a meeting of the Council at the earliest possible convenience to consider the subject. Before adjourning, the Council set the time of the requested meeting at 10:30 a. m. on Wednesday, November 8.

[Washington,] November 6, 1950.

Subject: Chinese Communist Intervention in North Korea.

Participants: Mr. Hume Wrong,
Canadian Ambassador.
Mr. Charles Ritchie,
First Secretary,
Canadian Embassy.

Mr. Dean Rusk, Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs.

Mr. Arthur B. Emmons, 3rd, Officer in Charge, Korean Affairs.

The Canadian Ambassador, Mr. Hume Wrong, called on Mr. Rusk at 3:30 this afternoon at the Ambassador's request to discuss the question of Chinese Communist intervention in North Korea.

The Ambassador stated that the subject of Chinese Communist intervention would be discussed in the Canadian Cabinet this week and wished to have the Department's views in relation thereto. Mr. Rusk summarized the information which the Department had on the size and capacity of the Chinese Communist forces now in North Korea, comparing them with the forces available to the Unified Command. He then gave the Ambassador an analysis based on eight possibilities concerning Chinese Communist motives in intervening, ranging from limited objectives which the Chinese Communists might be seeking up to and including an all-out effort to throw UN forces entirely off the Korean peninsula. This latter possibility he tended to discount as not being very practicable from the Chinese point of view.

The Ambassador then raised the question of General MacArthur's recent communiqué on Chinese intervention 1 and implied a Canadian criticism that General MacArthur might be overstepping his role as a military commander. Mr. Rusk pointed out that the General was up against some hard, cold facts in North Korea and must have felt the importance of setting forth his ideas on how to meet the new situation, adding that perhaps a communiqué, however, was not the best manner in which such ideas should be put forth.

The Ambassador expressed the opinion that there was danger that the Unified Command might go ahead too rapidly in its reaction to Chinese intervention and thus might endanger some of the support provided by other nations contributing to the United Nations action in Korea. Mr. Rusk reassured him that it was not our intention to do this and that we would be in consultation, specifically with the British, on the situation. He assured the Ambassador that any concrete steps to meet the new developments in North Korea would be taken only after consultation with the other interested UN nations. In this connection he brought up the subject of a special meeting of the Security Council scheduled for November 8 in which the question would be discussed and handed the Ambassador a copy of a draft Security Council resolution on Chinese intervention which our delegation was now studying.

Mr. Rusk asked that this draft resolution be kept in strict confidence within the Canadian Government and pointed out that the terms of the resolution did not directly charge any specific foreign regime by name with intervention. He also stressed that this resolution called for no concrete action against the Chinese Communists, commenting that the presentation, however, should be no weaker than the minimum of what "the traffic would bear" in relation to United States public opinion. The Ambassador countered that it appeared to be about all "the traffic would bear" in regard to the state of opinion in the United Nations at this time.

The Ambassador expressed relief at Mr. Rusk's summary of the limited extent to which Chinese Communist forces appeared committed in North Korea thus far, and added that his summary of the situation and our line of approach on the question of Chinese intervention would be conveyed to the Canadian Cabinet.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

[Washington,] November 6, 1950.

Subject: Security Council Resolution Re Korea

Reference: CA's memorandum of November 3 recommending UN action, telegram 477 to USUN, New York transmitting a draft resolution for use UNSC, re Chinese Communist intervention in Korea.

In order that there be left no doubt—if any in fact exists—in the Chinese Communist mind as to whether the U.S. position respecting Formosa and U.S. action in Korea is preparatory to U.S. aggression against China, and so that the public record is clear, CA believes any action in the Security Council having as its objective the cessation of Chinese Communist intervention in Korea should contain specific and forthright assurances that with cessation of such intervention the Chinese frontier and China's border interests would not be threatened. The draft resolution contained in the telegram referred to above appears deficient in that regard. CA accordingly suggests consideration of the attached alternative draft.

CA notes that General MacArthur's statement respecting the intervention of outside Communist forces in Korea has given public emphasis to the matter of Chinese Communist intervention and has increased the urgency of any steps which we may decide to take relative thereto. It seems, further, to give added warrant to the above move.

DRAFT RESOLUTION

The Security Council

Having in mind its resolution of June 25, 1950, calling upon all members of the UN to refrain from giving assistance to the North Korean authorities:

Taking cognizance of the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on October 7, 1950, setting forth the policies of the General Assembly with respect to Korea:

Cognizant of the danger that the Korean conflict may spread to other areas thereby further endangering international peace and security:

Calls upon the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China to cease and refrain from intervention in Korea and to cause the immediate withdrawal of any Chinese nationals, individuals, or units which may be now in Korea:

Affirms that if this action is taken the Chinese frontier with Korea will be held inviolate by UN forces and China's legitimate interests in the frontier will be fully protected.

614. Information from Chinese military sources transmitted to Washington past few days by Embassy's service Attachés gives strong support to assumption Chinese Communists intend throw book at UNO forces in Korea besides stepping up efforts in Indochina. Obviously allowance must be made for wishful thinking among Chinese military, majority of whom see general conflict as only hope for liberation of China from communism. In present case however this qualification still leaves imposing array seemingly established facts plus evident sincerity of opinion among best informed Chinese here such as to make it entirely possible that preponderant view among them, anticipating all-out action by Chinese Communists in Korea is justified:

Among reasons advanced why Chinese Communists have delayed entry in force, without speculating on Moscow influences, are:

1. Chinese Communists assumed North Koreans would win and therefore were not prepared intervene on short notice.

2. Delaying major effort until fighting reached frontier region greatly shortened their lines of communication, which particularly important with UNO forces controlling sea, air, and gave them maximum time to prepare. Besides moving up troops from other parts of China it necessary replenish stocks, supplies and equipment in Manchuria which seriously depleted in aiding North Koreans.

3. In frontier area fullest advantage can be taken of extent to which world opinion already conditioned to acts of aggression and regards identification of few regiments on wrong side of border as something less than overt action. Meanwhile UNO forces can be weakened and exposure Chinese Communist bases and communications to bombing delayed. Evidence of all-out effort including expenditure Chinese Communist air force expected be postponed long as possible for reasons paragraph 2 above.

4. Much easier whip up support of public opinion in China for major military operations if immediate threat to Manchurian border can be claimed; this despite general assumption Chinese Communist leaders know UNO forces have no intention cross frontier and would not attempt invade Manchuria with mere ten divisions in any event.

5. Most effective possible counter to UNO successes from Communist viewpoint would be crushing victory by Chinese Communists in North Korea, which would serve purposes of discrediting UNO, enhancing Asiatic and Communist prestige vis-à-vis western imperialism and eliminating large part existing US army as fighting force.

Foregoing are necessarily matters of opinion to considerable extent, but facts that Chinese military on Formosa have access to more sources of information on mainland and have had more experience in this field than anyone else outside curtain warrant most serious attention their views at present juncture.

Menon said Panikkar had reported nothing on that subject that he recalled. He sent for cable file however and gave Steere actual text Panikkar remark which followed immediately after his report Chinese protest of American planes alleged violations Chinese territory. Panikkar's remark was as follows: "While undoubtedly there have been violations of Chinese territory these protests would seem to be for purpose of justifying before the world action they have decided upon in regard to Korea."

Menon said unless Panikkar's drafting was very bad this meant that CPR had decided upon some action in regard to Korea, and that he would immediately cable Panikkar about the matter.

The paragraph in question read as follows: "Phrasing Panikkar telegram which was read to Embassy officer seemed highly unreal in some respects including obscure reference to Chinese action in or toward Korea, he might have intended to say 'Tibet' but on the other hand, he might have meant that some action toward Korea is contemplated." Delga 240. No distribution outside Department. Re Gadel 84.1 Currency to be used North Korea discussed with IC today. Committee informed of CINCUNC's recommendation use UN script and US view preferable use ROK currency. Only member having definite views Australian, who favored UN scrip, suggesting that if delay serious ROK currency might be used in meantime. He assumed would be one for one with ROK currency, but this question not discussed.

Committee requested matter be put over to next meeting 2 p. m. Tuesday 2 to give time for consideration, and requested factual statement. Following is text, which corresponds closely to oral statement, of statement circulated confidentially to committee members:

"1. The United Nations Commander has directed commanders of the United Nations forces in Korea to use only North Korean currency in the area north of the thirty-eighth parallel. While this order has been obeyed by the commands, troops have carried with them substantial amounts of ROK currency, which is generally accepted by North Koreans.

2. The people of North Korea do not have confidence in the North Korean currency and it is depreciating rapidly.

3. The communist authorities of North Korea have destroyed or carried away the major stocks of North Korean currency, together with all plates and means of printing it.

4. It is urgent that the United Nations Commander authorize promptly the use of some currency in North Korea

a. In order that the United Nations forces may use it to pay requisitions and meet other military needs, and

b. In order that a rate may be fixed between the currency authorized by the United Nations Commander and the North Korean currency, to protect the holders of North Korean currency against further depreciation through lack of confidence.

5. In this situation General MacArthur has expressed readiness to print in Japan and issue a new "United Nations scrip", principally because he believes this would be in accord with the political recommendations of the Interim Committee. He has estimated that it would take three weeks to print this scrip, which according to his recommendation would bear the United Nations emblem, the denomination, and the word "whan" in Korean, English and French. This scrip would be redeemed by the United Korean Government when established. No financial obligations would accrue to the United Nations since United Nations forces would settle with the United Korean Government for whatever amount they use, and the proceeds of the relief and rehabilitation supplies to be brought into Korea would more than equal the amount of scrip issued.

6. It is suggested that there are certain advantages in the use of a. The delay resulting from printing and distribution of the new scrip would create difficulties in respect to military operations and with respect to the fixing of an exchange rate between ROK currency and North Korean currency, thus injuring the holders of the North Korean currency by reason of the further depreciation of that currency in relation to ROK currency.

b. While it is technically feasible to issue a military scrip in the name of the United Nations redeemable by the Government of United Korea, the issuance of currency bearing the name or seal of the United Nations would be a serious precedent, all implications of which should be carefully considered. For instance, if the impression were created that the United Nations was responsible for the redemption of the currency, it might circulate at a premium above the ROK currency; if, on the other hand, it were made clear that the United Nations is not responsible for its redemption, its acceptability would be impaired.

c. The issuance of still another currency in Korea would be confusing and would unnecessarily complicate the financial problems of the Government of a United Korea. There are already three currencies in circulation: the old Bank of Chosen notes of the ROK, the New Bank of Korea notes, and the North Korean currency. Whatever Government of United Korea may hereafter be formed will have to recognize the currency in circulation, and a single currency will facilitate its task of creating economic order in a unified country.

7. The use of ROK currency by the United Nations forces would not be a recognition of ROK sovereignty in North Korea. Such currency can be used without any declaration that it is legal tender, and by authority of the United Nations Commander, not of the ROK. It would be necessary, however, soon to convert the existing North Korean currency by reason of the possession of stocks and plates by former North Korean authorities.

8. For the reasons which have been indicated above, it is necessary that guidance on this subject be given promptly to the United Nations Commander, and the views of the Interim Committee are accordingly requested as a matter of urgency."

Delga 243. Interim Committee on Korea met and heard MacArthur special report on Korea without comment.

It will meet at 2 p. m. on November 7 to consider question of currency to be used by UNC north 38th parallel.1

It agreed upon the following principles concerning the application on [of] its resolution of 12 October. This formulation is to be part of IC record but not otherwise publicized and is for confidential assistance to UC.

"The Interim Committee on Korea wishes to ensure that the people of the northern part of Korea shall have the opportunity to participate fully and freely in the establishment of a unified and democratic government of Korea. It therefore advised the UC on 12th October to exercise administrative functions in the north until the commission had considered means of consulting the Korean people and their representatives.

"The Interim Committee on Korea considers that in order to conform with the resolution of the committee adopted on 12th October 1950, the following principles should govern any use in the north of Koreans from south of the 38th Parallel, subject to the needs of military operations and security:

"1. Efforts should be made to use members of the local population wherever possible. Any Koreans from south of the 38th Parallel who are used in the north should be appointed by, be under the control of, and be responsible to the UC and not act as the representatives or agents of any other authority;

"2. No one should be used in a manner which would enable him to bring political pressure to bear upon the local inhabitants or in any manner restrict the free expression of political opinions by the local inhabitants. These principles will be reviewed by the UN Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea after it meets."

790. Bebler, November SC President, during course of lunch with Gross discussed problem of Korea in light of intervention by Chinese Communist forces. In general he thought this was manifestation of "infantile disease" of new Communist regime which in early stages of development lacks political judgment and sees problems as black and white. He thought CCP invasion of Tibet and reply to Indian démarche was another manifestation of this disease and a colossal mistake. He was thankful Yugoslavia had not made such mistakes in early years such as invasion of Trieste. Parenthetically, he felt relations between Italy and Yugoslavia are now improving every day.

He is convinced CCP feels hydro-electric works are threatened and that UN forces constitute a genuine threat to Manchuria. USSR certainly is trying to develop this feeling and Bebler felt it was fostered by phrases in MacArthur communiqué No. 11 referring to "present sphere of military action" and "present mission".

In reply to Gross' questions as to how problem should be handled, he thought assurance on these two points by US and UN might do much to remove these issues from current situation.

Re UN handling of Korea case, he felt UNCURK would be best means of developing the facts. He hoped that US would not rush a resolution through the SC and particularly one that contained a finding of aggression by CCP. However, if the matter were to be taken up in the SC, and he recognized that this might be a preliminary to Assembly action, he personally felt he could support a resolution with localizing the conflict approach. In answer to Gross' question, he further indicated that the problem of a Soviet veto might depend on timing of the resolution. He recalled that CCP representatives are due November 15. Therefore, it is likely that on Wednesday, when he agreed to have a meeting, the USSR would ask for postponement until CCP representatives arrived. He asked Gross whether the US had given these representatives visas which he understood were being sought at Prague. He requested definite information on this point at or before Wednesday's meeting. Assuming the US is facilitating travel of these representatives to Lake Success, he felt it would be proper to proceed with discussion in their absence rather than support any Soviet move for postponement. However, he recognized that this or a vote on possible resolution might draw Soviet veto solely on ground of CCP absence.

Such a result would not only endanger your forces but would enlarge the area of conflict and U.S. involvement to a most dangerous degree.

However in view of first sentence your 68396 you are authorized to go ahead with your planned bombing in Korea near the frontier including targets at Sinuiju and Korean end of Yalu bridges provided that at time of receipt of this message you still find such action essential to safety of your forces. The above does not authorize the bombing of any dams or power plants on the Yalu River.

Because of necessity for maintaining optimum position with United Nations policy and directives and because it is vital in the national interest of the U.S. to localize the fighting in Korea it is important that extreme care be taken to avoid violation Manchurian territory and airspace and to report promptly hostile action from Manchuria.

The military facts in substantiation were reported in the daily telecons and radio reports since furnished you. These reports confirm unquestionably that organized units of Chinese Communist forces have been and are being utilized against our forces; that while the exact strength is impossible to accurately determine, it is sufficient to have seized the initiative in the west sector and to have materially slowed the offensive in the east sector. The principle seems thoroughly established that such forces will be used and augmented at will, probably without any formal declaration of hostilities. If this augmentation continues, it can well reach a point rendering our resumption of advance impossible and even forcing a movement in retrograde. An effort will be made in the west sector in due course of time.

I deem it essential to execute the bombing of the targets under discussion as the only resource left to me to prevent a potential buildup of enemy strength to a point threatening the safety of the command. This interdiction of enemy lines of advance within Korea is so plainly defensive that it is hard to conceive that it would cause an increase in the volume of local intervention or, of itself, provoke a general war.

General Marshall asked Secretary Finletter and General Vandenberg to call on me today at noon to raise the desirability of having Ambassador Austin include in his statement to the Security Council a strong presentation of the difficult problem posed for UN forces by the "sanctuary" aspect of the present military position in Korea.¹

The Pentagon does not think we should take any action against Manchuria at this point but they feel very strongly that the whole world should understand the great problem created by forces which are in position to attack UN forces from within a safe haven. This would apply both to ground and air forces. We are now drafting something along this line for your consideration later in the day. You may wish to mention this to the President.

[&]quot;Hostile planes are operating from bases west of the Yalu River against our forces in North Korea. These planes are appearing in increasing numbers. The distance from the Yalu to the main line of contact is so short that it is almost impossible to deal effectively with the hit and run tactics now being employed. The present restrictions imposed on my area of operation provide a complete sanctuary for hostile air immediately upon their crossing the Manchuria-North Korea border. The effect of this abnormal condition upon the morale and combat efficiency of both air and ground troops is major.

Draft Memorandum by Mr. John P. Davies of the Policy Planning Staff

[Washington,] November 7, 1950.

CHINESE COMMUNIST INTERVENTION IN KOREA

It is possible that Chinese Communist intervention in Korea may be limited both in form and duration. In this context, Peiping may be nominally making good on its promise not to stand idly by, making a token show of force, seeking to intimidate the U.N., hoping that a peace-maker will bring about a negotiated settlement providing for at least a buffer zone on their frontier, but ready to yield all of these in the event that it is confronted with determined force. If this is the case, Peiping's intervention is essentially a bluff and the bellicose Chinese Communist propaganda is designed to persuade the U.N. to seek a solution of the Korean conflict by means other than military decision. The fact that so much of the frankly truculent propaganda about atomic bombing is broadcast in English to North America lends plausibility to such a thesis.

Other considerations, however, suggest that the situation is more ominous than indicated above. Chinese Communist capabilities are such that its intervention can be greatly expanded both in volume and duration. Even if intervention is limited in form it can easily be limitless in time.

Ideologically the Chinese Communists have every reason to foster Korean Communist resistance and, ultimately, expansion on the peninsula.

As the power in control of the mainland of China, the Peiping regime entertains governmental concern over the security of its frontiers. However mistaken it may be, the Peiping regime regards the U.N. forces in Korea as hostile. It undoubtedly recognizes that Korea and Manchuria are a geopolitical unit, that two wars have been fought to make them so. Yet Peiping derives no comfort from the fact that it is the U.N. and not the U.S. alone which was advancing on Manchuria. In its eyes the U.N. in Korea is acting not as a universal organization but in its alternate personality, as a free world alliance.

The fact that the United States is the moving spirit in the U.N. operation in Korea is of major importance in Peiping's reactions. Quite aside from their ideological antipathy to us, the Chinese Communists view us with morbid distrust and hatred. This is the product of five years of intensely bitter civil war in which they regarded us as allies of their enemies, culminating in the galling frustration of our action this summer with regard to Formosa.

We may assume that the Kremlin has done nothing to make Peiping any more understanding of us. To the contrary it is to be assumed that the Kremlin is actively egging China on to support covertly at least, the Korean Communists and to embroil itself more deeply with the West.

It would be rash to assume that Peiping has so parted with its senses as to have ignored the question of U.S. reactions to its intervention. Our reaction to the invasion by the North Koreans must have persuaded both Peiping and Moscow that the reactions of the American people and Government are not easily predictable. Furthermore, there is reason to believe that preventive war talk in this country is taken more seriously abroad than here. Therefore, it is likely that in deciding to intervene in Korea, the Chinese Communists took into account all possible retaliatory action to which we might resort. If this is so, it is probable that Chinese Communist propaganda assertions that they were prepared for our bombing of China were genuine. It, therefore, seems likely that Peiping has accepted the risk of violent United States reaction.

At the same time there are indications that the Chinese Communists know the limitations of what we can do to China. And this being the case, they may even have looked further and anticipated (whether rightly or wrongly) an American public reaction against the futility of war against China and a turning to the doctrine of a preventive war against the U.S.S.R. In this sense Peiping may genuinely anticipate and accept the imminence of World War III.

If all of this—or even a large part of it—is so, the Chinese Communists may be on the rampage. The invasion of Tibet—an obvious compensation for Formosa—is a clear indication that Peiping has reconciled itself to foregoing membership in the U.N., that it is not adverse to being regarded as an international outlaw. We must, therefore, take into our calculations the possibility that Communist China is in a mood to pursue a reckless, rather than a cautious, course throughout East and South Asia.

What is the relation of the Kremlin to the foregoing developments? Let us attempt to put into perspective the Kremlin's interest in the local situation along the Manchurian-Korean border.

The Kremlin's first concern is of course with Western Europe and the United States. Asia, in Stalin's mind, "should be regarded as the rear, the reserve of imperialism." As such it is for the Kremlin a theater of diversionary operations. If the United States, the United Kingdom and France can be drawn into deep military commitments in Asia, that is all to the good, provided that the Free World engages itself in hostilities with someone other than U.S.S.R. itself, permitting the Kremlin to nourish its own strength for the main theater of conflict.

This strategy is as old as the U.S.S.R. As early as 1920 Lenin indicated that he was aware of the advantages to the U.S.S.R. deriving from bad relations between Japan and the U.S.* In 1936 Stalin instigated the Chinese Communists to make common cause with the Nationalists so as to form a joint diversion against Japan. Now the pattern is being repeated with Peiping joining with the Korean Communists and openly proclaiming that we are playing the role which the Japanese did in the 30's. No war is declared: it was the "China Incident", now it is the Korean police action.

It is not to be necessarily assumed, however, that the Kremlin was able easily to persuade the Chinese to embark upon this dangerous course of intervention. Korea is not like Formosa or Tibet, claimed as Chinese territory. Nor is it even, as Indochina is, a potential suzerainty. It has been since 1945 (North Korea actually and South Korea potentially) a particular Soviet sphere from which Chinese influence was assumably pretty well excluded. Therefore, the Kremlin may have had to introduce special inducements.

An obvious means of spurring Peiping intervention would be Kremlin stimulation of the already marked suspicions of the Chinese Communists regarding U.S. intentions toward China. In international affairs Mao and company are bigots and novices while the Kremlin is adept and practiced at provocation. The theme that World War III is not only inevitable but imminent was current in China at the time the new regime established itself and announced its policy of "leaning" to the Soviet side. It then lapsed and has only recently been revived in evident currency. In so far as it is believed by the rulers of Communist China it is a counsel both of defensive desperation and of tight alignment with the U.S.S.R. Finally, it is probable that Peiping asked for Soviet material support and will get it, within limits. And it may even have been able to exact the return of some measure of control over Manchuria.

Whatever the Kremlin may have had to give to induce Chinese intervention—it was worth it; even if it cost yielding temporarily exclusive Soviet control over the Korean Communist movement. It promises the possibility of bailing out world Bolshevism from an impending fiasco threatening greater demoralization and damage than even the Tito defection. And it probably removes, at least for the foreseeable future, the possibility of Chinese Communist exceptionalism. A termination of the factional feud in the Japanese Communist Party would be a reasonably sure sign of this.

^{*}Lenin, Speech to Moscow Party Nuclei Secretaries, Nov. 26, 1920: "What saved us was that while Japan was gobbling up China she could not move westward, through all Siberia, with America in her rear, and she did not want to pull the chestnuts out of the fire for America. What would have saved us still more would have been a war between the imperialist powers. If we are obliged to tolerate such scoundrels as the capitalist thieves, each of whom is preparing to plunge a knife into us, it is our direct duty to make them turn their knives on each other. When thieves fall out, honest men come into their own." [Footnote in the source text.]

The Kremlin is, of course, alert to the grave and unpredicable risks which flow from Chinese intervention. It may even be inviting them, seeking to precipitate World War III. What seems more likely, however, more in keeping with the Kremlin's political personality, is that it accepts rather than seeks the risks of general conflict. It cannot believe that the risks do not exist, even though it is twice removed from formal responsibility—itself to Peiping and Peiping to the "volunteers". The Kremlin undoubtedly realizes now that it is not dealing with controlled incidents—as it did with the Axis in Spain and the Japanese at Nomanhan. In this situation it is playing with the volatile fire of American democracy.

CONCLUSIONS

On the basis of evidence at hand, we do not know what course Peiping and the Kremlin will follow in the coming months. Not only are their intentions veiled from us, but also—situations such as this tend to generate their own imperatives. We must proceed, therefore, on the basis that the situation confronting us contains a wide range of possible developments. At best we may be able to bring about a local solution to which Peiping and Moscow accede. At the worst we may find ourselves in World War III. Our objective should be to seek the first and urgently prepare for the second.

In a sense, these two objectives tend to be mutually exclusive. To commit ourselves to a local solution might, in certain circumstances, tend to defeat our preparations for global war. To prepare for global war, in certain contexts, might tend to impel the Kremlin to resort to arms immediately. Our policy must take into account these pitfalls.

Furthermore, we should avoid maneuvers uncoordinated with an overall plan. It is too late to expect that isolated assurances regarding the Yalu hydroelectric installations will mollify Peiping. Nor are threats of bombing or invasion likely to move us further toward our objectives.

What is needed is a unified policy directed toward our two objectives. It would be best defined and set forth in a special message by the President to the Congress along the following general lines.

The intervention of Chinese Communist "volunteers" in Korea is a matter of the gravest importance to the civilized world. It is an act of defiance to the law-abiding members of the world-community. It is a clear warning that an outlaw is at large in the world community and that all peace-loving countries must look to the defense of their homes.

Accordingly, the United States is immediately mobilizing.

It is mobilizing as a matter of prudent defense. It is not mobilizing to take aggressive action. It will continue to support fully the United Nations action in Korea. It will assist the Korean people to defend their homes. But it will not take action which will give international renegades the excuse for plunging the world into chaos. If general war must come it will be through the action of the outlaws.

Meanwhile we will provide the arms and supplies necessary to enable Korea to defend itself. We will assist in the training of as many Korean soldiers as are necessary to expel and withhold the marauders. We will not withdraw our troops until there are Korean forces to take their places. And we will participate in the United Nations' constructive endeavors to rehabilitate Korea and further the development and progress of this free nation.

On the basis of evidence at hand, we do not know what course Peiping and the Kremlin will follow in the coming months. Not only are their intentions veiled from us, but also—situations such as this tend to generate their own imperatives. We must proceed, therefore, on the basis that the situation confronting us contains a wide range of possible developments. At best we may be able to bring about a local solution to which Peiping and Moscow accede. At worst we may find ourselves in World War III. Our objective should be to seek the first and urgently prepare for the second.

First let us examine and dispose of certain alternative courses which we might follow.

Recognizing the grave risks that the present situation might degenerate into World War III, we might decide that we should withdraw our forces from the Korean theater in order to (1) avoid provocation, and (2) husband our strength for the great test with the Soviet world as a whole. Such a course would probably alleviate the present crisis, but new dangers would immediately ensue as a direct result. In the first place, the American people would be confused and humiliated by a decision of this character. It would be a body blow to morale at the center, the maintenance of which is essential if we are to win the world-wide struggle in which we are engaged. The effects of such action on the rest of the Free World would be little short of disastrous. In most of these countries, confidence and the will to resist Bolshevism would be shattered. In the rest, it would be gravely shaken. To decide to withdraw from Korea would be to avoid a current crisis in exchange for which we would be confronted with a situation of even greater isolation and menace than that in which we now find ourselves.

An alternative course would be to break off contact with the enemy and fall back to a purely defensive position. This would be at best a temporizing course. It would be interpreted by the Kremlin and Peiping as a precipitate retreat inviting bold exploitation. It would have only delayed the necessity for our making a decision.

A third course would be to seek immediately to negotiate. In the present circumstances such a move would be made in the context of a reverse. To negotiate in the present circumstances would be simply to register the present situation which is, from our point of view, weak and unsatisfactory.

Finally, we might immediately carry hostilities to Manchuria and China Proper. At present the only feasible attack would be by air and naval action. Even these limited means would probably cause full-scale Chinese intervention from Manchuria. To provoke full-scale reaction at a time when the Chinese Communists are committed on a limited scale would be, at best, premature and at worst reckless—unless we deliberately seek to set off a chain of events designed to bring on World War III.

Let us now return to the recommended policy of (1) seeking a localized solution in Korea, and (2) preparing for the possible imminent outbreak of World War III.

It is essential that the dual phases of this policy be developed simultaneously and be made public simultaneously. In essence one is a course of moderation and, in Peiping's fevered eyes, perhaps even reassurance. The other is a warning. To attempt only to localize might be regarded as a gesture of weakness. To expand radically our military strength without indications of temperate intent would be regarded by our adversaries as an alarm signal of aggressive American design possibly requiring forestallment.

In pursuing a strategy of localization we should, obviously, seek to avoid action which we calculate would bring the Chinese Communists overtly into the Korean conflict. The same holds true with respect to our actions affecting the U.S.S.R.

Tactically this means that in the present situation we should not cross or take hostile action across the Manchurian border on land or in the air, nor should we advance into Chinese territorial waters or attack the Chinese coast. This rule is, of course, subject to revision by this Government and the U.N. in the light of later developments.

Inside Korea our tactics should be, if and when militarily feasible, to maintain the offensive; otherwise to accept a defensive stance.

Meanwhile we should promptly repair our neglect with respect to maintaining responsible private points of contact with the Peiping regime, both for obtaining interpretations of Chinese Communist intentions and conveying to Peiping information designed to influence its policy.

It is of major importance that we immediately begin to expand the ROK military force with a view to obtaining manpower to meet probable additions to Chinese strength in North Korea, provided that we calculate that the ROK will resist mounting pressure and that we can provide the necessary material.

Finally it is tactically essential that our activities be taken in the U.N. context, that we seek to bring other members of the U.N. along with us in our policy and that we avoid becoming politically isolated, as the Kremlin desires. To bolster Korean morale and win international support we should, in addition to pursuing military objectives, calmly and confidently lay stress on the constructive phases of the U.N. effort—rehabilitation, education and development.

Our strategy of preparing for the eventuality of World War III must concentrate on building strength at the center. This calls for implementing most of the recommendations of NSC 68 ² at a far faster tempo and on an expanded scale. It is a policy closely approaching mobilization.

At the same time we must move ahead rapidly in the NATO—and if that proves immediately impossible, rethink our policy regarding Europe.

Japan must be built up. Its meagre capabilities to defend itself must be added to. Its abilities to product materiel, including arms, should be developed so that the strain on us for supplying an expanding ROK Army can be eased.

Finally the question arises regarding the risks of this dual policy. They are the same risks which we consciously accepted in June.

That of Soviet intervention is basic and ever present. If it occurs, whether thinly disguised or open, a new situation will have been created requiring a decision in the light of circumstances at the time. The present recommended course is designed to minimize these risks.

There is also the risk of alternating military commitments between the Chinese and the U.N. forces mounting to the point that general hostilities with Communist China eventuate. This is also recognized in formulating the recommended policy. The tactics involved in localizing the conflict are designed to meet this risk. If notwithstanding these efforts, we find ourselves drawn into general hostilities with Communist China, it does not necessarily mean that the U.S.S.R. would honor its alliance with Communist China. The likelihood of that occurring would increase as we departed from retaliatory air and naval action and expanded the conflict in two respects—toward the Soviet frontiers and onto the ground. Were we to restrict our reaction to punitive air and naval action, to South Manchuria and China Proper, the U.S.S.R. might be content to limit its participation to supplying the Chinese Communists and we, for our part, might be able to foresee a termination to the action simply through air and naval disengagement. For us to become more deeply engaged in hostilities with Communist China would, in the foreseeable future, not only create a far greater risk of open Soviet involvement but also create a situation, even if the U.S.S.R. did not enter the hostilities, in which we could not impose a decision and from which we could not extricate ourselves.

Similarly, we have had recent experience in Greece where Maejos [Markos] guerrillas were equipped with many weapons coming from foreign sources and frontiers were opened to give sanctuary to Andartes. It seems a pattern has developed in such matters which, until recently, allowed flagrant violations of older precepts of international conduct to proceed unchallenged. It is possible such is the case with Peking authorities for it is noteworthy that according MacArthur's report (Deptel 305, November 5)3 regular military formations have been broken to form special operational forces such as units 54, 55, 56.

I cannot imagine that were Mexico in so deplorable situation as Korea that US Government would not be considerably concerned over boundary and other questions when settlement terms were being arranged.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] November 7, 1950.

Subject: Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea: Counter-Strategy

Reference: CA Memorandum November 4, 1950 "Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea: Estimate of Objectives"

I. Chinese Communist Capabilities

The possible objectives of the Moscow-Peiping Axis have been made the subject of estimate in CA's reference memorandum. The Communist allies must be presumed to have prepared for all eventualities they contemplate facing as a result of Chinese intervention in Korea, given known factors for the achievement of their aims. Those aims are undisclosed, but it is beyond question that they constitute objectives dangerous to the UN position in Korea. The Communist side have full knowledge of the political and economic factors in being on the UN side, and it is to be assumed that they are bringing into play those factors which they have computed will be sufficient to overcome the forces ranged against them. That Communist calculation can be thrown off only by the introduction of new factors into the equation from the UN side. The following suggestions respecting the UN counterstrategy are offered.

II. Political Détente

GHQ SCAP still numbers the Chinese Communist troops at some three or four divisions. If that estimate is correct as of this date, the UN position is serious only in potentiality, not in actuality at this moment. We have time to consider the possibility of some détente that will give us opportunity to explore the possibilities of effecting a settlement through the UN apparatus. Granted that, by the record of Communism, the possibility seems slight, the very fact of exhaustion of all possibilities would tend to weld our allies closer to us-and one basic strategy must be to keep the affair in the UN framework. The Chinese Communists undoubtedly look askance at our support of the National Government, our efforts to keep Peiping out of the UN, our guerrilla contacts (which very probably have become known to the Communist side), our avowed anti-Communist position—even as we look askance on their motivations. The USSR has assuredly played on the Chinese Communist hopes and fears as a master-violinist on a fiddle. The two Governments have a formal alliance, and they are possibly bound by some agreement of August current. Even so, assuming the two sides have only limited objectives at this stage, they might be prepared to avail themselves of political means which might be offered to deal with the dispute—for so it is—in point. If their aims are unlimited, that is, if they assume the outbreak shortly of World War III. UN forces had better be elsewhere than in Korea.

This détente would be facilitated, possibly, by acceptance by Britain, France and the United States of the Soviet offer to discuss the problem of Germany. It is hard to see what could be lost by following this procedure, for it is not necessary that we surrender one iota of our position if we chose not to do so; but we might gain (1) a better understanding of the Soviet aims and (2) more time—which is sorely needed. It appears clear that the USSR chooses to proceed along the way to World War III by a path which makes it appear that the "peace-loving people's democracies" are being forced into war by "imperialist warmongers". Since ideas count for so much in war, we should not by sins of omission, in cases where action costs us nothing but a little time which may be of equal advantage to us, play into their hands. It is hard to believe that, in the event of war at this time, we shall be able to avoid certain military defeats of serious nature for the UN side. It might be economic to concede the holding of a few conferences now, in the estimate that we might just possibly thus avoid the loss of a number of battles later. It is well, in times like the present, to leave no stones unturned.

The attendance of the Chinese Communist delegation at the UN in connection with the case of Formosa would offer, it would appear, a major opportunity for bringing about a political détente, both in respect to Formosa and otherwise, if such be possible. There might even develop an occasion for having informal discussions on the subject in which the Soviets might participate. The non-appearance of that Peiping delegation, on the other hand, would be an ominous sign that China, which has been clamoring to enter the UN, is in fact not now (if ever it was) interested in the rights and obligations of membership.

The virtue of considering the possibilities of moves in the field of diplomacy is pointed up in Mr. Peake's memorandum of November 61 commenting on CA's reference memorandum of November 4, 1950. Mr. Peake's suggestion that Chinese Communist intervention is an effort to enhance the Communist bargaining position with respect to Japan, as well as to the status of Korea, Formosa and to the admission of the Chinese Communists into the UN, has some logical ground in the known fact that the Communists frequently adopt a threatening posture with the cold-blooded purpose of so frightening their enemies that the latter will surrender without a fight. If the Communist side were to rise to diplomatic bait at the present juncture, there would be some reason to assume that the present storm in China had been raised by the Chinese Communists for the calculated purpose of redressing the military balance in their favor by the means of a limited use of volunteers. The cloud of warlike propaganda is perhaps raised for the express purpose of showing the United States to be the aggressor, and the provocative actions of planes based in Manchuria may be designed to cause the United States Air Force particularly to take the actions with which we are to be charged. The Communist side would thus be offered an opportunity, on the eve of the scheduled hearing of the Chinese Communist charge of aggression against the United States, of proving their case by an approach from another angle, and of splitting the united UN front. The hostile planes as vet have patently constituted no real military threat.

All of the above bears no suggestion, of course, of "appeasement": it does propose the use of such political avenues as may be available, in an effort to localize, in Korea, the new hostile moves from the Communist camp.

III. Military Strategy

One way to shift the military balance back into the UN favor in Korea would obviously be to throw in more troops. It would appear inadvisable, in the light of political strains existing elsewhere, substantially to increase the present United States complement. Efforts should be made to increase the proportion of participation of other nations, in terms of both personnel and materiel. The other UN members may refuse to accept the greater commitment, in which event the question arises as to the advisability of tipping the balance back by the use of new weapons or new strategies. The following seem to offer themselves: (a) chemical warfare; (b) indirect employment of Nationalist forces; and (c) strategic bombing in Manchuria. Chemical warfare would be effective against Chinese Communist troops, who are reputedly ill-equipped for defense in that regard. The loosing of Chinese Nationalist forces against the mainland (by technically withdrawing the Seventh Fleet without public warning but after prior confidential notification to the National Government) would offer them the chance they purport to have desired, under optimum conditions where they would have the advantage of surprise and only a thin force of Communist troops arrayed against them. Strategic bombing (even atomic) of certain selected targets in Manchuria, especially if prior public notification were made that the population of all major cities of Manchuria should evacuate, would indubitably shake the Chinese aggressor.

Neither the first nor the last of the indicated lines of action should be adopted, by all of the rights of the case, without common agreement with our UN comrades at arms. That agreement would be practically impossible to get. There would be strong opposition to the use of chemical warfare against "defenseless" Asiatics—especially in Asia. The unilateral loosing of Nationalist forces in what would be deemed a contravention of the June 27 ruling, particularly at a time when the question of Formosa is to be made the subject of debate in the UN, would set poorly in public opinion—and it is dubious whether the Nationalist forces could or would in fact stray far from the apronstrings on the basis of the advice "You're on your own: give performance and you may rehabilitate your position." Incursion into Manchuria would hardly be countenanced by the UN as such, and if undertaken with less than united opinion would probably by itself set off the next Communist move, in the direction of a further splitting of the sometime united UN front and possibly the expansion of the area of armed conflict. All three measures would promise, in sum, the weakening of the UN front and the expansion of the area of conflict. Our measures should rather be devised to strengthen the UN front, and to limit the area of conflict: it is the Communist design which intends the opposite, and we should avoid the Communist traps.

1. Refusal to Engage China Per Se

Military strategy must follow that political strategy which, it must be emphasized, contemplates maintenance of the united UN front, for the safety of each and every one of those States which have resisted aggression in Korea. This is the main reliance for resistance to aggression throughout the world. Again it is to be noted that, in the presence of three new divisions and a very handful of enemy planes, there would seem to be no immediate cause for a panic reaction. There would seem to be time to stabilize and await further developments, in a situation where the Chinese Communists have thus far publicly done no more than call for volunteer aid to Korea, before reaching decisions on matters of major political and military importance. Premature conclusions here might lead us to exactly the move that the USSR desire that we make. It is clear that any action which would result in an enlargement of the scope of the present hostilities, it [sic] in the present circumstances would very possibly bring about a further enlargement, by the action of the USSR, to the distinct disadvantage of ourselves and our friends. We are in no posture now to resist Soviet arms in either Japan or Germany. And it appears clear that, for whatever reason, the atomic bomb alone can no longer be counted on to deter the USSR and its satellites from taking a course which runs the danger of war. Perhaps it is the fact that the Soviet armaments, now at their prime, will within a couple of years be outmoded, obsolescent; perhaps it is that the USSR plans to use other weapons, of either chemical or bacteriological warfare, which it estimates will balance the atomic bomb; perhaps they count on the initial advantage they would gain by causing the destruction of Washington and/or its inhabitants in a sudden, deadly strike; but, in any event, they can count on the advantage of having the initiative and the ability to accomplish a surprise move against an opponent that remains still in a posture of self-defense. In circumstances like those, it is elementary common sense that we proceed warily until the intentions of the enemy become clearer, in order that we shall not fall into a trap vaster in scope than anything dreamed of by Machiavellian strategists of former eras. Even if strikes against Manchuria meant nothing more than hostilities with China, it would be practically impossible to disengage from such a war, and while we were slowly sinking in the quagmire of that vast waste over which no victory could be anything but pyrrhic, we might see Japan, Germany, and all of Europe be lost before our eyes—and the United States placed in a danger such as it had never known before. It may be hard enough not to fight China, as things stand, without us ourselves deciding that the present course of things shall take on a graver turn still. We should refuse to engage, in order that we can disengage at will. If we ourselves willed the engagement, there could be no turning back on the road to disaster.

2. Temporary Holding Operation

The battle for Korea should be continued on the basis of General MacArthur's standing JCS directive of October 9, pending definitive developments. The implementation of that directive, designed to localize the war, will admittedly be more difficult under the now changed conditions. It has not yet been established as impossible. The use of Manchurian airfields by enemy planes is an irritating factor. For so long as such planes do not appear in considerable numbers, real danger to either our ground forces or our air force seems absent excepting as a suspected potential. The presence of Chinese troops in the field in Korea is established, but the real reason for their being there remains something of a mystery in the light of the Peiping contention that they are volunteers and in view of the limited contact they have had to date with UN forces.

The temporary abandonment of an all-out offensive in favor of more wary tactics, with perhaps some withdrawals necessary for sake of strength and stability, may slow up time-schedules and throw previous planning awry. That we still have much room, strength and time for maneuver is shown by the very disposition of our forces on the northeast front, from which they could and would obviously be drawn back to consolidated positions across the neck of the peninsula if the high command considered that real danger threatened. This should be a period for some slowing up of military operations to permit political estimates and discussions with our allies, to the end that, in our haste to win a battle, we shall not lose the war.

3. Political Support for a War

It cannot be repeated too often that the Korean war must be kept within the UN framework. We should of course fulfill our obligations to the UN; we should not assume, however, that our will is the UN will, or disregard the fact that the obligations to be fulfilled are only as established by joint action in the UN, and also that others besides ourselves are rightfully called upon to fulfill the same obligations. We cannot go faster than the UN, or we shall find ourselves alone—which is the Soviet design. The form our strategy is to take in Korea must be determined, in the ultimate analysis, by the decision of the 53 nations who joined in resistance to aggression in the first instance. Our task is to support that united front, which gives us a framework for action. If it can truly be said that the experience of Korea has become an element of strength in the UN power of resistance to aggression, it can with equal validity be noted further that the continuance in being of the UN is more important than Korea—assuming, for instance, that the UN refused to go as far as we might like in respect to the problem of Korea. Even in the hypothetical event of our experiencing certain military reverses stemming from UN action in Korea, a UN which remained united would continue to be a bulwark against aggression. And, united, it may still win the battle for Korea, despite the Chinese Communist intervention.

Bajpai said he did not wish to advise but it occurred to him that US statement of intentions might have useful effect at this time. He referred to statement contained Depcirtel 119 November 5 which Embassy had included at end of note handed him this morning and said he assumed US would make statement its attitude in SC meeting on Korea November 8.

Adverting to Chinese intervention Korea Bajpai said he thought there were three possible explanations:

(1) Defensive reaction to alleged American bombing of Chinese territory;

(2) Action to guard against Manchuria's loss of important sources

(3) Action taken under the direct influence of Moscow (latter assumed worst possible reason). Referring to claim in joint party declaration (Embtel 1105) of Chinese interests in Korea and reason for intervention Bajpai remarked sarcastically this line of reasoning could as readily be advanced by India for sending troops into Tibet.

Bajpai's attention was called to Peking's charges of Anglo-American activities in Nepal (Deptel 673 November 63) and Nepalese Embassy's denial of US arms aid. Point was made to him this is exactly kind of charges Communist regimes used against countries upon which they had designs of one kind or other. The United Nations Security Council met on Wednesday, November 8, from 10:30 a.m. to 1:10 p.m.; for the record, see U.N. document S/PV.519. Over the objection of the Soviet Representative, the Council voted to adopt the agenda which called for a discussion of General MacArthur's special report of November 5 (S/1884) on Chinese Communist intervention in Korea. The Soviet Representative then proposed the following draft resolution (S/1889):

"Decides that during the discussion of the Korean question it shall be necessary to invite the representative of the People's Republic of China."

Following expressions of disapproval by the representatives of the United States and the Republic of China, the United Kingdom representative offered a counter-draft resolution (S/1890)—on the grounds that the Soviet draft resolution was not appropriate—which read as follows:

"The Security Council

"Decides to invite, in accordance with rule 39 of the rules of procedure, a representative of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China to be present during discussion by the Council of the special report of the United Nations Command in Korea (S/1884)."

The United Kingdom representative expressed the opinion that, if the counter-draft should be adopted, the United Nations Security Council should not be deterred, pending the arrival of a representative from the People's Republic of China, from discussing the agenda item and taking any decisions thereon.

[Washington,] November 8, 1950.

Subject: Use of the Atomic Bomb in China

If we use the atomic bomb in China it should be done only on the basis of over-riding military considerations. We should presumably have reached a point where the bomb is needed to produce decisive results either unobtainable by conventional warfare or obtainable only through expenditure of vastly greater numbers of men and quantities of materiel.

We should of course defer to a JCS estimate of the military effect of atomic bombing in China. One opinion would seem to be that China offers few suitable A-bomb targets, in view of scattered cities, low degree of industrialization, and immense area. Targets would presumably be 1) cities, 2) industrial complexes, and 3) concentrations of men and materiel in particular tactical situations. Obviously, the political effects, summarized below, would vary in degree according to the target. A repetition of Hiroshima and Nagasaki would produce the most damaging reaction, bombing of purely industrial targets the least. Nevertheless, we must consider that, regardless of the fact that military results achieved by atomic bombardment may be identical to those attained by conventional weapons, the effect on world opinion will be vastly different. The A-bomb has the status of a peculiar monster conceived by American cunning and its use by us, in whatever situation, would be exploited to our serious detriment.

Therefore, if a decision to use the A-bomb in China should be reached, we should either:

1) Secure some form of sanction for its use from cooperating members of the UN, or

2) be prepared to accept the political damage in return for the strategic gain.

The following are foreseen as some of the political effects of a decision to use the atomic bomb in China:

1. The Effect on the United States Moral Position.

In view of the history of our attempts to secure international control of atomic energy and of the special place occupied by the atomic bomb as a weapon of mass destruction, the moral position of the United States would be seriously damaged as a result of use of the bomb, without international sanction, against China. Because of the difference in the moral, political, and psychological position occupied by China as opposed to that of the USSR, in the eyes of the world, the effect of using the A-bomb against China would be quite different from that of its use against the Soviet Union.

2. Effect on the UN of a US Decision to Use the A-Bomb.

Unilateral decision by the United States to use the atomic bomb against China would in all likelihood destroy the unity preserved thus far in the combined UN action in Korea. It is probable that U.S. use of the A-bomb would be deplored and denounced by a considerable number of nations who had up to that time supported the action in Korea. The results might therefore be a disintegration of the concept of UN maintenance of world security and a shattering blow to the future development of the UN in the direction indicated by the Uniting for Peace resolution.

3. Effect on the USSR.

Use of the atomic bomb in China would strengthen Soviet propaganda that the United States is bent on initiating general war. Furthermore, should the Soviet Union be prepared to launch a third World War, atomic bombing of China would encourage Soviet participation in war under conditions by which the U.S. moral position would be irreparably damaged while the Soviets would suffer the minimum condemnation.

4. The Effect in Asia.

Should the next atomic bomb be dropped on an Asiatic population, it is easy for foresee the revulsion of feeling which would spread throughout Asia. Fears that we reserve atomic weapons exclusively for Japanese and Chinese would be confirmed, our efforts to win the Asiatics to our side would be cancelled and our influence in non-Communist nations of Asia would deteriorate to an almost nonexistent quantity.

5. Use of the A-Bomb Would Commit us Deeper in Asia.

In order to obtain decisive results we should undoubtedly have to engage in atomic warfare on a wide scale. This would involve us deep in Asia and make it difficult, if not impossible, to withdraw in order to fight in another theater of war. On the other hand, should we be unable to achieve decisive results even with atomic bombing of China, the effect upon our world position, particularly as regards Western Europe and countries looking to us for protection against the Soviets, would be disastrous.

NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE ESTIMATE *

CHINESE COMMUNIST INTERVENTION IN KOREA

THE PROBLEM

1. To estimate the scale and purpose of Chinese Communist intervention in North Korea and Chinese Communist capabilities and intentions.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

- 2. Present Chinese Communist troop strength in North Korea is estimated at 30,000 to 40,000. Chinese Communist ground units are engaging UN forces at various points ranging from 30 to 100 miles south of the Korean-Manchurian border. Recent action has been marked also by the appearance of Soviet-type jet fighters in combat with US aircraft over Korea.
- 3. Present Chinese Communist troop strength in Manchuria is estimated at 700,000. Of this number, there are at least 200,000 regular field forces. These troop strengths, added to the forces already in Korea, are believed to make the Chinese Communists capable of:

 (a) halting further UN advance northward, through piecemeal commitment of troops; or (b) forcing UN withdrawal to defensive positions farther south by a powerful assault.
- 4. The objective of the Chinese Communist intervention appears to be to halt the advance of UN forces in Korea and to keep a Communist regime in being on Korean soil. In accomplishing this purpose, the Chinese Communists would: (a) avert the psychological and political consequences of a disastrous outcome of the Korean venture; (b) keep UN forces away from the actual frontiers of China and the USSR; (c) retain an area in Korea as a base of Communist military and guerrilla operations; (d) prolong indefinitely the containment of UN, especially US, forces in Korea; (e) control the distribution of hydroelectric power generated in North Korea and retain other economic benefits; and (f) create the possibility of a favorable political solution in Korea, despite the military defeat of the North Koreans.

5. The Chinese Communists thus far retain full freedom of action with respect to Korea. They are free to adjust their action in accordance with the development of the situation. If the Chinese Communists were to succeed in destroying the effective strength of UN forces in northern Korea, they would pursue their advantage as far as possible. If the military situation is stabilized, they may well consider that, with advantageous terrain and the onset of winter, their forces now in Korea are sufficient to accomplish their immediate purposes.

6. A likely and logical development of the present situation is that the opposing sides will build up their combat power in successive increments to checkmate the other until forces of major magnitude are involved. At any point in this development, the danger is present that the situation may get out of control and lead to a general war.

7. The Chinese Communists, in intervening in Korea, have accepted a grave risk of retaliation and general war. They would probably ignore an ultimatum requiring their withdrawal. If Chinese territory were to be attacked, they would probably enter Korea in full force.

8. The fact that both the Chinese Communists and the USSR have accepted an increased risk of a general war indicates either that the Kremlin is ready to face a showdown with the West at an early date or that circumstances have forced them to accept that risk.

DISCUSSION

9. Actual Development of Intervention to Date.

Prior to mid-October, Chinese Communist support of the North Koreans consisted solely of logistical aid and moral support. Since that time, however, the Chinese Communists have been committing troops in increasing number so that at present UN forces are being engaged by Chinese Communist ground units in varying penetrations, ranging from 30 to 100 miles south of the Manchurian-Korean border.

To date, elements taken from the Chinese Communist 38th, 39th, 40th, and 42nd armies of the Fourth Field Army have been identified in the combat zone of Korea. Units of approximately battalion size from each division of three or more of the Chinese Communist armies along the Korean border in Manchuria have been combined to form units of approximately division size. One regular Chinese Communist division has been tentatively identified. Present Chinese Communist troop strength in North Korea is estimated to number from 30,000 to 40,000. This number, combined with an estimated 45,000 North Korean troops, constitutes an over-all enemy strength of 75,000 to 85,000. Of this total, an estimated 52,000 are in contact with UN forces.

The arrival of Chinese Communist ground units in the Korean fighting has been accompanied by a marked stiffening of North Korean resistance. The previously confused and disorganized North Korean units now appear to be in process of recommitment as reorganized and re-equipped combat units. There are indications that Chinese Communist forces in Korea are being reinforced.

Although the nationality of the hostile aircraft involved in recent incidents over the Korean-Manchurian border has not been definitely established, the fact that Soviet-type jet aircraft were involved indicates that the North Koreans are receiving air assistance from Manchuria in addition to direct ground force support from the Chinese Communists.

10. Chinese Communist Capabilities for Armed Intervention.

The over-all strength of the Chinese Communist ground forces is estimated at 2,800,000. Of this number, 1,770,000 are well-trained and well-equipped regular field forces, and the remainder are fairly well-trained and well-equipped military district troops. In addition, there are approximately 2,000,000 poorly-trained and poorly-equipped provincial troops.

Since spring 1950, there has been a general build-up of Chinese Communist tactical troop strength in Manchuria to a point which exceeds normal security needs. The movement of numerous major units from south and central China is estimated to have brought current Chinese Communist strength in Manchuria to approximately 700,000. Of this number, there are at least 200,000 regular field forces, comprising possibly eight to ten armies, plus elements of at least four other armies.

The Chinese Communist Air Force, not tested in combat to date, is believed to consist of 200 combat aircraft in tactical units. Of this 200, 40 are TU-2 light bombers, 40 are IL-10 ground attack, and 120 are LA-9 fighters. It is possible that the CCAF may include 30-40 Soviet-type swept-wing jet fighters formerly stationed in the vicinity of Shanghai, some of which are believed to have been the jet aircraft which have appeared in recent operations in North Korea.

With these ground forces and this air strength, the Chinese Communists could probably make available as many as 350,000 troops within 30 to 60 days for sustained ground operations in Korea and could provide limited air support and some armor. This could be done without jeopardizing their internal control in Manchuria or China proper. The Chinese Communist Forces are therefore believed capable either of: (a) halting further UN advance northward by matching any foreseeable UN build-up with piecemeal commitment of forces presently along the Yalu River; or (b) forcing UN withdrawal to defensive positions further south through a powerful assault.

11. Chinese Communist Motives for Intervention.

The Chinese Communist decision to commit troops in North Korea, entailing as it does the serious risk of widening the Korean conflict, would not have been taken by Communist China without Soviet sanction or possibly direction. It must therefore be assumed that both parties consider the anticipated benefits to justify the acceptance of the calculated risk of precipitating a general war in China which could eventually involve the Soviet Union. This calculated risk includes the possibility of a reaction on the part of the US directly to meet the broader issue with the USSR rather than to allow itself to become involved in an expensive and indecisive war with Communist China.

The immediate occasion for Communist Chinese armed assistance appears to have been the crossing of the 38th Parallel by US forces and the consequent swift collapse of North Korean resistance. Unless the Chinese had intervened, UN forces would soon have reached and secured the Yalu River line. The Korean People's Republic would have ceased to exist except as a government-in-exile and as a guerrilla movement. Confronted with this possibility, the Chinese Communists have apparently determined to prevent an early UN military victory in Korea and to keep a Communist regime in being on Korean soil.

It is significant that the Chinese Communists refrained from committing troops at two earlier critical phases of the Korean war, namely when the UN held no more than a precarious toehold in the Pusan perimeter and later when the UN landings were made at Inchon. The failure to act on those occasions appears to indicate that Peiping was unwilling to accept a serious risk of war, prior to the US crossing of the 38th Parallel. Since the crossing of the Parallel, Chinese Communist propaganda has increasingly identified the Peiping cause with the cause of the North Koreans.

The immediate objective of the Chinese Communist intervention in Korea appears to have been to halt the advance of UN forces. Chinese Communist military operations to date, including the nature of the forces employed, suggest an interim military operation with limited objectives. This view is strengthened by consideration of the limitations imposed on military operations by winter weather in this mountainous area.

In assisting the North Koreans, the Chinese Communists can derive several advantages for themselves, the Soviet Union, and world Communism. They are:

a. To avert the psychological and political consequences of a disastrous outcome of the Korean venture.

The prestige of the world Communist movement and, more particularly, the domestic and international political position of the Chinese Communist regime, are linked with the fate of the North Korean satellite. A complete UN victory in Korea would adversely affect the power of international Communism to attract and hold adherents. For the Chinese regime itself, the total elimination of a satellite state in Korea would mean a serious loss of political face in China and in the world at large, most notably in the Asiatic areas that have probably been selected by the Chinese Communists as their primary sphere

b. To keep UN forces away from the actual frontiers of China and the USSR.

The establishment of a Western-oriented and US-supported regime on the south bank of Yalu River is probably viewed by Peiping as a threat to the security of the Communist regime in China. The USSR would likewise be sensitive to the advance of UN forces to the northeastern tip of Korea. The Chinese Communists apparently regard the US as a hostile power, determined to bring about their eventual overthrow.

c. To retain an area in Korea as a base of Communist military and querrilla operations.

The terrain of North Korea adjacent to the Manchurian border is especially suitable for such a base.

d. To prolong indefinitely the containment of UN, especially US.

forces in Korea.

Prolonged involvement of UN and US forces in Korea is favorable for Communist global strategy. The containment of these forces in Korea prevents their redeployment to Germany, or to other areas where they might be required to oppose Communist aggression.

e. To control the distribution of hydroelectric power generated in North Korea and retain other economic benefits.

Peiping has an immediate economic stake in the preservation of a friendly state south of the Yalu. The hydroelectric installations in North Korea, particularly the Suiho plant, are important sources of power for South Manchuria. The port of Antung in Manchuria is part of an economic entity that embraces the Korean city of Sinuiju across the river; trade in the area would be hampered severely if no arrangements existed for the operation of the Antung-Sinuiju port as a single unit. River traffic on the Yalu and the Tumen rivers is dependent upon workable agreements between political authorities in Manchuria and Korea.

f. To create the possibility of a favorable political solution in Korea, despite the military defeat of the North Koreans.

It is possible that the Chinese Communists and the USSR hope to establish a military situation that will make the UN willing to negotiate a settlement of the Korean conflict in preference to a long drawnout and expensive campaign.

12. Possible Developments.

The Chinese Communists thus far retain full freedom of action with respect to Korea. They are free to adjust their actions in accordance with the development of the situation. Their current violent propaganda—centering as it has on (a) the "will of the Chinese people" (rather than the government) to supply "people's volunteers" to aid the North Koreans and "defend China"; and (b) America's "use of Japanese" and "aping of Japan" in its "aggression against China"—is excellently adapted for preserving maneuverability. It could mean equally: whipping up of public opinion that seems chilly toward any Korean venture; a part of a general war of nerves; a real intention to organize an anti-UN military campaign on a "people's volunteer" basis; or a psychological preparation of the Chinese people for hostilities with the US, if not a world war.

If the Chinese Communists were to succeed in destroying the effective strength of UN forces in northern Korea, the Chinese Communists would probably pursue that advantage as far as possible, bringing in reinforcements from Manchuria to exploit the opportunity.

If the military situation is stabilized, the Chinese Communists might well consider that, with advantageous terrain and the onset of winter, their forces now in Korea are adequate to prevent a military decision favorable to the UN, at least until spring. Such a military deadlock would contain UN forces in Korea and expose them to attrition. It would also permit the reconstitution of North Korean forces and facilitate the development of guerrilla operations behind the UN lines. In these circumstances, the possibility of a political solution as the most convenient means of bringing the situation in Korea to a conclusion would be increased.

A likely and logical development of the present situation is that the opposing sides will build up their combat power in successive increments to checkmate the other until forces of major magnitude are involved. At any point in this development the danger is present that the situation may get out of control and lead to a general war.

The Chinese Communists appreciate that in intervening in Korea they have incurred grave risks of retaliation and general war, but have accepted the risk. They would probably ignore a UN ultimatum requiring their withdrawal. If Chinese territory were to be attacked, they could and probably would enter Korea in full force, with the purpose of expelling UN forces altogether.

The fact that both the Chinese Communists and the USSR have accepted an increased risk of a general war indicates either that the Kremlin is ready to face a showdown with the West at an early date or that circumstances have forced them to accept that risk.

Editorial Note

The United Nations Security Council met on November 8 from 3 to 4:50 p.m.; for the record, see U.N. document S/PV.521. Ambassador Austin made a brief statement to the effect that Communist China should be summoned, rather than invited, to speak before the Council.

The Council then voted on the Soviet draft resolution (S/1889) which failed of adoption by a vote of 2 in favor (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Yugoslavia) to 3 opposed (China, Cuba, United States), with 6 abstentions. A Soviet proposal to amend the United Kingdom draft resolution (S/1890) by changing the words "special report of the United Nations Command in Korea (S/1884)" to "the question submitted by the delegation of the United States of America (S/1886)" was rejected by a vote of 1 in favor (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) to 2 against (China, Cuba), with 8 abstentions. The United Kingdom resolution was then adopted (S/1892) by a vote of 8 in favor to 2 opposed (China, Cuba), with 1 abstention (Egypt).

Editorial Note

On November 8, Mr. Acheson issued a statement to the press (text in Department of State Bulletin, November 20, 1950, page 818) on the United States position regarding the recent Soviet proposal for a Four-Power meeting on Germany; related documentation is scheduled for publication in volume IV. The statement observed that Germany was not a problem which could be isolated from the context of similar areas of tension elsewhere, but no specific mention was made of Korea. The Department of State had considered including in the November 8 statement a suggestion that the Four-Power talks be expanded to cover other areas of international tension such as Korea and Indochina, but Foreign Minister Bevin advised deletion of any mention of Korea and Indochina on the grounds (1) that it might give the Soviet Union the impression that these were the only problems besides Germany which the Western Powers wished to consider, and (2) that the Western Powers had thus far publicly refrained from accusing the Soviet Union of being behind the events in Korea and Indochina. TOP SECRET EMERGENCY TOKYO, November 9, 1950—3:19 p. m.¹ C 68572. Re your msg JCS 96060, DTG 081753Z.² I cannot agree with the interpretation of your paragraph 2 which by reference to JCS 92801 of 27 Sept would require a reexamination of the mission of the United Nations Command in Korea. On the contrary the present situation is fully covered by the amplification of that directive contained in your JCS 93709 of 10 Oct ³ reading as follows.

"Hereafter in the event of the open or covert employment anywhere in Korea of major Chinese Communist units, without prior announcement, you should continue the action as long as, in your judgment, action by forces now under your control offers a reasonable chance of success. In any case you will obtain authorization from Washington prior to taking any military action against objectives in Chinese territory."

In my opinion it would be fatal to weaken the fundamental and basic policy of the United Nations to destroy all resisting armed forces in Korea and bring that country into a united and free nation. I believe that with my air power, now unrestricted so far as Korea is concerned except as to hydroelectric installations, I can deny reinforcements coming across the Yalu in sufficient strength to prevent the destruction of those forces now arrayed against me in North Korea. I plan to launch my attack for this purpose on or about November 15 with the mission of driving to the border and securing all of North Korea. Any program short of this would completely destroy the morale of my forces and its psychological consequence would be inestimable. It would condemn us to an indefinite retention of our military forces along difficult defense lines in North Korea and would unquestionably arouse such resentment among the South Koreans that their forces would collapse or might even turn against us. It would therefore necessitate immediately a large increment of increase in foreign troops. That the Chinese Communists after having achieved the complete success of establishing themselves within North Korea would abide by any delimitations upon further expansion southward would represent wishful thinking at its very worst.

The widely reported British desire to appease the Chinese Communists by giving them a strip of Northern Korea finds its historic precedent in the action taken at Munich on 29 Sept 1938 by Great Britain, France and Italy wherein the Sudeten Lands, the strategically important Bohemian mountain bastion, were ceded to Germany without the participation of Czechoslovakia and indeed against the protest of that govt. Within 10 months following acquisition of that vital strategic bastion, Germany had seized the resulting impotent Czechoslovakia declaring it had ceased to exist as a sovereign state and that the Reich forces would thereafter preserve order. Of that settlement our own State Department has this to say in its public document "Postwar Foreign Policy Preparation [1939-1945]" a page 14:

"The crisis occasioned by the German occupation of Austria in March 1938 was followed by the Munich crisis in Sept, when the weakness of peaceful efforts toward just settlements in the face of determined aggression was unmistakably demonstrated."

This observation of the State Department points unmistakably to the lessons of history. I am unaware of a single exception which would cast doubt upon the validity of this concept. In the case of the United Nations such action would carry within itself the germs of its own ultimate destruction, for it would bare its own weakness requiring that it limit the imposition of its decisions and orders upon the weak, not the strong. It is tribute to aggression which encourages that very international lawlessness which it is the fundamental duty of the United Nations to curb.

To give up any portion of North Korea to the aggression of the Chinese Communists would be the greatest defeat of the free world in recent times. Indeed, to yield to so immoral a proposition would bankrupt our leadership and influence in Asia and render untenable our position both politically and militarily. We would follow clearly in the footsteps of the British who by the appearement of recognition lost the respect of all the rest of Asia without gaining that of the Chinese segment. It would not curb deterioration of the present situation into the possibility of a general war but would impose upon us the disadvantage of having inevitably to fight such a war if it occurs bereft of the support of countless Asiatics who now believe in us and are eager to fight with us. Such an abandonment of principle would entirely reverse the tremendous moral and psychological uplift throughout Asia and perhaps the entire free world which accompanied the United Nations decision of June 25 and leave in its place a revulsion against that organization bordering on complete disillusionment and distrust.

From a military standpoint I believe that the United States should press for a resolution in the United Nations condemning the Chinese Communists for their defiance of the United Nations orders by invading Korea and opening hostilities against the United Nations Forces, calling upon the Communists to withdraw forthwith to positions north of the international border on pain of military sanctions by the United Nations should they fail to do so.

I recommend with all the earnestness that I possess that there be no weakening at this crucial moment and that we press on to complete victory which I believe can be achieved if our determination and indomitable will do not desert us.

Minutes of the Thirty-sixth Meeting of the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET

New York, November 9, 1950—9:15 a.m.

1. ECOSOC resolution on Korean relief and reconstruction.

Mr. Lubin explained that one main issue in connection with the Korean relief program which had had to be solved by the Economic and Social Council was whether the Unification Commission or some other agency was to run the relief and rehabilitation program. Australia, with the aid of Chile and Pakistan (all three members of the Unification Commission) wanted the Commission to run the show. State Department preference was to operate the program under the direction of an Agent-General with broad powers, who should be guided only in certain political matters by the Unification Commission. After extensive private negotiations with the Australians, Mr. Acheson had conferred with the Australian Foreign Minister, Mr. Spender, and had told him that Congress would not give money to the program if it were to be directed by a commission of this character. Agreement was then reached upon the appointment of an Agent-General to administer the relief program.

Mr. Lubin briefly summarized the responsibilities of both the Agent-General and the Unification Commission, which would guide the Agent-General on three particular political issues. Mr. Lubin explained that, in addition, in order to ensure even further control over the Agent-General, provision was made for an Advisory Committee of five governments—probably to be composed of the five largest contributors—to assist the Agent-General. The resolution provided that the Economic and Social Council should have only the function of reviewing the reports of the Agent-General and the comments of the ¹The U.N. Economic and Social Council, in accordance with the request of the U.N. General Assembly contained in Resolution 376 (V), October 7, p. 904, had been considering the question of Korean relief and rehabilitation at its resumed 11th session from October 12 to November 7. On the latter date, it approved a comprehensive plan in Resolution 338 (XI), which was forwarded to the General Assembly. Concerning the legislative history of this resolution in ECOSOC, see Yearbook of the United Nations, 1950, pp. 270–276. Concerning U.N. General Assembly Resolution 410 (V), December 1, on this subject, see editorial note, p. 1297.

Unification Commission and should report to the General Assembly on the way the program was proceeding. (Some members of the Council had favored a greater delegation of authority to the Council.) The Council had also agreed upon a set of general principles, making clear that the operation was for relief and rehabilitation only and did not include economic development.

Mr. Lubin explained that the method of financing the program was still an unsolved issue. The Department believed that individual countries should be assessed for their individual shares. However, opposition to this proposal was very great. Australia, France, Pakistan, India and the United Kingdom were absolutely opposed, wishing to see Korean relief financed in the same way as technical assistance. This would mean that a conference would be called, the United States would make a statement as to the amount it would be willing to contribute, and other countries would follow with their statements.

Mr. Lubin noted that there was also pressure to reduce the estimated cost of the Korean relief operation. He observed that the Unified Command had estimated the cost at $350,000,000, but about $100,000,000 of that would be spent by January 1. For this reason, we had agreed on an estimate of $250,000,000 for 1951. The pressure to cut that estimate was great. The British and Australians insisted that this estimate would scare away contributors. However, the actual decision as to how much money would be raised had been left in the hands of the Assembly. The Council had not decided the question, even though there had been pressure for it to take this decision. Mr. Lubin believed the $250,000,000 estimate would be cut by the General Assembly to about $200,000,000. Other members hoped that the United States would give a major share of that amount. Our problem was to get individual countries to give more than token contributions. For example, France had indicated it could only promise a token amount, and Belgium had said it would give 20% of the French contribution.

Speaking as one who knew Congress very well, Ambassador Austin believed it would be of great importance if we could go to the Congress—especially since the last election—with a statement of what other countries were contributing, even though some contributions were only token amounts. This would encourage Congress to appropriate the money for the United States contribution. He wondered whether there should not be some effort to promote that idea before the United States was required to state what contribution it was prepared to make. Mr. Lubin said there had been some talk along that line. The British, in particular, were softening their position in this regard. He hoped that the British would make a fairly substantial contribution because this would have some bearing on the amounts other states would be willing to contribute. He felt it important that various governments should appreciate our Congressional situation. Perhaps our Embassies abroad could bring this matter to the attention of the appropriate governmental authorities, and thus indicate how important we considered the whole issue to be. This was the first time the United Nations had explicitly stated that a relief operation of this kind was its responsibility. For this reason, it was important to tie in the financing of the program with United Nations action in Korea.

Ambassador Austin repeated his question as to the possible strategy of having other countries first make their commitments for contributions. Mr. Lubin believed every country should give something. Ambassador Austin asked again whether it was intended that the United States should be the first to put its contribution on the dotted line. Mr. Lubin thought we should at least intimate first to other delegations how much we would ask Congress to appropriate. Otherwise he did not think other countries could be expected to do anything.

Mr. Hall ² explained that the original proposal of the United States for an assessments scheme would have gone furthest in meeting the comments of Ambassador Austin, since a fixed scale of contributions would have been established. This plan, he noted, had been supported only by the Canadians, although other members of the British Commonwealth now appeared to be coming closer toward its acceptance. He thought it possible that the idea of dealing with the financing of this program in the Assembly might have to be abandoned. However, if a special conference were called, members could still be assessed on the basis of a fixed scale. There was growing support for proceeding in that manner.

Mr. Lubin raised the question whether the United States should insist that the Agent-General should be an American. We had discussed this subject with all the members of the Economic and Social Council. There was a general feeling that if an American were not chosen, the Agent-General should preferably be an Asian. The good political effect of such a choice would be obvious. The only Asian candidate appeared to be Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar of India. However, no member had specifically objected to the choice of an American.

Mr. Hyde observed that the Republic of Korea had considerable interest in what happened in this regard. After all, it was the government with which the Unified Command and the Agent-General would have to deal. There was a strong feeling among representatives of the Republic of Korea that India was an unfriendly government. He believed the choice of an Indian as Agent-General would create prejudice and bad feelings at the start; this would be unfortunate for the success of the program.

Mr. Ross referred to the question of the nationality of the Agent-General. While he saw some political advantage in the choice of a non-American, he still considered such a choice less practical and did not believe that it would outweigh the advantages of an American Agent-General both with respect to getting appropriations from Congress and in obtaining contributions from other governments. Certainly the chances of larger financial contributions were greater with an American as Agent-General.

Ambassador Austin asked whether the Delegation was agreed that an American should be chosen as Agent-General, providing a suitable candidate could be found. Mr. Lubin added that the Indian Delegation had informed him that if more money could be gotten for the program by choice of an American as Agent-General, it would prefer an American. The only real Indian objection to an American was based upon the feeling that an American would be obliged to bolster the Rhee Government, which India did not trust.

Mr. Hickerson thought the views of Senators Lodge and Sparkman, and of Mr. Wilcox ³ would be useful on this point. Senator Sparkman said that he had been under the impression that there was real opposition to the appointment of an American, and that resentment over the program might be aroused by such a choice. However, if the situation were what Mr. Lubin described it to be, he thought the choice of an American highly desirable. There could be no question that better results would be obtained from the Congress with an American in this post.

Senator Lodge thought the Department might face an entirely different psychology in the new Congress, which could certainly be expected to raise fundamental questions with respect to the whole foreign relief program. He believed our activities abroad would be considered de novo. In this particular matter, it would be impossible to go about the organization of Korean relief in any worse way than to label it a United Nations program, with only the United States and perhaps two or three other countries contributing funds, and an Indian as Agent-General. Such a move would encounter the roughest treatment in Congress. He even wondered whether it might not be better to have this an exclusively United States operation or perhaps to insist that only those states which contributed would get any credit for the Korean relief operation, and only their names would be associated with the program.

³ Francis O. Wilcox, Chief of Staff, Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and Adviser to the U.S. Delegation to the U.N. General Assembly.

Mr. Wilcox thought that not only an American, but a Republican, would have the best chance in the new Congress. In this connection, he referred to the experience of Mr. Paul Hoffman with the 80th Congress and believed that Hoffman's political orientation was perhaps one important reason for the continued support of ECA. If an American administrator could not be chosen, Mr. Wilcox suggested the choice of either an Australian or a Canadian. Senator Lodge agreed that the particular individual chosen was of the greatest importance. It would be desirable to find a man like Hoffman.

On the other hand, Mrs. Roosevelt believed that, if an American were not chosen, the Agent-General should be an Asian, not only because of political advantages, but also because an Asian might be able to carry on a program with a smaller budget. In her opinion, the only disadvantage in choosing an American was the fact that there were perhaps too many United Nations operations in which an American held the top post. It was necessary to keep some balance and to decide in each case, where it was most important to place an American in the top job. Certainly all top places could not be occupied by Americans. On the contributions question, Mrs. Roosevelt thought it vitally important that every country make some contribution, and, moreover, that other countries make their contributions before the United States.

Mr. Lubin pointed out the difficulty of getting contributions from the smaller states. He did not believe these countries would come through, even with token contributions, unless some word were sent to their government through our missions abroad that this government attached major importance to their part in the Korean relief operation. Senator Cooper asked whether this suggestion had been taken up in the Department. Mr. Hickerson said that he would undertake to see that the Department instructed our missions abroad to apply pressure in this regard. He agreed with Mrs. Roosevelt in the importance of every state making contributions. After all, this was a case where the dollar shortage was not involved. In this connection, he referred to the materials shipped, medicines, and other miscellaneous articles contributed by various members of the United Nations to the Korean military operation. He was sure the Department would be glad to use every ounce of diplomatic pressure which the United States had in the proper channels.

Ambassador Austin also thought it important that a number of countries should join in the relief effort, even though they made only token contributions. He did not believe we should give up too easily in our discussions with them. Tremendous work and effort would be involved, and he could only advise Mr. Lubin to tackle the problem again. Because of the trend of discussion in the Delegation, Ambassador Austin wondered whether it would not be sounder policy for the Delegation to take no definite decision on these matters at this time. Mr. Lubin indicated that it would be important to have further consultations with other delegations on the matter of contributions. Mr. Dulles wondered whether the Delegation could not at least decide that it wished to have an American as administrator of the program. Ambassador Austin saw no objection to that decision.

Mr. Cohen thought it was perhaps relevant in that case to decide whether provision should be made for an advisory committee. He did wish to lay down a caveat on increasing the number of bodies involved in Korean relief since this would certainly create administrative problems. There was no further discussion.

353. Re Embtel 348 on Chinese intervention. Eighth Army reports there considerable decrease late yesterday and last night in number vehicles moving southward across Yalu from Manchuria. Movement on Sakchu-Chongju road was negligible; but movement on Kanggye-Huichon road was in excess of volume noted heretofore—numbering about 200 vehicles.

In Eighth Army sector UN ground forces have not made solid contact with Chinese forces past two days. It appears Chinese forces have withdrawn northward where they may be regrouping in conjunction North Korean remnants. UN forces probing northward yesterday on line from Pakchon to Kaechon found numerous Chinese dead—running into hundreds. Most of these Chinese evidently killed by aerial strafing. Vehicle columns moving south from Manchurian border were hard hit by UN aircraft moreover city of Sinuiju was virtually destroyed by heavy air assault yesterday on at least four occasions yesterday UN and hostile jet aircraft clashed near Sinuiju area with one hostile aircraft reportedly shot down and others damaged.

On basis information currently available, it difficult to determine Sino Communist intentions. It appears, however, Chinese intervention thus far cannot be regarded as of direct, open nature. Neither can it be regarded, on basis current intelligence, as all-out continuous effort on part Sino Reds. Unquestionably Chinese have suffered severe losses in men and materials past few days. Their failure to follow up early successes and their defensive attitude during past two or three days suggest any plans they may have had for all out intervention may have been modified. In any event next few days developments should determine conclusively what Chinese Reds real intentions are.

Washington, 9 November 1950.

Subject: Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea

- 1. In accordance with the request contained in your memorandum, dated 6 November 1950, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have formulated the following views on the military significance of Chinese Communist intervention in North Korea.
- 2. It has been suggested that the Chinese Communist forces intervening in North Korea might be composed of "volunteers." The objective of such an intervention, if this view were accepted, might be the interposing of sufficient Chinese Communist men and equipment in the paths of the advancing United Nations forces in order to delay them and to gain time for the defeated and disorganized remnants of the North Korean Army. The delay thus imposed on the United Nations forces might enable the North Koreans to make preparations for protracted guerrilla warfare in Korea and possibly to attempt to hold during the winter months the entire north central mountain region near the Yalu River. Intelligence reports indicate, however, that Chinese Communists are entering North Korea both as individuals and as well-organized, well-led and well-equipped Chinese Communist units, probably as large as divisions.

3. Chinese Communist intervention in Korea must have been motivated either by pressure of the USSR or by genuine Chinese reasons or by a combination of both. There is no conclusive evidence at hand upon which to draw sound inferences as to what governs. However, regardless of the motives involved, any one or combination of the following objectives is logical:

- a. To protect the Yalu River and the Changjin-Pusan reservoir power complex and possibly to establish a cordon sanitaire in North Korea;
 - b. To continue the active undeclared war in Korea; and
 - c. To drive the United Nations forces from Korea.
- 4. Protection of the Yalu River and the Changjin-Pusan reservoir power complex and possibly the establishment of a cordon sanitaire in North Korea:
- a. The Chinese Communists might fear that if the United Nations forces capture the Changjin-Pusan power complex they would either destroy or damage these facilities, or divert to Korea power now being received by the Chinese. It is understood that the electricity generated by these power systems furnishes light and power to Manchuria, including Mukden, Port Arthur, and Dairen and that the distribution systems are on the North Korean side of the Yalu River. If the Chinese Communists were prevented from obtaining electricity from these power systems it would be a severe economic blow to Manchuria;

b. If the Chinese Communists are attempting to protect the Yalu River and the power systems in North Korea, it would be to their advantage to establish the defenses at some distance from the river and the power systems, and to hold a buffer border zone in North Korea. In any event, to accomplish this objective it would be necessary to hold the central mountainous region of North Korea and thus flank the coastal approaches to the Manchurian border;

c. If the Chinese Communists have intervened in North Korea solely for this purpose, their withdrawal might be accomplished by an unmistakably clear announcement of a guarantee by the United Nations that:

(1) The United Nations forces would not infringe on the sovereignty of Manchuria:

(2) The dams, power plants, and electric distribution systems would not be damaged or interfered with; and

- (3) The present distribution of electricity from the power plants would not be changed except by mutual arrangements of the contracting parties.
- d. Such an announcement and guarantee, if made, would in any event clarify the situation, since if the Chinese Communists refused to accept the guarantee, this possible objective would be eliminated from further consideration.
 - 5. Maintenance of an active undeclared war in Korea:
- a. The Chinese Communists might place sufficient forces in Korea in order to continue the undeclared war in Korea and thus force the United Nations and particularly the United States to retain its armed forces now there merely to maintain the present positions;

b. Korea is at such a distance from the United States that it would be expensive for the United States in manpower, materials, and money to conduct an undeclared war in that area over a long period. Conversely, China is adjacent to Korea and it would be comparatively inexpensive for the Chinese Communists, with their practically unlimited manpower and with Soviet equipment, to carry on such a war indefinitely. The continued involvement of the United States forces in Korea would be in the interests of the USSR and of world communism by imposing a heavy drain on United States military and economic strengths;

c. It would also be in the interests of the USSR for the meager military forces in being of the United States to be committed in a strategically unimportant area. From the viewpoint of a global war, the United States would thus be off balance while the USSR perfects and completes its plans for global conquest and prepares to deliver a

d. The intervention in Korea would jeopardize the security of the United States if the undeclared war were to be permitted to sap our strength and leave us unprepared for Soviet attack elsewhere. The United States might, under such circumstances, win the skirmish in Korea but lose the war against the USSR if global war eventuates.

e. An undeclared war in Korea between Chinese Communist intervention forces and United Nations forces, if localized, would offer the possibility of settling the conflict by negotiation during the conduct of which South Korean military forces could be materially increased. Additionally, the time thus gained could be utilized for a further build-up of the industrial potential and the military strength of the United States.

6. Driving United Nations forces out of Korea:

The Chinese Communists might intend to commit enough forces to drive the United Nations forces out of Korea. However, it is doubtful if this could be accomplished without material assistance by Soviet naval and air power. In this event it would be evident that World War III was upon us and the United Nations forces should be withdrawn from Korea as expeditiously as possible.

- 7. As to military eventualities in other areas, the Chinese Communists can be expected to recognize the increased drain on the military resources of the nations of the Western world which will result from their intervention in Korea, and to assume that there would be a corresponding lessening of the military capabilities of those nations. Therefore, it is possible that if Chinese intervention in Korea is of limited nature it may well be accompanied by Communist aggression in other countries, such as by attempting the invasion of Formosa, by taking Hongkong and Macao, by intervening more actively in Indochina, by invading Burma, or by occupying Tibet.
- 8. Chinese Communist air units are operating in Korea from nearby bases in Manchuria; they are thus taking advantage of the present technical inviolability of Manchuria to use it as a sanctuary. Similarly, their army units are able to move from the Manchurian sanctuary to the fighting lines overnight. Such a situation may well become intolerable. Although to a certain extent dependent on the relative scale of effort maintained by the Chinese Communists, there appears strong likelihood that the tactical situation in Korea will demand that the United Nations commander "be authorized to take appropriate air and naval action outside Korea against Communist China," as provided in NSC 73/4 2 and NSC 81/1.3

9. Also depending on the relative scale of efforts on the part of the Chinese Communists, there are three courses of action open to the United Nations forces: (a) force the action to a successful conclusion in Korea; (b) continue the action on a defensive line short of the Korean border; or (c) withdraw. The first course may require some augmentation of military strength in Korea even if the Chinese Communist scale of effort is not materially increased. The second course is apparently feasible now and it might be a temporary expedient pending clarification of the military and political problems raised by Chinese intervention which are as yet unanswered. The third course, withdrawal, if conducted voluntarily would so lower the worldwide prestige of the United States that it would be totally unacceptable, and if conducted involuntarily could only be accepted as the prelude to global war.

10. The fact of military intervention by the Chinese Communists does not of itself provide conclusive indication that the USSR intends to launch a global war at this time. On the other hand, the United States should "recognize the increased strain on the fabric of world peace" arising from such intervention. The present situation brings to a sharp focus the statement appearing in NSC 73/4:

"Global war could come in one of three ways: (a) Soviet design; (b) by a progression of developments growing out of the present situation; or (c) by a miscalculation on the part of either the United States or the USSR."

Even though the United States makes every effort to localize the present conflict, a review of its probable eventualities leads to the conclusion that there now exists a greatly increased risk of global war.

11. In summary, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are of the opinion that the following implications of military significance with respect to the Chinese Communist intervention in North Korea may be drawn:

a. The Chinese Communists are presently in Korea in such strength and in a sufficiently organized manner as to indicate that unless withdrawn they can be defeated only by a determined military operation.

² Text and related documentation are scheduled for publication in volume 1.
³ Of September 9, p. 712.

b. The military objectives of the Chinese Communist intervention in Korea are not yet clear.

c. A sustained military campaign in Korea would serve as a heavy drain on our military potentialities.

d. From the military standpoint, the continued commitment of U.S. forces in Korea is at the expense of the more useful strategic deployment of those forces elsewhere.

- ê. It is not envisaged that the Chinese Communists and the North Koreans could drive presently committed United Nations forces from Korea unless materially assisted by Soviet naval and air power. In the event of the commitment of the latter, U.S. forces should be withdrawn from Korea as it would then be evident that World War III is imminent.
- f. Under present restrictions the Chinese Communists are permitted to use Manchuria as a hostile sanctuary for aircraft directed against the United Nations forces.

g. There appear to be three general courses of action open to United Nations forces:

(1) Force the action to a successful conclusion in Korea.

(2) Establish and maintain a defensive position on a line short of the Korean border.

(3) Withdrawal.

- h. The present conditions do not indicate conclusive evidence that global war is imminent but rather that the risk of global war is increased.
 - 12. Therefore, the Joint Chiefs of Staff conclude that:

a. Every effort should be expended as a matter of urgency to settle the problem of Chinese Communist intervention in Korea by political means, preferably through the United Nations, to include reassurances to the Chinese Communists with respect to our intent, direct negotiations through our Allies and the Interim Committee with the Chinese Communist Government, and by any other available means.

b. Pending further clarification as to the military objectives of the Chinese Communists and the extent of their intended commitments, the missions assigned to the Commander in Chief, United Nations Command should be kept under review, but should not be changed.

c. The United States should develop its plans and make its preparations on the basis that the risk of global war is increased.4

Memorandum by the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency
(Smith) to the National Security Council ¹

Washington, 9 November 1950.

In the present situation, the Central Intelligence Agency, with the concurrence of the Intelligence Advisory Committee, would restate previously agreed estimates (J.I.C. 531/10² and N.I.E. 2³) in the following terms:

1. To date there is insufficient evidence to indicate that the USSR intends to commit Soviet forces overtly in Korea. However, the commitment of Chinese Communist forces, with Soviet material aid, indicates that the USSR considers the Korean situation of sufficient importance to warrant the risk of general war.

2. The probability is that the Soviet Union considers that the U.S. will not launch a general war over Chinese Communist intervention in North Korea and the reaction thereto. The principal risk of general war is through the exercise of Soviet initiative which the Kremlin continues to hold. The probability is that the Soviet Government has not yet made a decision directly to launch a general war over the Korean-Chinese situation. There is a good chance that they will not in the immediate future take such a decision. At what point they will take a decision to launch a general war is not now determinable by Intelligence.

It is our opinion that action by U.N. forces to attack troop concentrations or air fields north of the Yalu River, or to pursue enemy aircraft into Chinese territory would not increase the already substantial risk that the situation may degenerate into a general war involving Russia. In other words, the Kremlin's basic decision for or against war would hardly be influenced by this local provocation in this area. However, such provocation would probably materially increase the extent of Chinese Communist reaction in Korea proper. (See par. 7, National Intelligence Estimate No. 2.)

Hong Kong, November 9, 1950—5 p. m. [Received November 9—6:53 p. m.]

1047. Wilkinson, Yager and Clough 1 have repeatedly heard expressed by non-Communist Chinese the belief that Chinese Communists actually fear US intends invade Manchuria and that this is important reason for their intervention in Korea. Lieberman, NY Times correspondent who is serious student of China and has many Chinese contacts, strongly urges new statement be issued by President in attempt convince Chinese Communists we have no such intention. He feels statement should not be in form ultimatum but dwell on longterm friendship between Chinese and American people and deplore their fighting each other. It should emphasize we do not intend invade China but make clear that we cannot tolerate despatch of Chinese soldiers to obstruct operation UN forces in Korea. It should state that if Chinese Communists really believe we intend invade Manchuria, this belief is based on most pernicious and deceptive intelligence. Only statement by President, Lieberman believes, would get sufficient play in Far East press and have enough impact on Chinese Communists to offer hope of success.

Consulate General not sanguine that such a statement would influence thinking of Chinese Communist leaders. However, situation holds such dangerous potentialities that no possibly hopeful measure should be neglected. At very least, statement would place American position clearly on record and be useful weapon for psychological warfare. Implication that Chinese Communists misled by deceptive Soviet intelligence would strike responsive chord among Chinese. Of course, statement would have to be so phrased and timed as to not interfere with any action being taken by UN.

It is suggested that the Swedish Government, because of its concern in the general problem of maintenance of world peace, might desire to instruct its Ambassador at Peking who is persona grata with the Chinese Communist regime to make an approach to the Peking Foreign Office for a discussion of the present situation arising out of Chinese Communist intervention in Korea.

The approach could have as its nominal motivation the desire to convey to the Chinese Communist authorities an outside point of view respecting developments in Korea and particularly to present the UN point of view. It has been noted that despite efforts by the UN generally and the U.S. in particular to indicate that UN operations in Korea constitute no threat to China, the content of current Chinese publicity respecting developments in that area would indicate that the Chinese Communist leaders view those UN actions as reflecting aggressive American intentions against China. The U.S. position in regard to Korea is identical with and a part of the UN position respecting Korea. It is in essence that the sole purpose of present UN operations (which include U.S. operations) in Korea is the reestablishment of order in that country, its unification on the basis of the principles of international justice and its economic rehabilitation. The tenor of UN thinking, and likewise U.S. thinking, is shown by the resolution currently being introduced in the Security Council by the Franco-Anglo-American delegations. That resolution proposes that the UN forces operating in Korea are acting on the basis of a policy of respect for the boundaries of China. The traditional American position has been and is one of respect for the territorial integrity of China, and the present policy of the U.S. Government is to support and maintain peace in the Pacific area as well as elsewhere throughout the world.

This Government would be grateful if the Swedish representative at Peking could point out to the Chinese Communist leaders the many evidences of UN and U.S. bona fides in respect to the developments in point and could discuss with those leaders the situation which has been created as a result of the appearance in Korea of Chinese Communist troops.

It is this Government's idea that such a démarche might have the beneficial result of bringing about some détente in the present strained political situation and would, at the least, possibly bring out some indication of the present course of Chinese Communist thinking respecting this serious matter.2

Subject: Action Respecting Korean-Manchurian Frontier

Because the whole Korean question is at the present time in the UN framework (note that the first substantive action on the question is scheduled for today) and presumably should remain there for exigent political reasons, it is believed that no military action should be carried over the frontier into Manchuria, whether "in hot pursuit" of enemy planes having their bases there or against AA installations which have fired upon our own planes in the Korean air, without UN sanction. Such action, even if proposed with UN sanction, had best be presented—again for political reasons—by an ultimatum directed to Peiping warning them of the consequences which would be visited upon such enemy planes or airfields or AA installations after a specified date in the event that such hostile action as has been experienced to date were to continue.

The above reasoning is based, I would note, on the following assumptions:

1. The destruction of bridges already accomplished in part is not in any event an adequate means of denying to the Chinese Communists the possibility of getting their troops across the Yalu, it remaining possible for them to use (a) pontoon bridges, (b) movement by boat at night, and (c) before long, traverse by ice.

2. The world political atmosphere is tense and the patent desire of

2. The world political atmosphere is tense and the patent desire of friendly governments is that the present situation shall not be aggravated insofar as it is humanly possible to avoid such aggravation.

3. In those circumstances where the destruction of bridges is relatively inefficacious (and our troops by report stand in no immediate danger) and unilateral action might lose us some of the support now solidly behind us, it appears preferable by far temporarily to exercise restraint, if need be by again directing our aircraft to remain several miles from the frontier pending further developments. Those developments will probably come soon in the form of (a) renewed Chinese-Korean military action in the field, (b) the appearance (or non-appearance) of the Chinese Communist delegation scheduled to arrive at Lake Success on November 15, and (c) debate and action in the UN.

It seems preferable, in sum, to forego a relatively minor additional military advantage in order to avoid being placed in a position where we may be charged by the Chinese-Russian side with aggression against the air and soil of China. It is my theory, you will appreciate, that it may be part of the Moscow design to cause us to commit such military infringement of the Manchurian frontier to give them political basis for a planned further attack.

The Secretary of Defense (Marshall) to the Secretary of State

Washington, 10 November 1950.

Dear Mr. Secretary: In response to requests, on 8 November 1950, from Department of State officials for Defense views on certain resolutions to be introduced into the Security Council regarding Chinese Communist intervention, there are attached, for your information, the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff of 9 November. A copy of these views, with which I concur, has already been informally made available to Assistant Secretary of State Rusk.

While it is the view of both Departments that some form of reassurances to the Chinese Communists is called for, I believe it should be made clear that a sanctuary for attacking Chinese aircraft is not explicitly or implicitly affirmed by any United Nations action.

Faithfully yours,

G. C. MARSHALL

Editorial Note

The 521st meeting of the United Nations Security Council was held on Friday, November 10, from 3 to 6:25 p. m.; for the record, see U.N. document S/PV.521. The following draft resolution (S/1894) was submitted jointly by the Representatives of Cuba, Ecuador, France, Norway, the United Kingdom, and the United States.

"The Security Council,

"Recalling its resolution of 25 June 1950, determining that the North Korean forces had committed a breach of the peace and calling upon all Members of the United Nations to refrain from giving assistance to the North Korean authorities,

"Recalling the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on 7 October 1950, which sets forth the policies of the United Nations in respect to Korea.

"Having noted from the special report of the United Nations Command in Korea dated 5 November 1950 that Chinese communist military units are deployed for action against the forces of the United Nations in Korea,

"Affirming that United Nations forces should not remain in any part of Korea otherwise than so far as necessary for achieving the objectives of stability throughout Korea and the establishment of a unified independent and democratic government in the sovereign State of Korea, as set forth in the resolution of the General Assembly dated 7 October 1950,

¹ See the memorandum dated November 9 from the JCS to Secretary Marshall on "Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea", p. 1117.

"Insistent that no action be taken which might lead to the spread of the Korean conflict to other areas and thereby further endanger international peace and security,

"Calls upon all States and authorities, and in particular those responsible for the action noted above, to refrain from assisting or encouraging the North Korean authorities, to prevent their nationals or individuals or units of their armed forces from giving assistance to North Korean forces and to cause the immediate withdrawal of any such nationals, individuals, or units which may presently be in Korea;

"Affirms that it is the policy of the United Nations to hold the Chinese frontier with Korea inviolate and fully to protect legitimate

Chinese and Korean interests in the frontier zone;

"Calls attention to the grave danger which continued intervention by Chinese forces in Korea would entail for the maintenance of such a policy;

"Requests the Interim Committee on Korea and the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea to consider urgently and to assist in the settlement of any problems relating to conditions on the Korean frontier in which States or authorities on the other side of the frontier have an interest, and suggests that the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea proceed to the area as soon as possible, and, pending its arrival, that it utilize the assistance of such States members of the Commission as now have representatives in the area for this purpose."

An effort by the Soviet representative to prevent inclusion of the Korean question on the agenda in the absence of representatives from the People's Republic of China was defeated by a vote of 10 to 1 (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics). The representatives of France, the United Kingdom, and the United States then spoke on behalf of the draft resolution.

1048. Many anti-Communist Chinese in close touch with political situation on mainland express view that although Korean intervention on large scale by Chinese Communists is underway there is still considerable element of bluffing Chinese Communist policy and that firm stand by UN will force them pull back. Among means suggested by these anti-Communist Chinese as effective in putting pressure on Peking are: (1) Far more stringent economic warfare to deprive Communists of urgently needed commodities which up to now have been slipping into China in fair volume through Tientsin; (2) heavy propaganda barrage directed at Chinese Communist troops in Korea to encourage defections, (3) strengthening of UN forces in Korea to point where serious setback can be administered overconfident Chinese troops imbued with concept American is "super tiger"; and (4) encouragement guerrilla activity in south and west China. Two further points relative to possibility forcing Chinese Communists back down have been mentioned. One is that they have avoided committing selves publicly to total war by referring Chinese Communists troops as "volunteers". Other is that Chinese Communists have in case of Formosa shown selves capable of halting military move when faced by superior force and turning off propaganda build up. ConGen reports above not as own view but as representative of current thinking of large segment political conscious Chinese.

In accordance Deptel 809, September 22,¹ ConGen has been closely following Chinese Communist press. Increasing scope and intensity of NCNA anti-American campaign past few days inclines us more and more to view that intervention will be on large scale. Chinese Communists are no longer talking of "long term war of attrition" but rather of "turning tide of war, annihilating and repulsing unconsolidated American invading troops and forcing aggressors accept just and peaceful solution of Korean question". (Editorial from Peking People's Daily November 6.) USALO continues receive reliable reports (USALO Hong Kong 266 November 6²) of heavy troop movements north indicating at very least that Chinese Communists aware of serious risk that war will spread as result their intervention.

CONFIDENTIAL US/S/1568

[New York,] November 11, 1950.

Subject: Korea.

Participants: H.E. Dr. Victor Andres Belaunde, Chairman of the Delegation of Peru

Ambassador Warren R. Austin United States
Mr. Edward P. Maffitt Delegation

Dr. Belaunde came in this morning at his request to put what he termed a personal idea to Ambassador Austin. At the outset he stressed that he had not communicated the idea to his Government and would do nothing about it if it was unacceptable to the United States Government. He did not wish to do anything which might weaken or embarrass the United States since his Government was heart-and-soul with the United States, et cetera, et cetera.

Briefly Belaunde's idea was the establishment of a buffer band, say ten miles deep, around Korea's northern borders with the USSR and Manchuria, this territory to be demilitarized, and administered by a special Security Council commission which would include among its members a representative of Red China and a United Nations power friendly to Red China such as perhaps India. He said he had conceived this idea (and had mentioned it last night to General Romulo) as a result of a growing fear which he felt among fellow delegates that the third world war was close.

Belaunde went on to say that the United States should not propose such a step but that he could take it up with the Latin American caucus meeting on Eritrea at 3:00 p. m. with a view to having Ecuador and Cuba pose it to the Security Council.

In passing Belaunde said it was a step forward that the Red Chinese were invited to present their case in the United Nations but that he wondered whether the delegation would come. Ambassador Austin said he had some doubt that they would come. Belaunde said he shared that doubt.

Commenting in strict confidence and on a purely personal basis, Ambassador Austin described American public opinion as being increasingly bitter against the Red Chinese and increasingly opposed to anything which might give them face or recognition. He said that even people who had previously favored the admission of the Peiping regime to the UN in the cause of peace had become disillusioned and were now against the idea. He was extremely doubtful that public opinion would assent to anything that might look like appeasement or concessions to Peiping and he felt that we probably will take the position that nothing can be offered until the Reds withdraw the spearpoint at present menacing the UN forces in Northern Korea. He recounted past American services and help to the Chinese people and pointed out the effect on American opinion of Peiping's ingratitude therefor.

Ambassador Austin said furthermore that anything which appeared to be appeasement or yielding would simply stimulate the enemy behind the Red Chinese to press its puppets onward to ever-expanding aggression. He felt, however, that if the USSR found resolute firmness facing it, it would, as it had in the past, not push an unprofitable venture. He felt that the USSR had blundered and had over-reached itself in extending its political sway over the tremendous Chinese land mass, and was uncertain what to do next. The Korean adventure had turned out badly for its North Korean puppet and the Tibetan invasion was having unfavorable repercussions for its Peiping puppet. The USSR itself was still not committed to war and could keep Korea from becoming the beginning of the third world war. In fact, Ambassador Austin said he would not be surprised if, faced with an unyielding UN attitude in Korea, the USSR turned up with some attempt to negotiate its way out of its difficulty.

Dr. Belaunde said it would serve equally well if the creation of a buffer band should be proposed by the USSR.

Ambassador Austin added another reason why he felt it might be unwise to proceed with Dr. Belaunde's idea at this time. He said that the Red regime in China is not Chinese but Russian, not republican but dictatorial, and not popular but un-Chinese. Anything the United Nations did to give "face" to the regime would offend the people of China and set them against us.

Dr. Belaunde thanked Ambassador Austin for his frank expression of views and said that he would forget his idea. Ambassador Austin said not to forget it because it was good in principle and might be useful sometime when and if it could be carried out without the great cost which he had outlined above.

Dr. Belaundo left after saying that he would not do anything at this time and would never do anything on the matter against the advice of Ambassador Austin.

2474. Pls approach Bevin urgently question UK financial support UN relief rehabilitation program in Korea. Matthews, UK Treasury Expert GA informed USDel GA that matter likely be given high level UK govt consideration Monday. Subject will arise in GA within next three or four days.

Total cost period covering calendar year 1951 and possibly extending into early 1952 approximately $200,000,000 to $250,000,000. US likely to offer 65 percent which is over half again as great as its percentage contribution to the regular UN budget. Any US contribution would of course be subject to Congressional approval.

Prompt and generous UK contribution to program for 1951 essential to set standard for other UN members and safeguard UN nature of Korean rehabilitation action. To this end Dept earnestly hopes that UK willing to contribute something in excess of its proportion of contribution to the regular UN budget which is 11.37 percent or about 23 million in term 200 million dollar Korean program. As UN Resol. permits contribution in currency, supplies, and services, major part of UK contribution could be made in form of supplies and services secured in UK with other supplies secured in sterling area.

Proposal of UK contribution something in excess percentage of regular contribution not unreasonable considering that UK contributed $610,000,000 or 16.95 percent of total UNRRA operating costs at time when UK economic position much less favorable.

If cannot persuade UK make contribution suggested above serious danger failure whole program as UN activity with consequent far reaching political ramifications. These ramifications would touch upon Congressional and popular attitude toward future economic assistance to foreign governments through all channels. Congress and people would find it difficult to understand failure of major free countries with which we have history of strong economic and defense financial assistance to support UN in a common program of Korean relief and rehabilitation.

Financial arrangements under which contributions will be made are now being discussed Committee 5. Contributions will be voluntary in sense will be conditioned on necessary parliamentary authorization and of appropriation funds all participating governments. With this reservation, US believes arrangements should establish as firm as possible commitment all participating governments to come through with contributions in agreed upon percentages. This very much in interest of governments like US and UK with record of meeting financial obligations to protect them from carrying unexpectedly large share program cost due failure other governments to carry through. Suggest you urge Bevin support US position in this respect as well.

Your negotiations should take account of fact may be complicated by UK realization that they will be expected to make substantial contribution toward Palestine Refugee Program requiring total of $50,000,000 in 1951 of which US may contribute between 50 to 60 percent, these figures not to be divulged at this point. If issue is raised you should emphasize that in US opinion success of both programs essential to effectiveness of UN both in political and economic field.¹

Minutes of the Thirty-eighth Meeting of the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET

New York, November 13, 1950—9:15 a. m.

1. Korean Relief and Rehabilitation (A/1493, A/C.2 & 3/L.32, Deptel 497) ¹

Mr. Lubin recalled that the original draft resolution adopted by the Economic and Social Council² on this subject gave the Unification Commission certain responsibilities. The Assembly's overall Korean resolution had simply stated that the Commission should assume such responsibilities in the field of rehabilitation as should be decided. In connection with this provision, the Economic and Social Council had recommended that the Commission should be empowered, first, to determine the Korean authorities with whom the Agent-General should have political relations; second, to determine the areas in which the Agent-General should operate; third, to determine when he should start operations; fourth, to recommend such policies on rehabilitation as would enable it to carry forward its own responsibilities in the political field. Chile had now submitted amendments to the Economic and Social Council resolution, which was before the Joint Second and Third Committee, which amendments were designed to broaden the powers of the Unification Commission. We opposed these amendments since their adoption might mean that the Commission could become the directing force in the relief operations.

Mr. Lubin called the Delegation's attention to Deptel 497 containing possible United States amendments to the resolution. The real question was how much pressure we should put on other delegations to maintain the original draft as adopted by the Council. The Chilean amendments represented an attempt on the part of the countries on the Unification Commission to get power over expenditure of the funds for the relief and rehabilitation program.

² See footnote 1 to the minutes of the U.S. Delegation meeting of November 9, p. 1110.

Mr. Dulles thought this matter was very important. However, it was also such a complicated affair that he doubted whether an off-hand Delegation judgment would be particularly helpful. Mr. Ross quite agreed that the situation was very complex. At the same time, the Economic and Social Council resolution had been discussed by the delegation before and had been approved in general. The present difficulty was created by the Chilean amendments and raised the question whether we should submit amendments of our own. He believed that it was better to stick to our guns on the Council resolution and to defeat the Chilean amendments rather than to put in counter amendments.

Senator Sparkman said his own thoughts were along the same lines as those expressed by Mr. Ross. We should move every stone possible to insist that the compromise accepted by the Council be adhered to in the Assembly. He did not believe we would get very far by offering counter amendments. Mr. Lubin thought the real question was whether we might not save time by submitting amendments. He personally felt we should fight for the original resolution as adopted by the Economic and Social Council. While the Department also preferred the original draft, these amendments had been suggested in order to formulate a compromise upon which the majority could agree. Senator Sparkman pointed out that the United States might find itself in a minority in insisting upon the original draft resolution. We would either have to have a "knock-down and drag-out fight" on this issue, or accept some sort of a compromise.

Mrs. Roosevelt thought nothing could be done except to leave it to Senator Sparkman as to the best thing which could be worked out in the circumstances. Senator Sparkman said that he had hoped that Senator Lodge would be present so that together they might confer with Romulo and Santa Cruz who were leading the move for amendments in this regard and point out to them the practical matters involved, including problems with the Congress. He planned to do this in any event but he had thought that Senator Lodge might lend a helpful Republican flavor to the conversation. There was no further discussion of this item.

SECRET NIACT London, November 13, 1950—1 p. m. [Received November 13—11:22 a. m.]

I said our estimate of total contributions required would probably run to between 200 and 250 million dollars; that my government was prepared to increase its percentage to about 65 percent; that we feel, in accordance UNRRA precedent, UK might be willing increase its percentage to about 17 percent, which could be in form of supplies and services from UK and sterling area; and that although we recognized most commitments must be ratified by a Parliamentary body we hoped in interests of US and UK all other nations prepared to offer contributions should make their commitments as firm as possible in order that we would not be left holding the sack. I stressed fact what we do in Korea will influence future relations with China and that US, more than other nations, being unjustly accused of being aggressors in Korea we were prepared contribute more than our share to prove we do not wish dominate Korea but help it to recover.

Bevin expressed view from SEA point of view we should move fast in resolving this problem. Were we able to do so it would have tremendous effect on Asiatic mind. He felt total relief figure might be made somewhat higher and that UN percentages could then continue to be used as guide in Korean relief and the same results obtained. He wanted avoid situation where only large nations carry burden and certain other nations contribute only resolutions. Gaitskell 2 thought best procedure would be to have special committee of UN deal with problems as in case of technical assistance fund. He said Younger well qualified represent British at Lake Success this matter. Bevin and Gaitskell both felt it highly important from point of view Soviet propaganda other UN countries contribute. They felt participation by Iron Curtain nations highly unlikely. Bevin particularly stressed desirability of getting substantial contribution from

He hoped proper handling Korean relief problem might result in establishment of precedent for future cases where UN relief might be required. He said before he could make definite commitment UK contribution he would want full report from Younger on basis of which he could go to Cabinet. He thought he might do a little preliminary spade work in certain foreign capitals where it would do the most good.

In leaving I reviewed what I understood to be British position, in which Bevin concurred, about as follows: UK views with sympathy US position but cannot commit itself today. It believes proper place for negotiations is in UN. Important as many other countries as possible contribute. Especially important India and other Asiatic nations participate. In absence anticipated failure Soviet bloc contribute, other nations should increase percentage contributions. Above all necessity for early action realized.

The British Embassy to the Department of State

Message From Mr. Bevin to Sir Oliver Franks
Dated 13th November, 1950

Before receipt of your telegram we had been giving some consideration to a proposal on the lines mentioned by you. My colleagues and I feel that in view of Chinese intervention in Korea we should endeavour to find a solution to the Korean problem which will not result in the hostilities dragging on in Korea with the ever growing risk of extension beyond Korea.

2. What we have in mind is a fresh approach to the problem which might be embodied in a resolution in the Security Council on the following general lines:—

The Resolution

(a) would recall previous resolutions and declare that with the destruction of the great bulk of the North Korean Armed Forces and the extinction of any threat from the North Korean Authorities the military campaign may in fact be regarded as at an end and that there need now be no delay in proceeding with the urgent task of political and economic rehabilitation;

(b) would propose the establishment of a demilitarised area from which all foreign forces and combatants would be withdrawn. This area would extend from a United Nations line (running roughly from Hungnam in the East to Chogju in the West) to the existing Manchurian-Siberian-Korean frontier:

(c) would declare that this demilitarised area is only to be set up for a temporary period pending the unification of the whole of Korea;

(d) would reaffirm the objectives of the United Nations already declared in relevant United Nations resolutions and reassure the Central People's Government of China that there is no intention to damage their interests.

- 3. The resolution would also have to provide for the assumption by an appropriate United Nations body of responsibilities in connexion with the demilitarised area and define those responsibilities. It would, in addition, provide for appropriate association of the Central People's Government of China with this United Nations machinery.
- 4. One problem of particular difficulty would be the disposal of the North Korean Government and the remnants of the North Korean Forces in the proposed demilitarised area. The best solution would be for the North Korean Armed Forces to lay down their arms and for a suitable de facto temporary administration of the area to be set up under the aegis of the United Nations, though admittedly this solution may be difficult to achieve.
- 5. From the political point of view the suggestions outlined above may afford us a means not only of terminating the whole Korean campaign earlier and thus liquidating a costly military commitment, but also of satisfying the Chinese that the United Nations have no aggressive intent against Manchuria. The most important difference between our proposals and the suggestion made in your telegram is that we omit any reference to territory lying north of the Yalu. To include any such reference would, in my view, defeat the whole object we have in mind as it would be inevitably rejected by the Chinese.
- 6. It can be argued that these proposals involve a unilateral concession on the part of the United Nations. This is however not the case. They will also mean that the Chinese themselves will have to withdraw their considerable forces already disposed in the proposed demilitarised area, thus giving up positions of considerable military advantage to them. I feel that this aspect of the problem, together with the grave risks inherent in the present situation of an extension of hostilities beyond Korea needs special emphasis. Indeed, the successful conclusion of the campaign on hitherto accepted lines seems no longer possible without serious risk of the conflict spreading.
- 7. From the military point of view there are considerable advantages in the proposals outlined above:—
- (1) The United Nations line from Hungnam to Chongju is some 150 miles in length as compared with the North Korean frontier line which is some 400 miles long.

(2) Whatever line is eventually held, the threat of frontier guerrilla activity will remain, but if United Nations Forces occupy up to the Korean frontier, advantage of air power cannot be taken without violating Chinese territory.

(3) It is doubtful whether, without striking at air targets in Manchuria, General MacArthur has sufficient forces to fight his way to the North Korean frontier and maintain himself there once he reaches it.

- 8. If the State Department are receptive to these suggestions, we shall work out a draft resolution on the basis of the first thoughts explained in paragraphs 2 to 4 above, and hope that the State Department will do so also so that the two drafts can be compared. Meanwhile, as you will have seen from my telegram to New York I have asked the United Kingdom Delegation to try to secure postponement of discussion of the resolution already tabled. If the United States Government like the proposal of a demilitarised area outlined above, it is important that there should be no further general advance by United Nations forces beyond their present positions.
- 9. Please consult Mr. Acheson and telegraph reply urgently. It is easy to see many objections to the course which we are proposing and no doubt detailed working out of the proposals may present difficulties. Moreover, it is possible that the Chinese would reject any such proposal. If they do so, their rejection can only mean that they are bent on making mischief.

Memorandum by the Acting Director of the Office of Foreign Military Affairs, Department of Defense (Murdaugh)

Washington, 13 November 1950.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD

Subject: Interview between Secretary of Defense Marshall and Ambassador Muccio.

Present: Secretary Marshall

Ambassador Muccio

Mr. U. A. Johnson, Department of State

Captain A. C. Murdaugh, USN

Ambassador Muccio thanked Secretary Marshall for the excellent cooperation received by him in Korea from all military personnel with whom he had dealings. Conversation then turned to the question of UN rehabilitation plans for Korea and Mr. Muccio noted the tendency to progress too fast and to attempt to raise the Koreans too quickly from a primitive and agrarian economy.

Mr. Muccio described the effective work of KMAG. Through previous training efforts there now exist in the Korean Army a large number of officers whose primary loyalty is to the Government and not to any individuals. This is the result of discarding the older Japanese-trained officers.

Secretary Marshall expressed satisfaction at learning of this and discussed briefly the problem of a country the size of Korea supporting a ten-division army as proposed in current studies on the subject. While an establishment of that size would be necessary for the immediate future after the cessation of hostilities, he considered it essential not to overburden the country with too large an army which would either collapse or become a threat to civil authority and to financial stability of the country. The problem therefore to be solved is to adjust downward from ten divisions to some plan which can endure for a long time involving perhaps a truly strong quickly-mobilized unit on a national reserve basis. Our own National Guard does not become available quickly enough and should not be a pattern.

[Washington,] November 13, 1950.

Subject: Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea

Participants: Mr. Erik Boheman—Swedish Ambassador Dean Rusk—Assistant Secretary of State

I asked the Swedish Ambassador, Mr. Boheman, to call at my office today.

I asked him if the Swedish Ambassador (Mr. Hammerstrom) is now in Peiping. He replied that he was. I asked if he seemed to have anything like normal relations with the Chinese Communist authorities; Mr. Boheman replied that his relations were normal, "within limits". I told the Ambassador that we had been wondering whether there might not be some advantage in asking Mr. Hammerstrom to sound out the Chinese Communists in order to determine just what their present intentions are and to discover whether there is in fact any basis for a peaceful settlement of any of their legitimate anxieties. I then outlined for him the principal ideas in the attached memorandum.

Mr. Boheman said that he would be glad to inquire of his government, but that he felt that Stockholm would be sympathetic to the idea.

I told Mr. Boheman that we had tried a discreet direct contact without result and that the Swedish Government might wish to explore the situation initially on its own account before leaving any indication that they were in touch with us. Otherwise, the effort might run into a simple rebuff. Mr. Boheman agreed to pass this suggestion along. I then gave him a copy of the attached memorandum.

[Annex]

It is of the utmost importance that every effort be made to ascertain the actual intentions of the Peiping authorities with respect to their present intervention in Korea.

The most serious possibility is that the present move is part and parcel of an overall Communist offensive, coordinated from Moscow, in which the Korean affair is only an incident of much larger plans. The facts that the Chinese Communists are moving more or less openly in Korea, are giving considerable assistance to Ho Chi Minh in Indo-China, have selected this particular time to move into Tibet at the risk of straining their relations with India, and are making menacing propaganda moves toward Nepal, suggest that the Korean matter is not merely a local action. The additional fact that Chinese forces (although of Korean ethnic origin) have been moving into Korea over the past year suggests a longer-range purpose than can be related to immediate incidents in Korea.

If, on the other hand, there is any possibility that Peiping is acting in the Korean matter out of any real fear that UN forces have any designs against China or out of fear that China's legitimate interests in frontier matters (including hydro-electric power) may not be adequately safeguarded by the UN, it is important to ascertain that fact and to arrange the necessary negotiations and machinery to deal with such matters peaceably.

So far as the United States is concerned, we have no hostile intentions toward the China mainland, we are acting in Korea wholly within the framework of United Nations policy, have no interest in any military position or bases in Korea for U.S. forces, and see no reason why China's legitimate interests are not wholly reconcilable with the United Nations policy in Korea.

On the other hand, the United States will not accept a pattern of Communist aggression in Asia and must insist that the Peiping authorities act peaceably to avoid a result which will only bring disaster to China and comfort only to the Soviet Union.

¹Mr. Acheson had previously shown the attached memorandum to President Truman and secured approval of it and the suggested plan of action involving the Swedish Ambassador in Peking (795.00/11-1350).

The Secretary of State to the United States Mission at the United Nations

Washington, November 13, 1950—5 p.m.

498. Eyes only for Austin. Purpose of this telegram is to set forth certain views regarding strategy and tactics of handling Korea case in UN as case proceeds. This in no sense qualifies splendid manner in which you have handled Korean case. All of us here are in complete and cordial support.

Unfortunately we do not have at this time reliable and accurate picture of ultimate Chi objectives beyond those set forth Deptel 478.¹ Further, the immediate military situation in Korea is unclear pending further action by UN forces to clarify the situation on their own front. Under these circumstances we must play our hand in UN with some care in order to achieve to extent possible objectives which we seek to obtain from UN consideration. These objectives are:

First. To localize Korean conflict to bring about withdrawal of Chi forces and prevent a world war or general engagement between Chi and UN forces with all consequences that might follow. This requires careful handling both politically and militarily. On political side it means that if Chi position is subject to satisfaction and negotiation (for example, fears concerning their frontiers or equitable allocation hydro-electric power) our handling of case should leave room for such negotiations. It may be, of course, that Peiping Moscow aggressive conspiracy has its roots so deeply in worldwide strategy that negotiation of local Korean issues is not possible.

Second. To obtain maximum support from international community for such action as may be required under various contingencies if character and extent Chi intervention change for worse. To mobilize this international support, it is essential that it be fully understood that our objectives are UN objectives, that we have no hidden purposes of our own, and that we are ready to take advantage of any opportunity to obtain UN settlement or to prevent general war with Chi Commies.

A Third objective is of course to bring about final settlement Korean question along lines Oct 7 resolution.

General MacArthur has pointed out that the initial mission of UN forces in Korea has been largely accomplished, i.e., to repel the aggression of NK forces against the ROK. Chi aggressive intervention appears as a new factor. From a propaganda point of view it would be comparatively simple to brand Chi Commies with aggression through the SC-GA procedure and thereby be free to take action against Commie Chi. Our overall national interest does not permit us to move readily down this path. We must be careful that our political posture not run substantially ahead of the situation on the ground in such a way as to commit us to heavy involvements in Asia which we should try to avoid. Just as we pretended that Moscow was not committing aggression in NK so it may be necessary for us not to overplay the new factor of Chi intervention in NK until our combined political-military interests require that action.

Whether we should push six-power resolution through to a vote at maximum speed or let Council proceedings move forward more slowly depends to some extent upon the development of planned military operations in Korea. Also affecting tempo of SC consideration is question whether overwhelming majority SC will be dissipated by differences on bringing six-power resolution to vote before Chi Commies reach New York. If latter are obviously stalling, this question probably does not arise.

Similarly, we should not now make firm public commitments that Korean case will be brought immediately to GA following anticipated Soviet veto. Although present prospect is that we shall want GA consideration, we should not at this stage consider that as inevitable consequence of Soviet veto in SC. If Chi Commies position is "negotiable", we may find some move on their part or by other governments to find some negotiating procedure which is more flexible and which moderates prestige and face considerations more than full GA debate. For example, some conciliation procedure analogous to efforts of six "neutrals" in Berlin case in 1948.²

Above considerations arise from facts that risk of general war has been substantially increased in recent weeks and that our political and military decisions must be related to fundamental and overriding considerations of a worldwide sort and not merely to the precise issues of this specific case. Maximum firmness and energetic action are required but the main effort must be directed toward the principal challenge and not to diversive secondary threats.

UN forces in Korea itself. See excerpt from Austin's statement to UNSC on Nov 10.1

This problem arises in two respects. First, ground forces can move into Korea and supply themselves from bases and lines of communications which are largely sheltered by immunity of Manchuria. Secondly, enemy aircraft (nationality not always known) operate from Manchurian fields, dash into Korea air space to strike UN air and ground forces and then fly to safety behind Manchurian border a very few minutes away.

UN Commander has strictest orders about violations Manchurian territory in addition to orders to use extreme care in operations near the frontier itself to insure that hostilities are restricted to Korea. This determination to play according to the rules imposes most serious handicap in face of an enemy which is willing not only to break the rules themselves but to exploit proper conduct UN forces.

US Govt is determined to do everything possible to localize conflict in Korea. This is illustrated by rigorous instructions to Commanders as well as by efforts made to adjust accidental intrusions into Chi territory by offering compensation for damages, etc. It is obvious, however, that the abuse of Manchuria by the enemy could easily impose an intolerable burden upon UN forces operating lawfully and properly on UN missions in Korea. Therefore, US Govt wishes to inform Govt to which you are accredited that it may become necessary at an early date to permit UN aircraft to defend themselves in the air space over the Yalu River to the extent of permitting hot pursuit of attacking enemy aircraft up to two or three minutes flying time into Manchurian air space. It is contemplated that UN aircraft wld limit themselves to repelling enemy aircraft engaged in offensive missions into Korea. We believe this wld be a minimum reaction to extreme provocation, wld not itself affect adversely the attitude of the enemy toward Korean operations, wld serve as a warning, and wld add greatly to morale of UN pilots who are now prevented from taking minimum defense measures and for whom in case of bomber pilots it is impossible under existing conditions to provide adequate air cover.

FYI we are not asking the concurrence of Govt because we believe the highly limited application of hot pursuit doctrine in this situation wld turn upon milit necessity and elementary principles of selfdefense, but we think it important that Govt be notified of the problem. Pls telegraph any reactions niact.²

Tokyo, November 14, 1950.

Subject: General MacArthur's Concept of the Korean Campaign.

Participants: General MacArthur Ambassador Sebald

In response to my question regarding his concept of the Korean operation, General MacArthur said that his immediate objective is to destroy the bridges across the Yalu River in order to isolate the area between the present line of the UN Forces and the border. He said that he had given orders to his forces, and particularly to the Air Forces, that the border must be scrupulously observed, an order which is the object of considerable resentment on the part of many Air Force officers who complain that Communist planes use Manchuria as a sanctuary from which they operate and to which they retreat when convenient. Furthermore, the Manchurian side of the border contains many anti-aircraft batteries which are employed against UN aircraft. As part of the air campaign, the General said that orders have been given to destroy as much as possible of the built-up areas between the present UN front lines and the Yalu River, thus obviating any possibility of the Communist Forces living off the country.

With regard to Communist China, General MacArthur said that he was glad to learn of the proposed resolution calling upon Communist China to withdraw its forces from North Korea. He said that beyond this it would appear that little can be done by the UN under present circumstances, and that it looks as though the UN has now reached an impasse in so far as Communist China is concerned. He hoped that in view of Communist China's refusal to attend the discussions in the UN ("a slap at Soviet Russia by the Chinese"), the UN would refuse to receive Communist Chinese representatives to discuss Formosa. General MacArthur said that it would be a mistake, in his opinion, to allow the Chinese Communists to dictate as to what they would or would not discuss in the United Nations.

Concomitant with the destruction of the bridges, as previously mentioned, General MacArthur said that every effort is now being made to build up the supplies for the UN Forces preparatory to an all-out offensive designed to drive the Communist Forces across the Yalu ¹This document was forwarded by Mr. Sebald to Assistant Secretary of State Rusk under cover of a letter dated November 15, not printed, which was received in the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs on November 24. A manuscript notation on the source text indicated that the memorandum was seen by Mr. Acheson.

River.² The UN Forces would, of course, stop at the boundary. If this can be accomplished during the next several weeks and before the river freezes, General MacArthur feels that the Korean campaign would be at an end. Should the planned operation fail and the Communist Forces continue to stream into North Korea from Manchuria, however, he saw no alternative, from a military point of view, to bombing key points in Manchuria. He said that if this should become necessary "the fat would be in the fire", because such operations would, in his opinion, bring about a counter-move by Soviet Russia. Such counter-move, he felt, could only lead to a spreading of the war and he therefore hoped that it would not be necessary to resort to such drastic action.

General MacArthur expressed the opinion that the entry of Communist China into the Korean war was largely motivated by the Chinese themselves, and that such entry is merely one more manifestation of what he termed "Chinese imperialistic aspirations". He said that he is convinced that Communist China undertook the North Korean operation, the Tibetan invasion, and assistance to Ho Chi Minh on its own responsibility, and that Soviet Russia, despite its satisfaction derived from action parallel to its own objectives, has remained in the background. General MacArthur said that there is no evidence available that Soviet Russia is taking a direct part in the Korean war. While, admittedly, the materiel being used by the North Koreans and Chinese Communists is of Soviet origin, the General believed that the North Koreans and Chinese Communists have paid for such material either in cash or in kind.

General MacArthur felt that if his military operations, as envisaged above, are successful, the Korean campaign will be at an end. He expressed the opinion that the Chinese Communists would then feel that they had demonstrated their desire to be of assistance to the North Koreans, and had also proven to the world their ability to engage in a first-class war. He explained the late date of the Chinese assistance by saying that the Chinese Communists had not thought it necessary previously to enter into the war, as they had believed that the North Koreans would drive the UN Forces into the sea. It was only after the Inchon landings that it became apparent that something must be done. In consequence, considerable time was lost in the complete reorientation of the center of gravity of Chinese military force, requiring the shifting of Chinese armies and supplies from Central and South China to the northeast.

716. ReEmbdesp 440 August 31 and Depcirtel 148 November 11.2 Netherlands FonOff has made available substance two telegrams dated November 11 and 12 from Chargé Peking. These present analysis of Chargé re Chinese Communist intervention in Korea and may be summarized as follows:

November 11 cable:

CPG intervention primarily influenced by fear US aggression, particularly US aims re Manchuria which CPG seems compare with pre-war Jap policy. This attitude discussed at some length new Chinese news agency. Chargé comments that, in principle, he believes this CPG fear real. On other hand, because this exaggerated by CPG, he expresses reservation that alleged fear being used as pretext for anti-US propaganda purposes.

He believes long term CPG aim Korea establishment really independent Korean state which would not be threat China. Primary CPG prerequisite could be demand that it be allowed discuss this view on status Korea in SC. (FonOff comments that what CPG really after is full UN membership.)

Short-term aim protection Chinese frontiers. Chargé believes they would be satisfied with 50 mile border zone free UN troops. Says argument for justness latter claim (1) fact that CPG did not intervene immediately upon UN crossing 38th parallel, (2) actual resistance began only when UN forces approached Yalu river, (3) Chinese troops suspended their resistance after repulsing UN troops some distance from Manchurian border. On other hand, Chargé observes opposing argument fact that Chinese planes have been operating behind UN lines from Manchurian bases. Nevertheless, believes CPG wishes avoid hostilities with UN troops, providing latter remain outside 50 mile zone. Actually that zone has now been created as result CPG intervention, yet intervention force composed alleged "volunteers" enabling CPG disclaim all responsibility. Chargé acknowledges "possibility remains that intervention may be part prearranged Sino-Soviet strategy" (FonOff comments that it believes latter "too complicated" to be likely).

November 12 cable:

Chargé comments SC invitation to CPG and most recent Peking propaganda trends give him another impression about three arguments (set forth above), that CPG strategy may possibly be intended as trap for UN air force and planes with aim being extending conflict into Manchuria. By this, fiction of US intervention and aggression could be upheld. Furthermore CPG would be able rally full support Chinese people which interestingly enough Chargé describes as "still doubtful now." (Latter at variance with Netherlands FonOff thinking, because it has always contended Mao regime enjoyed popular support.)

Furthermore, extension of US action into Manchuria would give CPG opportunity appeal all other "people's democracies" that China now victim of aggression. (FonOff comments that such appeal would be useless because no "people's democracies" would come to aid CPG unless Soviet Union so instructed.)

Chargé gives little credence British MA report that there are halfmillion Chinese Communist troops massed along Manchurian border and 160,000 actually in North Korea.

Report concluded with Chargé urging greatest caution particularly that no UN forces should enter Manchuria thereby giving Mao strong rallying point.

1023. Embtel 1013 November 13.1 Devotion of entire back page of Pravda November 13 to blatant announcements and attempted justification of Chinese intervention in Korea followed by one column quoting three leading Chinese newspapers on same subject today, gives domestic readers and western world clear indication extent Chinese "volunteer" effort. It is possible that this theme will be featured by Communist propaganda (secondary of course to WCPP) during period pending participation Chinese Communist representative in UNSC meeting on Taiwan aggression and that this represents Soviet propaganda build-up for initial Chinese Communist appearance at UN. Although whole Communist propaganda structure is based on twin false assumptions that, first, US started Korean war and is aggressor, and second, that US real aim is to invade Manchuria, effectiveness of "big lie" in Communist controlled areas well known and objectives this campaign deserve study. Obvious that while first assumption above has been trumpeted by Communist world since outbreak Korean war, second is relatively recent, receiving attention with publication here November 5 of "Joint declaration Chinese democratic parties".2

¹ Not printed. ² See footnote 2 to telegram 1124 from New Delhi, received at 11:13 p. m. on November 7, p. 1094.

As to implications this publicity re question of whether Chinese in fact intend to engage maximum resources in NK this time, while Soviet attitude may seem ominous, we are still inclined feel that CPG is not in fact inviting war with US and UN and in support this view offer following comments:

1. Chinese Communist Government has not yet made any formal statement, to our knowledge, committing itself to defense of Korea. Emphasis thus far has been on service of "volunteers". While the nature of this type intervention misleads no one, in realm international relations it retains significance and CPG has not chosen to go beyond this. It provides CPG with way out if UN is not intimidated by implied threat of large scale Chinese intervention and resolutely proceeds with mission in Korea. Despite ominous undercurrent in both "joint declaration" and November 11 statement by MFA representative,3 CPG still retains degree freedom of action.

2. Strikes Embassy that both documents targeted as much for domestic consumption as for impact abroad. We do not believe Chinese people want foreign war or can regard without apprehension at this time prospect of war with US; certainly CPG must take strong steps if it is determined to sell idea. Degrees of opposition, antipathy and support can best be determined by reaction to statements such as those already issued. But caution of CPG reflected by fact that November 11 statement made by unidentified official, not Chou En Lai himself. And although "joint declaration" signed by all parties, no names of party leaders appeared (at least in Soviet press). In society where names of individuals carry much weight, thus far we know of no top rank CPG official who has publicly carried ball.

3. Publicity describing Chinese "volunteer" participation Korean war probably aimed at least in part at WCPP to furnish justification for intervention and possibly to establish model of approved method "fighting for peace".

4. Without minimizing present and potential danger of Chinese full scale intervention, we note that Soviets, who also share border with Korea, have given no publicity to participation Soviet "volunteers" in Korean war. This points to probability that Soviets are using Chinese for catspaws insofar as practicable but that Soviets still unwilling touch off World War III prematurely. If CPG continues be careful not to commit itself, it appears likely magnitude Chinese intervention will depend upon degree force exerted by UN and ROK and that CPG will not pour huge numbers troops into Korea indefinitely.

³ The text of this statement is printed in U.N. document S/1902. It acknowledged the presence of Chinese volunteers in Korea and indicated that the Government of the People's Republic of China saw no need to hinder such efforts to aid the North Koreans. The statement pointed to French voluntary efforts to aid the American colonists during the American Revolution and, more recently, to American and British volunteers who fought on behalf of the Republican cause in the Spanish Civil War. It went on to call for withdrawal of all foreign troops from Korea as a step toward a peaceful settlement there and condemned the United States for launching a war of aggression. Finally, it supplied a lengthy list of U.S. Air Force overflights and attacks in the area of Northeast China between August 27 and November 10, 1950.

5. Appears possible that present Chinese threat represents final Soviet effort salvage something from its gross miscalculation in ordering NK aggression on ROK. Seems doubtful that CPG, which did not come forward to assist NK when UN forces occupied only corner of South Korea, or when Inchon landing made and appearance strong Chinese forces might have halted UN advance at 38th parallel, would now decide on basis sober military estimate to enter fray all out. Despite their truculence and bombast, it appears to us here that Chinese Communists have scarcely proceeded far enough with their economic and social reform and development programs in China and with consolidations of their nationwide strength and popularity as a party, to plunge their country into a war against the most formidable array of opponents in the world today. If CCP has learned anything from Soviets, its leadership must be aware that risking its existence without better than fair chance of success is contrary to interests and normal strategy world Communist movement.

6. This raises question of how far Soviets want CPG to go at this time. In absence indications requiring revision Embassy estimate of Soviet intentions, we are reluctant assume Soviet yet prepared precipitate World War III. If this conclusion still sound, we feel that amount and number unofficial and semi-covert assistance to NK by Chinese "volunteers" (actually highly trained, well equipped and supplied regular troops), will probably depend on: first, their chances of preserving extensive area in NK for operations; second, on degree UN determination eliminate this intervention. Parenthetically, Embassy recalls relative success of ROK forces in reducing NK guerrilla activity below 38th parallel prior to June 25 and believes that major burden of driving Chinese forces from hinterland below Chinese frontier should be assumed by ROK army, which should be expanded as rapidly as practicable to cope with this task.

7. It is clear that continued use of Chinese territory for military operations (including AA fire on UN planes over Korean territory, air bases, and for movement military supplies) directed versus UN forces, presents UN with provocative and trying problem. From legal standpoint, we assume CPG will claim that no violation Korean sovereignty involved, as CPG recognizes NK and crosses frontier at latter's invitation (analogous to Allied position in Greece).

sanctuary for forces attacking UN forces in Korea. After reading note verbale, Heeney said this serious military development had been foreseen by Canadian Government which recognized its inevitability and gravity. For this and other reasons Canada had been anxious to give Chinese Communist regime firmest assurances no UN or US ambitions respect to China. Such assurances to be offered by some third power, possibly India, to which Chinese would give credence.

Henney stated Canadian Government would recognize justification of hot pursuit enemy aircraft across Manchurian border and would find this limitation placed upon UN forces admirable restraint, although he did not discount altogether future possibility of further military action beyond border. Heeney wished same restraint could be shown in all our dealings with China at this critical moment, obviously reference to presentation our case UN.

Re instructions to certain Embassies (TS reference telegram Deptel 2487 to London, received USUN 5:15 p. m., November 14), Canadian and Australian delegations upon instructions their Governments approached USUN today for clarification. Riddell (Canada) said note left by Woodward not clear in two respects:

(a) Whether action indicated had already been taken or was

(b) If latter were case, was it contemplated action might be taken without further SC action. Woodward being unable to answer these questions, Riddell instructed to get answers from us.

Later in afternoon Sir Keith Officer (Australia) called on Gross requesting comments on message, particularly in light of prior discussions (mytel 806, November 10). Sir Keith said he could understand tactical military requirements but was concerned lest action foreshadowed in reference telegram might lead to bombing Manchurian targets. Sir Keith expressed hope "provocative actions" could be avoided at least until Chinese Communist delegation arrived NY and we have further opportunity to ascertain their viewpoint.

Not printed. It reported on a conversation between Mr. Gross and Sir Keith Officer wherein the latter expressed the extreme worry felt by members of the Australian Delegation over the question of hot pursuit. (795.00/11-1050)

In light of telephone conversation between Gross and Hickerson, Riddell and Sir Keith were told that matter was being handled elsewhere, that Canadian Ambassador in Washington had been fully briefed by Department, and that American Embassy, Canberra was presumably fully briefing Australian Foreign Office.

Subsequent to foregoing calls, Gross phoned Hickerson requesting authority for USUN to inform Jebb, Chauvel and Sunde and such authority was given.

We think it pertinent to raise question whether broader consultations here might be useful. As Department is aware, many delegations here are genuinely concerned lest military actions be taken unilaterally which may precipitate or provoke expansion of hostilities. Our experience has shown that many of these delegations are more easily led than driven and that (always subject to prudent requirements military security) it will better assure mobilization of UN sentiment behind any military action thought necessary by Unified Command if there is opportunity, within limits of security and of military urgency, to have at least selective consultations. This, we are confident, will better assure accomplishment of tactical considerations outlined in TS Deptel No. 498, November 13.

Some specific questions certain to arise here are:

(1) Will consultations be held prior to military action in or over

Manchuria other than type described reference telegram?

(2) Does US as co-sponsor of draft resolution tabled November 10 in SC, intend to request amendment of paragraph related to "inviolate" Sino-Korean frontier or does US interpret this paragraph and paragraph which immediately follows it as authorizing action beyond aerial hot pursuit?

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] November 15, 1950.

Subject: Relationship of Attendance of Chinese Communist Delegation at UN re Charge of American Aggression Against Formosa to Matter of Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea

Reference: USUN Telegrams Nos. 808 and 809, November 11.1

It is noted that Chou En-lai's two telegrams of November 11 and November 12, respectively, announce the intent that representatives of the Peiping regime will attend the meetings of the UNSC for discussion of the Chinese Communist complaint alleging armed aggression against Formosa, and, while refusing the invitation to attend the meetings of the UNSC to discuss Chinese intervention in Korea, propose that "it would be most proper that the SC combine the discussion of the accusation raised by the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China against armed aggression on Taiwan by the U.S. Government and discussion of the question of armed intervention in Korea by the U.S. Government" thus to enable the Chinese Communist delegation to raise an accusation "against armed intervention in Korea by the U.S. Government".

It is the CA position that the Chinese Communists should by no manner of means be permitted thus to confuse the issue. Their case as regards the charge of American armed aggression against Formosa is most weak and must inevitably fall of its own weight. It is the Moscow line that the hostilities in Korea are the result of aggression mounted by the Republic of Korea against the Communist regime in North Korea in accordance with a Machiavellian American plan. No consideration of the case based on law or logic, even though in the halls of the UN, would alter that point of view. The Chinese Communists, if they testify in the UNSC at all with respect to Korea, should be caused to do so only in connection with UNSC consideration of Chinese Communist intervention. No charge of "American aggression" should be permitted to reach the UNSC with respect to Korea where all of the present trouble has so clearly resulted from actions of the Communist side itself.

On November 15, Secretary of State Acheson spoke at the Department of State before a National Conference on Foreign Policy; for the text of his statement, see Department of State Bulletin, November 27, 1950, page 853. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Acheson attempted to allay any misunderstanding or anxiety existing in the minds of the Chinese Communist leadership that the United States had any ulterior designs concerning Manchuria or the territories and installations along either side of the Yalu River.

Assistant Secretary Rusk spoke before the same audience on the same day along the same lines (text ibid., December 4, 1950, page 889). He emphasized that Chinese interests could easily be accommodated unless the Chinese were plotting the eventual seizure of all Korea, for which the United Nations could not stand.

As a result Canadian position stiffened considerably as compared Heeney's reaction yesterday. Ambassador called this mornning to hear statement changed Canadian reaction.

Following is text External Affairs draft paper in this regard.

"(1) We agree with the US Government that everything possible should be done to localize the conflict in Korea. We also agree that the abuse of Manchurian territory by the enemy could impose an intolerable burden upon the UN forces operating lawfully and properly on UN missions in Korea.

"(2) The immediate question is whether the burden has not become, or is likely shortly to become, so intolerable as to make it necessary for UN aircraft to pursue attacking enemy aircraft up to two or three minutes flying time into Manchurian air space. The answer to this question involves, of course, the careful balancing of purely military considerations against the political consideration that combat operations in Manchurian air space will increase the risk of the extension of hostilities.

"(3) In order to lessen the risk that the step which the US Govment has proposed would lead to an extension of hostilities and in order to give the Chinese Communists an opportunity to discontinue the present abuse of Manchurian air space by hostile aircraft, we consider it important that, before the UN Commander-in-Chief is instructed to permit pursuit, the Chinese Communist Government should be given a specific public warning, preferably by a representative of the Unified Command in the Security Council, that, if hostile aircraft continue to use Manchurian air space, United Nations aircraft will naturally have to defend themselves in the air space over the Yalu River to the extent of pursuing attacking enemy aircraft.

"(4) Such a warning might also help us to determine the real intentions of the Chinese Communists. If they take measures to stop the use of their air space by hostile aircraft, this will to some extent indicate a desire to limit the conflict on their Korean border.

"(5) It would therefore seem to us to be wise to delay a decision whether or not UN aircraft should be authorized to pursue hostile aircraft into Manchurian air space until reasonable time has been given for the Chinese Communist Government to show whether or not they intend to heed this warning.

¹ Same as telegram 2487, November 13, 7 p. m., to London, p. 1144.

"(6) In spite of the case which could be made under international law that the UN Commander-in-Chief has the right to authorize UN aircraft to pursue attacking aircraft into Manchurian airspace, the Canadian Government considers it most important that no military operations take place outside Korean borders without specific authority from the UN."

Heeney also said that according NY Times November 7 Gross has stated UN forces would not take action outside Korea without specific authorization UN 2 and he wondered how this reconciled with present position.

Answer. Well, the instructions of General MacArthur, as has been reported to the Council, are very explicit and do prohibit bombing of territory outside Korea. Truman, 1950, page 711. Mr. Truman endorsed the six-power draft resolution before the United Nations Security Council and asserted that the United Nations had no intention of carrying hostilities across the North Korean-Chinese frontier. He went on to say that the United States "never at any time entertained any intention to carry hostilities into China. So far as the United States is concerned," he continued, "I wish to state unequivocally that because of our deep devotion to the cause of world peace and our long-standing friendship for the people of China we will take every honorable step to prevent any extension of the hostilities in the Far East. If the Chinese Communist authorities or people believe otherwise, it can only be because they are being deceived by those whose advantage it is to prolong and extend hostilities in the Far East against the interests of all Far Eastern people."

planes across the enemy frontier. He stated that he had no instructions but desired to obtain information as to whether our approach to the French Government was a request for "consultation" or merely "informing" it as indicated by Ambassador Bruce at Paris. I told him that we fully recognized the great interest of particularly those governments which were participating in the military action in Korea in decisions such as this and we had, therefore, immediately informed them of the possibility that a decision might have to be taken giving them an opportunity to express their views if they desired to do so. I said that in reaching our final decision, full weight would be given to any views which they may have expressed. Mr. Millet stated that he had no instructions to transmit any official views to us, but that from the telegrams which had been exchanged between the Foreign Office and Chauvel at New York, it was evident that both Chauvel and the Foreign Office were very concerned over the matter, and particularly over our apparent intent to make the decision without consultation with the UN. He stated that he expected Mr. Chauvel probably would have instructions on the matter by tomorrow.

I informally and personally discussed with Mr. Millet the various possibilities and probable results of various types of formal or informal consultations or action within the UN which might be undertaken to meet the apparent French views. He was unable to suggest any procedure which even he felt would be practicable from the standpoint of meeting the problem. I avoided making any commitment as to our course of action if the views of the French and other governments were unfavorable which was the evident primary purpose of his call.

In reply to his query concerning the newspaper reports of Mr. Rusk's reference in his speech yesterday to a "buffer zone", I said that we would be interested in obtaining the details and developing the thoughts any government might have on this subject, but felt that it would be only equitable and just that such a zone be established on both sides of the Sino-Korean frontier.

² See the editorial note, p. 1158. In his speech, Mr. Rusk made the following statement:

[&]quot;There has been some talk about a buffer zone. That perhaps they [—the Chinese Communists—] are trying to create in North Korea a buffer zone between themselves and United Nations forces. That is a matter which has come up for some discussion publicly around Lake Success and is a matter about which, undoubtedly, there will be more discussion in the future."

about which, undoubtedly, there will be more discussion in the future."

DEAR Mr. Secretary: With reference to my letter to you of 2 November, regarding general reductions in forces to be deployed by members of the United Nations to Korea, it is requested that due to the fluid situation in Korea, action be held in abeyance pending further study and recommendation by this Department.

With the execption of the Greek and Canadian contingents, the utilization of units already in Korea or projected for deployment to Korea will continue as originally planned. Since operational arrangements to ship to Korea only one Greek battalion and one Canadian battalion, instead of the larger forces (brigades) originally planned, have proceeded to an advanced stage, it would be both difficult and expensive to reverse these actions at this time.

No decision can be reached at this time concerning the diversion to Europe of the remainder of the Canadian brigade until the situation in Korea has been clarified. Meanwhile, the Canadian force will enter a period of additional training at Fort Lewis, Washington, as previously scheduled.

Faithfully yours,

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

[Washington,] November 16, 1950.

Like everyone else, I have been racking my brains as to possible additional steps, however small, which we might take to reduce the risk of hostilities spreading from Korea. I submit the following, allthough they may have been already considered and rejected:

1. Clamping down on statements out of Tokyo Headquarters and lesser commands.

It seems to me that there have been a series of irresponsible and provocative statements attributed to high American officers. Undoubtedly they have served to arouse further the suspicions of the Chinese as to our intentions. I suggest that the Secretary discuss this with General Marshall with a view to the JCS sending out a stiff warning for General MacArthur to transmit to all his subordinate officers.

2. Similar precautions with the Rhee Government.

I suggest a telegram to Muccio asking him to impress upon Rhee and his cabinet the vital importance at this point of avoiding any provocative or belligerent statements on the part of ROK officials.

3. Discuss delicacy of present situation with heads of wire services, papers or syndicates having representatives in Korea or Tokyo.

It seems to me that as a further protection against irresponsibility on the part of American or Korean officers and officials, the responsible American newspapers would be willing to exercise a voluntary censorship on publication of interviews or statements which might further increase the tension.

4. Presidential action at home.

If it has not already been done, it seems to me that the President should ask his cabinet and members of the Congress of both parties, through the Congressional leaders, to exercise extreme restraint in any public statements on Korea or Chinese intervention at this time.

All of the above relate to efforts to avoid any further strain due to unnecessary or irresponsible talk. The following three suggestions relate to efforts to make sure by direct contact that Peiping is left in no doubt as to our non-aggressive intentions provided they withdraw from their intervention:

5. A personal message from President Truman to Mao Tse-tung.

I think we should consider asking the British or Indians in Peiping to transmit personally to Mao Tse-tung a letter from the President which would reiterate our purposes. It should be firm but not minatory in pointing out the consequences of continued intervention on their part. I think it should, moreover, be kept secret at the outset and only published later if some advantage from such action appeared clear.

6. Sending an agent to directly contact Chinese Communist leaders in Hong Kong.

This should be someone who speaks the language, possesses means or contacts whereby he could be put in contact with Peiping agents, clearly an official and not a private go-between and yet not of a rank which would result in publicity. Specifically, I suggest Sabin Chase, who I believe meets all of these qualifications and in whose judgment and discretion I have complete confidence. I think we should consider putting him on a plane in the next few days with a full briefing but no additional tools other than a signed letter from the Secretary stating that he has his full confidence; that he be provided with means of secure communication directly to the Secretary. The purpose would be to reiterate assurances already publicly given and to attempt to ascertain the Communists' true intentions.

7. Direct approach to Stalin.

I think we should consider instructing Kirk that he request an interview with Stalin for the purpose of re-stating assurances already publicly given the Chinese and asking him to endorse and transmit these assurances to Mao Tse-tung. I know this is a difficult problem of approach in order to avoid any appearance of weakness.

Any of the last three steps, before being undertaken, should be fully discussed in advance with the British and our other principal allies.

Gadel 116. Urtel 825, Nov 14, last para. As indicated by Deptel 2487, Nov 13, to London and certain other posts, Dept fully recognizes justified interest and concern particularly those govts whose forces participating in action in Kor over mil decisions of Unified Command which might entail possibility of extension of area of hostilities and will continue to keep such govts informed, as far as possible in advance of taking such decisions, in order that they may express their views to which full consideration will be given.

With respect to second question, view of Dept that six power draft res of Nov 10 must be considered as a whole and therefore, affirmation of policy of holding Chi frontier with Kor inviolate must be interpreted in relation to preceding para which calls upon CC to withdraw forces now in Kor, and subsequent para which calls attn to grave danger which contd intervention by Chi forces wld entail for maintenance of this policy. It wld appear difficult to assert that CC cld continue indefinitely to claim protection afforded by one section of res without accepting corresponding obligations of other sections.

New Delhi, November 16, 1950—5 p. m. Received November 16—7: 35 p. m.]

1231. 1. Bajpai today handed me following excerpt from telegram just received from Panikkar, Indian Ambassador to Peking:

[Here followed the message from Panikkar stating that the Chinese delegation to discuss the Formosa issue before the Security Council had left on November 15 and was due in New York on November 19. Panikkar understood that the delegation had been given wide powers to discuss Korea also, provided that the whole question of Korea was taken up and not just MacArthur's report. Panikkar stated that the Chinese were anxious to settle the Korean question but only on the condition that they were parties to the settlement. His impression was that they would be agreeable to a settlement through discussions held outside the Security Council in view of their firm belief that the original resolution on Korea was invalid because of Chinese and Soviet nonparticipation. Panikkar also understood that the delegation might be willing to discuss informally with the representatives of other powers, including the United States, issues of a general nature.]

- 2. Bajpai said that he was giving me this without comment because:
- (a) He had lost confidence in Panikkar and;
- (b) He did not want US Government to misunderstand motive in passing this along. GOI was not trying to bring pressure on US to come to understanding with Peking and did not know whether such understanding was possible. Nevertheless, GOI was still anxiously hoping some development would take place which would forestall another world war. This telegram was so different from others which have been received from Panikkar that he was hoping China was commencing have more sober thoughts about possibilities of third war.

3. Bajpai told me in utmost confidence that telegraphic instructions were being sent to Panikkar instructing him, in case Peking appears to be taking more friendly attitude than it has assumed since launching Tibetan campaign, again impress upon Communist China that no great powers have designs against it and express hope it will refrain from pursuing policies which may lead to war. He said Panikkar had been informed it would be useless deliver this message unless attitude Peking was more friendly than it had been during recent weeks.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

[Washington,] November 17, 1950.

Subject: Probable Consequences of Carrying UN Hostilities into Manchuria

Ref.: CIA Memorandum November 9, 1950 for NSC

CA finds itself unable to accept the opinion expressed in the final paragraph of the reference memorandum that "action by U.N. forces to attack troop concentrations or air fields north of the Yalu River, or to pursue enemy aircraft into Chinese territory would not increase the already substantial risk that the situation may degenerate into a general war involving Russia", that such action would "probably materially increase the extent of Chinese Communist reaction in Korea proper [only]1".

CA's reasoning is as follows:

As set forth in the JIIC report of November 9,2 there was information indicating that a northward troop movement from the south and east China areas had been under way for the past month, and that it was apparently accelerated in late October, and that "almost all recent information points to a heavy and accelerated build-up of Chinese Communist strength in northeast China". The reference report noted that "Open Communist acceptance of responsibility for the fate of North Korea has also become apparent in statements from Moscow and Eastern Europe in the past few days. . . . The contrast of these statements with Communist Party efforts only a few weeks ago to play down the question of intervention in Korea is striking. . . . the unreserved nature of the propaganda implies an intent to turn the tide in Korea through an unofficial war by the Chinese Communists." The report admitted that "it still cannot be determined conclusively whether the objective of the Chinese Communists is to tie down U.N. forces in Korea for an indefinite period or whether they are making preparations for an offensive to attempt to drive the U.N. forces out of Korea." It observed further that "The scale of the Chinese military build-up in Northeast China, however, is indicative of a growing military capability beyond any apparent defensive needs, and the increasing belligerency of Chinese propaganda also indicates the beginnings of a campaign to prepare their people for continuing if not augmented support of the North Korean Communists. The risk of war which the Chinese have assumed further raises the question of what commitment the U.S.S.R. may have made to China and at what point the U.S.S.R. would come to her aid, particularly if air attacks on Chinese territory should be made."

The last quoted item from the reference JIIC report has been made the subject of recent comment coming from the Netherlands Foreign Office which has transmitted the estimate of their Peiping office that Manchuria may constitute a trap for UN forces. This same subject is taken under consideration in Mr. Emmerson's memorandum of November 6³ on Soviet and Chinese Communist intentions in Korea where, pointing to the circumstance that the Chinese Communists have braved the risk of UN bombing of Chinese cities by reason of their intervention, he said that the taking of the risk could mean as one hypothesis that "the Moscow-Peiping axis actually desires us to launch an attack on China which would bring into play the Sino-Soviet treaty, permit involvement of the USSR against Japan and eventuate in World War III".

The military commentator Hanson W. Baldwin, writing under Hong Kong dateline of November 15 (New York Times, November 16), while reporting the Hong Kong consensus of opinion that the Chinese Communist objective in Korea was limited to forcing us to fight a war of attrition there indefinitely, commented that "indications are strong that both the Chinese Communists and the Russians are preparing for any eventuality in Manchuria or the Korean area. The most important of these indications is the concentration of military forces now occurring in that area." Taking note of some of the recent Chinese Communist troops dispositions, he concluded that the enemy troops now concentrating in Manchuria were "a very powerful force potentially—by the sheer weight of numbers. How the Kremlin and Peiping intend to employ these hordes will determine the future fate of the world."

Hanson Baldwin's estimate of the gravity of the situation gets support currently from many quarters both in United States and friendly capitals. In general line with that estimate is the quoted comment of Lt. Gen Albert C. Wedemeyer who, in an address yesterday at San Francisco, stated inter alia that "Recently catastrophic events in the Far East suggest strongly that the Communist leaders have elected to use military force . . . (and) we are on the brink of, if not already involved in, World War III . . . (and) face subjugation or even annihilation by the Communists."*

In sum, one is bound to conclude from the scale of the military movements undertaken by the Chinese Communists, from the defense preparations they are making at home, and from the violence of their propaganda that they are preparing for major events. How those major events are to be touched off still remains unknown to us. The possibility that the carrying of UN military operations into Manchuria would have been used as a springboard by the Communist side has already been suggested. The JIIC report under mention noted in passing that the USSR has in recent weeks made specific reference to the Sino-Soviet mutual defense treaty. Both the Chinese and Soviet propagandists have put on record their allegation that the United States has used Japanese troops in fighting in Korea.4 The New York Times today reports a new Soviet allegation carried by Pravda that Japanese troops are participating extensively in the Korean war, and that a secret military agreement was under negotiation between General MacArthur and the Japanese Government providing for a 30-year occupation of Japan by U.S. forces of three divisions strength, with a tripling of the Japanese reserve police corps now numbering 75,000.

CA reiterates the belief previously expressed (CA Memorandum, November 10, 1950, "Action Respecting Korean-Manchurian Frontier") that the carrying of UN military operations into Manchuria would be attended by a strong possibility that there would be set off a violent political-military reaction which would be detrimental to the UN and U.S. political and military positions alike. CA believes that the relatively minor military advantage which might be immediately obtained by "hot pursuit" of hostile planes across the frontier would be far outweighed by the increased risk—already seemingly grave—of a general war.

The Soviet representative on the Far Eastern Commission had made this allegation at the November 2nd meeting of that body and then released his statement to the press. At the November 16 meeting of the FEC, the U.S. representative (Hamilton) took note of the denials which had been made by the Departments of State and Defense as well as by General MacArthur. 2. What I have in mind is that at a suitable opportunity during the debate Jebb should give a broad outline of these suggestions which he might present as a supplementary interpretation of the resolution and within its spirit. My immedately preceding telegram.

Chinese Intervention in Korea.

Chinese intentions are unpredictable but it is essential that every effort should be made to ensure that they understand the pacific nature of our intentions towards Chinese territory. I was very pleased to read the wise and statesman-like announcement by the President yesterday which does much to make the position clear.

2. I am proposing to make a statement in the House of Commons designed to secure publicity in China. In it I would try to convince the Chinese that the objectives of the United Nations in Korea are those publicly stated, that we have no ulterior designs and no intentions to violate Chinese territorial integrity, that the implications of Chinese action in Korea are extremely grave, and that while it is our earnest desire to prevent any extension of the conflict, the decision and the responsibility will lie with them.

- 3. But the situation is so serious that I think we ought to go further than making governmental declarations and attempt to bring our intentions home to the Chinese through any other available channels. I think it is also important from the point of view of public opinion in our countries that we can be shown to have tried all possible means to make our position clear.
- 4. It may be possible to make direct contacts with the Chinese Delegation when they arrive in New York and in preparation for this I am strengthening the Delegation by sending Mr. Lamb² to New York. But it looks as if the delegation may not arrive in New York for some time and meanwhile the situation may deteriorate. I therefore propose to take the following immediate steps.
- 5. Though Mr. Hutchison in Peking unfortunately has no right of access to the Chinese Government on matters of general policy, I propose to instruct him to try to see Chou En Lai (even at the risk of inviting a snub) or at any rate the highest available responsible official, to convey a statement on the general lines of paragraph 2 above. I do not propose to convey to the Chinese Government an indication of our proposals and ideas for a demilitarised area. If however the Chinese should give any opening to Mr. Hutchison in the course of conversation about future possibilities in the frontier area, I would ask him to enquire from them (as being an enquiry from him personally) whether they had ever given any thought to the idea of a demilitarised area in North Korea and if so whether they would like him to convey any suggestions regarding this to me.
- 6. I also propose to inform Pandit Nehru of the approach which Mr. Hutchison will be making to the Chinese Government and shall ask him to consider sending instructions to the Indian Ambassador in Peking to make a parallel approach.
- 7. Finally I propose to instruct His Majesty's Ambassador in Moscow to inform the Soviet Government, in view of their declared interest in the maintenance of peace, of the views of His Majesty's Government on the gravity of the situation in the Far East. Sir D. Kelly would not raise the question of a demilitarised zone.
- 8. I do not much like Mr. Pearson's suggestion that the Secretary-General of the United Nations might get in touch with the Peking Government since this might detract from the efficacy of the approaches suggested above.
- 9. I should be glad if you would so inform Mr. Acheson. I am sure that the United States Government will agree with what I am doing as they share our views as to our common objectives (namely those outlined above). In view of our recognition of the Chinese Government we may however be better placed than they to take the initiative.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador in Korea (Muccio)¹

[Tokyo,] November 17, 1950.

Subject: North Korean Military Action

Participants: General MacArthur

Ambassador Muccio

General MacArthur outlined in considerable detail his conclusions as to Chinese Communist motives in North Korea. These reflected mainly Chinese Communists imperialistic aspirations acting independently of the Kremlin. The General went on along lines similar to those recorded by Mr. Sebald in his Memo of November 14.

The General continued that he was sure the Chinese Communists had sent 25,000, and certainly no more that 30,000, soldiers across the border. They could not possibly have got more over with the surreptitiously covert means used. If they had moved in the open, they would have been detected by our Air Forces and our Intelligence.

The General then went on that he had finally received authorization to knock out the Korean end of the bridges across the Yalu; the Air Force was concentrating on doing so and, at the same time, destroying all resources in the narrow stretch between our present positions and the border. Unfortunately, this area will be left a desert.

The General stated that he is mounting an all out offensive ² and is certain that the whole area still in the hands of North Koreans and Chinese Communists would be cleared within ten days. Upon attaining our immediate objectives, he plans to:

1. Release all Korean Prisoners of War with the admonition that if any should resume fighting, they will be subject to treatment as irregular forces. The question of the restoration of civil rights to these paroled Prisoners of War, of course, would be a matter for determination by ROK.

¹This memorandum was transmitted to the Department under cover of a letter to Mr. Rusk, not printed, which was received on December 4. The letter indicated that the conversation took place on the evening of November 16.

indicated that the conversation took place on the evening of November 16.

² In telegram C-69211, November 18, General MacArthur informed the JCS that the offensive would be launched on November 24; see Appleman, South to the Naktong, North to the Yalu, p. 774.

2. He will take all Chinese Prisoners of War to the border, release them, and send them across the line.

3. As a further means of emphasizing to the world the end of the Korean Military Action, he will, at once, order the Eighth Army back to Japan, leaving the stabilization of the situation to the Tenth Corps, UN National Units, and the ROK Forces.

INTERIM REPORT BY THE NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL ON UNITED STATES

COURSES OF ACTION WITH RESPECT TO KOREA

- 1. The National Security Council has continued its review of the situation created by the intervention of Chinese Communist forces in Korea. This report is supplemental to the interim report of the Council dated November 14, 1950.*
- 2. The military operations of the United Nations in Korea are being carried out in accordance with current directives. The resistance by the North Korean forces, fortified by substantial numbers of Chinese Communists, continues. Men and material continue to flow across the Manchurian boundary to the support of the North Korean troops. Communist aircraft, notably the Russian built Mig-15, continue to engage our forces and to return to sanctuary across the Yalu River.

3. While hoping that the United Nations forces will achieve a rapid success in spite of this, the Council recognizes the possibility that the military situation may result in a request by the Commander in Chief of the United Nations forces for authority to reduce Chinese Communist support by air attack against targets in Manchuria.

4. The Council believes that two major policies should dominate our actions in Korea, one affirmative and one negative.

The affirmative policy is to continue our vigorous support of the United Nations and the consequent development of that organization as the medium through which it is hoped that aggression will be prevented and war eliminated as a human institution.

The second policy is to avoid having the Soviets succeed in involving us in a war with Communist China.

5. The Council believes that the creation of a situation whereby United Nations aircraft would attack targets in Manchuria would increase very substantially the likelihood that we would become involved in war with Communist China and therefore believes it important that all possible action be taken to eliminate the necessity for such attacks by United Nations forces.

6. At the moment the military action of the United Nations forces is going reasonably well and there is reason to hope that even without such attacks in Manchuria the United Nations forces may succeed in driving the Communist forces out of Korea.

7. On the other hand this happy result may not be forthcoming and it may be that the best that the United Nations forces can do, without undertaking air attacks against Manchuria, is to hold the line. Should this situation arise, the Council believes that such a line should be held as long as possible.

8. If, however, the Chinese Communists, through their assistance to the North Korean forces, succeed in causing the United Nations forces to retire, the Council believes that the most serious consideration should be given to a political course of action by the United States, within the United Nations, which would openly and effectively hold Russia responsible for the action in Korea.

9. To hold Russia responsible for this action would be a very grave step. The Council believes, however, that unless the prestige of the United Nations, built up at so much cost in the Korean war, is to be lost, and the cause of peace correspondingly harmed, the United Nations forces cannot accept a military defeat in Korea without making it clear to the world that such defeat is caused by the Soviet

Memorandum by Mr. John P. Davies of the Policy Planning Staff

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] November 17, 1950.

The Problem

To formulate United States policy with respect to the crisis posed by the present situation in Korea.

Analysis

To be understood, the problems which now confront us on the Korean-Manchurian border must be viewed in the context of the great power confrontation. Only if we have this understanding can we judge wisely the course which we should follow.

The Kremlin's Korean adventure was a symptom of Moscow's dissatisfaction with the previously existing ratio of power between the Free World and the Soviet Empire. It indicated that the Kremlin felt it necessary either to compensate for the gradual but steady advance of power in the Free World or to maintain the dynamics of the Bolshevik movement through further expansion, or both. It was obviously a carefully calculated design. But it failed to take into account the extent of our reaction, Instead of advancing its power position, the Korean adventure had by July begun to pose the threat of a major reverse and by October the reality of this threat was urgent and real. At this point the Chinese Communists moved to save the situation.

Because it is in the nature of the Kremlin to be well forearmed, it was to be expected that the Kremlin might at any time between the commitment of American forces and the Inchon landing have taken up positions along the 38th parallel to insure at least a continuance of the status quo ante. It did not do this, nor did the Chinese. Likewise, a natural defensive position at the neck of the peninsula was allowed to fall into our hands. It was not until our forces were near the frontier that the Chinese, not the U.S.S.R., moved with great vigor and decision to counter our advances.

Three deductions are to be drawn from what has been said thus far:

(1) Any action of ours which threatens to advance our power position or reduce the Kremlin's will produce a reaction from the Kremlin designed at least to compensate for its threatened loss.

(2) The Kremlin will be inclined, even at the sacrifice of immediate advantages and increased risks to itself, to create a situation in which our action is taken in a context which can be presented as aggressive.

(3) It will seek, if possible, to cause others to fight its battles for it.

Let us examine these deductions in more detail.

This concept of action and reaction in the power struggle is deeply engrained in Kremlin thinking. It stems from the very roots of Communist philosophy: the conflict between thesis and antithesis resulting in synthesis. In plain language, action to advance our power position must evoke a reaction to redress or advance the Kremlin's power position, thus creating a new situation. This situation may be stabilized (temporarily, of course) through political agreement registering its realities—and implications—from the Kremlin's point of view or, if such an agreement is unacceptable to us, we may be expected to act anew and the Kremlin correspondingly to react. Thus there is never a permanently stable power relationship. The struggle proceeds through a series of phases—action and reaction, perhaps a temporary adjustment, then another phase of action and reaction, always with the possibility that the phases begin to telescope with no intermediate period of accommodation. In this sense the Kremlin considers war inevitable.

It was with this approach that the Kremlin in mid-summer studied the Korean situation and planned its next move. It undoubtedly examined the Korean situation in depth, in terms of the global struggle for power and in terms of an indefinite chain of action and reactions. Thus it must have calculated that its reaction (through the Chinese) would create a new situation—which we could either accept or in which we could act anew. If we accepted the situation created by its reaction, it could be registered in a political settlement, provided that we would pay the price. If we would not, then we could be expected to act anew in an attempt, at least, to redress our power loss.

The Kremlin was not likely again to underestimate what we might do. In calculating what new action we might take, moving the power struggle into another phase, the Kremlin presumably took into account the extreme possibility—a chain process leading quickly to global war. That the Kremlin has nevertheless created this new situation is an indication that it accepts the extreme risk.

While it accepts the risk of general war it does not do so without qualifications. The fact that it and Peiping reacted neither at the 38th parallel nor at the natural defensive line at the neck and that the reaction did not occur until it could plausibly be made in a defensive context, accompanied by charges of our aggressive intent, reveals a Kremlin (and Peiping) concern regarding the mode of its reactions. This stems from deep within Bolshevik strategy—the theory that the capitalist world is "aggressive", that the Bolsheviks are "peace-loving" and that if war eventuates it must be in the context of what can be alleged as attack by the capitalists.

Thus every effort is being made in the present situation to create the atmosphere of U.S.-U.N. aggression and Communist self-defense. The stage is feverishly being prepared to make any action of ours carrying the struggle into a new phase occur in an aggressive setting, to maneuver us into a politically disadvantageous light, causing others to shrink away from us, leaving us isolated. And so it would probably be in each successive phase.

The Kremlin's acceptance of the risk of World War III is further qualified by a desire to operate indirectly, deviously, avoiding the appearance of Soviet responsibility and, wherever feasible, inducing others to do its fighting for it. The North Koreans having collapsed, it has succeeded in transferring primary responsibility to the Chinese. Whether this was achieved by orders which were obediently obeyed, by coercion, by concessions or whether the Kremlin may even have had to restrain Peiping, we do not know. In any event the Chinese are holding the bag and would undoubtedly continue to do so were the struggle to move into a phase of Sino-American hostilities. The Kremlin is quite capable of remaining nominally aloof from such a new phase, provided that its power relationship to the Free World was not diminished thereby.

So much for background. Let us now examine the immediate problem before us—what to do in the present crisis.

It is possible that the Kremlin and Peiping are bluffing or that either one would welsh on the other, that they will not increase their commitments in Korea, that they will yield before U.N. military action and that we can establish U.N. authority to the borders. They might accept such a situation, accept a major defeat and the consequent serious decline in their global power position. But if they did, they would feel compelled to react elsewhere on a large scale, sufficient at least to compensate for the Korean and Manchurian border reverse.

The bulk of available evidence points, however, to the probability that the Kremlin and Peiping are committed at least to holding the northern fringe of Korea—and that, against our present forces they have the military capability of doing so, the Chinese in manpower and the U.S.S.R. in supplies. If this is so, what then are the alternatives before us?

Course 1

We could try to bring about an increase of U.N. military commitments and seek to drive the Chinese out of the North Korean fringe. Because it is unlikely that others would go along with us on such a plan, we would have to draw from our own existing military reserves for this purpose. Because they are limited and would probably not tip the scales in our favor, it would probably be necessary to call up more men to be committed to Korea. This process could proceed with no foreseeable point of termination even though we mobilized and committed ourselves to a large-scale war for the Manchurian border.

Going to these lengths we might achieve a decision—but we can neither be sure this would be so nor that we would be willing to pay the continuing price of such a course.

Course 2

We could write off Korea, promptly withdraw and prepare for any eventuality. This course would have so disastrous an effect on our prestige and influence throughout the world and so enhance the position of the Kremlin and Peiping that even were we to mobilize fully, it would not compensate for our reverse. Rather it might well create something close to the ideal climate, from the Kremlin's point of view, for the waging of global war. This situation would be little changed were we publicly to accuse the Kremlin of responsibility for what had happened.

Course 3

We could carry the struggle into the next phase by air and naval action against at least South Manchuria. The reaction to this could scarcely be less than overt Chinese intervention in Korea and Soviet Air Force resistance to our air attacks. Given enemy capabilities, it is difficult to see how we could impose a military decision or find an acceptable basis for a political settlement stabilizing the situation. Having pushed the military expression of the struggle one phase further and finding ourselves incapable of forcing submission, the settlement price of our foes would register our failure and therefore exceed what we could in honor yield. But were we to enter this further phase through purely punitive hit and run and blockade tactics and were we able to keep our prestige from becoming deeply engaged, we might hope to terminate this action without reverses, by simply ceasing operations. However carefully these tactics might be planned and executed, it is doubtful that we could avoid becoming caught up in alternately mounting commitments between ourselves and the Soviet Air Force. This would run the real risk of starting a chain of actions and reactions leading quickly into global war.

Course 4

Finally, we could follow the course which we had, by the terms of NSC 81,¹ intended to pursue had we encountered indications of firm Soviet or Chinese intentions to resist a U.N. advance anywhere north of the 38th parallel. We could take steps along the following general lines:

(1) Sponsor a U.N. resolution announcing the conclusion of full scale U.N. military action and calling for (a) the demilitarization of northern fringe of Korea, (b) the withdrawal of all foreign military elements from that zone, (c) its administration by a U.N. Commission pending the holding of elections throughout North Korea and the establishment of normal civil administration and (d) the phased withdrawal of U.N. foreign forces from Korea;

(2) Immediately begin the retirement of all U.N. forces to a defensive position at the neck of the Korean peninsula;

(3) Cease military air action over the demilitarized zone but elsewhere continue whatever military action is deemed necessary;

(4) Accept in our planning the likelihood that part of North Korea will remain under effective Kremlin control and be a constant threat to the ROK;

(5) Build up the ROK armed forces to a condition where they can within a year hold at the neck of the peninsula anything short of a major Chinese or Soviet attack.

This course would probably halt for the time being the steadily mounting commitments between ourselves and the Moscow-Peiping Axis—a process in which, on the basis of existing intelligence, we are unlikely to be able to outdo the enemy short of pressing phase by phase to the ultimate action: initiating atomic warfare. These tactics would probably not provide a basis for a political settlement recording a clear-cut victory for either ourselves or the Moscow-Peiping Axis. The situation created by such a move on our part would probably represent a power stalemate. It might be registered explicitly in an agreement through the U.N. or tacitly by unexpressed mutual acceptance of the situation.

But what is very important to us is that if the Axis is determined to resume the struggle over Korea on a military plane, it will have to bear the onus of initiating clearly aggressive action. That is something which the Kremlin and Peiping will seek to avoid, something which will probably give them pause. For our part we will not only be in a better moral position to react as drastically as we deem necessary, we will also be in a better military position both in Korea and globally.

Conclusions

The United States should adopt Course 4.

Meanwhile, in view of the increased risk of general war, we should:

1. Expand the military program invisaged in NSC 68 ² and declare immediately a state of national emergency [and] accelerate the implementation of the policy laid down in NSC 68.

2. Move ahead rapidly with the development of NATO and, if that proves impossible in the immediate future, reexamine our policy regarding Europe in the light of possible general hostilities in the near future.

² The NSC 68 series dealt with U.S. Programs and Objectives Relating to National Security; documentation is scheduled for volume I.

3. Build up Japan to defend itself and increase its military supply production, while securing our lines of communication to Japan and Korea.

ConGen has been unable obtain any reliable information as to extent to which Chinese Communists may have acted under Soviet pressure. It seems reasonable to suppose Chinese Communists intervention not only has Soviet sanction but also was urged by Soviets. Nevertheless there is sufficient identity of national interest between the two nations with respect to Korea, given Marx-Leninist theory which has strong influence on leaders of both countries, that Chinese may have felt they acted in national interest even though from our point of view they are simply promoting aims of Soviet imperialism. There are wide differences of opinion in Hong Kong on this question and so far as ConGen has been able ascertain opinions are based solely on observer's general attitude toward independence or lack of independence of Chinese Communists with relation to Moscow rather than any knowledge of what took place in discussions between Chinese Communists and Russians prior to intervention in Korea. Strong feeling exists among Western Europeans in Hong Kong that Chinese Communists acted independently as result genuine fear that US threatening Manchuria. Those holding this belief counsel compromise in Korea and admission Communist China to UN. At other extreme are violently anti-Communist Chinese who believe every act of Chinese Communists is dictated by Moscow and advocate strongest possible action against Chinese Communists including support of mainland guerrillas. ConGen believes truth lies somewhere between two extremes but evidence defining exact relationship between Peking and Moscow extremely difficult obtain. Reports available to Eighth Army suggest CCF in Northwest Korea are not receiving reinforcements or replacements; it also appears supplies and equipment are not coming from Manchuria in any substantial quantities. Unless Chinese intervene much more actively than appears to have been case during past two weeks, main conclusion to be drawn is they fighting delaying action and consequently not committed to allout intervention. Reasons for delaying action, if it indeed be that, are not clear. It could be to test UN determination in face threat of all-out war with Chinese, it could be to gain time to remove valuable

US/S/1579

Subject: Plans for Handling Chinese-Communist Representatives

Participants: Ambassador Ales Bebler,

Yugoslav Delegation Ambassador Ernest Gross, United States Delegation

Mr. C. P. Noyes,

United States Delegation

Ambassador Bebler stated that he wanted to discuss with us the problems he would face as President of the Council in dealing with the Chinese Communists. The first question on his mind was how rigid he should be in confining them to the Formosa question during the discussions of this matter. Of course he recognized their Government and did not wish to be put in a position of being hostile to them. He was anxious not to give Malik the opportunity of pretending that this was the case. The question on the agenda is American Aggression Against China, and there would be some justification for the Chinese ranging fairly widely and in particular touching upon the Korean question. He understood that the United States position was that their action in regard to Formosa resulted from the necessity to neutralize Formosa during the Korean operations. He was anxious to know what our views are and to find out from the other Members of the Council what kind of backing he would get for whatever position he took.

Ambassador Gross indicated that we had always had great difficulty in confining discussions in the Security Council rigidly to particular issues. In this case there were probably advantages in letting the Chinese speak their mind, and he was sympathetic to the idea of the Chairman being fairly liberal in his attitude towards efforts to limit the discussion. It was possible, of course, that the Chinese Communists might take such an extreme position that it would be necessary to stop them.

Noyes pointed out that it might be highly useful if the President, in his preliminary discussions—if he had any—with the Chinese Communists, should warn them in fairly strong terms that he would, as President, be forced to call them to order if they insisted on speaking to the substance of the Korean question. It might be hoped then that the Communists would keep within reasonable bounds and that the Chairman could take a liberal approach.

Noyes pointed out that the Chairman might be in a difficult position if he should permit the Chinese Communists to refuse the Council's invitation in the Korean question and yet attain the advantage of saying their full say by disregarding proper Council procedure.

Bebler indicated he would hope to have advance talks with the Chinese Communists in his capacity as President, in order to find out a convenient time for meetings, and to explain to them the general situation.

Mr. Gross indicated that these talks might be most useful not only with regard to procedure but also to obtain some idea what is in their minds with regard to substance. He indicated that in view of the general situation, we were interested in finding out the Chinese Communist views on a number of subjects, in particular the Korean question, and that while we would of course take no initiative, we would have no difficulty in meeting the Chinese Communists informally and talking with them. This would of course in no way affect our position in that we did not recognize their Government, and we should have to take care to preserve our position in that regard.

Bebler raised the question of discussions in regard to Chinese Aggression in the Korean question. He understood the Chinese had refused the Council's invitation to be heard on that matter on the ground that they were invited as the accused to explain only their position with regard to MacArthur's Report.

Mr. Gross indicated that from the technical point of view there might have been some misunderstanding on this question. Mr. Malik's original motion had been too broad. The British motion which was passed might, on its part, have been misunderstood. He thought the true technical position was that the Council had invited the Chinese Communists to be heard in regard to the question on the Council's agenda, i.e.: Aggression Against the Republic of Korea. This invitation should not be interpreted to mean that they are invited to sit at the table for all discussions of that question. What the Council is particularly interested in, obviously, is the situation which had arisen as a result of Chinese intervention. He thought that the President might explain to the Chinese Communists that this was the situation.

Bebler asked what we thought of the idea put forward by Rau some time back that the nonpermanent members might be designated as a subcommittee of the Security Council to consider and make recommendations in regard to Chinese intervention. We discussed the precedent of the Berlin case, and Mr. Gross left the impression with Bebler that this might be a useful instrument. In particular it might help get around the problem created by Dr. Tsiang's Presidency of the Security Council during December. Mr. Gross indicated he thought Dr. Tsiang would step aside on the Formosa question, and he might also step aside when the problem of Chinese intervention in the Korean War is considered. This was less certain. In any case the possibility of following the precedent of the Berlin case, or something along similar lines, was worth considering.

NOVEMBER 17, 1950.

ESTIMATE OF THE MOST PROBABLE COURSE OF SOVIET-CHINESE ACTION WITH REGARD TO KOREA

1. The immediate situation with regard to Chinese intervention in Korea is as follows:

a. The military activity of Chinese troops in Korea so far is not sufficiently extensive to indicate a plan for major operations.

b. Military preparations being carried out in Manchuria and China generally are on a scale that suggest (1) plans for a major operation of prolonged duration, (2) expectations of extensive US air attacks on Chinese, particularly Manchurian, cities.

c. The climate of opinion prevailing in China, including circles close to Party leadership, appears on the basis of extensive reports to reflect expectations of war.

d. Chinese propagandists for the past three weeks have mounted an intensive war spirit campaign centering on the charge that US military action in Korea is aimed at an attack on China and calling for all-out sacrifices to meet and defeat this threat through support of Korea. A sub-theme of the campaign has been American impotence in a war with China.

e. Neither Chinese officials nor Chinese propaganda has thus far committed the Chinese Government to a line of action in Korea. Discussion of preparation for support of Korea has been only in terms of volunteer action.

f. The Soviet press has reported with approval Chinese preparation for support of North Korea. Soviet official statements and Soviet propaganda have identified the struggle of the North Koreans with the Communist cause generally. However, neither source has in any way committed the Soviet Union to any line of action, including support for the Chinese.

- g. There has been no suggestion in Chinese propaganda or official statements that the Chinese support of North Korea has a limited objective, either protection of power plants, establishment of a buffer zone on the border, or withdrawal of UN forces to the 38th parallel. In fact, none of these has been mentioned by the Chinese. All Chinese treatment has been in terms of the necessity of bringing about a withdrawal of foreign forces from Korea.
- 2. While there are no indications regarding the role that the Soviet Union has played in decisions reached by Chinese leaders in regard to Korea, Chinese pressure on the US position supports known Soviet objectives, and, if successful would result in a substantial improvement in the Soviet power position as against the US; while a failure of Chinese pressure on the US would represent a notable worsening of the Soviet power position as against the US.
- 3. The Soviet Union has made no open commitment to support the Chinese. However, planes drawn from the Soviet air force have been increasingly observed in Manchuria and over Korea. Soviet propaganda has recently called attention to USSR obligations under the Sino-Soviet treaty to support China in case of aggression on the part of Japan or any power directly or indirectly associated with Japan. Soviet officials and propaganda have recently stressed US use of Japanese troops in Korea and US preparations to use Japan as a base for aggression.

4. Chinese activity in regard to Korea follows extensive indications of an acceleration and intensification of Soviet political and military preparations for war with the US and comes at a time when Soviet armed forces are in such an advanced state of readiness for war that offensive operations could be initiated on all appropriate fronts in Europe and Asia without additional warning.

5. Chinese activity in regard to Korea also follows a period of increased militancy on the part of the USSR in its prosecution of its struggle with the US. The releasing of the North Korean aggression must be regarded as an integral element in this increasing militancy.

6. At no time since 25 June have the Russians taken any steps to diminish the likelihood of US mobilization, which they must regard as one of their greatest dangers. Indeed, they have taken or allowed only actions which would increase that danger.

7. In view of all factors involved, the intelligence organization of the Department estimates the most likely Soviet-Chinese course as follows:

a. Continuation of Chinese-North Korean holding operations in North Korea until Chinese over-all preparations have been completed and until prospects of securing US withdrawals from Korea through intimidation and diplomatic maneuvers have been exhausted.

b. In case of the failure of these tactics, increasing unofficial Chinese intervention in Korea to, if necessary, the point of large scale military operations.

c. Increasing Soviet support of the Chinese in the form of equipment, planes, technical advisers, and, if necessary "volunteers" to the extent required to prevent a Chinese defeat.

- 8. The intelligence organization of the Department estimates that the situation already existing in Korea and the events likely to follow carry with them grave risks of a general war developing and believe that Soviet rulers have allowed for this possibility and feel prepared to cope with it.
- 9. The intelligence organization of the Department also feels that the indications of a possible Soviet intention to launch general war, while definitely not conclusive, are sufficiently serious to merit close and constant attention.

1051. Bevin's proposal for "fresh approach" to Korean problem to include establishment of demilitarized area (Department infotel November 17, 2 a.m.¹) presumably will be unpalatable to Soviets. Continuance hostilities engaging major portion US and some UN forces in Far East would seem to be of considerable importance to Politburo in their current world strategy and that they envisage continuance of struggle by "people of Korea" for indefinite period has been theme of all their recent pronouncements re Korea. Further, in general Soviets are disinclined to negotiate losses.

Proposal also on face unacceptable to UN as envisaging less than complete achievement UN objectives Korea, and in implying possible weakness tending encourage Communist enemy.

However, it is manifestly undesirable continue indefinitely commitment UN (particularly major portion US forces) in Far East and advantages which would accrue from effective cessation hostilities Korea should, of course, be given major consideration in determining US and UN attitude.

In any event, it would seem inadvisable, in light of seriousness of risks involved in present situation, to close the door to negotiation and we presumably wish to maintain maximum maneuverability for attainment of an appropriate solution.

Of course, if Bevin's proposal is made and rejected by Commies, such rejection would have obvious advantage of further demonstrating (to those who for one reason or another have misgivings re righteousness of UN cause) the basic Commie objectives and degree of Commie determination to continue operations in Korea.

Obviously if Bevin's proposal is to be voiced, the manner of its handling is of utmost importance. In this connection, my British colleague informs me that he was instructed two days ago to see Gromyko and, in emphasizing British adherence to UN objectives in Korea and

British conviction that those objectives do not contemplate violation of Manchurian frontier, to take occasion, if such were offered, to explore Soviet attitude toward demilitarized zone. Kelly added that British Chargé in Peking has similarly been instructed to see Chou En-lai. On grounds that Gromyko would have taken his usual position of inquiring what specifically the British had to propose, Kelly was disinclined to make the suggested approach and was in the process of so informing the Foreign Office when he received a second instruction to delay his representations pending the results of Hutchinson's démarche in Peking.

We are apprehensive at this proposed British initiative which seems to us to play into Soviet hands in the same fashion as British talks on this subject last July. The Soviets inevitably welcome any unilateral action which could be interpreted as diminishing US-UK solidarity in that it implies divergence of views between our two governments, and British initiative in this instance can only tend to facilitate Soviet confusion of the issues. We are also unhappy for similar reasons that proposal is to be made by British at Peking, although perhaps some consolation may be had in the fact that representations there might tend to strike responsive chord among Chinese who may not be wholeheartedly in favor of course Chinese Government is now taking, presumably at Moscow instigation. In this connection, while Embassy notes statement Burmese Ambassador (and has been informed similar views are held by Pannikar and Dutch in Peking) that Chinese Government really apprehensive that US intends invade Manchuria, it seems possible to us that there may be some validity in the theory that Chinese authorities are, on the contrary, convinced we do not intend invade and would take increasing comfort in the possibility of their continuing to act with impunity if our intention to held that frontier inviolate should be over-emphasized.

We concur with Department that consideration of Bevin's proposal should not result in postponement or interfere with action on present six-power resolution.

United States Courses of Action With Respect to Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea

Points for Consideration With Secretary Marshall and the Joint Chiefs of Staff

THE PROBLEM

1. To determine whether the present mission assigned to the Commander in Chief, United Nations Command, in Korea should be amended in view of the changed situation which results from Chinese Communist intervention and probable Chinese Communist intentions in Korea.

U.S. Objectives in Korea

2. Establishment of a unified and independent Korea. While the objective of the United States and of the United Nations remains the establishment of the unity and independence of Korea, the achievement of this objective does not necessarily require the military occupation of all of Korea to its northernmost boundaries. The practical elimination of "North Korea" as a defined territory north of the 38th parallel under an organized government, and the present situation in which at least ninety percent of the Korean population is in territory under the control of the UN forces, makes it possible to proceed now with the activities of the new UN Commission for the political and economic consolidation of existing gains. If an area in the North remains not wholly pacified and contains hostile elements of North Korean and Chinese forces, from a political point of view such an area can be regarded as being no different from those more restricted and scattered areas both north and south of the 38th parallel in which guerrilla activity still presents a military problem of pacification.

3. Localization of the Korean conflict. It is in the interest of the United States to avoid action which might entail major military involvement with Communist China or which might lead to general war.

Chinese Communist Intentions

- 4. The Estimate of Chinese Communist intentions contained in the CIA Memorandum for the President of November 8, 1950, reads in part as follows:
- "... Although the possibility cannot be excluded that the Chinese Communists, under Soviet direction, are committing themselves to full-scale intervention in Korea, their main motivation at present appears to be to establish a limited 'cordon sanitaire' south of the Yalu River . . ."
- 5. The CIA Memorandum of November 8 further states: "The Chinese Communists probably genuinely fear an invasion of Manchuria despite the clear-cut definition of UN objectives."
- 6. Intervention in Korea by the Chinese Communists, which we must assume to be at Soviet direction or with Soviet connivance, means the acceptance by the Kremlin and Peiping of risks of a spread of hostilities and of general war. While assuming such risks, the Moscow-Peiping Axis would prefer and probably aims to create a situation which portrays U.S. and UN actions as aggression against China, which commits U.S. forces in indecisive and prolonged warfare, and which still leaves the USSR uncommitted.
- 7. Actions taken by the United States and by the UN forces must be directed toward thwarting the Kremlin aim of creating the situation described above. If the foregoing analysis of Chinese Communist intentions is correct, it would further our policy if we could win a military success without taking action across the northern frontier of Korea and if we could maintain UN support and Korean cooperation and bring about a political settlement. It is impossible to predict with certainty the effect upon the Chinese of further military advances. If we accept the estimates referred to in paragraphs 4 and 5 it would seem logical to couple these advances with some type of political negotiations which would meet the assumed Chinese Communist fears. Naturally, such negotiations should be conducted in such a way as not to suggest weakness since weakness would make the Chinese Communists less willing to accept a negotiated solution. The principle of negotiation from strength applies.

Military Action

- 8. In the present situation there seem to be three courses of military action, each with variations of degree and character, which should be considered:
- a. pursue the offensive with the intention of occupying Korea to the northern boundary from the mouth of the Yalu to the Siberian frontier;

b. establish a limit of advance short of the frontier;

- c. withdraw to a defensive line established south of the presently held positions.
- 9. Under either course b) or c) above, the CINCUNC should not be precluded from taking such offensive military action in Korea against enemy units north of the limit of advance or line established, as in his judgment would be militarily desirable or necessary. As a political matter, however, the CINCUNC should be in possession of the clearest indication of the mission with which he is charged. As stated in paragraph 2, this mission is not to be considered as concentrating upon the principle of the occupation of territory.

10. It is not believed that total withdrawal from Korea should be considered a practical alternative at this juncture.

11. If course a) above can be accomplished speedily with the UN forces now available in Korea and without the necessity for military action across the northern frontier of Korea, it would have the advantage of removing any remnants of a Communist regime from Korea and of restoring the rightful boundaries of the country. In order to determine the political implications of such military action, it would be useful to have answers to the following questions:

i. Except for the area near the mouth of the Yalu, would it be a practical military possibility to hold the entire line of the Korean frontier against Communist penetration and infiltration?

ii. Would the holding of some other line at a distance from the frontier be equally or more advantageous from a military point of view?

- iii. Would the holding of such a line be more feasible logistically? iv. If it is attempted to hold the line at the frontier itself, would there be an increased risk of defeating the objective of localizing the conflict?
- v. If an attempt is made to hold the line at the frontier in force and if this should result in the full commitment of Chinese capabilities, is it correct, as indicated in the CIA Estimate of November 8, that the Chinese Communists would have the capability of denying the UN forces the successful maintenance of this position?
- 12. Course b), unless accompanied by the establishment of a demilitarized zone in the area north of the limit of advance, would tacitly accept Communist control of the northern areas of Korea and the continued existence of a North Korean Communist regime. On the other hand, it might provide the basis for a termination of hostilities and permit the ultimate withdrawal of UN troops and the development of adequate Korean defenses to deter repeated Communist aggression.
- 13. Course c) might envisage the line across the neck or a line still further south. This course would presumably be necessary should Chinese forces be increased in such numbers that it became militarily infeasible to hold a defensive line at the present positions.

Political Action

14. The military and political actions taken by the United States are mutually dependent and must be correlated. Political steps should be modified if necessary, in order to obtain maximum support in the UN. Among the alternative actions which might be taken are the following:

a. press for the adoption of the resolution now before the Security Council; when vetoed, press for similar action in the General Assembly;

b. support in the UN the UK proposal for the establishment of a "demilitarized zone" or "security zone" in the area north of the Chongju-Hamhung line with a UN Commission to assume responsibility for this zone and for the negotiation of border problems between the Koreans, the Chinese and the Russians;

Memorandum by the Planning Adviser, Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs (Emmerson), to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

[Washington,] November 20, 1950.

Subject: Soviet and Chinese Communist Political Objectives.

On the assumption that the Chinese intervention in Korea has a limited objective, at least for the present, we must be prepared for a combined Soviet-Chinese political barrage intended to shift the issue in Korea to the questions of Chinese Communist admission to the United Nations and of Chinese Communist control of Formosa.

While it is quite likely that until recently the USSR may actually have not wanted the Peiping government in the UN, the Soviets' objective now, again assuming they do not want general war, is probably to get the Chinese into the UN as partial political salvage of their Korean adventure. The prestige of the Communist world would be considerably repaired by UN acceptance of Communist China and the prospect of Communist control of Formosa.

That the campaign has already started on the basis of the bargaining position attained by the Chinese "volunteers", is clear from the Chinese "peace proposals" leaked by the Polish UN delegate, by the Soviet resolution of the Lie memorandum 2 and by Vyshinsky's most recent speech. We may expect the arrival of the Communist delegation on November 24 to step up this political campaign.

There is reason to suspect that the Soviets and Chinese may win considerable support for the concessions they will demand. Not only the UN members, such as the UK and India, who have recognized Communist China, but many others who view with alarm the dangers of a Korean operation involving hostilities with China, would welcome a cessation of hostilities and the establishment of a buffer zone at what they would consider the comparatively cheap price of ³ Reference is to Mr. Vyshinsky's statement before the General Assembly on November 18 in debate on Mr. Lie's 20-Year Peace Program; see U.N. document A/PV.309.

Reports had recently appeared in the press that the Chinese Communists might be willing to withdraw from Korea in return for creation of a buffer zone controlled by North Korea south of the Manchurian border, withdrawal of the U.S. Seventh Fleet from the Formosa Straits, withdrawal of U.S. recognition from the Republic of China, and a declaration by the United States that no more aid would be extended to the Chinese Nationalists. (See Royal Institute of International Affairs, Survey of International Affairs, 1949–1950, p. 514.)

² Reference is to a Soviet draft resolution pertaining to Mr. Lie's 20-year Peace Program proposed during debate in the U.N. General Assembly. deserting the Chinese Nationalist regime. The Soviets and Chinese Communists may be expected to exploit differences between our friends and ourselves and to keep up military resistance and guerrilla operations on a sufficient scale to give them continued bargaining power.

At some point we may face a decision between continuing an expensive operation in Korea with dwindling UN support or trying to achieve some semblance of a termination of hostilities by tacitly permitting Chinese Communist entry into the UN. The implications of such a decision, apart from domestic political ones, extend to our whole position in Asia and obviously and particularly to the disposition of Formosa.

It would seem, therefore, that, in addition to considering other alternatives of policy in Korea, we should as a matter of urgency analyze for ourselves the factors which must be considered in any political settlement of the type explored above and must attempt to discover what course would best serve the interests of the United States.

[Washington,] November 20, 1950.

Participants:

Dr. John M. Chang, Korean Ambassador Mr. Dean Rusk, Assistant Secretary, FE

Mr. Arthur B. Emmons, 3rd, Officer in Charge of Korean Affairs, NA

The Korean Ambassador, Dr. John M. Chang, called on Mr. Rusk by appointment at four o'clock this afternoon. Dr. Chang stated that he had just come down from New York and wished to pay his respects to Mr. Rusk and to discuss the latest developments in Korea.

Mr. Rusk asked Dr. Chang what the views of his Government were toward Chinese Communist intervention in Korea. The Ambassador stated that he personally was somewhat out of contact with the situation, although he had recently received the impression from Seoul that his Government did not believe the Chinese were necessarily acting as free agents in intervening in Korea, that the Soviet Union was undoubtedly influencing them to do so and that his Government did not believe that the Chinese would go all out in a war against the West on the Korean question. He thought that intervention by the Chinese Communists more probably represented an effort on their part to test the resolve and determination of the UN in carrying out its objectives in Korea, and that the proper approach by the UN should be one of stiff and unwavering action against them as long as the Chinese Communists remained on Korean soil. Mr. Rusk remarked that Chinese intentions in Korea might become clearer during the next few days with the progress of military operations.

Mr. Rusk then asked the Ambassador's opinion as to whether control over the Supong dam on the Yalu River might have influenced the Chinese to intervene. The Ambassador thought that this might be a possible factor. He went on to add, however, that his Government would insist that all of the power generated at the dam was Korean by virtue of the fact that the generating stations were on Korean soil, that the dam had been built by Korean labor under the Japanese and that, as former Japanese property, it now belonged to the Koreans. The Ambassador mentioned the possibility that some of the power generated might be reaching Russian installations and that this might be an influence in Sino-Soviet relations in connection with Korea.

The Ambassador then mentioned the fact that he was greatly preoccupied over his treatment at the hands of American correspondents who were consistently bedeviling him in an effort to obtain opinions on any and every subject related to Korea and frequently attempted to trip him up. He added that his Government was greatly disturbed over what he called a "smear campaign" against it in the press and stated that the correspondents who interviewed him were very sharp individuals against whom he had constantly to be on his guard. Mr. Rusk remarked that these tactics were common practice with certain elements of the press in an effort to probe for answers which would make news and that the State Department also was faced with the same problem.

The Ambassador referred to a proposal for a so-called buffer state or zone along the Sino-Korean frontier and asked Mr. Rusk where this idea had originated. Mr. Rusk replied that it appeared first to have been broached, at least in the press, in England and that undoubtedly in trying to analyze the various motives that might be impelling the Chinese Communists to intervene, perhaps the objective of a buffer zone might have been considered as a possible motive and had thus become the subject of discussion. The Ambassador was insistent that insofar as his Government was concerned it would be unwilling to accept the principle of a buffer zone at the expense of Korean territory, adding that since the Chinese were the aggressors in this instance, it should not be Korean interests that should be sacrificed. He reiterated that the UN should be uncompromising in its attitude toward the various Communist elements in Korea and should drive them from Korean soil without any thought of concessions.

Mr. Rusk asked the Ambassador if he had been in touch with the Indian Delegation in New York, to which the Ambassador replied that in the past he had had several fairly lengthy conversations with Sir Benegal Rau. He said that Rau had given him to understand that the Indians were in sympathy with the ROK, but had indicated to him that one of the considerations in the Indian attitude towards the conflict in Korea was that further destruction and bloodshed should be avoided, citing the instance of Burma; the Burmese had been left to their own resources in rebuilding what had been destroyed. The Ambassador added that he had told Rau that even if his home were destroyed he, as a Korean, would still have favored an all-out attack against the North Koreans since no one could live with the Communists. He said that Rau did not appear particularly impressed by this argument and that he had seen very little of him since that conversation. The Ambassador commented that he was keeping in close touch with the American Delegation at the UN, particularly with Mr. Allison and Senator Dulles, and that it had been very helpful to have Ambassador Muccio here recently. The Ambassador added that he had received a letter from President Rhee praising Ambassador Muccio's efforts on behalf of Korea in the highest terms and that this was rather unusual since President Rhee was generally reserved in such comment.

Mr. Rusk then asked for the Ambassador's views on the problem of guerrilla activities in Korea. Dr. Chang replied that the ROK recognized the guerrilla problem as a serious one and agreed with Mr. Rusk's comment that action against the guerrillas would probably have to be conducted largely by the Koreans themselves since they were best suited to this type of operation. The Ambassador raised the question of the six-power resolution on Korea now under consideration in the GA and said that it was his feeling that the resolution was not strong enough in view of the fact that it did not threaten the Chinese Communists with reprisals if they did not withdraw from Korea. He felt that a paragraph should be added to the present resolution which would provide a threat of reprisals in case of non-compliance by the Chinese Communists. Mr. Rusk pointed out that if such a paragraph were added the necessary votes in support of the resolution would probably not be forthcoming in the GA, and suggested that the Chinese were already getting retaliation right now in North Korea through the active military action which was proceeding against them.

The Ambassador expressed the hope that the ROK would be given a voice in any peace treaty which might be concluded with Japan. (At this point Mr. Rusk, who had an appointment with the Secretary, excused himself and left and the conversation continued with Mr. Emmons.)

The Ambassador again reverted to his difficulties with the press and pointed out that he was frequently misquoted or that his remarks were twisted to put himself or his Government in a bad light publicly and hoped that the Department realized his difficulties. Mr. Emmons assured him that the Department knew of his sincerity and that it also appreciated the problem with which he found himself faced. The Ambassador requested that any news articles or other published statements which might be attributed to him and which could be considered embarrassing be called to his attention because he was endeavoring, in every way, to avoid such embarrassment either to his Government or to the United States.

Dr. Chang stated that he had received word from Seoul that the arrival of badly needed civilian relief supplies, such as clothing and blankets, was being delayed and that many civilians were beginning to suffer extremely as a result of the onset of winter conditions. He hoped that the Department would do everything possible to expedite the arrival of these badly-needed relief supplies.

As the Ambassador was leaving, he again reiterated the concern of his Government over any possibility that a buffer zone might be established along the Sino-Korean frontier and hoped that the Department was not considering supporting such an idea, to which his Government was unalterably opposed. Mr. Emmons replied that the Department appreciated his frank statement of the position of his Government in this regard and that as far as he knew no commitment had been made along these lines, although he pointed out that naturally the Department must give consideration to every aspect of the numerous and complex problems which had come up as a result of the UN action in Korea.

Memorandum by Mr. Lucius D. Battle, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State

[Washington,] November 21, 1950.

At a meeting last night in the Secretary's office, he discussed in some detail the current situation in Korea and analyzed the problem along the following lines. He said there were four parts of this analysis:

(1) We should see whether General MacArthur has been told very clearly what to do and whether this is within his capabilities.

(2) We should examine the effect of various courses on the probability of bringing on general hostilities and war.

(3) What is the area of political adjustment and what are the pluses and minuses with regard to them.

(4) What is the effect of the general military posture of the United States and does this require change in policies.

With regard to (1) above, the Secretary said there was a possibility of some confusion in General MacArthur's mind because he has a straight military directive from the Joint Chiefs of Staff and also has general orders sent from the United Nations. On a straight military basis, he was told to pursue the enemy forces north of the 38th and destroy them as a military force. If the Chinese appeared, he was to continue the mission until it was evident he could not succeed. The Secretary felt that no one should change this part of the directive until General MacArthur had had a chance to "probe" the situation. The Secretary said that the civil affairs directive may have affected General MacArthur's interpretation of the military directive. He referred particularly to that portion on occupation. He said that the civil affairs directive does confuse and does not take into consideration the contingency of the Chinese communists coming in, as does the military directive. The Secretary said we must talk to the Joint Chiefs of Staff about this and clear up any misunderstanding, if one exists. We must point out that we are not interested in "real estate" but in an armv.

With regard to (2) above, we are unable to answer this question until after General MacArthur has had a chance to "probe". There are several things which bear on the question. Sir Oliver Franks mentioned to the Secretary vesterday that the entire history of this part of the world indicates a concern over Korea as an entrance to Manchuria. Sir Oliver had mentioned that the Russians, the Japanese, and the British had all had this concept. If this is true, the Secretary said this led to some understanding of the concern which Russia and the Chinese communists might have over the use of Korea as a main highway. He said that he doubted that the communists believed that the United States would use Korea in that way but that their fear may relate to propaganda on the rearming of Japan. The Secretary said this might lead you to believe that there is more sensitivity here than the intelligence reports seem to indicate. He said this sensitivity had some bearing on the immediate situation but more on the longrange situation. If General MacArthur is successful in defeating the Chinese and driving them across the river, the situation might ease and he could let the Republic of Korea take over the border areas. If the Chinese were badly licked, it might reduce the chance of general war. However Chinese communist forces cannot be destroyed in Korea. If, on the other hand, strong resistance is met and we find that there is inevitably to be a long struggle, we must turn again to the field of negotiation and the sensitivity becomes even more important.

With regard to (3) above, this will take time. It will not be done quickly. If resistance is strong, the idea of a negotiated settlement and a quick withdrawal is impossible. We must have forces either in Korea or in Japan for some time on the assumption that the Chinese communists could continue to cause trouble. The idea of a de-militarized zone is merely another way of saying that the Chinese communists will occupy that territory. The zone, nevertheless, has certain advantages in that it will permit a cooling down of the situation. It recognizes that there will be a dangerous frontier there for some time to come.

With regard to (4) above, in our judgment the maintenance of stability and peace requires that we be in the Far East longer with more forces than we had expected. This will not necessarily mean "forever" but probably for a rather long time. We cannot base our military plan on a Christmas withdrawal as we are under far too much pressure. This brings us to Mr. Harriman's point as set forth in the 9:30 meeting yesterday about the need for getting more men. The conclusion we come to is that we need to get more men under arms faster than had been anticipated.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk) to Colonel Marshall S. Carter, Executive to the Secretary of Defense

Washington, November 21, 1950.

Colonel Carter: At the meeting this afternoon Secretary Acheson expects to discuss informally the way in which our present problem in Korea shapes up as he sees it. He will not be speaking from a formal memorandum covering the subject of his remarks.

In conclusion, Secretary Acheson will suggest to the Secretary of Defense and the JCS certain points which represent our broad political objectives in Korea in the present situation. These points are listed in the attached paper. They are intended to be suggestive and are, of course, subject to further consideration. Secretary Acheson will raise with the Secretary of Defense whether it might be desirable for the JCS to consider these points and to determine what bearing they might have upon the course of our military operations in Korea and, specifically, whether General MacArthur's present directives should be expanded or modified.

List of Points Prepared by the Secretary of State for Discussion With the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff

- 1. To permit UNCURK to enter North Korean provinces as soon as the security situation in each province would permit UNCURK to carry out its political functions under the October 7 Resolution of the General Assembly looking toward the unification of the country.
- 2. To provide adequate security arrangements for provinces in which UNCURK is operating in order to prevent hostile attack or large-scale guerrilla disorder from blocking UNCURK's functions.
- 3. To support UN and US political action directed toward the withdrawal of the Chinese from Korea, and the surrender of North Korean remnants by military operations against enemy forces remaining in North Korea.
 - 4. To conserve UN, and particularly US, manpower.
- 5. To establish as soon as possible ROK forces in position to take over all military responsibility for Korea, with first priority on antiguerrilla operations and security missions along the northern frontiers.
- 6. To restrict the fighting to Korea; specifically, to avoid being drawn by the Korean situation into major hostilities against Communist China.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador at Large (Jessup)

[Washington,] November 21, 1950.

Subject: Situation in Korea

(Notes on meeting in Pentagon, 2:30 pm)

Participants: Secretary Marshall Mr. Lovett

Admiral Sherman Mr. Pace

Mr. Harriman
General Bradley
Mr. Rusk
General Collins
Mr. Matthews

General Vandenberg Mr. Jessup

Secretary Acheson outlined the situation in accordance with the memorandum which had been prepared.

Mr. Loverr said they had received nothing from General MacArthur to indicate he could not accomplish his mission. He inquired about the attitude of other members of the UN and whether we could count on their continuing support.

Secretary Acheson and Mr. Rusk pointed out the anxiety which other friendly members of the UN felt about our becoming more deeply involved perhaps finally in war with Communist China.

General Marshall expressed satisfaction that Mr. Acheson had stated his belief that General MacArthur should push forward with the planned offensive. He expressed some doubt about the establishment of the zone and assumed that if one were established south of the River another would have to be established to the north. If there were a UN Commission in the zone it would have to have military protection. He preferred to consider first the political action based on the premise that General MacArthur will succeed in his pending military offensive. The time for making political proposals would be after MacArthur had had such a success.

Secretary Acheson pointed to the possibility that there might be partial success without either complete success or failure. He noted that we had discouraged the UK from pressing its proposal for a zone. He noted the difficulty of securing agreement on a demilitarized zone on both sides of the border. The zone on the south side only would be better than continuing the war but we would want to be sure that the zone was not being used for the build-up of further Chinese forces.

Mr. Loverr raised the question whether instead of negotiating for a zone it would not be better as a matter of fact if General MacArthur withdrew to a defensible line after pressing his offensive forward successfully to the River.

Secretary Acheson stressed the need for finding a way of terminating the Chinese intervention in the war and also stressed the sensitive area of the northeast province from the Soviet point of view. From the point of view of our partners in the UN, it is desirable to find some kind of an agreement and we are searching for something which would be useful instead of harmful to General MacArthur.

General Marshall stressed again the desirability of our making proposals while the UN Forces are advancing instead of waiting until other members of the UN advance proposals which might be unacceptable.

General Vandenberg, at this point and later, emphasized his doubt whether we could find any solution which would satisfy the Chinese Communists, particularly in view of the Secretary's interpretation of their long-range fears.

Secretary Acheson suggested the possibility of some kind of UN assurances which might suffice for the present and give us time. We do not have an interminable responsibility for the relations between Korea and China.

General Bradley, General Collins and General Vandenberg discussed from a military point of view the probable positions which it would be advantageous to hold. They agreed that it would not be useful to hold the line at the River but rather the high ground back of the River.

General Collins pointed out on the map a line, perhaps beginning with a small river which comes in about ten miles east of the mouth of the Yalu and then following the high ground which runs at a distance from ten to twenty-five miles back of the River. This line would be followed up to the main bend in the frontier which has now been reached by our forces, after which the line could come down more or less directly to the Coast.

Admiral Sherman emphasized the sensitivity of the Russians to the region near the Siberian frontier and the desirability of alleviating Russian anxieties lest they in turn put the heat on the Chinese to maintain their intervention.

GENERAL MARSHALL indicated that patrols would probably be utilized in the area beyond the high ground on the River boundary and that ROK forces could be used for this.

General Collins suggested that General MacArthur, after the attack is well launched and is succeeding, could announce that it was his intention only to go forward to destroy the North Korean units and that he intended to hold the high ground overlooking the Yalu with ROK forces, assigning the rest of the UN forces to rear areas while elections were being held and the government being set up.

Mr. Jessur queried whether there was any real difference between the space between the high ground on [and?] the River which the Chiefs had referred to and the zone to which Secretary Acheson had originally referred.

There was then considerable discussion of the relative advantages of an announcement of intention as against a negotiated arrangement.

Mr. Loverr thought it would be weakness if we burdened ourselves with self-imposed limitations without a negotiated settlement.

GENERAL VANDENBERG seemed to share this view.

Secretary Acheson stressed that if we could get the Chinese Communists to take through negotiation what we would do any way (namely, holding the line of the high ground) that would be very satisfactory. One could defer until later the details about administration of the area between the line held and the River. It might be possible to ignore the status of this area.

General Marshall stressed his belief that we should take the initiative in suggesting a solution and not wait until somebody else had proposed something. He seemed to favor the possibility of an announcement of intention by General MacArthur either formally or informally through the press. This could be followed by negotiation.

Mr. Harriman also stressed the sensitivity of the northeast area near the Soviet frontier.

After Secretary Acheson, General Marshall and Mr. Harriman withdrew, the conversation continued without introducing major new elements in the Korean analysis. The Chiefs seemed to agree that if it was decided that it would be desirable to concentrate on the line which General Collins had indicated, some changes in MacArthur's directive would be desirable in order to assure him that he did not need to occupy all of the rest of the territory. They all seemed to be agreed on the importance of leaving the northeast province alone.

There was a brief discussion of what would happen if General Mac-Arthur's offensive bogged down. There was no consensus on what could be done at that time.

Admiral Sherman, supported by General Vandenberg, took the view that we would probably have to tell the Chinese Communists that they must either quit or we would have to hit them in Manchuria.

There seemed to be some agreement with the view that as an expedient through the winter one could hold back of a line which would be the desirable objective and that this would not represent a defeat.

General Collins particularly, but the other Chiefs as well, stressed their concern with the long-range future and the need for getting our divisions out in order to use them elsewhere. This led to some talk about the possible increase of ROK forces.

GENERAL BRADLEY said that MacArthur contemplated leaving ten divisions, of which he now had about eight, and that this reached more or less the limit of ROK capacity.

GENERAL COLLINS, supported by the other Chiefs, strongly rejected the possibility of using units from other countries.

Mr. LOVETT raised the question of the possible use of Chinese Nationalists under such circumstances.

Mr. Rusk suggested that this would have to be weighed from a military point of view against the need for those forces to defend Formosa or their ultimate use against south China.

Mr. Jessur suggested the employment of Chinese Nationalist forces in Korea would almost certainly lead to full involvement in hostilities with the Chinese Communists.

Mr. Rusk pointed out that it was most likely that the British would refuse to have their troops fight along side of Chinese Nationalists against the Chinese Communists and suggested that 10,000 British troops were of more value than 30,000 Chinese in Korea.

Mr. Matthews asked whether this would not indicate that we should find some other way to raise more American troops so that we would be in a position to send the expected divisions to Europe provided we could not draw two divisions from Korea as had been planned. He pointed to the great importance from the aspect of the German situation of getting American forces into Europe as soon as possible.

There was general agreement with this but General Collins said they were clear that they should not attempt to send National Guard units overseas and that they did not have sufficient Regular Army units readily available here.

Secretary Pace said they had been worried about this situation. General Collins said they probably could send one armored division to Europe.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Charles P. Noyes, Adviser on Security Council Affairs, United States Mission at the United Nations

CONFIDENTIAL

[New York,] November 21, 1950.

US/S/1581

Subject: Security Council-Korea

Participants: Mr. Dayal, Indian Delegation 1

Mr. Charles P. Noyes, United States Delegation

Mr. Dayal gave me the attached draft resolution and requested US comments. His thought was that the Security Council might set up a subcommittee consisting of the six non-permanent members during the course of this week before the Chinese Communists arrive. This subcommittee could then continue its work while the Security Council was in the process of holding a series of meetings on the Formosa question. He thought this would have the advantage of finding a way to obtain the Chinese Communists' views and intentions with respect to the Manchurian border and their intervention in Korea. They had refused to appear before the Security Council. He thought they would probably be willing to state their position to this subcommittee in private session. The subcommittee would also have the advantage of avoiding the difficulty of Dr. Tsiang being President of the Council during December. Dayal indicated that, of course, the subcommittee members would remain in close touch with the US Delegation as well as the delegations of the other permanent members. He doubted that they would make proposals which were undesirable from our point of view.

I reacted somewhat sympathetically to the Indian proposal with clear understanding that this was entirely a personal point of view. I broached with him the idea of following the precedent in the Berlin Case rather than having a formal resolution setting up a subcommittee. He thought this was worth considering but was inclined to feel that too much informality in the formation of a subcommittee might result in the Chinese Communists being unwilling to meet with it. He thought the Committee's recommendations would then have less weight. I pointed out that there was no indication that if this subcommittee were set up the Communists would attend its meetings and if they refused this would make the Council look a little silly. If the matter was handled as in the Berlin Case it would be possible to make sure that the Chinese Communists would meet with the Committee before going ahead with the plan. I also pressed the point of view that a formal resolution of the Council might be vetoed by the Russians or that they might try to do so. I suggested that the Russians might not like the idea of the Chinese meeting privately with the six non-permanent members. I also suggested that the Chinese might have some difficulty with the formal subcommittee and that such a proposal might involve a full fledged debate. I asked him what he would do with the present draft resolution. He had not thought of that but thought that it might be sent to the subcommittee or simply left in abevance. I expressed feeling that even if the US would go along with their basic idea, we would probably have some difficulty with subparagraph a. Subparagraph a might well leave the impression that the subcommittee could re-examine the whole question of the nature of a peace settlement in Korea. I thought the Security Council should not take any step which would reopen any of the policy issues settled either in the Security Council or the General Assembly. Dayal was sympathetic to all of these comments and left me with the impression that the Indian Delegation would be willing to make any necessary modifications in their plan or in the text to meet these various points.

I told Dayal I would consult the Delegation and we would let them know the US position on their draft shortly.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant)

SECRET

[Washington,] November 21, 1950.

Subject: Message from Mr. Bevin to Sir Oliver Franks

Participants: Mr. Hubert Graves, Counselor, British Embassy

Mr. Livingston T. Merchant, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs

Mr. Graves came in at 4:30 this afternoon to leave a copy of the attached telegram from Mr. Bevin to Sir Oliver Franks which arrived this afternoon.

At the outset Mr. Graves explained that the opening sentence was misleading in that from it one might infer that the Ambassador had reported that the Secretary had accepted the suggestions which he put to him last Saturday. Mr. Graves assured me that the Embassy had merely reported that the Secretary "accepted the idea" and in that sense had suggested that if Jebb made his statement it should occur late in the debate on the Resolution.

Mr. Graves asked that we inform him as soon as possible of the Secretary's reaction to these suggestions. He also intimated that we would want to look long and hard at the proposal contained in 3(c). Mr. Graves is under the impression that if the Security Council meets tomorrow, the debate on the Resolution might go so fast as to require Jebb to make his statement during the course of the day.

SECRET

MESSAGE FROM MR. BEVIN TO SIR OLIVER FRANKS DATED 21ST NOVEMBER, 1950

I am very glad to learn of Mr. Acheson's favourable response to my suggestion that Sir Gladwyn Jebb should give the broad outline of the suggestions contained in my telegram of Nov. 13 during the course of the debate on the joint resolution.

- 2. As regards tactics, I think there is a lot to be said for deferring Sir G. Jebb's statement until after the Chinese arrive and talks have started with them, provided of course they do not show unwillingness to engage in any talks until such a lead has been given to them. We should therefore do what we can to prevent an early vote on the joint resolution, and, if possible, work for an adjournment of the debate until after the Chinese arrive. If however an early vote becomes unavoidable then I want Jebb to outline our suggestions before that vote is taken.
- 3. Next there is the substance of the statement which Jebb is to make. Though it would be unwise to go into too much detail at an early stage I agree that we must not risk failure through lack of precision. I have therefore in mind that Jebb's statement might:

(a) recount the broad outline of the suggestions given in paragraph 2 of my telegram of Nov 13;

 (\bar{b}) suggest that the responsibility for the administration of the area should be entrusted to the United Nations Commission for Korea, who would set up such temporary de facto administration as they consider suitable and who would consult with representatives of the Central People's Government of China where necessary;

- (c) propose that in order to ensure the effective demilitarisation of the area and the maintenance of law and order the United Nations Commission, assisted by United Nations and Chinese Military observers attached to it, should recruit a small police force preferably from amongst Koreans. 2673. In message to Franks from Bevin today ¹ it appears that Jebb may be instructed to present to UNSC UK proposals for demilitarized zone in Korea along lines Dept infotel Nov 17, 2 AM.²

There apparently was some misunderstanding on part Emb or FonOff as to our views. Problem of winding up present Korean operation is now receiving highest consideration US Govt. Question of some special security arrangement along frontier is one element in such consideration. We have at present no basis for agreement with UK as to nature of any demilitarized zone, method or timing of presentation or negotiation, or other important elements.

You are requested to see Bevin immediately and to urge upon him in the strongest terms our belief that it would be most harmful to have Jebb put forward the UK proposal in the immediate future. Our reasons are: First, that with the offensive about to start in Korea it would be most confusing to General MacArthur and his forces; second, that before the Chi have arrived in New York and with their attitude explored, such a proposal would constitute a commitment which will be regarded by them as a starting point for bargaining for something more; third, that the terms of the proposal will present grave military problems and danger which have not been adequately explored; fourth, until results of the forthcoming offensive are known, it is impossible to ascertain what course can and should safely be adopted. Dept is working with military on this whole matter and believes that situation will be gravely prejudiced by proposing Jebb action at this time.

Since we would be compelled to oppose such proposals if made, we hope that we can avoid a disclosure of divergence between US and UK

Amended Version of Message To Be Delivered by His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, Peking, to Chou En-lai, or to Him Through the Highest Available Official

It is requested that the original version handed to the State Department on the 20th November, be destroyed.

Same as telegram 2487, November 13, 7 p.m., to London, p. 1144.

 $^{^1\,\}mathrm{Not}$ printed, but see footnote 1 to telegram 2984 fron London received at 3:29 p. m. on November 21, p. 1210.

Message begins, It appears from published Chinese official statements that Central People's Government of China may be under some misunderstanding regarding the nature and purposes of current operations of United Nations Forces in Korea.

- 2. These forces are in Korea in pursuance of recommendations made by the Security Council with a view to re-establishment of peace and order.
- 3. At Moscow in December 1945 the Great Powers affirmed the aim of re-establishing Korea as an independent state. Since 1947, when the question first came before the General Assembly, it has constantly been the aim of the United Nations to achieve this end. For this purpose United Nation's Commissions have been in Korea for nearly three years. In furtherance of this, the General Assembly in their resolution of October 7th 1950 again re-affirmed their essential objective of a unified independent and democratic Korea and recommended steps to be taken to accomplish this task.
- 4. It was the hope of His Majesty's Government and of the over-whelming majority of members of the United Nations that North Korean Forces would lay down their arms so that the United Nations could devote their energies to assisting the Korean people in the work of relief and rehabilitation and of establishing a unified State; and so that the United Nations Forces might thereupon withdraw.
- 5. Recent reports show that resistance of North Koreans has been stimulated by support given to them by Chinese Nationals from across the border, and by aircraft based in Chinese territory. His Majesty's Government deeply regret that their efforts to arrange for an exchange of Ambassadors with the Central People's Government of China, and to secure representations of the Central People's Government on various organs of the United Nations, have not so far been successful. Had they been so, much misunderstanding might well have been avoided by mutual exchanges which the establishment of diplomatic relations and representation on international bodies afford.
- 6. I therefore wish to take this opportunity to make known to the Central People's Government of China facts concerning the purposes of the United Nations in Korea, so that no possible room for misunderstanding may exist.
- 7. These are, in brief, that objectives of United Nations in Korea are those publicly stated in various resolutions of United Nations. It is our aim to create a unified independent democratic and peace loving state living in friendship and amity with its neighbours and with the rest of the world. The sole task of the United Nations Forces in Korea is to restore peace and order so that United Nations may proceed to the attainment of these aims. There is therefore no threat to the security of China or of any other state.

- 8. Believing that a free and independent Korea is in the interests of China as of all peace loving countries, His Majesty's Government earnestly desire to prevent any extension of the conflict and deplores any action which may prolong sufferings of the Korea people. His Majesty's Government recognise that the Central People's Government of China are deeply interested in the future of their neighbour Korea and it is hoped that the presence of their representatives in New York will provide an opportunity to make it clear that fulfilment of United Nations aims in Korea will in no way endanger legitimate Chinese interests.
- 9. It is, further, the hope of His Majesty's Government that the Central People's Government of China will accept my assurance that United Nations entertain no hostile intent towards them, and it is our hope that Central People's Government will take steps to cause in violability of the frontier to be respected. His Majesty's Government have joined in sponsoring a resolution now before the Security Council of the United Nations which affirms that it is the policy of United Nations to protect legitimate interests both of Korea and of China in the frontier area, and to hold the frontier inviolate.
- 10. In sending this message to Your Excellency I wish also to assure you that the desire of His Majesty's Government is the maintenance of peace and strengthening of the United Nations Organization which was created for that purpose. It is our sincere hope that representatives of the Central People's Government will play their due part in counsels of Nations so that misunderstandings may be avoided and world peace assured. Ends.

875. For Hickerson and Rusk from Gross. Re Korea—demilitarized zone.

I showed Jebb last night message to Embassy re UK proposals for demilitarized zone in Korea.¹ On basis discussion with Jebb, it appears a misunderstanding arose between Department and UK Government regarding procedures British had in mind for publicly raising question. In response to question, Jebb insisted not only that he had received no instruction from Bevin to raise matter in Security Council at this time, but that Jebb himself realized that in view of vague and formless nature of British proposal at the present moment, there was not much to discuss publicly. Jebb said he, himself, had strongly objected to draft resolution originally outlined by Foreign Office, believing resolution already tabled by six SC members should not be subjected to amendment at this time. I asked for and received assurance from Jebb that latter would under no circumstances raise question in SC without prior notice to me and opportunity for discussion. Jebb professed his sole interest, and he thought this was also true of Bevin, was to keep an eye open to see whether at some appropriate stage question of demilitarized zone might be interjected into the SC proceedings in some appropriate manner.

I received impression that UK idea of what is appropriate may be different from ours. Accordingly, recommend Department advise British Embassy that we understand we have commitment from Jebb for prior discussion before latter raises question in SC.

It appears from what Jebb said that he has been closely tied in with British Embassy and UK Foreign Office on all discussions regarding this matter, despite impression of Department that matter was primarily being handled in Washington between Department and British Embassy. Accordingly we strongly recommend we be kept as closely informed on current developments as possible in whatever manner Department thinks appropriate. [Gross.]

431. Continuing Embtel 412, November 20 and previous on Chinese intervention: contact with Chinese both on ground and in air has been virtually negligible last three days.

During this period, most significant development has been recovery of 27 wounded US POW's. While reports reaching Seoul are incomplete and subject to verification, these 27 appeared in US lines evening of 21st. Reports reaching here indicated they part of 8th [Army?] cavalry regiment which was cut off on November 3. These and other US troops were surrounded, overpowered and made prisoners by Chinese. They were then taken overland to the town of Pyoktong on Yalu River where they were kept in schoolhouse. They were treated well, not even their valuables being taken from them, and they were interrogated, but the questions related mainly to their political ideas and beliefs, not military matters. On evening of November 19, 27 enlisted men were selected and put on trucks. They travelled southward two nights, spending intervening day in village. When within four miles of UN lines, their Chinese captors patted POW's on back and shook hands with them and directed they return to own units. Recovered POW's reported there approximately 300 other US POW's and 600 ROK prisoners at Pyoktong; UN forces have been endeavoring yesterday and today to effect contact through aerial reconnaissance, but thus far efforts not successful.

Recovered POW's now being interrogated carefully and verified report should be available by tomorrow. Chinese motive in releasing US POW's is not clear; however, it is recalled that during Sino-Japanese war, Sino-Communists on occasion released Jap POW's after political indoctrination in hope they could influence Japs against continuing hostilities.

Please convey the following message to Mr. Acheson in reply.

Begins. I have given careful consideration to your message of November 21st ² and I have also had the advantage of a talk with Mr. Holmes who amplified it in response to my enquiries. I was particularly glad to receive his assurance that you had not changed your general attitude to the proposals and that what you had in mind was that I should instruct Sir Gladwyn Jebb as a matter of tactics to delay making them public at the moment.

2. I agree that it is not necessary to make these proposals public immediately. As I said in a recent telegram to Sir Oliver Franks, "I think there is a lot to be said for deferring Sir Gladwyn Jebb's statement until after the Chinese arrive and talks have started with them". I did however make the qualification that if any Delegation on the Security Council should press the resolution to an early vote, I should want Jebb to outline my suggestions before that vote was taken. We should however be able to overcome this without any undue difficulty if both our Delegations act together in New York to ensure that no member of the Council ends the debate precipitately.

- 3. In general I still feel most strongly that my suggestions for a demilitarised area offer the best chance of bringing the conflict to a speedy conclusion and that despite the obvious difficulties involved, we ought to pursue them with the utmost vigour, even if for the moment they are not made public.
- 4. I sincerely hope that you will be able to agree with these views. Meanwhile I am instructing Sir Gladwyn Jebb that he should not make these proposals public until I instruct him as to the exact timing. Ends.

Number returned 27; all members First US Cavalry Division. Men captured night November 2; after capture by Chinese they were led back to central assembly area, some reaching destination in 1 day and others in 8. During this period POW's received hard treatment. On arrival at central assembly point US POW's separated from other UN POW's.

Here POW's were subjected to routine questioning. Most questions were of political nature: Why fight in Korea? Why aiding American imperialists and Wall Street tycoons? Et cetera. Both North Koreans and Chinese participated in interrogations. While at central assembly point POW's were billeted in farm houses. Millet diet provided initially but later rice, fish and other items were furnished. Some personal items were pilfered on trip north but after arrival at central assembly point personal possessions were not molested. POW's left assembly point by truck and were released near UN lines 21st. POW's told of destination only just before release.

POW's unable explain motive for release. However, intelligence officer who questioned POW's got impression decision must have been made on high level.

Mr. Broustra last night told me in the strictest confidence that the French were considerably worried over what General MacArthur might do. I attempted to assure Broustra that the General was under the strictest orders not to violate the frontier in any way.

the various Far Eastern items which will shortly be discussed in the Security Council with the participation of the Chinese Communists. I alluded to the fact that one of the most important reasons that have been adduced in support of the Indian suggestion was that it would eliminate long propaganda speeches having a tendency to exacerbate the situation and pointed out that even should the SC subcommittee partly meet this problem, we were now going to have the Chinese Communists in Committee I of the General Assembly, and it was almost certain that speeches of the kind in question would be made.

I asked the Indians whether they were going ahead with their scheme and whether they intended formally to present it in the SC when it meets. They answered that they did not intend to take such action and that their approach to us had been merely of a sounding out nature. I gathered that their soundings have produced negative replies generally and that they have lost their enthusiasm on this particular project.

Memorandum by the Central Intelligence Agency

SECRET NIE-2/1 [Washington,] 24 November, 1950.

NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE ESTIMATE *

CHINESE COMMUNIST INTERVENTION IN KOREA

The Problem

1. To re-estimate the scale and purpose of Chinese Communist intervention in North Korea.

Conclusions

- 2. The Chinese Communists will simultaneously:
- α . Maintain Chinese-North Korean holding operations in North Korea.
 - b. Maintain or increase their military strength in Manchuria.
- c. Seek to obtain UN withdrawal from Korea by intimidation and diplomatic means.
- 3. In case of failure to obtain UN withdrawal by these means, there will be increasing Chinese intervention in Korea. At a minimum, the Chinese will conduct, on an increasing scale, unacknowledged operations designed to immobilize UN forces in Korea, to subject them to prolonged attrition, and to maintain the semblance of a North Korean state in being. Available evidence is not conclusive as to whether or not the Chinese Communists are as yet committed to a full-scale offensive effort. Eventually they may undertake operations designed to bring about the withdrawal of UN forces from Korea. It is estimated that they do not have the military capability of driving the UN forces from the peninsula, but that they do have the capability of forcing them to withdraw to defensive positions for prolonged and inconclusive operations, which, the Communists might calculate, would lead to eventual UN withdrawal from Korea.

- 4. So long as Chinese intervention continues, the USSR will continue and possibly increase its support to the Chinese by furnishing equipment, planes, technical advisers, and conceivably, "volunteers" as necessary to man the more intricate equipment.
- 5. The risk that a general war will develop already exists. The Soviet rulers may underrate this possibility but they appear to have allowed for it and to feel prepared to cope with it.

Discussion

6. The immediate situation with regard to Chinese intervention in Korea is as follows:

a. The military activity of Chinese troops in Korea so far is not in itself sufficient to demonstrate the existence of a plan for major offensive operations.

b. Military preparations being carried out in Manchuria and elsewhere in China are on a scale sufficient to support major operations of prolonged duration, either offensively in Korea or defensively in Manchuria.

c. Prevailing opinion in China, including opinion in circles close to Party leadership, appears to reflect expectations of hostilities, including expectations of extensive air attacks on Chinese, particularly

d. Neither the Chinese Government nor Chinese propaganda has thus far committed the Chinese Government to a specific line of action in Korea. Discussion of preparation for support of Korea has been only in terms of "volunteer" action.

e. Chinese propagandists for the past three weeks have been carrying on an intensive campaign centering on the charge that US military action in Korea is an attack aimed at China and have called for all-out sacrifices to meet and defeat this threat through "support of the Korean people." A sub-theme of the campaign has been American impotence in a war with China.

f. There has been no suggestion in Chinese propaganda or official statements that the Chinese support of North Korea has a limited objective such as protecting power plants, establishing a buffer zone on the border, or forcing the UN forces back to the 38th Parallel. In fact, none of these objectives has been mentioned by the Chinese. All

Chinese formulations have been in terms of the necessity of bringing about a withdrawal of foreign forces from Korea.

g. The Chinese decision to send a delegation to the UN has been announced in such a manner as to give no conclusive indication of Chinese intentions with regard to Korea. The delegation has been reported to be willing to reach a diplomatic settlement on Korea so long as it is arranged outside the Security Council. No terms have been suggested, and there are as yet no indications that the Chinese would accept less than the withdrawal of foreign troops from Korea.

h. The Soviet press has reported with approval, Chinese support of North Korea. Soviet official statements and Soviet propaganda have identified the struggle of the North Koreans with the Communist cause generally. However, neither source indicated that the USSR is in any way committed to any specific line of action beyond moral support of North Korea and of China.

7. While there is no reliable intelligence regarding the role that the Soviet Union has played in decisions reached by Chinese leaders in regard to Korea, Chinese intervention in Korea furthers Soviet objectives. Although the USSR has made no open committment to support the Chinese, planes drawn from the Soviet air force have been observed in increasing numbers in Manchuria and over Korea. Soviet propaganda has recently called attention to Soviet obligations under the Sino-Soviet treaty to support China in case of aggression by Japan or by any power directly or indirectly associated with Japan. Soviet officials and propaganda have recently stressed alleged US use of Japanese troops in Korea and US preparations to use Japan as a base for aggression.

The Chief of Staff, United States Army (Collins), to the Commander in Chief, United Nations Command (MacArthur)

Washington, 24 November 1950.

OPERATIONAL IMMEDIATE

WAR 97287. From CSUSA sgd Collins. Following from JCS: Other members of United Nations indicate growing concern over the possibilities of bringing on a general conflict should a major clash develop with Chinese Communist forces as a result of your forces advancing squarely against the entire boundary between Korea and Manchuria-USSR. This might not only result in loss of support within United Nations and leave US standing alone but would also involve increased risks of a military nature. Proposals in UN may suggest unwelcome restrictions on your advance to the north since some sentiment exists in UN for establishing a demilitarized zone between your forces and the frontier in the hope of thereby reducing Chinese Communist fear of UN military action against Manchuria and the corresponding sensitivity on the part of the USSR with respect to Vladivostok.

A meeting was held Thursday [Tuesday?] 1 with Secretaries of State and Defense, The Joint Chiefs of Staff and other officials to review the situation developing here.

The consensus of political and military opinion was that there should be no change in your mission, but that immediate action should be taken at top governmental level to formulate a course of action which would permit the establishment of a unified Korea and at the same time reduce risk of more general involvement. On the assumption that your coming attack will be successful, exploratory discussions were had to discover what military measures, which you might in any event wish to take, might lend themselves to political action which would reduce tension with Peiping and the Soviet Union and maintain a solid UN front. The following represent a search for such measures:

1. After advancing to or near the Yalu, you might secure the position which you had thus achieved by holding forces on terrain dominating the approaches from the Valley of the Yalu, from its mouth to approximately the position now held by the 17th Infantry. These forces would be principally ROK troops while other UN forces would be grouped in positions of readiness to insure the holding of the established line. This, of course, would be contingent on the cessation of effective enemy resistance.

2. The above position would be extended to the Japan Sea along a general line approximately east from the 17th Infantry's position with an outpost at Chongjin, which would be the limit for the present of your advance to the northeast.

3. It was thought that the above would not seriously affect the accomplishment of your military mission.

4. UN forces would continue to make every effort to spare all hydro-electric installations in North Korea; destruction of these facilities could result only as incident to resistance from enemy forces.

ties could result only as incident to resistance from enemy forces.
5. UNCURK would, at the appropriate time, enter into negotiations with appropriate representatives to insure an equitable distribution of hydro-electric power.

² General MacArthur flew to Korea on November 24 to witness the launching of the U.N. offensive. For the occasion, he issued a communique which concluded as follows:

¹ See the memorandum of conversation by Mr. Jessup of the meeting which took place on Tuesday, November 21, p. 1204. No record of a meeting on Thursday, November 23 (Thanksgiving Day), has been found.

[&]quot;If successful this [attack] should for all practical purposes end the war, restore peace and unity to Korea, enable the prompt withdrawal of United Nations military forces, and permit the complete assumption by the Korean people and nation of full sovereignty and international equality. It is that for which we fight." (See Appleman, South to the Naktong, North to the Yalu, p. 774 and Hearings, p. 3491.)

- 6. In the event that the Chinese forces did not again attack in force across the Yalu, the conduct of orderly elections in North Korea and the unification of the country could proceed in accordance with UN action.
- 7. Ultimate handling of the extremely sensitive Northeast Province would await further UN procedures.

While it is recognized that from the point of view of the Commander in the field this course of action may leave much to be desired, it is felt that there may be other considerations which must be accepted and that the above procedure would not seriously affect the accomplishment of your military mission. At the same time it might well provide an out for the Chinese Communists to withdraw into Manchuria without loss of face and might lessen the concern of the Russians as to the security of Vladivostok. This concern may be at the root of Russian pressure on the Chinese Communists to intervene in Korea.

The above is suggested as a course of action upon which we would appreciate your comments. If it should prove feasible the second question would arise as to whether and how such a course of action might be announced. This would have to be worked out in such a way as not to impede your operations, but in such a way that the Chinese and Russians could not mistake UN intentions. Your views as to timing and source of such an announcement would be appreciated.

Since there are many political and military implications involved in these ideas and since other nations would be involved, no action along these lines is contemplated until full opportunity has been given for further consideration of your views, final decision by the President, and possibly discussion with certain other governments. information. (The message is contained in the Department's Top Secret cable 2752 of November 24.2) Mr. Rusk added that the UN Commander was anxious to take full advantage of favorable terrain in determining where troops will be halted.

Mr. Rusk stated that we had some intelligence, the reliability of which was unknown, that Chinese communists were cancelling all contracts which called for delivery of goods from Hong Kong later than November 30. This might imply some threat to Hong Kong. He assumed that the British had the same intelligence but would see that it was passed to them. Ambassador Franks said that he did not know of any such intelligence.

Mr. Rusk referred to the fact that the Soviets had published the memorandum regarding the Japanese peace treaty which had been circulated to the members of the FEC.³ This might have been done for strictly propaganda purposes if the Russians did not think negotiations on a peace treaty would lead anywhere. Hence, they might wish to seize the propaganda initiative. A more serious speculation was that the Russians might use it to tie in with their claims that Japanese forces were being used in Korea and might relate it to invoking the Sino-Russian treaty. It seemed useful to trying to figure out why the Russians had acted as they did.

Ambassador Franks said that the British Chargé in Peiping had seen the Deputy Foreign Minister who had listened with great attention to the British message (disclaiming any intention to invade Chinese soil or injure Chinese interests). The Deputy Foreign Minister had asked for the promptest possible delivery of the Chinese text of the British message.

Mr. Rusk said that he had been asked whether the timing of the UN offensive in Korea had had any relation to the arrival of the Chinese communist delegation in New York. He had answered that it had not.

⁴ November 23.

My Dear Mr. Ambassador: I refer to our conversation of Wednesday ⁴ about certain aspects of our Korean policy.

³ Transmitted at 8 p. m. on November 24, p. 1228. ³ The text of the memorandum is printed in the Department of State Bulletin, December 4, 1950, p. 881. For documentation on the Japanese peace treaty, see vol. vi, pp. 1109 ff.

Please assure Mr. Bevin that the objectives of the United Nations Commander in the field are no more and no less than the stated objectives of the United Nations as expressed in its resolutions and that the United States directives to the United Nations Commander have as their purpose nothing more than the attainment of declared United Nations objectives. This assurance is hardly necessary in view of the statement of the President last week on the same subject. The reason why these directives are not made public is that, as Mr. Bevin properly suggests, it would not be in the interest of our common cause to reveal operational military directives during the course of the campaign.

I see no reason why Mr. Bevin cannot assure the House of Commons in terms of the three points contained in paragraph 5 of the message from him which you discussed with me on Wednesday.

I should be most happy to exchange with Mr. Bevin assurances that we shall both, in so far as we are able, seek to concert our policy and our action with respect to Korea and to maintain full and close consultation for that purpose.

For the reasons mentioned by Mr. Bevin, it is not possible for the Security Council to issue detailed military instructions to General MacArthur.

There would be some difficulty in our undertaking a formal commitment not to proceed with our United Nations responsibilities in Korea without the express agreement of individual members of the Security Council in cases where one or another of them may fear that action will be taken which would be beyond the United Nations mandate. The problem may be more theoretical than practical in view of our strong determination to act closely with our friends in accordance with United Nations policy, but a governmental commitment could not be offered on the basis of such a broadly defined concept and without some consideration of the circumstances attending the issue if it should arise.

That it is most unlikely to arise is shown by the great restraint which the United Nations Command has shown during recent weeks under grave provocation and considerable danger, by the constant consultation which this government has carried on with other interested governments, including His Majesty's Government, and by the concerting of views which has been achieved.

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in the United Kingdom

Washington, November 24, 1950—8 p. m.

PRIORITY

2752. Please deliver to Mr. Bevin immediately following personal message from the Secretary:

"I have just received word from our London Embassy that you have agreed not to present the proposal for a demilitarized zone in Korea before the arrival in New York of the Chi Commie Del on the understanding that the six-power res is not to be voted on before then. Since the del arrived today and since there will probably be a meeting of the SC early next week, I wish to lay before you in more detail than was possible in the brief message transmitted through Sir Oliver Franks on Nov 21 why I have the gravest apprehensions regarding the presentation of any such proposal pending such clarification and reconsideration of the situation following Gen MacArthur's offensive. My reasons are as follows:

1. Your proposal contemplates the creation of a very considerable demilitarized zone in NK. Your message of Nov 13 suggested that it would include an area running roughly from Hungnam to Chongiu in the west. Gen MacArthur's forces in the west are taking off from positions which at many points are already north of this line in an endeavor to defeat the enemy and drive them from the proposed demilitarized area in the west. In the east a substantial part of his forces are already considerably to the north of this line both along the coast and inland. Therefore, to make such a proposal at any time in the near future in the UN would be suggesting that we abandon considerable areas and population in the east which had already been brought within UN protection and in the west that we should abandon positions which may be of very considerable military importance to secure, and for which Gen MacArthur's forces would at the very moment be putting forth a great effort under adverse circumstances and undoubtedly heavy losses. The effect of such a proposal on the conduct of military operations upon the morale of the troops, upon the morale of the Koreans and upon public opinion in the US which has furnished the great bulk of the troops would, in my opinion, be disastrous. I do not think that it is possible to fight a war or to maintain the support of the population in Korea under these circumstances.

2. Furthermore, I do not think that it is possible at this time to say that the proposal if adopted would have the benefits claimed for it. The idea of a demilitarized zone is to remove contending forces from it and interpose a buffer between them. Your message of the 13th indicates the gravest doubts as to whether the NK forces can be removed from the demilitarized territory under your proposal. So long as there is no assurance about continued organized NK resistance, I do not see how we can have any real assurance as to how the Chi, even if withdrawn from NK, can be kept from returning under such a proposal as you make. If our own forces are withdrawn from the territory and enemy forces continue to occupy it, all that we would have done under the proposal, as suggested, would be to remove the frontier considerably to the south and hamper operations without resulting benefit.

3. It also seems to me that the effect of the proposal at this time and of this nature upon the Commie Del and its Govt would be unfortunate. I believe it would be taken by them as a starting point for negotiations to obtain something much more favorable to them and as an indication of the greatest weakness upon our part. I think that we will hurt rather than advance the prospect of aiding the situation by negotiation if at this time and in this way we put forward the proposal you suggest.

4. Under these circumstances, it seems to me of the greatest importance that Gen MacArthur's operation be given every support by the UN and by the countries contributing forces. The results of his operation will make much more clear many matters which are now obscure, the strength and effectiveness of the Chi forces, the intention and capacity of the Commie authorities to support and reinforce them, etc. If these matters become clearer, a number of alternatives will emerge, among which we would now not wish finally to choose. By taking present military requirements as a starting point, we may be able to stabilize the political situation by proposals which originate from a position of strength and which will help to end the fighting and achieve the results of the UN on a more permanent basis.

5. I do not think I need to dwell upon the possible divisive effects of making such a proposal under the circumstances, as outlined above. I think it is an understatement to say that the reaction to it in this country at the moment that our troops are making a great effort would be most violent.

6. I think we are all trying to do the same thing—that is, to devise ways in which political action and negotiation help in the most effective way to bring about the end of the fighting and the unification of Korea under circumstances which will amply assure its neighbors that neither the UN nor any of its members have the faintest hostile intention toward them. We are, as you know, working on possible measures which would keep western forces away from direct contact with Chi or Russian forces at the Korean frontier and which would clearly demonstrate that UN forces in Korea have no purposes beyond those set by the UN. I do believe most strongly, however, that the putting forward of any proposal at this particular time would do the greatest damage.

I have given you all my thoughts on this subject because I am deeply conscious of the gravity of the ensuing days and of the far-reaching consequences of any misstep. I shall continue, as I have in the past, to keep in the closest touch with Sir Oliver Franks and through him with you."

Dept. believes it might be useful for you to discuss the general lines of the above with Salisbury and Eden 1 without indicating that you had delivered formal message to Bevin on subject.

885. Re Chinese Communists in SC: Gross called on Bebler to discuss various tactics. Bebler indicated that he sees situation as opportunity for Yugoslavs to have useful contact with CCP representative from point of view of Yugoslav interests.

Jebb had called on him and they agreed Formosan item should be first on SC agenda, since CCP representative unwilling to discuss MacArthur report. However, when Gross suggested as alternative that two items of Formosa and Korea be bracketed for simultaneous debate, Bebler was sympathetic although he did not commit himself. He agreed that bracketing items had certain advantages in that the USSR would have difficulty in objecting, and it would avoid CCP representative being out of order in discussing Korea. He saw advantage from US point of view in having ROK representative seated at the table during entire discussion. However, he feels it likely that whatever happens there may be a sharp issue raised by CCP as a matter of prestige to establish first of all that there are no strings attached to their invitation. He seemed to indicate agreement that Tuesday afternoon would be good time for SC meeting.

Bebler stated in some detail what he proposed to say to CCP representative. He would point out that UN members are obligated to seek peaceful settlement of pending issues and that US as UN member is eager to do so. Also recent GA resolution obligates permanent members to confer and that extends to this issue. Of course someone must initiate and make arrangements for consultation and as SC President Bebler feels that he is appropriate person and that by doing so situation would be avoided after 1 December for Tsiang to control negotiations. He proposes to contact CCP representative today or Saturday and suggest meeting probably at Lake Success. He will point out to them that upon the way they conduct themselves depends whether tension is heightened leading toward war or an agreed settlement can be reached.

In commenting on this line, Gross emphasized that this is not a bilateral dispute between CCP and US but it is a charge by CCP against UN as a whole. Therefore it would be unfortunate if any individual acting as mediator created a contrary impression. As to the US attitude as UN member Gross stated we are entirely willing to discuss any of the issues now in the UN with CCP representative but it would not be correct to say we are eager to do so. Also Bebler should know that with an important military offensive in progress we should do nothing that might hamper in any way its successful conclusion by premature decisions as to the form of consultations. Gross also observed that there will perhaps be other self-appointed mediators, mentioning in this connection the Indians. Bebler commented that he understood US position but wondered whether presence of the Seventh Fleet in the Formosa Straits is not in reality a bilateral issue since no UN action is involved.

Gross referred in passing to the Indians thinking about a resolution creating a subcommittee of six non-permanent members to negotiate with CCP representative. He thought this would be a questionable device which in any case would be vetoed by USSR and by Chinese Nationalist representative. Bebler was sympathetic but stressed importance of perhaps an informal arrangement to make possible centralizing negotiation CCP if Tsiang becomes President. He mentioned precedent of GA President in Greek case. Gross mentioned SC precedent in Berlin case and agreed that it would be desirable for Tsiang to step down as SC President not only on Formosa item but also on Korean item.

It was agreed that Bebler will call us as soon as and if he has seen CCP representative and will be on a standby basis over the week-end.

C-69808. Reurmsg W-97287. The concern underlying the search for the means to confine the spread of the Korean conflict is fully understood and shared here, but it is believed that the suggested approach would not only fail to achieve the desired result but would be provocative of the very consequences we seek to avert.

In the first place from a military standpoint my personal reconnaisance of the Yalu River line yesterday demonstrated conclusively that it would be utterly impossible for us to stop upon commanding terrain south of the river as suggested and there be in a position to hold under effective control its lines of approach to North Korea. The terrain ranging from the lowlands in the west to the rugged central and eastern sectors is not adaptable to such a system of defense were we, for any reason, to sacrifice the natural defense features of the river line itself, features to be found in no other natural defense line in all of Korea. Nor would it be either militarily or politically defensible to yield this natural protective barrier safeguarding the territorial integrity of Korea.

Moreover any failure on our part to prosecute the military campaign through to the achievement of its public and oft repeated objective of destroying all enemy forces south of Korea's northern boundary as essential to the restoration of unity and peace to all of Korea would be fraught with most disastrous consequences. It would be regarded by the Korean people as a betrayal of their sovereign and territorial integrity and of the solemn undertaking the United Nations entered into in their behalf, and by the Chinese and all the other peoples of Asia as weakness reflected from the appearement of Communist aggression. As pointed out in my message C-68572 of 9 November,2 such action as tribute to international lawlessness and aggression would but encourage further international lawlessness and aggression. Furthermore, the political tension existing between the two countries requires that the international boundary be closed to reduce to a minimum lawless border incidents including bandit raids and smuggling and such action could not be effected if there existed a border zone beyond our immediate control.

Study of the Soviet and Peiping propaganda line discloses little to suggest any major concern over the potentiality of United Nations control of the southern banks of the Yalu River. Even what has been said concerning the hydroelectric facilities in North Korea is for the most part a product of British-American speculation, finding little reflection in any Soviet or Chinese utterances. Indeed, our info on these facilities and the disposition abroad of their power output fails to confirm that dependence upon this source of power is a major factor in the basic causes giving rise to the Chinese aggressive moves in Korea. Thus despite the fact that these hydro-electric facilities at Changjun brought under control of the X Corps had been closed down completely for a full month prior to the arrival of our forces with much of the vital machinery and other equip removed and dispersed and are not yet restored to operation, no suggestion of complaint has emanated from Soviet or Chinese sources over the deprivation of power consequent thereto. In view of these factual considerations one is brought to the conclusion that the issue of hydro-electric power rests upon the most tenuous of grounds.

The entry of Chinese Communists into the Korean conflict was a risk we knowingly took at the time we committed our forces. Had they entered at the time we were beleaguered behind our Pusan perimeter beachhead, the hazard would have been far more grave than it is now that we hold the initiative and have a much smaller area within which to interdict their hostile moves. Our forces are committed to seize the entire border area, and indeed in the east have already occupied a sector of the Yalu River with no noticeable political or military Soviet or Chinese reaction. We have repeatedly and publicly made it unmistakably clear that we entertain no aggressive designs whatsoever against any part of Chinese or Soviet territory. It is my plan just as soon as we are able to consolidate positions along the Yalu River to replace as far as possible American Forces with those of the Republic of Korea and publicly announce orders effecting:

(1) The return of American Forces to Japan;

(2) The parole of all prisoners of war to their homes;

(3) The leaving of the unification of Korea and the restoration of the civil processes of government to the people, with the advice and assistance of The United Nations authorities.

I believe that the prompt implementation of this plan as soon as our military objectives have been reached will effectively appeal to reason in the Chinese mind. If it will not, then the resulting situation is not one which might be influenced by bringing to a halt our military measures short of present commitments. By resolutely meeting those commitments and accomplishing our military mission as so often publicly delineated lies best—indeed only—hope that Soviet and Chinese aggressive designs may be checked before these countries are committed to a course from which for political reasons they cannot withdraw.

He stated that he agreed there was nothing to be gained by introducing his proposed resolution at this moment but is obviously preoccupied with his internal political situation (see in this connection Embtel 3043, November 24¹) and anxious to take any positive constructive action which may prove practicable and helpful. He said he hoped our action could be "synchronized" in New York but added jokingly that this did not mean he was promising not to take independent action. Yesterday for first time within week hostile aircraft were active over North Korea. Three Mig jets were observed taking off from Sinuiju Airfield. About 8 o'clock last night a single transport-type enemy aircraft dropped leaflets over Pyongyang. Leaflets were addressed to Pyongyang citizens, told them Chinese and North Korean military forces were meeting success in military operations and invited them to create disruption behind lines. At 8:30 last night hostile fighter strafed Suichon and few minutes later another hostile aircraft dropped a few light bombs on Hongju.

C 69953. The developments resulting from our assault mymts have now assumed a clear definition. All hope of localization of the Korean conflict to enemy forces composed of North Korean troops with alien token elements can now be completely abandoned. The Chinese military forces are committed in North Korea in great and ever increasing strength. No pretext of minor support under the guise of volunteerism or other subterfuge now has the slightest validity. We face an entirely new war. Interrogation of prisoners of war and other intelligence info establish the following enemy order of battle, exclusive of North Korean elements, as reported by commanders in the field: 38, 39, 40, 42, 66, 50 and 20 CCF armies and 6 additional divisions without army identification, comprising an aggregate strength approaching 200,000. The North Korean fragments, approximating 50,000 troops, are to be added to this strength.

The pattern of Chinese strategy is now quite clear. Immediately after the Inchon operation the center of gravity of the Chinese forces was moved northward in China with heavy concentrations of their troops in Manchuria and a surreptitious mymt by night infiltration of their organized forces into North Korea under the protection of the sanctuary of neutrality. After checking the United Nations advance toward the Yalu late in October, following the destruction of the North Korean forces, the Chinese partially broke contact before launching a general offensive in order to build up in overwhelming strength, presumably for a spring offensive. Their ultimate objective was undoubtedly a decisive effort aimed at the complete destruction of all United Nations forces in Korea. At the present moment the freezing of the Yalu River increasingly opens up avenues of reinforcement and supply which it is impossible for our air potential to interdict. It is quite evident that our present strength of force is not sufficient to meet this undeclared war by the Chinese with the inherent advantages which accrue thereby to them. The resulting situation presents an entire new picture which broadens the potentialities to world embracing considerations beyond the sphere of decision by the Theater Commander. This command has done everything humanly possible within its capabilities but is now faced with conditions beyond its control and its strength.

As directed by your JCS 92801 DTG 272240Z Sept. 50, as amplified by your JCS 93709 DTG 092205Z Oct 50, my strategic plan for the immediate future is to pass from the offensive to the defensive with such local adjustments as may be required by a constantly fluid situation.

Memorandum by the Acting Officer in Charge of Korean Affairs (Emmons) to the Deputy Director of the Office of Northeast Asian Affairs (Johnson)

[Washington,] November 28, 1950.

Subject: Steps which might be taken in the light of all-out Chinese Communist intervention in Korea.

Military Action

It is obvious that in the light of new Chinese Communist aggression in Korea and its serious implications as reflected in MacArthur's communiqué of this morning 1 that UN capabilities for carrying out its original objectives of restoring peace and security to the area and, following that, of withdrawing UN forces as quickly as possible, cannot now be carried out except at the cost of all-out war with Communist China. The U.S. cannot now afford this course and its policy under NSC 81/1 2 makes clear that if UN forces are confronted in Korea with Soviet troops no further move should be made to aggravate the situation. All-out Chinese involvement in Korea against the UN forces carries with it a strong implication of Soviet involvement through the Sino-Soviet treaty and present developments could easily lead to the invoking of this treaty.

As a result of the foregoing considerations it now seems evident that U.S. and UN policy in relation to Korea must be carefully and, at the same time, urgently reconsidered. If the original objectives cannot be attained what lesser objectives should be sought? Much will depend upon the ability of the UN forces substantially to hold what has already been taken. Militarily, for instance, if the present line cannot be held, a shorter one running from Sinanju to Hungnam might be maintained. If this is the case, then diplomatic measures should be taken to resolve the question by establishing in Korea north of this line a demilitarized zone from which both Chinese and UN forces would withdraw. Such an arrangement admittedly would be undesirable and would lead to the possibility or even probability of renewed aggression by the North Koreans against the ROK at some future time. The British proposal of a 50 mile neutralized zone south of the Yalu and Tumen rivers would now hold out no hope of acceptance by the Communists at this late date.

² Dated September 9, p. 712.

¹ General MacArthur's Special Communiqué No. 14, issued at 5:25 p. m. Tokyo time (3:25 a. m. EST), reported on the Chinese Communist military offensive in Korea along the general lines of telegram C 69953, received at 4:46 a. m. on November 28, p. 1237; the text of the Communiqué is printed in U.N. document S/1920. It concluded with the following statement:

[&]quot;This situation, repugnant as it may be, poses issues beyond the authority of the United Nations military council—issues which must find their solution within the councils of the United Nations and chancelleries of the world."

If it becomes impossible to hold the line referred to above then successive withdrawals will have to be made as necessity dictates until the 38th parallel is reached. If in turn the 38th parallel line cannot be maintained then every effort should be made to strengthen the ROK forces with what equipment is now in Korea. UN ground forces should be disengaged and withdrawn but air and naval support should continue to be rendered. Consideration might also be given to assisting Chinese Nationalist forces now on Formosa to come to the aid of the ROK. This would include water transportation and naval and air protection of convoys. The Seventh Fleet should be withdrawn and no further inhibitions placed upon actions of the Chinese Nationalists. American and/or other UN garrisons in Japan should be reinforced. Chinese Nationalist forces should forthwith be given a maximum of U.S. military aid.

Political Action

A resolution by the Security Council (after Soviet veto, then by the General Assembly) should be passed, condemning Chinese Communist aggression in Korea. All States should be called upon to refrain from aiding or assisting Communist China in any manner as long as her forces remain in Korea. Sanctions should be considered against any state violating this injunction. The resolution should explain that in order to avoid the spread of war due to Chinese Communist unlawful intervention in Korea in defiance of the UN it has been necessary to stop short of a full achievement of UN objectives in Korea, that in so doing the UN has been guided only by force majeure and through its desire to limit the conflict. Communist China might be called an international outlaw against the peace of the world and treated as an outcast in international relations. The resolution should pledge the continued interest of the UN in a settlement of the Korean problem.

General

Once the military situation has become clearer, immediate and urgent consultations should be had with the various governments contributing armed forces to the UN operations before any of the above steps are undertaken. The unanimity of the UN must be preserved at all costs to meet the test of the future.

Most of the meeting was devoted to a lengthy statement by Ambassador Austin wherein he accused the Chinese Communists of aggression in Korea, outlined United States policy in Korea and Formosa, reviewed the history of Sino-American relations, and asked questions of the Chinese delegate aimed at clarifying the number, organization, and composition of the Chinese volunteers in Korea. He also questioned whether the People's Republic of China was ready to abide by the central paragraph in the six-power draft resolution calling on all states and authorities to refrain from assisting North Korea.

THE PRESIDENT asked Secretary Acheson if he had any comments to make.

Secretary Acheson said he had been on the Hill all day and would rather hear about the military situation first from General Marshall and General Bradley.

General Bradley sketched the military situation on the map. He said that the questions which were now before us involved MacArthur's message that we were now facing a new war and whether a new directive should be issued to him. The JCS think no new directive is needed now although it may be after 48 or 72 hours had elapsed. MacArthur will be taking a defensive position pending UN action. It is desirable to wait for clarification. The country from which the enemy is launching its present attack is extremely mountainous with few roads and they may have transportation difficulties in sustaining it. Perhaps a little later we may wish to issue a new directive as executive agent or secure one from the UN.

There are some 300 aircraft back in Manchuria, including 200 twoengine bombers. They could strike a severe blow. The JCS do not think we should violate the border pending developments. Our airfields, both in Korea and Japan, are crowded and we are depending heavily on an airlift. Our fields are therefore very vulnerable. So are our road convoys. One enemy plane dropped a few bombs on one field and damaged six of our planes. THE PRESIDENT asked whether we had any defense against such air attacks.

General Vandenberg said not without bombing their airfields or without pulling back some of our planes to Japan to get them out of danger.

GENERAL MARSHALL referred to the meeting this morning of their Policy Committee which was attended by Dean Rusk and Averell Harriman. He had asked each of the three secretaries and the JCS to state their individual views. He had then asked the three secretaries and the JCS separately to formulate their views. He read a memorandum 1 prepared by the three secretaries. This memorandum proceeds on the following assumptions. We are engaged with other members of the UN in suppressing a Korean aggression. We are now faced by a new Chinese aggression. We should act through the UN and not individually. It is possible to hold a line. While the Chinese Communist action is dictated in large measure by the Politburo we should not publicly hold the USSR responsible now. Our purposes are to fulfill our UN obligations but not to become individually or as a member of the UN involved in general war in China with the Chinese Communists. To do this would be to fall into a carefully laid Russian trap. We should use all available political, economic and psychological action to limit the war. Strong military support is needed for the localized action. We should not go into Chinese Communist territory and we should not use Chinese Nationalist forces. To do either of these things would increase the danger of war with the Chinese Communists. We need a more rapid build-up in the West. We should increase the number of UN troops, other than US and have them available in Korea regardless of whether we have to pay for them. We should press for the second supplemental 1951 appropriation at once and give Congress notice we will need more. The 1952 budget should be revised. We should accelerate instead of decelerate, accelerating production and production facilities as a matter of special emphasis.

General Marshall made comments on this paper as follows: There should be no cuts in the estimates of personnel and materiel needed. In the next two weeks we should work in the UN and maintain our position in Korea. We should not now try to change our budgetary figures. We should find a way to go along with the UN approach without involving injury to our troops. A very difficult question is the danger of Chinese aerial bombardment to which our troops are not accustomed. This would pose a most difficult question. The question on how to line up our allies in the UN is for the State Department. He stressed once more the view of the three secretaries that we should not get into war with the Chinese Communists. He suggested that the general attitude in the UN would probably not complicate our decision in that respect.

General Bradley said we should not call out more National Guard or other units at this time. There are no more ground troops which we could now send. MacArthur has enough there and Navy. The situation may change in one or two weeks. The JCS feel just as strongly as the three secretaries that we should not be pulled into a war with the Chinese. Regarding extra UN forces, the JCS want them to be militarily effective if possible but could take them on a less satisfactory basis if the State Department thinks this is desirable for political reasons.

GENERAL MARSHALL referred to the situation in the Northeast part of Korea. One question was how the gap in the line could be filled in at its eastern end. This is a problem for General MacArthur. GENERAL MARSHALL assumes that he will withdraw his advanced forces. It is a problem to be considered here in Washington regarding involvement in a general conflict with the Chinese Communists but it would not be helpful to interfere in MacArthur's operations on the spot.

SECRETARY PACE spoke of the status of replacements in the United States. The only unit which would be available is the 82nd Airborne. The National Guard would not be ready until March 15th. Filter replacements will not be available until after January. The first new divisions could be ready to move March 1st which would give four months training of selectees.

THE VICE PRESIDENT spoke of General MacArthur's statement about getting the troops home by Christmas.² He wanted to know whether he did make the statement and, if so, did he know what was pending and if he did know, why did he make it.

THE PRESIDENT said that MacArthur did make the statement and the Vice President would have to draw his own conclusions as to why.

THE VICE PRESIDENT said that he couldn't have known about the Chinese Communists if he made the statement in good faith. He couldn't have gotten the boys home anyway.

THE PRESIDENT inquired whether anyone could help supply an answer to the Vice President's questions.

SECRETARY PACE said he understood General MacArthur officially denied the statement.

Mr. Loverr said that they had the transcript of his statement but the General said there had been some misinterpretation of it. The statement was however made.

² See Whitney, MacArthur, p. 416.

GENERAL BRADLEY suggested that General MacArthur might have had in mind making the statement for the effect it would have on the Chinese in order to make it clear to them that we would get out after the attack.

THE PRESIDENT said we could not cause the Commanding General in the field to lose face before the enemy. Loads of questions will be asked about this and he was glad that the Vice President had brought it up.

THE VICE PRESIDENT said that the statement was causing much speculation as to whether it was a hoax. He said, of course, the discussion of this matter here was strictly confidential in the room. He had great respect for General MacArthur's ability.

General Bradley said that General MacArthur had full confidence in the success of his attack. He had no inkling of the strength of the concentration in the high mountains on the right of his position. He had not supposed that so strong a force could be mounted from that area. It certainly was no hoax.

General Marshall said we would regard the statement as an embarrassment which we must get around in some manner. The present report of 200,000 Chinese was very much in excess of previous estimates but they are skillful in concealing themselves in that terrain. He referred to the meeting with the Secretary of State a few days ago in which, while he was present, they discussed plans on the basis of the assumption that General MacArthur would be successful. At that time he had considered it much harder to decide what should be done if he was not successful. The answer was not clear to him.

THE VICE PRESIDENT said that it was possible that they might put in even more men than now estimated. The prospect was very gloomy unless we could get more men in.

General Marshall said that this was a gloomy possibility and that he did not know the answer. We want to avoid getting sewed up in Korea and how could we get out with honor.

THE VICE PRESIDENT pointed to the difference between war with the Chinese Communists and the problem of holding Korea.

GENERAL BRADLEY read the directive to MacArthur based on NSC 81/2, explaining that this authorized him under the present circumstances to go on the defensive.

GENERAL COLLINS said we can get individual replacements after January 1 but no new units until March 1. A rather steady flow of replacements to meet losses could begin after the first of the year. These would fill the shortage in present units now in Korea which are short by thirty or forty percent. He thought that we could hold the line in the narrow neck unless the Tenth Corps is cut off.

THE PRESIDENT said he thought we could hold the line.

GENERAL BEDELL SMITH said that we had known for some time the size of the Chinese Communists forces in Manchuria which totalled about 500,000 men.

SECRETARY ACHESON said we were much closer to the danger of general war. He pointed out the need for understanding that there had always been a Chinese Communist involvement in Korea. There had been a progressive uncloaking of the extent of this involvement until now there was a fullscale attack. Behind this there was always the Soviet Union which was a more somber consideration. We must consider Korea not in isolation but in the world-wide problem of confronting the Soviet Union as an antagonist. There were certain objectives to reach and dangers to avoid. He thought the memorandum of the three secretaries and the comments by General Marshall were very wise. Our political purpose must including going forward in the UN to uncloak the Chinese Communist aggression. He agreed entirely that we would not, at this time, say the USSR is responsible because we could not do anything about following such a charge against the Soviet Union due to the attitude of our allies. It is clear, however, that we should charge the Chinese Communists with aggression. We should see what pressures we can put on the Chinese Communists to make life harder for them. He agreed with the three secretaries that it was not advantageous to involve the use of the Chinese Nationalists on Formosa. He had been asked about this on the Hill today. This question raised the problem of who would take them to China and who would bring them back if they ran into trouble.

General MacArthur has a new situation. We should be sure he understands his directive. He seems to have thought he had to occupy the northeast part of Korea. Perhaps we should tell him that from the UN and US point of view he need not occupy that territory. We want to achieve a termination of this involvement. We can't defeat the Chinese in Korea; they can put in more than we can. We should give very, very careful thought regarding air action in Manchuria. If this is essential to save our troops, it must be done. If we enter Manchuria it would be very hard to stop and very easy to extend the conflict. If we were successful in Manchuria, the Russians would probably enter to aid their Chinese ally without considering it war with us. We would get more deeply involved. One imperative step is to find a line that we can hold, and hold it. This would help meet the views of our allies and show them we are not aggressive and we await the next Chinese Communist move. We should know what line MacArthur thinks he can hold and we should press forward in the UN. We might consider the question of a zone in North Korea. We should not say that we must push forward. We should hold the line and turn it over to the ROK as soon as can. Outside of Korea we must press faster to build our strength. We must liquidate the French objection to the development of the European Army.

Secretary Snyder referred to the ticker item that the French Cabinet had just resigned.

Mr. Matthews reported that President Auriol had refused to accept Plevin's resignation.

Secretary Snyder said that on the fiscal side everything was arranged for any action that was necessary.

Mr. Harriman called attention to the recent article in Pravda quoting from various papers in the United States. He urged that the President strongly assert his leadership in the United States and that the United States assert its leadership in the United Nations. He also urged that we move as rapidly as possible in our plans under the NAT.

THE PRESIDENT referred to the campaign of vilification and character assassination which has been going on in this country and that would constitute the best asset of the Soviet Union. He pointed out that he had made this remark at Key West some months ago. During the recent campaign, the Hearst, McCormick and other papers had fed that fight. We are confronted by certain facts and conditions and must meet them. He will meet them. The question was just how this should be done. In regard to sending a special message to Congress, he thought this was not desirable now. He did not think it desirable to have an individual approach to the problem pending UN action. He should, however, meet the campaign of vilification and lies in the United States.

THE VICE PRESIDENT said the situation was the same as he had found on his campaign tour. It was a diabolical attempt to poison the minds of the American people. We are in for a lot of trouble.

THE PRESIDENT repeated that we must meet it. He said that some would rather see the country go down than for the Administration to succeed. This was not true of all but it was of some.

Mr. Harriman said he was not sure that we will be able to rally our friends in the UN and in the NATO until the President asserts his leadership here in the United States.

THE PRESIDENT said that was a point which should be discussed.

Mr. Symington said the most important thing was to get out of Korea as fast as possible. He said that labor and industry in this country don't know how serious the situation is. It was important for us to get strong as fast as we can even though we have to give up such things as refrigerators and television.

GENERAL BEDELL SMITH said the CIA did not wish to make any revision now in its intelligence estimate.

Mr. Finletter said that we had had a surprise on the ground and might get it in the air. Both Chinese and Russian units are available. A Chinese air attack alone would be very serious.

GENERAL MARSHALL said the MacArthur offensive was necessary in order to find out what the Communists were up to. Now we know.

THE VICE PRESIDENT inquired whether there were any indications that the Chinese were willing to consider a peaceful settlement.

SECRETARY ACHESON said there is no indication now that any arrangement could be made. He thought it would be disastrous for us simply to pull out of Korea at this stage.

Admiral Sherman said if there is an air attack from across the border we must hit back or we cannot stay there.

THE PRESIDENT said he agreed and that we will meet that when it comes.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN said we must face the fact that we cannot stay in the neck of Korea if we are under air attack.

THE PRESIDENT asked what his estimate was about possible attacks on the Navy in Korean waters.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN said they had 78 submarines in that vicinity. Mr. Jessup noted the possibility that the Indian Delegation in the UN or some other delegation might come forward with a proposal for a cease-fire. If such a cease-fire proposal does not prevent the re-grouping of our forces, he wondered whether from the military point of view it would not be advantageous for us to agree.

THE PRESIDENT said that that should be settled with the military.

(After the meeting General Collins expressed some doubt about such a cease-fire plan but said he wanted to think about it.)

Mr. Lovett said he wished to speak about NSC 68 and the contemplated build-up. He said this might be the last warning for an increase of the rate of preparation and readiness. He thought the approach to the 1952 budget should be that we must get the most in the fastest way even if this results in "peaking" and dropping back later. He didn't want to do this but we may have to.

THE VICE PRESIDENT said he should get what he needs now.

THE PRESIDENT said the Vice President would sit up and take notice when he saw the proposals which were going to be submitted. They were getting these in shape.

THE VICE PRESIDENT said that it ought to be ready; they had over two months to work on it since Congress adjourned.

⁴The NSC 68 series dealt with US Programs and Objectives Relating to National Security; documentation is scheduled for publication in volume 1.

THE PRESIDENT said they actually had only two weeks for various reasons which he would not go into.

Mr. Lay inquired whether the President wished to have any decisions recorded and THE PRESIDENT said no.

Editorial Note

The United Nations Security Council held its second meeting on November 28 from 3 to 6:50 p.m.; for the record, see U.N. document S/PV.527. Virtually the entire meeting was devoted to a lengthy statement by the delegate of the People's Republic of China, General Wu Hsiu-chuan, condemning United States policies in Taiwan and Korea. In conclusion, the Chinese delegate submitted the following draft resolution (S/1921), which was subsequently sponsored by the Soviet Union:

"The Security Council,

"Recognizing that the invasion and occupation of Taiwan by the armed forces of the Government of the United States of America constitute open and direct aggression against Chinese territory;

"Recognizing that the armed aggression against Chinese territory and the armed intervention in Korea by the armed forces of the Government of the United States of America have shattered peace and security in Asia and violated the United Nations Charter and international agreements,

"Condemns the Government of the United States of America for its criminal acts of armed aggression against the Chinese territory of Taiwan, and armed intervention in Korea;

"Resolves to demand the complete withdrawal by the Government of the United States of America of its forces of armed aggression from Taiwan, in order that peace and security in the Pacific and in Asia may be ensured; and further

"Resolves to demand the withdrawal from Korea of the armed forces of the United States of America and all other countries and to leave the people of North and South Korea to settle the domestic affairs of Korea themselves, so that a peaceful solution of the Korean question may be achieved."

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in the United Kingdom

SECRET NIACT WASHINGTON, November 28, 1950—8 p. m. 2810. Please express appreciation to Mr. Bevin for his inquiry Tues afternoon (urtel 3117 Nov 28) and give him following message. I recognize the difficulties which Mr. Bevin will face in Parliament tomorrow and that these difficulties are not lessened by the lack of firm and final information on the immediate situation in Korea.

There is no doubt but that the Chi Commies have intervened with very large forces in an open and flagrant way in the fighting in Korea. There is also little chance that this intervention could have such limited purposes as securing their frontier, protecting hydro-electric installations or of providing token assistance to NK forces.

An important factor in the present situation is the unanimous and considered judgment of our JCS, supported by information from field commanders, that the present Chi offensive has been planned and staged over a considerable period of time. What in fact has happened is that two offensives ran into each other. This point is important not only because it removes any question that the Chi were merely reacting to the UN offensive but also because it clearly reveals an intention to attempt to destroy UN forces in NK. The Chi offensive was launched across a broad front, was well coordinated, had great depth and penetrating power, and involved a mass of troops in an operation which must, for military reasons, have been in motion for several days.

As Mr. Bevin knows, the timing of the attempted UN offensive was based on military factors and was not related to the arrival of the Chi Commie Del at Lake Success. There is every possibility, of course, that the Chi offensive was timed with such arrival in order to get maximum political effect.

The military position in Korea will continue to be confused for at least another day or two. We are sorely disappointed by the present situation. One of the purposes of our offensive was to clarify the situation. The lack of contact between the opposing forces for a period of two weeks was a serious factor in the surprise which we suffered as to the scale and disposition of enemy forces.

The present situation is serious but not in any sense disastrous. Two ROK divisions have suffered very heavily but the remainder of the UN forces are in good shape. The breakthrough obviously imposes problems of position and redeployment upon the UN Command. For Mr. Bevin's info, the present purpose of the Command is to stabilize the position along the general line of the narrow waist in NK.

In connection with the increased gravity of the position in Korea, you should reiterate the assurances I gave (Deptel 2776 Nov 27)¹ re the three questions raised by Mr. Bevin through Amb Franks. It is our purpose to deal with this massive and increasingly overt Chi aggression through the UN and not unilaterally. In arriving at our position, we will continue to consult closely with the UK and bear in mind the special interest of those nations represented by combat forces in Korea.

The scale of the Chi offensive makes it impossible to pretend that this is not an openly aggressive move by the Peiping regime. Amb Austin has stated this view in the SC. Please tell Mr. Bevin that our purposes in Korea remain the same, namely, to resist aggression, to localize the hostilities, and to wind up the Korean problem on a satisfactory UN basis and in such a way as not to commit US forces in large numbers indefinitely in that operation. We believe that the UN must make every possible effort to force the withdrawal of the Chi from Korea and so we believe it important that the six-power resolution receive urgent and favorable action.

This message does not purport to be a full examination of the problems arising from the present situation in Korea but is furnished after a quick review of the situation today in Washington and in order to be of some help to Mr. Bevin in the House tomorrow. Please tell Mr. Bevin we shall keep in close touch as the situation develops. I trust that Jebb's instructions will permit him to vote if resolution comes up Nov 29, as it may, even though prior to such vote he should prove unable to communicate with Chi leaders.

I expect to speak at Cleveland tomorrow night 2 and will say that we must meet the situation with resolution and firmness but that we are acting in Korea as a part of the UN and not unilaterally.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of Northeast Asian Affairs (Johnson)

[Washington,] November 29, 1950.

Subject: Six-Power Security Council Draft Resolution on Korea

Participants: Sir Oliver Franks, British Ambassador

Mr. Dean Rusk, FE

Mr. U. Alexis Johnson, NA

The British Ambassador, who called at his request, stated that because of British domestic political considerations he desired to ascertain whether there would be any proposal by the United States to amend the present six-power Security Council draft resolution on Korea. He stated that, while the British had no objection to whatever might be stated in debate with regard to the Chinese intervention in Korea, any attempt to amend the resolution to include a charge of aggression against China therein would at the moment pose political problems for the Foreign Minister. As there had been a Cabinet decision to support the resolution, the British could vote for it at any time, but if the resolution was amended he knew a Cabinet decision would be required. After checking with Mr. Hickerson, Mr. Rusk assured the Ambassador that we had no intention of amending the present resolution.

In reply to the Ambassador's question, Mr. Rusk stated that a decision had not yet been reached as to when or what action might be sought from the General Assembly upon the veto of the present resolution in the Security Council and that that was a matter which we would naturally desire to discuss with the British.

Mr. Rusk stated that very shortly there were other problems that we would desire to discuss with the British and, in reply to the Ambassador's request for an indication as to the type of thing we at present had in mind if a temporary stabilization of a line is achieved by UN forces in Korea, Mr. Rusk replied as follows:

1. How do we mobilize political and economic pressures on China?

2. It is now obvious that Chinese intervention in Korea had been planned over a long period, and it is probable that the decision to go into North Korea was taken in August, prior to the crossing of the 38th parallel by the UN forces. It also appears that the present Chinese offensive was launched without relation to the offensive of the UN forces. The question, therefore, is how we are to deal immediately with this disclosure of a larger threat and are the British and American estimates in this regard near alike. Also, how do we relate the UN General Assembly to the political and economic pressures needed to meet this threat?

In reply to the Ambassador's question on the present military situation, Mr. Rusk replied that the present problem was one of handling the Chinese Army attempt to split the Eighth Army and the X Corps. Mr. Rusk also mentioned the build-up of air strength in Manchuria and the grave danger that a sudden air onslaught from Manchuria would present to the UN forces which would have to fight back such an onslaught. Mr. Rusk raised with the Ambassador the question as to whether, in view of this danger, political action should be taken to make it clear that the onus and responsibility for any counter-attack that the UN forces might have to take against such an onslaught would rest with the Chinese Communists.

(2) Re possible meeting by Rau with Chinese Commies.

Following SC meeting November 28, Gross discussed with Rau position of India re six-power Korean resolution. Rau said his present instructions would not permit him to vote on the resolution at this time but in view of our feeling that the resolution should be promptly acted upon, he would at once communicate with New Delhi. Although Rau did not commit himself when asked by Gross whether he would recommend to GOI that he be authorized to vote for the resolution, he added that if he had not received requisite instructions in time for voting on November 29, he hoped we would not press for a vote until November 30 so as to give an opportunity to receive new instructions.

When asked by Gross re his efforts to meet with the Peiping representatives, Rau replied he had had a meeting scheduled for Tuesday a. m., November 28, but Peiping representatives postponed the meeting because of alleged conflict with SC meeting. Rau commented that he did not believe that such a postponement was actually necessary and would not have been suggested by Peiping representatives unless they had desire to make their statement in the SC before entering into any discussions. In response to question, Rau said he had no firm time for meeting, but thought it might possibly take place morning of November 29.

902. Re Korea: Confirming Gross telephone conversation with Hickerson yesterday, following is report of Gross' conversation with Jebb and Chauvel November 28 re Korean developments.

Chauvel has present authority to vote for six-power draft resolution and to support taking matter into GA following Soviet veto. When Chauvel learned of my intention to charge Peiping with aggression, he reported fact by telephone to Paris. Schuman "took grave view of step" and apparently instructed Chauvel not to support UN finding of Peiping aggression without specific authority from Paris. Chauvel also advised Gross in confidence that he had received telegram from French Foreign Office suggesting he seek interview with Peiping representatives here to discuss Chinese Communist intentions re Indochina, and particularly to inquire concerning significance Peiping accusations France engaged in "barbarous bombings" in Indochina. Chauvel suggested to Paris this was not appropriate time for such step, and instruction accordingly appears to have been withdrawn or suspended.

Chauvel stressed that because of fears of French Government re disastrous consequences of spread of war in Far East, it is necessary to use greatest caution in connection with either (a) UN condemnation of Chinese Communists re aggression, or (b) extension of military operations to Chinese territory or airspace. He said it was view of French Government that either of these steps or measures would necessitate "intergovernmental consultations".

Jebb informed Gross that he had been instructed to attempt to obtain postponement of vote on six-power Korean resolution until there had been an opportunity to "put his ear to the ground" with regard to intentions of Peiping representatives upon their arrival here. He has not been successful in efforts to obtain contact with them, and complains that Peiping delegation is being closely watched and shepherded by so-called body-guards, apparently Czech or Pole. However in view of urgency of situation, Jebb agreed to request authority to vote for SC resolution (Jebb advised Gross this warning [morning?] a. m., November 29, that he had received such authority).

Jebb took same position as Chauvel re necessity for intergovernmental discussions prior to condemnation of aggression or extension of military operations to Manchuria. Jebb added he is without present instructions re taking matter into GA but is asking for instructions.

Jebb outlined at some length his views concerning precarious position British Government in foreign policy debates scheduled in Parliament this week. He thinks Korean developments may affect governmental position adversely, commenting that if only a half-dozen or so Labor members absented themselves or abstained on a vote of confidence, the government might well fall. Jebb continued that particularly for this reason the UK position in the UN re Korea would probably be limited to support of pending six-power resolution without strengthening amendments and this might also apply to resolution in GA.

Gross stressed to Jebb and Chauvel in frankest terms absolute necessity for continuing solidarity, and expressed opinion that best chance of averting disaster is to maintain solid front based upon fundamentally common objectives. Jebb and Chauvel repeated familiar Western European thesis they were "on the front lines and wide open to Soviet military attack and that this fact accounted for growing public concern in France and England lest the Asiatic octopus squeeze out all our common strength". They also expressed frank concern re "preoccupation of General MacArthur in Far Eastern matters". Gross replied that common objective is to localize conflict in Korea and terminate it as quickly as possible, and that common problem was to agree upon most effective methods of deterring would-be aggressors. Both Jebb and Chauvel were visibly impressed by information relayed by Gross that Chinese Communists had prepared an offensive which was actually in motion at the time our offensive was launched and that accordingly Chinese military movements were not merely reactive.

Jebb and Chauvel both inquired concerning efforts to "talk matters out with Chinese Communists". Jebb commented in particular that Bevin's position would be greatly strengthened in the face of domestic criticism if he could say that genuine efforts had been made to develop an understanding with Chinese Communists and to ascertain their apprehensions. Gross told them in strict confidence of his understanding that efforts had been made directly and indirectly to establish contact with Peiping regime for these purposes. Jebb and Chauvel then stated that if this fact could be made known as soon as possible, that it would be of invaluable aid to the French and British Governments. Gross agreed to transmit their comments to Department for urgent consideration, pointing out that he was not familiar with time or nature of any such approaches and that there might be serious difficulty in the way of giving publicity to them. Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant)

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] November 29, 1950.

Subject: Visit from Australian Ambassador

Participants: The Australian Ambassador 1

Mr. David McNicol, Australian Embassy²

Mr. Shullaw, BNA ³ Mr. Merchant, FE

In Mr. Rusk's absence, I saw this afternoon the Australian Ambassador who had requested an appointment. At the outset he said that he desired to communicate informally a message from his Government. He stated that it was concerned over the apparent lack of coordination between political policy and military action in Korea and most anxious to state its view that no political commitment be entered into without consultation. The Ambassador elaborated by expressing his Government's apprehension over the possibility that General MacArthur might involve the Australian Government by his actions. I replied that there were grounds for apprehension in the situation but that these arose from massive and overt Chinese Communist intervention and not from any lack of coordination in the past nor by the entrance through his action into any political involvements by General Mac-Arthur. I referred to the restraint General MacArthur had exercised in not retaliating against aircraft operating from across the Manchurian border and referred to disciplinary action taken in isolated incidents where, contrary to orders, American pilots violated the border.

The Ambassador went on to say that his Government felt that General MacArthur's communiqués should be factual. I asked him what particular communiqué or passages in them gave rise to this fear, and the Ambassador cited the final paragraph of the General's last communiqué into which he said other governments than his own had read an implicit request for expanded authority. I replied that this communiqué like his others, insofar as I was aware, was factual in character and that the gravity of the situation arose from Chinese intervention which General MacArthur properly characterized as a new factor.

The Ambassador went on to say that Australia was prepared to continue to play its full part and carry its full share of responsibility but that they did desire to be consulted before political decisions were made and, to the extent possible, be kept currently informed of developments in the theater. I told the Ambassador that we were glad that he had spoken frankly, however unjustified we felt his apprehensions to be; that we recognized the special position Australia occupied as one of those nations supplying combat forces and that we would continue to consult closely with them.

Secretary of State Acheson delivered a major foreign policy address on the evening of November 29 which was broadcast from Washington to the National Council of Churches of Christ in the United States meeting in Cleveland; for the text, see Department of State Bulletin, December 18, 1950, page 962. Regarding Korea, he termed Chinese Communist intervention a premeditated act of brazen aggression, called on the Chinese Communist authorities not to act as the dupes of others in opposing the United Nations, and reiterated that the United States had no special interests in the area apart from the interests of the majority of United Nations members in achieving peace.

This threat is emphasized by thrusts from elements of the Corps all along its west flank as far north as Mupyong-Ni and as far south as the roadnets west from the Wonsan sector. This threat is now being met by the enemy commitment of a reported 6 to 8 Divisions which otherwise would have been available for use against the Eighth Army. The enemy's penetration southward could not be safely accomplished until this threat of the X Corps is contained or nullified. Any concept of actual physical combination of the forces of the Eighth Army and X Corps in a practically continuous line across the narrow neck of Korea is quite impracticable due to the length of that line, the numerical weakness

The X Corps will contract its position, as enemy pressure develops, into the Hamhung-Wonsan sector. The Corps Commander has been enjoined against any possibility of piecemeal isolation and trapping of his forces. While geographically his elements seem to be well extended, the actual conditions of terrain make it extremely difficult for an enemy to take any material advantage thereof.

C-50107. For info only. The Chinese Communists continue the buildup of their forces in North Korea despite all interdiction of our Air Command. Red troops located in Manchuria less than a week ago are now definitely indicated on our front and the two Army Groups, 4th and 3rd, are operating in our two sectors. The North Korea Command has been practically swept aside.

Troops from the neutral international border can reach the front in two night marches. This condition provides for a continuous and rapid buildup, as the enemy potential strength immediately available for prompt reinforcement comprises several hundred thousand troops which in turn are subject to replacement from other Chinese sectors. As a result, it is quite evident that the Eighth Army will successively have to continue to replace to the rear.

Everything leads to the conclusion the Chinese forces have as their objective the complete destruction of United Nations forces and the securing of all of Korea.¹

[&]quot;In reply to both messages the Joint Chiefs of Staff stated that the elements of X Corps must be extricated from their exposed positions and suggested that the forces on the two coasts be sufficiently coordinated to prevent large enemy forces from passing between or outflanking them. Finally, they stated that the entire region northeast of the waist of Korea should be ignored except for military considerations relating to the security of the command."

President Truman held a news conference on the morning of November 30 which he opened by reading a prepared statement. In it, he promised that the United States would continue to work in the United Nations for concerted action to halt aggression in Korea and indicated that the United States would take steps to strengthen its own defenses and aid its allies to do the same against the possibility of aggression elsewhere. He also adverted to the repeated assurances given the Chinese Communists that no aggressive intentions were held by the United States or the United Nations. Responding to questions on General MacArthur, Mr. Truman said that he had done a good job and had not exceeded his authority.

In the course of questioning on the Korean crisis, the following exchange occurred:

"The President: We will take whatever steps are necessary to meet the military situation, just as we always have. [12.] Q. Will that include the atomic bomb? The President: That includes every weapon that we have. Q. Mr. President, you said 'every weapon that we have.' Does that mean that there is active consideration of the use of the atomic bomb? The President: There has always been active consideration of its use. I don't want to see it used. It is a terrible weapon, and it should not be used on innocent men, women, and children who have nothing whatever to do with this military aggression. That happens when it is used."

Later on the same day, the White House issued the following press release:

"The President wants to make it certain that there is no misinterpretation of his answers to questions at his press conference today about the use of the atom bomb. Naturally, there has been consideration of this subject since the outbreak of the hostilities in Korea, just as there is consideration of the use of all military weapons whenever our forces are in combat.

"Consideration of the use of any weapon is always implicit in the very possession of that weapon.

"However, it should be emphasized, that, by law, only the President can authorize the use of the atom bomb, and no such authorization has been given. If and when such authorization should be given, the military commander in the field would have charge of the tactical delivery of the weapon.

"In brief, the replies to the questions at today's press conference do not represent any change in this situation."

In order to bring the representatives of the principal countries contributing military aid to Korea up to date on the latest developments in Korea, Assistant Secretary Rusk arranged a briefing meeting at the Canadian Embassy. The meeting was held at the Canadian Embassy rather than in the State Department in order to avoid press speculation and questioning.

Mr. Rusk thanked the representatives for meeting with him in a body and saving him a great deal of time. Mr. Rusk said that the official military reports of the fighting in Korea were always several hours behind the newspaper headlines which reflected cabled reports from the front line correspondents. These front line reports usually were more pessimistic than the facts warranted when things were going badly and more optimistic when they were going well. The situation was extremely serious and would not be clarified for two or three days, but our best estimates were that the UN forces would be able to stabilize the line across the waist of Korea without more reinforceand the first that the beside the contribution of the term of the term of the term of the contribution of ments than those already available to them. Because of the shortness of the lines and the long hours of darkness, the Chinese Communists were able in secrecy to mass a large number of troops (somewhere in the neighborhood of 200,000) in the mountainous region of north central Korea. It has become increasingly evident that this operation by the Chinese Reds had been planned for a long time and that the offensive was not a result of or in response to the recent UN offensive. UN forces had been out of contact with the enemy for ten days or two weeks. UN forces had spread out northward up avenues of easy access as a series of fingers. When the Chinese offensive started the fingers were withdrawn from the western part to form a fist. In the central part where the Chinese offensive struck. South Korean troops were employed and received the full weight of the offensive. The fact that they retreated more rapidly than parts of the lines is not an indication. of inferiority. They happened to be in the way of the main Chinese drive. The South Korean forces received a bad mauling. The other UN forces (the American divisions, the British, and the Turks), although battered somewhat, have not been seriously hurt. The Tenth Army Corps in Northeast Korea is in a serious predicament, and it is not known yet what its tactics will be. Mr. Rusk paid tribute to the extremely gallant fighting of the Turkish contingent.

On the political side Mr. Rusk said that it is our purpose not to go beyond the Manchurian border and that we are doing everything in our power to prevent the entrance of the Chinese Army into the Korean War from touching off World War III. Mr. Rusk emphasized the restraint with which the UN forces were operating. He contrasted the fact that the UN forces have not sent airplanes or men across the border at any time with the 200,000 Chinese Reds which are in North Korea fighting and many thousands that have been there for some time. Yet if a single UN airplane as much as gets across the border a tremendous protest that the UN forces are provoking war goes up. One of the reasons that our Intelligence did not find out the extent of Chinese penetration in advance of the offensive was our inability to make reconnaissance flights across the border where the Chinese Army was being concentrated. At the present the UN forces have total air superiority. If the Chinese concentrate air power in Manchurian air fields and use it in Korea, it will be necessary for us to bomb the bases in Manchuria.

We will deal with the new problem of the Chinese Armies in Korea through the UN and not unilaterally. The situation is quite different now than it was in June when action had to be taken in a matter of hours or everything would have been lost. Now UN forces are there fighting and the need for immediate UN action is not as great. More time for consultation among the United Nations as to each step is available. We will continue consultation with members of the UN with forces in Korea. We believe that the Six-Power Resolution must proceed. If, because it is vetoed in the Council, it is necessary to go to the Assembly, we believe the resolution should be rewritten.

The Australian Ambassador was puzzled by the disparity between the recent communiqué from the UN Commander when the UN offensive was begun indicating that this was the final phase of the fighting and the subsequent discovery that large Chinese forces were in North Korea. He wondered what had happened to the UN intelligence. Mr. Rusk said the intelligence of course was faulty but pointed out again the difficulties caused by the shortness of the distance between the Manchurian border (over which we could not send reconnaissance planes) and the North Korean hills where the Chinese Communists are. During the day we, of course, patrolled by air and ground along the border regions but the Chinese moved at night and hid during the dav.

Mr. de Beus said that a report had been received several weeks ago from Peiping indicating there were about 160,000 Chinese Reds soldiers in Korea ready to go. In view of this report he wondered why the surprise. Mr. Rusk said that the report was one of hundreds, each one different, and it was impossible to tell in advance which one was right. There were so many reports in fact that one of them was bound to be right.

The Belgian Ambassador wanted to know what we thought the short and long range objectives of the Chinese Army were. Mr. Rusk stated a personal view that it seems clear that their objectives had been and are to get the UN forces out of Korea, but what their objectives were beyond this there was no way of telling.

Subject: The Korean situation.

Participants: Baron Silvercruys, Belgian Ambassador

Mr. Rusk-FE Mr. Winfree—WE 1

The Belgian Ambassador called today at his request.

He began by stating that his Foreign Minister, Mr. Van Zeeland, was, in his capacity as President of the Council of Ministers, a very active man who journeyed frequently to many of the Western European capitals to converse with the leaders of other Western European Governments. Mr. Van Zeeland was, accordingly, in a position to convey any opinions we might have to the heads of other European governments. Therefore, the Ambassador stated, although my discussion of Korea yesterday had been crystal clear, he believed that if I could give him a firm statement of policy that he could pass on to Mr. Van Zeeland, the Foreign Minister could assist us by helping to clarify our position before other governments. The Ambassador added that, as we knew, in certain European capitals there was great indecision as to what should be the attitude toward the most recent aggression in Korea, and that certain groups opposed to the democratic way of life were not averse to using such moments of indecision under the guise of nationalism to further their own ends. Therefore, he felt that Mr. Van Zeeland could help the common cause.

I told the Ambassador that, as he of course knew, the situation in Korea was serious but not disastrous; however, the United States did not intend to permit the United Nations troops to be driven out of Korea. While we were a peace loving and peace seeking nation and were prepared to do everything possible to avoid a general breakout of war, we were not going to withdraw from Korea. The Ambassador then referred to the President's statement regarding the use of the atom bomb and asked if I meant that we were going to use it. I replied that I could not say whether or not we were going to use the atom bomb. The Ambassador said that he presumed the President meant that he would be guided by the recommendations of the military commanders in the field, since the President alone could authorize the use of the atom bomb.

I told Baron Silvercruys that there were possibly some additional political and economic moves we could make in this situation. However, it had now become clear that the Chinese Communists had as their objective driving all UN troops completely from Korea and if the Chinese Communist delegation in New York had come to the United States to attempt to bargain with us, they were certainly not anxious to do so since they had surrounded themselves with a very effective iron curtain and had rebuffed crudely every attempt by third nations to contact them. I emphasized again that we had no intention of letting ourselves be driven out of Korea.

The Ambassador then referred to the meetings of the Security Council and stated that he was quite confident that we could expect a veto of our resolution in the Council and that the matter would then be turned over to the General Assembly. He asked whether we were going to present our same resolution to the General Assembly. I replied that I did not think we would use the same resolution but would present a new one to the General Assembly.

Baron Silvercruys then said that van Langenhove, the Belgian delegate to the United Nations, who was a very shrewd observer, had noticed a general feeling of indecision among the members of the United Nations in regard to action by the General Assembly. Many members were lacking instructions as to how they should vote when the question was raised in the GA. The Ambassador thought that we should get in touch with other friendly governments just as soon as possible in order that appropriate instructions might be sent to the delegates of other nations in time for the General Assembly meetings. I agreed with him on this and said that we would do so.

The Ambassador then asked what would happen if the United Nations failed to support the United States' proposals regarding Korea. I replied stating that the free nations of the world must present a united front on this issue. We would win together or hang separately. I also quoted to the Ambassador a remark I had heard some months ago: "Would the United Nations benefit by gaining Communist China and losing the United States?"

The Ambassador thanked me for the information I had given him, adding his opinion that we must act together in this crisis.

While Mr. Winfree was walking to the elevator with the Ambassador, the Ambassador stated that if we were to use the atom bomb, he could not see any particular value to using it against Chinese cities. Why not go a little further and destroy the Soviet facilities for manufacturing atom bombs which, according to the Ambassador, were not located at too great an air distance from the scene of our present operations.

Memorandum by Mr. Lucius D. Battle, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State, of a Meeting Held on November 30, 1950

[Washington,] December 3, 1950.

The Secretary saw Mr. Lovett on Thursday afternoon, November 30, at the Secretary's request.

Following the meeting, he talked to several people in the Department about it. He said that he had told Mr. Lovett it was essential that action be taken immediately to determine where we went in light of the present Korean crisis. He suggested a meeting the following morning at which General Smith, Mr. Harriman, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Marshall and Mr. Lovett, as well as certain people in the Department, would be present. The purpose was to take up questions left over from the last meeting of this group.

The Secretary said that it was imperative that we get a program immediately. He said that we could expect a veto not later than Monday of the six power resolution presented before the Security Council. (I was called out during the course of the meeting and informed that the resolution had been vetoed that afternoon, which I reported back to the group).

The Secretary told Mr. Lovett that the first step was to stop the Chinese. He said that there was no use discussing anything else unless we could do that. He pointed out that our troops were at present badly dispersed in Korea. He said we must find a place which was suitable and hold it. We should then try to get sanctity to that position, a sanctity which would be aided by the passage of time. He said we must get our allies together and put all the backbone we could in them. He pointed out we must have a program in order to do this.

The Secretary said we must try to maintain the position at as little cost as possible.

Mr. Lovett mentioned the possibility of a cease fire resolution. It was pointed out there were many very nervous people in the United Nations and that a cease fire could probably be obtained as a United Nations move. If that is what we want, someone would undoubtedly propose it and we must consider urgently what kind of cease fire, when we want it, etc. The Secretary pointed out that it was desirable to get the kind of cease fire which allowed us to strengthen ourselves. The Secretary suggested consideration of using, if the cease fire were accepted, the Marshall tactic of getting a group of teams to assure compliance. One of these teams would be from the Chinese Communists, one from the United Nations Mission and one from General MacArthur's headquarters. The Secretary pointed out that it might be difficult to get the Chinese Communists to agree to a cease fire.

Arrangements were made for the meeting at the Pentagon the following morning. A record of this meeting was prepared by Mr. Jessup.¹

Up until later afternoon, November 30, Indian delegation UN has been unsuccessful in attempts establish personal contact with Chinese Communist delegation. Upon arrival latter delegation, Indians sent letter to it suggesting talks. Chinese Communists replied in letter stating they would be glad have talks at early date when Security Council not in session. B. N. Rau had appointment see Chinese today 11 a. m., but was informed by telephone that Chinese too busy and could not keep appointment. In later conversation with Gross, Rau gave impression he considered further effort would be futile at this stage. This connection Rau stated he did not believe Chinese Communist delegation were "free agents".

916. For Hickerson from Gross: Korea and Formosa: UK, French, Indian, Brazilian views:

Lengthy discussion with Jebb and Chauvel developed following views re Korean situation.

Jebb had received instructions from Bevin this morning to seek postponement of vote on 6-power resolution but obtained reversal of instructions. Basis of instruction apparently was that in 2 or 3 days situation might be clarified sufficiently so that Jebb could make a statement which would include a "last call for the use of reason". Jebb summarized attitude UK Government in following manner:

UN Charter was not considered at San Francisco to be instrument suited to handling problem of war among major powers. Irrespective of who recognized what government in China, de facto situation which confronts world is prospect of precisely the kind of war with which UN is neither competent nor capable to deal. Regarding Korea itself, no one knew on June 25 whether victorious UN forces would proceed north of 38th parallel. In fact, original purpose and mission of UN action had been accomplished with "restoration of status quo" and restoring to power in South Korea of Syngman Rhee. Jebb added that for all practical purposes the Republic of Korea really meant South Korea.

A resolution which included a finding of aggression constituted undertaking to commit the already inadequate defense forces of free world to a campaign of reconquest and liberation of areas seized by Chinese Communists. This would be taking place at a time before the constitution of sufficient strength of western Europe "to make at least a pretense of defending itself against a Russian attack."

Basic understanding of UK had been that such forces would be created in western Europe and that had not yet been accomplished. Launching a quite obvious barb at France, Jebb added that the slowness of developments in western Europe along these lines had not been the fault of the British Government or people.

In any event, Jebb continued, he was certain from his discussions with other western European delegations during the past 2 days that they shared with the UK the tremendous apprehension that US was committing western Europe to conduct of war in the Far East at an impossible time and under the most difficult possible strategic conditions. Jebb mentioned specifically discussions he had held with Belgium, Dutch and Norwegian representatives here.

Jebb strongly favored a 2 step process, involving the tabling of a resolution in the GA along the lines of the pending SC resolution and subsequently, if necessary, the introduction of a stronger resolution of the sort we were discussing. In this connection, Jebb said he was bound to make clear that UK Government had not yet decided that the matter should be taken into the GA at all at this stage and Jebb was awaiting instructions on this point. The 2-phased procedure he described as his personal view.

Chauvel in general agreed with Jebb's analysis, differing however in 1 or 2 important respects. Chauvel said French Government did not share view Jebb had expressed regarding 38th parallel. He felt French view to be more in the direction of considering that a military line could be stabilized, perhaps at the narrow waist of the peninsula. This could be regarded as a "strategic frontier" and consideration could then be given of the next steps with regard to portions of Korea north of the "strategic frontier".

At this point, Jebb appeared to express personal agreement with Chauvel's analysis, repeating that his earlier expressed view had been his own personal observation and he thought probably his government would agree with Chauvel's analysis.

Chauvel's instructions authorized him to support introducing into the GA resolution along lines pending SC resolution. However, Chauvel read to me a telegram received this morning from Paris in which Paris expressed view that a finding of aggression was "inopportune" at this time and repeating instructions to Chauvel not to support such action until matter had been discussed at an "inter-governmental level".

Chauvel confirmed Jebb's analysis of attitude other western European countries, adding that Dutch representative had come to him "with tears in his eyes" asking whether Chauvel saw any hope of avoiding the war which was rapidly being precipitated. Chauvel's specific procedural suggestion was that SC transmit to GA vetoed resolution requesting GA to consider subject matter of resolution and make recommendations. Chauvel said such procedure would avoid problem of SC dis-seizing itself of whole Korean question and that the resolution could be amended in the GA.

Both Jebb and Chauvel urged that, assuming SC vote and veto today, we should allow several days for consultation before placing matter in GA.

Both Jebb and Chauvel expressed belief we would be in a much stronger position, particularly vis-à-vis western Europeans, if Chinese Communists defied a GA resolution along lines SC resolution. When I pressed Jebb to express his views concerning the second step in the light of what he had said earlier concerning the strategic implications of the situation, Jebb said that under circumstances of outright defiance of a request to withdraw forces, the issue "would then indeed be a question of war or peace", and he could see no way other than to follow the matter through to its logical conclusion.

New subject: At beginning SC meeting this afternoon, Rau told me that he planned to refer to the Formosa question in his SC statement this afternoon. His idea (which he said he had not put up to his government) was that the resolution might contain a paragraph in effect calling upon US to withdraw the 7th Fleet if Chinese Communists withdrew forces from Korea. Rau thought this would "offer something" to the Peiping regime, which the present resolution does not. He added this would do nothing more than give effect to President Truman's statement of January 5. Rau said the gravity of the crisis, and the rapid movement toward war required everyone to search his conscience and present to the SC ideas which "might take root".

I strongly urged Rau not to raise the Formosa question in this manner and expressed the hope he would give us opportunity to consult with him. He agreed with some apparent reluctance to delete these passages.

New subject. Ambassador Muniz (Brazil) asked to see me during SC meeting and showed me message from President Brazil instructing him to seek views of US and UK delegations concerning probable international developments which Brazil Cabinet wished to discuss tomorrow morning. In particular, Muniz asked concerning our plan for action after the Soviet veto of pending SC resolution. I assured Muniz we would allow sufficient time for consultation with such close friends as Brazil prior to circulating resolution in GA and might indeed request Brazil to co-sponsor resolution. In response to a question whether we planned to request the GA to charge Peiping regime with aggression, I told him that was still under consideration and would probably be matter we would wish to discuss with Brazil within the next day or two. He expressed hope we would not table the resolution before Monday or Tuesday 1 at the earliest, and I assured him that we would allow time for consultation before circulating a resolution although we took it for granted that matter should be referred to the GA. Muniz agreed. [Gross.]

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador at Large (Jessup)

[Washington,] December 1, 1950.

Subject: Notes on Meeting in JCS Conference Room, Pentagon, 8:30 a.m., December 1, 1950

Participants:

Secretary George C. Marshall
General of the Army Omar N. Bradley
General J. Lawton Collins
Admiral Forrest P. Sherman
General Nathan F. Twining ¹
[Deputy] Under Secretary Robert A.
Lovett
Secretary Frank Pace
Secretary Thomas Finletter

Secretary Dean Acheson
Mr. H. Freeman Matthews
Mr. Dean Rusk
Mr. Paul H. Nitze
Mr. Philip C. Jessup
General Bedell Smith
Secretary Francis P.
Matthews
Mr. Averell Harriman

Secretary Acheson opened the discussion by referring to the desire to resume the very useful session which had previously been held. It was now necessary to consider the contingency which had not been covered in the previous discussion; namely, what to do in case the offensive failed. He summarized the action in the Security Council yesterday and referred to the virtual state of panic which seemed to exist among our friends in New York. Many are complaining that the United States' leadership has failed, and the present difficulties are the fault of General MacArthur's action. It is of the greatest importance that we should again bring about unity among our friends. The effect of disunity is felt not only in Asia but also in Europe. We must, accordingly, restore confidence so that we can get results in our European defense plans. It is essential that what we do in the political field be coordinated with military considerations and make sense from that point of view. He then summarized the various considerations under points one and two of the attached memorandum prepared by Mr. Rusk. He emphasized the thought, which he said he was advancing for purposes of discussion only and not because he felt sure it was the proper solution, that if a line could be established from a military point of view a political attempt should be made to attach some sanctity to it. If this could be done de facto, perhaps it would open up a field of negotiation. He raised the question of a military desirability of a cease-fire resolution if some of our friends suggested it in the United Nations. He discussed the possibility that we might agree to it and the Chinese would not, as well as the possibility that if the Chinese agreed they would still not carry it out loyally while we did. He suggested the possibility of armistice teams along the pattern which General Marshall had followed in China. He then passed to a consideration of subsequent actions and raised the question whether we could get out of Korea hoping the Chinese would also withdraw into Manchuria. We might then leave the ROK against the North Koreans. The question was where that would leave us. In any event, we must do something in Korea, and we must do something to counter the rapid resurgence of neutralism in Germany. He had under consideration the advisability of his going to New York next week to speak in the General Assembly, but did not wish to do so until the United States Government has an agreed plan. If from a military point of view it is impossible to hold a line, we are confronted with a new set of problems and must proceed on different assumptions. He requested guidance from the military.

General Bradley said it was hard to give answers now. Unless the Tenth Corps can succeed in regrouping, it is hard to stabilize a line. One cannot tell now. If our losses are heavy in the east, we may not have enough troops to hold a line. There is an indication of very heavy traffic representing large reinforcements coming in from Manchuria. We may have to fall much further back.

Secretary Acheson inquired where, from a military point of view, it would be most useful to have the Tenth Corps.

At General Marshall's request, General Bradley showed the Secretary a telegram the Joint Chiefs of Staff had sent to General MacArthur last night.²

General Bradley said the telegram had been cleared with the President at ten after ten last evening. The gist of the message was that they felt it was desirable to group the Tenth Corps, and it ended with a statement which General Marshall said that he had inserted telling General MacArthur that from the point of view of his United Nations mission it was unnecessary to hold the territory northeast of the waist and that except for strategic and tactical considerations involving the security of his command he could ignore that area.

² See footnote 1 to telegram C-50107 from Tokyo, received at 3:33 a.m. on November 30, p. 1260.

General Collins said it might well be that he would have to have a gap between the Tenth Corps in the Hamhung-Wonsan area and the Eighth Army on the west.

Secretary Acheson again inquired what would be the most advantageous thing for us to do; e.g., buying time by a cease-fire.

GENERAL COLLINS said we could not tell now. He thought that someone should go out to Japan immediately to find out the situation on the spot.

General Marshall agreed that it would be useful for General Collins to go today. He said it was hard to establish a line. The Tenth Corps on the east coast would have ports available for supplies or for evacuation if necessary. Such evacuation might succeed in taking out at least three-fourths of the force. However, it lets the communists converge all of its forces on either one or the other of our two main positions. The Chinese Communists may put in their air force at any time. A line of the kind that Secretary Acheson had referred to was not a practical proposition. We may be able to hold on both the west and the east separately, but we cannot give a firm answer on this now.

Mr. Rusk inquired whether the same considerations would apply to holding the line elsewhere, for example at the 38th Parallel or at the Han River.

General Collins replied that the waist was the shortest line, and there was no natural line at the 38th Parallel. There was still a question about the intentions of the Chinese Communists. He repeated it was very hard to move our two groups to any one place. Probably the only possibility would be to withdraw our troops from the east by sea around to the west. There would be no other way to withdraw. There are no really useful ports between Wonsan and Pusan.

Admiral Sherman said from a strategic point of view we should be on the islands and off the mainland, but the abandonment of Korea would be dangerous to Japan due to airfields in Korea. From this standpoint, it would be desirable for us to hold at the waist as a longterm strategic plan. We may end up with Inchon, Wonsan and Pusan as supply bases. For some reason, the Chinese Communists have allowed us to maintain sole control of the air. We should not interfere with this situation until our position is straightened out. Therefore, the advantage of keeping our air on our side of the frontier outweigh the disadvantages, but we must decide in advance what to do if the Chinese Communist air comes in. If Russian air were added, we might not be able to hold. There is a good chance to get a useful line of positions tied to ports avoiding any detached force not supplied by sea. If the position is stabilized, the question is what we do next. Shall we strengthen our Pacific Fleet at the expense of the Atlantic? Where do we get more ground troops for needs in the Far East?

General Bradley said the question was if the Chinese air comes in do we want to hit back. To do so might draw in the Soviet air. If this is true, we may have to defer striking. He was not sure this question should be decided in advance.

GENERAL COLLINS strongly supported General Bradley. If we hit back, it is a strong provocation of the Chinese and may possibly bring in Soviet air and even submarines. The only chance then left to save us is the use or the threat of the use of the A-bomb. We should therefore hold back from bombing in China even if this means that our ground forces must take some punishment from the air.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN said that he did not disagree with this provided we do not have to take too much from the Chinese air force.

General Collins said he strongly dissented from Admiral Sherman's view about holding Korea. He thought Korea was not worth a nickel while the Russians hold Vladivostok and positions on the other flank.

General Bedell Smith said that they were now preparing a new estimate which would be distributed not later than Monday ³ which makes a much better case than they previously thought for Russian plans for war soon. It could be assumed that their first purpose is to defeat European rearmament. They probably do not plan on war now but are willing to have it if they can bog us down in Asia. They will never accept a Korea in hostile hands. We should get out of Korea although we do not solve the problem by getting out. The Russians are sure we don't intend to get into war in Asia, and so feel that they can push us as far as they want. The new estimate would indicate probable Soviet reactions during the next 12 to 24 months. They could bleed us to death in Asia while defeating the armament effort in Europe. The recent Pravda article is a clear indication that they fully understand our situation.

Mr. Lovert said he understood there was a consensus on two points: first, that Korea is not a decisive area for us; and second, that, while the loss of Korea might jeopardize Japan and perhaps bring about its eventual loss, Western Europe was our prime concern and we would rather see that result than lose in Western Europe. It was best to hold in Korea for political moves. We should regroup our troops and stall for time. We might then move in on securing a cease-fire or a truce along the model used in Palestine. We should deliberately admit to ourselves that part of the condition would be that the Chinese withdraw while we do too. This might involve the abandonment of Korea.

General Collins said that he did not think that the loss of Korea would involve the loss of Japan, but in reply to Secretary Acheson's question agreed that the political consequences in Japan might be different. He said it was illusory to think of making a line and turning it over to the ROK to hold at least before a year had passed. The ten ROK divisions contemplated by General MacArthur were still raw and ill-equipped. His impression of their leadership was that it was not of much consequence and that they could not stand up against real forces supported by the Chinese.

General Twining said that, if the Chinese air is used against our ports, it would be very serious and we might have to go against their fields. In reply to General Marshall's question, General Twining went on to say that he definitely felt that, if they attacked in mass with air against our ports, we must hit their fields.

GENERAL BRADLEY agreed but said the decision must be made here if the situation develops and we should not now decide to give authority to the Theater Commander.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN and GENERAL MARSHALL exchanged views on the question of hitting back at the Chinese, with Admiral Sherman indicating that he thought we must fight back but admitting that this might open up attacks from Vladivostok. He added that we could not operate our air bases which are very crowded in the face of very heavy air attack. He urged that no political commitments should be made which did not leave us a free hand to act quickly.

Secretary Acheson agreed fully with the last proposition. He pointed out that, as General Bradley had said, if we do hit back it may bring in Russian air support of the Chinese and we would go from the frying pan into the fire.

In an exchange between General Bradley and General Smith, the idea was expressed that if real Russian support of the Chinese developed, we would have to evacuate and probably would be engaged in war.

General Collins repeated that in this situation, we would have to consider the threat or the use of the A-bomb. It would be very difficult to get our troops out if Russian air were used.

Admiral Sherman said the Chinese were probably afraid of attacks on their cities and might hold off for that reason.

Secretary Acheson inquired what the view would be if there was a suggestion of our accepting a cease-fire and going back to the 38th Parallel. He inquired whether, from a military point of view, that would seem to be the best choice and whether they would consider we were lucky to get such an arrangement.

GENERAL COLLINS, ADMIRAL SHERMAN and GENERAL BRADLEY indicated an affirmative answer.

General Bradley specifically said that any cease-fire would put us in better position but did not dissent from General Collins' answer to Secretary Acheson that we should not agree on it yet.

GENERAL MARSHALL thought that the acceptance of the cease-fire would represent a great weakness on our part.

Notes Prepared for the Secretary of State by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] December 1, 1950.

- 1. What are our primary objectives in the Korean situation?
- a. To deny a success to communist aggression.

b. To localize the conflict, i.e., to avoid becoming involved in a more general war with China and/or the Soviet Union.

c. To end the Korean situation quickly on a satisfactory UN basis and disengage U.S. troops as rapidly as possible, even though complete withdrawal may take considerable time.

d. To maintain a solid front among our principal allies and, if possible, the solid support of an overwhelming majority of the UN.

2. If possible, we should try to attain all four objectives. If the situation forces us at some point to choose among competing objectives, we must make some difficult choices. In face of the present Chinese onslaught, how should we proceed in order to attain all four objectives?

a. We must first find a place to hold in Korea—and hold it.

This is primarily a military problem. Can we do it? How soon? Where can we hold? This raises a question about the X Corps. Is it being employed to the best military advantage? Insofar as future political problems are concerned, there would be advantage in a simpler configuration in our position, e.g., a line which cuts cleanly across the Korean peninsula.

b. Having found a line which we can hold for some time, we should try to stabilize it by both military and political means.

(1) Strengthening of ROK forces(2) Political consolidation of Korea

(3) Build-up of political resistance in UN to any further communist encroachment of line

(4) Possible cease-fire (see below)

c. We should consider carefully the possibility of a UN cease-fire; we should try to delimit the conditions of an acceptable cease-fire in the light of the obvious political and military complications involved.

(1) Can we count upon sufficient military stabilization to avoid having to seek a cease-fire while we are in full retreat?

(2) Would it be to our advantage to have a cease-fire which permitted or prohibited the redisposition of forces on both sides?

(3) Could we accept a cease-fire and thereby be denied air action against enemy build up?

(4) What organization would be required to monitor a ceasefire? Teams composed of one member each drawn from the opposing forces and the UN?

- (5) Since there might be, under certain circumstances, political advantages in our being willing to accept a cease-fire (such as maintaining solid UN support), are there serious military dangers in a cease-fire as contrasted with merely an absence of military advantage?
- d. If a cease-fire appears desirable, and if it is accepted by the enemy, a process of negotiation might then follow with the purpose of getting a political settlement (plus or minus the cease-fire position).
- 3. The build-up of enemy forces, his probable and more ambitious intentions, and the inability to provide an equivalent build-up on the UN side may mean that a cease-fire would be rejected and that we should have to choose among our four objectives. Specifically, we may have to choose between a forced withdrawal from Korea and an extension of our blows against the Chinese. Certain questions obviously need examination:
- a. At what point does it become academic to concern ourselves about whether strikes we make against China would provoke further effort by China against us? Is not China, except for air, in as full scale a war effort against UN forces as China can produce against us? Perhaps in Korea. But Hong Kong and Indo-China?

b. How can we most effectively strike China in such a way as to make a difference, without becoming involved with U.S. forces on the mainland? Blockade? Carrier Task Force strikes? Air and naval strikes and raider parties operating from Formosa? Rapid build-up of covert operations? What is China's vulnerability?

c. What action against China could affect the situation in Korea? Should our action be concentrated against Manchuria in the hope of affecting Korea?

d. To what extent is possible action against China inhibited by great risks of provoking action by the Soviet Union?

Minutes of the Forty-seventh Meeting of the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET

New York, December 1, 1950—9:15 a.m.

[Here follows a list of those present (44).]

Chinese Communist Aggression Against the United Nations in Korea.

Colonel Hasbrouck briefed the Delegation on the present military situation in Korea and described future developments which might be anticipated.

Ambassador Gross reviewed the present situation in the Security Council and the General Assembly. Referring to the resolution of the Security Council of June 25, he explained that although the resolution was not specifically stated to be such, the action taken by the Council had been under Chapter VII of the Charter. He reviewed the terms of this resolution and recalled that as the first step it did not include a finding by the Council that there had been an act of aggression or a breach of the peace. However, on June 27 the Security Council had adopted a second resolution in the face of the continued North Korean defiance of the resolution of June 25. This resolution fell even more definitely under Chapter VII and included the determination that the armed attack against the Republic of Korea had constituted a breach of the peace. This resolution furnished the basis for subsequent action taken by the Council, including the establishment of the Unified Command.

Ambassador Gross noted that the item on the Security Council agenda, "Complaint of Aggression against the Republic of Korea," was the heading under which the present crisis in Korea resulting from Chinese Communist intervention had been discussed. Yesterday the Soviet Union had vetoed a resolution on the immediate situation roughly comparable to that of June 25 on the original Korean situation. He reviewed the terms of this resolution and pointed out that it did not call upon United Nations members to assist in the execution of the resolution or to give such assistance to the United Nations as might be necessary to repel the armed attack. In the Council, it had been explained that this resolution was designed to express the policy of localization of the conflict and to give reassurance to the Chinese Communists that their legitimate interests in the area were not threatened. Now that this resolution had been vetoed, the problem arose as to the next appropriate step.

Ambassador Gross explained that both the Department and the Mission were firmly convinced that the type of action necessary fell within the principles and concepts of the "Uniting for Peace" resolution adopted by the General Assembly earlier in the session, since this was clearly a case where action had been frustrated by the exercise of the veto in the Security Council. The important questions now involved were those of the timing of the presentation of a resolution in the General Assembly and procedures before this step in the Security Council in order to remove this particular aspect of the problem from the Council's agenda. In addition, we would have to work out the terms of the resolution to be introduced in the General Assembly.

As regards the problem of timing, Ambassador Gross believed that we ought to move as quickly as orderly and prudent consultation with our allies would permit. He then turned to the procedures which would resolve the difficulties arising out of the provisions of Article 12 respecting Council and Assembly jurisdiction. If the Council were called upon to remove this part of the item from the agenda, a question might arise as to the means by which to keep alive the July 7 resolution establishing the Unified Command and setting up its relationship to the Security Council. In order to preserve this relationship, the question was not one of transferring to the Assembly the whole matter, but rather how to transfer the particular problem at hand which arose directly out of Chinese Communist intervention in Korea. The Department had not yet made up its own mind as to the most appropriate procedure to be followed.

During consultations yesterday with the British and French, Ambassador Gross reported that Ambassador Chauvel had suggested it might be desirable and practical for the Security Council to transmit to the General Assembly the vetoed resolution in its present form with the recommendation that the Assembly consider the matter and make recommendations on the subject of that resolution. It was important, however, in the Security Council, to avoid the creation of any situation or to propose any procedure to which the veto might apply. In this connection, he noted that the simple act of removing an item from the agenda of the Council was a procedural step. One question arising in connection with Ambassador Chauvel's suggestion was whether a request by the Security Council for action by the Assembly was a procedural or substantive question.

Ambassador Gross thought that by far the most important question was the kind of action which we would want the General Assembly to take, as rapidly as consultations would require and permit. The view of the Department had been that time and events had overtaken the six-power resolution which had been vetoed yesterday in the Security Council, and it was considering an alternative text which would contain at least the following three elements: a finding of aggression against the United Nations, a call upon the Chinese Communists to withdraw their forces from North Korea, and a call upon members of the United Nations to furnish assistance in repelling the aggression against the Republic of Korea and the efforts of the Unified Command to restore international peace and security in the area. Such a resolution was now being drafted in the Department. In addition, the Department was considering on a tentative basis the possible inclusion of an additional paragraph which would request the Collective Measures Committee to make recommendations concerning collective measures which might be taken by members to bring about the desired result in Korea. Such action would relate to sanctions and would not rule out armed force procedures. Mr. Dulles noted that the intent of such a paragraph would be not to have the Collective Measures Committee engage in any activities interfering with the Unified Command. Ambassador Gross concurred, pointing out that we would not want the Assembly to get into the problem of relationships between the Unified Command and the Security Council. He went on to say that the Department was also discussing a possible paragraph calling upon members to sever all relations with the Chinese Communists and thus to brand and treat them as outlaws. He cautioned, however, that this suggestion was also highly tentative.

Ambassador Gross said that in weighing the various alternatives for action, the Department also wished to obtain the reaction of our principal allies. To this end, he had talked with Jebb and Chauvel of the United Kingdom and France, respectively, and had reported the results of these conversations in detail to the Department in a telegram which was available to the delegates. Both the French and British appeared to react violently against the introduction of a resolution into the General Assembly along the lines favored by the Department. Instead, they would prefer a two-phased operation in which the first step would be the introduction in the Assembly of substantially the vetoed Security Council resolution. Their instructions covered this step, but they were not authorized to support any resolution containing a finding of aggression on the part of the Chinese Communists. This position related to their fears that we might run the risk of committing the relatively small collective defense strength of the Atlantic Powers to the Far Eastern operation under almost impossible strategic conditions.

Turning to the second step envisaged by the French and British, Ambasssador Gross explained that after defiance of the resolution, they considered that the Assembly could take follow-up action by adopting a resolution along the lines of the resolution now preferred by the Department. They reacted strongly against an initial resolution which would include a finding of aggression, and which would call upon members of the United Nations to assist in repelling aggression in Korea. Jebb had indicated that the British regarded the situation as impossible from their point of view. It had been the British understanding that Western European defenses would be strengthened as rapidly as possible to a point consistent with fighting off Soviet invasion of Western Europe. This defense effort had not moved as rapidly as had been hoped. If a resolution were adopted containing a finding of aggression and calling upon members to assist the United Nations, that would constitute the clearest kind of commitment of United Nations forces to reconquer and liberate Northern Korean areas now occupied by China. In the British view, such a call could be interpreted as nothing else. In response to a question, Ambassador Gross indicated that the Department had not yet reacted to these British views.

Mr. Dulles did not think that the Department would agree with the British, rather, it considered that the situation should be characterized as what it was, namely, virtually a state of war between China and the United Nations, but the Department did not agree that this would commit countries in the sense suggested by the British. It would be reckless, on the other hand, to treat the incident as an isolated war. The Department wished to create legal freedom for action from the United Nations point of view but did not agree that we would be committed to exert all the strength we could muster in order to accomplish certain objectives.

Senator Lodge asked what would be accomplished by a statement on the part of the United Nations that a state of war existed between China and the United Nations when everyone really knew the Soviets were behind the whole thing. Mr. Dulles replied that it would then be far easier for us and there would be much greater unity. Moreover, we would be free to carry out diversionary activities in China. In this connection, he referred to the fact that our intelligence indicated considerable subversive activity was now going on in South China. Such a resolution might also permit the use of Chinese Nationalist troops now on Formosa. We could also stir up subversive activities in China from Hong Kong. In his view it was important to have sufficient United Nations authority to take such measures if they proved expedient.

Mr. Cohen asked whether it was true that the form of resolution was really an effort to localize the war. He asked whether that decision had been made or whether our real purpose was simply freedom of action. He indicated that in his view the resolution described might set in force forces on the other side which would compel action and end what hope might possibly remain for the negotiation of some arrangement on the Korean peninsula looking toward peaceful settlement of the situation. He thought the proposed resolution did raise a number of broad questions.

Mrs. Roosevelt inquired about the reaction of the Korean people to recent events. She recalled that she had read that Korea divisions had caved in immediately when the Chinese offensive had begun and asked whether that was because they were not happy under their government or whether this reflected a real division now, even in South Korea, as to what the people actually wanted. Mr. Dulles doubted that this was a factor in the present situation. Mrs. Roosevelt inquired whether we could count on Korean support. Mr. Dulles said if he were asked that question he would have to answer that we were on the way out in Korea.

Colonel Hasbrouck noted that it should be remembered that the South Korean forces had taken a terrible slapping around. Fifty percent of the South Korean Army had been decimated in the first five days of the war. He cautioned that the Delegation should expect a lot of bad news within the next week. Actually, we did not have much choice, since we had known all along that the Soviets had the capability of kicking us out of Korea whenever they wanted. He went on to observe the hey could repeat this performance in a number of other places any time within the next five years and pick their own time. Mrs. Roosevelt said that if this were so, she did not quite understand why we had started operations in Korea. It seemed to her to put us in a worse position. Colonel Hasbrouck thought that the question was whether we would give up everything without a fight. Mrs. Roosevelt believed we were now in a position where negotiations had to be undertaken since there was nothing else we could do. Colonel Hasbrouck suggested that surrender might be a better word in this connection; Mr. Dulles agreed.

Ambassador Gross reported that the British attitude was that the United Nations mission in Korea has been substantially accomplished when South Korea had been liberated and the status quo restored. Once that had been done, the United Nations had accomplished its mission. In reviewing the present crisis, Jebb expressed the view that the United Nations Charter at San Francisco had not been considered suitable for handling problems of war among the major powers. Irrespective of the recognition situation, the actual fact was that war with a major power was involved, and that was a matter in his view with which the United Nations was not competent to deal. He distinguished this situation from that of June 25 in just those terms. In Ambassador Gross's opinion, it was hard to tell whether this British attitude was a cynical or practical one. He noted, however, that toward the end of his discussion, Jebb did say that if the two-phased procedure in the Assembly were adopted and the Chinese Communists continued in defiance, under circumstances of outright defiance, the issue would indeed be one of war and peace, and he could see no way out other than to follow suit to the logical conclusion. The problem was really not one of cutting and running completely. He noted that conversations with the Norwegian, Belgian and Dutch delegations had indicated some desire to cut our losses in Korea by the establishment of a strategic frontier on which a line could be stablized, and then the next steps could be considered. With this approach there would be no commitment to reconquer lost areas.

Senator Cooper referred to the remarks of Colonel Hasbrouck to the effect that we had known all along the difficulties which would be encountered if the Chinese Communists entered the fighting in Korea. He thought consideration should be given to whether commitments could be made sufficient to meet all contingencies. He asked Ambassador Gross whether the suggested resolution gave us anything which we did not already have, except for the fact that China was definitely named as the aggressor. Ambassador Gross believed that the distinction was of a political, rather than a legal nature because an argument could be made that the June 27 resolution covered the present situation. There were two new steps. In the first instance, the United Nations was undertaking a commitment to take such reasonable, practical and honorable steps as were necessary to repel the Chinese Communist aggression, accepting fully that members could never undertake any particular tactical commitment in this regard. What would be involved was rather a commitment to take honorable steps to vindicate the authority of the United Nations. How the details would be filled in would be left to subsequent negotiations. He noted that the resolution in the form favored by the Department would definitely involve implicitly the authority to carry military operations into and over China.

Ambassador Austin remarked that an important factor in this situation was the views of other delegations and called upon Mr. Ross for observations in this connection. Mr. Ross indicated that there was not much point in discussing this in detail at the present time because the views of other delegations were still far too amorphous. In general, other countries were anxious to support the United States, but there was some feeling that we might want to go beyond a point at which the United Nations could effectively sustain action. For the most part, other delegations were waiting for an indication from us of our definite position. Ambassador Gross noted that the British and French probably correctly represented the views of the Western European states. Mr. Ross observed that there were also hopeful signs of support from the Arab states, who were obviously disappointed and disillusioned by the Chinese Communists.

Mr. McKeever observed that this was perhaps the most critical time the Delegation would meet and asked that members of the Delegation should be very cautious in their dealings with the press in order to make sure that all members of the Delegation were telling the same story.

921. For Hickerson from Gross, At Bebler's Security Council dinner last night Rau took me aside to tell me that the initiative for his meeting this morning with Wu "this time came from them". Rau said Wu sent him a message at the Security Council table yesterday afternoon suggesting they meet at 10:30 Friday a. m. Because of Rau's tendency to leap out of the water at flies, I undertook to sound some warnings. I expressed view that on basis Wu's performance in Security Council it was clear he had a long way to go before showing up at Tito's headquarters. Rau nodded agreement.

Following this up, I asked Rau if he would forgive a tactless question and when he replied that I should feel free to ask him anything, I said suddenly "what is your appraisal of Panikkar?" Rau was startled by the question, and after a slight pause, he grinned and said "you have something of an answer in my delay in formulating a reply". Rau then proceeded with the frank comment that Panikkar was a fine person and great scholar, but that "the people in Delhi know how to evaluate him and give the proper discount". I then explained that I had asked the question because several months ago Rau had told me of Panikkar's conviction that Communist China was pursuing its own course, that it was not a Soviet satellite, and that it was more Chinese than Communist. I said we had always been skeptical of this appraisal, and that Wu's performance appeared to me to show up Panikkar's analysis.

I thought it was difficult to say how much of Wu's manner was due to political immaturity and how much to planned terror tactics. In any event, it seemed to me important to avoid entrapment in a situation which would affect momentum in UN and especially important to prevent the fact of his meeting with Wu creating false hopes among UN members.

I reminded Rau that Soviets had often tried to obstruct and divert free world efforts to concert their policies by propaganda trick of pretending to want "discussions". I expressed hope Rau would be wary of efforts on part of Wu to build up a climate of so-called discussions and that in any statement Rau might make after the meeting he would avoid falling into this familiar trap. Rau listened intently and throughout nodded his agreement. Referring to earlier discussions relating to our willingness to talk with Wu, I said Rau would forgive me if I again stressed that while we were not eager to talk with Wu, and indeed had nothing to offer him or to suggest to him, that if Wu had anything on his mind we were prepared to listen. Rau professed understanding.

He said he would like to see me this afternoon, to tell me of his talk with Wu and also to discuss our notions of what happens next.

Rau referred to news of Attlee's visit to Washington. He said it had occurred to him after hearing this news that it might be a good idea for Nehru to come for a talk with the President, if Nehru could arrange to do so. Rau stressed this was his own idea, just born, and he did not know if it was practical. He thought I might pass it on the Department as Rau's personal and tentative idea.

Reverting to conversation earlier in day in which I had urged him not to launch in Security Council his plan to suggest including in resolution an offer to withdraw 7th fleet from Formosa Straits in return for Chinese withdrawal from Korea, I thanked him for acceding to my request. I explained in some detail the political and military dangers implicit in such a proposal, net effect of which might be to put UN and us under a commitment which we would honor but Communists would disregard at will and which moreover might well result in merely shifting the offensive to Formosa with Chinese troops released from their Korean adventure. Rau did not press his idea and acceded to my request that he talk with me before doing anything more with the plan. [Gross.]

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

[Washington,] December 1, 1950.

Subject: Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea—Counter Strategy

Reference: CA Memoranda July 12 "Korea and Over-All World Situation", November 17 [7], 1950 "Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea, Counter strategy" 1

The basic premises for this consideration remain the same as set forth in CA's July 12 memorandum, that is, in sum, that Moscow purposes the destruction of the United States, and the Communist operation in Korea is a part of the global strategic plan of world Communism and to be viewed accordingly. Those premises remain the same with the Chinese Communist intervention of late October. In fact, the Chinese Communist intervention is largely meaningless, unless it be regarded as a component part of a global Communist plan-for a war by China alone against the UN could bear only bitter fruits. It is believed that these assumptions get support from (1) the scale of Chinese Communist intervention, in terms of troops put in the field, (2) the defense preparations being undertaken on the China mainland, (3) the character of (and time limits imposed upon) Chinese Communist commercial and financial relations in the international market, (4) the identity of Peiping and Moscow propagandas and outlooks, particularly as evidenced most recently in the UN by General Wu Hsiu-ch'uan, and (5) Chinese Communist moves with respect to Indochina and Tibet. The international character of Chinese moves is indicated, it is thought, by such a circumstance as the energetic repair and construction of airfields on mainland China, on a scale far in excess of any conceivable needs which might be imposed by the operations of China's own very limited air fleet: the only logical inference to be drawn from such action is that preparations are being made for use of Chinese fields by the Soviet air force.

It is repeated: the deduction logically to be drawn is that the Korean operation constitutes only a part of a larger operation planned by Moscow in the global theater. It is to be anticipated in the given circumstances that an enlargement of the present conflict is probably, from the Chinese point of view, deemed "inevitable".

It is to be accepted as probable, in the light of the flexibility of Communist strategy generally, that various alternative avenues have been selected for the development from Korea of the widening conflict. One possible course presumably envisaged by the Moscow strategists would stem from the hypothetical carrying of UN military action into Manchuria or China generally.* Such a UN reaction would offer the opportunity for the Communist political strategists to invoke the provisions of the Sino-Soviet alliance of February 14, 1950. In that event, at a time when the available U.S. forces were tied down in Korea and Europe, the first new Communist blows would presumably fall simultaneously on Korea and Japan. Another possible avenue of approach would be the development of other Chinese Communist offensives concurrently with that in Korea against Indochina and Hong Kong on pretexts which have already been openly stated by the Peiping propaganda machine. This drive could be extended either toward the Philippines or westward into Thailand and Burma. That line of peripheral approach could naturally readily be extended to Europe by active development of the situations now existing in Germany and/or Iran. A third alternative might be, for the present, the active continuation of the campaign in Korea alone with the objective of annihilating the UN forces there present, with an attack on Japan and the other indicated areas to take place only at a later date. That date, be it noted, might not necessarily be much later.

As a corollary remark, it is to be observed that at such time as a major move against Japan or Germany were undertaken the Soviet Union, which has undoubtedly studied well the history of Germany's two wars of this century, would probably strike as well at the vulnerable administrative and industrial centers in the U.S.: the U.S., if it possesses a strategic air force, is nevertheless at the present time

largely stripped of trained ground troops and is weak in the tactical air force with which to oppose the Soviet Union's own strategic air force and air-borne armies advancing through Alaska and/or Canada. If American intelligence estimates do not at the present time seem to bear out this supposition of a Soviet capability of mounting an air-borne invasion, it is to be remarked that our intelligence of the Soviet Union, because of the effectiveness of the Iron Curtain, has serious gaps, and we cannot be assured that we are adequately informed of the direction, scope and timing of Soviet intentions. It would be relapsing into a Maginot Line philosophy to judge ourselves quite secure at home by reason of our stockpile of atomic bombs: the next "Pearl Harbor" may be even more surprising than the last. The USSR obviously need not maintain 170 divisions for use in Europe alone, and the Chinese Communist success in concealed penetration of Korea suggests possibilities that might be exploited by the Soviets against the American continent. If such a development is to be considered improbable for logistic reasons, the hypothetical possibility should not be left without consideration.

The present situation in Korea therefore is not to be regarded as purely a local problem. It is granted that the UN mandate cannot be abandoned. There are good reasons why it should not be abandoned, outstanding among which are the following: (1) The political consequences for the UN and the direct increment of strength to the cause of world Communism which would follow upon a UN withdrawal would be so serious that the undertaking should not be abandoned if it is possible to continue with it. (2) The naval and air superiority, and the technical superiority generally, of the UN forces are such that the UN ground forces with good generalship should be able to continue their campaign with current success despite the intervention of Chinese Communist forces in Korea, even if that intervention were to mount up to one-half million men. (3) The UN logistics, given access to the peninsula by sea and by air from a deep reservoir of supply, are more readily maintained than those of the Chinese Communists. (4) The economy of China in terms of industrial production and commercial circulation, as well as in terms of the people's livelihood, is too weak by far to permit the support of major operations for any considerable period of time. (5) The political situation in China, with deep discontents and much overt unrest, is such that outside pressure, if it can be applied, might start that rolling-up of the Communist power which is an absolute essential in the event (deemed improbable) that all-out war with the Soviet Union is to be avoided.

If the campaign in Korea is to be continued, however, it cannot be safely continued in the present manner: the time remaining before the next stage of development of the Soviet global plan is possibly, even probably, too short to permit us safely to keep our major available forces committed in that exposed position while other areas much more important strategically to the U.S. and the free world are left nearly unprotected. Those areas, particularly, comprise western Europe and Japan. China's very embarking on a program of military conquest at the expense of its seriously debilitated economy seems indicative of the existence of an earlier Communist schedule for war than had been thought. A change in strategy, and a shift of forces, would seem under present conditions to be essential. This argument draws force from the circumstance that it seems highly unlikely that a stable defense line, even if it could be thrown across the upper neck of Korea, could be effective. It is to be noted that Korea is at present in a war-torn state, that any massive program for rehabilitation cannot safely be undertaken, and that dissatisfaction and unrest will undoubtedly increase throughout the peninsula. By-passed North Korean guerrillas are already operating in south and central Korea, the Chinese Communists have already broken through the existing line, and guerrilla warfare in north and south seems bound to grow in extent and intensity. A line with the enemy on both sides of it would be largely meaningless.

With immediate reference to the existing military situation, the following suggestions are offered: (1) the UN forces should be consolidated in two major enclaves (or beachheads) respectively on the eastern and western sides of the peninsula, centering roughly on Pyongyang and Wonsan, with or without lateral contact; (2) our UN allies should immediately be consulted inside and out of the council halls of the UN, for the purpose of integrating Korean strategy into world strategy; (3) those allies should be asked to supply larger military contingents from their own sources, with new approaches made to UN members who have thus far failed to contribute troops to the enterprise; (4) the American commitment should, after stabilization of the UN position, immediately be reduced by the withdrawal of a number of U.S. divisions (four?) to Japan sufficient for the primary protection of that country, which is the truly vital area of the western Pacific for American defense, against a Soviet air-borne invasion which might be undertaken through Hokkaido; (5) the UN campaign should then be continued, on the basis of limited commitments, with the express purpose of fulfilling the UN mandate if possible, that is, continued in such manner that loss of the campaign would not constitute a vital blow to the military establishment of (a) the United States, (b) the N.A.T. areas, or (c) the Commonwealth nations. Continuation on that basis would have the merit of maintaining our political position intact and of effecting a severe drain on the economic and political strength of Communist China. It would seem feasible in view of the superior equipment of the UN forces and their better logistical position. It would enable us to build up the international aspect of the UN operation well past the point where the charge of the Peiping-Moscow axis—that the operation is purely an American operation could have any force. It would possibly enable us to avoid that involvement in a war with China which is so feared by our friends. It would enable us better to establish and strengthen our own military defenses and our military alliances against impending developments of an even graver nature than the present. And it would still be possible, in a more radical implementation of this general strategy, further to supplement the military operation by a tight UN economic embargo and even blockade of China, and even the fostering of opposition political movements in China itself. † On the eve or morrow of any later graver turn in the situation, it is further suggested, a heavy blow could be dealt against the Communist economy by the destruction (by A-bombs if need be) of not only the Yalu River Dam but the other power installations in North Korea.

As suggested above, the Moscow strategists probably conceive of alternative modes of development of their war against the free world. It is suggested that a new critical turn in events will probably not occur during the time while both the Soviet and Chinese Communist delegations are carrying on their propaganda campaign at Lake Success, and the Chinese Communist forces continue to operate in the guise of "volunteers". The earliest critical period is estimated to be possibly immediately following the termination of the UN sessions and the return of the chief Communist delegates to their homelands. A clear, violent break with the Soviet bloc in the UN would be—particularly since it would reflect a Soviet choice—a firm portent of an aggravation of military, as well as political, relations. It is estimated that another critical period would develop no later than early spring 1951, by which time, be it noted, new developments centering on Indochina can logically be expected. Tibet will also by then presumably have seen changes.

The above does not rule out reference to the means of political negotiation for the purpose of undertaking a political détente.‡ Presumably all means should be tried to gain further time for the free world. Those of our friends, particularly, who recommend the political approach, should be encouraged to make their démarches at Moscow or Peiping. The tenor of the propaganda of the Moscow-Peiping axis, however, evidently does not offer any substantial promise that success could be achieved by reference to political negotiations. It is clearly only by negotiation from a position of strength that there would be any chance of success and our present position is not one of strength. Our position is, contrariwise, one of grave military danger. It therefore behooves the United States and its allies to undertake at the earliest possible moment such redistribution and rehabilitation of their military strength as would put us, first, in a better defensive position than we are in today and, second, in a much stronger political position as well.

This telegram detailed some of the reasons for British concern outlined in telegram 3043, November 24 (see footnote 1 to telegram 3076 from London, received at 1:31 p. m. on November 25, p. 1234). Most British criticisms derived from distrust of the policies of General MacArthur and appeared centered in the belief that the U.N. offensive was launched in the midst of British proposals for a solution in Korea, that military pressure might now be exerted for authority to bomb Manchuria, and that U.N. orders were being flouted by open support of the "malodorous" Rhee regime. The criticisms were all leveled at General MacArthur, not at President Truman or Secretary of State Acheson. (741.00/11–3050) entanglement and that there should be close Anglo-American consultations before any such decision taken.

Attlee's Washington visit closely linked in all British press today with atomic issue and his quick decision to go has plainly relieved what otherwise would have been serious public tension here. Importance of this aspect visit and of Truman–Attlee talks therefore should be borne fully in mind by all information media.

Foreign Office emphasized to Embassy Office today it believes important avoid overplaying or dramatizing visit to avoid disappointment later, and suggests publicity stress general nature of talks.

Embassy impression is that vis-à-vis present Far Eastern situation and explicitly prospect of becoming entangled in all-out war with China, British opinion, always very reluctant as evidenced by their reaction on Formosa, has now hardened against any statement, step or policy which appears to lead in that direction. But Embassy also convinced that this extreme British caution with its apparent undertones is confined to issue of war with China and would not extend to Europe which all British press and government spokesmen emphasize is crucial area. Embassy feels it is important keep this background in mind when handling information on Attlee trip and Washington talks. Meantime however Embassy feels there is special and urgent need to meet criticism here of MacArthur and of his recent strategy. In particular recommend high level statement (possibly Marshall) emphasizing with all possible documentary evidence, that Chinese Commies had mounted and were on point of launching major offensive against UN forces prior to MacArthur's thrust.

931. Reactions to President's statement on A-Bomb re Sandifer-Brown¹ telecon December 1. With exception of Latins, majority of delegates commenting expressed considerable concern when reports of President's statement first spread from newsroom. Number of European and Commonwealth delegates appeared greatly shocked. Subsequent clarification had calming effect but did not entirely satisfy them. In particular, they seemed have little confidence that fears aroused at home would be allayed. Coulson, UK, spoke with emphasis along these lines today.

Federer, German observer, felt threat or even use of A-Bomb would solve nothing. It would not frighten Chinese Communists or USSR Government, since sacrifice of life was not an important consideration. Opinion expressed by several European correspondents that President's statement would receive heavy play in Stalinist propaganda.

Among Arab and Israeli delegates, President's clarification and our own explanations by no means dispelled impression US has under active consideration use of bomb in Korea. Opinion expressed this would inevitably start world war 3 and that bomb then would be used by USSR in other parts of world. Several Arab delegates went out of their way to convey fear, as expressed to them by Asian delegates, that A-Bomb might be dropped again on Asian people. Baroody, Saudi Arabia, today spoke with deep emotion to Mrs. Roosevelt along these lines saying matter had been discussed at length among delegates of smaller countries and requesting their views be transmitted to President. He felt impression would spread in Asia that US intended to use bomb against a colored people. If bomb used, effect on US relations would be disastrous for years to come. Mrs. Roosevelt replied war itself was basic evil. Although she hoped it would not be necessary to use A-Bomb in Korea, choice of weapons would have to be decided in terms military situation at particular time.

Mr. Jessup Mr. Sheppard

Mr. Hickerson the request that Mr. Truehea

Mr. Acheson opened the meeting with the request that Mr. Trueheart of the R Area ¹ give a briefing on the current situation in Korea.

After this briefing had taken place, the Secretary said that we had given careful consideration to the developments in Korea and had been in close touch with the Military Establishment. He mentioned that the Military were extremely pessimistic about the present situation and said that it was uncertain just what the decision would be so far as establishing a line on which we could hold. He said that we were looking at possible political courses in the light of the extremely grave military situation. He said that our objectives in regard to Korea in the UN were as follows:

1. To increase the security of our troops that are fighting there.

2. To localize the conflict; that is, avoid becoming involved in a more general war.

3. To end the Korean situation quickly on a statisfactory UN basis and disengage US troops as rapidly as possible.

4. To maintain a solid front among our allies and, if possible, retain the support of a majority of the UN.

In order to further these objectives we would take the following line in the UN:

1. That the intervention of the Chinese Communists has raised the gravest danger to the peace of the world.

2. If it continues, this intervention will cause a chain of developments which will bring unparalleled destruction to large areas of the world;

3. That the entire purpose of the UN Charter would come to naught if this is not stopped;

4. That the first point is to stop the fighting in Korea immediately;
5. That the UN should call upon the Chinese Communists to halt their attack and when they have done so the UN forces will cease any further hostilities against them;

6. That we believe the alleged reasons for the Chinese Communists' intervention to be completely without foundation.

7. That the UN cannot be the place for settling disputes, which is one of its primary functions, while the fighting is still going on.

The Secretary said that he was aware that the Chinese Communists might be unwilling to agree to a cease fire or might state conditions, such as withdrawing to the 38th Parallel, etc. Senator Austin replied that one of the conditions might be the withdrawal of the Seventh Fleet from Formosa.

The Senator said that many proposals were made to him. He mentioned that a Chinese, unknown to him, had stopped him in the corridors and suggested that Korea be made a dominion of the Peiping Government. Senator Austin said that he had no idea who this was, but he may have been a member of the delegation. He replied that this was absolutely impossible and the conversation ended there.

The Senator said his correspondence had been very large and was divided between those who went out all the way and recommended use of the atomic bomb and the opposite line of those who wanted to withdraw from Korea entirely. He mentioned a letter from Mrs. Bolton,² which was turned over to Mr. Hickerson for action.

Ambassador Gross said that he thought the question at the outset is how to establish contact with the Chinese Communists, where to get in touch with them, and who should serve as intermediary. He said Sir Benegal Rau was the most obvious intermediary and that, while he was often unreliable, he may be the best available. Mr. Gross mentioned numerous conversations recently with people at the UN and said the general feeling was that we should exploit the Rau approach to General Wu. He said that he had not encouraged this but had told Rau that when they had something they wanted to discuss we would, of course, be happy to consult with them.

Mr. Gross said that the attitude of many of our allies hinged on the question of what we are doing in an effort to work things out, and he felt that we must consider this and the possible use of an intermediary.

Mr. Gross referred to his conversation with Mr. Rau after Rau had seen Wu. He said that Rau had said he could not disclose all that took place. Mr. Gross said that Rau had told Jebb the same thing and that Jebb thought that some offer might have been made by Wu. Mr. Gross did not get that impression at all from his conversation with Rau.

Mr. Gross said that Rau had expressed to him the Indian position that India felt that the recently vetoed resolution was inadequate and inappropriate to the present situation and that India would want the resolution changed to include other methods of dealing with the problem. He did not state specifically what these methods might be, but said that they were along the lines of the amendments which the Indians had suggested informally when the resolution came up before.³

Mr. Jessup said that if we decided to proceed through an intermediary we could visualize our views being presented through Sir Benegal Rau to General Wu through Mao to Moscow. The point he wished to make was that it might be better to make a more direct approach to Moscow in the beginning, perhaps having someone talk to Mr. Malik. Mr. Jessup elaborated on this by saying that the use of intermediaries is a very slow process and a more direct approach would save time. Mr. Gross said that we would not even need an intermediary with Mr. Malik because conversations between the United States Delegation and Malik are rather routine.

The Secretary said that we might decide that we should use all avenues, maybe even taking it into the Political Committee at the proper time.

² Representative Frances P. Bolton, Republican, of Ohio. The letter is not printed.

Mr. Gross reverted to the discussions between Sir Benegal Rau and General Wu and suggested that in this connection the Department ask Ambassador Henderson to request the Indian Government to authorize Sir Benegal to talk with us freely and not to hold back any significant information in connection with the Rau-Wu discussions. Mr. Matthews suggested that perhaps a better approach would be to ask Ambassador Henderson to talk to Mr. Bajpai to see what information he could obtain which is not now available to us. Ambassador Gross inquired whether we had written off a direct approach to the Peiping Government through some government represented there. Mr. Matthews noted that we had tried this earlier and had not been successful.

Senator Austin inquired at this point whether we had a draft paper which we wanted him to introduce in the General Assembly. The Secretary replied that we were still considering whether it would not be better to have conversations without putting any specific position in writing. If we didn't have the conversations first, we might later have to water-down whatever position we had introduced, and we had wanted to consult with Senator Austin and Ambassador Gross first. In this connection the Secretary noted that the whole atmosphere of our approach should be very calm and without vilification.

At this point the Secretary again referred to the line we would take in the United Nations in furthering our objectives. The Secretary indicated that he thought this approach would appeal to our allies in that it was a sober, responsible position which clearly indicated that this Government does not wish to provoke a larger conflict.

In connection with the method of approach, Mr. Nitze raised the question as to whether it wouldn't be better to proceed secretly with negotiations while at the same time maintaining a public attitude of firmness. The Secretary replied that we should consider this but at the same time should keep in mind that a more open approach allowed us to bring the maximum pressure on Mao.

Mr. Gross said there was no question but that Formosa and the seating problem would be bound to come up.

The Secretary stated that in this whole matter we must keep ourselves in position to do whatever we need to do to secure our troops and our course of action should not forfeit our flexibility in this respect.

Mr. Gross said that another course of action might be to use a subcommission of the Security Council. They could meet quickly and as their first recommendation suggest that there be a cease fire order. Prior to such an approach, specific suggestions could be made to Mr. Malik to determine his attitude.

Senator Austin said that he had spent so much time at the UN that he felt that he fairly well reflected their viewpoint; that he and his staff had worked strenuously getting the delegations in line behind the resolution which was vetoed in the Security Council; and that as a result they had a certain amount of momentum underway with the other delegations. This momentum, he indicated, rests considerably on an attitude of firmness toward representatives of the USSR and of Mao. The Senator indicated that this momentum would need to be maintained and that he would find it difficult to return to New York and immediately start talking about some kind of an armistice. Mr. Gross said that it was his feeling that the momentum of the present resolution would not be inconsistent with further negotiations and that the negotiations would fit in with the line which we had been taking in New York.

Senator Austin suggested that we go ahead and let Sir Benegal make his amendments in the General Assembly along the lines which he is now thinking and in this manner neither side in the conflict would need to bear the onus of an initiative for stopping the fighting.

In conclusion, Mr. Acheson suggested that departmental staff work today with Senator Austin and Mr. Gross to produce a memorandum by evening for the President and Secretary Marshall which would outline a course of political action which might be followed in the event that the military situation requires it.⁴

TOP SECRET PRIORITY WASHINGTON, December 2, 1950—7 p. m. NIACT

Gadel 153. Eyes only for Austin and Gross. Set forth below is memo resulting from consultations this afternoon:

Recommended Steps in the UN. (1) Prompt submission to the GA by the six powers of new agenda item entitled "Intervention of the Central Peoples Govt of the Peoples Republic of China in Korea".

- (2) Concurrent submission of explanatory memorandum in such form as to leave open nature of resolution which might be adopted by GA.
- (3) Unless military situation requires different course of action, submission in GA of resolution vetoed in SC.
- (4) In the event that military necessity requires an immediate cease fire, the following alternative courses shid be considered:
- (a) An approach to the Russians or Chinese Communists or both either directly, or indirectly through an intermediary, with a view to obtaining their agreement to the issuance of an immediate cease fire and confirmation of that agreement by resolution in the SC or in any other way satisfactory to them.

The approach to the Russians and/or Chinese Communists cld be made directly by the US, by the UK, by the Indian Rep, by the Norwegian Rep, or by some combination of the foregoing. If the approach is made in Peiping the Swedish Ambas cld be used.

(b) If it is deemed inadvisable to initiate an approach to the Russians or Chinese, either directly or indirectly, there cld be proposed in the GA a resolution calling for an immediate cease fire. This cld be done by introducing a cease fire resolution instead of the vetoed SC resolution and accelerate Assembly procedures so that the whole matter is taken up in plenary session. It is believed that it wld be possible to obtain a vote in this fashion within 24 to 48 hrs after the matter is placed on the Assembly's agenda.

(c) A third and slower alternative wild be to proceed in the Assembly by submitting the vetoed SC resolution in the first instance, and arrange for the introduction in the Assembly by amendment of that resolution or otherwise of a cease fire resolution in which we wld acquiesce and which we wld push forward to a prompt vote. It wld also be possible for some other delegation to introduce a cease fire resolution in the Assembly as an interim measure pending consideration of the vetoed resolution.

(5) If an approach to the Soviet and/or Chinese is made and rejected we shld proceed in the GA in such a way as to secure and maintain the maximum support of the free world for such action on the ground as is necessary under the circumstances.

795.00/12-250

Memorandum by the Central Intelligence Agency

TOP SECRET

[Washington, December 2, 1950.] ¹

Soviet Intentions in the Current Situation

- 1. Developments in Korea and Manchuria indicate that the purpose of the Chinese Communist intervention is to render the UN position in Korea untenable.
- 2. The attitude of the Chinese Communist regime and urgent defensive preparations in China show that this intervention was undertaken with appreciation of the risk of general war between the United States and Communist China and perhaps in expectation of such a development.

- 3. It is highly improbable that the Chinese Communist regime would have accepted this risk without explicit assurance of effective Soviet support.
 - 4. The Soviet Union will probably:

a. Continue to support Chinese Communist operations in Korea by the provision of suitable materiel, technical personnel, and even "volunteer" units, as necessary.

b. Provide aircraft and anti-aircraft artillery, with trained personnel, as necessary for the defense of targets in China against UN air attack.

- c. Come openly to the military support of Communist China, under the terms of the Sino-Soviet Treaty, in the event of major US (UN) operations against Chinese territory.
- 5. The Soviet rulers, in directing or sanctioning the Chinese Communist intervention in Korea, must have appreciated the increased risk of global war and have felt ready to accept such a development.
- 6. Intelligence is inconclusive as to whether or not the Soviet intention is to precipitate a global war now. If the Soviet rulers do now intend to bring on such a war, they might well prefer that it should develop from the situation in East Asia. On the other hand, even if they do not intend to precipitate a global war, they must estimate that a broadening of the Korean war into a general war between the United States and China would be advantageous to the USSR.
- 7. Whether or not a global war were to ensue, the USSR could reasonably hope to derive the following advantages from the development of a general war between the United States and Communist China:
- a. The diversion of effective US and allied forces to operations in an indecisive theater and their attrition and containment there.
- b. The creation of dissension between the United States and its allies, which is more feasible with respect to Asian than to European issues.
- c. The disruption of the coherence achieved by the UN with respect to the original Communist aggression in Korea.

d. The obstruction of plans for the defense of Western Europe under the North Atlantic Treaty.

- e. The speedier achievement of immediate Communist objectives in Korea and Southeast Asia.
- 8. On the other hand, the USSR may estimate that the United States would decline the immediate challenge in Asia, in which case the USSR could proceed to collect the immediate stakes in Korea and Indochina.

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS

9. The Soviet rulers have resolved to pursue aggressively their world-wide attack on the power position of the United States and its allies, regardless of the possibility that global war may result, although they may estimate that the Western Allies would seek to avoid such a development. Further direct or indirect Soviet aggression in Europe and Asia is likely, regardless of the outcome of the Korean situation.

- 10. The minimal purpose of the USSR in the current situation is to render untenable the UN position in Korea.
- 11. The USSR is prepared to accept, and may be seeking to precipitate, a general war between the United States and China, despite the inherent risk of global war.
- 12. The possibility cannot be disregarded that the USSR may already have decided to precipitate global war in circumstances most advantageous to itself through the development of general war in Asia. We are unable, on the basis of present intelligence, to determine the probability of such a decision having in fact been made.

795.00/12-350

Memorandum by Mr. Lucius D. Battle, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State, of a Meeting Held on December 2, 1950

[Washington,] December 3, 1950.

On his return from the White House last night where he had met with the President, General Marshall and General Bradley, the Secretary said that it had been agreed to proceed with paragraphs 1 and 2 of the paper entitled "Recommended Steps in the United Nations". These paragraphs concern the submission to the General Assembly by the six powers of a new agenda item entitled "Intervention of the Central Peoples Government of the Peoples Republic of China in Korea". The paragraphs also provide for the concurrent submission of an explanatory memorandum in such form as to leave open the nature of the resolution which might be adopted by the General Assembly.

The President and General Marshall felt that the proposal in paragraph 3 of the paper for the submission to the General Assembly of the resolution vetoed by the Security Council was only a time-waster.

They felt that it might be a good stall for time but did not believe it would meet the current situation.

It was felt generally desirable to proceed with paragraphs $4\,a$ and b of this paper but that any steps should be after the telecon with General Collins on Sunday morning, December 3.2 It was also felt that action on these points should await Mr. Attlee's arrival.

The Secretary said that paragraph 4c was considered too slow and it was believed we did not have time for this action.

It was made clear that the provisions of paragraph 3 should be our public position for the immediate time being.

The President and General Marshall said that they felt that if any negotiations with the Russians took place, the United States should be in the talks.

There was a discussion as to the price which might be asked by the Chinese Communists as payment for a settlement of the situation. The Secretary said that he thought the least that they would ask was that we go south of the 38th parallel. General Marshall thought that it was most unlikely that the Chinese Communists would ask for this little, and the Secretary agreed. The Secretary said the next thing they might ask is that we get out of Korea. The next demand might be a seat in the General Assembly. The next, might be abandonment of Formosa. And the last, might be placing the Japanese peace treaty negotiations on a CFM basis with China represented. This would foreshadow an effort to get us out of Japan.

General Marshall mentioned that we were in a great dilemma of determining how we could save our troops and protect our national honor at the same time. He thought it would be difficult for us to abandon in good conscience the South Koreans. All agreed that we must think a long time before we come to any such conclusion.

The Secretary discussed briefly his conversation with the President and General Marshall on the domestic situation. He said that, regardless of whether it was really necessary from the standpoint of gaining authority, he felt that it was in the public interest to have the President declare a national emergency in existence. The Secretary felt that this would be highly desirable if the public was to be aware of the seriousness of the situation. He also mentioned that the President should consider use of his powers for freezing prices, wages, etc. He also urged that the President establish high and far-reaching production controls. He indicated the President said he agreed with what the Secretary had said on these points.

² General Collins arrived in Tokyo on December 4, whence he proceeded to Korea after a brief meeting with General MacArthur; see Collins, War in Peacetime, pp. 229–233.

The Secretary discussed with General Marshall and the President the urgency of getting our armed forces built up as quickly as possible, and also the need for getting the military establishment to place its orders for equipment, materiel, etc., as rapidly as could be arranged. They felt that additional funds in the form of appropriations would probably not actually be needed at present and believed that the funds presently available were ample to cover the accelerated program for the time being. Mr. Acheson urged that orders be placed as rapidly as possible. When the accelerated production gets under way, the question of additional funds can be considered.

It was agreed at this meeting that the Secretary and such others from the Department as he designated should meet with the Joint Chiefs of Staff on Sunday morning, December 3 at 9:30 and that following that the Secretary and General Marshall, and I believe General Bradley, would go over to see the President. The Secretary designated Messrs. Jessup, Rusk, Matthews and Nitze to attend the meeting from the Department and asked that I call Mr. Harriman and inform him of the meeting, which I did.

SUPPLEMENT TO MR. BATTLE'S MEMORANDUM OF DECEMBER 3 RECORDING THE SECRETARY'S CONVERSATION WITH THE PRESIDENT, GENERAL MARSHALL AND GENERAL BRADLEY

The following items appear in my notes and are therefore included in this supplementary memorandum.

At the outset of the conversation, General Marshall said the situation looked very bad indeed. General Bradley also took an extremely pessimistic view of the military situation and thought that not more than 48 to 72 hours would elapse before it reached a crash state.

General Bradley thought that the troops of the Tenth Corps could be evacuated in five days at least but wondered about the manner of the evacuation unless the cease-fire were secured. He thought the 7th Division might be saved and that the 3rd Division was nearer the ports and could get out. He thought we might lose Wonsan but might hold Hungnam. He said we could not take our troops out and leave the ROK Capital and other divisions behind.

³ On December 1, President Truman had requested from Congress an additional appropriation of $16.8 billion for the Department of Defense and a supplemental appropriation of $1,050,000,000 for the Atomic Energy Commission; see Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Harry S. Truman, 1950, p. 728.

General Marshall said that even a Dunkirk type of evacuation might be prejudiced if the Chinese brought in their air.

The President raised the question of General MacArthur's view about the need of operations across the frontier.

The Secretary repeated what he had previously said to General Marshall, namely, that the decisions should be based solely on whether it would help or hurt our troops. We need a very good military judgment as to whether knocking out the Chinese airfields would bring in the Russians. This decision should not be made by MacArthur but by General Marshall on the advice of General Collins, who should stay in Tokyo. We should not take this action for the purpose of holding Korea or merely for the purpose of retaliating against the Chinese but only for the purpose of permitting the evacuation of our troops, if necessary.

The Secretary stressed the importance of having at least the appearance of consultation with Attlee before definitive action was taken.

General Marshall indicated that we might have only 48 hours in which to reach a decision and we could not wait for the first meeting scheduled for Tuesday afternoon. General Marshall suggested it would be better to have Mr. Attlee suggest a settlement rather than having us bear the burden of making the suggestion.

1132. We concur course suggested Depcirtel 221, December 1 re Chinese intervention Korea. While this new Assembly agenda item directly involves central government of Peoples Republic of China, which Chinese have apparently been making effort to avoid, and by so doing obviously tends to sharpen issue directly between Chinese regime and UN, any other designation of responsibility for Chinese action in Korea is obviously unrealistic, and, at present state of affairs, to give further lip-service to Chinese pretensions that action "voluntary", or in someway involves less than full responsibility of Chinese regime, would appear likely to encourage Communist extension of this spurious device, possibly in other theaters.

In connection with Soviet attitude and intentions Korean situation, Department will have noted that in contrast earlier strident support

North Koreans et cetera, Soviet press recently has been relatively subdued in pronouncements particularly insofar as so-called North Korean communiqués are concerned. Latter have notably lagged behind Chinese successes and have eschewed emphasis thereon. Also, it is reported that agitators and lecturers addressing groups Moscow are comparatively colorless on Korea. We would hesitate draw important conclusions from this evidence but it obviously suggests measure of Soviet uncertainty as to future course Korea. If such uncertainty reflects any essential apprehension at UN reaction continued Chinese intervention, firm line as suggested by Department might succeed dissuade Communists from all-out effort. In any event anything but firm line will inevitably, we believe, encourage them to continuance Hitler-like tactics to which imperialist dictatorships prone. Further, as unprepared as free world nations may feel themselves this time, Chinese Communists no doubt also in less favorable position now than they might be expected to be after further period consolidation their regime et cetera.

Re Department's infotel December [1] 7 a. m.¹ Assume withdrawal to stabilized line is military necessity in any case. However, as regards maintenance indefinitely of "defensive" line, we note that defensive action has disheartening and adverse effect on UN members and their unity. Accordingly, we think such stabilization if it is to be continued long must be accompanied by increased effort in pursuit of positive objective of building up Western Europe to which French attitude on German rearmament has so far been principal obstacle.

Concern expressed among GA delegates that military-diplomatic situation may deteriorate further and belief that adroit diplomatic action essential to conclude Korean affair is also widely held among my friendly colleagues here, whose thinking similarly based on defenseless position Europe in face uncommitted Soviet forces. A number of colleagues have been advocating various moves obtain cease fire along present or even less favorable line, including UN taking initiative in proposing negotiations for armistice, neutral zone et cetera and urging at some length that fiction CPR non-involvement be continued. However, in our view military-diplomatic position UN at moment is such that initiative this type or failure cite CPR responsibility would inevitably not only fall into pitfall of appeasement, but, as sign weakness, backfire in stimulating Communists to further efforts. As set forth above, we feel calm determined firmness in face this Chinese Communist, but at least Soviet blessed, campaign offers best possibility restoring balance militarily and diplomatically to point where it will

We note this connection, recent Nenni² reference to armistice, which with previously cited attitude Soviet press et cetera, suggest that Communist thought does not rule out negotiated solution, although in present situation where things are going their way Chinese delegates refusal talk not unnatural.

We appreciate European apprehensions and, of course, united support UN as heretofore is of paramount importance. On otherhand, possibility détente now somewhat smacking of Munich is unattractive, even if—as we inclined doubt but feel unqualified to judge with assurance—same advantage of buying time for European build-up can be shown to exist now as was advanced in 1938.

prime importance that the 52 nation majority maintained complete solidarity throughout and he thought that some of the more vacillating members would have a better stomach for the endeavor if the military picture were a little less fluid and depressing.

Moreover, he thought the Chinese would also be more amenable to reason under those conditions. Then he suggested that the prospective meeting of Attlee and perhaps Pleven with President Truman in Washington would have an effect on the situation but one which was pretty hard to judge in advance. It might be well to wait at least until these conversations had begun before raising the question in the GA. He was in short in favor of avoiding the appearance of unnecessarily forcing the issue at this particular moment.

As for intransigent attitude of Chinese Communist group in New York, his UN delegation had informed him that Indian delegate Rau had finally succeeded in getting into conversation with Chinese group leader and was to have another talk very soon. Also, that Secretary-General Lie had established contact. He saw some slight hope in this and felt it supported his impression that the better course might be not to force the pace in the GA. He felt apologetic about offering this sort of advice to the US whose casualty lists were growing and who was carrying so heavy a share of the total burden. He presumed that domestic pressures were strong upon the Administration for prompt action.

165. ReDepcirtel 221. Canadian Government has assumed from start that 6 power resolution Korea would be vetoed in SC and referred to GA. Text Deptel this subject under urgent consideration in FonOff since delivery early this morning. From final meeting this evening headed by Pearson we have message as follows:

(1) We are glad to note that the US view is that the first step in consideration by the GA should be the 6 power resolution.

(2) We consider that any formal decision by the UN at this stage that Communist China is an aggressor would be unwise.

(3) In the light of the situation as we know it at present we agree that there appears to be no further fruitful action to be taken by the Council. This situation however might change.

(4) We feel that the new machinery established to transfer problems to the Assembly is so new that it will be severe test to place upon it this particular problem.

(5) It may not be essential to link the reference of this question to the GA with the resolution.

(6) There should be no effort to press for an early vote in the Assembly. The timetable should be kept flexible since much will depend on the progress of diplomatic discussions.

TOP SECRET NIACT

New Delhi, December 2, 1950—2 p. m. [Received December 2—11 p. m.]

1381. 1. During conversation with Bajpai this morning, I told him that I regretted that my illness had prevented my having a chat with him for several days. In meantime, there had been number of important developments and events including veto on part of Soviet Union of Six Power resolution and abstinence [sic] of India. He smiled rather weakly and said that India had made certain suggestions for amending resolution; that apparently resolution had to be passed so hurriedly that when it was found that objections were not practicable there had been no time for instructions to be sent to Rau. I said net result was, I feared, international Communists might not be sufficiently convinced that all of free world was completely unanimous in condemning Chinese aggression in Korea.

2. Bajpai said that it seemed to GOI that most important objective at moment was to prevent spread of hostilities. I agreed, pointing out, however, that it was not easy for UN forces to carry on warfare in present circumstances with an enemy which maintained supply base in untouchable area across international frontiers. Since large proportion American army involved US public was not likely to remain quiescent over very long period while such situation existed.

3. Bajpai told me in utmost confidence (and I request that this statement be repeated to no other government and be guarded carefully) that GOI had just turned down suggestion from Pearson of Canada that it join in appeal for immediate cease fire. It feared that such action on its part would be misunderstood. He asked me not to repeat this to my government but I feel I must violate this injunction.

4. Bajpai said he wondered whether it was too late to endeavor to set up a neutral zone around areas in which China has particularly strong strategic and economic interests. I told him I could not comment on suggestion of this kind. It could best be discussed at Washington or Lake Success. I again stressed that US had sent its troops to Korea as component part of UN forces and that all the activities of these troops had been in compliance with decisions taken by UN and that UN had inescapable responsibility for safety these forces. If these forces were in danger, it seemed clear that UN should take forthright and courageous action to minimize such danger.

Tokyo, 3 December 1950. [Received December 3—3:51 a, m.]

C-50332. Ref JCS 97772.¹ The X Corps is being withdrawn into the Hamhung area as rapidly as possible. The situation within the Eighth Army becomes increasingly critical. General Walker reports, and I agree with his estimate, that he cannot hold the Pyongyang area and under enemy pressure, when exerted, will unquestionably be forced to withdraw to the Seoul area. There is no practicability, nor would any benefit accrue thereby, to attempt to unite the forces of the Eighth Army and the X Corps. Both forces are completely outnumbered and their junction would, therefore, not only not produce added strength, but actually jeopardize the free flow of movement that arises from the two separate logistical lines of naval supply and maneuver.

As I previously reported, the development of a defense line across the waist of Korea is not feasible because of the numerical weakness of our forces as considered in connection with the distances involved; by the necessity of supplying the two parts of the line from ports within each area; and by the division of the area into two compartments by the rugged mountainous terrain running north and south. Such a line is one of approximately 120 air miles with a road distance of approximately 150 miles. If the entire United States Force of seven divisions at my disposal were placed along this defensive line it would mean that a division would be forced to protect a front of approximately 20 miles against greatly superior numbers of an enemy whose greatest strength is a potential for night infiltration through rugged terrain. Such a line with no depth would have little strength, and as a defensive concept would invite penetration with resultant envelopment and piecemeal destruction. Such a concept against the relatively weaker North Korean Forces would have been practicable, but against the full forces of the Chinese Army is impossible.

I do not believe that full comprehension exists of the basic changes which have been wrought by the undisguised entrance of the Chinese Army into the combat. Already Chinese troops to the estimated strength of approximately 26 divisions are in line of battle with an additional minimum of 200,000 to the enemy rear and now in process of being committed to action. In addition to this, remnants of the North Korean Army are being reorganized in the rear and there stands, of course, behind all this the entire military potential of Communist China.

The terrain is of a nature to diminish the effectiveness of our air support in channelizing and interrupting the enemy supply system; it serves to aid the enemy in his dispersion tactics. This, together with the present limitation of international boundary, reduces enormously the normal benefit that would accrue to our superior air force.

With the enemy concentration inland, the Navy potential is greatly diminished in effectiveness; amphibious maneuver is no longer feasible and effective use of naval gunfire support is limited.

The potentials, therefore, of our combined strength are greatly reduced and the comparison more and more becomes one of relative combat effectiveness of ground forces.

It is clearly evident, therefore, that unless ground reinforcements of the greatest magnitude are promptly supplied, this Command will be either forced into successive withdrawals with diminished powers of resistance after each such move, or will be forced to take up beachhead bastion positions which, while insuring a degree of prolonged resistance, would afford little hope of anything beyond defense.

This small command actually under present conditions is facing the entire Chinese nation in an undeclared war and unless some positive and immediate action is taken, hope for success cannot be justified and steady attrition leading to final destruction can reasonably be contemplated.

Although the command up to the present time has exhibited good morale and marked efficiency, it has been in almost unending combat for five months and is mentally fatigued and physically battered. The combat effectiveness of the Republic of Korea Forces now at our disposal is negligible; for police and constabulary uses they would have some effectiveness. The other foreign army contingents, whatever their combat efficiency may be, are in such small strength as to exercise little influence. Each United States division at my disposal other than the First Marine Division is now approximately 5,000 men understrength and at no time have they achieved their full authorized numerical complement. The Chinese troops are fresh, completely organized, splendidly trained and equipped and apparently in peak condition for actual operations.

The general evaluation of the situation here must be viewed on the basis of an entirely new war against an entirely new power of great military strength and under entirely new conditions.

The directives under which I am operating based upon the North Korean Forces as an enemy are completely outmoded by events. The fact must be clearly understood that our relatively small force now faces the full offensive power of the Chinese Communist nation augmented by extensive supply of Soviet materiel. The strategic concept suitable for operations against the North Korean Army which was so successful is not susceptible to continued application against such power. This calls for political decisions and strategic plans in implementation thereof, adequate fully to meet the realities involved. In this, time is of the essence as every hour sees the enemy power increase and ours decline.

1384. 1. In pursuance Depoirtel 221, December 1, 6 p. m., I called on Bajpai today. During our conversation I followed in general line laid down in that circular and said we would appreciate any views which GOI may have to offer as to our proposed move in UN.

2. Bajpai said that in GOI's opinion matter of further moves in UN re Communist China intervention in Korea should be postponed until after Attlee had had opportunity for full discussions in Washington. During protracted conversation which followed it became clear to me that:

(a) GOI hoping Attlee can use combined influence of various members Commonwealth and of other like minded powers in prevailing on US to agree to some kind of cease fire pending discussions either in or out of UN which would result in admission Communist China to UN, settlement Formosa problem in manner which would be at least acceptable to Communist China, settlement Korean problem in way which would save Communist China's face without sacrificing independence Korea et cetera.

(b) GOI desiring to avoid casting blame on Communist China for intervening in Korea so long as Communist China is deprived of what GOI considers its rightful place in UN.

3. I remarked to Bajpai that so far as I knew no responsible GOI leader has thus far indicated that Communist China had committed a reprehensible act by intervening in Korea and asked whether GOI was of opinion Communist China was committing aggression. Bajpai evaded reply. He indicated it would serve no purpose to formulate opinions of this kind. Problem was to work for peaceful settlement. He then explained at great length reasons why it was only logical that Chinese Communists should show their resentment at what they considered their unfair treatment from US by attacking UN forces in Korea. He said he wished to emphasize in explaining Chinese position that he was not defending it.

4. I shall not burden Department with description our exchanges. I tried to impress upon him that failure free world to present solid front in condemning Chinese aggression was likely to encourage aggressors and increase dangers to world peace.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador at Large (Jessup)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] December 3, 1950—9:30 a.m.

Subject: Meeting at the Pentagon

Participants:

General Marshall General Norstad Secretary Acheson Admiral Davis 3 Mr. Matthews General Bradlev Mr. Nitze Admiral Sherman General Ridgway General Haislip 1 and other officers Mr. Rusk General Vandenberg Mr. Harriman Mr. Jessup General Gruenther²

GENERAL RIDGWAY gave the briefing on military developments. This was based on yesterday's telecon since he said there was nothing really new in today's telecon. He stressed the adverse terrain and weather conditions. The Tenth Corps capability to withdraw is questionable. The Eighth Army probably can get down to Changdo.

In answer to Mr. Acheson's question, General Ridgway said he was not sure whether they could get to the Seoul area. The enemy can get down in force in a matter of days. We can hold the three beachheads of Inchon, Hamhung and Pusan for some time if we can get our troops in the beachheads. They could hold until a decision is made on the question of evacuation. He indicated they could reach the Seoul-Inchon area.

GENERAL BRADLEY said it was less clear that the Tenth Corps could get to Hamhung. There are some rail facilities—seven engines and 200 cars which can take the Capital Division and part of the Seventh Division part way. He expressed anxiety about radio reports on our troops strength and movements of the troops. This problem of release of military information to the enemy would have to be re-examined. General MacArthur has authority to impose censorship but he has not done so.

GENERAL RIDGWAY and ADMIRAL SHERMAN described the necessity for the Marines to regroup at Hagaru before the Division can withdraw. About 1,000 wounded have been evacuated by air.

Gen. Wade H. Haislip, Vice Chief of Staff, U.S. Army.
 Lt. Gen. Alfred M. Gruenther, Deputy Chief of Staff for Plans, U.S. Army.
 Vice Adm. Arthur C. Davis, Director of the Joint Staff, Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Secretary Acheson asked whether this information gives the answer to the questions asked at the meeting last night with the President; namely, has the military situation reached a point at which it is necessary for us to get a cease-fire?

GENERAL BRADLEY said if this is possible it would be fine. There is still a question of the price to be paid. Do we get out of Korea and do they? The military situation would improve if we succeed in getting into the beachheads. We do not have much strength in Pusan.

General Ridgway, in answer to General Marshall, who asked about the 2,300 replacements scheduled for December, said they were being expedited but pointed out they were mostly recruits just finished with their fourteen weeks training. Men are being flown out.

GENERAL HAISLIP said that General MacArthur sets the priorities as between men, equipment, etc.

General Bradley raised the question whether if we cannot get a cease-fire in forty-eight hours through the UN must we conclude that we must take action ourselves. Should we take other means, for example, saying to the Chinese Communists that since they refuse a cease-fire we consider we are at war. If we get out of Korea are we to give up the whole of Asia? Against China we could use blockade of the coast, bombing and a good many other things to bother them, though we would probably not use the A-Bomb.

Mr. Jessur asked General Bradley what he anticipated the Chinese Communist reaction would be in regard to attacks on Hong Kong and Indochina. To which General Bradley replied that we could hurt them a great deal by air; he noted their shortage of gas.

Mr. Acheson spoke on the question of the price which might have to be paid for a cease-fire. Do we say in the UN that we must have a cease-fire? Such an offer would either be rejected or it would start talks. As General Marshall had pointed out, we must consider the security of our troops and the effect on the position of the United States in the Far East and the whole world. There is danger of our becoming the greatest appeasers of all time if we abandon the Koreans and they are slaughtered; if there is a Dunkirk and we are forced out it is a disaster but not a disgraceful one. It seemed to him that the Tenth Corps will be forced out but the others would not be just yet. If the UN declares a cease-fire and an approach is made to the Chinese Communists and the Soviet Union they will ask terms. It would seem alright to agree to withdraw to the 38th parallel. This would not involve any loss of national unity. This, however, seems too easy and it is doubtful if they would agree. They might say we must leave Korea. We might agree to withdraw the Tenth Corps to Japan but not the Eighth Army. If this were accepted and we can get the Tenth Corps out they might soon start a new attack on the Eighth Army.

We are presented with a bitter choice. They may further ask that we withdraw the Seventh Fleet from Formosa and seat them in the UN. We must consider whether these are negotiable propositions. They might further demand that the Japanese Peace Treaty be concluded only by unanimous agreement of five parties, including the Chinese Communists. This would mean driving us out of the Far East.

General Vandenberg said that beginning negotiations on such matters involves the possibility of getting ourselves into a position from which we could not withdraw.

Mr. Acheson agreed that we would probably be drawn into negotiations. We get no support from our friends, except the Philippines, on refusing to withdraw the Seventh Fleet. The other countries agree that Formosa is not ours and have no sympathy with our position. On the other hand, if we can get a solid front among our Allies with our going back to the 38th parallel, this is a position with moral force and maintains cohesiveness among the Allies. The present tendency among other countries is to criticize us rather than the Chinese Communists.

GENERAL VANDENBERG asked whether we were not getting into a trap; the Chinese Communists will say "No, but . . ."

Secretary Acheson said we must anticipate that someone will propose a cease-fire, for example, Attlee. The State Department can try to hold other governments on what is decent and right. We must avoid having the whole world think we are wrong. We can get support for not abandoning Japan and support for not abandoning Korea. There would be no support on Formosa or on the question of seating the Chinese Communists.

General Bradley said from a military point of view a cease-fire would be very useful to relieve pressure, etc., but the political price will be too great. If we suggested and the conditions are bad, what do we do then? If we are forced out by military or political action where do we go? If we are to be at war with the Chinese Communists we certainly don't want to hand them Formosa. He repeated that a cease-fire would be a help to us if the cost is not too great. Time has now run out on that proposition and we must consider it.

Secretary Acheson agreed. Regarding a state of war with the Chinese Communists we must consider carefully any steps against China generally. If a cease-fire is rejected and we have to fight our way out, all military steps against the Chinese should relate to the evacuation of our troops. Anything helping out that is alright. If measures against China do not contribute to that end and are mere retaliation, it would not meet this test. If we get into general war with China and there are grave chances of general war with the Soviet Union soon then we would fight without allies on our side.

General Bradley said we must weigh that against Korea and against the loss of prestige in Asia and Europe. We would lose Indochina and Formosa. The Germans are already saying we have proved that we are weak. Appearement is gaining in Europe.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN said there were only two ways to treat with the Chinese. We can say we are a weakened nation and will negotiate. This is not true. We have lost men and will lose more and one can say we have lost a campaign but we are not defeated. He thought we should not ask for a cease-fire. The only sound basis for dealing with the Chinese Communists would say that unless you stop you are at war with the United States. If after that they choose war, we get our troops out as best we can and fight the war. If we don't take this course others will begin to push us around. If any one can kill that many Americans and not be at war, we are defeated.

Mr. Rusk asked regarding the evacuation of our forces without major destruction, what pressure is on us to pay some price to save that force.

GENERAL BRADLEY said it was a race to get into the beachhead. They probably won't agree to a cease-fire. It is a question of how long we can hold. It was also a question of how long the American public will stand this without saying we are at war with China.

Secretary Acheson said the great trouble is that we are fighting the wrong nation. We are fighting the second team, whereas the real enemy is the Soviet Union.

General Bradley said that he would not advocate putting men into China but wondered whether we could come home and just forget the matter.

Secretary Acheson said certainly not. He asked what the effect of war with China would be on our ability to fight the Soviet Union which would like to see us tangle with the Chinese. If our resources are devoted there, we cannot build up strength in Europe.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN urged that we avoid telling the Chinese or the Soviet Union that we will not do anything against them. We must avoid press, radio stories, etc., on what we are doing. We should make no commitment as to anything that we must do.

Secretary Acheson said suppose we are at war with the Chinese Communists we must think what is the effect on our Allies and our relations with the Soviet Union. He thought many of them would quit us and deal with the Soviet Union.

Mr. Harriman said he was not sure of that yet on the basis of his information.

Secretary Acheson thought that the other countries would not be willing to get into war with China in view of the Sino-Soviet Treaty.

General Marshall raised the question of Indochina and the dilemma of the French there and the resulting French attitude.

Secretary Acheson said the French are so weak and shell-shocked they are anxious for a deal which would give an illusion of safety. He asked Mr. Rusk for his views.

Mr. Rusk said the French would try to get a deal with Ho and then withdraw. They would not stay firm except with a solid UN front. The danger is that we might lose both our principles and our troops. The UN did come in in June. They are tied in with us and we with them in the UN. Unless we maintain the integrity of the UN, there is a question if we can maintain the integrity of our foreign policy. There must be no reward for aggression in Korea. We could solidify the UN with us on standing on the 38th parallel. If the Chinese cross the parallel it would solidify our UN support. The UN should be clear as to the Chinese Communist action. We are not actually at war yet and are therefore not committed to defeat Communist China. If the UN declares China an aggressor, the Chinese Communists get no political profit from aggression. The contrary would be true if they are seated as a result of the aggression. We must convince our friends. We cannot sustain here the theory of an absolute priority for Europe if we surrender the Far East. We could try to void China, making it hard for them to solidify their control and thus difficult to move into Southeast Asia. We could step up current action, if it would not involve too much sacrifice of our troops. It is a middle way between appeasement and full war.

GENERAL MARSHALL asked if we would confine the cease-fire to a line at the 38th parallel.

Mr. Rusk said the only thing we should accept by agreement is the 38th parallel and that anything else should be taken only de facto.

General Vandenberg asked whether we would settle the Formosan problem.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN said we may get some help out of Formosa if there are general hostilities with the Chinese. The UN must stand firm.

General Marshall said that the attitude described in the UN was illogical, amounting almost to bad faith but that one had to recognize that such situations do arise in international relations. He recalled the reactions in the British press at the time of the Battle of the Bulge. We must accept the UN procedure and try to improve it but not expect perfection.

Mr. Harriman said that tactics in the UN must consider our moral position and American opinion. Our policy must be based on holding the US and the British Commonwealth in line. The European attitude depends upon us and our attitude and what we are ready to do. More action in our defense effort is necessary. Many in Europe are ready to appease but not all of them will take this line unless we lose our leadership.

GENERAL HAISLIP pointed out that we can do nothing to help in Europe since we have only one Division and very few supplies to contribute.

General Bradley thought that Mr. Rusk's statement was fine. We might gain with the UN by proposing it but there was still the danger that we might get into a position of trading in regard to abandoning all of Korea, Formosa, etc. Again the question was how big a price will we pay. Perhaps we should make the gesture regarding the 38th parallel which might involve some gains but where do we go from there. Should we not say that if we don't accept this then we will be at war?

Mr. Nitze questioned whether the Soviet Union would want the Chinese Communists to accept it. If not, are we ready to follow the chain of events if the Soviet Union puts in its forces in support of the Chinese. There would be a slight chance of holding our European allies. It is not possible to hold the UK in line for early hostilities with the Soviet Union. He was not much worried about refusing to yield on Formosa and the question of seating the Chinese while we were under attack but there was the question of holding our allies in line. If we carry hostilities against China and the Soviet Union comes in what do we do?

Secretary Acheson asked whether anyone doubted that it would be desirable to have a cease-fire on the 38th parallel if some other country suggested it. (There was no answer to this but no dissent.)

GENERAL BRADLEY asked how much we could afford to lose by abandonment without further action against Communist China. He spoke of the reaction in Congress and among the armed forces. He doubted whether the Chinese would accept the 38th parallel if we crossed it first.

Admiral Davis said the UN proposal ought to be immediate.

Mr. HARRIMAN asked whether anyone doubted the immediate necessity of a higher degree of mobilization.

Admiral Sherman agreed we should accelerate.

GENERAL VANDENBERG questioned whether the Russians would move in Europe at the same time they might move in Asia. It might be better to get their Air Force involved in Asia. It would be very good from our point of view if we could force them to devote their air to Asia where they are more vulnerable and thus weaken their air force in Europe.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN said we must not tie up troops in China and we must make no public statement regarding what we plan to do.

General Bradley said there were two questions. The political question was whether we ask for a cease-fire; the military question is when we draw back to the beachheads, do we begin to evacuate our troops or do we fight to a Dunkirk. We can evacuate personnel rapidly from Inchon but not the equipment. We can get out more if we begin at once. The same is true of Pusan but there was a question about Hamhung. An immediate decision must be made on whether we begin to withdraw.

Secretary Acheson asked whether the materiel is vital.

General Bradley said we have nothing else but you cannot say it is "vital".

Admiral Sherman explained that 60,000 men could be evacuated from Inchon in one day without their equipment but that it would take six days to evacuate one division with its equipment.

Secretary Acheson asked whether we should evacuate the ROK forces.

Mr. Matthews said that we could not leave them there if they wanted to come out.

General Marshall returned to Admiral Sherman's point about starting from a complete admission of defeat. He pointed to the important psychological elements. On the political side he thought it would be useful if someone would put up the proposal of a cease-fire on the 38th parallel before we get there. Once we are in the beachheads the Chinese Communists can overrun South Korea. The line-up with the British Commonwealth is most important.

Mr. Rusk suggested there was no sense going to Pusan.

Mr. Jessup raised the question whether the ROK forces should be evacuated to Japan.

Mr. Rusk said that the Communists were very active among the Koreans now in Japan and that it might be risky to bring in the Korean Army.

Admiral Sherman raised the question of the rearmament of Japan.

General Bradley asked whether we should begin evacuation of civilian dependents from Berlin and other exposed places. Was there any political or military gain? We have avoided this step hitherto because of its psychological effect. On the other hand can we go to full mobilization and leave them exposed. We need an answer soon on this.

Admiral Sherman thought we should not allow any more dependents to go out to these places now.

General Vandenberg said if there was any political advantage in it we should do it fast.

Mr. Matthews said there was certainly no political advantage.

GENERAL VANDENBERG said it might show the USSR we meant business.

Mr. Harriman said it would scare Europe very badly.

GENERAL BRADLEY said if the Chinese attack on us in Korea is not war would it be war if they overran our zone in Berlin.

Secretary Acheson said we have already said it would be.

General Bradley recalled that we used to say that an attack on a platoon of United States troops meant war. Would anyone believe it now if we don't react to the Chinese attack. We might well be overrun by East Germans in Berlin.

Secretary Acheson doubted if the Russians would deflect any of their forces from Europe to China. He thought they might begin making trouble in Berlin and Vienna.

General Vandenberg said that the proposed action against China would not affect our capacity in Europe. All we would need would be the naval blockade and the use of one or two air groups. It would be a long-range job.

Mr. Jessup asked whether it would involve the loss of Hong Kong and Indochina.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN said the Chinese would take them anyhow.

GENERAL VANDENBERG stated it would be harder for the Chinese Communists to hold their people under an attack; they would have a great problem with food and transportation, etc.

Mr. Harriman expressed agreement with Admiral Sherman's previous statement about treating with the Chinese.

General Bradley asked what the effect would be on our friends in going beyond what we are now doing. He repeated the urgent need for deciding the two questions about a cease-fire on the 38th parallel and evacuation of our forces from the beachhead.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN said we could not give MacArthur an order about evacuation unless censorship had been previously imposed.

General Ridgway said we needed to accelerate now our mobilization. We have an uncommitted capacity for 75,000 more men.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN thought the President should announce a program of acceleration.

There followed a general discussion on details of calling up more men, the state of readiness of the camps, rebuilding, etc.

General Marshall kept pressing the question whether we need more money to do more than we are doing and General Ridgway and General Gruenther indicated that we did.

Secretary Acheson suggested that the President should take public action, including a declaration of national emergency which was not technically necessary but which would show the country the general attitude the President was taking.

General Vandenberg agreed it was important to make the country realize the situation.

General Bradley suggested that we establish firm beachheads but do it on the principle that we are going to withdraw in an orderly way. We might then get some other country to propose a cease-fire in the UN on the 38th parallel.

Mr. Jessup raised the question of whether we should agree that all non-Korean forces should leave Korea as proposed by General Wu of the Chinese Communist Delegation in his speech.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN said that he would rather take war with China than this.

Mr. Rusk suggested that any withdrawal would be a phased withdrawal under UN supervision.

General Vandenberg wondered whether the American people would accept it.

GENERAL BRADLEY was worried whether we could do this without striking back at the Chinese Communists.

Secretary Acheson said that if we should start action against the Chinese Communists elsewhere, the military situation is we must get out of Korea and the choice is between being forced out in a Dunkirk with heavy losses or whether we have a negotiated withdrawal or whether we undertake it along with war against the Chinese Communists. We might be at a point at which we would find the UN was not at war with Communist China but at the same time if we are at war with Communist China we want the greatest possible support from others.

General Bradley said he didn't want war with Communist China. The effect of pulling out or being kicked out without war with Communist China would, however, be very bad. He would not propose any retaliation until after we had completed the evacuation.

GENERAL GRUENTHER asked him whether he would include an ultimatum to the Chinese that if they did not stop fighting we would consider ourselves at war putting a date a few days ahead as General Bradley had previously indicated.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN said he didn't think the Chinese had fuel enough for a prolonged air effort.

General Marshall inquired about our anti-aircraft at Inchon. While we have lost a great deal of equipment there is still a great deal of anti-aircraft in the theater.

Secretary Acheson said that if we concluded now for whatever reason, either American opinion or anything else, to continue hostilities against the Chinese Communists we cannot take the course of proposing a cease-fire on any basis. We can't have a cease-fire and still go on fighting the Chinese unless they violated the cease-fire and renew their attack because in that case we alone would be starting a war in violation of the UN order. If we must go ahead with hostilities against the Chinese we must not take the course of ending the hostilities; we must be forced out of Korea and therefore we must resist a suggestion of a cease-fire. In that case, we would have to try to get condemnation of the Chinese and have them branded as an aggressor.

Mr. Jessur emphasized the point about unilateral defiance of a UN order.

GENERAL MARSHALL agreed.

Mr. NITZE said we would be better off if we had no hostilities with the Chinese if we could do this with honor and then get ready for the Soviet Union.

General Vandenberg stated that with the casualties we have suffered, a cease-fire is unacceptable.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN distinguished between the Israeli-Egyptian cease-fire and the present proposal in which the UN itself is being pushed around.

MR. JESSUP said that Admiral Sherman's point was entirely logical but that unfortunately the members of the UN are not looking at the matter so logically.

Mr. Harriman questioned whether a cease-fire proposal would unite the UN.

Mr. Jessur suggested we would have to decide which would be the greater blow to our prestige—to accept a cease-fire or to be driven out of Korea.

GENERAL VANDENBERG agreed.

SECRETARY ACHESON said that the President must talk with Attlee before a decision is made for war with China. We could go ahead and take the first three steps in the memorandum. We still have latitude with regard to the kind of resolution to press in the UN.

Mr. HARRIMAN said that any other course would be very dangerous.

Mr. Acheson said that at the meeting last night we had thought we might have to take some other course, but that the reports he had heard this morning looked better with regard to the military position.

GENERAL MARSHALL agreed that it did look slightly better. There is no use in holding the Northeast part of Korea. The military estimate of possibly reaching Inchon was better than it had been last night.

^{*}Reference is to the memorandum in telegram Gadel 153 to New York, December 2, 7 p. m., p. 1307.

General Bradley said that if our beachheads are not strongly established we need to get out as soon as possible. However, several days are needed for the talks with Attlee and the questions in the UN. He said that they expected to lose Wonsan but hope to hold Hamhung or Hungnam.

Secretary Acheson returned to the question of the desirability of censorship.

Admiral Sherman said it was most desirable but it was difficult. Perhaps the best way was to get the reporters out of the place.

Secretary Acheson recalled that General Sherman's policy in the Civil War was to tell the correspondents all his plans and then lock them up in jail.

Mr. Rusk stressed the importance of not announcing our plans in regard to evacuation of troops.

ADMIRAL SHERMAN urged that General MacArthur be ordered to get his troops into the beachheads at once.

GENERAL MARSHALL inquired whether he hadn't already received such orders and Admiral Sherman indicated that the Joint Chiefs had indicated concurrence in his plans.

GENERAL MARSHALL said it was important that the President should talk with Attlee before final decisions were made.

General Bradley read a draft of an order to General MacArthur along the lines of telling him to hold the beachheads as long as required pending settlement of the general situation.

General Marshall questioned whether it was necessary to go into so much detail on the situation and future developments. He thought it would be sufficient merely to approve the grouping in the three-base areas. He wondered, however, whether this would bar General MacArthur from any other choice which might seem to him on the ground necessary.

General Bradley said that the Joint Chiefs were merely approving what MacArthur had suggested. He agreed it was dangerous to make any more commitments than necessary.

Admiral Sherman suggested inserting a sentence to the effect that the safety of his forces was paramount.⁵

Secretary Acheson said that from the political point of view the evacuation of the Tenth Corps was alright.

GENERAL MARSHALL noted his concern about the problem of the South Koreans.

⁵The Joint Chiefs of Staff transmitted the following message to General MacArthur at 1:41 p. m. on December 3:

[&]quot;Your C 50332. We consider that the preservation of your forces is now the primary consideration. Consolidation of forces into beachheads is concurred in." (Telegram JCS 97917; 795.00/12-350)

General Bradley raised the question of the 160,000 north Korean POW's we hold.

Mr. Rusk suggested that we might want to exchange them for some of the prisoners which they hold.

GENERAL MARSHALL said this matter must be considered and guidance sent later to General MacArthur.

Memorandum of a Telephone Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

[Washington,] December 3, 1950.

Subject: Nehru's Message to Rau

Ambassador Gross telephoned me at 11:15 this morning and gave me the following summary of a message from Nehru to Sir B. N. Rau at New York. This is based on a telephone conversation between Rau and Gross.

The Prime Minister says there is great anxiety about recent developments, President Truman's mention use of the atomic bomb. The Prime Minister is most anxious to help in any effort to avoid war. The Prime Minister feels that the best procedure would be for representatives of the great powers to meet and to attempt to stop the rapid progressive deterioration. But even a temporary solution must now be quickly sought. Any such discussion must include "China" (note by Ambassador Gross: Rau made clear that this referred to Peiping).

Nehru believes that steps should be taken for a cease-fire as soon as possible followed by the demarcation of a demilitarized zone. At this time the Prime Minister thinks it is essential to have a frank approach which must be aimed at peace. If we can obtain a cease-fire followed by a demarcation of a demilitarized zone the whole question of a settlement in Korea and later of Formosa can be negotiated. Nehru is convinced that unless the question of Formosa can be disposed of along the lines of the Cairo declaration there is no hope for lasting peace in Asia.

Nehru wants to make clear he is not condoning Chinese intervention in Korea but it is necessary to face reality. The Prime Minister thinks the Chinese feel the United States has aggressive designs against them and makes special reference to "non-recognition" policy. (Rau did not read to Gross Nehru's comment regarding this point.)

Nehru believes that it is a matter of absolute necessity to avoid use of the atomic bomb. Such use would make war inevitable. There is a wide-spread feeling in Asia that the atomic bomb is a weapon used only against Asiatics.

Nehru will make a statement of "some sort" tomorrow in the Indian parliament. Rau is not sure of the nature of the statement.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Executive Secretariat (McWilliams)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] December 3, 1950.

Subject: Meeting in Mr. Matthews' office, at approximately 12:00 Noon, re Korea.

Participants: Messrs. Webb, Matthews, Jessup, Nitze, Kennan, Hickerson, Rusk, Barrett, McWilliams

Messrs. Matthews, Rusk, Jessup and Nitze had just returned from a meeting in the Pentagon attended by the Secretary with the Secretary of Defense and his advisers. Mr. Matthews reported that the current thinking of the military was that while the military situation in Korea was extremely dangerous, it was not yet bordering on a catastrophe. It was felt that blocking positions could be established to enable the bulk of the 8th Army to retreat, if necessary, to the Pusan area, where they could be evacuated. The bulk of the 10th Corps has been ordered to concentrate in the Hamhung area, where they will be evacuated if necessary. It is the feeling of the military that we should continue to fight as long as possible and only evacuate in event of necessity. It is also their feeling that the South Korean troops should not be abandoned by our forces, but should either be transported to the south where they could disband and infiltrate back to their homes or be taken to some point outside Korea. The military people agreed with us that it would be unwise to engage in a complete war with the Chinese, but the Navy and Air Force believe that we should take some action in the event of evacuation to repay the Chinese Communists for their deeds. This might take the form of a complete blockade and a concentrated air effort over the major cities of China. This is not, at the moment, a decision, but merely represents thinking of some of the people at the Pentagon.

There was some discussion in this meeting of the latest national intelligence estimate on Soviet intentions and capabilities. Mr. Kennan said that he had looked it over but did not entirely agree with it. He said he did not believe the events of the past few weeks were the result of a master plan by the Soviets, but that they had been playing the situation by ear and through a series of favorable events had found themselves in a much more advantageous position than they had ever hoped. He also said that he did not yet believe that World War III was inevitable and he did not believe that another Korea is likely to break out in another place.

Toward the close of the meeting Dr. Jessup said that he was greatly concerned over the matter of censorship and press speculation. He thought that the worst thing that could happen at this point was loose statements by Government officials, and he urged that the President be asked to issue an order stopping all speechmaking, press conferences, and interviews by individuals. He said he thought that the program which has been going on in the Department of having correspondents see selected officials for background should be stopped at once, and that consideration should be given to having questions submitted in advance of their press conferences to the President and the Secretary. Mr. Barrett and Mr. Webb both said they would give attention to this matter.1

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Executive Secretariat (Sheppard)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] December 3, 1950—3 p. m.

Subject: Report of the Secretary's meeting at the White House with the President, General Marshall and General Bradley

Participants: The Secretary

Mr. Rusk

Mr. Webb Mr. Matthews Mr. Kennan

Mr. Hickerson

Mr. Jessup Mr. Sheppard

Mr. Nitze

The meeting was called so that the Secretary could report the discussion which he had had with the President, General Marshall and General Bradley at the White House late this morning.

The Secretary said that he had raised in the meeting with the President the question whether our position in the world required us to continue hostilities with the Chinese Communists. He said he had advanced the viewpoint that if that were the case, it would mean that we would have to examine the policies governing our other actions to conform to that situation. He had further stated that if our world position did not require us to continue hostilities with the Chinese Communists, then it would be necessary to try to stop the fighting in Korea before the disintegration moved too far in order to save our forces.

¹ On December 5, President Truman issued a directive to all Cabinet officers and certain other officials of the Executive Branch "to reduce the number of public speeches pertaining to foreign or military policy". The directive laid down the necessity for clearing with the Department of State in advance any "speech, press release, or other public statement concerning foreign policy" and with the Department of Defense any such statement concerning military policy. The President also issued instructions that officials overseas, "including military commanders and diplomatic representatives, should be ordered to exercise extreme caution in public statements, to clear all but routine statements with their departments, and to refrain from direct communication on military or foreign policy with newspapers, magazines, or other publicity media in the United States". The directive was forwarded to General MacArthur by the JCS on December 6; for the text, see Hearings, p. 3536.

The Secretary said that he went on to say that so far as the evacuation was concerned, it seemed to him to break down into three parts—the East Coast, Inchon and Pusan.

With respect to the East Coast the Secretary said he indicated that, so far as he was concerned, this operation is solely concerned with saving troops. He told the President that there was nothing to be gained politically by making a stand there. The problem was simply to do what you could to get them out. The Secretary told the President that he didn't wish this to appear as advice because it was a strictly military matter. However, if the military did need some kind of political action, such as a cease fire, in order to carry out the evacuation on the East Coast, then the military should let us know.

With respect to Inchon, the Secretary said he had advanced his opinion that for a couple of days, there were no decisions which had to be made. He continued that General MacArthur will probably have his hands full getting the troops to Inchon during this period. After that, it would seem to be a normal operation to remove wounded troops and disorganized units first. The Secretary said he told the group that as far as he was concerned these troops which were not combat effective should be removed. The Secretary said he had told the group that if there was a question as to where these troops should be relanded and refitted, he would suggest Japan over Korea.

The Secretary said that he had discussed the additional question as to what to do with the South Koreans. The Secretary had said that it would be dreadful to abandon them far from their homes and that he felt they should be picked up some way or other and relanded in South Korea to filter back to their home towns. He said that he had stressed that the main thing, though, was not to abandon them. General Marshall and General Bradley agreed that this was very important.

The Secretary said that he then discussed his viewpoint that it was essential to get some kind of censorship in the Far Eastern Command immediately. He had said it would be much better if General Willoughby were to have no additional press conferences in which he speculated about the possible courses of action, and the dire consequences which would flow from alternate courses. The President replied that he might just have to order censorship invoked. In response to this, General Marshall indicated this would be a rather difficult thing to do.

The Secretary said that the question then came up about the price we would have to pay for the events in Korea. The Secretary said he replied to this that we were tending to dwell on a false dichotomy. The Secretary said he suggested that we should now put our minds on action in the United Nations. The Secretary said he suggested perhaps we should think along the lines of a cease fire at the 38th parallel, which raised the question whether such a resolution might be rejected. If it is accepted, the Secretary had continued, we will need to understand that we can't do things like bombing Manchuria and will be required to observe it ourselves; on the other hand, if we think the probabilities are that it will not be accepted, then that would be another thing. In any event, the Secretary said that he had assured the President that we would carefully analyze the possibilities and prepare a possible course of political action.

The Secretary said that he felt that the President would want to listen to Prime Minister Attlee and see what the general temper is of our allies. The Secretary said that he was sure the President was not prepared, at this point at least, to negotiate with anyone, or to ask for a cease fire.

Mr. Hickerson said that Ambassador Gross had called from New York to say that Mr. Dulles and the whole senior staff recommended that we go ahead in the General Assembly with the resolution which was vetoed in the Security Council. Mr. Gross had talked to Mr. Younger who was very reluctant to go ahead with the resolution with respect to Chinese Communist aggression in Korea. Mr. Younger urged that we await Mr. Attlee's arrival and give Mr. Younger an opportunity to talk to Mr. Attlee about it first. Mr. Hickerson said that if he had the Secretary's approval he would move right away and talk with the British on going ahead with steps 1, 2 and possibly 3 (in the telegram to USUN).

Mr. Hickerson said that this brought us to face with the question whether we go ahead with steps 1 and 2 alone if the British disagree with us. The Secretary remarked that it is imperative that we not get separated from the British on the eve of Mr. Attlee's arrival. Mr. Jessup asked whether we would in fact become separated from them if they don't agree. Mr. Jessup said perhaps it would be possible to go ahead alone on steps 1 and 2, assuring the British that we won't do anything toward introducing a resolution until we consult further with them.

The Secretary summed this up by saying the question was "If the British and the other sponsors of the old resolution disagree with putting this item on the agenda, do we want to put it on alone with Mr. Attlee arriving the next day?" The Secretary said he was inclined to think we shouldn't go ahead alone, and it was left that way.

The Counsellor of the Canadian Embassy (Ignatieff) to the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Perkins)

SECRET

Washington, December 3, 1950.1

DEAR MR. PERKINS: The Canadian Government wishes its views on the Korean situation, as set forth in the attached memorandum, to be transmitted to the Government of the United States immediately. The Ambassador has therefore asked me to deliver this message to you today.

Copies of this memorandum are also being transmitted to the Governments of Australia, Belgium, Ceylon, France, India, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, South Africa, Turkey and the United Kingdom. I am giving a copy of this memorandum to the British Ambassador this afternoon.

Mr. Wrong has also been informed that the Canadian Government is most anxious at this time to keep in as close touch as possible with the Government of the United States, as well as the other Governments noted above, and that the Canadian Government would welcome an expression of your Government's views.

Yours sincerely,

G. IGNATIEFF

[Enclosure]

Canadian Government's Memorandum on Korea December 2nd, 1950

1. Ever since the decision was made to resist the aggression on Korea, the determination of the democratic powers has been to use their utmost endeavors to limit hostilities in the Korean area and to have them come to an end as quickly as possible. The only country whose interests would be served by a war with China would be the Soviet Union.

¹A manuscript note on the source text by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Bonbright) indicated that this note was handed to him by Mr. Ignatieff on December 3 at 4:30 p. m.

2. A war with China would commit to this theatre of operations a dangerously large proportion of the limited armed resources of the democratic powers at the expense of other fronts such as Western Europe, where the Soviet Union may intend to conduct its major campaign if a third world war should break out.

3. There is danger that a war with China would lead to Soviet armed intervention to assist China since the only assumption on which we can safely proceed is that before the Chinese Communist Government decided to intervene in force in Korea it had received from the Soviet Union assurances of assistance in the event of U.N. military retaliation against China.

against China

4. The situation in Korea must therefore be looked at in the light of global strategy and of the present balance of armed forces between the Soviet world and the democratic world. Given determination by the democratic world, time is on our side and we should therefore play for time so long as we can do so without denying our obligations under the United Nations Charter.

5. It is moreover essential that public opinion not only in the Americas but in Western Europe and in the democratic states of Asia, should be convinced that we are doing everything we possibly can to avoid war. If, despite all our efforts, China and the Soviet Union should precipitate a war, it is essential that the democratic nations should be united in their resistance to aggression. This end would be more difficult to achieve unless there had been sustained common efforts to avert a catastrophe.

6. The door should therefore be left open until the last possible moment for a settlement with the Chinese Communists by negotiation. Consequently any formal decision by the United Nations at this stage that Communist China is an aggressor would, we think, be unwise.

7. Meanwhile, every opportunity for discussion of the issues with Communist China should be explored. Once the military situation has been stabilized, a cease fire might be attainable. This might be followed by the creation of a demilitarized zone. In these conditions, a modus vivendi might be sought by negotiation. In this connection consideration might have to be given to the other related aspects of the Chinese problem, such as Formosa and Chinese representation in the United Nations.²

No formal, written reply to this Canadian note was made by the Department of State. On March 6, 1951, Norris S. Haselton of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs talked with Mr. Ignatieff, who acknowledged that he had been in close touch with Department of State officials on this subject and indicated that no reply was necessary since most of the points raised in the Canadian memorandum had been overtaken by events.

SECRET PRIORITY New York, December 3, 1950—5:56 p.m. [Received December 3—6:16 p.m.]

Delga 365. Re Chinese Communist conversations with UN SYG. Confirming Gross-Hickerson telecon Saturday, December 2, following is report of Gross conversation with SYG Lie and Entezam held 6 p. m. Saturday evening.

¹ Nasrollah Entezam, Iranian Ambassador to the United States and Chairman of the Iranian Delegation to the U.N. General Assembly, was President of the 5th Session of the General Assembly.

Regarding 1½ hour talk Lie held with Wu and other Peiping representatives December 1, Lie described conversation as taking place in friendly atmosphere. After discussing number administrative matters, Lie says he told Wu in direct language that Chinese were "committing aggression" in Korea and that the killing must stop as soon as possible. Lie reports he told Wu that there must be a cease-fire and that "it was no good" that they were killing American boys and Americans were killing Chinese. He says he told Wu that he should have more contacts with other delegates, those which have not recognized Peiping regime as well as those which have. If Wu had such contacts he would find out that everyone agreed with what Lie was saying about stopping the fighting. Reminding Wu that Lie had always favored seating Peiping regime in UN, he says he told Wu that course they were now pursuing would not bring about that objective.

When Wu indicated willingness to see other delegates, Lie arranged a dinner at his home 8 p. m., Monday, December 4. Guest list, submitted to Wu in advance and approved by him, includes Jebb, Rau, Zafrulla Khan, Grafstrom, Sharett, Zinchenko, as well as Wu, Chiao, Mrs. Kung and interpreters. Lie explained he invited Sharett not only because Israel had recognized Peiping but because Sharett speaks Russian. For reason Lie plans to put Sharett alongside Wu and Jebb alongside Chiao.

During course of conversation, Gross alerted Entezam to possible need for quick GA action on Chinese intervention question. Entezam expressed entire willingness to cooperate.

After Entezam left, Lie told Gross that Entezam was also "trying to get in touch with Wu" and appeared anxious to talk with him.

Lie gave strong impression to Gross throughout conversation, without expressly saying so, that he considered himself to be logical chosen instrument for mediation. Gross of course remained completely noncommittal.

expressed yesterday re UN action on Korea situation had been confirmed today by cabinet defense committee made up of Prime Minister, Defense Minister, Justice Minister and himself.

They understood from Norwegian UN delegation that proposal now was for delegations of 6 powers jointly to address letter to Assembly President tomorrow December 4 requesting item be placed on GA agenda as urgent priority matter. This would be expected bring on full debate beginning December 6 or very shortly thereafter. Debate in turn would aim toward early passage of resolution which would presumably receive more than $\frac{2}{3}$ vote even if not all of 52 country majority. Seemed quite unlikely China would heed any such resolution particularly so long as Chinese troops were or thought they were winning. In opinion himself and his 3 colleagues end result would then be a state of declared war between the Communist Government of China and the UN.

Once this process were set in motion by putting the question on the GA agenda, the other steps would inexorably follow without possibility of stopping them.

They therefore consider that at least a few days more should elapse before the fatal sequence is started. Rau and Lie have told Norwegian UN delegation they are pessimistic as result their conversations with Chinese Communist group but do not yet feel approach hopeless. Still some remote possibility there which could be explored next few days, Lange thinks. Then also although latest military news is discouraging, defensible new line might be found which would improve UNs position. Thirdly Norwegian Government would hope that Attlee and President Truman would weigh consequences of proposed GA procedure during interval.

Lange said he believed we would find other western European countries thinking along these same lines.

Issue being placed before full cabinet tomorrow morning and then before Storting Foreign Affairs Committee composed all parties. Instructions to Norwegian UN delegation are to set forth above position and if other 5 delegations should insist on getting item on GA agenda without further delay, delegation is to seek further instructions.

Please instruct niact if Department wishes I press US view. Norwegian view that once matter gets on GA agenda it will head straight toward declared war or equivalent in short time seems to afford room for argument.¹

Memorandum by Mr. Lucius D. Battle, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] December 4, 1950.

After the 9:30 meeting today the Secretary talked to Messrs. Webb, Jessup, Matthews, Rusk, Nitze and Kennan on the Korean crisis.

Mr. Rusk asked if the Military were in the frame of mind for the best possible effort which we could make there. He mentioned that they all appear to be extremely dejected and he had been thinking overnight whether we should not think long and carefully about mustering our best effort and spirit together to put up the best possible fight in Korea. He mentioned the difficulty that the British had been in in this sort of situation where the odds were overwhelmingly against them but they had managed to hold. Mr. Rusk thought that we might talk to the Military about making the best possible effort to consolidate our position to one point or points in Korea. He thought we could at least force the Chinese Communists to make a really major effort at great cost to themselves if they were to get us out of Korea. He said that we do have, of course, to consider the welfare and protection of our troops but thought that within that range we might be able to consolidate and make a really effective stand. He mentioned the great difficulty which would result to our position in both Europe and the Far East if we were to simply bow out at this point. He referred to the some 23,000 replacements which were scheduled to move into Korea and asked whether these and possibly others might not be thrown in to help hold a position at some point.

Mr. Kennan said that we were in a very difficult position—one which was similar to the one the British had been in in the last two wars when they held on when there was no apparent reason for it. He mentioned the political desirability of retaining a position of some sort in Korea.

Mr. Rusk said that we must get a real estimate from the Military on its capacity to resist. He said we must make the best stand possible if we are unable to get a cease fire at the 38th parallel. He mentioned the possibility of using General Collins as a Field Commander with General MacArthur spending full time on the Japanese Peace Treaty.

The Secretary said that in order to do this we would have to strengthen the Military's will to resist and at the same time see that they did not bomb Manchuria. Mr. Webb said that there were two courses: one to let the Secretary talk to General Marshall; the second, to let the operating level in the State Department take up the matter with the same level in the Military.

Mr. Kennan said that with regard to any possible negotiations with the Russians, a request for a cease fire would look to the U.S.S.R. as a suit for peace. The U.S.S.R. would then want to extract every possible advantage and to damage wherever possible the prestige of the United States. He said their reply would inevitably be an arrogant one. He said that if others approached the Russians for us, the Russians would probably refer to the need for a general political settlement and would probably insist on the discussion taking place in the Security Council rather than the General Assembly, Mr. Kennan said that, if we try to negotiate under a threat to attack the Chinese Communists, the U.S.S.R. would probably appear indifferent publicly. He said that if we threaten general war with the U.S.S.R., they would probably decline to negotiate on that basis. He said that if we threaten to use the atom bomb that the U.S.S.R. would not negotiate under such threat of military action. He said that it was not out of the question that the Russians would agree to some sort of settlement in the Far East involving some sort of status for Korea but that this would inevitably be in the framework of United States concessions in the Far East. Mr. Kennan was speaking from a paper 1 which I believe he has put on file in the Department. I was unable to get full notes on all of his discussion.

Mr. Kennan concluded by saying that now was the poorest time possible for any negotiations with the Russians. He said that if there were validity to the theory that negotiations should be from conditions of strength, this was clearly a very bad time for an approach to the Russians.

Later Mr. Acheson spoke to General Marshall about the foregoing problems and Messrs. Rusk, Matthews and Kennan went over to see the General. Mr. Kennan is doing a memorandum of his meeting over there.²

For the Joint Chiefs of Staff:

KOREA

It is recommended that the President discuss with Mr. Attlee the following course of action with respect to Korea:

- 1. Inform Mr. Attlee of the military situation confronting United Nations forces and of the plan to assemble them in three beachheads in the Seoul-Inchon, Hamhung and Pusan areas. Inform him that the X Corps will be evacuated from northeast Korea and moved to Japan in any way which proves to be militarily practicable. The precise handling of evacuated Korean forces will require special attention.
- 2. It would be militarily advantageous in the immediate situation if a cease-fire order could be arranged provided that considerations offered were not so great as to be unacceptable. It might insure full support of the United Nations if it were done on the basis of the 38th Parallel. Before Chinese Communist forces have reached the 38th Parallel in strength, we should try to establish a cease-fire on the basis of the 38th Parallel, with the armies separated by a demilitarized zone. The principal purpose of this effort would be to attempt to deny a success to aggression and to consolidate an overwhelming majority of the United Nations behind this attempt. Arrangements for a cease-fire on the basis of the 38th Parallel must not be impose conditions which would jeopardize the safety of United Nations forces nor be conditioned on agreement on other issues, such as Formosa, and the Chinese seat in the UN. During this cease-fire effort the United Nations Eighth Army would retire on the Scoul-Inchen area but should not begin any evacuation until the result of the cease-fire effort can be determined.
- 3. If a cease-fire ean should be effected which permits a stabilization of the 38th Parallel, United Nations should proceed with the political, military and economic stabilization of the Republic of Korea while continuing efforts to seek an independent and unified Korea by political means.

¹In the enclosure, the underlined portions are those suggested for insertion by the JCS, while those lined out represent sections of the original Department of State draft recommended for deletion by the JCS.

4. If the Chinese Communists reject a cease-fire and move major forces south of the 38th Parallel, the United Nations Eighth Army forces will face a forced evacuation of the Korea. Secul-Inchon and Pusan areas. The consequences of a voluntary acceptance of a successful aggression and of a voluntary abandonment of our Korean allies would be such that any United Nations evacuation must be clearly the result of military necessity only.

5. If the Chinese Communists drive United Nations forces out of South Korea, The United Nations must take immediate action to declare Communist China an aggressor and must mobilize such political and economic measures as are available to bring pressure upon Peiping and to affirm the determination of the United Nations not to accept an aggression. The absence of available forces and the acknowledgment that the major threat posed to the free world comes from the Seviet Union would not permit an effort to impose a military defeat upon Peiping on the mainland of China. This would not exclude, however, Also there is the possibility of some military action which would harass the Chinese pending their acceptance of a United Nations settlement for Korea and would not exclude any including efforts which could be made to stimulate anticommunist resistance within China itself, including such as the exploitation of Nationalist capabilities, imposition of a naval blockade, and disruption of communications by bombing.

In addition to the measures indicated above, the U.S. and U.K. should consult immediately about other steps which might be taken to strengthen non-communist Asia. These steps might include:

(a) Restoration of considerable self-government to Japan, the acceleration of efforts to obtain a Japanese peace settlement, the strengthening of Japanese capacity for self-defense, the greater utilization of productive capacity to strengthen the capabilities of the free world, and the prompt admission of Japan into international organizations. United Kingdom reluctance to move on these points should be discarded in light of the new critical situation.

(b) Appropriate military arrangements between nations in Southeast Asia capable of effective mutual support. Further steps to organize collective security in the Pacific on a regional basis.

(c) Special efforts to convince non-communist Asia of the nature of the threat which confronts it and to urge upon the governments concerned the need for concerted Asian action to resist communist aggression in that area.

(d) Intensification of economic and military assistance to encourage the organization of resistance to communist encroachment.

(e) Intensification of psychological and covert activity against communist regimes and activity in Asia.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Acting Officer in Charge of Korean Affairs (Emmons)

SECRET

[Washington,] December 4, 1950.

Subject: Korea

Participants:

Dr. John M. Chang, Korean Ambassador

Mr. Sae Sun Kim, Counselor, Korean Embassy

Mr. Dean Rusk, Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern

Affairs

Mr. Livingston T. Merchant, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs

Mr. Arthur B. Emmons, 3rd, Officer in Charge of Korean Affairs

Ambassador Chang called on Mr. Rusk at 11 o'clock today by appointment to make a farewell call before returning to Korea to assume his new post as Prime Minister. Mr. Rusk expressed his congratulations to the Ambassador on his new appointment and, on behalf of the Secretary, apologized for the necessity of having had to cancel the Secretary's appointment with the Ambassador for this afternoon at 2:30. The Ambassador said that he was planning to leave for Korea on Saturday, December 9, and hoped to see the Secretary before leaving.

Mr. Rusk reviewed the military situation in Korea and emphasized that this information was top secret and must be very carefully guarded. He asked the Ambassador whether the Korean units fighting guerrillas in South Korea were well-trained or were green troops. The Ambassador replied that he believed that the majority were in fact relatively untrained. The Ambassador added, however, that there was the Youth Corps which numbered some 500,000 and which if given arms could throw its weight into the fighting and that his Government would use every available man if necessary. He said that the Korean people were determined to fight Communism to the end but that the United States must help them by supplying the necessary arms. Mr. Rusk remarked that the Ambassador should in no sense feel any shame with respect to the Korean units which had been cut up in the breakthrough north of Pyongyang, since they had been overwhelmed by greatly superior forces and had borne the brunt of a major all-out attack.

The Ambassador expressed the hope that action could be taken in the United Nations with respect to the new crisis in Korea and stated that the present six-power resolution did not meet the requirements of the situation since it carried no threat of sanctions against the Chinese regime. Mr. Rusk pointed out that if too much in the nature of sanctions were embodied in the resolution, many of the delegations would not vote for it and that it was more than ever essential to maintain the unanimity of the United Nations in the face of these new developments. The Ambassador replied that the Korean people were the ones who were now suffering destruction and death and while other nations, such as those of western Europe, were worried about their future defense, Koreans were fighting for their very lives. Dr. Chang emphasized that it was obvious that it was not the Chinese Communist regime that was alone responsible for the present intervention in Korea but that this represented an overall plan for Communist aggression and domination which was being directed and carried out from Moscow and that if it were to be stopped, the United Nations must strike at the cause.

The Ambassador believed that the Chinese people themselves were not inclined to support the Communist aggression in Korea and that, if given their choice, no such intervention would have taken place. He stated that the Chinese and Korean peoples had traditionally enjoyed good relations and that it was only through Russian pressure that the Chinese would have attacked Korea. He suggested that the United States might withdraw the Seventh Fleet and allow the Chinese Nationalists on Formosa to attack the Chinese mainland as a diversion to the Korean operation. If such a landing were made, he felt that there was a good chance that the Chinese people might rally to the Nationalist cause now that they had been exposed to Communist methods. Mr. Rusk replied that there were significant military considerations which must be taken into account in connection with this proposal, and that it must not be assumed that the Chinese Communists had left the coast of China opposite Formosa militarily uncovered as a result of their intervention in Korea.

Mr. Rusk suggested that during the remainder of the Ambassador's stay in the United States, daily conversations with the Department might be helpful and made appointments with the Ambassador for 11 A. M. on December 5 and tentatively for the same hour on December 6.

At this point Mr. Rusk was called away urgently to the Secretary's office and Mr. Merchant came in. As Mr. Rusk was leaving, the Ambassador asked him to impress upon the Secretary and upon the President that his Government would strongly oppose any attempt at appeasement of the Chinese Communists at this stage and that it would not agree to the establishment of a buffer state at the expense of Korean territory. He reiterated the firm resolve of the Koreans to fight Communist aggression to the end and hoped that the American people not only appreciated this fact but that the United States and the United Nations were also determined to see the thing through. He felt that a strong statement by the President at this time along these lines would be helpful.

Following Mr. Rusk's departure the Ambassador again went over some of the ground he had covered with Mr. Rusk and again emphasized the sufferings of the Korean people and their determination to continue a fight to end Communism.

Mr. Emmons asked him whether the fact that Chinese armies were now invading Korea might not tend to create stronger bonds of unity within the Korean population against such a foreign invader and that as a result a more solid front against Communism might not develop. The Ambassador believed that such would be the case.

As he was leaving, the Ambassador again reiterated the determination of the Korean people to fight Communism to the last and his hope that the Americans not only understood this but would render them all possible support. Mr. Merchant replied that we fully appreciated Korean courage and determination in the new situation which had developed.

Participants: S

Sir Roger Makins (UK Foreign Office)

Mr. Robert Scott (UK Foreign Office)

Mr. Philip C. Jessup

Sir Roger Makins and Mr. Scott called on me at 12:30 to inquire about the plans for the meeting this afternoon. I gave them an indication of the procedure which I understood the President was inclined to follow along the line of the "scenario." I said I thought that General Bradley would give them a review of the military situation and that then the President would probably suggest some consideration of Item 1 of the agenda—the General Review—prior to getting into the specific issues on Korea. I said we understood Mr. Attlee was prepared to state his views on this, and Sir Roger confirmed this. I said that I thought the President, after the discussion of the general situation, might set forth his general appreciation of the problems confronting us in Korea and the issues which need to be resolved and that he would hope to hear Mr. Attlee's views. Makins pressed hard for an indication of the conclusion which we had reached, and I said that I felt sure the President had reserved final decision until he could talk with Mr. Attlee.

At their request, I gave them a brief indication of the military situation indicating that, while it was serious, it was by no means desperate, that the grouping of the forces and the beach-heads was proceeding in an orderly way, that we still had considerable good forces and that we were not talking about throwing in the sponge.

I asked if it was correct as reported in the press that Mr. Attlee was going to urge some kind of cease-fire and whether he would present the view of all the British Commonwealth. They said that they did not think the Prime Minister had an absolute firm view on just what ought to be done and indicated that, so far as the general Commonwealth position was concerned, they had no concerted view since the recent military developments. Several times they indicated that an appreciation of the military situation was crucial to their reaching a decision. I confirmed their impression that it did not seem feasible militarily now to establish a firm East-West line, but that the beachheads probably could be held at least for some time.

They revealed without fully committing themselves an inclination for some kind of negotiated solution with the Chinese, perhaps through the Indians. I pointed out the dangers inherent in the process of negotiation with the Chinese demanding more and more prices. I stressed the dire consequences of setting in motion a series of chain reactions which would lead the Chinese and Russians to the conclusions that the use of force could produce concessions on whatever they wanted. In this connection, I mentioned the possible repercussions in terms of an East German attack on Berlin, for example. They said that they had been naturally thinking a great deal about that end of it, and Mr. Attlee would probably touch upon this in his general review. They agreed on the importance of maintaining a common front in the United Nations. I noted the danger that a variety of self-appointed mediators might make different suggestions to the Chinese thus giving them an opportunity to choose among various proposals with the possibility of splitting our ranks. They thought it very possible that Trygve Lie might engage in such voluntary mediation. They seemed to try to press me to say that we felt a negotiated solution was the best and I repeatedly told them that we were not all satisfied that the matter should be handled by negotiation but were considering the possibility of some "arrangement" which might be brought about as the result of our holding of the beach-heads plus an overwhelming vote in the United Nations suggesting an acceptable solution. They seemed to recognize the danger of trying to bargain on such questions as Formosa, the seating of the Chinese Communists and the Japanese Peace Treaty and to accept the view that we should avoid paying a price to reward an aggression.

I asked them about Rau's conversations with Wu, and they professed ignorance; that after the first talk Rau had told them he could not reveal the full nature of his talk without specific authorization from Nehru.

PRIORITY

New York, December 4, 1950—1:59 p. m. [Received December 4—3 p. m.]

Delga 368. For Hickerson from Gross—Re Rau talks with Wu (confirming Telecon Hickerson-Gross).

Rau, Younger, Jebb and Gross meeting called by Rau, 4 December, 10 a. m. Rau advised he wished to give a full account of his two talks with Wu and Chiao.

At meeting between Rau and Wu on December 1, Rau proposed to Wu an immediate cease fire with a demilitarized zone to be negotiated. Wu asked Rau for written proposal, without indicating any interest in discussing matter at the moment. At noon, on December 1, Rau gave Wu a written proposal, text of which was not produced by Rau in our meeting this morning. In reply to questions by Younger, Rau stated the written proposal contained a suggestion for immediate cease fire, for demilitarized zone to be somewhere south of the Manchurian frontier without specification. Wu stated he would transmit the proposal to Peking that same day.

On December 3, in the evening, Rau had another and apparently longer talk with Wu and Chiao. Wu said that he had received no reply from Peking and that communication time required three days before answer could be expected from Peking. When Rau asked whether he was computing three days from December 1, Wu replied that he was not, but that he meant he would receive a reply in three days from December 3.

Rau at his meeting with Wu Sunday night added to the suggestion he had made on December 1 the additional proposal that after agreeing to an immediate cease fire and to a demilitarized zone to be promptly negotiated, there should be a conference among representatives of "the great powers" for the purpose of discussing those matters which would clearly remain for discussion. According to Rau, Wu voiced very strong resentment against "the American ruling circles" and insisted that Peking Government had real belief that the US was intent upon war with China. Rau argued that the American people, just as the Chinese people, do not want war. Wu's reaction was cold and stated that if there were a war it would not be the fault of the American people but of the American rulers.

Reverting to discussion of meeting of representatives of great powers, I asked Rau specifically whether he had in any way made such a suggestion a condition or implied commitment with regard to the first steps he had proposed. Rau was quite clear that he had not done so but that he felt it necessary, upon instructions from his Prime Minister, to offer a specific forum in which political matters could be discussed as promptly as possible but in any event, after a cease fire and establishment of a demilitarized zone.

He made it clear that the great power meeting would be attended by Peking representative. Wu said he would transmit this additional suggestion for a great power meeting to Peking and would expect also to have that question answered by Wednesday.

I said that I wished it to be clearly and distinctly understood that I was absolutely without any instructions whatever concerning the matter of a cease fire. I said that I would be willing to listen to any suggestions Rau had and particularly interested to learn of his discussions with Wu on this subject, but that I would either refrain from comment or if I did comment it would be understood that I was completely without instructions or authority on the matter. Rau, Younger and Jebb all stated they understood this and Jebb and Younger stated they were in precisely the same position.

In discussing with Rau his concept of a demilitarized zone, he stated that he had not discussed details of any sort with Wu because he considered that question to be a matter for negotiation. However, Rau added that in his mind a demilitarized zone would undoubtedly mean withdrawal of Chinese troops beyond the Yalu River and the withdrawal of UN forces to an undetermined line.1

Jebb asked for Rau's ideas concerning the nature of the administration of such a demilitarized zone and in particular requested Rau's views concerning the position of North Korean forces in such a zone. Rau replied that he assumed that such North Korean forces as might be in the zone would lay down their arms, that the area would be "neutralized". With regard to the question of administration, Rau stated he had given no thought to the matter.

Rau stressed that the question of Formosa seemed to be if not uppermost at least very much in the minds of the Peking representatives. In referring to alleged American aggressive designs against China, Wu used Formosa as his main talking point rather than Korea. He did not mention the 38th parallel. With regard to Formosa itself, Rau told Wu that he did not consider it appropriate at this stage to discuss the matter although he felt that an ultimate solution should undoubtedly be along the lines of the Cairo declaration. Rau further informed me that Wu made it clear that the importance which the Chinese Communists attach to Formosa was grounded in large part upon their belief that it was the purpose of the Americans to keep Chiang in power on Formosa with a well supplied armed force which would stand as a constant threat to the mainland and therefore as a constant peril.² Rau further said Wu had made it clear that while a solution of the Formosa question would be of the greatest importance to the Peking regime, they also attached considerable importance to being seated in the UN.

Rau said that throughout the conversation at repeated intervals, Wu referred to this matter, clearly indicating that it was one of the sources of Chinese Communist bitterness against the US and a symptom of our aggressive design toward them. Rau understood this to mean that our support of Tsiang in remaining seated was the political part of our military conspiracy for the potential use of Chiang.

With regard to Rau's suggestion for a great power meeting, I believe that he not only made the suggestion at the instructions of Nehru, but that he told Wu that this was Nehru's idea.

Rau insisted that in his discussion with Wu he made it clear that the important and essential thing was to cease hostilities. When Wu said at several points that it was the fault of the American interventionists that fighting was going on, Rau replied that without in any way agreeing with Wu he said that question was irrelevant. In commenting aside to Younger and myself, Rau said that he himself felt that the main objective was to let the trapped troops get disentangled as soon as possible. In reply to Wu's comment about American intervention, Rau said he used the figure of speech that "when a house is on fire" the first thing you do is to prevent the spread of the fire by creating a lane and that a continuance of the fighting undoubtedly was inviting disaster to everyone.

Turning to procedures in the General Assembly, I asked Rau what his own judgment was concerning the next steps. I told him, and Jebb and Younger both nodded agreement, that the six sponsors of the vetoed SC resolution felt it of the greatest importance to bring the matter within the cognizance of the GA and that we had agreed that it should be done by sending a letter to the Secretary General this morning and subsequently circulating the vetoed six power resolution with some editorial changes. Rau said that he had talked with Wu about the six power resolution. Wu very vehemently insisted that the six power resolution was part of an "American plot" to lay the basis for bombing of Manchuria. Wu said that if the six power resolution were introduced into the GA, "those who voted for it would have to be responsible for the consequences".

At this point, Younger and Jebb interjected that they were aware of the undesirability of proceeding too quickly to a vote upon the resolution and had increasing doubts as to its adequacy or appropriateness.

Rau quickly said that his Prime Minister had grave doubts on the same matter and had in fact advised Rau that he should not support this resolution. Rau referred to the amendments circulated informally by him on November 12 in connection with the six power resolution and said he believed that Nehru felt these amendments were still appropriate except that in lieu of reference to the Peace Observation Commission, Nehru believed that a great power meeting was more appropriate to the present situation.

I pressed Rau concerning this matter and ascertained that he was more doubtful as to Nehru's attitude than his opening statement on the subject implied. In fact, he said he was not sure concerning the use of the POC, saying that from one point of view it seemed "slightly out of date". He said that if he [we?] wished him to, he would wire New Delhi for comments because the Prime Minister had not in fact referred to the POC either in his instructions to Rau or "in his telegram to Attlee". I said that I of course was not in a position to comment concerning this matter at the present moment, but that speaking quite personally, I thought there would be great difficulties in the way of setting up great [power] attendance, but also from the point of view of fixing an agenda. For example, would such meetings confine themselves to Far Eastern questions. Rau, without giving an explicit reply, said that he assumed they would be so limited. Younger then said that he doubted whether such questions as might be raised, mentioning Indochina and Formosa, could be effectively disposed of in this manner.

'Calls for the immediate cessation of hostilities;

^{*}The amendments were reported to the Department in telegram 817, November 13, from New York, as follows:

[&]quot;Rau handed Gross for consultation the following suggested substitute for last two paragraphs of Korean resolution before Security Council:

^{&#}x27;Calls attention to the grave danger which the continued employment of Chinese (Communist) forces in Korea would entail for the restoration and maintenance of peace in this region:

Decides that a peace observation commission composed as described in section B of resolution A adopted by the GA on November 3, 1950, with the omission of China which is a party to the present proceedings, be established and be directed—^{&#}x27;(a) to proceed to the area as soon as possible;

'(b) To consider urgently and to assist in the settlement of any problems relating to conditions on the Korean frontier in which states or authorities on the other side of the frontier have an interest.'" (330/11-1350)

Reverting to the POC, I said that again speaking entirely personally and without authority, I wondered whether we might not envisage three phases rather than two. First would be a cease fire; second would be interposition of POC which could supervise cease fire and provide requisite assurances to both sides; and third phase would be the use or establishment of some appropriate forum for discussing political issues. I expressed the personal view that to attempt to jump from a cease fire situation to a full fledged discussion of political issues might be a leap which could not be made. However, I said that of course I would communicate this whole conversation and in the meantime requested Younger and Rau to say or do nothing of any nature on the basis of any comments I had made in view of their purely personal nature.

I asked Rau what he thought his government would do in the event that we proceeded to table in the GA the six power resolution. He said he had no instructions on this point but thought that he might table at some appropriate time a resolution calling for a cease fire and demilitarized zone.

Rau has no present plan for seeing Wu again except that they will be together at dinner tonight at the home of Trygve Lie, in the company of Jebb, Zafrullah Khan, Sharett, Grafstrom. Wu told Rau he would get in touch with him as soon as he had received instructions but did not expect them until Wednesday.

I told Rau I would be in touch with him if possible later in the day, particularly with regard to whether we had views concerning the possible use of the POC. In this connection, Rau pointed out that in the amendments he had circulated November 12, he had provided that China would not sit as a member of the POC because they were party to the dispute but that China could be heard by the POC. In this manner, Rau said it had been his intention to by-pass the question of Chinese recognition. However, he did not know whether this remained a timely suggestion and in particular felt that the Chinese Communists would not accept this procedure. [Gross.]

The Swedish Ambassador called at his request this afternoon to inform Mr. Rusk that the Swedish Ambassador in Peiping had been unable to establish any further contact with the top Chinese Communist officials. The Ambassador said that he had called to report this fact and to answer his own conscience by asking if there was any further action which we felt they could take at this time. Mr. Rusk thanked him and replied that we saw nothing further to be done for the present. Mr. Rusk then asked him if they knew whether or not Mao Tse-tung was in Peiping. The Ambassador replied that in response to this specific question, the Swedish Ambassador in Peiping had reported that he did not know.

The Ambassador asked what our plans were with respect to a resolution in the General Assembly and Mr. Rusk replied that the six sponsoring powers were seeking today to place the subject on the agenda of the General Assembly but that no final decision had been reached as to the nature of the resolution to be offered. The Ambassador suggested that the resolution vetoed in the Security Council would have very broad support in the General Assembly and, without definite commitment, Mr. Rusk indicated agreement with this thought.

The Ambassador referred gloomily to the apparent military situation in Korea and suggested that disengagement with a view to gaining a breathing space seemed best course. Mr. Rusk said that a breathing space was alright provided that it was utilized to the full in strengthening ourselves. He also pointed out as indicative of the grave implications of withdrawal from Korea the fact that the United States faces both the Atlantic and the Pacific; that a large segment of the American people might, if they found themselves alone in the Pacific and forced to withdraw, reason that similarly they should withdraw from commitments across the Atlantic. The Ambassador indicated his understanding of the broad situation.

Mr. Rusk thanked the Ambassador for his call and expressed regret that the impending meeting at the White House ² did not allow him the time he would like to continue the conversation.

¹On December 4, the Swedish Government informed the United States that it would support referral of the six-power resolution to the General Asssembly, the Norwegian Government agreed to join the other five powers in the actual procedure, and the Government of New Zealand indicated that it would vote for the six-power resolution in the General Assembly (telegram 657 from Stockholm, telegram 565 from Oslo, and telegram 175 from Wellington; all December 4; all 795.00/12-450).

UNITED STATES The President Secretary of State Acheson Secretary of Defense Marshall Secretary of the Treasury \mathbf{Snyder} General Omar Bradley Mr. W. Averell Harriman Mr. W. UNITED KINGDOM
Prime Minister Attlee
Sir Oliver Franks
Field Marshal Sir William Slim
Sir Roger Makins
Lord Tedder
Mr. Robert Scott
Mr. Denis Rickett ³

Mr. George Elsey ²

The President opened the meeting by expressing his appreciation of the Prime Minister's coming to the United States. The objectives of the United States and the United Kingdom are parallel, and he hoped they always will be. Accordingly, he believed these discussions would be very useful. The situation is so serious that he felt it was necessary to begin the talks as soon as possible, although he had wanted to give the Prime Minister time to rest after his arrival. After he had consulted with the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense, it had seemed that he ought to ask the Prime Minister to begin this afternoon since he did not want to come to any conclusions until after he had talked with him. He suggested that the Prime Minister might like to have the military situation presented by General Bradley.

⁸ Principal Private Secretary to Prime Minister Attlee.

GENERAL BRADLEY summarized the situation on the map. He said there had not been very much pressure on the western front during the last 24 hours. A new line was now being formed and then the forces would withdraw in an organized way to the Inchon-Seoul beachhead. The port of Inchon has been handling 3,000 tons a day and could handle more. The Tenth Corps is being concentrated in the Hamhung-Hungnam beachhead. This force had been scattered in order to unify Korea as part of the program of holding elections throughout the country. It had now been ordered to fall back. The Seventh Division was proceeding with its withdrawal without too much opposition, and the two Korean divisions were coming back. The First Marine Division and one regiment of the Seventh Division were fighting their way back from Hagaru but had a difficult problem in withdrawing over a road which was controlled by the Chinese Communists. Yesterday they had evacuated 1,100 wounded from improvised airfields and 978 the day before. They were being supplied by air drops, 270 tons having been dropped yesterday. In South Korea in the Pusan area, three ROK divisions and some smaller divisions were being supplied through Pusan. The position at Inchon was rather strong. The river protects one flank and support can be given by naval gunfire. One cruiser and two destroyers are now standing by to give support.

Our air has been very active, flying 600 missions yesterday; there were 230 missions by Naval air. It has been this close air support which has enabled our forces to stand up against odds of about seven to one. There has been very little enemy air lately. Yesterday four or five Migs jumped a reconnaissance plane and one other. The reconnaissance plane escaped and the other returned badly shot up.

FIELD MARSHAL SLIM inquired whether it was the intention to hold the beachheads or to evacuate them.

General Bradley said this made little difference at the time. No orders have yet been given as to which the commander is to do. No answer has yet been given to the question whether we should withdraw or hold them.

FIELD MARSHAL SLIM asked whether they could hold.

General Bradley replied that, if they get back in good shape, they could hold for some time. He noted the forces available include two good ROK divisions, two somewhat less good ROK divisions, a Turkish brigade, as well as the British and American forces. Contrasting the position which they have been in with the beachhead, General Bradley said they had had very little artillery, but on the beachhead with artillery and protected flanks they could hold pretty well. It would be some days yet before they could be assembled in the Inchon area. In the east, two divisions are moving by sea from Wonsan. It was less certain we could hold in the east. He thought the Seventh Division could get back in good shape since it was now able to move by rail, there being seven engines and 200 cars available. The Third Division is expected to be able to keep its heavy equipment.

FIELD MARSHAL SLIM suggested that the Chinese forces and ours might arrive at the eastern beachhead at about the same time. He asked whether fresh equipment could be put in by sea.

GENERAL BRADLEY agreed that the Chinese might be able to get there at the same time and fresh equipment could be so landed.

FIELD MARSHAL SLIM remarked that it was very important to hold a beachhead in North Korea. This would constitute much more of a bargaining point.

General Bradley thought it was not much considering the size of the beachhead and the size of the enemy force.

FIELD MARSHAL SLIM suggested that nevertheless, while it was held, it might make the Chinese think we are building up. He inquired about the situation at Pusan.

General Bradley said we must at least hold this against guerrilla attacks for some time. It was our main point for bringing in supplies, handling about 30,000 tons a day. We also have 150,000 North Korean POW's in that area. It will take some time to get scattered ROK divisions down there.

FIELD MARSHAL SLIM inquired General Bradley's estimate of the reliability of the ROK forces.

General Bradley said they fight reasonably well; that so far as their officers were concerned, they did not have much training. No divisional commander has as much as three years' service, and it is difficult to develop proper officers in that time.

THE PRIME MINISTER said he understood there was no possibility of holding a line across the peninsula.

GENERAL BRADLEY said that was true since the enemy had too great a capability of infiltration. Even with all of our forces intact, there would have been a question of holding the narrow point at the waist.

General Marshall added that there were some 30,000 South Koreans without very much training with the Marines and the Seventh Division. The ROK main weakness was in the command. The individuals were good fighters and had shown great resiliency. After being badly battered, they were put together again and back in action with rapidity. On the west, unless the enemy cuts in from the northeast, there is a very good opportunity to get back without the forces being too much demoralized. On the northeast, there was still a question what shape they would come back in and whether the Chinese Communists would arrive in the area simultaneously. The ports there were small and, while they did not have the problem of the tides which bothered us at Inchon, their capacity was restricted.

The Prime Minister inquired whether we could keep our air cover. General Bradley said there had been no trouble so far. We have five carriers standing off the coast and are operating from seven fields. The field at Wonsan is out, and the Hamhung field is of doubtful value. We have good fields at Kimpo (Seoul), Suwon, Taegu, Taejon, and Pusan. Suwon, however, may be too far to be included in the beachhead. The retention of Taegu and Taejon depends on the guerrillas. He recalled that at first we had operated out of fields in Japan, and that this could be resumed to some extent. If however we are run off the airfields in Korea, we will have to depend largely on the carriers.

General Marshall said it was important to realize the operations of the enemy with their forces scattered through the mountains and masses pouring in against our men without any regard to the losses. It was much easier for them to conceal themselves than for us, because of the way in which they operated and their ability to stand the hardship. For these reasons, air cover was less valuable than might be supposed.

THE PRESIDENT said that the Prime Minister would see that we have very grave military decisions to make. There are also decisions which have to be made regarding procedure in the United Nations. For this reason, he welcomed free and frank discussion of all points. He did not want to decide these questions before Mr. Attlee's arrival. In this face-to-face discussion, a mutual understanding could be developed much better. The United States has responsibilities in the East and the West. We naturally consider European defense primary, but we equally have responsibilities in Korea, Japan and the Philippines as the British do in Hong Kong and Singapore. It must be clear that we are not going to run out on our obligations even though these are hard to meet. One of the first things to consider was what the attitude is regarding the Chinese Communist aggression in Korea. He hoped that, after full and complete discussion, decisions could be made today or tomorrow. He asked the Prime Minister if he would wish to comment.

The Prime Minister said that he was very glad to be here and appreciated the President's willingness to see him. He, like the President, felt that they must take a broad view on a wide horizon. A first point was the maintenance of the prestige and authority of the United Nations. (The President expressed agreement.) The United States is the principal instrument for supporting the United Nations, and the United Kingdom is giving what help it can. This problem has now become very difficult with the Chinese Communists coming in. It is common to our thinking that we wish the Korean business to be limited to asserting the authority of the United Nations against aggression in Korea. We all realize that other forces might come in and might bring on another world war. We are very eager to avoid the extension of the conflict. If our forces become engaged in China, it will weaken us elsewhere. (The President agreed.) As the President had said, the United Kingdom and France have other Asian interests, but it would help the Russians if we were fully engaged in Asia. (The President again agreed.) We do not have very great forces. The question is what is to be done. He had hoped that a line could be held, and that an opportunity would be afforded for discussion and perhaps some accommodation. A few weeks ago, we might have played those cards from a stronger hand. We now have a weak hand although we do have future potential strength. There is an obvious time factor. He did not know what the President's view was regarding reinforcements. So far as the United Kingdom is concerned, it would be impossible for them to get any there for several months, and General Bradley had indicated that the question of holding is for a limited time.

We must consider opinion in the United Nations and European, American and Asian opinion. He had been in close touch through all this time with the Asian members of the Commonwealth. If we become involved in war with the Chinese, we must consider what effect that would have on opinion in the United States, Europe and Asia. In his thinking, it was very, very difficult for any of us to contemplate this situation. It would seem to be handing the game over to the Russians. He had tried to look at the matter from the way in which the Chinese felt it. We ourselves look upon it as a stand by the United Nations against aggression. The Chinese Communists are not members of the United Nations and, therefore, are not obligated by any of those considerations. They regard it as action by those forces fighting against them especially the United States. Their attitude seems to include an element of fear, a genuine fear of the United States and of the European nations generally. So long as they are not in the United Nations and while they are feeling flushed with success in China, they feel they are entitled to come in. They want to have the fullest position of any Chinese government in recent times. They feel strongly about Formosa and a little less strongly about Hong Kong. He doubted if they wanted to throw themselves completely in the hands of the Russians. They would rather feel their own strength and independence.

The Prime Minister had been thinking whether there was some approach by way of discussion. An element of this would be some kind of a cease-fire while our forces are still on the ground. The question then was what the Chinese were likely to demand. There was danger that, if we showed a spirit of accommodation, the price would go up. What they would like to have is recognition as the government of China, settlement of the Formosan question, and settlement in Korea. One could not tell whether they wished all of Korea to be governed by the North Koreans or what solution they sought. He hoped that these questions could be carefully considered today and tomorrow. It was necessary to decide what kind of things we wanted to negotiate and how far we could go. We should consider the limits on negotiation and the method that should be used; for example, whether we should proceed in the United Nations through third parties. The whole matter was serious and very distasteful. The United Nations might lose face, as we all would, especially in the Far East, but we must weigh the advantages on one side and the other. The British people had had to face some hard situations in their history. According to his view, we must not get so involved in the East as to lay ourselves open to attack in the West. The West is, after all, the vital part in our line against communism. We cannot take action that will weaken it. We must strengthen our hand in the West as much as possible.

Secretary Acheson, at the request of the President, commented on the points which had been made by the Prime Minister. In the first place, we had to bear in mind that the central enemy is not the Chinese but the Soviet Union. All the inspiration for the present action comes from there. There has no doubt been some arrangement between the Chinese and the Russians to make the Chinese think they have strong Russian support. While their counterattack goes well, there is little limit to what they will try to do; if they can drive us out, they will do so. No one knows how much further they might be inclined to go. The situation is already serious. Regarding the question of all-out war against China, if this meant land, sea and air action, there were not many of the President's advisers who would urge him to follow that course.

Concerning the Prime Minister's suggestions about arrangements with the Chinese Communists, he was far less optimistic that anything could be done. We did not have an alternative between negotiation and becoming involved in war with China. We are actually involved at this time. We did need to consider the consequences of any actions. Regarding a cease-fire, it would appear to be militarily advantageous to us, although he would defer to General Marshall's opinion on this point. If this was correct, then it would be disadvantageous to the Chinese, and they would therefore not be likely to accept it. There would be some political advantage in suggesting a cease-fire, but if you go into negotiations, the question arises what price will be asked. The Chinese would probably ask for the recognition of their government and seating in the United Nations. They would also ask for concessions on Formosa and might well insist that any Japanese Peace Treaty must be concluded with their assent. The latter point would certainly interfere with our relationship to Japan.

He wished to return again to the attitude of the Chinese Communists. He agreed that they do not think of this as being United Nations action against them. He referred to the editorial which appeared in Pravda vesterday, and the theme that the matter should be treated as an issue of military power between the Soviet Union, the Chinese Communists and the United States. The Chinese Communists were not looking at the matter as Chinese but as communists who are subservient to Moscow. All they do is based on the Moscow pattern, and they are better pupils even than the Eastern European satellites. The Russians are no doubt pleased with the idea that we might be fully engaged in war with the Chinese Communists who are acting as their satellites. The questions raised by the Prime Minister were very grave. He referred to the reports of the talks between Sir B. N. Rau and General Wu of the Chinese Communist Delegation in New York. The means we should utilize should be considered in the broadest terms in relation to the whole Far East. If Formosa were turned over as a result of aggression, this fact would be exploited in a most devastating way. It is hard to believe that this is merely a burst of Chinese military fervor; and if we give them Formosa and make other concessions, they would then become calm and peaceful. On the contrary, if we give concessions, they will become increasingly aggressive. We may not be able to do anything about this on the mainland, but we can on the islands.

If we yield to the Chinese Communists, he questioned whether we would be able to keep the Japanese and the Filipinos in hand. The Japanese have been very cooperative, but at that point they might well say they have come to the end. This would have very grave consequences from the military point of view. The advantages of this course would not be equal to the disadvantages. If no settlement is made with the Chinese Communists, are we worse off than if we do make such a settlement? This depends on what we do next. This moment for negotiations with the communist movement is the worst since 1917. If we do not negotiate and do not have a settlement, what do we do? We may fight as hard as we can in Korea, keeping going as long as possible, punishing the enemy as much as we can. Our negotiating position would be no worse then. If we are pushed out later and cannot hold Korea, we are still on the islands. We must refuse to recognize their gains. We could make as much trouble for the Chinese Communists as possible and hold Formosa, retaining what strength we can. If the Communists are successful in Korea, this may so weaken the French in Indochina that they will pull out. He doubted if any one of the President's advisers would urge him to intervene in that situation.

THE PRIME MINISTER inquired how long the beachheads could be held as an annoyance to the Chinese Communists without too much loss.

General Bradley said it was hard to say. If we have heavy losses in the east, it might be a short time there. In Inchon it might be a matter of weeks or one or two months unless the Chinese launch an all-out attack regardless of loss of life. In that case, they might be able to overrun us in a short time.

General Marshall said that, regarding the northeast sector, in all probability it could not be held and this raised the question of how many units could be evacuated with their equipment. If these forces could be moved to the west, the situation would be better. His own thought was that we should get out of the eastern sector with the least possible loss. The western beachhead should be held till we could see the condition of the units as they are brought back. They have been in constant action since June, and everybody reacts to battle fatigue. We will have to see what our losses are and what help we can give. Probably the best we can do is put in more air; some is now on the way. In December we shall have 23,000 replacements available and in January larger numbers. We are sending material out to replace our losses, and in strict confidence he could say that this equipment was being taken from National Guard units on our West Coast. He was much more hopeful than he had been four days ago.

THE PRIME MINISTER inquired what the reaction of people would be if we continued to hold the beachhead with continuing losses. Wouldn't there be a demand for all-out war against China?

THE PRESIDENT said that such demands are now being made. We need a united effort at home. Huge appropriations are being made. He hoped that the line could be held in Korea until the situation was better for negotiation. All of his military advisers tell him that there is no chance to do this, but he still wanted to try.

THE PRIME MINISTER said opinions differ on the extent to which Chinese Communists are satellites. He inquired when is it that you scratch a communist and find a nationalist.

THE PRESIDENT believes that they are satellites of Russia and will be satellites so long as the present Peiping regime is in power. He thought they were complete satellites. The only way to meet communism is to eliminate it. After Korea, it would be Indochina, then Hong Kong, then Malaya. There was no chance to approach a solution without seeing clearly the course we should follow. He does not want war with China or anyone else, but the situation looks very dark to him. We can get all-out mobilization very soon, but he does not wish to do that either. He is not shutting the door to negotiations but does not think that they would be successful.

THE PRIME MINISTER remarked that Russia has posed as the friend of Communist China.

THE PRESIDENT said that he thought the Chinese Communists had made up their mind where they were going. They think they will get what they want including a seat in the United Nations and Formosa. He repeated that he was anxious to get all points of view and would especially appreciate those of the Prime Minister.

THE PRIME MINISTER inquired how the Japanese were likely to react.

Secretary Acheson said this depends in the long run to the power relation. Our thinking is that, if we now give up in the Far East, we are through. The Russians and the Chinese are coming in and other Far Eastern peoples would make their best terms with them.

THE PRIME MINISTER remarked that this was the bandwagon psychology.

Secretary Acheson said we would be better off if we took a strong attitude. It was hard to tell whether the Chinese Communists would remain satellites in the long run, but he wondered whether they would not act in the same way now regardless of the answer to that question. It was a mistake to count on their goodwill. It is a saying in the State Department that with communistic regimes you can't bank goodwill; they balance their books every night.

THE PRIME MINISTER expressed agreement. If the Chinese Communists are satellites, they would play the Russian game. If they are Chinese nationalists, they might prefer to get into the club so that if the Russians go too far in Manchuria or elsewhere they would not be already in Russian hands.

General Marshall referred to the several meetings he had with Mao Tse-tung and many more with Chou En-lai when he was in China. He recalled the latter saying to Mrs. Marshall at the dinner table with great emphasis that there was no doubt they were Marxist communists and he resented people referring to them as merely agrarian reformists. Pictures of Stalin and Lenin were everywhere when he visited their territory. They made not the slightest attempt to conceal their Moscow affiliations. They regarded the Russians as correligionists. This feeling was thoroughly indoctrinated in their troops.

THE PRIME MINISTER remarked that Tito was also a full communist. THE PRESIDENT said he relied on the view of General Marshall who had dealt with these people for a year. They are fully tied to Moscow. The Chinese people do, of course, have national feelings. The Russians cannot dominate them forever, but that is a long-range view and does not help us just now.

THE PRESIDENT said that Secretary Acheson had suggested that perhaps it had not been made clear to the Prime Minister that we have made every possible move to keep out of war with the Chinese Communists. We do not want such a war and have shown great forbearance so far in withstanding their attacks. On Wake Island he had told General MacArthur that he wanted to avoid giving any provocation to the Chinese in Manchuria and the Russians in Vladivostok. General MacArthur had agreed and gave his opinion that the Chinese would not intervene. General MacArthur had at that time arranged to shift two divisions to Europe because he was sure the Korean campaign would be cleared up, as it would have been were it not for the intervention of the Chinese Communists. However, they are now in. They intend to push the United Nations out of Korea if they can. He hoped we could find a way to prevent this. We had never taken a move or given General MacArthur an order unless it came from the United Nations. He wished to emphasize that we do not want to act independently. It was for this reason that he particularly welcomed these talks.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that the problem was to find out how best we could avoid playing the Russian game.

THE PRESIDENT said this was exactly right.

General Marshall commented on the Japanese reaction. He had in mind their great triumph for a time and then their collapse. We had been much worse off after Pearl Harbor and had then destroyed them. That memory would influence their reaction. They had a fearful lesson.

THE PRIME MINISTER said it was also necessary to consider the effect of our action on Asiatic opinion.

THE PRESIDENT said this was indeed vital. The trouble was that Asiatic governments seem to condone Chinese action in Tibet and Korea and blame the United States for all that happens. Russian propaganda along this line has even gotten through to India. He had tried to make our position perfectly plain, pointing out that we are not trying to take anything away from anybody but to restore things to those who ought to have them.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that Asiatics think that this is their show. He recalled the attitude which he had found in India almost twenty years ago in regard to the Japanese.

THE PRESIDENT said it was hard to offset this propaganda which had taken hold out there. We had to find a common policy for ourselves and the NAT powers in order to get a common front and must then attempt to keep from all-out war. The Russians only understand the mailed fist, and that is what we are preparing for them. The situation is very serious, and we must find a common course which we can all hold to. He suggested that it might be desirable to continue the discussion tomorrow to see if we could reach a common conclusion which would avoid all-out war.

THE PRIME MINISTER wondered how we could avoid being bled in the East so that we could save the West. It would be wise today to consider the most immediate problems. THE PRESIDENT said we must make two decisions in a day or two which still leaves us time for some discussion. If an approach is to be made on the question of a cease-fire, this cannot be long delayed.

THE PRIME MINISTER agreed, saying if we delayed very long something would blow up.

THE PRESIDENT then said he wished to read to the Prime Minister certain points as follows:

"1. It would be militarily advantageous in the immediate situation if a cease-fire order could be arranged provided that considerations offered were not so great as to be unacceptable. This might insure full support of the United Nations. Arrangements for a cease-fire must not impose conditions which would jeopardize the safety of United Nations forces nor be conditioned on agreement on other issues, such as Formosa, and the Chinese seat in the United Nations.

"2. If a cease-fire should be effected which permits a stabilization of the situation, United Nations should proceed with the political, military and economic stabilization of the Republic of Korea while continuing efforts to seek an independent and unified Korea by political means

"3. If the Chinese Communists reject a cease-fire and move major forces south of the 38th Parallel, the United Nations forces may face a forced evacuation of Korea. The consequences of a voluntary acceptance of a successful aggression and of a voluntary abandonment of our Korean allies would be such that any United Nations evacuation must be clearly the result of military necessity only."

THE PRESIDENT here interposed that we cannot get out voluntarily. All the Koreans left behind would be murdered. The communists care nothing about human life. The President continued reading:

"4. If the situation in the preceding paragraph develops, the United Nations must take immediate action to declare Communist China an aggressor and must mobilize such political and economic measures as are available to bring pressure upon Peiping and to affirm the determination of the United Nations not to accept an aggression. Also, there is the possibility of some military action which would harass the Chinese Communists and of efforts which could be made to stimulate anti-communist resistance within China itself, including the exploitation of Nationalist capabilities.

"In addition to the measures indicated above, the United States and United Kingdom should consult immediately about other steps which might be taken to strengthen non-communist Asia. These steps might include:

"(a) Restoration of considerable self-government to Japan, the acceleration of efforts to obtain a Japanese peace settlement, the strengthening of Japanese capacity for self-defense, the greater utilization of productive capacity to strengthen the capabilities of the free world, and the prompt admission of Japan into international organizations. United Kingdom reluctance to move on these points should be discarded in light of the new critical situation."

On this last point, THE PRESIDENT said that he attached great importance to this and would like to discuss it at more length with the Prime Minister later. The President continued:

"(b) Appropriate military arrangements between nations in Southeast Asia capable of effective mutual support."

THE PRESIDENT wondered whether there was very much that could be done under this point. Continuing:

"(c) Special efforts to convince non-communist Asia of the nature of the threat which confronts it and to urge upon the governments concerned the need for concerted Asian action to resist communist aggression in that area."

THE PRESIDENT thought that a good deal could be done on this line. He concluded with the following two points:

"(d) Intensification of economic and military assistance to encourage the organization of resistance to communist encroachment.

"(e) Intensification of psychological and covert activity against communist regimes and activity in Asia."

THE PRESIDENT said that he had been considering some kind of Marshall Plan for Southeast Asia. The ECA had done a lot of good work there. A special plan was now underway for the Philippines to stabilize their situation, and he hoped that it would be rapidly approved by Congress. All of these points were worth consideration and further discussion.

Secretary Acheson said the Prime Minister knows the present position in the United Nations. The six powers have put the item on the agenda and have filed a memorandum without indicating any course of action. We might now put in the 6-power resolution which had been vetoed in the Security Council. It was important to take some action to avoid seeming not to know what to do. Perhaps there should be a resolution just calling for a cease-fire now. It might be necessary to take the position very soon in the United Nations, and this should be done after complete agreement is reached between the Prime Minister and the President.

THE PRIME MINISTER remarked that General Wu and the Secretary General were dining together tonight and something might come out of that.

Secretary Acheson referred to General Wu's statement to Sir B. N. Rau that it took him three days to communicate with Peiping. He said he meant one to Peiping, one to Moscow, and one back. He doubted if much would come out of that approach.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS said that he would like to suggest the points which seemed to him had emerged from the discussion. He would not attempt to assess these points but merely to list them and he hoped he would be corrected if wrong:

1. The military situation is such that we ought to make no assumption regarding prolonged occupation of any area of Korea. We may hold a beachhead for a considerable time but this is not certain. We are therefore holding a position of diminishing strength which cannot last long. In regard to talks with the Chinese, we must assume a position of military weakness.

2. We had been trying to guess what the Chinese were thinking about and what they would do in a negotiation. Would they go beyond Korea to include such questions as Formosa? This inquiry leads us to the problem of the slippery slope and the question where you end.

3. Mr. Acheson had suggested another possibility in which perhaps the military situation would be held as long as possible and until we were obliged to leave so that we would be forced out instead of withdrawing by agreement. In that case, we would not need negotiation but would need to think what steps we would take against the Chinese who force us out. Then new problems would arise on that line.

4. Criss-crossing these alternatives is the question of a cease-fire which, if obtained at all, must be in the near future. It was not clear to him how that fitted in to the above alternatives, but it seemed to fit into each and ought to be pursued on its own merits.

THE PRESIDENT said this was very clearly put.

Secretary Acheson said it was very accurate. The only question which was posed by Sir Oliver was how a cease-fire fits in. If the United Nations puts forward such a suggestion, the United Nations would have said the Chinese Communists must cease and at the same time would say to the Chinese, "We tell you that our forces will cease fire also." At least that would result in your stopping the killing of people while you talk. We would pay little for that. If they say we should be behind the 38th Parallel, the answer is we soon will be anyway. Such a United Nations position which would be acceptable to us would mean that we are not the aggressors and that we are ready to stop if the Chinese will.

THE PRESIDENT suggested that, if it was generally agreed, the discussion could be adjourned until tomorrow.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS inquired what should be said to the press.

THE PRESIDENT read a draft release. This was discussed by Mr. Ross ⁴ with Sir Oliver and Mr. Roger Makins, and then adopted with slight revision as follows:

"The President and Prime Minister Attlee conferred in the Cabinet Room of the White House today from 4 p. m. until 5:35 p. m. (Others who were present are listed at the end of this statement.)

"In order to give Mr. Attlee the latest information on the serious military situation of the United Nations forces in Korea, the President asked General Bradley to summarize it.

⁴ Charles G. Ross, Press Secretary to President Truman.

"Mr. Attlee and the President then reviewed the general world situation in the light of developments in the Far East. The relationship between these developments and the responsibilities of the two nations in Europe and the rest of the world were emphasized.

"The frank discussion which followed revealed the determination of Mr. Attlee and Mr. Truman to arrive at a mutual understanding of the serious problems faced by both the United Kingdom and the United States, as well as by other members of the United Nations. The common ground on which the two governments base their foreign policy was fully revealed.

"The Prime Minister and the President will meet again at lunch tomorrow and continue their discussion afterward."

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador at Large (Jessup)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] December 4, 1950—6:30 p.m.

Subject: Truman-Attlee Talks

Participants: Sir Oliver Franks, British Ambassador

Sir Roger Makins Mr. Robert Scott The Secretary Mr. Jessup Mr. Rusk

SIR OLIVER FRANKS accompanied by Sir Roger Makins and Mr. Robert Scott came to the Secretary's office for further conversation about the matter discussed between the President and Mr. Attlee.

THE SECRETARY said that there was some point in Sir Oliver's summary during the meeting which he wanted to touch on and to clear up any possible confusion. Sir Oliver had seemed to indicate an understanding that our position was so weak that we had to proceed on the assumption that we were licked in Korea. The Secretary said that he did not take this view and it should not be treated as a foregone conclusion that we are out of Korea. The Secretary then went on to develop our general thought. Foreign policy in the East and in Western Europe cannot be separated. We must have a single foreign policy for both sides of the world. He touched on the problem of American opinion, pointing out that he was not referring to vociferous extremists but to the sound judgement of reasonable people. If we surrender in the Far East, especially if this results from the action of our Allies, American opinion will be against help in the West to those who had brought about the collapse. In order to avoid this kind of reaction we must take a steadfast position in the Far East. He pointed out that he was not falling back on the gild [quild?]

catchword "my public opinion won't let me". He was, however, appraising an important factor, namely, the trend of general American thinking. He pointed to the size of the effort here in terms of taxes, military service, etc. If as a result of the military defeat in a campaign in Korea we make a surrender which would lose to us all of the results of the Pacific war, American opinion would not accept such a situation.

SIR OLIVER said that he did not dispute the fact that the United States has prime responsibility in the Pacific area and that the UK did not wish to make us weak on the western side of the Pacific. In saying this he referred to our position in the island chain. He accepted the idea that the United States must take a two-ocean view and he did not wish to weaken that approach.

SIR ROGER MAKINS believed that our two countries differ in our estimate of Chinese attitudes and intentions.

THE SECRETARY said that a surrender to the Chinese would probably result in the loss of the island chain to which Sir Oliver had referred. If we surrendered Formosa, the Japanese would react to our surrender to the display of Chinese force. If we give up Korea by agreement the Filipinos and Japanese would run for cover. In this connection the Russian opposition to our proposal for holding the Ryukyus shows a general plan to oust us from our island defenses. The Secretary then read the questions which had been prepared for the President but which the President had not read. (See page 4 of memorandum entitled "Suggested Procedure for First Meeting with Mr. Attlee".)1 He called attention to the appearance of indecision which would result from a delay by the Security Council and the General Assembly action in the United Nations. The following steps could be considered in the General Assembly. We might go ahead introducing the six-power resolution. We would then be taking the same position we took in the Security Council—no stronger, no weaker. Someone might then intro-

¹ The questions referred to read as follows:

[&]quot;(1) What is to be our joint attitude toward Chinese aggression in Korea?
(2) How are we to lead the United Nations to face this situation in such a way as not to wreck that organization?

⁽⁵⁾ How can we act in the present situation so as to prevent a collapse of Asian resistance to communist penetration?

⁽⁷⁾ Can we find a course of action which maintains intact our principle of resistance to aggression without committing us to a concentration of effort in a secondary theater in the face of the primary threat of the Soviet Union?" (795.00/12-450)

duce in the Assembly a simple cease-fire resolution. We could press ahead with that resolution and get it passed in twenty-four hours, leaving the six-power resolution in abeyance. It is probable the Chinese would not accept the cease-fire and that others would then urge us to pay a price. We should ignore such arguments. If the Chinese do accept, we would reorganize our defenses as vigorously as possible. If thereafter the Chinese attack, we would be in a better world position and if we have to take a Dunkirk we will at least prove that we are not ready to surrender but are standing up to attack. After that we would have to go ahead and make trouble for the Chinese. It would be much easier to hold opinion on that course than by desertion and surrender. We must avoid rewarding the Chinese for their aggression and equally avoid putting an Army on the Chinese mainland and pulling in the Russian Airforce by all-out bombing of China.

Mr. Rusk called attention to the other affirmative steps in the Pacific which might be taken concurrently. These points had been read by the President during the meeting. (See points a-e in memorandum entitled "Korea".) ²

Mr. Scorr then spoke about the importance of holding Asian opinion. While he agreed in the course of the discussion that concessions made to the Chinese now would probably not change their general policy, e.g. in regard to Indochina, Malaya, the Huk troubles in the Philippines, etc., there was a chance to reduce the tempo of their activities and this was important. (It was apparent that in the minds of Mr. Scott and of the other UK representatives that "Asian opinion" meant the views of India. They dwelt at some length on the importance of Indian manpower to the UK in previous wars. The Secretary indicated rather strongly his view that the Indians could not be relied upon.)

SIR OLIVER stated that it seemed to him that the United States was seeking a middle way between branding the Chinese as aggressors and negotiating with them. In this policy we end up merely by harrassing them.

THE SECRETARY pointed out that our experience with the Russians, which should be applied here, showed that their basic theory of negotiating is to exchange something intangible for something tangible. In this case, we might be asked to give up Formosa, which is a tangible asset, in exchange for the hope that we might influence their future conduct.

THE SECRETARY asked Sir Oliver whether after he had talked with Mr. Attlee this evening it would be possible for them to meet again tomorrow morning in order to submit some recommendation to the ² Ante, p. 1349.

President and Mr. Attlee for the 2:30 meeting. Sir Oliver doubted whether that would be feasible. He indicated that Mr. Attlee might wish to send a telegram to London. It was generally agreed, however, that it was undesirable to have the meeting this afternoon continue by repetition of the same points and Sir Oliver undertook to communicate with the Secretary before lunch in order that the plan for the afternoon meeting could be arranged.³

Mr. Lie told Wu that he was prepared to travel to Peiping to consult with the Chinese leaders in an effort to maintain the peace and asked him to send a message to this effect to his Foreign Minister.

In respect to a cease-fire, Mr. Lie introduced the concept that the Chinese troops might withdraw to the Yalu and the UN troops withdraw below the 38th parallel.

Mr. Lie indicated that Wu made it very clear that the three demands of the Chinese Government were (1) withdrawal of UN troops from Korea; (2) withdrawal of the Seventh Fleet from Formosa; and (3) seating of the Chinese Communist regime in the United Nations; and that his position on these demands was very firm.

Mr. Lie indicated that he had made an independent cease-fire proposal to General Wu and that General Wu had told him that he had passed this to Peiping and would get in touch with him when he received his instructions, which would take at least three days.

Mr. Lie said he had compared notes with Ambassador Rau as to their two conversations and they had agreed that there was no significant difference in General Wu's attitude as indicated in the separate conversations.

Delga 372. For Hickerson from Gross—re Rau talks with Wu.

Following are incidental points relating to Rau talks with Wu (Delga 368 December 4) added as supplemental report for sake of completeness.

Rau considered Chiao to be "the important man in the delegation", commenting that he usually took the lead in the discussion and that Wu made few if any replies to questions without first consulting aside with Chiao in Chinese.

Rau seemed to have been impressed by fact that Wu kept referring to China and Chinese interests without mentioning Soviet relationships. Rau's inference (to which he is normally prone in any event) is that Peiping is not necessarily acting upon instructions from Moscow although when I pressed him, he confessed to his belief that Moscow and Peiping are closely coordinated. Rau had no information concerning relations between Peiping and the Soviet delegation here, but Jebb volunteered that his impression was that they were not as close as he had assumed they would be. Jebb appeared to have no basis for this reaction except "atmosphere".

Prior to arrival of Jebb and Younger, I spent almost ten minutes with Rau alone. He started by asking "how did this happen?" He said it appeared to him that there had been complete failure of information concerning size and disposition of Chinese forces. I replied I was not personally familiar with the situation in that regard, but that it seemed clear to me that in addition to the availability of information there was always the essential problem of evaluation of intention. I was sure that few people would have been prepared to believe that any man or group of men would have been capable of taking a decision with such obviously disastrous potentialities as the Chinese Communists had done. Rau replied by reminding me that his government had passed on to the US Government some time ago advice from Panikkar reporting that the Peiping Government had made the explicit threat to him that they would intervene in Korea if our forces crossed the 38th Parallel. I expressed the guess that this information had undoubtedly been included in the evaluation of intention but that it was obvious that the practice of making threats was a weapon frequently resorted to by totalitarian regimes. The fact that we did not always discount such threats, I thought, was demonstrated by fact that when Peiping regime openly proclaimed its threats to take Formosa by force and massed forces on the mainland opposite the island, we evaluated their intention in a manner which led to the conclusion that it was necessary to interpose the 7th Fleet in order to prevent the carrying out of the threat. The fact that the Chinese Communists had taken incalculably grave step of invading Korea to overwhelm UN forces tended to confirm the correctness of our evaluation of the threat to Formosa and justify the decision to prevent the spread of hostilities in that area. Rau agreed to logic of this but said that what we had done by putting 7th Fleet into the Formosa Straits was to give to Peiping Government an assurance of safety from that quarter, thus releasing forces for use in Korea. I replied that if this were the case, it would merely serve to indicate the fraudulent nature of the Chinese Communists' assertions that we had aggressive designs against them. I pointed out that whatever the nature of their propaganda, both the Russian and the Chinese Communists seemed to take our assurances at face value in many specific situations and I had always doubted that their asserted fears of our intentions were anything but propaganda slogans or dogmatic rituals. As an example, I pointed to fact that both the Chinese Communists and the Soviet representatives had always attacked the reports of the UNCOK as emanating from a "creature of the Anglo-American imperialistic bloc", even though they knew India was a member of the Commission and had signed the Commission's reports.

Apropos of Rau's reference to 38th Parallel, I said we had been struck by fact that in Wu's two-hour opening speech in the SC, he had not once mentioned the 38th Parallel.

Rau's tone throughout was depressed rather than critical. It was my impression that Nehru is using Rau as his principal agent for the discussions with the Chinese Communists. When Rau subsequently in the conversation (Delga 368) referred to the delay in communications as described to him by Wu, I could not help wondering why New Delhi, which had obviously been kept closely advised, did not seek to expedite receipt of Peiping's views by requesting Panikkar to see Mao. Attitude of GOI toward Panikkar as reflected in Rau's comments may have some relevance to this. (Re mytel 921 December 1.)

One point which I forgot to include in my hastily dictated telegram (Delga 368) was that Rau mentioned that Wu had during course of his conversation pointed to fact that our offensive in Korea coincided with arrival at Lake Success of Peiping delegation. Rau said Wu appeared to attach great importance to this point, mentioning it along with our attitude toward seating Peiping representatives in UN and our "occupation of Formosa" as evidence of our hostile attitude towards Communist China. Rau somewhat naively asked me whether there was any significance to fact that our offensive had coincided with Wu's arrival and I assured Rau that to the best of my knowledge, and I was morally certain I was correct, the timing of the offensive bore no relation to arrival of Wu and I reminded Rau that the preparations for such an offensive required a long time, that it was launched on purely military rather than political considerations, and that none of us knew for a certainty of the date of arrival of Peiping group. 517. Contact between CCF and UN forces in Eighth Army sector remained light yesterday as latter forces continued withdrawal.

About 300 vehicles were sighted in enemy rear areas last night of which 220 moving south. Heavier traffic was observed on road from Sakchu to Unsan. Yesterday what appeared to be 5 Mig-15's attacked 2 UN F-80's northwest of Chongju, damaging 1 of latter. This represented first encounter of this type for 2 weeks.

Eighth Army Intelligence definitely accepts following Chinese armies in North Korea: 38th, 39th, 40th, 42nd, 66th, and 50th. At least 4 prisoners have been taken recently who claim to be from CC 37th Army. It possible but not confirmed 48th, 49th and 65th armies are in Eight Army sector. 37th army is carried as part of third field army and 65th and 66th as special army groups. Remainder above stated armies carried as fourth field army units. Chinese Communist 20th and 27th armies are accepted as being in X corps area. It possible but not confirmed Chinese Communist 30th army also operating in X corps area. Chinese troops encountered thus far have fought hard and well though losses have been extremely heavy. They well maintained, organized and disciplined. Numerous ex-KMT soldiers are found but proportion of whole not established. Officers and non-coms invariably Communists and ranks leavened with Communists. Chinese troops have shown little disposition to surrender. Equipment mainly US and Japanese. CCF thus far have not had heavy artillery and few if any tanks. Their tactics reminiscent of those used by North Koreans in early days of war, infiltration and mobile warfare being stressed.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Executive Secretariat (McWilliams)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] December 5, 1950.

Subject: Meeting in the Secretary's Office, December 5, 1950, 10 a.m.

Mr. Acheson

Mr. Nitze

Mr. Webb Mr. Matthews

Mr. Perkins Mr. Harriman

Mr. Jessup Mr. Rusk

Mr. Kennan Mr. McWilliams

Mr. Merchant

The Secretary opened the meeting by saying that he had had a meeting last night with Ambassador Franks, Messrs. Makins and Scott of the British party, Mr. Rusk and Mr. Jessup. The Secretary said he had suggested to Ambassador Franks that he attempt to work out with Mr. Attlee a means of getting a more relaxed attitude at future meetings with the President. He suggested to Franks that he ask Attlee to allow his subordinates at the meeting to initiate discussions on the subjects which come up.

The meeting which was held at 4:00 p. m. yesterday (December 4) was rather rigid and too many people were in attendance. The Secretary asked Mr. Harriman to speak to the President along this line and said he would do the same if he had the opportunity.

The Secretary said he could summarize the meeting at the White House yesterday in a few words. He said that Mr. Attlee had taken the position that at this time we had no choice except to negotiate with the Chinese. These negotiations would, of course, extend beyond Korea and it was certain the price the Chinese demanded would be Formosa, a seat in the UN, and recognition. The President stated that we were not prepared to proceed on this line and that was about all that the meeting produced.

 $^{^{1}\,\}mathrm{See}$ the memorandum of conversation by Jessup of the meeting held on December 4 at 6:30 p. m., p. 1374.

In the meeting in the Secretary's office last night the Secretary informed the British that we could not separate our foreign policy into two compartments—the far East and the European.

The Secretary went on to say that Americans would not accept a surrender in the Far East in accord with the desire of some of our Allies and then cooperate in Europe with the same Allies who have urged us to be concilliatory in the Far East. Americans demand that we must be vigorous everywhere. The Secretary said he tried to point out to the British that the consequences to their proposal was greater than they thought. He said that you can not, as the British seem to want to do, make a distinction between little aggressions and big aggressions. The British seem to be saying that we would take action to put down little aggressions but if a big aggression came along they would say that is a different matter and not act against it.

The Secretary pointed out to the British that if we accept surrender Japan can not be expected to stay with us. If we accept surrender, we would be conceding that Russia and China are the most powerful forces in the Far East and as a result of that all Asians would hurry to make the best deals they could with them.

In answer to the Secretary's presentation, Ambassador Franks said that the British felt that we were basing our position on a moral position but since our power had collapsed they felt we would have to change our moral position. The Secretary replied to Ambassador Franks by saying that he did not want to argue this but would rather examine the question to see whether this was a position which we could defend vigorously.

Mr. Rusk pointed out that we are now more powerful militarily than we were at the beginning of the Korean war. He based this statement on the fact that we had taken many measures as a result of the Korean war which have put us in a much stronger position militarily; and, although we have had and will have considerable personnel losses in Korea we are none-the-less in a stronger position militarily. He said that he conceded that we have lost prestige but we have not lost power.

The Secretary reported that the British then proceeded to argue against our proposals. He said he thought the British arguments would demonstrate some weaknesses in our line of action and that we should re-examine it closely. In brief he outlined our proposals as follows: (1) fight as hard as we can; (2) if someone proposes a cease fire, we will accept it but we will not pay anything for it; (3) if a cease fire is not accepted or is accepted and the Chinese later start fighting again, we will start again and we must fight the best we can—we will not run out; and, (4) if we are thrown out, we will try to harass the Chinese all we can by economic blockade or such action as we may be able to take. Under no circumstances would we agree to turn over Formosa as a condition to settle.

The British countered by saying that our position is one of getting thrown out of Korea and maintaining a position to harass China which could get us nowhere even though we were to carry it on for years. In addition, they pointed out that such action would make the British position in Hong Kong untenable. The British think that this would weaken everyone and alienate our friends. They said that the Asians now thought that we were wrong about Formosa and that this, of course, would further alienate them. They believe that if we pursue this course, the Asians would probably not join the Soviet camp but would probably rather neutralize themselves into a third force. The Secretary countered by saying that the Asians would probably do that anyway and he did not think we should pay a price for Asian opinion.

This brought the meeting of last night to the question of what should we do.

The Secretary had proposed to the British that we proceed with the first steps in the UN as now scheduled and that we follow this by filing the resolution vetoed in the Security Council to demonstrate that we have not changed our position. In the meantime, if some other party proposes a cease fire, he would like to see that passed quickly so that there would be no negotiation first on the price of a cease fire. The British agreed to take this up with the Prime Minister to see if he would agree to this.

This ends the summation of the meeting with the British last night. The meeting then turned to a discussion of what course of action might be available to us. Mr. Nitze opened by saying that if there was no cease fire order and the pressure continued on us militarily, he would favor giving consideration to blowing up the dams on the Yalu River. Mr. Harriman said he thought this had merit since the Russians would depend on the industrial capacity of Manchuria in any war in the Far East and by destroying the major source of power we would then cripple that potential.

The discussion then turned to the question of whether or not a harassment of China would cause the Soviets to take military action. Mr. Kennan said he did not think that this would be the case. He said that it might happen coincidentally but that Russia would not take military action purely because of our harassment of China. He pointed out that the Russian desire is to split the Allies where ever they can. If they can do that, it makes military action less necessary. He pointed out that our harassment of Chinese would tend to split our Allies on that point and the Russians would consider this a very favorable turn of events.

Mr. Jessup said that he thought if we were to hold our Allies in Europe we must be prepared to agree to a meeting with the Soviets. Mr. Harriman said that he thought the way to hold unity is to move ahead on the European military organization.

Mr. Kennan then said that he did not think that what we have to do in the Far East need be a petulant effort of annoyance to the Chinese. He said that we have worried for years whether or not we are popular with other governments and we have bent over backwards to try to make them trust us and like us. He said the Chinese have now committed an affront of the greatest magnitude to the United States. He said that what they have done is something that we can not forget for years and the Chinese will have the worry of righting themselves with us not us with them. He felt that we should take our time in deciding what we do. He said we owe China nothing but a lesson. He said he thought we should attempt to get a stance and understanding with the British; that we have different views on the matter of China but that we must do what we must do and they should accept and understand that and be willing to cooperate at least on other things.

At this point, Mr. Jessup said that he was concerned as to whether our Ambassadors in the field were fully enough informed of our position in order that they might make it plain to the governments to which they are accredited. There was unanimous agreement that we should make a greater effort to see that our Ambassadors were informed and

Mr. Rusk agreed to undertake this.

Mr. Rusk said that he felt our position with the British today should be that we intend to go ahead with our UN program and leave to them the problem of maintaining unity and the onus of not calling the Chinese action an aggression if they wish. He again pointed out that we can not accept the British proposal because this is a big aggression rather than a little aggression. Mr. Rusk thought that the merit of proceeding in this matter was to show the world that we are not appeasing and if the UN did not support our program they would be the appeasors and not us.

At this point, Mr. Perkins entered the meeting to report that Ambassador Bruce had just sent a message saying that the French are ready to agree to our position if the Secretary would send Mr. Schuman a letter along the same lines of the message sent to him last week. Ambassador Bruce has also asked for a telecon this morning on this subject and the Secretary said that if the telecon verified the facts above he thought it important that we push the British to get ahead with the European Defense Force Program as rapidly as possible.²

Returning to the Korean situation, the Secretary suggested that we might propose to the British that if the Chinese accept a cease fire we will stop shooting but we will not pay anything. We would then be willing to exchange agreements with the British on the protection of Australia and New Zealand. We would then see how vigorously we could proceed in Europe. We could tell the British if they would do certain things, we do many—such as sending additional forces to the Continent, naming a supreme commander, etc. We could ask the British to help this program along and not buck.

The discussion then turned to the question of a stopping point in the UN if we were unable to make satisfactory progress. The consensus of the group seemed to be that if no cease fire resolution is passed, we should then pass the original resolution calling for the Chinese to withdraw from Korea. If the Chinese do not comply with this resolution, we should make it plain that we consider that the UN has done all it can and is no longer in control of the situation. We would then be able to act unilaterally as we see fit. At this point, 11:30 a. m., Mr. Battle informed the Secretary that the British Ambassador and his delegation were in the Secretary's reception room to see him and all except the Secretary, Mr. Rusk, Mr. Jessup and Mr. Harriman withdrew from the room.

SECRET

[Washington,] December 5, 1950.

Subject: Situation in Korea

Participants: Dr. John M. Chang, Korean Ambassador

Mr. Dean Rusk, Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern

Affairs

Mr. Arthur B. Emmons, 3rd, Officer in Charge of Korean Affairs

Ambassador Chang called on Mr. Rusk at 11 o'clock this morning by prior appointment. Mr. Rusk briefly reviewed the current military situation in Korea and pressed upon the Ambassador the necessity of not letting oneself be entirely guided or influenced by reports and interpretations with respect to the situation in Korea appearing in the press. He added that he had met with members of the press, and might do so again, to impress upon them in the strongest terms the necessity of calm and accurate reporting on the Korean situation, adding that sensational or distorted handling of the Korean situation in the press could do nothing but give advantage to the enemy. He again emphasized to the Ambassador that he should not permit himself to be unduly influenced by press reports.

⁸ See the memorandum of conversation by Jessup, p. 1390.

The Ambassador spoke to some length as to the terrible consequences to the Korean people of a withdrawal of United Nations forces from Korea and reiterated emphatically a number of times that if the situation came to this point the Korean people, as a nation, would suffer final annihilation at the hands of the Communists. Mr. Rusk reassured the Ambassador that it was not the intention of the United States in any sense to abandon the campaign in Korea or to withdraw our forces short of being absolutely forced to do so by military events, and that the Ambassador should realize that the military situation was not hopeless and might yet be stabilized. Mr. Rusk also emphasized that there were overriding military factors rather than political considerations, which dictated certain specified courses of action which we were now following in Korea and that all aspects of the situation were being given the closest attention.

The Ambassador again stressed the determination of the Korean Government and people to continue the fight against Communism to the last, and in this connection he mentioned the one-half million Korean youths who, if supplied with arms, were only too eager to add their weight to the forces combatting the Chinese Communists. He hoped that Mr. Rusk had conveyed his thoughts on this subject, expressed in his conversation of yesterday, to the Secretary.

While again stressing that there was no disposition on the part of the United States to withdraw its forces from Korea short of being militarily forced to do so, Mr. Rusk suggested that perhaps the Ambassador might wish to give some consideration to eventualities should this happen and to the possible establishment of a Korean Government in exile. He suggested that this might form an appropriate topic of conversation for the Ambassador's visit with him tomorrow at 11 a. m.

The Ambassador stated that although he had heard that his appointment with the President for tomorrow had been cancelled, he very urgently desired to see the President at the request of President Rhee and hoped that even a very brief interview could be arranged for tomorrow. Mr. Rusk replied that he would take up the Ambassador's request.

The Ambassador in France (Bruce) to the Secretary of State

SECRET NIACT Paris, December 5, 1950—2 p. m. [Received December 5—11:03 a. m.]

3164. French public and governmental views on the Korean situation and US policy in Far East largely parallel those of British opinion as set forth in London's 3241 to Department December 3,¹ and Pleven's affirmation of "identity of views" with Attlee is generally accepted and welcomed here. As a matter of fact, Pleven's and Schuman's trip to London seems to have temporarily silenced those few voices who had criticized government for not acting independently enough, and fair amount of unity in foreign affairs, as exemplified by recent confidence vote in the Assembly, may be registered as one favorable factor in present situation here.

Recent events have at the same time inevitably caused a certain flurry of speculation about French neutralism, notably by foreign observers, and no doubt neutralist tendencies have received some impulse from existing fears that situation may be drifting toward general war. Sharp distinction must in our view be drawn, however, between neutralists, who are a very small coterie of intellectuals and whose attitude has in recent past become increasingly anti-American, and sentiment of large majority of Frenchmen who during present crisis show no inclination to dissociate themselves from France's western allies.

What is increasingly encountered here is feeling that there is difference between US and Western European approaches toward the Far Eastern situation and that France, together with Britain, must exercise moderating influence on US to avoid major war in Far East which would detract from US capacity to help create situation of strength in Europe. Peculiarly enough, what the French fear at this point is precisely the thing they welcomed last June, the spontaneous reaction of US public opinion to a challenge, and quick and decisive response to such a challenge by the US Government. Nearly all the polemics against MacArthur (most recently when he started his last offensive, and increasingly as the offensive developed into retreat) and against the President (for allegedly toying with idea of using atom bomb) spring from feeling that US must be brought around to more cautious attitude, rather than from feeling that France should in any way dissociate itself from the US.

Fact that no French troops are engaged in Korea may account for the different French psychological reaction to the Chinese aggression compared to that which was apparently caused in the US. As a matter of fact, although news of the Chinese counter-offensive was received with dismay and consternation, this was to some extent coupled with an I-told-you-so-attitude. In any event, developments with respect to Communist China's reception in the UN are largely looked upon from point of view of whether compromise solution is rendered more or less difficult. Certainly a compromise solution is what French public opinion hopes for, relief and hope in newspapers yesterday created by alleged Chinese proposal for settlement (on basis restoration 38th parallel, admission to UN and jettisoning of Formosa) is significant in this connection.

In spite of these feelings, the recent statements of Pleven and Schuman about complete French unity with the west, and firm adherence to the UN and principle of collective security, can be taken at face value, and France can in our view be counted upon to continue to make her contribution to build up of strength and unity in Europe and defense of this interest in Indochina. But the facts must be recognized that in the Far East France's war is Indochina and not Korea; that US policy on Formosa has never captured the French imagination; that the French were perhaps only prevented from recognizing Mao by the fact that Mao recognized Ho Chi-minh; and that Schuman is on record as having favored restoration of the status quo ante bellum in Korea (Embtel 1182, September 7²). Consequently for French opinion a compromise involving, say, return to the 38th parallel and admission of Communist China to the UN, would be comparatively palatable.

What we are witnessing under present circumstances is emergence into the open of certain latent feelings about the US: feelings that due to geographic and psychological factors the US might decide more lightly about war and peace; that the US Government may be impelled into military commitments which are not in its own interests and a fortiori not in those of its European allies; that the US has in the past not sufficiently listened to real or imaginary counsels of moderation from its allies; and that France, together with Britain, must now play the role that it has from time to time successfully coveted in the past, namely the role of moderator and intelligent, detached advisor to its mighty and much-needed friend. All these feelings of course spring from the basic fact, which cannot be emphasized too often, that under present circumstances and given its geographic position, France feels naked in the face of possible Russian aggression in Europe and fears more than anything else a Soviet military occupation, even if it were to be of short duration.

[Washington,] December 5, 1950.

Subject: Truman-Attlee Talks Participants:

United Kingdom
Sir Oliver Franks
Mr. Kenneth Younger
[Sir] Roger Makins
Mr. Robert Scott

United States
The Secretary of State
Mr. Averell Harriman
Mr. Dean Rusk
Mr. Philip C. Jessup
Mr. Jack Hickerson

Sir Oliver said that they had had a talk with the Prime Minister on the conversation in the Secretary's office yesterday evening. His conclusion was that the President and the Prime Minister this afternoon should devote themselves first to some of the short-range problems. He understood the proposal was to lay the 6-power resolution before the General Assembly. Someone else then might be prompted to introduce a cease-fire resolution. We would attempt to push through to a vote. The Prime Minister would be happy to get these points decided this afternoon.

As a procedural matter for the meeting this afternoon, he hoped that the discussion could be kept vigorous and alive. Mr. [Sir Roger] Makins said that there was another point about holding the bridge-heads about which Field Marshal Slim wished to speak. The British understand that it is our policy to hold as long as possible and they agree generally with this but there are various things which need to be done. The Secretary agreed with what had been suggested.

There was then discussion between Mr. Rusk and Mr. Younger regarding the parliamentary procedure in the United Nations. Mr. Younger said it would be hard to let the matter lie too long unless we were inclined to think this was necessary. Mr. Rusk thought some debate on the 6-power resolution would be useful before the cease-fire resolution were introduced. Mr. Scott urged that the soundings of the Chinese Communists should take place before people make speeches on the 6-power resolution. This suggested the desirability of some interval.

There was discussion as to whether the Chinese would be present. It was pointed out that, if the matter were handled in the Political Committee, the Chinese would be there since the Committee had already agreed to have them present for the discussion of any question in which they were interested. On the other hand, there is no procedure for inviting outsiders to the Plenary in the General Assembly, and it would be difficult to do this. The Secretary thought it was not too important to sound out the Chinese. As a matter of fact, this had already been done by Sir B. N. Rau who was to receive an answer on the sixth. The tone of the debate ought to be sober and would not be affected by the Chinese view just as it would not affect them or their attitude. If we get the item on the agenda today, the debate could begin tomorrow and then someone could put in the cease-fire resolution.

There was also discussion of the possible necessity of a resolution in the Security Council to take the item off the agenda. Mr. Hickerson pointed out with Tsiang as President this month this might get us into a long and unfortunate debate in the Security Council and this should be avoided. It was agreed that Mr. Hickerson and Mr. Younger would sound out the views of the French and the Norwegians in New York and see whether this technicality could be dispensed with.

Mr. Younger pointed out it was possible to begin the debate in the General Assembly regardless of Security Council action. He, however, expressed some doubt as to whether the resolution should be filed today. He suggested that certain changes ought to be made. He thought the part of it relating to the Chinese border now would seem rather silly although it was applicable to the question of bombing. Mr. Hickerson thought it desirable to leave it alone except for a few editorial changes and Sir Oliver supported this to show that we had not altered the attitude which we had already taken in the Security Council.

Sir Oliver suggested that, in the discussion of the Far Eastern question this afternoon, we should face the fundamental difficulties of view. The attitudes of the two governments on current action are conditioned by their long-range views on China. These views are different. We needn't try to find a complete accommodation on the long-range results, but at least the United States should make the United Kingdom say what they think about China and then the United States should point out any fallacies. The United Kingdom view is that nationalism is virulent in China, that it has been transferred from Chiang to the Chinese Communists. They believe that they are both communists and Chinese, just as Tito is both a Yugoslav and a communist. The Russians were very clever in cloaking their aid to the Chinese Communists so that they have had the impression that they achieved their power by themselves. The Chinese are expansionists and have been for a long time. They now have the power to carry out this aim, and they are using it. Our main effort must be to direct that expansion in one way or another. It was therefore very important to determine our attitudes and actions toward the Chinese. If you put up a gallant fight ending up in a Chinese victory in Korea and then go on promoting friction with them by economic sanctions, etc., we don't see where we come out. He stressed British opinion, not in terms of the wilder views appearing in the press, but the sounder judgment on the future of China. This British opinion felt that there was coincidence between Chinese and Russian views rather than Chinese subservience to Russian views. If we could talk these things out, it might lead to real accommodation. The Secretary said this was correct, but we must also consider the effect of immediate actions on our long-range views. He did not think the United Kingdom would find there was a vast difference in our views regarding the result of the policy of friction. The first point is what is the cost in terms of our security in the island chain, which is very important. The second point is the whole attitude of approval of our current action. We have nursed them for 50 years of friendliness and now find them bitter against us. We feel that we want to see the Chinese Communists prove that they are our friends. Their enmity would in the long run hurt them more than it would us.

The significance of a cease-fire is the cessation of hostilities, a fact from which many other things grow. Under those circumstances, we could not carry hostilities against them.

It was agreed that Mr. Hickerson and Mr. Younger would make a brief Minute which the President and the Prime Minister could approve this afternoon.

¹ Chairman of the Economic Planning Board.

THE PRESIDENT asked Secretary Acheson to open the meeting.

Secretary Acheson said it was hoped that the President and the Prime Minister could give immediate guidance on certain steps which need to be taken in the UN. They had had some talks since the meeting adjourned yesterday afternoon and had some recommendations to submit. The purpose was to get started in the UN. They had already reached agreement on certain matters and had put in the new item on the agenda. At the same time they had circulated a rather colorless memorandum concerning the item which does not disclose the next steps we will take.2 Agreement had been reached with representatives of the UK on two further steps. The first step was the reintroduction of the six-power resolution which was vetoed in the Security Council. The main purpose of this step was to hold the international political front. It was difficult to change our position at this stage and while the resolution is not quite responsive to the present situation it shows that we have not gone either backward or forward from our old position. The second step would be a cease-fire resolution which might perhaps be taken up in the General Assembly before the other resolution. This resolution would merely say that the shooting should stop. Further steps beyond this could not be determined until the President and the Prime Minister had finished their discussions. The two indicated steps. however, were recommended. Secretary Acheson then read the specific language of the recommendations as follows:

"1. That the 6-Power Resolution vetoed in the Security Council should be filed and circulated as soon as the six powers can agree on the minor editorial changes to put it in shape for General Assembly action.

"2. If a cease-fire resolution were introduced in the General Assembly, the United States and the United Kingdom should, in principle, be prepared to support it."

THE PRIME MINISTER asked if it were possible to read the 6-power resolution in question. He thought it might need some amendments to bring it up-to-date.

Secretary Acheson then read the text of the resolution. (UNDoc S/1894)³ He said it was true that the resolution was now out-of-date but the great trouble was in trying to get agreement on amendments. It was quite clear that it needs some editorial changes; for example, the Korean Commission which is urged by the resolution to proceed to Korea is already there, but if you start to change the text you either must say that the Chinese intervention is aggression which must stop at once or else you weaken the resolution which raises serious problems. There is an advantage in saying that this is the same resolution which was vetoed in the Security Council, subject to minor editorial changes. If we try to wait until we get agreement on a satisfactory new resolution, considerable delays will be involved.

² See footnote 1 to telegram 556 to New York, December 3, 5 p. m., p. 1341. At its 74th meeting on December 5, the General Committee considered the request for the inclusion of the new agenda item on "Intervention of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China in Korea", recommended favorably to the General Assembly, and suggested it be referred to the First (Political and Security) Committee for consideration and report (see U.N. document A/1628). For the General Assembly's action, see the editorial note on the 319th meeting held on December 6 at 10: 45 a. m., p. 1421.

Secretary Snyder said the resolution was appropriate when it was introduced in the Security Council, to which Secretary Acheson agreed.

THE PRIME MINISTER asked Mr. Younger, who had just come from the General Assembly, to speak on his estimate of the situation there.

Mr. Younger said that if any resolution was to be introduced, he thought that Secretary Acheson was right in sticking as closely as possible to the previous text. There were a few things which should be altered. For example, the original resolution says that "Chinese Communist military units are deployed for action against the forces of the United Nations" and there were other slight changes such as the one which Secretary Acheson had mentioned. In general, however, this resolution would get support and it would serve to initiate the debate. It would fit the mood of the General Assembly for the next few days.

THE PRIME MINISTER said he thought this was quite so.

THE PRESIDENT said that while the debate on this resolution was going on the General Assembly itself might put in changes which would make it more desirable.

Mr. Younger commented that the changes might also be less desirable.

THE PRIME MINISTER asked what the view was on the timing of this step.

Secretary Acheson said that as to the exact day and hour he thought we should leave this to our delegations at Lake Success. The theory is to get something to show there is no difference of counsel between the UK and the United States and no uncertainty as to what we should do. It should not be put in too soon to discourage those who are talking with the Chinese Communists. We can introduce it and then start the debate as events develop. It might perhaps be introduced tomorrow with the debate started on the next day.

THE PRIME MINISTER questioned the title of the original resolution which reads "Complaint of Aggression upon the Republic of Korea".

Secretary Acheson noted the new agenda item which had just been introduced reads "Intervention of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China in Korea".

THE PRIME MINISTER said he thought the suggestions made were along the right lines.

THE PRESIDENT said that this was the only procedure we can follow under the circumstances. It is necessary that we should do something.

THE PRIME MINISTER said this would be followed up with a cease-fire resolution.

Secretary Acheson said that this was correct and that we would hope that someone else would put in such a resolution simply calling for a cease-fire and saying that when the Chinese stopped fighting the UN would do the same. This would be put up and passed as soon as possible. The Chinese would know in advance what we were doing so that they would not be taken by surprise. If we delay the whole problem gets complicated by the question of negotiations.

THE PRIME MINISTER thought this was right.

THE PRESIDENT repeated that this was all we could do under the circumstances and asked Mr. Younger if he had anything to add.

Mr. Younger said that he had really nothing to add. The Indians were the ones most likely to introduce the cease-fire resolution. They might want to put more into the resolution in terms of conditions but perhaps it would be possible to persuade them to limit it. This was not a question, however, which could be settled at the present meeting.

Secretary Acheson suggested that Mr. Younger and Mr. Hickerson could settle these details.

THE PRIME MINISTER agreed.

THE PRESIDENT said that if it met with the Prime Minister's approval we would proceed on that basis.

THE PRIME MINISTER asked where we would go from there.

THE PRESIDENT replied that we should hold the line in Korea if that can be done. His military advisers told him that the line was too long to be held with the forces at our disposal. However, we cannot voluntarily back out of Korea. If that is to be the result we must be forced out. He hoped that if there were a cease-fire we could hold the line. He thought that if we abandoned Korea the South Koreans would all be murdered and that we could not face that in view of the fact that they have fought bravely on our side and we have put in so much to help them. We may be subjected to bombing from Manchuria by the Russians and Chinese Communists which might destroy everything we have. He was worried about the situation. He did not like to go into a situation such as this and then to admit that we were licked. He would rather fight it to a finish. That was the way he had felt from the beginning. He would like that to be on the record. He wanted to make it perfectly plain here that we do not desert our friends when the going is rough. He thought that the Prime Minister felt the same way in his heart.

THE PRIME MINISTER said "We're in this with you and we stand together." He spoke of the participation of British forces in the common effort in Korea. He said the question of how long we can hold is a matter of military opinion.

THE PRESIDENT pointed out that we must not give up voluntarily. He was still optimistic that we can hold.

THE PRIME MINISTER said this depended on whether we get a cease-fire.

THE PRESIDENT said this was correct.

THE PRIME MINISTER said we should try to get some kind of situation in which the whole matter could be carefully considered. He said that the President can understand that the UK stands in with the United States and was with them in this whole affair.

THE PRESIDENT expressed his appreciation for this very fine declaration which the Prime Minister had made.

THE PRIME MINISTER said we would have to watch how the matter goes on the question of a cease-fire but we should be clear in our minds on where we go from there if a cease-fire is accepted.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that then would be the time for negotiations. The Prime Minister said this was true which brought us back to the discussion yesterday on whether we stand pat as Secretary Acheson said yesterday. He wished to ask certain questions. We had started by looking at the immediate position and have decided on the next steps in the UN. While we are partners in this matter and while our position is very important, we must remember that we are acting as members of the UN. What will the UN say next? The UN took a firm line against aggression. It is vitally important to the whole future of the UN that it should not admit any condonation of aggression but we must all admit the limits on what we can do. We were all agreed yesterday on our major strategy in that we do not wish to be bogged down in an all-out war with China.

The President agreed.

THE PRIME MINISTER continued. We therefore do not want to bomb the industries in Manchuria and the various centers in China. As a matter of fact the Chinese get on without large industrial centers. In this respect they are like the Huns. They can also be supplied by the Russians. He wondered whether it was agreed that we had ruled out that kind of a war.

Secretary Acheson inquired whether we could go along a little further with the development of the Prime Minister's idea.

THE PRIME MINISTER recalled that Secretary Acheson said that if we had to withdraw this should be the result of our having been forced out. Should we then attempt to count our losses or would we be planning to return. He thought that we had little chance of success on that, He also thought there was little chance of success in striking the Chinese elsewhere. Secretary Acheson had said we might be in a position in which while not at war with the Chinese we would not recognize them and would do all we could to impede them. The Prime Minister thought that if we were to do that it must be under some UN resolution which would be difficult to obtain. If one asked what the Chinese would do under these circumstances, the answer would be that they would cause all the trouble they can. If we pulled out of Korea they would certainly have their armies and could take some of them to Indochina, Malaya, or Hong Kong. One had to consider the balance of forces. He doubted if the Chinese were very vulnerable to the kind of pressure which the Secretary of State had suggested. In regard to a blockade it should be noted that the Chinese were not greatly dependent upon the West and they could hurt us more on this than we could hurt them. It would be very hard to hold our own people and UN opinion on such a policy directed more against the civilian population than against the armed forces of China. We would be led gradually into a shooting war against China or into negotiation. The suggestion which had been put forward seemed merely to hold the line without getting us anywhere. He said that he thought we should talk very frankly about these matters in this meeting.

THE PRESIDENT entirely agreed.

THE PRIME MINISTER continued that their appreciation of Chinese intentions differed from those of the United States. The United States thinks that the Chinese are completely subservient to the USSR and that they are not only Communists but Stalinists. There was a great difference here. They can be Marxists and yet not bow to Stalin. He agreed that it was quite true that the Chinese are hard-shelled Marxists-Leninists but it was quite possible that they were not Soviet imperialists. There was a chance of Titoism. The case of Tito was of very great importance as Stalin himself thinks. Stalin had gone ahead with his imperialist policy believing that wherever a Communist nucleus was established they had a unit fully subservient to them. In every case where the country owed its delivery to the Soviet and not to its own efforts, as in Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, and other satellites. this had been true but Yugoslavia was the one case where the people claimed that they had delivered themselves. Accordingly, Tito, while remaining a communist, was not a satellite. The Russians have not given very much help to China. The Chinese do not owe them very much. There is a strong mixture of Chinese nationalism in their communist attitude. One had to recognize that the old Chinese regime had become rotten and corrupt.

THE PRESIDENT interposed to say that was true and that was what the Communists had built on.

THE PRIME MINISTER said when you have such a regime the Chinese believed that communism offered them the only alternative to the old corruption. He had discussed this situation at length with Nehru.

THE PRESIDENT said that he had also.

THE PRIME MINISTER recalled that Nehru said that the communists took advantage of economic and social conditions to appear as deliverers. They failed in Europe where the standard of living was high but in Asia they had allied themselves with nationalism. In Burma and other countries, the UK had allied itself with nationalism and those countries resisted communism. In China all of the conditions were in favor of communism. It is easy to say that China is entirely in the hands of the Russians. This is a fatalistic attitude. At least you can hope that if you back nationalism you can get Chinese imperialism opposed to Russian imperialism. Therefore, the UK had tried to drive a wedge between China and Russia. We cannot lose by trying that. We may be wrong but if so we will find it out. If we can try this without losing too much we may set up China as something independent. China had been made a great power by Franklin Roosevelt.

THE PRESIDENT agreed.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that at the time they had not agreed thinking that China was still an inchoate mass. However, what had been theory had now been accomplished by the Chinese Communists who were emerging as a great power with a strong military force. They had faced Chinese expansionism in Malaya, in the East Indies and in Burma. All over the East the Chinese had expanded as the dominant race. To this factor was now added their military force which gives them to a large extent the leadership in Asia. They had hoped that this leadership would go to India which had absorbed so much of the West. Accordingly, they had tried to create some division between China and the USSR because opinions do change when people get some of their objectives. The Indian nationalists had waged a violent campaign against the British. The British gave them what they wanted and a very considerable change had occurred, and the Indians now recognize the values of western civilization. He had seen a very great change in the orientation of leading Indians. It is not hopeless that the Chinese are not fully imbued with Soviet ideas. They will no doubt go quite a way in the communist direction as the only alternative to a rotten regime. But Chinese civilization is very old and is accustomed to absorbing new things. They may wear the Red flag with a difference. The question was what we could do to prevent the Chinese looking to the USSR as their only friend, as a result of which they would be completely absorbed in that huge land mass. If we say that China is just part of the USSR, we link them together and play the game of Russian imperialism. The longer we can hold out without a major war the more likely it is that people behind the Iron Curtain will object to Stalin's iron rule.

THE PRESIDENT indicated agreement with this last point.

THE PRIME MINISTER wondered whether it was wise to follow a policy which without being effective against China leaves her with Russia as her only friend. This he said represented the general line of their thinking.

The President asked Secretary Acheson if he cared to comment. Secretary Acheson said that he would like to make a few comments merely for the purpose of assisting the President and the Prime Minister in building up the background. We did face a very definite fork in the road if a cease-fire is adopted in the UN. If this were accepted by the Chinese Communists, hostilities would stop. Then all of the talk of our possible military action against China would not be in point since we could not start what had been stopped. Under these circumstances, as had been stated, we would enter the period of negotiation. What kind of negotiations would these be? Negotiations on the future of Korea should not be complicated by saying that we cannot start them until we seat the Chinese Communists in the UN and deal with Formosa and similar questions. Korea must be the subject of the negotiations.

THE PRIME MINISTER asked what would come after that. He had not intended to give the impression that he favored giving all of Korea over to the Communists.

At this point Mr. Rusk handed the Secretary a report of a telephone call from Mr. Ross of the United States Delegation to the United Nations which reported that all of the Asiatic states were joining in calling upon the Chinese and North Koreans to issue a statement that they would not cross the 38th parallel.⁴ Sir B. N. Rau had asked Mr. Ross to ascertain whether the US and UK would object to this proposal.

Secretary Acheson said that this was a matter which was of sufficient importance to interrupt the discussion and he read the message aloud.

THE PRIME MINISTER asked what Asiatic states were included.

Mr. Rusk said he had been told that it included all of the Arab states and the states to the east of them.

THE PRESIDENT asked whether Turkey was included and Mr. Rusk said he had no information on that point. In answer to further questions he said that he understood that both Siam and the Philippines were included.

⁴ See the memorandum by Hickerson, p. 1408.

After a brief discussion of the President with his advisers and the Prime Minister with his, The President said that if this proposal were unanimously made by all the Asiatic peoples and the Chinese refused to accept it would be favorable development. He thought it would not be wrong for us to accept it.

THE PRIME MINISTER agreed. He said it would revise the timetable we had been discussing. It linked up with the discussion of the cease-fire resolution but comes at an earlier point. This proposal might be followed by a proposal for a cease-fire.

THE PRESIDENT agreed.

Secretary Acheson inquired whether we could say we were in favor of the suggestion.

General Marshall remarked that we had not been asked to say we were "in favor" of it but merely whether we saw any objection. He thought it better to phrase any comment in that way.

THE PRESIDENT and SECRETARY ACHESON agreed and said they thought we should say that we do not see any objection.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS inquired whether this proposal was made within the UN framework or outside.

Mr. Rusk explained that it was being discussed by delegations to the General Assembly at Lake Success but it was not planned as a resolution to be adopted by the General Assembly. It was framed as an appeal by the delegations.

THE PRESIDENT suggested that they might decide to put it in a resolution.

Mr. Rusk said that was not, at the moment, the proposed course. Secretary Snyder said it was merely a declaration.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS suggested that in transmitting word to New York it would be helpful if word could also be sent to Sir Gladwyn Jebb that the Prime Minister and the President had agreed on this point.

The Prime Minister inquired whether this action had been taken by the delegations on their own initiative or by instruction of their governments.

SIR ROGER MAKINS thought that they would not have acted without instructions.

Mr. Younger said that was true of most of the delegations but some of them are free to act without instructions.

THE PRESIDENT said that he understood there was no objection to the proposal and then called on Secretary Acheson to proceed with his comments.

Secretary Acheson recalled the points he was making were thoughts which had been brought out by the remarks of the Prime Minister. He had remarked that if we got a cease-fire a period of negotiation would follow and the pattern of his thought was that such a negotiation should center on Korea. He would return later to give his reasons for this. If a cease-fire were not accepted and the fighting went on we would hold as long as we could and until we were forced out. At that point we would have to consider the possibility whether we would engage in warfare against China or would take some other action which would not be friendly but which would be hostile to China. These indicated the two general courses of possible developments. Before coming to the long-range consideration regarding China, there was one important thing which ought to be mentioned and that was the attitude of the American people. He was not referring to the short-range political activities but to things which were deeply believed by sensible people. As the President said yesterday no Administration in the United States could possibly urge the American people to take vigorous action in its foreign policy on one ocean front while on the other ocean front they seemed to be rolled back and to accept a position of isolation. The public mind was not delicate enough to understand such opposing attitudes and even if it were that difference would be wrong. We were up against a fundamental proposition: if we accepted the proposition that because an aggression is a very large one we can submit to it we have changed our attitude very deeply. This would affect our attitude toward other things. This was not a question of logic but of the very integrity of the people. In common with other members of the UN we went out after a smaller aggressor. We are now faced by a big aggessor and we have been licked in this campaign. If we face that by saying that we adjust ourselves to it it affects the whole stand of the people. In that case we must adjust ourselves to power and aggression everywhere. This was not the whole story but it was an important point to keep in mind.

THE PRIME MINISTER inquired whether we hadn't been forced to an attitude of saying where we could stand. The rape of Czechoslovakia was carried out under legal forms. They were not prepared to go in at that time and had to sit down. When the Berlin Blockade came along we went in. Now that we are involved in a matter including major powers we have to decide where we stand.

Secretary Acheson said there was, however, a great difference between "taking it" and "liking it". There are indeed limits to power and we must adjust ourselves to those limits. Returning to the Prime Minister's remarks on China, he thought that he would not find much disagreement among the President's advisers on many of the fundamental points. He pointed out that he had probably been more bloodied by announcing these views than anyone else. He had stated them in his Press Club speech in January. The question was not whether this was a correct analysis but whether it was possible to act on it.

THE PRIME MINISTER said this was quite so. He thought we should be clear that the presence of Chiang Kai-shek adds difficult problems. The problem of Formosa would be very different were it not for him. The Chinese Communists regard him as their principal rival but the fact is that he is on Formosa.

The President said that this was quite a political issue in the United States since Chiang had many converts here.

THE SECRETARY agreed that we must face the fact that Chiang was on Formosa. The question was, however, whether the Chinese would act differently in the time period which was vital to us, namely 1950 to 1954, regardless of what we do to reach a settlement. If we could act during the next four years without vitally affecting our interests then perhaps in ten or fifteen years we might see a change in the Chinese attitude but we do not have that time available. It seemed to him that the Chinese would act in the same way although it had been suggested that there would be a difference of tempo if we now give them all they asked. This might or might not be true. The question was what you have to pay and what the consequences are. If in taking a chance on the long future of China we affect the security of the United States at once, this is a bad bargain especially if our security would be affected by the influence of these steps on Japan, the Philippines and other countries. All that the Prime Minister had said was correct if we had time but we can't buy our way into this poker game; the cost of coming in is too high.

THE SECRETARY stated that he had wanted to give the President and the Prime Minister the flavor of this way of thinking and he also wanted to point out that we must link this problem with the problems of Europe. Whether there was a cease-fire or not a possible line is one not necessarily involving us in the bombing of the Chinese and similar military actions but merely stating frankly that our attitude is one of hostility. For fifty years we have tried to be friends with the Chinese. They have now attacked us with their armies and have denounced us violently. They have done great harm to the work of the fifty years. It may be a decade before the American people are ready to forget it, and to take the attitude that they will overlook this conduct just as if it were a question of the Chinese Communists not having learned to have good table manners. If the Chinese Communists take an attitude of hostility to the United States they will suffer more than we do. Instead of our making an effort to prove that we are their friends we ask them to prove that they are ours. Formosa is too dangerous a thing for them to have to play with. We must hold the islands. We must also proceed with vigor to our armament efforts in Europe. We must settle the questions now in dispute with the French and the Germans, we must appoint the Supreme Commander and have troops in actual formation rapidly. This would provide a better chance to get our people behind the effort and to draw on the power from the United States which actually is the only source of power. It is vitally important to hold the United States in this effort as such a source. We had furnished these ideas not for the purpose of arguing with the Prime Minister but to bring out certain points.

THE PRESIDENT remarked that we could not separate our discussion from the political problems we face. Mr. Acheson had brought out the need to carry our people with us. Our interest in the Pacific is too great to desert Japan, the Philippines, Canada or Alaska and to run out on it because we have been licked in a campaign in Korea.

THE PRIME MINISTER said he was very sensible to those points but he would note that it was also important to consider the UN and the importance of Asian opinion.

THE PRESIDENT said there was nothing more serious than Asian opinion.

Secretary Acheson suggested that to weaken the security of the United States would be even more so.

The Prime Minister agreed that this was an important part of it. We want to keep Japan and the Philippines, Indonesia, India and Pakistan and all the other Asian powers. We need to hold the line in the UN. He agreed strongly concerning the European question. The best line was to keep marching together. There was, however, a danger of a deteriorating situation in the East. He did not know enough of Japanese feeling to comment upon that. He thought, however, that the Japanese might think America's real objection to meeting with the Chinese was that China was an Asiatic power and that we were not willing to treat them as an equal. Of course, we must consider political opinion in both the UK and the United States. He was frank in saying that opinion in the UK had no sympathy with Chiang Kai-shek or on the question of Formosa. The United States must consider its opinion but both the United States and the UK must act as members of the UN.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS said he thought a good deal had been agreed upon in connection with plans in the UN. If a cease-fire is suggested without strings, we like it. If there is no cease-fire we don't wish to contemplate a voluntary withdrawal from Korea and allowing for our very different roles in Korea, the UK wanted to go along with the United States and therefore their units help to carry out the task. If resistance can be continued in Korea we may get to the negotiating stage later. If the cease-fire were not accepted there would be no chance for negotiations. The Chinese troops, by sheer force of numbers, may compel an honorable withdrawal. We would not then be giving away. Then the UN and the United States which had suffered most would have done all they could for Korea even though that was not enough. The UN would have failed with honor. It had been said yesterday and elaborated by Secretary Acheson that we should follow up our attitude against aggression with determination to defend Korea as long as we could. We should maintain our attitude against aggression in the face of the greater aggression. In that connection, it had been suggested we should think of economic sanctions and aiding movements in China which might break down the Chinese Communist Government. For his part he was undecided and not convinced now that that attitude and that course of action was in the best interest of all of us. He did not see how even if we were both agreed on this course we could get much UN support. If there is little support in the UN, it is a ground for questioning this policy. It would be hard to go ahead without UN sanction. It would not be easy to bring damage to China quickly. On the other hand, considerable and rapid damage could be done to the UK in Hong Kong and Malaya. Would not the proposed course tend to provoke the Chinese to see what they could do against us in those places. It would increase the tempo of their action and he wondered whether we wished to do this. This made him, and he thought the Prime Minister, doubt whether the policy suggested by Secretary Acheson was the right one to follow. He thought this should be clarified in these discussions. He wished to return to the question of negotiations if there were a cease-fire or if continuing resistance proves to be possible in Korea without a cease-fire. He understood some of the American public opinion which had been referred to and had no comment to make on that. On the question whether or not Formosa should be involved in any negotiation, if he thought that this involved a stride on the slippery slope, he did not want to do that. Another question was Chinese Communist membership in the UN. This would probably come up in any negotiation on the Korean question and many Asiatics would support them. The United Kingdom had followed that position and was not changing it. They might be wrong but the point was bound to arise in any negotiation. He hoped that all views on this question would be brought out.

THE PRIME MINISTER noted that these questions were already on the table in the UN.

Mr. Younger said that both the question of seating the Chinese Communists and the question of Formosa were on the agenda but were in a quiescent state.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that accordingly, this would not be entering a new negotiation but going on with an old one. He wondered whether we should not continue to discuss the question of seating the Chinese Communists in the UN.

Secretary Acheson said this was connected with the previous discussion. He did not say very much about it but hoped to provoke General Marshall to speak. He thought that Sir Oliver Franks had very forcibly raised the question of what we did do against the Chinese. He didn't think it was possible to know at this point. One aspect of the present situation was that any one who put up an idea subjected himself to powerful attack. It was hard to suggest any position which could not be successfully attacked. He agreed there might be great trouble in bombing China. This might lead to a chain of circumstances which had to be carefully considered. The question was not so much the ends of a policy but whether you start by accepting the results of aggression and say to the aggressors that they had licked us and can collect their price. Would we go on and say that we are friendly to the aggressors, that we want to trade with them and seat them in the UN? The proposal had that flavor. If there is a cease-fire and a negotiation, the approach should be that we would negotiate on the future of Korea. If the Chinese were intransigent on this point, he hoped that no one would be favorable to seat them in the UN.

THE PRESIDENT remarked that this certainly would not be good from the point of view of maintaining our position in American opinion.

Secretary Acheson added that it was not so much the unreasonable political attacks in the United States—the President has successfully bucked that kind of attack, but it was a body of sound opinion on this question to which he had already referred.

General Marshall said that with the failure of the campaign in Korea, with the attitude of the Chinese in their triumph and with what goes on behind the scenes, we are greatly weakened if Formosa goes to them. As a military matter only, with Japan to the north and the Philippines and Indonesia, the problem which would confront us would be the driving of a wedge in among these island defenses. They could make it awkward for us and we could be greatly weakened.

GENERAL BRADLEY added that when we started in Korea we had felt we must draw the line somewhere. We may fail in Korea but if so, we must draw the line on Formosa. People could not understand why we changed so much if we yielded entirely.

GENERAL MARSHALL stated that we must look at Formosa as a wedge. We would be taking a step to liquidate our position in the Pacific if we surrendered it. It is hard enough any way to settle the Japanese question. From the military point of view it was very dangerous to give up Formosa. There were other dangers in Indochina, Malaya, and Hong Kong, but if we split the island chain that would really be serious.

General Bradley added the loss of Formosa would cut our line of communication. Planes which now fly directly from the Philippines to Okinawa would have to detour and would not have the range. The holding of Formosa by the enemy would also supply him with submarine bases and increase the range of their aircraft.

THE PRIME MINISTER said these were sound military points but that as a military matter it was not in accord with the Cairo Declaration in which we said that Formosa belongs to China.

Secretary Acheson said this was more of a problem for the UK than for the United States. The United States says it does belong to China and that the Chinese actually have it and are in possession of it. He recalled that the Cairo Declaration also talked about Korea. The Russians and the Chinese were violating the Cairo undertakings about Korea. In effect, they were saying that all their promises mean nothing but that we must give full performance on ours. He recalled that the doctrine of failure of consideration was an old legal proposition. At Cairo we had been talking about another Chinese Government not one equipped with Soviet planes and pilots. This is a very different situation.

Mr. Scorr inquired whether it would be possible to separate Formosa from the question of the recognition of Chiang Kai-shek. The arguments on the military aspect of Formosa seemed to him to be very strong ones but Chiang was a definite provocation.

Secretary Acheson said it would be helpful to explore this point and wondered if General Marshall would speak since he was the expert on Chiang Kai-shek.

Mr. Scorr said in settling the Korean question we must settle the matter of the Chinese seat in the UN which requires a change in our attitude toward Chiang. At the same time it might be possible to safeguard Formosa. That question could be separated from the recognition of the government.

GENERAL MARSHALL said that from his knowledge he could say that it would be difficult to find a replacement for Chiang with his stature as a leader. It had been brutally evident that there was no aggressive leadership aside from him in his own or in independent parties, except perhaps for Mao Tse-Tung, who was then in the hills. He was now out of touch with the situation but the question depended on who would step into Chiang's place and fill his role vis-à-vis the Chinese Communists. General Marshall had held Chiang free from personal corruption but his followers and party were corrupt. Chiang was well-intentioned and was not personally getting rich but was the victim of his associates with whom he would not or could not break. It might be that the Prime Minister thought that no replacement was needed but then what would happen on Formosa.

Mr. Scorr suggested that it might be put on ice with a UN Commission.

GENERAL MARSHALL said that might be all right if you could do it but there would be heavy pressure against you.

Secretary Acheson recalled that we had hoped that the Formosan question could be carried on in the UN but no UN Commission could defend Formosa against the Chinese Communists, only naval and air force could keep them out. There would not only be no right but a positive wrong in doing this. We would be merely going through a form and then letting them take it. He wondered whether the suggestion had been to leave Chiang on the island as a local leader or to take him off.

THE PRIME MINISTER suggested that a UN Commission on the island could hold it until the Chinese Communists behave.

SECRETARY SNYDER inquired whether he meant a UN Trusteeship. THE PRIME MINISTER said that he had in mind something like that. THE PRESIDENT said this was worth considering.

Secretary Snyder said this pre-supposed that Chiang would cooperate.

THE PRIME MINISTER inquired whether he would not have to do what he was told.

THE PRESIDENT remarked that the conversations had been most interesting and constructive. He hoped they would continue. He had to attend a Cabinet meeting at 5:00 and if it were agreeable they would adjourn until 11:30 the next morning and seek to reach agreement on the matters which had been talked about.

Secretary Acheson said there was one matter which he wished to mention before they adjourned. The French Cabinet was to meet tomorrow morning. A proposal had been made that he should write a letter to Schuman explaining our attitudes on the French proposal. The UK had not been sympathetic with this but in our view something must be done to move the matter along. He was sure that the Prime Minister would want to communicate with London on the suggestion and wondered if it would be satisfactory for us to continue talks with Sir Oliver Franks.

THE PRIME MINISTER and THE PRESIDENT agreed.

⁵ Related documentation is scheduled for publication in volume III.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS said that the matter was urgent and that they would need to send a cable to Mr. Bevin.

SIR ROGER MAKINS said that only last Monday, Mr. Bevin had spoken in Parliament and there was a very marked difference of opinion in what he had said and in the proposed line. He thought some discussion would be useful. The French position had changed in the last few days. On Saturday they had favored a proposal for a High Commissioner as an alternative to a European Defense Minister but now they had swung back to the latter alternative and were asking US blessing on that.

Secretary Acheson said that any solution to move forward was better than doing nothing.

THE PRESIDENT said he thought that something could be done. He then read a proposed press statement which was approved by the Prime Minister:

"The President and the Prime Minister held their second meeting this afternoon on board the Williamsburg. They resumed their discussion of the situation in Korea and of steps to be taken to meet it.

"There will be a further meeting of the President and the Prime Minister at 11:30 tomorrow, Wednesday morning, at the White House."

Memorandum for the Files by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

SECRET

[Washington,] December 5, 1950.

At about 3:15 this afternoon Mr. John Ross of the United States Delegation called and informed me as follows:

"Sir B. N. Rau has just handed to me the following declaration which he said the Asiatic States, with the exception of Israel, are thinking of putting out this evening as a public statement:

'On behalf of the following Delegations to the United Nations, we consider it our duty at this critical hour earnestly to appeal to the North Korean authorities and the Central Peoples Government of the Peoples Republic of China immediately to declare that it is not their intention that any of their forces should cross to the south of the 38th parallel. Such a declaration will give time for considering what further steps are necessary to resolve the conflict in the Far East and will thus help to avert the catastrophe of another world war.'

Sir B. N. Rau said that the Asiatic States concerned are meeting again at six o'clock this afternoon. They would like very much to find out from us, as well as others immediately concerned (he mentioned the UK in particular), whether from our point of view we saw any objection to the issuance of this resolution by the Asiatic States. He said that an objection to this statement on our part might be the fear that it would imply that UN forces would have no business north of the 38th parallel."

I called the White House operator immediately and asked to speak either to Mr. Jessup or Mr. Rusk, who are now in the meeting on the Williamsburg. Mr. Rusk came to the telephone and I read this statement to him. He took down textually the proposed public declaration quoted above. I said that, in my opinion, we should state that we have no objection to the issuance of this statement. Mr. Rusk said that he would take this up with the meeting and call me back as soon as possible.

While I was waiting for a reply, Mr. Ross dictated the following further statement:

"General Romulo has just approached me with regard to the proposed Asiatic Declaration. Romulo gave me the following views which he has cabled to Quirino:

1. The Declaration affords the means of extricating UN forces, particularly American, from a desperate situation in Korea with a minimum loss of lives and face.

2. It makes possible establishment of a line which our UN troops can reorganize to man and hold there which many believe they cannot now set up otherwise.

3. It gives us a respite for negotiations.

Romulo said that the Asiatic group which met to consider the draft declaration at noon today at Rau's apartment all felt that the declaration should be issued as fast as possible. Many thought it should have been issued immediately after this noon meeting. Romulo insisted, and others backed him up, that the declaration should not be issued before we had a chance to comment."

At 3:50 p.m. this afternoon Mr. Rusk called me from the Williamsburg and said that I was authorized to inform Rau as follows:

"We have no objection to the issuance of this declaration."

Mr. Rusk asked that I put through a call for Mr. Kenneth Younger over our tie-line to the British Delegation in New York. Mr. Rusk asked whether we had a complete list of the States who would be parties to this and I replied that we do not but that Rau said it included all the Asiatic States with the exception of Israel. He asked if I knew who took the leadership in this. I said that Mr. Ross did not know but that the meeting took place in Rau's apartment and we assumed that it was Rau who had taken the initiative in this matter. Mr. Rusk asked if Turkey was associated with the declaration and I replied that we did not know.

At 4 p. m. I got Mr. Ross on the telephone and told him to inform

Sir Benegal Rau immediately as follows:

"We have no objection to the issuance of this declaration."

I asked Ross whether he knew whether Turkey was associated with the declaration and he replied that he did not. He said that Romulo said there were fifteen States represented. I asked him if he could discreetly find out the names of all the States and he said he would. I asked him if Egypt was included and he said that he knew that Egypt was.

At 4:05 p. m. I called Mr. Rusk on the Williamsburg and told him that I had instructed Mr. Ross to give the statement recited above to Sir Benegal Rau.

I gave Mr. Rusk the information recited in the preceding paragraphs about the States involved.¹

Memorandum by Mr. Lucius D. Battle, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State, of a Meeting Held on December 5, 1950

[Washington,] December 6, 1950.

In a meeting yesterday afternoon following the meeting with Mr. Attlee, the Secretary, Mr. Jessup, Mr. Rusk, Mr. Matthews, Mr. Nitze and Mr. Perkins discussed several matters that were involved in the meetings with Mr. Attlee. Most of the discussion was general, vague and without conclusion.

At the close of discussion, however, the Secretary asked for a study which Mr. Hickerson and Mr. Rusk agreed to do with the assistance of their people. The Secretary said that we must do some very careful thinking about the position we are in with the British in regard to Korea. He said we talked to the British about two lines of action. First, we take up the cease fire and if the Chinese Communists agree to that, we stop the shooting and begin to talk about Korea and the UN. What about the six power resolution? Does it make sense to continue or should we start negotiation on the issues behind the scenes? The Chinese Communists say they want to discuss the problem but only in the Security Council and only if they are in the Security Council. What is our attitude on that? Do we say that we won't be hammered into seating them? Should we set up a meeting with the same people in the Security Council and with the veto and conduct them in that form?

If the British do not agree and say they will vote to seat the Chinese Communists, what then? Do we walk out or do we still talk? It is foolish to say any decision will be reached in the Security Council with the television going and the whole world listening.

What kind of settlement do we envisage? Do we accept something which is roughly comparable to the present situation in Korea, agree on some sort of front government with the North Koreans running it?

If we get some settlement, do we let the Chinese Communists bring it into the UN, if they are seated, and get UN blessing on it?

With regard to Formosa, the Chinese Communists say that it must be part of the deal. We will not agree. What about Security Council action on it? (At this point, Mr. Jessup suggested that we might go back to the old plan of putting it in the General Assembly. Mr. Rusk said that if the Chinese Communists try to tie in Formosa, we might tie in Indochina, Tibet.)

The Secretary continued by saying that whatever the settlement is, should we let it go through? This is on the theory that we had a cease fire, were still in Korea, and that there was a settlement. Also, on the assumption that we have to get out of Korea. Do we at that time try to block a settlement, or don't we?

What if at some point the Chinese Communists say they have had enough of the cease fire, if it is ever agreed to, and declare the cease fire over? What do we do then?

These are all things which we should think out. The Secretary said that we spoke of there being two roads, one based on the principle of negotiation, and the other on the principle of evacuation. He said that perhaps, in reality, there was only one road or that they both led the same direction.

The Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Marshall)

SECRET

Washington, December 5, 1950.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In light of recent developments in Korea, the Department of State has reviewed once again the prospects for obtaining additional ground force contingents from other United Nations members for service in Korea.

Apart from those countries which are already represented by units in the field, or for whom firm plans of which you are aware have been concluded, there appear to be very few further prospects. Discussions with several of the Latin American countries are, as you know, continuing and it is possible that a few additional units in the months to come may be available from that area. I doubt that at the present moment any pressures in Latin America beyond those already contemplated would accelerate desired results.

The Department is prepared, if you concur, to make another effort to obtain a Pakistani unit, although I am not hopeful as to the possibilities of success. The Department is also fully prepared to assist in any way, upon request of the Department of Defense, to secure the agreement of the Greek and Canadian governments to raise their contingents to the size originally contemplated.

There would remain then the possible desirability of requesting the governments of certain countries, such as Australia, Great Britain, Belgium, The Netherlands and Turkey, which have already placed small units in the field, to increase the size of their commitment. France has not been included in this list in view of the fact that French commitments in Indo-China make it undesirable in our view to ask France to divert forces for service in Korea at this time.

I realize that any effort in this direction requires a consideration of military resources and commitments on the broadest scale. It is also possible that the Filipinos and Thais could be persuaded to increase their units to the larger number which was originally offered.

As you know, reconsideration of the Chinese Nationalist offer is already under way.

If upon a review of this matter it is the judgment of the Department of Defense that an effort along these lines should be made, the Department of State will of course be ready to take any necessary action. Meanwhile, and unless I hear from you to the contrary, the Department will continue along existing lines. In general, it would appear to me that the most promising possibility for developing further units lies in the direction of the training and equipping of additional Republic of Korea forces.

Sincerely yours,

DEAN ACHESON

Washington, December 5, 1950—5 p. m.

Gadel 157. When item of Chi intervention in Korea is included in GA agenda, question may arise as to applicability of Art 12 of Charter. Dept's views on this question fol.

1. SC is currently seized of agenda item "Complaint of Aggression Upon ROK". SC has, within meaning of Art 12, exercised and continues to exercise its functions with respect to this problem; adoption of resolutions of June 25 and 27 and extended subsequent consideration makes this clear. SC has also examined question of Chi intervention in Korea, particularly when it considered 6-power res vetoed by Sov. It can be argued however that in respect to this phase of Kor problem, SC is not exercising its functions because it was prevented from doing so by Sov veto of 6-power res. Accordingly, there is reasonable constitutional validity to conclusion that Art 12 imposes no limitation on GA recommendations as to Chi intervention because SC in fact is not exercising its functions in respect thereto. Dept wld not however wish to rely exclusively on this conclusion if other friendly UN Members believe it legally unsound or otherwise tactically undesirable.

2. At same time we do not wish remove from list SC seized items agenda question of Complaint of Aggression Upon ROK. Removal of this entire question wld raise doubt as to legality of continued UN operations under SC resolutions of June 25 and 27 and wld make it difficult without protracted debate to get item back on agenda in present form in event further SC action desirable.

3. Therefore, if it is later decided that Art 12 requires some action by SC before GA can make recommendations, that action shld be confined to procedural decision in appropriate forum that SC is not dealing with that aspect of Kor case relating to Chi intervention.

"1. While the Security Council is exercising in respect of any dispute or situation the functions assigned to it in the present Charter, the General Assembly shall not make any recommendation with regard to that dispute or situation unless the Security Council so requests.

[&]quot;2. The Secretary-General, with the consent of the Security Council, shall notify the General Assembly at each session of any matters relative to the maintenance of international peace and security which are being dealt with by the Security Council and shall similarly notify the General Assembly, or the Members of the United Nations if the General Assembly is not in session, immediately the Security Council ceases to deal with such matters." ademieseth Newschleisethol gland Conveniente, hatook op its Hollestol And to Coll of the Societal difference in a language of the product.

- 4. Under present circumstances Dept believes SC meeting for this type action undesirable unless it becomes clear that it is tactically necessary. Certainly there shld be no SC meeting to effect partial removal until after debate has commenced in GA. Meeting of SC at this time wld open door to propaganda speeches and delaying tactics by Russians. Public attention wld be focused on SC meeting in a way that wld be most undesirable. Public wld not understand that sole purpose of meeting was to take procedural step made necessary only by technicalities of Charter. Furthermore, Sov might reverse its position that only procedural vote was necessary and get Council in parliamentary snarl by attempting to use double veto. With China in Pres chair, we cld not be assured that procedures to neutralize double veto wld be properly carried through.
- 5. As a result of conversations with UK in Washington today it was agreed that both US and UK would make efforts to persuade other dels that SC action not necessary under Art 12 and in any event SC shld not meet for that purpose until just before GA ready to make recommendation.

Memorandum of Conversation, Dictated by the United States Deputy Representative at the United Nations (Gross) From New York

SECRET

DECEMBER 5, 1950—5:35 p.m.

Trygve Lie just informed me that yesterday at 12 noon Siroky visited Lie and discussed the Korean situation. Siroky told Lie, in response to Lie's question concerning the intention of the Communists in Korea, that they "wanted peace". Lie asked him what he meant by this. Siroky replied that he meant what they have been saying all along, that is, that foreign troops should get out of Korea. Lie said that he assumed that under any circumstances it would be necessary to have a cease-fire and to have that as soon as possible. Siroky said that he did not think that was excluded. Lie pressed Siroky concerning his idea of withdrawal of foreign troops, asking whether he meant also Chinese troops. Siroky said "of course". Lie asked whether he meant withdrawal of foreign troops from all of Korea or merely from North Korea. Siroky replied that he was referring to the "status quo". Lie asked him what he meant by this and he replied "as of June 25". However, he said that in any event foreign troops would have to be withdrawn from all of Korea. Lie said that Siroky used the expression "status quo" several times during the conversation.

Lie did not get into a discussion with Siroky regarding details. Lie told me that he pointed out to Siroky that this was a very important matter that they were discussing and that he, Lie, wanted to know if Siroky was reflecting Vishinsky's views. Siroky replied that he was not speaking for Vishinsky but indicated to Lie that these were undoubtedly Vishinsky's views.

TOP SECRET PRIORITY

New York, December 5, 1950—9:44 p. m. [Received December 5—10:22 p. m.]

Delga 378. Chinese Communists: Following is account given by Sharett to Ross of conversations with Chiao at Trygve Lie dinner last night. Sharett had no conversation at all with Wu other than very brief exchange of amenities.

Sitting next to Sharett at dinner, Chiao said that a Chinese "student" en route through Israel had, without official status or authority, expressed opinion to someone in Israeli FonOff that Israel and Chinese Communist Government should exchange diplomatic representatives. Apparently naive and uninformed on question, Chiao asked Sharett who should take first step in exchange of representatives. Sharett replied question very simple so far as Israel concerned. They wanted peaceful relations with China. Their relations with China not very extensive. They did not know whether it would be necessary for them to maintain a representative in Peiping full time. They had thought they might accredit their man in Moscow to China and he might visit Peiping perhaps once a year. Said to Chiao Peiping might wish to consider some similar arrangement but of course Israeli Government would be glad to receive a Chinese Communist representative.

Sharett then suggested perhaps first step might usefully be exchange of visits by representatives the two countries. Chiao observed that might be very good idea. Sharett went on to say that even this step would of course seem to depend on peace. He then stressed that for a new country like Israel, preoccupied with reconstruction and development, peace was essential. Chiao observed that Communist China was in same situation as Israel. They too were preoccupied with their problems of reconstruction and development and wanted peace so that they could give their full attention to these tasks.

Sharett said that the principal conversation of the evening took place after dinner from about 9:30 to 10:30. This discussion took place in a group consisting of Chiao, Sharett, Lie, Zafrullah and Jebb. It was a close-knit group, uninterrupted by others. Wu spent the evening after dinner in a larger group with Mrs. Lie, the Lies' daughter, the woman member of the Communist delegation, Grafstrom, et cetera.

Sharett, according to his account, took the lead in the after dinner conversation with Chiao by asking Chiao how the Korean question could be solved. Chiao replied that question could be solved only by withdrawal foreign forces from Korea. Asked how he defined foreign forces, Chiao defined them as American. Sharett, assisted by Jebb, insisted that forces in Korea were UN forces. This apparently made little impression upon Chiao. Jebb asked Chiao whether the Chinese Communist forces in Korea were not foreign forces. This question evoked no reaction from Chiao.

Sharett observed that if all foreign forces were withdrawn from Korea the result would clearly be war in Korea. Chiao apparently shrugged this off, saying in effect "So what—it would be a civil war". Sharett then apparently took strong line that UN could not wash its hands of Korea, that UN was in Korea for legitimate purposes.

Chiao argued that if principle of UN intervention in Korea were admitted, then on same analogy one might argue that UN could have intervened in Chinese civil war in support of Chiang. Sharett apparently argued that the analogy did not apply, that the civil war in China, while a matter of importance in international affairs, did not directly involve international equilibrium. Sharett took line that although situation might seem paradoxical to Chiao, he and his government would simply have to learn to face political facts and reality. One political fact was that Korea is part of the world equilibrium. That equilibrium has been upset and peace cannot be restored until the equilibrium is restored.

Chiao then took off on line extreme bitterness Chinese people against US for supporting Chiang against Chinese people's struggle for freedom.

Sharett, assisted by Jebb, responded with analogy extreme bitterness various times between British and Jews but that real statesmen both sides maintained position that one great people could not hate another great people and hope to survive, that bridges for ultimate agreement must not be destroyed if either people hoped to survive.

Sharett then apparently went on to appeal Chinese Communist selfinterest. He referred to China's orientation to the sea. He said he could not envisage Chinese wishing to become landlocked power. He referred to the great naval (maritime) power of the US which had the capability of forcing China to become landlocked power. He referred in this connection to the great potential strength of US, industrially and otherwise.

To this line Chiao responded that the Chinese people were Asians seeking their freedom and they wanted no interference from outside world. He said that relations had not been broken with American people. He said that Chinese people were still trading with American people. He said that apparently their actions had not created bitterness against China among all Americans, referring in this connection naively, Sharett thought, to the flowers which had been sent to them upon their arrival. He also said, referring to the Seventh Fleet, that US was already blockading China.

On last comment Jebb and Lie asked Chiao if the Chinese Communists did not realize that the presence of Seventh Fleet was as much a protection for the mainland as it was for Formosa. Chiao responded that to say this was simply to repeat the lies of the American ruling clique. At this point there was what Sharett described as a "sociological" discussion of just what the term American ruling clique meant.

Jebb inquired if Chiao did not realize that if the Seventh Fleet were withdrawn a new area in the Far East would be plunged into bloody war. There was no reaction from Chiao to this question.

Jebb, Lie and Sharett raised the question of a cease-fire, a gradual withdrawal of forces on both sides and full use of the Peace Observation Commission. Chiao professed not to know what the POC was and this was explained to him fully. Sharett said there were no reactions from Chiao to any of foregoing three points, singly or in combination. Sharett said Chiao's attitude was "exploratory". He asked a good many questions.

At one point in the discussion question of Chinese representation arose and Chiao indicated very definitely that they wanted to be in UN.

Chiao apparently in this connection referred to six-power telegram to Lie requesting that item of intervention be put on agenda. Sharett said Chiao seemed to be very happy about the use in this telegram of title of Chinese Communist Government. He made some observation to effect that at last those people (Sharett thought he meant the people in Washington) are beginning to talk sense.

1400. 1. I talked to Nehru for perhaps half hour. He was courteous and apparently received what I had to say in friendly spirit. I told him that as result bitter experience US Government and people had become convinced during course last war that only way to prevent fresh world wars would be for all peaceful peoples to make it clear that they would unite to oppose aggression anywhere from any source; therefore since last war principle of collective security had become almost article religious faith for American people. It was to discourage aggression-not to advance any selfish US interest-that US had played so prominent role in opposing aggression in Korea. In interest maintenance world peace US had expended blood and treasure and had assumed great risks in Korea. Now much that had been accomplished was being undone as result of new massive aggression which was placing great strain on UN forces, backbone of which was elements from US armed forces. US people did not want another war. In particular they did not desire fight Chinese people with whom they were historically friendly. US Government and military leaders had been and were leaning over backward to prevent extension of hostilities beyond Korea. What US had done in Korea had been in pursuance of decisions of UN. US continued to act in framework of UN. Nevertheless in this hour of crisis and anxiety many voices condemning US and US leaders for events in Korea were being heard in various parts of world. In some countries which US considered as most friendly various individuals and newspapers instead of giving words encouragement were criticizing US, not the aggressors. Unfortunately even in India with which US had uniformly maintained friendly relations and which was also committed to oppose aggression there were loud criticisms of US and practically no criticism of Communist China in spite fact US was supporting and Communist China opposing by force execution decisions of UN. Tomorrow there would be debate in GOI Parliament on foreign affairs. What was said in this debate would be important.

Would substance debate be of comfort to, and encourage, forces of aggression? Would debaters under leadership Congress Party concentrate on criticizing US for not following Far East policy to India's liking and overlook fact that Communist China with Soviet backing was openly attacking forces of UN? I deeply hoped Prime Minister with all of his great influence would do what he could to prevent debate from following such trends.

- 2. Nehru maintained he was exerting his full influence to prevent debate from degenerating into series of blame-casting speeches. Situation was so grave nothing could be gained at this late date by looking for scapegoats for mistakes of past. He could not of course be responsible for all that various debaters might say but he hoped for display of temperance and restraint.
- 3. Prime Minister said he was sorely troubled as to what could best be done to prevent onrush of war. It was true that collective opposition to aggression seemed in long run most effective deterrent to war. But when house was on fire efforts for moment must be concentrated on extinguishing fire rather than on applying fire preventative methods. Fire was blazing in Korea. Problem was how to put it out. UN, he regretted to say, did not seem to offer much hope in this respect in present circumstances. He thought that only hope was across the table talks between powers most immediately concerned such as US, UK, USSR and Communist China—latter must be included because it was party to hostilities. First cease fire, then talks on subjects which had become inextricably interrelated—Formosa, entry of Communist China into UN, and settlement of Korean problem. Perhaps it was already too late for talks of this kind; perhaps war was inevitable and all that was left was for each power to get in or keep out of war as gracefully as possible. If single great power should be convinced that war was inevitable and should base its actions on that conviction war was of course inevitable. He had some concern lest Communist China had already decided that war was inevitable and therefore could not be deflected from its course.
- 4. Nehru said that he had sent some of his views re situation to US through Attlee and direct to Mme Pandit. I told him that I was sure that his views which were always welcomed by my government would be given careful consideration.

628. Department's circular 221, December 1. Kardelj assured me today that Bebler has been instructed to seek passage by GA of resolution re Chinese intervention in Korea which was vetoed in SC.

Kardelj expressed hope that honorable solution to Korean situation could be found which would prevent extension of hostilities, but he said he had received no intimation that Chinese Communists had become reasonable or that Rau-Wu conversations would be successful.

In response to my question, Kardelj said he attributed Chinese intervention in Korea primarily to expansionist tendency of Peiping regime and to desire of that regime to detract Chinese attention from internal difficulties. He thinks intervention, while supported by USSR, was primarily at Peiping's initiative. He suspects Chinese may have gone into Korea in larger force than Moscow wanted.

Kardelj expressed concern that if China should win in Korea, USSR might be encouraged to seek "compensating victory" in Europe.

I commented that American people were not accustomed to give up, once we had started, and that we were determined that UN, which we supported with much enthusiasm, should not lose its first fight. Kardelj expressed appreciation for this American characteristic but said that as a European, he only hoped we would not allow ourselves to get into situation where we were compelled to give disproportionate attention to Far East. He expressed confidence that you and President Truman were doing everything possible to avoid war with China and hoped, for Europe's sake, you would succeed.

The Secretary of State to Diplomatic and Consular Offices

CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, December 6, 1950—8:25 a.m.

ALLEGED ATROCITIES BY THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA

In view of certain widespread criticisms of the Government of the Republic of Korea and the alleged ill treatment of collaborators and communists apprehended by Republic of Korea authorities, the following précis on the subject is forwarded for the information and guidance of your mission. The information is based on Seoul telegrams Nos. 251, October 13; 317, October 31; 333, November 4; 366, November 11; and 397, November 17; but source should in no way be cited. Following information is unclassified.

In general, observers have been impressed by the reasonable attitude and restraint of officials of the Republic of Korea toward persons suspected of aiding the Communist authorities during the occupation. Newspaper articles to any other effect have usually been based on $^{^{\}rm 1}$ For the text of telegram 333, November 4, see p. 1043; the other telegrams are not printed.

spot observations and some have been written by inexperienced, biased or apparently highly emotional reporters.

In support of statement that Republic of Korea agencies have shown generally commendable restraint it should be pointed out that, of approximately ten thousand arrestees who were investigated, about half were released for lack of legal evidence. Also, persons were arrested not for "collaboration" but for the violation of the specific terms of the National Security Law and other statutes, particularly those dealing with the conspiracy to overthrow the state by force of arms, murder or sabotage. Most arrestees have been delivered to civil rather than to military courts. Attention is also drawn to the fact that enemy prisoners of war captured by Republic of Korea forces have been treated in accordance with the Geneva Conventions. The excellence of this treatment has been attested by International Red Cross Representatives in Korea.

The Government organs of the Republic of Korea have consistently urged moderation in the treatment of collaborators. President Rhee himself has publicly advocated forgiveness of enemies and "small fry" among communists. The Director of the Seoul Police Bureau and the Republic of Korea Home Minister have made statements that mistreatment of suspected collaborators not only would not be tolerated but would be summarily punished. The Korean National Assembly passed two bills setting up an 11-man commission to review collaboration cases and prohibiting search, questioning, apprehension, and punishment of suspected collaborators except by due process of law.

The steps taken by the Republic of Korea in regard to Communist collaboration should be contrasted with the activities of the Communist invaders and their wanton disregard of every civilized standard of behavior. It should be borne in mind that many of Korea's principal cities have been largely destroyed by departing Communist arsonists. Moreover, more than ten thousand civilians disappeared from Seoul after the occupation and countless more were murdered. The Communist atrocities have been summarized by a preliminary report by the United Nations Commission's report which stated: "The Commission condemns the complete disregard by the North Korean authorities of civilized standards of behavior as well as of the principle of the Geneva Conventions despite assurances to the contrary."

"Reaffirming that United Nations forces should not remain in any part of Korea otherwise than so far as necessary for achieving the objectives of stability throughout Korea and the establishment of a unified independent and democratic government in the sovereign State of Korea, as set forth in the resolution of the General Assembly dated 7 October 1950,

"Insistent that no action be taken which might lead to the spread of the Korean conflict to other areas and thereby further endanger international peace and security, policy;

"Requests the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea to consider urgently and to assist in the settlement of any problems relating to conditions on the Korean frontier in which States or authorities on the other side of the frontier have an interest." 795.00/12-650

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Acting Officer in Charge of Korean Affairs (Emmons)

SECRET

[Washington,] December 6, 1950.

Subject: Latest developments in Korea.

Participants: Ambassador Chang, Korean Embassy

Mr. Dean Rusk, Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern

Affairs

Mr. Arthur B. Emmons, 3rd, Officer in Charge Korean Affairs

Ambassador Chang called on Mr. Rusk at 11 o'clock this morning by prior appointment. Mr. Rusk briefly reviewed the military situation in Korea as it had developed in the last 24 hours, adding that the U.S. and Great Britain were determined to back up UN forces now fighting in Korea. He also called the attention of the Ambassador to the fact that General Bradley's statement of yesterday, concerning a withdrawal from Korea, had referred only to the evacuation of the 10th Corps and other troops from the northeast coast, and that General Collins had reported that the 8th Army was now in a position to look after itself.

Mr. Rusk then referred to the statement issued yesterday at New York by the delegations of the 13 Arabic and other middle eastern countries which called upon the Chinese Communists to halt at the 38th parallel, and read the Ambassador the text of the statement.¹ The Ambassador emphasized that he and his Government were completely opposed to any arrangement with respect to Korea, such as that proposed, which would leave Korea disunited and render the Republic open to further armed attacks from the north. He added that the Koreans would rather die fighting than to sacrifice their principles and their freedom to Communism.

Mr. Rusk pointed out that the statement would have the obvious advantage of tending politically to separate the Chinese Communists from the rest of Asia if the proposal that they halt at the 38th parallel were not accepted by the Chinese. He stressed that the Koreans in the foreseeable future would continually be faced with the menace of Communist aggression from China and the Soviet Union, no matter what line might be drawn, and pointed out that the proposal, if accepted, would for the moment at least save south Korea, the only alternative to which might be the complete and immediate occupation of the whole country by the Chinese Communists, in which case all would be lost. Mr. Rusk also said that a halt at the 38th parallel would give the United Nations and ROK forces a chance to regroup and to strengthen themselves and emphasized that if this happened the ROK and Korean people would have to expend every possible effort to build up a strong defense for the future. He hoped that the Ambassador and the ROK would make no comment upon the 13-power proposal until sufficient time had been given to see whether or not the Chinese Communists were disposed to accept it and to halt their offensive and that this was of great importance.

Dr. Chang stated that he had received new instructions from President Rhee to put off his departure from the U.S. for several weeks and until the situation in Korea had become more clarified.

Mr. Rusk then remarked that he was very much disturbed by a report from Seoul concerning certain unfortunate remarks reportedly made by Chang Taek Sang upon his return to Korea relative to a conversation that he had had with Mr. Rusk, at which Ambassador Chang had been present. Mr. Rusk added that these remarks were false, entirely misrepresented the tone of the conversation and created a very unfortunate impression concerning relations between Chang Taek Sang and officials of the U.S. Government. Dr. Chang replied that he had not previously heard of these remarks but that he too was very disturbed at hearing of them and would like to see just what Chang Taek Sang had said. He promised to see if a rectification could not be made, since he personally could bear witness to the fact that the remarks were not based on the truth, if such were the case.

The Ambassador mentioned that he had received another instruction from President Rhee asking him urgently to solicit the assistance of the U.S. in supplying arms to Korean youth who were only too eager to throw themselves into the battle against the Communists, and that this additional manpower should prove of great help in stemming the Communist invasion. Mr. Rusk reassured him that all possible arms were being sent to Korea which it was within the capacity of the U.S. to supply and that we had dug deep into our military resources to provide all possible assistance to the forces fighting under the United Nations in Korea. He said that no question of policy was involved as to the extent of arms thus to be supplied but that it was merely a question of our capacity to do so. Dr. Chang said that he would also raise this question with the President when he saw him this morning.

The Ambassador indicated his great interest in seeing Mr. Attlee at some time during his visit and asked if Mr. Rusk could not assist him in so doing, adding that he had made a request of this nature through the British Embassy but had received no reply. Mr. Rusk replied that he would be willing to discuss the question with Mr. Attlee's staff but that he did not expect to see Mr. Attlee personally.

Mr. Rusk stated that he would get in touch with the Ambassador concerning a future appointment with him at the Department, in line with his previous suggestion that these daily discussions be continued.

The Korean Ambassador

Mr. Sae Sun Kim, Counselor, Korean Embassy

The Chief of Protocol

His Excellency Dr. John Myun Chang, departing Korean Ambassador, recently named Prime Minister, called today by special request and on a basis of urgency. The Ambassador made a personal plea to the President to continue extending to Korea the military help which had already been furnished by the United Nations and which, he said, should be continued in spite of recent military reverses.

The Ambassador spoke of how grateful the Korean people were for what we had already done. He stated that Korea, both for its own sake, and for the sake of the world, must be saved from Communist domination. He stated that the Koreans would prefer death to such domination. He insisted that there are now approximately one million Koreans, faithful to the core, who are ready and willing to take up arms in defense of their country. All they needed, he said, was for the United States to furnish them the necessary equipment to carry out this purpose. He also made a plea for the use, in defense of Korea, of the Chinese Nationalist forces now in Formosa.

The President expressed great appreciation for the valor and patriotism of the forces of the Korean Republic, as shown in their operations since the invasion of last June. He said that the United States will see this thing through, and will do everything possible to save Korea. He gave, however, an indication of the difficulties which are involved in reaching any decision which might permit the use of Chinese Nationalist troops in the present conflict.

In closing, the President advised the Ambassador that, should he wish to carry this matter further, he might wish to undertake direct consultations with Generals Marshall and Bradley and Mr. Lovett.

The Ambassador left with the President a memorandum touching on the points which he had mentioned in his conversation.²

(b) Having regard to the new factors introduced by the serious and large scale Chinese Communist intervention in Korea, what should be our military objectives both short term and long term? (c) What are the immediate military objectives of the Central Peoples Government of China? It appears to us extremely difficult if not impossible to determine the particular ways

Mr. Ray L. Thurston, United States Delegation

In a discussion with Menon today on the meeting which took place last night out of which emerged the appeal of thirteen countries, lead by India, to the Chinese Communist and North Korean authorities to halt at the 38th parallel in Korea, he said that the Turks had refused to go along because of their feeling that with Turkish troops fighting in Korea it would not be an honorable thing to "beseech" the Chinese Communists in this matter, while the failure of the Thailand representative to associate himself in the move was attributed to the fact that the Thai did not have any instructions from his Government to cover the matter.

Menon said that because of India's mediatory position it would abstain on all questions of procedure and substance connected with the GA item on Chinese intervention in Korea, and that the Indians were expecting a large number of the thirteen country bloc to abstain as well.

Memorandum by Mr. Lucius D. Battle, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State, of a Meeting Held on December 6, 1950

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] December 7, 1950.

MEMORANDUM

After the 9:30 meeting this morning, Mr. Acheson discussed the conversation which took place last night at dinner at Sir Oliver Franks' residence. He said that he would dictate later on the conversation, but would tell us the high points.

The Secretary said that twice before the talks with the President and the Prime Minister, General Tedder and General Slim said to the Secretary that they had muffed the ball on his kick-off on the defense business in the meeting yesterday afternoon. They said it had been hard for them to do anything since their chief did not lead off. They asked Mr. Acheson if there was any way they could retrieve the situation. The Secretary said it was up to them to handle it.

After dinner, Sir Oliver Franks, the Prime Minister, the President, General Marshall, General Bradley, General Slim and Mr. Acheson talked from about 9:30 until midnight. They were joined by others around 11 o'clock.

Both the President and the Prime Minister said they were pleased with the conversations. The British brought up again the defense matter discussed in the meeting yesterday and the Secretary said he did not feel they got very far. The Secretary said to them that there were two points he felt which should be borne in mind. First is that when the British leave, unless the President and General Marshall are convinced that the British are doing all possible in the direction of their own defense effort, the British have not accomplished much here. The Secretary told them that there was a feeling in Washington that the British were not doing all they could do. He said that if the President and General Marshall were convinced that the British were doing all they could, this would help a great deal in meeting the feeling in this country to the contrary.

The second point was that the only way we can do anything with NATO is for the United States and the United Kingdom to go ahead and act and force the others to follow. The Secretary said that he thought much of the talk on these subjects had been off the point. He said he admitted that the British had problems but regardless of the difficulty, the question is whether what is being done is adequate. The British said they understood. There was then much confused talk which the Secretary did not report in detail.

Prime Minister Attlee then said he wanted to raise a difficult and a delicate question. He raised the question of General MacArthur's direction of the effort in Korea. He said that there was a feeling in Europe that General MacArthur was running the show and also a feeling that the other participating countries had little to say in what was done. General Bradley and General Marshall then discussed the matter with Prime Minister Attlee and said that General MacArthur was doing what he was required to do by the United Nations which had given him direction to hold Korea and get elections there, etc. They emphasized that he was doing exactly what he had been told to do by the United Nations. The Secretary said that he did not participate in this portion of the conversation. General Marshall discussed the joint control by the Department of State and National Defense over General MacArthur's activities. General Marshall said that the British could not say they were not consulted and mentioned the questions of "hot pursuit", bombing of Manchuria, etc., on which consultation had taken place.

The British then proposed some sort of committee to direct the war. General Bradley said that a war could not be run by a committee. He said that decisions with reference to the Korean war must be handled with great dispatch and that a committee would not be able to meet this requirement. He said that if others did not like what was going on, they should say so and they would be given assistance in withdrawing. He went on that if they did not want to get out, they must accept the responsibilities assigned to the United Nations command.

The President then said that the United Nations had asked the United States to set up a unified command. He said that he was in charge and would run it as long as the United Nations wanted him to. He emphasized that he would have to continue running it unless the United Nations asked him not to. He said the orders to General MacArthur now were only concerned with the safety of his command. He said that if others came over to bomb the troops there, the President said that every airfield in sight would be bombed in order to protect our troops.

Mr. Acheson then spoke up and said that there were two things to consider here. The first was the Prime Minister's doubts about General MacArthur. The Secretary said he would stay out of this one. The second was whether the United Nations Command was adequate for what we are doing here. He said that the Korean war was not the only issue here and mentioned the possibility of the conflict being broadened and also the situation in Europe. He said that, so far as the bombing issues were concerned, the Prime Minister and the President were discussing that, and we could not get any higher authority. He said the important thing in regard to Europe was the bearing on the unified command which was under consideration for Europe. He said that if the same kind of concern were going to develop over General Eisenhower as Supreme Commander in Europe, we should know it now. He said that we would not have a Supreme Command if all countries had to be consulted. He said that the important thing was to get someone who was trusted by all. General Tedder said that the Standing Group arrangement in NATO was rather nonsensical. He said that we did not trust the French because of known security difficulties, and that the important thing was that the United States and the United Kingdom stick together, to which all agreed.

During the conversation the President said again that his attitude was that we stay in Korea and fight. If we have support from the others, fine; but if not, he said we would stay on anyway.

TOP SECRET
PRIORITY

New York, December 6, 1950—11:24 p. m. [Received December 7—12:26 a. m.]

Delga 384. Re Korea: Gross and Ross had two-hour discussion late this afternoon with Younger, Jebb, Chauvel and Lacoste on current phase Korean case in UN. Subjects covered were handling Six-Power resolution and cease-fire.

Having agreed to file joint resolution at noon today British in particular, but strongly assisted by French, were strongly disinclined to proceed further in Committee 1 for time being. They thought it mistake that Committee 1 meeting had been called for Thursday, seeing no particular reason why few days delay in committee procedure would make much difference. On British side principal objections were necessity awaiting outcome Attlee-Truman talks and substance of resolution itself. On first point Younger said he was absolutely without instruction and would be unable say anything on substance of resolution until he knew outcome Washington talks. On substance of resolution Jebb in particular referred to resolution as an absurdity, ironical and ludicrous in present situation.

Chauvel, although concerned with outcome Attlee-Truman talks, apparently did not feel resolution itself amounted to very much but he was principally concerned with question of where resolution might lead us if it were passed. In contrast with June 25 resolution which contemplated action if North Koreans failed comply with provisions of resolution, Chauvel could not see that anyone had a course clearly plotted for action in event failure Chinese Communists to comply with present resolution. He felt strongly we should know where we were going before committing ourselves too deeply to Six-Power Resolution.

We argued strongly that Six-Power resolution was both an action (withdrawal of Chinese Communists forces) resolution and resolution of principle which represented minimum which we felt great majority membership would insist upon to uphold UN principles. Passage of this resolution would in turn, unless we should decide upon some other course, be important factor as demonstration UN solidarity against Communist aggression. British in particular, but also French did not accept our estimate of majority desire, indicating strong Commonwealth and European as well as other dislike of Six-Power resolution. We also argued that it was essential to maintain momentum in handling charge Chinese Communist intervention and unity UN membership in order maximize bargaining position vis-à-vis Russians and Chinese Communists.

We also argued that with friendly chairman and friendly majority we could control future proceedings in light of developing circumstances, future proceedings being debate on procedural motion to take up Communist intervention item ahead of Soviet charge of aggression against US, debate on substance of Six-Power resolution and vote. British and French were most strongly opposed to bringing resolution to vote within predictable future.

After lengthy discussion along foregoing lines British and French finally agreed to have Committee 1 meet on schedule Thursday morning provided day's proceedings were limited to procedural question order of items and that there would be no debate on substance beginning tomorrow.

We then had lengthy discussion cease-fire question. We made clear throughout this discussion in variety ways that we were not soliciting directly or indirectly any initiative by anybody with regard to ceasefire. Referring to suggestion he had made earlier in day Chauvel wondered whether it would not be desirable for him or someone to seek Entezam's advice. In this connection Chauvel outlined rather elaborate program of details of possible cease-fire which might be discussed with Entezam. Jebb could not envisage what form possible GA resolution re cease-fire would take. He felt that cease-fire was essentially matter of negotiation.

We indicated did not seem feasible for UN to get involved in cease-fire details. The most we felt Assembly could do would be along lines Rau's proposal in light Asian appeal last night, namely, (a) cease-fire, (b) withdrawal of Communists beyond Yalu and withdrawal UN forces to 38th parallel, and (c) machinery to work out details. British particularly, but French also, felt that Communists would never agree to cease-fire involving their withdrawal beyond Yalu except at price of political conditions. We made clear we were not interested in cease-fire with political strings attached.

Younger, taking at face value our statements re not soliciting directly or indirectly any initiative by anybody, said he supposed that they would have to consider whether to take initiative or suggest that others take initiative. Said first question that would be asked would be whether US would support cease-fire proposal. In order to convince others that such proposal would be taken seriously he felt it would be necessary inform others in light Truman–Attlee understanding that US would support (or favor) a cease-fire proposal. We argued this would be tactically very unwise and that tactically it would be much better not to commit our position but rather to indicate assumption that 53 members of UN supporting UN effort in Korea would without exception want cessation of killing in Korea.

British and French all agreed that there was no particular hurry about developing cease-fire proposal since this was essentially a process of negotiation which thus far had moved very slowly and could not reasonably be expected move much faster in next few days. Our conversation ended on this note with understanding discussion would be resumed tomorrow.

After French had left meeting we told Jebb and Younger, on basis earlier Hickerson-Gross telecon that we felt we had to be most careful in discussing matter in presence of French but that we assumed British realized that we thought a cease-fire would be militarily desirable, although we thought it very important that British give absolutely no indication to others that this was our position.

No Chinese POWs have been obtained in recent days. Air reports indicate CCF relying heavily on horses, mules and camels to bring up supplies.

Air reconnaissance last night was limited owing poor visibility. However, about 200 vehicles were sighted moving south from Sinanju toward Pyongyang and another concentration, number unestimated moving southwest from Tokchon.

Yesterday UN planes attacked about 20 hostile aircraft parked on field at Sinuiju destroying 2 and damaging 2. UN planes returning for second attack found field clear of planes. During latter operation UN planes were attacked by 2 Mig's but no damage resulted. Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador at Large (Jessup)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] December 7, 1950.

Subject: Truman-Attlee Talks Participants:

United Kingdom

Sir Oliver Franks

Sir Roger Makins Mr. Robert Scott

United States The Secretary of State

Mr. Matthews Mr. Rusk Mr. Nitze

[&]quot;Contact between UN and CCF forces in Eighth Army sector remained virtually nil yesterday as both continued regrouping. (Embtel 517, December 5.) "Vehicular traffic behind enemy line relatively heavy last night, about 400 vehicles being observed, mostly moving south with main concentration on Kanggye-Huichon road. Yesterday two Mig 15's attacked four UN jets in vicinity Kanggye damaging one of the latter. Migs fled into Manchuria when pursued by UN planes." (795.00/12-650)

Sir Oliver suggested the desirability of a short meeting tomorrow morning between the President and the Prime Minister to tie things up. Presumably it could not be held before that because the group working on the raw material question would not be ready. This was agreed upon.

There was some discussion as to whether there should be an attempt to draw up agreed conclusions as a private record. It was agreed that there should be a public Communiqué. In regard to that, Sir Oliver said that anything in the Communiqué on the Far East was very important. In phrasing it, one must keep in mind that the worry in Europe, including the United Kingdom which the Prime Minister has represented in person here, is a very real thing. Sir Roger Makins suggested that the Communiqué might contain the thought that it had not been the purpose of these meetings to reach conclusions. There was no decision on these matters.

Sir Roger said that the Prime Minister this afternoon would want to make a statement on Indochina since he had talked with the French about this in London. This statement would not contain any concrete request and would not call for action. Mr. Attlee would also say something about Japan, but again there would be no specific points.

The Prime Minister may also touch on the question of US-UK organization and may hand the President a paper on this. He indicated that the Prime Minister approved the action which we have taken in sending the letter to M. Schuman, and that we could go ahead with the whole Spofford Plan operation. On the question of the armament effort, he did not think the Prime Minister was yet clear and that this would have to come up later.

Mr. Nitze reported on certain intelligence items which had come to us indicating the possible link between stepped up activities in East Germany and the developments in Asia.

The Secretary then went over orally the memorandum entitled, "United States Position on Two Principal Alternative Courses in Korea." The following reactions were noted. The British agreed on 3a, made no comment on 3b, c, or d. On e iii, they agreed on the importance of the question; and on iv, Sir Oliver agreed on the first sentence. He and Sir Roger agreed that some United Nations forces would have to stay in Korea during the period of negotiations.

On f dealing with Formosa, Sir Oliver asked whether the foreign policy referred to included the following three points:

(1) Continued recognition of Chiang,

(2) Denial of Formosa to the mainland, and

(3) An assertion that in some way and at some time in the future Formosa would belong to China.

He wondered whether this was correct, or whether 2 was the main point. The Secretary said that was at least a starting point, and it was difficult in such matters to use such words as "forever". Sir Oliver said he had raised this question for general reasons.

Skipping to the second course, which is the failure to get a cease-fire, he thought the United States was assuming United Nations support which he thought would be hard to get.

In regard to Formosa, the British recognize the force of the military considerations which we had advanced and their military people also agreed. They were not however impressed by our position on continuing to recognize Chiang Kai-shek. They understood that the recognition of the Peking Government by the United States was out, but they questioned the continued recognition of Chiang.

The Secretary agreed there was a lot of trouble wrapped up in this problem, and he did not know the answer. If one starts with the proposition that we want to deny Formosa to the mainland, there is no question that Chiang is a factor in this denial. He is on the spot. While we did not like the situation any better than the British do, it is dangerous to talk about the point Sir Oliver raised.

Mr. Scott said he thought there were two alternatives and not three. The first was to make an effort to reach a settlement with the Chinese Communists, and the second was to get into war with them. On the first alternative, he said we must make the effort since so much world opinion and United Nations opinion expected it. Speaking personally, he thought it would be possible to make a settlement. He left to one side the question of recognition of the Chinese Communists by the United States, but they thought that in the United Nations there should be effective representation of China which was not now the case. The United Kingdom does not believe that the conduct of the government is the test to determine whether it should be seated. If they were seated, then they must either comply with their Charter obligations or be denounced. The Secretary asked whether their situation would be any different from that of the Soviet Union. Mr. Scott said no but Chinese Communists were now outlaws and there was much support of the idea that they ought to have the seat in the United Nations. The United Kingdom would like to put this to the test and see how they behave. He then analyzed their arguments about the way in which they were merely helping North Korea which is a government they had recognized, and he said they made out "quite a strong legal case" which appeals to a great many.

Mr. Scott then argued that we should try to establish a position of consistent and unwavering policy. Regarding Formosa, we had once said it was of no strategic importance and now we say it is. We ought to reaffirm the Cairo Declaration. In doing so, we would say it must stand or fall as a whole. We would argue that the part on Korea is the most important and that, before we looked at the question of Formosa and other questions, we should get implementation of the agreement on Korea. We should point out that this is a new Chinese Government which has repudiated some of the earlier Chinese obligations and we should ask whether they accept the principles of the Cairo Declaration which includes the renunciation of aggression and of any desire for territory. These general principles were stated in the Declaration in regard to Japan, but they were of general application. If China accepted them, that would be good. He did not think this course would settle the whole Far Eastern problem, but if war broke out in the East it would become a world war. At that point Korea would be very similar to the case of Greece in World War II. He admitted that the success of the policy he outlined was doubtful, but it would carry world opinion with us. It would safeguard both Korea and Formosa. It would show that our policy is not based on expediency and opportunism, but is consistent. He stressed the responsibility of the United Nations regarding Korea and said that his proposal offered the only hope for a United Nations solution regarding Korea. The United Nations might be able to do its job if the Chinese Communists were seated instead of having the United Nations in the ingenuous position of negotiating with outlaws.

The Secretary, without commenting on the proposals, inquired whether in the end this policy would mean that both Korea and Formosa would be in communist hands.

Mr. Scott recalled that, even before the present situation developed, we had both felt that at some time Korea might become communist. This was a risk but the risk would exist under any plan, for example, if we had all-Korean elections. He did not know whether under this plan Formosa would eventually be in communist hands, but this plan would not increase our risks.

The Secretary said that, while it was true Mr. Scott had outlined what might be considered a consistent and logical policy, he feared the end of it would be grave danger. He mentioned that as a matter of fact we did give Formosa to China but said that he did not wish to prolong the discussion by arguing what might seem to be merely a lawyer's point.

Sir Oliver said he would like to recall certain elements of British foreign policy over the last two centuries. They had never been a large land power and therefore they had always had to act on the basis of working with other countries. The United States, in addition to being a sea and air power, was also a large land power with all of the industrial capacity which that involved. He thought, however, even if this great power of the United States were contrasted with the large world mass, the United States would need to accept the same principle which the British had followed. This principle of solidarity with other countries now works, whether for good or ill, through the United Nations.

The meeting had to adjourn so that the Secretary and Sir Oliver could keep a luncheon engagement.

PHILIP C. JESSUP

[Annex]

- U.S. Position on Two Principal Alternative Courses in Korea 2
- I. The first course: Early and unconditional cease-fire.
 - 1. The first course assumes:
- (a) A cease-fire, probably in the vicinity of the 38th Parallel, without political conditions.

(b) Regrouping of UN forces in South Korea.

- (c) Freedom of action on the part of the Chinese to regroup their own forces north of the cease-fire line.
- (d) Probable negotiations on Far Eastern questions (not to be proposed by U.S.).
- 2. Under this course of action, there would be a cease-fire on the ground, air operations against the enemy would be suspended, and hostile military action would not be undertaken against any part of the China mainland.
- 3. During the course of any negotiations or UN action which might follow a cease-fire, the United States should take the following positions on the questions indicated:

(a) Six-power resolution: Further consideration of the six-power resolution would be temporarily suspended in the UN General Assembly.

(b) Discussion of Korea in the Security Council: The United States should not accept any Communist demand that, as a precondition for the discussion of Korea in the Security Council, the UN should oust KMT delegates and seat Communist delegates in the Chinese seat. Otherwise, the United States should be willing to discuss Korea in the Security Council and to have the Peiping representatives seated at the table for that purpose.

² The source text bears no indication of authorship, but presumably this was the paper drawn up by Messrs. Hickerson and Rusk at the request of Mr. Acheson; see the memorandum of conversation by Mr. Battle, December 5, p. 1410.

(c) Discussions outside the Security Council: The United States should be prepared to take part in a negotiation respecting Korea with the interested governments and authorities, including representatives of the Peiping regime. Presumably, these discussions should be held at the seat of the UN.

(d) The agenda of negotiations: Every effort should be made to deal first with the question of Korea in any discussions or negotiations. We should specifically reject the linking up of other questions such as Formosa and the Chinese seat in the UN, in such a way as to reward the Chinese for their aggression in Korea. We should resist inclusion of any irrelevant items on the agenda in the first instance, particularly by thorough discussion of the matter and its implications with our friends. If it becomes necessary to enlarge the agenda to maintain unity with our friends, we should accept the inclusion of items other than Korea without, however, making any prior commitments with respect to our views on any particular problem. In this case, we might well include items of interest to us (e.g., Communist recognition and support of Ho Chih-Minh, Tibet, treatment of U.S. persons and property in China) along with items which the Communists may insist upon raising.

(e) Korean settlement: Our maximum aim in negotiation would be an orderly unification of Korea with extensive UN participation in accordance with the resolutions of the General Assembly. Our minimum aim would be a restoration of the status quo ante June 25, 1950.

In considering the details of a negotiated settlement in Korea, we must take into account the following:

(i) We now know that we cannot impose a full UN settlement in Korea by force in the present world situation.

(ii) We should like to reach a conclusion which gets our forces out of Korea by stages under honorable conditions and in such a situation as not to require their return.

(iii) We must take into account the fate of the South Koreans in any settlement.

(iv) Any solution for Korea must take into account the great pressure which will be exerted by its large Communist neighbors to turn Korea into a Communist state. At the present time, a unified Korea would be more likely to turn to Communism than would the southern part of a divided Korea. To the extent that UN supervision could be effective, the threat of Communism in Korea would be reduced or retarded.

In view of the above, the United States should be willing to accept a settlement for Korea along the following lines:

(i) Initially the Republic of Korea should be supported and strengthened south of the 38th Parallel. This should include action in the political, economic and military fields to place it in an effective position to maintain itself against pressures short of major overt aggression. Special attention might be given to friendly association between South Korea and Japan in order to introduce some countervailing influence to that of its Communist neighbors.

(ii) A United Nations commission should be given the task of arranging for the ultimate unification of Korea and to supervise the electoral and constituent steps by which this unification might be accomplished.

(iii) Pending the unification of Korea, the United Nations rehabilitation program should be limited to the Republic of Korea.

(iv) A United Nations Commission should arrange the phased withdrawal of Chinese forces from North Korea.

- (v) Similarly, a United Nations commission should arrange for the phased withdrawal of United Nations forces from Korea; it should be understood that the situation in Korea may require the retention in that country of certain UN contingents for a considerable period to deter the early resumption of fighting. If other Members of the United Nations were themselves willing to accept the responsibility, the United States would be willing to withdraw all of its own forces.
- (f) Formosa: We should seek to exclude the subject of Formosa from any negotiations about Korea, unless its inclusion is essential to maintain unity among our friends. If it is included, our position would be to maintain our present policy. We cannot alter our present position on Formosa as a reward for Chinese aggression in Korea. We are willing to have the question of Formosa considered in any appropriate forum for peaceful settlement. Pending a final disposition of the question, we reserve freedom of action to use U.S. forces to prevent a forcible seizure of the island. In any final disposition, account must be taken of the wishes and interests of the inhabitants of the island as well as of the existing strategic situation in the Pacific.

(g) Chinese seat in the UN: We oppose the seating of a representative of Peiping in the UN. We must take a very strong position on this issue so long as Peiping is in the role of an aggressor. If the issue is considered in a UN body in which there is no veto, the United States will oppose the Chinese Communists and will make no commitments about the use of its influence to support this position but will accept a parliamentary result and not walk out of any UN body. In the Security Council we should adopt the same position but should maintain that this question is not subject to the veto.

(h) Japanese Peace Treaty: The United States can make no commitment which involves a veto by the Soviet Union or by Communist China on the conclusion of the Japanese peace settlement.

II. The second course: Continuation of Hostilities.

1. The second course assumes:

(a) Rejection by the Communist High Command of a cease-fire, or the attachment of unacceptable conditions to a cease-fire.

(b) Continued resistance by UN forces to Chinese aggression.

- (c) Possibility of evacuation of UN forces from Korea as a result of military necessity.
- 2. In this contingency, the UN and US will be confronted by the problem of refusing to accept an aggression without, at the same time, becoming increasingly involved in a war in Asia which would further weaken the ability of the free world to deter or meet a Russian attack.

- 3. All reasonable effort should be made, consistent with the realities of our worldwide military situation, to increase military, material and moral support of the United Nations operation in Korea.
- 4. Our political effort in the United Nations should be directed toward mobilizing and maintaining the maximum degree of support for such action as it may be necessary to take against Communist China in order to resist the aggression in Korea, including the UN finding of aggression.
- 5. The United States believes that the United Nations cannot accept an aggression, even by a great power, without taking such action as it can to suppress it. The United States should not place itself in the historical role of accepting an open and flagrant act of aggression. Failing a cease-fire, United Nations forces should attempt to resist the aggression in Korea so long as there is a reasonable prospect of ability to do so; any United Nations evacuation of Korea should be clearly the result of military necessity.
- 6. In the event of a forced evacuation of Korea, the following course of action should be pursued:

(a) Continued air and naval action on a reduced scale against the enemy in Korea.

(b) The imposition of diplomatic and economic sanctions against the aggressor, including breach of diplomatic relations, postponement of further consideration of the Chinese seat in the United Nations, commercial embargo, and freezing of financial assets.

(c) Covert operations against the mainland of China, with the exploitation of Nationalist capabilities to contribute to such operations.

(d) It would not be our intention to undertake military action against the Chinese mainland, provided the Chinese Communists do not themselves extend the nature of their operations by large-scale air attacks against UN forces, attacks on Japan, Ryukyus or Formosa.

(e) While not excluding the possibility of a naval and air blockade of China, it would probably be desirable to attempt to effect the same result by concerted action of other governments in the field of economic sanctions.

While the above measures could more advantageously be taken as a part of general UN sanctions, the United States may wish to act unilaterally in particular cases, for example the freezing of Chinese Communist assets and trade restrictions. In addition, any or all of the above actions would have to be taken in the light of the global situation and our commitments elsewhere.

TOP SECRET

New York, December 7, 1950—11:45 a. m. [Received December 7—12:12 p. m.]

949. Personal for President and Secretary. Following is memorandum prepared by Ambassador Gross and Minister Ross, considered by USUN staff, and with which I fully concur.

"Mindful of our special responsibilities for and concern with UN affairs and considering that one of the basic premises of our foreign policy is the preservation of the UN, the following are our views:

The British, against their own best interests, are assuming at the UN an initiative with the Commonwealth and the North Atlantic group on a negative and defeatist basis.

They fail to understand the essential reason for pressing for action on the Six-Power resolution. This resolution symbolizes (1) the solidarity of the sponsors and of the other 47 members who supported UN action in Korea—and (2) the fact that the Soviet Union cannot by its veto thwart the will of the UN.

The issue of the cease-fire is a tactical military issue. If a cease-fire arrangement is necessary in order to preserve or liquidate a limited military situation, such an arrangement must not be permitted to undercut the essential requirement of preserving the political and moral authority of the UN.

It will assist, rather than hinder, the accomplishment of both objectives, i.e., obtaining an acceptable cease-fire and maintaining the authority of the UN, if we insist that we proceed to the adoption of the Six-Power resolution.

We must also make clear that if this resolution is defied, we shall urge the UN to name the aggressor and to call for the assistance of all members in repelling the aggression. The UN would thus show its firm intention to vindicate its authority when the means and circumstances permit.

No other course suffices to preserve the moral integrity of the UN. No other course can preserve the solidarity of the free world nor assure the survival of the UN itself. If the UN is thus destroyed, we shall revert to a chaos in which every nation, in isolation, must deal with the threat of Communist aggression and subversion.

Our declaration of intention to proceed on this course is the only way to prevent a rapid deterioration of confidence on the part of people all over the world in the enduring values of the UN and in American leadership. The UN won the first battle in the war against it by accomplishing the objective of repressing the North Korean invasion. It may lose the second battle, now being fought against it by the new aggressor. By following the course here suggested, it can prove that it will persevere in its intention to win the war."

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] December 7, 1950.

CHINESE INTERVENTION IN KOREA—CURRENT INTENTIONS

Reference: CA Memorandum, December 1, 1950, "Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea—Counter Strategy"

The following comments are offered in respect to the situation which has arisen as a consequence of massive Chinese Communist intervention in Korea.

Basic Assumptions:

1. The free world is now in the preliminary stage of World War III.

2. The next stage, by Moscow planning, probably envisages either (a) the rapid development of new peripheral conflagrations leading up to direct war between the U.S. and the USSR, or (b) the outbreak of war between the USSR and the U.S. immediately from the situation in Korea.

3. In either event the USSR would endeavor to isolate the U.S. from its present allies, insofar as possible.

4. The outbreak of war with the U.S., although having a background of Soviet propaganda, would be in the form of an unheralded sudden strike against U.S. power at points where it is exposed and accessible to Soviet military strength, with objectives on the North American continent included in that strike.

Moscow-Peiping Intentions:

The Indian messages of August current (see especially Delhi's 466, August 24¹) seemed to indicate that the Chinese Communists had only limited objectives with respect to American relationships with Formosa and Korea. Chou En-lai's warning (Delhi's telegram 831, October 4) was, it will be recalled, related to the 38th Parallel and by clear inference projected no Chinese movement unless foreign UN forces crossed the 38th Parallel: forces comprising only South Korean elements might go north over that line without the threat of Chinese intervention.

Meetings with high Soviet officials appear, however, to have been held in Peiping in both August and October. It is not clear that Chinese Communist objectives (that is, Moscow objectives) were not changed as a consequence of those meetings. It is clear in any event that Chinese Communist propaganda is now aimed at (1) the ousting of UN forces from the Korean peninsula or their annihilation; (2) the removal of the 7th Fleet from the Formosa strait; (3) the cessation of U.S. aid to the National Government on Formosa; (4) the seating of Communist China in the UN; and (5) Chinese Communist participation in a peace settlement with Japan.

UN forces are now in retreat, and no propaganda gloss put on communiqués from the UN side would be able to hide from the Chinese Communist commanders in the field the fact that the UN military position has badly deteriorated. Until the fronts are stabilized, we should be negotiating from a position of weakness and in those circumstances the Chinese Communist negotiators would surely ask for every conceivable political concession. They would possibly demand in addition that in the withdrawal of UN forces (if conceded) the forces should be without their arms and be under the watchful surveillance of the Chinese Communists. They might propose in addition that the UN bear the burden of Korean rehabilitation—of course under the direction of the "local authorities". There would appear to be little profit from a deal which not only conceded gratis all Communist demands but required that we foot the bill. Munich couldn't hold a candle to it.

Advantages of Continuation of UN Operation:

The objective situation in Korea appears to offer little promise that the UN forces would be granted a cease-fire arrangement which would leave them with a shred of prestige or even safety. Vyshinsky's reaction to the 11-Power proposal ² would appear to be an augur of what can be expected from Peiping in reply to the démarche of Sir Benegal Rau.

If there appears to be little potential for a cease-fire and a subsequent compromise agreement, however, there are still elements in the situation which seem to offer some benefits from a continuation of the UN military operation in its present character. If it is militarily feasible, the UN forces might be kept in being in a relatively restricted beachhead with good port facilities which could be made into a "Stalingrad" that the Chinese Communists would find very costly to reduce. This should be practicable and possible in view of the UN possession of

² Reference is to the appeal of the 13 Arab-Asian nations; see the memorandum by Mr. Hickerson, December 5, p. 1408. During the General Assembly meeting on December 6, Mr. Vyshinsky had made the following statement:

[&]quot;It is common knowledge that the United States armed forces crossed the 38th parallel with the approval, among others, of the authors of a statement issued by several Powers and published in the Press, in which they now plead that a halt should be called at the 38th parallel and that that line should not be crossed. Yet at that time they gave their full support to the northward march of MacArthur's legions beyond the 38th parallel and to the Manchurian border." (U.N. document A/PV.319) truly superior weapons, including an air force, which contribute substantially to redress the balance of forces between the opposing sides. If this is, as postulated, one sector in the preliminary stage of world War III it should be exploited as such, for what it is worth to the global struggle.

There are fruits which could logically be expected to come from the maintenance of the UN position in Korea which are worth striving for. Certain developments which could logically be anticipated to follow from continuation of the UN action, and which would be beneficial to the UN allies, are the following:

1. The Chinese Communists, entering into Korea in such force as the present, can hardly avoid trampling upon certain political and administrative rights of the Koreans in the area invaded.

2. The Chinese Communists, if condemned by the UN as aggressors, will possibly suffer certain political disadvantages at home. Their drive for a UN seat would be effectively checked.

3. The areas under occupation, and particularly North Korea, have been badly torn up by war, and the Communist occupants will therefore sustain an additional burden of rehabilitation—and at the same time face the discontents of the Korean population.

4. The military action itself, as carried out against the UN forces, will constitute an attritive drain upon the resources of the Chinese nation. If it be argued that the Chinese are readily able to meet drains on their manpower whereas the Occidental UN member States supporting the UN operation are not, it is on the other hand to be noted that the Chinese nation lacks anything approaching the same capacity to meet drains on its material resources. This is particularly true at a time when the Chinese economy is still suffering from long years of war and civil war. Whether the USSR is in a position readily to make up those material deficits is an open question.

5. The very successes which have attended the Chinese drive will tend to increase their self-confidence, even their arrogance. This might possibly be true to a certain degree even vis-à-vis Moscow, as well as in respect to the so-called "imperialist camp" against which they are currently warring. This situation will be aggravated perhaps by the circumstance that the Chinese Communists will be in occupation of an area long considered by the Soviet Union (and before the USSR, by Tsarist Russia) to be of considerable strategic and political importance to Russia rather than to China. There does exist in the present situation, in short, the seeds of some possible dissension between the Moscow-Peiping alliance.

6. For so long as the Chinese Communists are engaged in Korea they will presumably be correspondingly braked as regards other ventures directed, by hypothesis, toward Indochina, Formosa, or other areas on their periphery. That would constitute a net gain.

7. Both dissident "guerrillas" and bandits, and other discontented elements in China Proper, would be emboldened by continuation of the present struggle, where they would be disheartened by a quick collapse of the UN forces under the blows of the People's Liberation Army. The initial roll-up of the enemy front in satellite territory, suggested as one way of throwing the USSR off balance, would perhaps develop as a possibility in China. Morale in Formosa would also be maintained, where otherwise it would fail. The situation in Japan could better be held stable, where disquiet and vacillation would surely follow upon any rapid withdrawal from the peninsula. The support that a continuing UN campaign would offer to political resistance to Communism in Europe as well as in Asia is another goal to be achieved.

In sum, a new objective in Korea should now replace the first objective of UN forces, namely, the U.S. should strive through the localized UN operation to increase the strength of its political alliances throughout the world, which development should be paralleled by the progressive outlawry of the Moscow-Peiping combine and its satellite friends. The original UN view that the Korean peninsula can be conquered, unified, stabilized, and rehabilitated through UN military, political, and economic means must, however, now be abandoned; and, in certain contingencies, the UN military campaign itself may have to be abandoned. We should therefore make certain that we are found in a military position to accomplish evacuation of the UN forces in the event that (1) there intervene other major developments which make a redistribution of those forces advisable, or (2) it is the UN will that the project be abandoned as hopeless from a military point of view. The withdrawal, it should be emphasized, like the UN challenge to aggression in the first instance, should be by UN mandate.

$Global\ Redistribution\ of\ U.S.\ Forces:$

A concentration of U.S. military effort, or even UN military effort, on Korea alone would be justified only on the basis of the hypothesis that the Moscow-Peiping axis at the present time contemplates only a limited peripheral operation and not the development of the Korean hostilities in the near future into the dimensions of World War III. Such an assumption cannot safely be assumed. It is because of this circumstance that neither the U.S. nor any of its allies should be caused to keep in Korea contingents which cannot safely be spared from strategic areas of greater importance for the global defense of the free world. It is clear that the over-all world danger is increasing. It is truly desirable that the UN Korea operation be kept in being, in at least token form and preferably in effective form, in the anticipation that at least some of the benefits listed in the foregoing section may be gained, and in order that there shall be full exploitation of all reasonably safe opportunities that may develop for inflicting a defeat on some sector of the world Communist camp. The UN commitment, however, should be related to our over-all capabilities and demands on our strength from the main theaters of potential conflict, and the circumstances and times alike appear to demand that the U.S. contingent particularly should be reduced substantially in order that we may strengthen other, more important areas. It is tentatively suggested that approximately all but two or three full divisions of the U.S. forces should be evacuated in the near future, while the UN nations support it, the UN action should be asked for stronger contingents. The UN force is not small: under General Walker's command alone there are 4 U.S. divisions, 8 ROK divisions, 2 British brigades, 1 Turkish brigade, the U.S. 187th Airborne RCT, and smaller Filipino and Thai units.* The ROK force particularly is presumably subject to expansion. Perhaps other contingents than the American can be built up as well. But if the U.S. partial withdrawal leads in due course to termination of the UN operation before an overwhelming Communist threat, so be it.

As suggested in CA's reference memorandum of December 1, it would seem essential that there should in any event be such redistribution of U.S. forces as would assure the primary defense of Japan. Germany and western Europe generally likewise have their demands on the forces of the allies. The defense of the U.S. itself and the training of its new armies of course should be given priority over all else.

Conclusion:

It is patent that the demands of both the Korean war and other theaters cannot now be met except by (1) making much heavier demands on the armed forces of other UN member States, and (2) mobilization of substantially larger forces in the U.S. itself. It should not be overlooked that the USSR in supporting Peiping's intervention in the Korean war presumably undertook certain commitments to help its ally directly or indirectly by actions of its own-depending upon developments, for the Communist tactics are flexible. It is not to be assumed as certain that the Soviet aid would be forthcoming only when and if the UN forces were to cross the border of Korea and intrude into the territory of China itself. The Soviet Union may plan for reasons of both military advantage and political prestige to balance the Chinese Communist operation in Korea by another operation of its own, whether near to or far from the Korean theater. The immediate present, and particularly the period when there may be in progress any evacuation of UN forces from the peninsula (which evacuation would naturally tend to strengthen other potential theaters of warfare in which the USSR presumably has an interest), would appear to be one critical period. Whether it is the most critical period remains to be seen. It does not appear in any event, however, that the free nations can afford to consider longer that they have until 1952 to prepare.

Editorial Note

The First Committee of the United Nations General Assembly met on the afternoon of December 7 from 3 to 4:15 p.m.; for the record, see U.N. document A/C.1/SR.409. At this meeting, the Committee by a vote of 42 to 5, with 4 abstentions, agreed to give priority to debating the question of intervention by the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China in Korea. The First Committee, however, did not vote during the remainder of its sessions during 1950 on the six-power draft resolution (see the editorial note, page 1421).

THE PRESIDENT explained that General Marshall had been unavoidably detained but would be there shortly, and he suggested that they proceed with the meeting. If the Prime Minister had any statement to make, he would be very glad to hear it.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that he first wanted to refer to all of the problems connected with the Spofford Plan and to tell the President that they were agreed to go forward at the meeting of the Deputies. He said that this did not commit the United Kingdom to the precise time of the approach to Germany or whether the agreement should be reached through a formal meeting of the Ministers.

THE PRESIDENT said he was very happy to know it.

The Prime Minister said he would like to return to the Far Eastern questions and see where there were agreements and where there were gaps in the agreements. He thought they were agreed we did not wish to become involved in a major war with China. We were also agreed that we should hold on in Korea until we are forced to leave. He thought these agreements led us to the point that sooner or later we must somehow get some kind of settlement in the Far East. They were standing on the Cairo agreement. The major point in that agreement was its provisions regarding Korea. These had never been carried out because of the Russian attitude, but the UK still wished to see a unified government in Korea.

THE PRESIDENT interposed that we did too.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that in due course Korea should be free and independent. This was a hard row to hoe and we haven't been able to get it both unified and free. In North Korea the government had become more and more communist, and in South Korea the government which had been set up would as soon as it got into power let its people down badly. It became very corrupt and inefficient. This at least was the general view held in the United Kingdom. It seemed unfortunately true that governments so set up in some places are not the best. They did not expect an ideal government in Korea, but it is still necessary to work for a Korea that will be free and independent. Some kind of settlement was required for this purpose.

Regarding the military situation, he wondered what was the first decision which had to be made. It seemed that we should hold out until we were obliged to get out. A cease-fire may be secured; then we could begin to talk. It was very important that this be regarded as a primary point. This was really a United Nations business, but our enemies are always trying to present the matter as if it were really a quarrel between the United States and China.

THE PRESIDENT said that this was right and we did not want that impression.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that we must therefore keep it on United Nations lines. We must work it out there so that we gradually approach an agreement. He had stated frankly that they thought it was better to have the Chinese Communists inside the United Nations. This question was already under discussion here. It was said that we could not have such a result while they were carrying on war against us. He recalled, however, that he had once had the Prime Ministers of Pakistan and India sitting down around the table and discussing matters quite amicably when they were almost at war with each other in Kashmir. Similarly, they had talked with the Israelis when they were being pretty nasty to the United Kingdom. Talks could not therefore be ruled out on those grounds. We should get to the point where we can discuss these things. We have a slightly different slant on the matter because of our differing judgments regarding the Chinese. They still felt that, if you rule out full war with China, you are led to some negotiation in some way at some time.

THE PRIME MINISTER remarked that the President had thrown out the idea that there might be some continuation of warfare against the Chinese; very frankly, he said, this had not appealed to him very much. He wondered what could be done in the way of economic warfare or subversive activity or through other actions which amounted merely to pin pricks that could really lead eventually to a settlement. Our cards were not good enough to lead to that effect. The policy suggested was for a kind of limited war and this did not appeal to the British people or to the bulk of those in the United Nations. They feared that, if we began on a limited war, this might become full war and thus defeat our objective. Therefore, the Government of the United Kingdom does not approve of limited warfare against the Chinese if this were not directed to the immediate terrain of Korea but become a kind of war around the perimeter of China. If the Chinese were in the United Nations, there might be a possibility of reaching some settlement by discussion. He realized that this might seem distasteful since it might look as if we were climbing down. But if there were to be a settlement, it was better to have it in the United Nations than to have it forced on any one of us individually. In Korea we are acting as servants of the United Nations and the questions must be settled there. If the Chinese Communists were seated in the United Nations, there would be less loss of face for them than if the United Nations were dealing with them as outsiders where they disregard their obligations. If they were in the United Nations, we could use arguments based on the principles of the United Nations which are not so effective when they are outside the club. He said he did not know how far we could go in considering moves in the United Nations which we might not initiate or even bless but which in any case might come along.

Secretary Acheson, responding to an inquiry from the President, said this was a very difficult subject which they had been wrestling with in conversations with Ambassador Franks.

THE PRESIDENT said it was political dynamite in the United States. Secretary Acheson said this was true. One could approach this subject by a series of logical arguments and one could make a persuasive case for a consistent policy based on the Cairo Declaration. In this connection, one could stress that the Cairo Declaration dealt with Korea as much as with Formosa and also contained principles against the use of force. The fact was that we were confronted with a series of dilemmas. It was quite possible to point out the differences, but that did not provide an escape from the dilemma. Putting the various suggestions to a pragmatic test revealed that the outcome would be one to which both Korea and Formosa became communist. This would give great prestige to the communists and would undoubtedly have a serious effect in Japan and in the Philippine Islands. We were all agreed to make every effort to make Korea unified and free. The trouble is that we may get it unified but that it would not be free. We do not have to accept a communistic Formosa; we have the power to prevent that. This raises the deepest possible problem. The Prime Minister made strong arguments against a limited war with the Chinese. His arguments were worthy of careful consideration. We must think that one out. If we agree not to be involved in war with China, the question is what can you do to the Chinese. It might be very little, but there were other things that we could do in the Far East as, for example, building up Japan as a counter-weight, or strengthening the Philippine Islands or other states in order to encourage their resistance to communism. The problem was to arrive at a sound judgment on the result of the two courses of action rather than to make logical arguments on both sides.

Disturbing things were happening in East Germany. The letter which had recently been sent by the leader of East Germany to Adenauer had a dangerous similarity to the kind of letter which the North Koreans had written to the Government of Korea just before they attacked. They indicated in effect that, if their proposal were not accepted, the choice was between peace and war. While this propaganda is growing in intensity in Germany, Vishinsky is making his speeches in the United Nations saying that our action was the first step to the third World War. We must step up our efforts in Germany and elsewhere.

At the same time, we must estimate where we are going. One had to ask how near we are to war. If we think that the movement is gathering speed and drawing to this conclusion, it would be a great mistake to make moves for unsuccessful attempts to buy off the aggressor just before the crash came. The question was whether you could buy him off or whether you would not merely get more pressure. He did not presume to know the answers and suggested to the President that he would wish to secure additional advice on this point. He would point out, however, that there was a lot of history regarding this sort of attempt. It was not the first time that attempts had been made to buy time from aggressors. The whole proposition of the United Nations and of our post-war policy had been not to do that but to say that we would fight it out from the position we had taken. These attempts in the past had not often been successful, and if we tried them now it would be very hard to get the heart in our people to see a rough job through. In fact, such a plan would not work. One could buy some time but it would not be enough. It would only divide our own people and make them feel that we had betrayed our principles and we would have no moral position left if war came. He was not attempting to make a legal argument, although there were lots that could be made. What he would like to do would be to get to the real issue. As a matter of legal argument, one could say, for example in respect to the Cairo Declaration, that we did give Formosa back to the Chinese; do we have to do it again every year? Such arguments were not worthy of this discussion. We may have both negotiation and war and, if this were true, we would not want to have the negotiation. However, if the negotiation would have a profound effect upon the world, certainly one should think it over.

THE PRIME MINISTER said, in speaking about negotiations, the Secretary of State seemed to assume that there would necessarily be a retreat all along the line. It might be possible to get an agreement to hold in Korea on the 38th Parallel; on Formosa, one might admit that the Chinese were to get it eventually but that now it should be held in a neutral status. We then would not have given way, but we would get some settlement in the East and would not break our ranks or give up our principles.

Secretary Acheson said clearly, if there were a cease-fire there would be a negotiation and we would be in the midst of it. If there were not a cease-fire and war goes on and the United Nations forces hold, we may have negotiation at some point or we might sound them out and then see about having a negotiation. We would tend to disintegrate unless we know where we are going. One needed to remember that not all United Nations armistices are firm.

THE PRESIDENT said that it occurred to him that, if the Chinese Communists were admitted to the United Nations, we will have a great deal of difficulty with our people. The Russians have been in the United Nations and have constantly given us trouble on a great many subjects including the attempts to get peace with Austria, Germany and Japan, and in connection with their handling of their satellites in Greece and earlier in Iran. It had been the same in Berlin. He wondered whether there was any reason to believe that we would have any closer approach to the Chinese Communists if they were in the United Nations than if they were out.

THE PRIME MINISTER asked whether it was any worse having two vetoes than having one.

THE PRESIDENT repeated that he thought it would be no better to have the Chinese Communists in than to have them out. He referred to the way in which they had treated our consular officers in China and the seizure of our property. There had also been various verbal attacks on the United States. He had to admit that all of this had not made him have any friendly feelings toward them.

SIR ROGER MAKINS said it was inevitable and essential that any policy we develop must be a United Nations policy.

THE PRESIDENT said he agreed with this.

SIR ROGER MAKINS continued that, if this were so, then we must carry the majority of the United Nations with our policy. There is a strong sentiment in the United Nations in favor of an attempt to arrive at a negotiated settlement. The Canadians, for example, were strong for it and so were the Asiatics. Many of the Europeans feel the same way. A negotiated settlement may be impossible. If that were true, he did not know what would happen, but we would need the support of everyone we could rally. The question was whether we would get that support without a demonstration of our willingness to get a settlement and an ability to show good sound reasons why our effort had failed. This, he said, was the factual situation. On hard points like the seating of the Chinese in the United Nations and on Formosa and on Korea, actions had already been started in the United Nations. These could be extended and carried forward if that were part of our policy.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that it was true that Russia was a nuisance in the United Nations, but on the whole he thought it was better that they should be in than out. He wondered if the same did not apply to the Chinese. He thought there was a case for seating them in the United Nations.

Assistant Secretary Rusk said he agreed with Sir Roger Makins that we should rally as much support in the United Nations as possible and make every effort to find a settlement. However, the record indicates great doubt as to where we would come out. We have tried many times to find a settlement with the communists in various ways. When Prime Minister Nehru took the initiative in approaching the Soviet Union, Stalin published the correspondence at the wrong time and affronted Nehru. We have tried both direct and indirect approaches to the Chinese Communists. We had suggested that a United Nations Commission should supervise the border. In regard to the bombing incidents on the Manchurian frontier, we had suggested that a commission be sent to assess the damages. When the Chinese objected to that, we sent word privately to them through the Indians and told them that we would be glad to settle for the bombings by having persons go to the spot privately outside the United Nations. He wondered if it was not merely the question of concessions which we were talking about here. We have never said we would not enter into talks with the Chinese Communists. Perhaps if the United Nations knew more of our efforts, their actual attitude might change.

THE PRIME MINISTER said this might be true.

GENERAL MARSHALL said that the problem of world reaction and attitudes in the United Nations were not in his field and it was not for him to discuss them.

Secretary Acheson interposed that General Marshall had been in that field much longer than he had.

GENERAL MARSHALL continued that, if there were any reasonable means by which we could avoid war with Communist China, we would want to take them because we were faced with the threat of a global war. We know we are dealing with people with whom it is almost impossible to negotiate. From the military point of view, it is very dangerous to go on in such a way as to weaken us in the field before we may have to fight. Specifically with regard to Formosa, among our military people some from time to time have said that it was not of great strategic importance to us but that it would become so if it were in enemy hands. It might be all right if it were neutral with Okinawa and the Philippines on each side, but it would be intolerable to have it in enemy hands. If we come out of negotiations with Formosa in hostile hands, we may have irreparably damaged our position in the Far East and in the world at large. It was hard to see how we could successfully negotiate a settlement with the Chinese Communists on these questions without making large concessions. He had nothing very constructive to suggest, but perhaps the passage of time would help us. He pointed out to the Prime Minister that the United Kingdom faced a predicament in Hong Kong but said this was not quite comparable to the Formosan question. The factors relative to a negotiation had already been discussed. We would be in an almost intolerable position if we made a big sacrifice of prestige in the western Pacific and abandoned our express commitment in Korea and also at the same time actually weakened our position. He repeated that he had no constructive solution but thought that a little time would be useful.

THE PRESIDENT said he would like to make a little comment on the Cairo Declaration. This Declaration was made at a time when the Russians, as he recalled, were not at war with Japan and Japan was the overwhelming power in the Pacific; and that our objective, if he read history correctly, was to establish power in the Far East that was friendly to the United Kingdom and the United States to offset the vicious power of Japan. Now we were almost in the same situation with China, the great power we set up, having collapsed and its place having really been taken by Russia, since they really were Russian and nothing else. When we thought that Formosa was not strategically important to us, we never considered that the Chinese Government would be one which would be very hostile to the United States. There is no question now that it is very hostile to us. We went into Korea in support of a resolution of the United Nations. Fifty-three countries endorsed what we thought was the proper thing to prevent the vicious mistreatment of Korea. We were about to accomplish the purpose which we had started on June 25th. We had suffered some 35,000 casualties. If we surrendered Formosa, we left our flank open. Our position would then be wrecked and so would that of the United Kingdom. He just could not agree to do that, and he was sure the Prime Minister could see why. He said that he wanted peace just as Mr. Attlee did. He was not, however, in any mood for an unnecessary surrender to give in to China which is actually the Russian government. He hoped that time would bring them to realize that their friends are not in Siberia but in London and in Washington.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that he didn't think we would make them realize that by continuing military action against them.

THE PRESIDENT said he quite agreed, but we couldn't leave the Koreans to be murdered.

THE PRIME MINISTER said they were agreed on that question.

THE PRESIDENT said if they licked us in Korea that was one thing, but after Dunkirk the British didn't surrender but they took it and went right on. He thought that perhaps we in the United States had inherited from the United Kingdom the spirit of not liking to pick a fight but of standing up to it when it comes to us.

LORD TEDDER inquired what military action in continuation of hostilities was contemplated and what military effect that would have on the Chinese and on our interests.

General Marshall said they had not drawn up any detailed preparations for such action. One suggestion had been for a blockade of the ports and possible air action against critical points. Another suggestion had been for undercover action in South China to make greater difficulties for them than they now have. This was not a proposal to hold the place but to make it harder for the Chinese. He had an open mind on these questions. He did not know how effective the blockade would be nor how soon results would come from any subversive activities. The question which was very much in his mind was the bombing procedure. This is always tangled up with the inevitable loss of civilian lives, which even in the middle of war is a very regrettable business.

General Bradley pointed out there was also a possibility of continuing hostilities in Korea itself.

LORD TEDDER thought that would mean a hot war.

GENERAL MARSHALL said that he had not yet boiled down the various considerations in his own mind.

FIELD MARSHAL SLIM inquired whether this kind of action against the Chinese Communists would not lead the Soviet Union to invoke their treaty with China.

GENERAL MARSHALL said it probably would.

THE PRESIDENT said that was what we were worried about.

Secretary Snyder said he could not understand why they could fight us and we could not fight them.

General Bradley said they were actually sending military forces against us and did not call it war, and yet if we drop one bomb across the Yalu they say we are making war against them. It would appear from the way some of our friends talk that there was after all some value to the Soviet propaganda.

THE PRESIDENT remarked that there were also some Republicans who talked that way.

General Bradley said that he supposed if they attacked Hong Kong it would be war, but it was not considered war in Korea now.

General Marshall pointed to the fact that Russian Mig's were taking part in the fighting in Korea and yet it was not considered war. We have to be careful now in regard to carrying the offensive across the river. The question was how much we would be pommelled before we hit back. He recognized that there was a fear of general war breaking out; he shared that fear but felt there were limits. He was inclined to think that the question of carrying bombing against them was too great a risk for small gains.

FIELD MARSHAL SLIM said that from a military point of view we would seem to gain little from such activities especially if we still had troops in Korea. If Russian air came in we would have to say goodbye.

GENERAL MARSHALL said that it had not been intended to take any such steps until we were out of Korea.

General Bradley repeated this point. He recalled that as the Secretary of State had said, if we take this in the East people will wonder whether we are going to take the same kind of treatment in the West. It would be hard to see the difference.

FIELD MARSHAL SLIM said that in regard to Formosa he recognized its importance from the military point of view. He wondered whether agreement to engage in negotiations would involve giving up Formosa. He thought we might favor our having negotiation on Korea and the question of seating in the United Nations without dealing with the Formosa question. What he wanted to stress was that we should avoid a full-scale war which would tie us up in the Far East. He recalled that they also had troops involved there.

General Bradley suggested that if little things brought war then we were going to get into it any way. If we were, there was no point in turning over Formosa with its 300,000 troops; this was not sound from a military point of view.

THE PRESIDENT said it was not sound from the political point of view here and that he had to consider the political situation here.

LORD TEDDER said that if war started with the Chinese, the Russians might wait in Europe until it suited their book to come in. The Chinese would probably go on attacking Hong Kong and Indochina, hoping our troops would be drawn to Malaya, and at that point there might be a Russian strike in Europe. We must avoid that if we can.

General Marshall said that these suggestions were far away from his thinking. He wanted to avoid war with China. In thinking about the kind of continued action he had referred to, it must be borne in mind that this was something to be considered in case we were kicked out of Korea. We could either go back to Japan like a whipped dog or we could do something about it. This was all that had been thought of. Perhaps the suggested action would not be useful but he still would bring about an avoidance of destruction that was something else to think of.

Mr. Harriman expressed the opinion that Indochina was worthless in terms of negotiation and for any other reason. There was no reason to think that the enemy would stop there. The question was one of the organization of the free world and the re-establishment of its morale. This could be accomplished only by strong action with a demonstration of strength in the Far East to the limit of our capacity and especially by pressing on with our NATO plans. We can't close our eyes to the Pacific. He doubted whether we could obtain the objectives of the Cairo Declaration. We might get into the situation of paying tribute to the Chinese Communists without getting results. Some of those in the UN hope for easy solutions. Actually the only way is to follow a vigorous policy to strengthen others and preserve a defense in depth in Southeast Asia by economic aid to Indonesia and similar countries, by strengthening the Middle East through our economic programs and mainly by getting ahead with the NATO plans. He wondered how we could do all of that if there were differences between the United States and United Kingdom regarding the East. That seemed to him the most disturbing thing in these talks. From a realistic point of view, he did not think that we could carry the American people in their support of NATO without common action in the East.

THE PRESIDENT said that we couldn't finish the job without some agreement on the Far East. There was a very difficult situation here in the United States and we could hardly talk about negotiating the question of seating the Chinese Communists.

Mr. Harriman said that, considering the possibility of war with Russia, our last chance was to act in accordance with the policy which the President had indicated and while we still have time get on with the constructive things which we can do.

THE PRESIDENT asked Mr. Symington whether there were any results to report from the meeting of the Working Groups on raw materials.

Mr. Symington reported that another meeting was to be held at 5:00. They seemed to be getting close together on general policy and both sides felt that there was some help that each could give the other on specific things.

THE PRESIDENT said that if there were no further points that any one wished to bring up now we would resume the meeting at 11:00 tomorrow. He wanted to emphasize the importance of maintaining a solid front. It was very helpful to bring out all viewpoints and approaches. He felt that we must not end these discussions until we come out with a solid front. It would be disastrous if we could not reach accord. He wondered whether there was any desire to continue at that time unless someone had some new ideas to present.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS wondered whether our differences were as great as they seemed. In the first place he said we do not differ on the strategic importance of the island chain. Personally, he thought that the United Kingdom had been strongly moved by the military views on Formosa which had been presented. They were not asking the United States to give up Formosa.

THE PRESIDENT said that he was glad to hear Sir Oliver say this but he had never thought that they were.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS continued that he thought we were agreed on what we hoped to do in Korea. This attitude flowed naturally from the decisions which had already been made concerning aggression. He thought we further agreed that if at any stage we can have negotiations in an honorable way, that we would consider that this was sensible. We were agreed that if there were a cease-fire then there would be negotiations. No one had doubted this. It may well be that even if there were no cease-fire, there might in some other way be a chance for negotiations. He did not at the moment know how that might come about but he thought no one would say "no" to that proposition. If we were not to become involved in a major war, it seemed necessary to find some form of settlement.

The President interposed that was correct.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS continued that he had no precise idea regarding the time at which there might be negotiation. What General Marshall had said was relevant to this point. They did not argue that negotiations should take place this week or next week but if the opportunity is offered to begin negotiations we should seriously consider it. That did not mean that concessions should be made in advance before we begin negotiations. Nor did he mean to suggest that we should let ourselves go down the long slope of concessions. There was one thing on which they had not convinced the United States as yet and that was the question of Chinese Communist membership in the United Nations. From the British point of view, we did not think that agreement on this involved giving in much because they had been urging it even before the aggression started. They looked upon it as a question of fact and not as a question of whether one liked or disliked the Chinese Communists. They were, therefore, inclined to think of reaching an agreement on that point in negotiations and would not stumble over this difficulty as the United States would.

THE PRESIDENT interposed that this was indeed a vitally important point in the United States.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS continued that other points of difference were less than they had been. He was perturbed by the suggestion that if it was impossible to maintain some military force in Korea, our hostility to aggression would be expressed in some other way against the Chinese than through the continuation of the military action in Korea. That presented an opposite point of view to the one which considered that it was time to make a settlement. It might be that we were both agreed on wanting to reach a settlement in the Far East but from the UN point of view such actions as naval blockade and so on will get us into trouble as we have pointed out on both sides.

THE PRESIDENT agreed.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS continued that he thought it had been helpful to them to find that this point has not yet been settled. They were not pressing for negotiations at any price.

THE PRIME MINISTER said this was right.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS said he thought we were agreed on the prices which we should not pay. The development of a new situation changed our willingness in regard to paying the prices which we had been willing to pay months ago. Nevertheless, we should not neglect an opportunity for settlement if one were possible. Regarding the admission of the Chinese Communists to the United Nations, he thought there was not a great difference of approach but only one of emphasis. He thought that as time moved on our differences could be dissolved and that we would find a way. He was optimistic that we would be able to think up some idea for a solution, for example, in regard to Formosa. As a result of the talks they hoped that the United States would weigh the views which had been expressed on behalf of the United Kingdom with the problem of some decent negotiation.

THE PRESIDENT said that their views undoubtedly helped; the area of difference was not as great as had appeared.

THE PRIME MINISTER agreed that this was the case.

THE SECRETARY said that he hoped we could get on with the area of agreement. We were agreed that we must move forward with the resolution in the United Nations. A cease-fire was more likely if we keep a unified front and move forward. The United Nations now thinks there is uncertainty and difference of opinion between us. This impression centered on views which had been expressed by members of the Commonwealth-for example, Canada. We were now going ahead, especially with Canada, regarding the desirability of pushing for the six-power resolution. He hoped that we would move on steadily with this resolution but not too fast. Hesitation or delay would give an impression that we were nervous. He wanted to point out that all through the Korean affair we had been careful not to tell the truth about the Russian role in this matter. This put us at a great disadvantage and in a position of weakness. The Russians have a great advantage in their propaganda in saying this whole thing is an aggression by the United States and that it is not a United Nations action. When we have to say that this is just a matter of some North Koreans or of Chinese we are backing away from the real fact. We must not allow the Russians to appear as a disinterested friend of the Chinese, if we go into negotiations instead of having it plain that they are the ones who started the whole aggression. He called attention to the Russian attitude on the appeal of the group of Asiatic powers and said the Russians had by posing as a disinterested by-stander kicked the stuffing out of them. We must consider not formal steps to brand the Russians as aggressors but to say we understand this business that is going on; we understand that this is all Russian action and not just Chinese action. We did not need to decide this now but we were coming close to the time when we must remove the "fig leaves" as the expression was used in the State Department.

THE PRESIDENT suggested that perhaps if the Prime Minister agreed this was the time to adjourn.

The following communiqué was then mutually approved:

"The President and the Prime Minister, with members of their respective staffs, met at the White House at 3:30 this afternoon to continue their exchange of views on the broad aspects of the present world situation. This meeting is to be continued tomorrow morning to permit the two heads of government to consider reports which will be brought in by the groups working on raw materials.

"A Joint Communique will be issued at the conclusion of this meeting."

At this meeting, the Prime Minister handed to the President for consideration a document entitled "United States and United Kingdom Liaison Arrangements". (This document is attached as an annex to the minutes of the sixth meeting.)

Memorandum for the Record by the Ambassador at Large (Jessup)

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] December 7, 1950.

EXCERPT FROM MEETING BETWEEN THE PRESIDENT AND PRIME MINISTER IN THE CABINET ROOM OF THE WHITE HOUSE, THURSDAY, DECEM-BER 7, 1950

(This information not incorporated in official account of meetings.)

The President said he had just talked with the Prime Minister and that they had discussed the atomic bomb and its use. The President reminded Mr. Attlee that the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States had always been partners in this matter and that he would not consider the use of the bomb without consulting with the United Kingdom. The Prime Minister asked whether this agreement should be put in writing, and the President replied no that it would not be in writing, that if a man's word wasn't any good it wasn't made any better by writing it down. The Prime Minister expressed his thanks.

Memorandum for the Record, by Mr. R. Gordon Arneson, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State 2

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] January 16, 1953.

Subject: Truman-Attlee Conversations of December 1950: Use of Atomic Weapons

1. The position which Secretary Acheson discussed with the President, in anticipation of the British raising the question of the use of atomic weapons, is attached at Tab A.3

2. In the course of the Fifth Meeting of the Truman-Attlee conversations in the Cabinet Room of the White House, Thursday, December 7, 1950, the President spoke to the subject along the lines reflected in Tab B.4

1 Note in the source text.

³Mr. Arneson, previously Special Assistant to the Under Secretary of State, had assumed the position of Mr. Acheson's Special Assistant for atomic energy matters, effective November 13, 1950. He held the same post on January 16, 1953.

- 3. As the Sixth Meeting began on December 8, 1950,5 Secretary Acheson called for Mr. Arneson to join him at the White House to advise him as to what should be said in the Joint Communiqué concerning atomic weapons.
- 4. Shortly after 12 o'clock noon the President withdrew briefly from the meeting and went to his office to discuss with Secretary Acheson, Secretary Lovett, Secretary Snyder, Mr. Harriman, and Mr. Arneson the language to be incorporated in the Joint Communiqué. During the discussion, Secretary Lovett recalled that the Quebec Agreement 6 had provided that the United States had to obtain United Kingdom consent before using the atomic weapon. Members of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, particularly Senator Vandenberg and Senator Hickenlooper, had been very disturbed at this provision and had urged most strongly that steps be taken to abrogate it. Negotiations were undertaken at the end of 1947 7 (Mr. Lovett was then Under Secretary of State) to supplant the Quebec Agreement with other arrangements. A salient objective of these negotiations was to terminate the provision concerning United Kingdom consent. The resultant Modus Vivendi of January 7, 1948,8 provided, among other things, that the commitment concerning use of atomic weapons was to have no further force or effect. As the discussion proceeded, Mr. Arneson drafted the language which was subsequently incorporated in the final Joint Communiqué of December 8, 1950. The President approved the suggested language and asked Secretary Acheson to secure British acceptance thereof.
- 5. Secretary Acheson discussed the matter with Sir Oliver Franks and, with British concurrence, these two sentences were inserted as the penultimate paragraph of the Communiqué. (Tab C).9 The United States Minutes of the Sixth Meeting state:

"The President then said there were a couple more sentences on which he and the Prime Minister had agreed and which were to be included in the communiqué. He then read the sentences dealing with the atomic bomb as they appear in the final communiqué. The President said we should find the proper place to insert them."

6. In the course of subsequent comparison of minutes of the meetings, Mr. Wayne Jackson learned that the British Minutes of the Fifth Meeting included a passage along the lines of the first statement which the President made on the subject. (Tab A).¹⁰ The point was made at that time that this statement should be deleted since the President had corrected it and his correction constituted a change in the record of the conference itself. It was pointed out that the United States position on this matter was as reflected in the text of the Joint Communiqué. (For Ambassador Jessup's note on this point, see Tab D.)¹¹

7. In subsequent conversations with Mr. F. W. Marten of the British Embassy, Mr. Arneson had occasion to make the same point, namely that the official United States position as agreed by the President and as accepted by Prime Minister Attlee, was set forth in the penultimate paragraph of the Joint Communiqué—no more and no less.

Position Paper Prepared for the Truman-Attlee Talks

Use of Atomic Bomb

PRESENT POSITION

The President has made clear (a) that by law only he can authorize its use, and (b) that he has not authorized its use.

The sensational action by the press in dealing with the questions and answers at the President's press conference ¹² has given the impression that the President is actively considering use of the bomb in China.

BRITISH POSITION

That the bomb should not be used without consultation—and probably without agreement—with them and perhaps others. Probably, also, they are strongly opposed to its use in China.

¹⁰ Presumably, the reference should be to Tab B, i.e., Mr. Jessup's memorandum of December 7, p. 1462, which reflected President Truman's "first statement" on the subject.

¹¹ Mr. Jessup's memorandum for the record, dated January 9, 1951, read as ollows:

[&]quot;In discussions with the British about the minutes of the Truman-Attlee talks, Mr. Wayne Jackson was informed that in the minutes of the fifth meeting which they have in their own files they have included the first statement made by the President on the subject of the atomic bomb. We argued that the statement should be deleted since the President had corrected it and that his correction constituted a change in the record of the conference itself. They did not accept this argument so far as their file copies were concerned, but in the copy of their minutes which they are exchanging with us this paragraph is deleted."

¹⁸ See the editorial note concerning President Truman's news conference of November 30, p. 1261.

OTHER FACTORS

These are known to the President.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR ATTLEE DISCUSSIONS

(a) That no commitment be made restricting the action of the U.S.
(b) That our desire not to use the bomb be stressed.

(c) That our realization of the dire consequences for all of its use be stressed and our great sense of responsibility. We are, indeed, trustees for the future of the world in this respect.

(d) That our desire and expectation to move in step with the British be stressed. (Their role in this matter requires this.)

(e) That, if necessary after the preliminary discussions, further consideration of our position be undertaken.

to escape further Communist oppression and misery. It of interest that this phenomenon is underlined in UNCURK report to UN on Chinese Communist intervention.² Desire to escape is enhanced because of knowledge Communists this time are alien Chinese who traditionally hated and feared by Koreans.

For Department's information, it had been hoped great majority of North Koreans would "stay put", but tide proved irresistible, particularly from Pyongyang and Chinnampo areas where deterrent steps could not easily be implemented. There is reason to believe large exodus is also under way south along coastal highway from Wonsan. Current policy is to direct refugees, who run into six figures, away from main supply routes and potential areas of military operations. Those moving south from Pyongyang area are being diverted to Haeju area. For military and security reasons, it has not been policy to encourage North Koreans to seek refuge in ROK where government and UN welfare agencies are hard pressed to care for those already here not to mention numberless others who will take to road in case Chinese Communists invade ROK.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Henry S. Villard, Adviser to the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

CONFIDENTIAL

[New York,] December 8, 1950.

US/A/C.1/2341

Subject: Korean Resolution.

Participants: Mr. Sven Grafstrom, Swedish Delegation.

Mr. Henry S. Villard, United States Delegation.

I had dinner last night with Mr. Grafstrom, after which we discussed the Korean situation in some detail. The main points brought out during the course of our conversation were as follows:

(1) The Swedish Government fully supports the Six-Power Resolution and Mr. Grafstrom has his instructions to vote in its favor. He believes that the important thing is to get on with this resolution as soon as possible and to demonstrate by an overwhelming vote that it is not merely the United States, but the United Nations which opposes aggression.

² See footnote 2 to telegram 396 to Seoul, November 30, 8 p. m., p. 1272.

- (2) Mr. Grafstrom's conversation with General Wu at Secretary-General Lie's dinner demonstrated conclusively, to Mr. Grafstrom's mind, that Wu was only a megaphone for Moscow and acting the party line under instructions without any will of his own. Grafstrom spent the major part of his time talking to Wu through an interpreter and found that his approach was no different from that displayed in the Security Council. It was futile to expect anything to come out of such talks.
- (3) The situation today indicates that we have come face to face with the necessity for a showdown with Soviet Russia, that there is no compromise, no room for "negotiation" with those who seek to enslave mankind. "Black is white", "war is peace", "truth is false" are now Soviet dogma and there seems no possibility of reaching agreement on fundamental issues. There is a Swedish saying to the effect, "Better to end in disaster, than disaster without end". The only solution is for the free nations to unite against those who seek to spread their poison and infect the peoples of the world everywhere.
- (4) Mr. Grafstrom considered it useless to transmit messages to Peiping through Rau or any group of Asiatic nations. However, he was inclined to favor the idea of sending a small United Nations commission to Peiping to discuss the situation directly with the authorities there and to impress upon them the unity of virtually all members of the United Nations. Direct representations on the spot to those in control of the Chinese Communist regime might penetrate the barrier of propaganda which isolates them from the world and tend to convince them of the peaceful objectives of the West and its desire to attain a reasonable solution. Sweden would be willing to serve on such a commission, said Grafstrom.
- (5) Mr. Grafstrom asked that we keep in touch with the Swedish Delegation in order that it in turn may inform the Government in Stockholm as to the trend in our thinking. Stockholm was naturally looking to the United States for leadership in the crisis, although Grafstrom again emphasized that it was not the United States alone, but the United Nations which should be considered as acting against the aggression in Korea.

THE PRESIDENT opened the meeting by saying to the Prime Minister that General Collins, Chief of Staff of the Army, had just returned from a trip to Japan and Korea. They had begun these discussions with a briefing on the military situation by General Bradley and if the Prime Minister thought it would be useful he would ask General Collins to give a briefing on the situation as it stands now.

GENERAL COLLINS said that he had just returned from the four or five-day trip in which he had first gone to Tokyo where he had talked to General MacArthur.3 He then flew to Seoul where he talked to General Walker and went on up to the western front, which at that time was somewhat south of the river. He talked to the Commanders in the field. He then flew to the Hungnam area to see the operations of the Tenth Corps and talk to General Almond. He said that as the result of his conversations, he felt that General Walker's Command, if not pinned down to any particular directive requiring him to hold the Seoul area or any other particular spot, could gradually withdraw in an organized way to the Pusan area. Pusan was an excellent port where we already had large supplies. The two-track railroad to Pusan was in excellent condition. The Eighth Army was not in danger. They were falling back now to a position north of Seoul. The ROK units were in contact only with small North Korean elements. He felt confident about the general position of the Eighth Army. He spoke of the shift in the position of United States, United Kingdom and Turkish elements in the general redeployment of the forces. He said that the United Kingdom forces had not been badly hurt. The Turks had given a very good account of themselves and had been rather badly hurt in the action. Our Second Division had suffered rather severe losses and had lost a good deal of equipment. The Second Division and the Turks were now being refitted north of Seoul.

General Collins held his final meeting with General MacArthur in Tokyo on December 7, at which time the latter gave his overall views on the Korea situation, which were then reported to the JCS by General Collins. General MacArthur felt that the full power of the United Nations should be assembled at once to meet the Communist threat in Asia, since it had appeared there. If reinforcements could be sent to Korea in time, the most advantageous maneuver would be a series of fighting withdrawals to Pusan to damage the Chinese armies as much as possible. If reinforcements could not be forwarded, he thought the Command should be evacuated from Korea. In any case, if the Communists continued their all-out drive and his Command continued to operate with the present restrictions, the forces of the United Nations would have to be withdrawn with or without an armistice. These restrictions, as listed by General Collins, were: (1) no U.N. air action against China; (2) no U.N. naval blockade of China; (3) no reinforcement of U.N. forces from Nationalist China; (4) no substantial reinforcement of U.N. forces from the United States. If the restrictions were withdrawn, and if he could secure 50,000–60,000 Chinese Nationalist troops from Formosa, General MacArthur thought he could hold a line across Korea. If, on the other hand, the Chinese Communists could be persuaded not to cross the 38th Parallel, General MacArthur thought that the United Nations should accept an armistice based on the 38th Parallel, because that would be the most advantageous settlement which could be achieved in the circumstances. (Record of the Actions Taken by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, pp. 70–72)

Turning to the eastern front, he said that the Seventh Division, which had been up on the Yalu, was now all back in the Hamhung bridgehead area, except for two battalions which were with the Marines south of the reservoir. He had flown out to the area where the Marines were fighting and at first they had had good weather and had been able to see the operation but a snow storm had then begun and they were only able to see part of it. He explained that the Marines had not yet started down the precipitous slope which leads from the plateau area on which they were to the valley below. Forces had been despatched northward from the bridgehead to make a junction with the Marines. In his opinion if we had any kind of a decent break in regard to the weather which would permit the operation of our air force they had a good chance of getting back. The Chinese were making a very strong effort to bar their progress but we should be able to get out if air cover can be supplied. He pointed out also that our artillery was now within range of the area involved to support the evacuation. The column had its tanks with them and the operation was being well handled. He said that General Almond feels he can hold the bridgehead, including the airfield and the two cities of Hamhung and Hungnam for a considerable time with air cover and could evacuate the forces without serious loss. If Russian air came in in strength, this would pose a more serious problem. General MacArthur's plans, pending any political decision requiring a modification, were to withdraw the Tenth Corps to the Pusan area perhaps dropping small units at Pohang which would then move inland. From a military point of view, he said that all considered, it was far sounder to go to Pusan than to try to go across to form a junction with the Eighth Army. He felt, and the Commanders in the field agreed, that we could hold a position somewhere south of Seoul. He did not think that we could hold the Seoul area itself but perhaps could fall back to a position behind the Han River or hold on the Naktong River front. In summary, from a military point of view he could say that our troops were not in a critical condition today. The position of the Marines, however, was serious. He thought, however, that the Tenth Corps could be concentrated in the Hamhung area and could be withdrawn. He thought further that a junction could be made with the Eighth Army and that they could hold the Pusan bridgehead indefinitely.

[Here follows discussion of the questions of raw materials and United States-United Kingdom liaison, scheduled for publication in volume III.]

THE PRESIDENT said it then appeared that this part of the work had been a very successful conference for both of us.

Secretary Acheson raised the question of the final communiqué and suggested to the President that the group was too large to draft it.

THE PRESIDENT said clearly that the whole group could not engage in drafting. He told the Prime Minister that he would name the Secretary of State and any one that he wished to work on the matter, if that was agreeable to the Prime Minister. It was not possible to work out a draft in the entire meeting.

THE PRIME MINISTER agreed and said that he would designate Sir Roger Makins to assist with the drafting on their side. He then referred to a paper which he had handed to the President yesterday on the question of perfecting the liaison between the United Kingdom and the United States (Annex B). He wondered whether the President had had a chance to look at it. He had not proposed any formal arrangement but merely some informal steps.

THE PRESIDENT said that he thought the general idea was a good one but he had had no chance to talk about it with General Marshall yet but that he would do so.

THE PRIME MINISTER asked Sir Roger Makins if he could report on the present state of the communiqué.

SIR ROGER MAKINS said that a text was nearly ready to look at and that he thought they had no particular points to raise at the moment.

Secretary Acheson suggested that the drafting group could look at the issues involved and bring back to the President and the Prime Minister any points requiring their decision.

THE PRESIDENT said the drafting group could get to work at once and then submit the results to the Prime Minister and to him. If the Prime Minister had not yet met the Vice President and the members of the Cabinet who were present this interval would give an opportunity to talk with them about various matters.

THE VICE PRESIDENT said that he had had the pleasure of meeting the Prime Minister some time ago and that he had spoken to him this morning and was glad to say that he found him even younger and more handsome than he had been five years ago.

In response to a question from the President, Secretary Acheson said he would designate Assistant Secretary Perkins to take charge of the work on our side.

THE PRESIDENT asked the Prime Minister whether there was anything else he wished to bring up at the moment.

THE PRIME MINISTER replied he thought things were pretty well covered.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS said that all of the things they had wanted to bring up had already been covered and he thought in a very satisfactory way. They had nothing new to bring up at the last moment.

⁴ The text of this document is scheduled for publication in volume III.

THE PRESIDENT said that he had nothing new in mind but that he did not want to cut off the discussion if the Prime Minister had wanted to raise anything else. The talks had been very satisfactory from his point of view.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that he felt the same way.

THE PRESIDENT said we now know where each other stands and commented that the military report which they had had from General Collins gave a more satisfactory presentation than they had had before.

THE PRIME MINISTER agreed.

THE PRESIDENT said that it was hard in such a military situation for those of us who are sitting at desks to know just what the situation is in the field. He recalled how in various military situations there is a tendency first to have one's feelings very high up and then very low down. He did not think that we were going to be kicked out of Korea.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that we must take a stand and see what happens. No rapid judgment should be made in a fluid situation.

General Bradley remarked that on the basis of the present situation we were at least not forced to negotiate under pressure.

THE PRESIDENT and THE PRIME MINISTER agreed.

THE VICE PRESIDENT inquired whether the line that General Collins had referred to could be held by the forces already in Korea or whether we would have to send more.

GENERAL BRADLEY said that we could hold it with the present force supplemented by the normal flow of replacements.

THE PRESIDENT said that was very encouraging. The situation was not as gloomy as it had appeared on the day when the discussions had started. It was very satisfactory to hear from a man who had just been on the spot.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that this was very good indeed.

There then ensued general conversation around the table in the course of which the President asked the Prime Minister to excuse him for a few minutes and withdrew from the room.

The President returned to the room at 12:35 and at 12:50 the drafting group returned with its text and the conference resumed.

THE PRESIDENT said that if it was agreeable to the Prime Minister he would ask someone to read the communiqué all the way through after which we could discuss the different points.

Secretary Acheson suggested that Mr. Perkins, who had been in charge of the drafting, should read it.

Mr. Perkins read the communiqué.

⁵ The draft communiqué read by Mr. Perkins is not printed.

Secretary Acheson interposed at one point to ask the President whether he could raise a question then or whether the President wished the reading of the communiqué to continue and then to raise the questions.

THE PRESIDENT said he would prefer to come back later to specific points.

THE PRESIDENT then said there were a couple more sentences on which he and the Prime Minister had agreed and which were to be included in the communiqué. He then read the sentences dealing with the atomic bomb as they appear in the final communiqué. The President said we should find the proper place to insert them.

THE PRESIDENT then asked Secretary Acheson if he wanted to bring up the point he had raised on the part dealing with the question of seating the Chinese Communists and Formosa.

Secretary Acheson said there were two questions regarding the language which he would like to raise. In the present text, the explanation of the reasons for the United States not wishing to seat the Chinese Communist representatives in the United Nations was put in terms of our recognition of the Nationalist Government. He proposed the following substitute language: "The United Kingdom has recognized the Central People's Government and considers that its representatives should occupy China's seat in the United Nations. The United States has opposed and continued to oppose the seating of the Chinese Communist representatives in the United Nations."

THE PRIME MINISTER said that this alternate language was satisfactory.

Secretary Acheson also called attention to the sentence which said that the decision on Chinese representation was, of course, a matter for the United Nations. He said this was obviously true but the question arose why it was inserted. It must have some significance. Some people might interpret it as meaning we don't like this situation but it is a fact. It was either a statement of a platitude or it had some special significance which was not apparent and he thought it was better to leave it out.

Mr. Harriman said that this was especially true since the thought was already expressed in the first sentence.

THE PRIME MINISTER agreed that the first sentence did carry the same idea, and it was agreed to delete the sentence in question.

FIELD MARSHAL SLIM wished to raise a question regarding the sentence about the appointment of the Supreme Commander. He hoped this could be modified to read: "It is intended that this appointment will be made soon." People in Europe are waiting for a definite decision on this point.

Secretary Acheson said that he had no objection to the thought which the Field Marshal had advanced, but his language would sound as if the President and the Prime Minister were announcing the intention of all of the NATO countries.

THE PRESIDENT remarked that he was very anxious to appoint the Supreme Commander.

Secretary Acheson suggested it might be possible to say: "It is our joint desire that this shall be made soon."

THE PRIME MINISTER, FIELD MARSHAL SLIM and SIR ROGER MAKINS all expressed approval, and The President agreed.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that in the next to the last line in the sixth paragraph he would like to take out the word "world" before "peace." As the sentence now reads, it sounds as if we were anticipating the outbreak of world war.

THE PRESIDENT agreed.

Secretary Acheson said to the President that it was recommended that the statement on the atomic bomb be inserted in the middle of page 7. In this context it would avoid having the statement refer to any particular part of the world whether Europe or the Far East. It comes in a section dealing with general military capabilities.

THE VICE PRESIDENT asked that the statement on the atomic bomb be read again, and THE PRESIDENT read it. The Vice President wondered whether the statement meant that only the Prime Minister would be informed and no one else.

THE PRESIDENT pointed out that the Prime Minister represented the country which was especially helping us with raw materials and the general defense effort. He understood that the insertion was satisfactory.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL pointed out that on page 3 the language did not correctly state the purpose of the mission of our troops in Korea. They had been sent there not to unify Korea but to resist the aggression. The language in the communiqué did not sound as if this were true.

Mr. Harriman said he thought this was a very important point.

THE PRIME MINISTER and THE PRESIDENT agreed.

Secretary Acheson suggested substituting the words "to end the aggression" but thought that the drafting group could fix it up. (There followed an exchange of suggestions in which Mr. Harriman, the Prime Minister and others participated ending in an agreement on the text.) The Secretary said that Mr. Early had pointed out a possible misunderstanding beginning at the bottom of page 6 where the text said that the President and the Prime Minister had "reached the following decisions." Actually, this referred to only two conclusions and not to the balance of the paper. The two conclusions might be numbered.

THE PRESIDENT and THE PRIME MINISTER agreed.

Mr. Harriman said the Attorney General suggested in the fourth line from the end on page 3 that the word "joint" be inserted so that the phrase would read "For our joint part we are ready. . . ."

THE PRESIDENT said that he and the Secretary of State did not think that the insertion of this word added anything.

SECRETARY SNYDER agreed and THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said he would not press his point.

THE PRESIDENT said that the word had better be left out and THE PRIME MINISTER said it was not necessary to put it in. THE PRESIDENT said it would therefore not be inserted.

THE PRIME MINISTER then returned to the question of the place in which the statement on the atomic bomb would be inserted. He wondered if it would not be better to insert it between the ultimate and penultimate paragraphs.

SIR OLIVER FRANKS added that if this were agreeable to the President they would be happy to have it in that place.

THE PRESIDENT agreed and said the insert should be put in the place indicated by the Prime Minister.

The President then asked whether there were any other suggestions. If the communiqué was now satisfactory, it could be agreed upon.

Mr. Harriman said he thought there might be some concern in this country about the statement on page 9 which merely said: "We are fully conscious of the increasing necessity of preventing materials" reaching our adversaries. There was some feeling that this statement might create a good deal of discussion in the United States because of the strong feeling that we ought to do something about this problem.

THE PRESIDENT thought that the language was all right as it was. He said that actually we are doing something about it.

As the meeting closed, THE PRIME MINISTER thanked the President for his kind hospitality and for the way in which the President and his colleagues had received the Prime Minister and his associates.

THE PRESIDENT responded by referring to his statement that this had been a very productive and successful conference.

Communiqué Issued at the Conclusion of the Truman-Attlee Discussions

Since Prime Minister Attlee arrived in Washington on December 4, six meetings between the President and Mr. Attlee have been held. Among those who participated as advisors to the President were the Secretary of State Dean Acheson, the Secretary of the Treasury John W. Snyder, the Secretary of Defense General George C. Marshall, the Secretary of the Interior Oscar L. Chapman, the Secretary of Commerce Charles Sawyer, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff General of the Army Omar N. Bradley, Mr. W. Averell Harriman, the Chairman of the National Security Resources Board W. Stuart Symington, and Ambassador-designate Walter S. Gifford. Mr. Attlee's advisors included the British Ambassador, Sir Oliver S. Franks, Field Marshal Sir William Slim, Chief of the Imperial General Staff, Marshal of the Royal Air Force Lord Tedder, Sir Roger Makins and Mr. R. H. Scott of the Foreign Office and Sir Edwin Plowden, Chief of the Economic Planning Staff.

At the conclusion of their conferences, the President and the Prime Minister issued the following joint statement:

We have reviewed together the outstanding problems facing our two countries in international affairs. The objectives of our two nations in foreign policy are the same: to maintain world peace and respect for the rights and interests of all peoples, to promote strength and confidence among the freedom-loving countries of the world, to eliminate the causes of fear, want and discontent, and to advance the democratic way of life.

We first reviewed the changed aspect of world affairs arising from the massive intervention of Chinese communists in Korea. We have discussed the problems of the Far East and the situation as it now presents itself in Europe. We have surveyed the economic problems and the defense programs of our respective countries, and particularly the existing and threatened shortages of raw materials. We have considered the arrangements for the defense of the Atlantic community, and our future course in the United Nations.

The unity of objectives of our two countries underlay all the discussions. There is no difference between us as to the nature of the threat which our countries face or the basic policies which must be pursued to overcome it. We recognize that many of the problems which we have discussed can only be decided through the procedures of the United Nations or the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The peoples of the United States and the United Kingdom will act together with resolution and unity to meet the challenge to peace which recent weeks have made clear to all.

The situation in Korea is one of great gravity and far-reaching consequences. By the end of October, the forces of the United Nations had all but completed the mission set for them by the United Nations

"to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area." A free and unified Korea—the objective which the United Nations has long sought—was well on the way to being realized. At that point Chinese communist forces entered Korea in large numbers, and on November 27 launched a large-scale attack on the United Nations troops. The United Nations forces have the advantage of superior air power and naval support, but on the ground they are confronted by a heavy numerical superiority.

The United Nations forces were sent into Korea on the authority and at the recommendation of the United Nations. The United Nations has not changed the mission which it has entrusted to them and the forces of our two countries will continue to discharge their responsibilities.

We were in complete agreement that there can be no thought of appeasement or of rewarding aggression, whether in the Far East or elsewhere. Lasting peace and the future of the United Nations as an instrument for world peace depend upon strong support for resistance against aggression.

For our part we are ready, as we have always been, to seek an end to the hostilities by means of negotiation. The same principles of international conduct should be applied to this situation as are applied, in accordance with our obligations under the Charter of the United Nations, to any threat to world peace. Every effort must be made to achieve the purposes of the United Nations in Korea by peaceful means and to find a solution of the Korean problem on the basis of a free and independent Korea. We are confident that the great majority of the United Nations takes the same view. If the Chinese on their side display any evidence of a similar attitude, we are hopeful that the cause of peace can be upheld. If they do not, then it will be for the peoples of the world, acting through the United Nations, to decide how the principles of the Charter can best be maintained. For our part, we declare in advance our firm resolve to uphold them

We considered two questions regarding China which are already before the United Nations. On the question of the Chinese seat in the United Nations, the two governments differ. The United Kingdom has recognized the Central People's Government and considers that its representatives should occupy China's seat in the United Nations. The United States has opposed and continues to oppose the seating of the Chinese communist representatives in the United Nations. We have discussed our difference of view on this point and are determined to prevent it from interfering with our united effort in support of our common objectives.

On the question of Formosa, we have noted that both Chinese claimants have insisted upon the validity of the Cairo Declaration and have expressed reluctance to have the matter considered by the United Nations. We agreed that the issues should be settled by peaceful means and in such a way as to safeguard the interests of the people of Formosa and the maintenance of peace and security in the Pacific, and that consideration of this question by the United Nations will contribute to these ends.

The free nations of Asia have given strong support to the United Nations and have worked for world peace. Communist aggression in Korea increases the danger to the security and independence of these nations. We reaffirm our intention to continue to help them.

The pressure of communist expansion existed in Europe and elsewhere long before the aggression against Korea, and measures were taken to meet it. The need to strengthen the forces of collective security had already been recognized and action for this purpose is under way. Clearly, decisions regarding the Far East have their repercussions and effects elsewhere. In considering the necessities of the Far Eastern situation, we have kept in mind the urgency of building up the strength of the whole free world. We are in complete agreement on the need for immediate action by all the North Atlantic Treaty countries to intensify their efforts to build up their defenses and to strengthen the Atlantic Community.

We recognize that adequate defense forces are essential if war is to be prevented.

Accordingly, we have reached the following conclusions:

1. The military capabilities of the United States and the United Kingdom should be increased as rapidly as possible.

2. The two countries should expand the production of arms which can be used by the forces of all the free nations that are joined together in common defense. Together with those other nations the United States and the United Kingdom should continue to work out mutual arrangements by which all will contribute appropriately to the common defense.

We agreed that as soon as the plan now nearing completion in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization for an effective integrated force for the defense of Europe is approved, a Supreme Commander should be appointed. It is our joint desire that this appointment shall

In addition to these decisions on increasing our military strength, we have agreed that the maintenance of healthy civilian economies is of vital importance to the success of our defense efforts. We agreed that, while defense production must be given the highest practicable priority in the case of raw materials whose supply is inadequate, the essential civilian requirements of the free countries must be met so far as practicable. In order to obtain the necessary materials and to devote them as rapidly as possible to these priority purposes, we have agreed to work closely together for the purpose of increasing supplies of raw materials. We have recognized the necessity of international action to assure that basic raw materials are distributed equitably in accordance with defense and essential civilian needs. We discussed certain immediate problems of raw materials shortages and consideration of these specific matters will continue. We are fully conscious of the increasing necessity of preventing materials and items of strategic importance from flowing into the hands of those who might use them against the free world.

In the circumstances which confront us throughout the world our nations have no other choice but to devote themselves with all vigor to the building up of our defense forces. We shall do this purely as a defensive measure. We believe that the communist leaders of the Soviet Union and China could, if they chose, modify their conduct in such a way as to make these defense preparations unnecessary. We shall do everything that we can, through whatever channels are open to us, to impress this view upon them and to seek a peaceful solution of existing issues.

The President stated that it was his hope that world conditions would never call for the use of the atomic bomb. The President told the Prime Minister that it was also his desire to keep the Prime Minister at all times informed of developments which might bring about a change in the situation.

In this critical period, it is a source of satisfaction to us that the views of our governments on basic problems are so similar. We believe that this identity of aims will enable our governments to carry out their determination to work together to strengthen the unity which has already been achieved among the free nations and to defend those values which are of fundamental importance to the people we represent.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

SECRET

[Washington,] December 8, 1950.

Participants: Ambassador Bonnet

Assistant Secretary Rusk-FE

Mr. Godley-WE 1

Ambassador Bonnet called this afternoon at his request to inquire as to the details of the Truman-Attlee talks and to discuss the present situation in the Far East.

I said that notwithstanding certain areas of disagreement the talks have been most helpful. I then briefly reviewed for the Ambassador the military situation in Korea pointing out that we were somewhat encouraged by the report made this morning by General Collins. Although the situation remains serious our troops in Korea still had a lot of fight left in them and the retreat has been orderly. We were, however, fearful of increased enemy air activity and had noted reinforcements, particularly bombers, of the air forces northwest of the Yalu River. For the time being enemy aircraft were appearing in very small numbers, three or six at a time, and we continue to have control of the air. Our tanks were giving a good account for themselves and the latest American tanks definitely outclass the Soviet T-34s. The French battalion is not yet in action but is being "processed" prior to entering the line.

The Ambassador inquired whether General Collins' report bore on the Truman-Attlee decision to continue the fight in Korea. I said that it did not in that this decision was taken prior to General Collins' report.

With reference to the communiqué issued earlier today the Ambassador asked if I could give him any information regarding the discussions concerning Formosa, future economic action against China, and the subject of Southeast Asia. I replied that the discussions only touched briefly upon Formosa and that this, of course, brought up one of the points of disagreement, namely our relations with Communist China. As the Ambassador knew, the President and the Prime Minister did not agree on future action, possibly economic, against Communist China. With reference to SEA I said that this had not been discussed at the top level, but that I had spoken of it to Mr. Scott. We had discussed the matter generally, welcomed the recent French political action and noted that there was unanimity of US-UK views on that area. The Ambassador inquired several times whether the possibility of staff talks regarding SEA was mentioned to which I replied in the negative.

There then ensued a general discussion of Indochina during which the disorders in southern China and the strategic importance of Hainan were mentioned. The latter led the Ambassador to mention the importance his Government attaches to obtaining an aircraft carrier which might be used most effectively in the gulf of Tonkin.

In reference to UN action the Ambassador mentioned conflicting reports he had received from Ambassador Chauvel in New York and the Department relating to our attitude toward a possible cease-fire resolution. He had gained from Ambassador Chauvel the impression that we were opposed to any such UN action and he requested information on this point. I pointed out that Ambassador Chauvel's information was not quite correct in that although we could not take initiative on such action in the UN we would be interested in examining any such proposal in the light of existing circumstances. I added that while in view of the military situation we deemed it advisable to be neutral on this point, we were nevertheless interested in seeing whatever other countries might present. The Ambassador remarked that this seemed to be a logical and sound position.

The Ambassador then inquired as to the portion of the talks between the President and the Prime Minister relating to Europe and raw materials. I replied that although I had not been present at this portion of the conversations and could not discuss these points with him I understood there had been general agreement on these points. In this connection I remarked that we felt obliged to follow a rather straight and narrow path in that while we agreed that action in Europe must be intensified we could not permit this to result in a total disregard for Far Eastern matters and vice versa.

Mr. Ray Thurston, United States Delegation.

Mr. Menon told me late this afternoon that the Chinese Communists had not yet received any reply from Peiping to the communications which have been sent as a result of Indian mediatory action. He then referred to the Truman-Attlee communiqué and said it was very disappointing and indicated that no agreement had been reached on the substantive Far Eastern issues under consideration, that is, either Chinese representation or Formosa.

I told him that I was not sure about the accuracy of his remark on Formosa, since the communiqué rather left that question open.

In passing, Mr. Menon referred to Mrs. Pandit's call on General Wu last evening and said that nothing of consequence had been interchanged between them.

naming aggressor and calling for general support in Korea would mean extension rather than localization of conflict. In his opinion no GA delegation, aside from Soviets, was ready to forsake principles, although there was a legitimate difference of opinion as to best means of proceeding; it seemed highly questionable and lacking in humility and perspective to assume we knew the only solution. He did not believe telegram sufficiently recognized these elements in present situation, and wished his dissent to be recorded.

PRIORITY

Delga 394. Re Chinese Communists conversations with Rau. Confirming Gross-Hickerson telecon this afternoon, following is report of Gross conversation with Rau December 8.

Rau said that yesterday Chiao had asked Menon with regard to Asiatic declaration what assurances there would be that the UN forces would not cross the 38th parallel at some later date. Rau asked me what our position was on that matter. This led to a general discussion of the cease-fire situation and our attitude toward it along the following lines.

I said that we were not soliciting a cease-fire arrangement of any kind, were not taking any initiative looking toward one, and were not suggesting that anyone else take such initiative. However, in the event that someone else entirely on his own initiative proposed a cease-fire arrangement, we would be prepared to consider it on its merits, provided it contained no political conditions of any kind and provided that in all respects it was a clearly fair and honorable suggestion. I repeated that these comments on my part were not intended to suggest or imply any encouragement of initiative, and to stress this point I described the present military situation as from our point of view making it possible for us to "let nature take its course in the UN."

With regard to the specific question Rau had asked, I said that while I had no instruction on the matter except to listen to any comment or questions that might be raised by others, it seemed to me that the basis of the question was not clear. I said that, of course, looking at the matter from a purely logical point of view, the UN forces would respect any cease-fire line or else it would not be a "cease-fire line". I added that the main problem was to avoid any political implication of any kind with regard to future settlement. This, I repeated, we were not prepared to consider at the present time in connection with any cease-fire discussion. On the other hand, if the point of the question asked by Chiao was what sort of assurances might be given that any cease-fire arrangement would be respected, that was another question and one on which I would seek advice from my government. I said I assumed that the mere fact of agreement on the part of the UN to a cease-fire arrangement with a fixed cease-fire line should in itself constitute sufficient assurance that the UN would respect that line. However, if the Chinese Communists were fishing for some implication concerning future political disposition or settlement, that was, in our view, an entirely separate matter which I was not prepared or authorized to discuss.

Rau said that his present instructions were that he was not to participate in a vote on six-power resolution until his government had had an opportunity to consider the matter in the light of reports they expected to receive from Rau and Pandit summarizing the results of the Truman-Attlee talks and the attitude of the UK delegation here based on those discussions. Rau, who is conferring with Madame Pandit at Lake Success this afternoon, told me that he expected to see the UK delegation this afternoon or evening following the conference with Attlee here which will take place in New York sometime this afternoon or this evening. For these reasons, Rau hoped we would not press for a vote on the six-power resolution at least until Monday.¹

He said he thought he would be instructed to table the same proposal which he had circulated informally to the SC members on November 12.2 I asked him what this signified with respect to both the cease-fire proposal embodied in those amendments and the use of the POC. Rau asked whether I thought it would be best to table the proposal as amendments to the six-power resolution or as a substitute resolution. I said that I thought we should proceed on normal schedule with the six-power resolution but that if the cease-fire proposal were tabled entirely on his own initiative, we would favor immediate consideration of the cease-fire proposal on its merits and subject to the conditions I had already specified. From this point of view it seemed to me to make little difference whether the proposals were tabled as amendments of [or?] separate proposals. Rau thought that one advantage of tabling them as a substitute resolution was that the Chinese Communists might be more ready to consider them since they had already announced their firm opposition to the six-power resolution and had warned Rau in their discussions with him that anyone who voted for the six-power resolution would have to be prepared to assume responsibility for the consequences.

Rau engaged in a long conversation re Formosa. It was perfectly clear from his belaboring of this point, and indeed he said so in so many words, that he felt it would probably be essential to "do something about the Formosan situation" in connection with the Korean question. When I pressed him on this, he said that the Chinese Communists had made it clear to him that they considered a solution of Formosa to be at least as important to them as a satisfactory settlement of Korea. Rau indicated he was playing with the idea of adding to his cease-fire proposal or amending the six-power resolution by some reference to disposition of the Formosan question. What he had in mind, he explained, was to propose that the UN should proceed to consider the Formosan question (this reasoning underlay his suggestion made to me on Thursday during the SC meeting and which I dissuaded him from including in his SC statement. This has previously been reported to Department). I argued most strongly against relating these two questions and this precipitated a long discussion concerning the underlying motives of the Chinese Government.

Rau insisted that his information which turned out to be primarily from Peiping was that the Soviets "were attempting to exercise a moderating influence in the situation" and that the UN was facing not so much Communist imperialism as Chinese nationalism. On this appraisal, said Rau, the UN must beware lest it take action frustrating and driving the Chinese people closer to Moscow.

Saying that I was without any instructions on the Formosa question, it seemed to me that his appraisal of the threat to the UN was different from ours. I expressed the view that the UN was here faced with a revolt against it by an aggressive Communist movement and that if Chinese nationalism were being misused by its leaders, this was no different from what was happening in Russia where the Soviet leaders were perverting Russian nationalism in the direction of foreign adventures.

Rau indicated his awareness of our analysis and he did not press his analysis which in any event I said involved matters of such grave importance that I did not really feel competent to discuss them. I said that these were clearly issues which should be discussed at the proper political levels. Rau agreed and he did leave me with the impression that he would not take the action re Formosa which he suggested unless both we and the British were in agreement. However, he repeated the importance which he attached to some handling by the UN of the Formosan question. He particularly stressed the 7th Fleet referring to the President's statement last January and I made the usual explanation and attempted to point out the vast change in circumstances and the gravity of the threat to the free world which had emerged since the President had made his statement in January.

I outlined to Rau on a very tentative basis our suggestion that after the adoption of the six-power resolution the next step should be consideration of a resolution naming the aggressor, calling upon all UN members to assist the UN in repelling that aggressor and perhaps calling upon the Collective Measures Committee to consider the matter and to make recommendations. He said he would report these views to his government for comment.

Reverting to the cease-fire discussion, Rau said that he believed that the demilitarized zone to which he had previously made reference, would under the present circumstances probably be the whole of Korea north of the 38th parallel. He agreed with me that the Chinese Communists must be called upon to withdraw their forces from Korea. He thought that the POC could supervise the implementation of the cease-fire. I did not discuss the question beyond this point fearing to become too deeply involved with Rau in a discussion from which he might imply that we were encouraging him to take an initiative on a cease-fire proposition.

Rau had opened the conversation by advising me he had received no further word from Wu and that no reply had been received concerning the Asiatic declaration. In answer to my question he said that he had no present plan for another meeting with the Chinese Communists.

Subject: Instructions from Prime Minister Nehru to Indian Ambassador Participants: Mr. K. R. C. Pridham, Second Secretary, British Embassy

Mr. Clubb, CA

Mr. Pridham called at his request to show me a cable received through the Foreign Office purporting to give the text of message sent by Prime Minister Nehru on December 8 to the Indian Ambassador at Peiping, Mr. Panikkar, approving the line adopted by the latter in a conversation (undated) with "Chang" (Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs?). What line Mr. Panikkar had followed in that conversation was not clear from the cable.

Mr. Nehru went on to indicate that the first essential in respect to negotiations regarding Korea was the establishment of a cease-fire. Reference was made to the establishment of a demilitarized zone and to the withdrawal of UN forces south of the 38th Parallel. Mr. Nehru indicated, however, that any Communist demand for withdrawal of the UN forces from Korea entirely would be unrealized. The purport of his proposals for dealing with the question of political disposition of the peninsula was that Korea should be unified in accordance with the UN mandate.

The question of Formosa, according to this message, was complicated by reason of considerations of U.S. defense in the west Pacific, which had reference to both Formosa and Japan, and it was Mr. Nehru's recommendation that the matter therefore be brought up for consideration only at a later date.

Note: Mr. Graves of the British Embassy called later to request that the Department give no indication that it had knowledge of the message in point. It is recommended therefore that this message not be disseminated.

256. In view of uncertain military and political contingencies, it is not possible to plan far ahead in present Kor situation. Certain decisions can now be made, however, and in general, fol is current state of Dept's thinking:

Pres and PriMin communiqué makes it clear that there is no thought of appeasement, that aggression must be resisted and that peoples of world, acting through UN must decide how principles of Charter can best be maintained.

The action in UN that we will seek and tempo of UN action will to a large extent depend on our ability to mobilize and maintain unity of free world and their determination to stand firmly against aggression. Leadership that we must provide to this end must be in such a way and at such speed as will carry with us a willing and resolute community of nations.

Action in UN.

1. Cease Fire:

We have not asked for cessation of hostilities in Korea and have not encouraged others to initiate move for cease fire. We will of course accept cease fire if agreed to by Chi Commies but we would not agree at price of political strings or other dishonorable conditions. If cease fire is achieved we are prepared agree to discussion of Kor question with Chi Commies in appropriate forum with view to peaceful settlement. We cannot of course commit ourselves as to substance of our position on any questions that may be involved in such negotiations.

2. Six-Power Resolution:

At present US is pressing in Political Comite of GA 6-Power res which was vetoed by Sov in SC. This res sponsored in GA by same 6 Powers does not brand Chi Commies as aggressors, but calls upon them to get out of Korea. Res also affirms that it is policy of UN to hold present frontier with Korea inviolate and fully to protect legiti-mate Chi and Kor interests in frontier zone.

So long as Chi Commies are pressing their offensive against UN forces in Korea, adoption by GA of 6-Power res is minimum action that must be taken. This res, when overwhelmingly voted by GA, wld reassert unity of free world against aggression and in support of UN action in Korea. It wld underline principle of "Uniting for Peace" res, that Sov cannot by veto make UN impotent. Failure of UN to take action wld destroy its authority and its support among peoples of world, and particularly people of US.

We believe we must carry forward momentum in bringing this res to a vote in Comite and GA Plenary and not permit unwarranted delays. At same time we do not want to move so fast that other members will have basis believe that any opportunity for UN processes have been precluded. According to our present estimates the Comite shid reach vote on Dec 12 or, unless some indication of readiness for settlement by Chi Commie, at latest Dec 13.

If cease fire is agreed to we are of course prepared to suspend action on 6-Power res in GA pending outcome of any discussions or negotiations that may follow cease fire.

If hostilities continue we will continue fight in Korea in order discharge our responsibilities in accordance SC and GA res. If Chi Commies press their attack below 38th parallel in effort to drive UN forces into sea, further action by UN after adoption 6-Power res will be necessary. In light of appeal from Asiatic states we believe crossing 38th parallel by Chi Commies shld be treated as new and flagrant demonstration of aggression and evil design of reprehensible Chi Commie leaders. In such circumstances with hope of peaceful settlement in Korea gone, reasons for treading softly and maintaining mild and conciliatory tone in UN will have largely disappeared. We will therefore seek support of nations which approved original UN action in Korea for resolution to brand Chi Commies as aggressors. Since UN branded NK as aggressors in June, it cld do no less with regard Chi Commies who are committing aggression not only against ROK but also against UN forces, and are also flouting authority of UN. We are still considering what other UN action shld be called for in such later res and we do not wish make that decision at this time in light uncertain military situation. We wld welcome views of other UN Members. To be effective, such GA action must command full support of dels of nations of free world.

Pls discuss foregoing with FonOff with view to getting their full support.

Delga 397. Re Asian draft Korean peace plan. Below is draft plan dated December 5 and marked secret which was delivered to office of Gross in his absence this afternoon by Lopez, Philippines delegation. Marginal note in pencil on paragraph d on draft states "General Romulo objects to this paragraph". Lopez did not divulge origin of draft text. Covering note addressed to Gross and signed by Lopez is as follows:

Covering memo: "General Romulo, who is now in Washington, has asked me to show this general plan of a resolution to you. He doesn't know whether you have already seen it, and would only like to know your general reaction. The plan is tentative and, at this stage, unofficial.

I would appreciate a chance to have a word with you after the close of today's meeting."

Draft plans: "It is significant that in his speech before the SC, the Chinese representative at no time made reference to United Nations intervention in Korea as such, but restricted himself to charges against the United States and their intentions towards China. It might be well in this emergency for the UN, in taking note of this fact, to proceed as follows:

1. Repudiate in the strongest possible terms the charges levied by China against the US, re-emphasizing emphatically that the US action was taken at the request and as part of combined UN action and with its full endorsement and approval, which in every sense has United Nations backing.

2. Nevertheless, as illustrative of its determined intention to preserve world peace and to demonstrate the baselessness of the Chinese contention, and to bring an end to aggression, United Nations enunciates as follows:

(a) There will be an immediate cease fire in Korea.

(b) China will be requested to withdraw her troops from Korea and to cease concentrations of troops on Korean borders forthwith.

(c) UN will release US forces from participation in the United Nations force in Korea, and will request the US to withdraw all her troops immediately.

(d) The US will be requested also, to withdraw its fleet from Formosa simultaneously with the withdrawal of its forces from Korea, since with the cessation of hostilities in Korea, the commitments made by the US for the retention of its fleet in Formosa will have been fulfilled.

(e) The Government of South Korea would be requested to disarm its armed forces immediately and North Korean troops will likewise disarm forthwith; both to the satisfaction and under the supervision of a UN disarmament commission.

(f) A UN force of limited armament drawn from six member nations and not to exceed 50,000 men, without air or naval elements, will be retained by the UN in Korea as an internal security force. In addition a Korean police force of 25,000 will be maintained for like security purposes.

(g) UN observers will be stationed along the seaboards of Korea and along the borders of adjoining territories to assure that no infringement of the above provisions takes place.

(h) UNCURK will proceed to organize the holding of elections throughout Korea within six months of the cease fire order.

(i) Within three months of the holding of elections, the UN security force will be withdrawn from Korea and the duly elected all Korean Government will take its own steps to organize its own internal security forces.

(j) Within twelve months of the cease fire order and within three months after the withdrawal of the UN security forces, UNCURK will withdraw from Korea.

- (k) Immediately after the cease fire order and for such period as might be necessary to achieve its mandate, UNKRA will operate throughout Korea to bring relief and rehabilitation assistance to the Korean peoples.
- 3. The United Nations will announce categorically that in the event of any parties failing to carry out the above UN rulings, immediately, then such party will immediately be declared an aggressor and a threat to world peace and the full strength of UN forces and armament of any description will forthwith be brought to bear against them to the end that the aggression shall be thwarted and stopped." 1

Delga 399. From Gross. Re Chinese Communist conversations with Rau. Confirming Gross-Hickerson telecon today, following is report of Gross conversation with Rau December 9.

Rau advised me he had conversation with Wu this a.m., in which following points emerged.

Rau asked Wu whether he had received a reply from his government. Wu replied at first that he had not. Rau then pressed him by asking whether, if he had not received a specific reply, whether he had any indication of reaction his government either to discussions between Rau and Wu or to Asiatic declaration.

Wu then advised Rau that although he had received no specific reply, his government was anxious to see end to hostilities "which had been forced upon them by the US". Wu asked Rau whether he could not advise him of attitude "of the US or of the UN" toward the proposal which Rau had made. Rau replied that he could not comment about the "attitude of the UN", but that he had reason to believe US would be prepared to give consideration to a proposal for an immediate cease-fire, a demilitarized zone, and "further negotiations". Rau told me that, in connection with Wu's comment concerning the attitude of Peiping Government, Rau asked Wu whether the latter could confirm what Rau had told other members of UN concerning attitude of Peiping Government. Rau explained to Wu that he had expressed to other members of UN his (Rau's) belief that Chinese Communist Government did not wish a war. Wu repeated to him an earlier comment that his government was anxious to see an end to hostilities, repeating again that these hostilities had been forced upon his government by US.

With regard to Rau's question concerning Peiping reaction toward Asiatic declaration, Wu replied that the UN would see for itself from actions of Peiping Government. I pressed Rau for his interpretation of this somewhat cryptic reply, and Rau expressed view that Wu intended him to infer that Chinese Communists would heed the declaration. The primary basis upon which Rau apparently drew this inference was that Wu's manner throughout conversation with Rau was very friendly.

Rau told me that at end of his conversation with Wu, Rau attempted to summarize discussion. When he had finished his summary, Wu made following two points which he said he wished Rau to take as seriously intended:

- (1) The Chinese Communist Government was anxious to have an end to the hostilities.
- (2) Action upon the pending six-power resolution would "not facilitate matters".

Rau told me that he is awaiting further word either from Peiping or from New Delhi. He said Panikkar had been instructed to take up in Peiping the same matter which Rau had been discussing here with Wu. Rau thought he might have further word today or tomorrow re the Panikkar discussion. This connection, Thurston informed today in separate conversation with other member Indian delegation that GOI placing considerable importance on Panikkar negotiations with Chinese Communists at Peiping which were described as of "somewhat formal character" and "covering far broader scope than mere cease-fire in Korea". Inference was that other FE issues included such as Formosa and Chinese representation UN and also that GOI seeking high-level conference among UK, US, USSR and Peiping representatives as next step (Nehru's speech in Parliament yesterday cited on latter point).

Rau told me also that just before seeing me (he called me out of the political committee meeting to give me foregoing information), he had passed the word along to Kenneth Younger. Rau said Younger told him he was having lunch with me and would discuss matter with me. My lunch with Younger will enable me to confirm full accuracy of this report and I shall report later any impression which Younger may have derived.

At conclusion our conversation, Rau said that although he had not yet received instructions from New Delhi, he thought he would "probably" table the cease-fire proposal in political committee on Monday. He was somewhat vague when I pressed him concerning nature of proposal, although he indicated it would be along lines of our previous conversation, i.e., a call for an immediate cessation of hostilities and provision for demilitarized zone. I shall undoubtedly be in touch with Rau later today or tomorrow and will endeavor to obtain text of any proposal he intends to table. However, it is very important that I be in a position to make any comments on the text which Department wishes me to make, unless Department desires me to refrain from comment of any nature. New York, December 9, 1950—9:30 p. m. [Received December 9—9:55 p. m.]

Delga 400. From Gross. Re Chinese Communist conversations with Rau and Menon. Confirming Hickerson-Gross telecon. At 6:15 p.m., December 9, I was called by Menon (Indian delegate) who asked whether I had received Department reactions to my talk with Rau earlier today (reported Delga 399 December 9). I said I had not been in touch with Department since, but that I had promptly transmitted report of conversation. Menon said they were "very anxious" to have our views, indicating that they were seeing Wu within the half-hour.

I said that under those circumstances it might be helpful to repeat what I had already told Rau. Our position is as follows: We are prepared to consider a cease-fire proposal on its merits but we are not taking the initiative in proposing one nor encouraging anyone else to do so. Therefore, it is extremely important for Rau, if he decides to continue discussions with Wu, to understand and to make it clear to Wu that he is doing so on his own initiative. Further, we would not be prepared to consider any cease-fire proposal so made unless (1) it assured the security of UN forces and (2) it neither contained nor implied any political conditions or questions of any sort whatever.

Subject to all the foregoing, we would be prepared to receive and consider any comments of the Peking regime.

I asked Menon whether he could explain what Rau meant when he referred to "negotiations" in his talk with me this morning (Delga 399 December 9 will indicate vagueness of Rau's response to my question in this regard). I said it was quite obvious that the word might mean different things, depending on the premises one had in mind. If it related to military aspects of a cease-fire, obviously, it was necessary to "negotiate" such questions as fixing a cease-fire line, possibly fixing a no-man's land, arranging for movement of detached or isolated units and for feeding and medical assistance for troops, etc., we were, of course, prepared to negotiate these matters, on a military level.

If "negotiation" referred to political questions, that was another matter.

At this point, Menon asked me if we would negotiate with the Peking Government on "Korean questions" after a cease-fire. I replied that if satisfactory cease-fire arrangements were accomplished subject to the conditions I had described, we would be prepared to discuss Korean questions in or through the UN.

Menon asked if this meant we would negotiate with the Peking government. I replied that, of course, the Peking regime would be involved in such discussions, but that it must be clear this does not imply any change in our opposition to seating the Chinese Communists in the UN. Menon said that he understood this. I added that in my opinion the question of procedures for negotiations on Korean questions would be a matter for determination after a cease-fire arrangement had been put into effect. I felt that otherwise we would be, in reality, now discussing a political question as a condition of a cease-fire. However, we accepted in principle the idea of negotiating regarding Korean questions in or through the UN, and subject at all times to the maintenance of UN principles regarding Korea.

Menon said Rau might also have had in mind discussions relating to Formosa. I said this was outside the scope of issues we were now prepared to say we would discuss. I reminded Menon of my prior comments to Rau concerning our view that the Formosa question must be dealt with separately from the Korean question. (I believed it desirable to take this extreme a position in the light of Rau's proclivity to ride hard any horse he finds saddled for him).

Menon said Rau would call me back at 7:30 p.m.

Trygve Lie, in whose study I received Menon's call, heard my conversation.

At 7:45 p. m., I read the foregoing to Rusk and just as I finished, Rau phoned me. Rau said he had not received any word from Panikkar and did not expect to talk with Wu until sometime tomorrow. Rau asked me whether I had received any reactions from the Department to our conversation earlier in the day. I told him that I had talked about this with Menon earlier this evening but would like to take advantage of the fact that Rau was on the phone to recapitulate. I then read to Rau the substance of the foregoing telegram and then, for the sake of emphasis, summarized the most important points, particularly stressing the importance of Rau making clear to Wu that Rau is acting entirely on his own initiative, as well as the conditions precedent to our consideration of any cease-fire proposal resulting from Rau's initiative.

Rau said he thought he had our position clearly in mind. He asked me whether we would object to a single resolution which would mention the cease-fire, provide for cease-fire arrangements, and provide for the discussion of the Korean question after cease-fire arrangements had been effected.

I replied that subject to everything I had just mentioned to him

I thought this would be an acceptable type of resolution.

Rau promised to keep in close touch with me tomorrow. He concluded by saying that he understood that my reference to negotiations in or through the UN re Korea meant that the Chinese Communists "would be included in such discussions". I confirmed this understanding.

Immediately following my conversation with Rau, I advised Rusk of the substance of the foregoing and said that since this might be the last clear chance to make any corrections in the position I had outlined to Rau, I would appreciate comments.

Rusk replied that his only comment related to what I had said to Menon regarding Formosa. Rusk pointed out that we were not taking an adamant position that we would not discuss Formosa as indicated by the fact that we had put the matter in the UN. I said that I understood this but that I thought it might be better at this stage to let the Chinese or Indians come back with something on this later than to suggest it ourselves, on the theory that we were dealing with Orientals who had only taken off the 6th veil. However, this is a point I will keep in mind in subsequent discussions. At the same time, I assume Department will wish me to avoid being drawn into a situation implying a commitment to discuss Formosa question at this stage in light of Gadel 162, December 5.1 [Gross.]

Delga 401. From Gross. Re Chinese Communist conversations with Lie. Following is a report of my conversation with Lie at 5:30 this evening.

^{357.}AD/12-950: Telegram

Lie had seen Wu and other members of Peiping Delegation at Lake Success at 3:00 p. m. today. Lie began conversation with Wu by reading aloud wire service story that Rau had told press he had talked with Wu and believed Peiping Government desired peaceful settlement, and cessation of hostilities, and that Rau might have further word by Monday. Rau characterized statement as "inaccurate one" without elaborating.

Wu repeated he was for peace and was agreeable to a cease-fire. The world situation was prepared for a cease-fire including as it did the Truman-Attlee conference (as to which Wu's comment was that he found the communiqué "very interesting"), the fact that the threat of the atom bomb was "removed a little", the issuance of the 13 nations Asiatic appeal, and other factors.

Wu kept stressing interest, however, in US and UN formula for a cease-fire. He indicated doubts that Jebb and Rau were really indicating "views of UN and of US."

Lie said he agreed it would be helpful if Wu could learn to know UN and US formula for cease-fire and would try to find out. If Lie thought direct contact with US was desirable, would Wu prefer this or would he prefer to pursue discussions through Lie. Wu answered he would prefer latter for time being.

Lie told me he had feeling that if I had been there, matter might have been advanced.

Lie refrained from asking Wu his own views as to cease-fire, and did not think it appropriate to do so at the moment for fear of crossing lines with Rau. Wu did not mention Chinese representation or Formosa.

Lie told Wu he thought that they would have "better chance" on these questions once they stopped fighting and once a peaceful settlement for Korea had been worked out.

Wu said if 6 power resolution were adopted, it would be "an obstruction to understanding re a cease-fire". Lie replied "then we have very few days to settle the question. Next few days would be very decisive for China and Korea." Lie has impression Wu under instructions to prevent adoption of 6 power resolution and action which might follow.

Wu commented that none of 13 signers of Asia declaration had soldiers in Korea, mentioning specially India. Wu repeated he wondered about views of countries with soldiers in Korea, "especially UK and the US."

When Wu left, he told Lie he hoped "to see him again very soon." Lie indicated to me a real anxiety to "get into the act." He said he did not intend to mention to anyone else the substance of his talk with Wu and that he hoped for advice from us, if possible on Sunday, re Lie's next steps. I said I thought it important to avoid confusion of channels and above all to avoid being trapped by a situation in which Wu had Rau and Lie bidding against each other. I therefore suggested, and Lie agreed, that he would do nothing until we had further developments from Peiping to Rau. I would talk with Lie again at that time. [Gross.]

403. For Hickerson, UNA, from Gross. Re UK-US talks. Report of conversation of Gross and Ross with Younger and Jebb, at lunch

Saturday, December 9.

Younger, UK, and I matched our recollections of separate talks held this a. m. with Rau and nothing emerged from Younger's version which requires amendment of my report sent earlier today. According to Younger, when Rau asked Wu when latter thought Peking might reply to the Asiatic declaration, Wu answered that "the UK would be able to judge by the conduct of my government." I gave Younger fill-in on our talk with Rau at lunch on Friday (reported to Department same day).

¹ See footnote 1 to telegram Delga 397 received at 5:45 p. m. on December 9, p. 1490.

We exchanged views on present situation as follows:

1. Cease-fire proposals. I stated our position in same sense as I had given it to Rau on Friday. I said that while Rau appeared to have no fixed or considered view on the question of the "demilitarized zone," he was still thinking of Chinese Communist withdrawal beyond Yalu and I had encouraged the idea. However, Ross and I agreed with Younger and Jebb it was almost unlikely that Chinese Communists would now agree to withdraw from North Korea merely in consideration of UN agreement withdraw to south of 38th parallel. I said that it was good to keep encouraging Rau to think in these terms, however unrealistic, at least until we studied Peking reply, if any.

On a wholly tentative and personal basis, I made following analysis, stressing it was not only ad referendum to Department but subject to careful analysis from military viewpoint. It seemed possible to envisage 3 phase cease-fire operation, all within purely military context. (1) Fix time for cease-fire, with concomitant military arrangements for relieving isolated units, regrouping separated units, feeding, medical aid, and other essential requirements: (2) fixing cease-fire line, for purpose of accomplishing troop movements on both sides of line. This, for example, might be a "military fix" on or near the 38th parallel, and would be without prejudice to political issues of any sort. This would involve negotiation and might indeed be agreed upon at same time as (1). The Asiatic appeal, in effect, seemed to me to fix this type of line in principle. Buffer zone might be considered in this context. (3) Question of Chinese Communist withdrawal from North Korea (assuming, of course, they do not agree to this step prior to (1) and (2)). Since this is likely to raise question of UN withdrawal from South Korea, the problem arises in form discussed by President and Prime Minister and, I thought, settled on basis that UN evacuation from Korea would not be on a voluntary basis.

Younger and Jebb expressed personal agreement with this analysis. We discussed the following two points and agreed that we both required urgent advice:

(a) What would be our position with regard to the problem presented by a demand by the Chinese Communists that we withdraw UN forces from Korea in return for their agreement to withdraw Chinese forces from the north? (In this connection we referred to the draft resolution tabled by Vishinsky in the 1st Committee this a. m. which, among other things, called for a "withdrawal of foreign troops from Korea.")²

 $^{^{2}}$ The text of the Soviet draft resolution (U.N. document A/C.1/640) read as follows:

[&]quot;The General Assembly,

Calling attention to the grave threat to the peace and security of the peoples represented by the continued intervention in Korea of the armed forces of the United States of America and of the armed forces of the other States taking part in that intervention,

Seeking a peaceful settlement of the Korean question and the operation of peace and security in the Far East,

Recommends,

^{1.} That all foreign troops be withdrawn immediately from Korea;

^{2.} That the decision on the Korean question be entrusted to the Korean people themselves."

(b) What is our fixed position re a cease-fire line? If we have something in mind other than a military line running on or close to the 38th parallel we should make this fact known promptly, since the inference is being drawn by the UN membership that our expression of "no objection" to the Asian declaration implies agreement on our part to the 38th parallel as a cease-fire line.

We concluded this phase of the discussion by agreeing that it would be better for the British to attempt to ascertain from Rau his views concerning specifics re a cease-fire, on the basis that for us to do [so ran?] the risk of giving Rau the impression we were soliciting his initiative despite any express reservations on our part to the contrary. (We will ride the British coattails very hard on this, because experience has shown they are not always aggressive in pursuing an initiative of this sort.)

2. Six-Power resolution. We had lengthy discussion re relationship between cease-fire proposal, if tabled early next week, and action on Six-Power resolution. We agreed priority for discussion and action on cease-fire proposal, both in Political Committee and in plenary.

Differences of opinion developed reaction on Six-Power resolution following GA adoption of cease-fire proposal. I expressed view that, within a very short time, possibly two or three days, after the adoption of a cease-fire resolution the 1st Committee should resume consideration of the Six-Power resolution unless, of course, the cease-fire proposal were accepted by Peiping within that time. However, Jebb expressed the opinion that following adoption of cease-fire resolution "we should shut up shop for about a fortnight." Younger said that he had not been thinking of this long a period, but thought that a week or so would be an appropriate lapse in order to give Peiping opportunity to consider the matter after receipt of the information that the GA had acted. I urged the view that such a delay would be inconsistent with our analvsis, that action upon the Six-Power resolution would aid, rather than hinder, the effort to obtain a cease-fire. Our analysis was based upon the feeling that a demonstration of unity of action in support of the Six-Power resolution would be more apt to result in moral pressures upon the Peiping regime than would a period of UN inactivity. Younger and Jebb, on the other hand, believed that efforts to expedite action on the Six-Power resolution would only reflect disunity in the UN and Younger ventured the opinion that if we attempted "to force action" on the Six-Power resolution we would find that about half the members would abstain. He said he was sure this was true of the Commonwealth group and undoubtedly almost everyone else except the Latins. Although we think this an exaggeration, it is our estimate that there would be a damaging number of abstentions, including India.

Department's opinion urgently requested on question of timing.

3. UK delegation reactions to Truman-Attlee conversations and discussion of next steps. I said I would appreciate Younger's reactions to the Washington talks. Specifically, I asked him re next steps in the UN assuming no cease-fire and no compliance with Six-Power resolution. Referring to earlier conversation, Ross and I had had with Younger (reported to Hickerson by 'phone December 7)3 I outlined on a tentative basis possible "second step resolution" in three main parts: naming the aggressor; calling upon UN members to assist UN in repelling the aggression; calling upon collective measures committee to make recommendations concerning steps to be taken. I expressed understanding that Younger had question of timing uppermost in mind but that I had derived the impression that in principle Younger's initial reaction had been favorable, subject always to agreement on timing. Younger replied that the reason he considered timing such a vital element was that the UK regarded this step as of decisive consequence, with vital implications for the future. Jebb commented that this step meant "the declaration of limited war" upon the Chinese Communists. Younger said that much consultation and long and hard thought would be necessary before this step was taken. He added that up to this point nothing but "amateurish consideration had been given to the means of conducting limited warfare" and that so far as he could see no one had sat down and thought out either the methods of doing so or the possible consequences of such action.

Younger said that he himself could not envisage taking the step of introducing a resolution along the lines I had described before the middle of January.

This led to a discussion of the conversations between the President and the Prime Minister. I attempted to summarize the points of view expressed by the President and the Secretary at the first meeting with Attlee on the basis of my knowledge derived from a reading of the minutes. Younger replied that the Prime Minister had expressed some differing opinions and that no agreement had been reached concerning the subsequent steps in the event of noncompliance with a cease-fire proposal or Six-Power resolution.

Apropos our view that Peking regime is willing satellite of Moscow, Younger commented there was "rather a difference of opinion about this" and that UK feeling was that Chinese had genuine fear ("however unwarranted") of US aggressive intentions against China. [Gross.]

Delga 404. Re Asian draft Korean peace plan. Below is text of letter and memorandum received by Ross from Eban (Israel) this morning. Eban was immediately informed of our basic position as set forth by Gross to Rau and Menon yesterday (Delga 400) and to Lopez (Gadel 174 and Delga 402). Eban will take no further action without prior consultation. Said he would so inform others to whom he sent memorandum. We are covering these also.

Text of letter:

"I enclose the copy of a memorandum which we have sent to the Delegations of the United Kingdom, India, Sweden, Canada and Australia. Its purpose is to explore the possibility of a resolution on Korea which all members of the UN might find it possible to support.

Our object at this stage is only to clarify our thoughts on the matter and to test whether or not this line of thinking might be of assistance in realization of UN objectives in Korea. I need hardly say that we are keenly desirous of learning United States views on the utility of this approach.

This memorandum is entirely confidential."

Text of memorandum:

"1. The Israel Delegation suggests that it might be constructive for a group of states to propose a resolution in the GA containing the following elements in the hope of reaching a general UN agreement on Korea.

(I) An order for a cease-fire.

(II) The affirmation that the UN seeks to establish a united and independent Korea by free elections.

(III) The establishment of a UN Korean commission with the participation of the Central People's Government of China, and the USSR.

(IV) An agreement for the progressive withdrawal of non-Korean forces by June 1951, after the implementation of (III) above.

(V) A pledge by all states of strict nonintervention in the affairs of the reconstituted Korean state.

(VI) A programme for the rehabilitation of Korea under UN auspices.

(VII) An indication that the implementation of the present resolution would justify favourable action on the admission of the Central People's Government's representatives to the UN.

(VIII) A pledge to give consideration to claims and interests of the Central People's Government of China with reference to all outstanding questions (including the future of Formosa and Chinese interests in the frontier zone).

2. The recent turn of military fortunes in Korea raises issues of far wider import than the political future of that country. Nevertheless, it remains true that the military struggle originated in a conflict of views and interests amongst the great powers with reference to the destiny of Korea. The formulation of a political solution for Korea, which the UN can accept and in which the Central People's Government of China can both acquiesce, now appears as the only alternative to the continuing and progressive extension of the military struggle. It is clear that neither the UN nor the Central People's Republic of China will voluntarily abandon Korea and disinterest themselves permanently in the question of its future government. The prospect of terminating or even suspending the fighting without a new political departure by the UN appears remote.

3. During the closing stages of the Korean debate in the Political Committee of the GA, the Indian Delegation proposed that the Western Powers and the Soviet Union be brought together in an effort to obtain a resolution commanding unanimous support. 24 representatives supported this proposal.

It is reasonable to suppose that but for the apparent prospect that the issue would soon be resolved by military action alone, an even greater number of representatives would have supported this attempt to reach an agreed solution.

- 4. On the assumption that the states associated with Soviet policy, including China, still adhere to the objectives set forth in the USSR resolution (A/C.1/567) tabled on 2 October, 1950,² it may be fruitful to examine whether these objectives can be reconciled with the policy outlined in the majority resolution adopted on 7 October, 1950 (A/C.1/558).³
- 5. The provisions outlined in paragraph 1 above, are those on which it might be possible to approach such an agreement, in the light of the declared policies of the majority of UN members on the one hand, and of the Communist states on the other. There follows a more detailed consideration of these possible points of agreement.

(I) Cease-fire:

The withdrawal of the Chinese forces would certainly be a more desirable objective than a cease-fire on present positions or at the 38th parallel. It must, however, be recognized that there is little tangible prospect that the Chinese army will halt in its tracks at a moment of victory and surrender its ground to the UN. The frame of mind which could now render this action possible would have precluded Chinese intervention in the first place. Moreover, there are many precedents in UN jurisprudence for the adoption of a cease-fire order as a provisional measure to be followed by full withdrawal, or by reductions and partial withdrawals of forces at a later stage. Thus the

³ Same as U.N. General Assembly Resolution 376 (V), October 7, p. 904.

Security Council at various times adopted cease-fire resolutions which did not seek to restore the military status quo before attempting to facilitate a political settlement (e.g., entry of Arab armies into Palestine; the hostilities in Indonesia and Kashmir). In the Korean conflict a cease-fire was proposed by the majority of the Security Council on 25 June, 1950. In the Political Committee of the GA the USSR proposed a cease-fire resolution on 2 October, 1950. There is no refusal which any government can find more difficult to justify in the eyes of the world than a refusal to cease fire.

(II) Independent and unified Korea:

It should be possible for all members of the UN to reaffirm this objective. The UN commission for Korea is directed in the GA resolution to consult "both the North Korean and South Korean representative bodies" in establishing the elected organs of government in Korea. The USSR draft recommended that a national assembly be formed by "representatives of North and South Korea" in order to conduct Korean elections to the National Assembly.

(III) A UN commission for Korea:

Agreement should be sought on the constitution of a UN organ for Korea and its terms of reference. The UN resolution established a Korean commission to supervise the elections in Korea. The USSR draft proposed a UN committee "with indispensable participation of the representatives of the states bordering on Korea". In the light of recent developments, the representation of the USSR and of the Central People's Republic of China on that commission would appear to be inevitable, if it is proposed to influence the activity of Communist forces. It should be recalled that the USSR was offered membership on the original UN commission for Korea in 1947, and is a member of the peace observation group recently established by the GA. No change of principle is involved in the suggested extension of the Korean commission.

(IV) Progressive withdrawal of foreign armies:

The GA resolution on Korea declares that UN forces should "not remain in any part of Korea longer than is necessary for establishment of a unified democratic government" in Korea. The USSR draft recommended the immediate withdrawal of foreign troops to enable the Korean people to settle their political future. It should therefore be possible for both parties, in accepting the cease-fire, to reaffirm their understanding that all non-Korean forces, including Chinese forces, shall be withdrawn from Korea as soon as possible. The USSR proposal for the immediate withdrawal is however obviously unacceptable. The solution might be to set a date, about six months hence, by which all Chinese and UN forces shall be withdrawn. Such agreements for mutual withdrawal by a fixed time-table were often discussed and effected in the sequel of World War II, e.g., Iran.

(V) Non-intervention:

If all the above provisions were adopted it should be possible for all member states and other states not to intervene in Korea in any way or to impede the work of the UN commission. The unified state of Korea should be established in such a manner as to preclude any fear that it may be used as a base for endangering the security of any neighbouring state. A special reference should be made to the inadmissibility of so-called mass "volunteering" in Korea.

(VI) Rehabilitation:

The GA resolution and the USSR draft contain almost identical provisions for the rehabilitation of Korea under UN auspices.

(VII) Status of the Central People's Government of China:

The implementation by the Central People's Government of China of these provisions including especially the cease-fire, the progressive withdrawal of forces and a pledge of nonintervention should be regarded by the majority of UN members as convincing evidence of its responsiveness to UN opinion, and as justification for the admission of its representatives.

(VIII) Negotiation of outstanding questions:

Simultaneously with the adoption of the above provisions the GA could offer to examine sympathetically other questions affecting Chinese relations with the UN including the interests and claims of the Central People's Republic in regard to Formosa and to the Manchurian-Korean frontier zone. This examination may cover all questions liable to endanger the peace and security of the Far East.

6. The Israel delegation suggests that this memorandum be read in the spirit of the following statement issued jointly by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain on December 8th:

'Every effort must be made to achieve the purposes of the UN in Korea by peaceful means and to find a solution to the Korean problem on the basis of a free and independent Korea. If the Chinese on their side show any evidence of a similar attitude, we are hopeful that the cause of peace can be upheld. If they do not, then it will be for the peoples of the world, acting through the UN, to decide how the principles of the Charter can best be maintained.'

7. The Israel delegation adheres to its previously stated position on Korean question. This memorandum should be regarded as a working paper seeking to explore ways of reconciling a conflict whose proportions and consequences endanger the peace of the world."

Delga 409. Re Asian draft Korean peace plan. Following account of very brief and inconclusive conversation Gross and Ross with Younger and Jebb at 3:30 this afternoon. Jebb said he had seen Rau this morning. Rau said he was thinking of a cease-fire resolution which, after a preamble, would in the first operative clause call for immediate cease-fire. The second operative clause would be concerned with negotiations for the establishment of a cease-fire line. In this connection Jebb reported Rau seemed to be thinking that each "side" would nominate someone as its representative. Jebb seemed to be very fuzzy about whether an attempt would be made to establish a cease-fire line in the resolution. The third operative clause, according to Jebb, involved consideration of a demilitarized zone. The fourth operative clause would be concerned with negotiations of outstanding problems related to the Korean question after the establishment of a cease-fire line. According to Jebb, Rau had the impression that a proposal along the foregoing lines had been agreed to by Gross in conversation with Rau.

Gross clarified that the discussion with Rau had been on the basis of a proposal which would (a) call for immediate cessation of hostilities, (b) provision of machinery for making cease-fire arrangements and (c) following establishment of cease-fire, provision for negotiations of outstanding problems regarding Korea.

Although Jebb seemed to understand that it would be difficult to establish a cease-fire line in a GA resolution, he commented that a cease-fire meant only that shooting would stop and that movement of troops would not be inhibited. For example, Chinese Communist troops might, even after cease-fire, flow down the east coast. Gross observed he had indicated to the Department, because of reference to 38th Parallel in Asian appeal, most members of UN would probably think of 38th Parallel as cease-fire line. He indicated we hoped to have instructions soon concerning cease-fire line that would be acceptable from military viewpoint. It was agreed tentatively that questions such as definition of cease-fire line and establishment demilitarized zone or buffer zone should be dealt with by machinery which would make arrangements for effectuating cease-fire.

Concerning such machinery, Gross speculated personally whether the most effective machinery might not be an individual (such as Swedish chief of staff), possibly assisted by a sub-committee of the POC or a separately constituted advisory commission. British seemed agree that an individual rather than a group would be best suited to deal with the effectuation of the cease-fire. They thought it might be a good idea to have some sort of advisory commission, Younger observing, however, that he thought POC was perhaps too large.

Younger wondered whether the designation of an individual (or a commission) would be complicated in view of the fact that MacArthur is the UN commander in the field. (The British, as well as the French and others, seem to be bothered by fact that UN is one of antagonists in this situation.) Gross observed that he did not view this as a complicating factor, adding however, that we might be receiving quite definite views from the Department concerning preferred arrangements.

We had the impression in this conversation which, though brief, was revealing, that British are not very effectively following up with Indians.

Delga 411. Re Asian draft Korean peace plan. Following is account of Gross-Ross conversation with Rau, Dayal and Menon at Rau's apartment for better than an hour this afternoon.

Gross, after indicating that the military situation seemed to be improving and was such that it would be inappropriate to leave with Rau any impression that we were encouraging any initiative with regard to a cease-fire proposal, and that in discussing the matter with Rau we did not imply any encouragement, initiated discussion by referring to Jebb's report of the latter's conversation with Rau this morning. In order to avoid any risk of misunderstanding or lack of clarity, Gross summarized his understanding of previous discussion with Rau concerning possible cease-fire proposal. As Gross understood earlier conversation with Rau, proposal involved (a) a call for immediate cessation of hostilities (cease-fire), (b) arrangements to effectuate the cease-fire and (c) provision that negotiations concerning Korean question might be undertaken after the cease-fire had been effectuated.

Gross indicated that in conversation with Jebb and Younger earlier in the afternoon, it was not clear from Jebb's report of his conversation with Rau whether Rau contemplated making provision in the proposal for a demilitarized zone. Rau indicated that as he had undertood earlier conversations with Gross, he had referred to the possibility of establishing, in connection with the establishment of a cease-fire line, a "buffer zone" perhaps five kilometers wide.

Gross indicated that while he saw no reason to believe that we would oppose establishment of such a buffer zone, this was nevertheless a military decision and we had not yet received instructions concerning this and similar questions. In any event, Gross went on, he questioned whether it was necessary or desirable to refer to the question of a demilitarized or buffer zone in a resolution.

Rau replied that he did not contemplate such reference in a resolution. Establishment of a demilitarized or buffer zone is, as in the case of establishment of a cease-fire line, a matter which should be determined in military negotiations.

In a further endeavor to clarify understanding by Rau, Gross restated his understanding of what Rau said the draft cease-fire would contain as follows: (a) A call for the immediate cessation of hostilities, (b) provision for truce machinery to assist and supervise the making and execution of arrangements to effectuate the cease-fire and (c) some provision for negotiations on the Korean questions after the cease-fire had been effectuated.

Gross emphasized that regarding, in particular, the second two parts of the proposal, he was speaking personally, since we were without instruction. As a matter of timing, consideration had been given to these matters, but our government did not see how it would be possible to give our views even informally with regard to a draft proposal before Tuesday. He wondered, therefore, whether introduction of the draft proposal might not be postponed until Tuesday. Rau said he appreciated our problem of time and doubted whether in any event he would be ready to table a draft proposal before Monday afternoon. (At a later point in the conversation Rau indicated that it is the Asian group as a whole which is considering sponsoring the draft proposal. This would not include Turkey, which has forces in Korea and is not willing to be in a position of appearing to plead for cease-fire).

Rau, although apparently anxious to table proposal as soon as possible, did not demur to slight delay (British earlier had indicated they would not object to delay until Tuesday) since he said that our views would be of very great assistance to him. He would like to know what we would consider a feasible plan; what in other words we would be prepared to accept; what we would view as the proper content of a resolution. He added that after all if the agreement of the Chinese Communists on the one hand and of the US and the UK on the other was not obtained, a cease-fire proposal would be a futility.

Gross indicated that our military had not asked us to seek a ceasefire and that we are not soliciting one. It was therefore a little difficult for us to advance suggestions of our own. On the other hand, if we knew somewhat more precisely his own views, we would of course transmit those views to the Department and comment to the best of our ability.

Rau indicated that his views had not yet crystallized. In the first place with regard to a cease-fire (and thinking of the Charter) the GA can do nothing but recommend to member states or to the SC or to both. He had been thinking with regard to the first operative clause of a resolution concerning a cease-fire that it might read somewhat as follows: "1. Recommends that there shall be an immediate cessation of hostilities." Rau supposed that the Chinese Communists and the NK's as well as the Unified Command would take this as a recommendation and he hoped act in accordance therewith. He had not decided whether a definite date should be set for the cease-fire in the resolution or whether the call should simply be for an immediate cease-fire or a cease-fire at the earliest possible date. He agreed with Gross' comment that the term immediate would seem to cover the situation. It was obvious that Rau was very much concerned about the peculiar relationship of the UN in the Korean affair. At this point Rau showed us the text of a preamble he had drafted. This viewed with grave concern the situation in the Far East, declared that steps should be taken to prevent the spread of the conflict and to end the fighting in Korea in order that further steps might be taken to deal with outstanding issues in the area. Commenting that this appeared to be in line with our thinking, but suggesting that the word "and" might be substituted for the phrase "in order that," Gross brought the discussion back to the first operative paragraph of a possible resolution by mentioning a possible formula we had discussed among ourselves in an effort to find a way to get over the difficulty which seemed to be bothering Rau and some others concerning the particular status of the UN. We had thought, said Gross, that the first operative paragraph might, in two parts, first, call upon or provide that the forces in action against the UN in Korea should immediately cease hostilities and, second, decide (determine, recommend) that UN forces in Korea should thereupon (at the same time) cease fire. Rau seemed to feel that this might meet the difficulty.

Moving on to the second operative paragraph of a possible resolution (machinery for cease-fire arrangements) Gross said that speaking personally (Washington might have something entirely different in mind) we had been thinking about four alternative possibilities as follows: (a) UNCURK, (b) POC, (c) a special commission perhaps composed, for example, of the Indian and Swedish chiefs of staff, (d) a single individual or (e) some combination of the foregoing, for example, an individual who might have the benefit of the advice and assistance of the POC or a subcommittee of the POC.

Ross observed that an examination of the precedents in UN as well as sound administrative doctrine would seem to indicate that for the type of job in hand a single individual would be more effective in bringing about the necessary arrangements than a commission. Rau and his colleagues seemed to feel that this was probably the case.

Moving on to the third element in a possible draft resolution, Gross emphasized very strongly that we wanted to avoid any implication whatever that an indication of willingness to consider other questions after establishment of the cease-fire constituted a price paid for a cease-fire or a condition of a cease-fire. In other words, a cease-fire would have to stand on its own legs. Therefore any provision concerning future discussions would have to be drawn most carefully in order to avoid any implication that agreement to discuss other matters after a cease-fire was a price or condition. Rau said that he was very anxious to avoid any undermining of the authority of the UN. He said that his appraisal of present situation is that it is the result of misunderstanding. He said it had of course never been contemplated that the UN would launch a war against China. He also feels that the Chinese Communists have never contemplated launching a war against the UN. However, events, the results of which we did not foresee, have brought the Chinese Communists to the view that the rest of the world wants war with it. Previous resolutions, Rau said, have perhaps not been sufficiently explicit. We have never said explicitly that the UN should not or would not go beyond a certain point. He felt that this situation of misunderstanding could and should be put right without any suggestion of surrender or appearement.

Gross responded that as a practical matter it was impossible for any discussions to take place while hostilities were going on. The preamble of a resolution might therefore make explicit that the continuance of hostilities made it impossible for discussions relating to the other issues to take place.

Gross expressed view that the third operative section of the resolution could be pitched to this key. It might, for example, provide that although the continuation of hostilities against the UN made it impossible to discuss the Korean question, the UN would resume discussion of the Korean question after the termination of hostilities, including in such discussions authorities or governments concerned or interested. He pointed out this approach would not merely avoid any implication that a political price was being paid for the obtaining of a cease-fire, but also it would avoid the unfounded implication that the UN had not in fact been considering the Korean question. He added that, after all, it was of the essence of the UN that it was a standing forum in which all issues affecting international relations and peace were under constant discussions and that the tone of the third section of a draft resolution should not undermine this proposition.

Gross questioned whether consideration should not be given to separating the element of future discussion from a cease-fire proposal in order to avoid confusion or any risk that the question of future discussions might be linked by implication as a condition for a cease-fire. Rau explained that in order to make any resolution acceptable to the Chinese Communists it would be necessary to show them in the same resolution what would come next. Gross felt that if the third operative paragraph of a resolution were pitched to the thought he had just outlined, this objective could be met without impairing the prestige of the UN. At the same time such an approach would show the Chinese Communists that a cease-fire did not lead to a blank wall.

Rau inquired whether we had any thoughts about the composition of the body which might conduct negotiations after cessation of hostilities had been effectuated. Gross replied that this question seemed to us to be an important one but premature, and to become involved in that question would very likely color and confuse the cease-fire discussion. We are prepared in principle to discuss any questions if a cease-fire is effected. For the moment, however, we are not prepared to discuss such suggestions as that made by Nehru concerning great power discussions.

Rau indicated that he had not received any word from Delhi concerning Panikkar's activities nor had he been able to get in touch with the Chinese Communists today. He indicated that he would communicate with us anything of interest after the Asian group meeting this afternoon, in particular that he would communicate to us as soon as possible any draft resolution bearing in mind our time problem.

Later this evening Rau advised Gross that the Asian group had agreed not to table a cease-fire proposal until Tuesday. Rau said that he did not think it safe to wait until after Tuesday because of the gravity of the situation. He also said he had agreed to meet with the Asian group Monday, 11:30 a. m., to discuss a draft resolution. Gross asked him whether he would make the draft available to him before the meeting, on as confidential a basis as he wished. Rau seemed somewhat reluctant to do this, but said he would confer with his colleagues. Gross told him that he thought this would help him meet his own timetable.

Delga 412. Re Asian draft Korean peace plan. Initial reaction Canadian delegation (Holmes and Riddell) to Israeli proposals (reported Delga 4041) is similar to ours. Canadian representatives accept idea of not attaching any political or other conditions to any cease-fire proposal. They raised question as to negotiation of ceasefire arrangements in view of Chinese Communist insistence that the only Chinese Communist soldiers in Korea are volunteers and said Norwegians worried about same problem. US representative expressed view that it would obviously be necessary for some UN representative to discuss details military arrangements for cease-fire, including possible regroupment of separated sectors of UN troops (about whom Canadian delegation seemed especially concerned); that these discussions would probably have to be held on spot with whatever military commanders were in charge of enemy operations (whatever their nationality) and had authority to commit enemy on such military matters. Canadian representatives indicated that Pearson had not seen Israeli proposal and they were somewhat out of touch with his thinking for last two days. He is expected to return New York early Monday morning and they will communicate further with us.

General US position on cease-fire discussed with Pakistan representatives (Mohammed Ali and Ayub) prior to their meeting with rest of Asian group this p. m. They took view that there are really two practical alternatives: (1) simple cease-fire, unencumbered with political considerations or implications of any sort. They appreciated reasons why this would be only acceptable position of US at present time; or (2) a resolution which, in addition to cease-fire, made provision for "complete settlement" of Korean problem, including time tables for withdrawal various forces, elections, et cetera. Pakistan representatives characterized Rau's approach as being composed of three elements (a) cease-fire, (b) demilitarized zone, and (c) some "machinery or steps for resolving the existing conflict on all questions in the Far East." In terms of the two, clear-cut alternatives as Pakistanis see them, Rau's idea for demilitarized zone in connection with a cease-fire is unnecessary and impractical for following reasons:

1. Rau's original idea that this zone should be "buffer" area along North Korea boundary has been made anachronistic by events;

2. Concept of a demilitarized zone as a narrow strip of neutral territory between the two armies is unnecessary. As shown by Kashmir experience, opposing armies are not arrayed in solid lines; a certain "no man's land" naturally comes about through the disposition of opposing units by respective military commanders and the consequent minimization of possibilities of dangerous contact is thus worked out in process of demarcating lines, without necessity of specification of neutral zone;

3. Rau's idea that demilitarized zone should comprise all of North Korea and that Chinese Communist forces should withdraw completely contravenes purity of concept of simple cease-fire and interjects one of the series of steps necessarily involved in working out the complete politico-military solution of Korean problem. This should not be done unless we are prepared to embark on the second alternative of working out now in one package the complete settlement. To bring up question of complete Chinese Communist withdrawal as part of cease-fire would thus bring in its train the concomitant and consequential problems of disbandment of North Korean forces, governance of North Korea in interim, withdrawal of UN troops from South Korea, et cetera which US is understandably opposed to considering at moment.

According to Pakistani representatives, Rau's third point, on which he has been to date equally vague, was to provide some machinery for resolving Korean and all related Far East problems. They accepted US position that if and after satisfactory cease-fire arrangements had been concluded, we would be prepared discuss other questions re Korea in or through UN, but were concerned at what UN machinery might be used for this purpose since at same time US maintained that willingness discuss such questions did not imply any change in our opposition to seating Chinese Communists. Pakistani representatives felt that simply to permit latter to participate in discussions in Committee 1 would not be sufficient and suggested that, among other alternatives, Committee 1 might appoint small subcommittee of US, UK, and USSR which would consult with Chinese Communists on methods of working out political solution of a free and independent Korea, following cease-fire.

From Australian representatives (Tange, MacIntyre and Shann) US representative learned that Colonel Katzin had drafted and discussed with at least Australian, Canadian and Philippine delegations, proposals which closely parallel those of Lopez (Delga 397 ²). It thus seems clear that Katzin is real author of Lopez proposals. According to Australians, Pearson replied that the Katzin-Lopez proposals have no merit at all; Romulo reportedly liked them; and Australian delegation was completely noncommittal to Katzin.

Although Australian representatives stressed that Australian Government had not received or considered either the Israeli or the Katzin-Lopez proposals, the Australian representatives were inclined agree that former was unacceptable because they involved problems of political settlement in Korea, as well as a cease-fire. They felt that latter were even more difficult to accept because in addition they interjected Formosa and Chinese representation problems as well. On other hand, Australian representatives felt that unless military commanders were certain they could stabilize the situation at or near the 38th parallel by military action, acceptance of a cease-fire was probably necessary. They were convinced, however, that any simple cease-fire resolution would at least have also to include a reiteration by the UN of its political objectives of a free, unified, and independent Korea, etc. and probably also a declaration of the willingness of the UN to discuss, in the light of the changed situation, the best methods of achieving those objectives, permitting the Chinese Communist representatives to participate in such discussions. They stressed importance of UN standing firm on its declared political objectives, but clearly distinguishing between those and the military objectives which had always been limited to repelling the aggression and not, as a military objective per se, to unifying Korea by military force.

SECRET

[Washington,] December 11, 1950.

Subject: Point of View of ROK Toward Present Situation in Korea.

Participants: Dr. John M. Chang, Korean Ambassador

Mr. Dean Rusk, Assistant Secretary

Mr. Arthur B. Emmons, 3rd, Officer in Charge of Korean Affairs

Ambassador Chang called on Mr. Rusk this morning at 11:30 at the Ambassador's request. The Ambassador opened the conversation by saying that he had been instructed by his government to bring to the attention of the Department its complete and determined opposition to re-establishment of the 38th Parallel as any kind of frontier or any other form of compromise with or appearement of the Communists. Dr. Chang repeatedly emphasized this point and stated that the Korean people would never accept such a solution in Korea and that after the terrible sacrifice and sufferings which they had undergone the Koreans were determined to fight to the bitter end for complete unification of their country, adding that no other solution, however temporary, would be acceptable to his Government.

Mr. Rusk pointed out that both the United States and the United Nations had never recognized the legitimacy of the 38th Parallel as a frontier, that they remained committed to the original principles of unification and independence for Korea, and were not now disposed to compromise these principles. He stressed, however, that the military situation was such that there might remain for the United Nations and for Korea only the undesirable alternatives of stabilizing the situation, through negotiation, at some line such as the 38th Parallel or of being driven entirely out of the peninsula by superior military forces. He asked the Ambassador which of these two disagreeable alternatives he thought would be considered the most desirable by his government, adding that because of its geographical location, Korea never could be free from having Communist China or the USSR on its borders.

The Ambassador replied that his instructions did not cover this particular point, that he would ask for further clarification of it but that in principal his government and the Korean people were determined not to accept any compromise with the Communists which would lead to a restoration, however temporary, of the 38th Parallel or any other line south of the Yalu. The Ambassador said that at his recent visit to the White House, the President had assured him that the United States would not seek appearement of the Communists in Korea nor abandon the basic principles which motivated our actions there, and that the United States was not disposed to withdraw from Korea unless forced to pull out by military action. The Ambassador believed that this statement by the President represented a close approximation of the position of the ROK which he had just described and that it would imply that the United States would never settle for even a temporary re-establishment of any artificial division of Korea such as the 38th Parallel. He asked Mr. Rusk to stress to the President, to the Secretary, and to the Department of Defense the position of the ROK which he had outlined.

Mr. Rusk stated that he had seen reports indicating that over 500,000 North Korean refugees were moving south from the area menaced by Communist re-occupation and asked the Ambassador if he had any information on this. The Ambassador replied that while he had no exact figures, reports from Seoul indicated a very extensive refugee movement into South Korea and remarked that over 2,000,000 refugees had come south after the occupation of North Korea by the USSR in 1945.

Mr. Rusk suggested that the Ambassador might wish to discuss the position of his government on any compromise solution to the Korean problem with his Asiatic colleagues and to bring to their attention the ROK opposition to such a solution. The Ambassador replied that he had done this on various occasions in the past but that these colleagues usually reacted by saying only that they would follow the United States lead. Mr. Rusk mentioned that frequently the same Asiatic representatives had taken with us a different and more critical view of United States leadership and that often we found that they were not fully keeping up with us.

The Ambassador raised the question of the group of Koreans in Los Angeles who had consistently tended to support the Communist line in relation to Korea and were now engaged in vicious propaganda against our current actions there. He asked if something could not be done to stop their activities. Mr. Rusk recalled that some time ago we had looked into the matter and said that we would follow up the question to see what the status of these individuals now is. He asked Mr. Emmons to investigate the matter and give him a report.

Delga 415. Re Korea. Confirming Ross-Hickerson telecon, Fawzi Bey gave us this morning with great reluctance and on most personal and most confidential basis in order protect his relations with his Asian colleagues, the following text of draft resolution for cease-fire which was basis for discussion in Asian group meeting yesterday evening. This text is being worked on by Sir B. N. Rau whose redraft will be basis for discussion at Asian group meeting 11:30 this morning. Text follows:

"The GA

Considering that resolving of the conflict in Korea is an important step towards the restoration of world peace and friendly relations among nations;

"Reaffirming its objective for the establishment of a united, independent and democratic government in the sovereign state of Korea;

"Recommends that:

"1. There should be immediate cessation of fighting in Korea;

"2. A cease-fire line should be demarcated;

- "3. As soon as the cease-fire has become effective, representatives of ——— should meet to make recommendations for
 - "(a) Rehabilitation and restoration of normal conditions in Korea;
 - "(b) The establishment of a united, independent and democratic government in the sovereign state of Korea."

Authorship of this draft was claimed by Fawzi but we have reason to believe Pakistanis participated in draft.

Differences within Asian group centered around numbered paragraph 3. The general trend of opinion seemed to be that the specific countries to meet would be the Four Big Powers plus Communist China plus two neutrals (India and Egypt).

Second point of difference within group is apparently whether future discussions should be limited to Korea or be more comprehensive to include other FE subjects.

Fawzi said best authorities agreed that coupling Communist China with other governments in text resolution did not mean recognition Communist China. He said that if anyone had any doubt about this question they could clearly state in Assembly that recognition would not be implied. He said Egypt would so state.

Fawzi said that he felt his draft took fully into account our concern, with which he agreed, that no political conditions should be attached to the cease-fire.

Ross took following line strongly but on personal basis:

(a) Getting into specifics or modalities of who would discuss what with whom or broadening possible future discussions beyond Korea if not implying could readily be misinterpreted as implying political conditions to a cease-fire.

(b) Getting involved in specifics regarding future discussions would seem to involve, from viewpoint of Asian group which is seeking the cease-fire, confusion of issues which might impair acceptability of cease-fire resolution to Assembly.

Fawzi said their objective was "cooperation from both sides (US and the other party)". He said the Asians wanted to cooperate with us but did not want to be in position of dependence on our views. They wanted to avoid having to act on basis of "green light from any quarter". He said he thought that if it were desirable to avoid specifics concerning future discussions he at least was willing to consider doing so without committing himself, however, on this point.

Fawzi then raised question whether we were prepared to give priority to cease-fire resolution over six-power resolution. Ross said that in principle we were willing do so; however, he added, we would have to reserve our position on this point until we knew specifically what Asian group wanted to propose.

In this connection, Ross went on, it was very difficult to give authoritative views of USG in absence of specific proposal. In this connection Ross asked Fawzi (a) whether Fawzi would not be willing use his influence at 11:30 group meeting to prevent final decision being taken before we had opportunity [(b)] to see any draft proposal that may emerge from 11:30 meeting before final decision is taken but without committing group to acceptance of any views we might have to express. He added they would try to give us draft about 1 o'clock but would hope to have our comments before end of afternoon to permit them to make final decision at further group meeting late in afternoon preparatory to filing draft Tuesday morning.¹

With regard to point (b) Fawzi finally agreed to give us last night's draft on basis indicated above.

[Washington,] December 11, 1950.

Participants: Mr. Hickerson—UNA

Ambassador Gross—USUN

Mr. Hickerson called Mr. Gross to give him some reactions to the revised draft resolution circulated by Rau after the meeting of the Asians this morning.¹

Mr. Hickerson pointed out that we had had a meeting with the military, who were still in the room,² and that he and Rusk had talked the question over with the Secretary in the last few minutes. The line that was agreed upon for Gross to take with Romulo was as follows:

The proposed resolution was filled with military bugs of various sorts, among which were the question of whether there was adequate provision to prevent the Chinese from building up their strength, either by bringing new units into Korea or reinforcing existing units; there was no provision for inspection to insure that the Chinese Communists complied with the cease-fire arrangements when agreed upon; there was no provision preventing movement of the Chinese Communist units in North Korea in such a way as to regroup to strengthen their position. All these things made it clear that it was difficult and disadvantageous for the Assembly to adopt a resolution for a cease-fire when there had been no agreement in principle by the Chinese Communists to a cease-fire. This was a unique situation which differed from other cases before the United Nations where it was known in advance that there would be agreement in principle to a cease-fire. Therefore, although we should not run out on the cease-fire and should not depart from our position that we would consider any cease-fire on its merits, we should tell Romulo that we thought the first thing was to seek to obtain agreement to a cease-fire.

Accordingly, the course of action which we preferred would be to have Entezam, as President of the Assembly, with the help of Rau because of his initiative, and perhaps Mike Pearson, try to negotiate a basic agreement for a cease-fire with the Chinese Communists and the Unified Command. This should be done quietly and without publicity of any sort.

Our second preference would be to have a General Assembly resolution asking Entezam to appoint a commission which would consider the problem of cease-fire from every angle and determine whether or not a cease-fire would be agreeable to the Chinese Communists and under what terms.

A third alternative approach to take with Romulo would be to suggest to him that there should be included in the cease-fire proposal terms which would make it unacceptable to the Chinese Communists.

An acceptable variant of the third alternative would be to take the first two operative paragraphs of the Fawzi Bey draft and to add a third paragraph asking the President of the General Assembly to appoint a committee of, say three, to supervise the arrangements to carry out the cease-fire and demarcation of a line.

Mr. Hickerson emphasized that by suggesting these alternatives, it did not mean that we were running out on our agreement to consider a cease-fire. He said he realized that it would be a difficult task for Gross to get this across to the Asian group.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

TOP SECRET

[Washington.]

Notes on Meeting of the National Security Council December 11, 1950

At the beginning of the National Security Council meeting this afternoon, the Secretary of State asked the President's permission to take up at once a problem which has arisen at Lake Success about a cease-fire in Korea. The Secretary outlined briefly what the Asian group of states have in mind as a cease-fire resolution. He then said that in discussions in the Department of State today representatives of the armed services had raised some question about the desirability of a cease-fire in the present situation. The Secretary felt it of the greatest importance, in view of the Truman-Attlee discussion on the same subject, to discuss this matter in the NSC in order that the President might give us guidance as to how to proceed.

I was then asked to amplify the discussion in the Department of State with representatives of the armed services. I said that serious military questions arise from the cease-fire proposal, some of them affecting the basic security of UN forces. I said that the military representatives had raised the question of the continued buildup of enemy forces at the front without being subjected to UN air attack and the great danger which could be created by an enemy concentration with large stocks of supplies immediately available in the event the enemy decided to break the cease-fire. I pointed out that there is a serious question as to the action of the Tenth Corps in Northeast Korea. I also referred to the desire of the military to hold certain strong points which are in fact north of the 38th parallel.

I continued by relating the cease-fire problem to our longer-range intention to liquidate our commitments in Korea when possible. I said there were three broad possibilities: (1) A complete UN victory throughout all of Korea, which the enemy is now militarily capable of denying to us; (2) A complete evacuation of Korea by being forced out of Korea militarily; and, (3) Some stabilization inside Korea either on a military basis or on a cease-fire basis in connection with which military and political factors should operate. I said that our attitude on the cease-fire ought to be connected with our longer-range problem of disengaging U.S. forces from Korea.

I then stated that we had considered as an alternative to the type resolution which the Asian countries were planning to introduce a suggestion that Mr. Entezam, President of the General Assembly, should be asked to constitute a small committee of perhaps himself, Rau and Pearson to negotiate the military conditions of the cease-fire prior to the introduction of the resolution in the General Assembly. Another alternative would be, if the Asian countries insisted upon introducing a resolution, to let them file a resolution asking the President of the General Assembly to constitute a small committee to negotiate the conditions for a cease-fire.

The President indicated that he thought these latter alternatives would be preferable to the type resolution which the Asians were now considering. It was pointed out to him that we could not, of course, guarantee that the Asians would not in fact introduce their resolution without regard to our view.

Secretary Marshall then asked Admiral Davis what the views of the Military Staff are about the specific military conditions of a ceasefire. Admiral Davis indicated the types of questions which would have to be considered but said that the Staff had not come up with any conclusions as to the exact requirements which would be needed.

Secretary Marshall then emphasized the indispensable condition that any cease-fire arrangements must be supervised by a UN commission with access throughout all of Korea. He said that otherwise we would not have any protection against major violations—and that he had had plenty of experience with such violations in the year in China during which he was dealing with the same people. He also indicated that this condition might in fact result in the Communists refusing the cease-fire—but that that was a result which we could accept.

General Bedell Smith raised the question as to why it would not be desirable to move immediately a cease-fire on the basis of the 38th parallel. He said that although certain UN Forces were now north of the parallel, he understood that it was not the intention or the capability of the UN Command to hold north of the 38th parallel. He said that there had been some indications that the Chinese Communists might not in fact go below the 38th parallel and that it might be possible to get an agreed cease-fire on the basis of that status quo position. The President said that it was his understanding that General MacArthur wished to hold his present position north of the 38th parallel tenaciously and that the President thought that was the proper thing to do. Secretary Marshall intervened to say that although General MacArthur was establishing a definite line in positions north of the 38th parallel, he would not favor any order to General Mac-Arthur which would limit in any way his withdrawal to positions further to the south. Both Secretary Marshall and General Bradley indicated that the positions north of the 38th parallel were temporary but that if the enemy continued to attack it would be desirable to let him hold those lines before having to fight on lines further to the south. No decision was taken on the point of the 38th parallel and this is a point which will have to be resolved.

The Vice President said that he thought that any conditions attaching to a cease-fire should appear in an actual resolution of the UN and should not be behind-the-scenes understandings of any sort. He also said that it was very important that the United States not be in the position of opposing a cease-fire and said that it was very important that the other side bear the onus for rejecting a cease-fire if the terms were honorable.

Following the above discussion the Secretary of State asked the President if he would accept the following as guidance for the present and the President directed that the following be accepted as guidance:

We will consider a cease-fire in Korea but must insist upon a cease-fire which does not place UN forces at a military disadvantage and which does not involve political concessions.

Details of the cease-fire should be negotiated, in order to protect the security of UN forces before a cease-fire is accepted.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff will prepare as a matter of urgency the military conditions on which a cease-fire would be acceptable.

Although the following was not approved by the President, it clearly represents the sense of the meeting:

To insure compliance and to prevent a worsening of the military situation of the UN forces, there must be UN observation throughout Korea of the operation of a cease-fire agreement.

The Ambassador in Korea (Muccio) to the Secretary of State

SECRET

Seoul, December 11, 1950—9 p. m. [Received December 11—2:37 p. m.]

563. Situation described in Embtel 530, December 6 [7], worsened through December 9, but yesterday and today there has been perceptible easing of tension. It would appear Truman–Attlee statement primarily responsible for calmer atmosphere of past two days.

Mayor of Seoul estimates that during past five or six days some 200,000 people have left Seoul for adjacent countryside or points south. While there has been steady exodus past few days, Embassy feels Mayor's estimate exaggerated. Outward flow appeared much reduced today. Public statements issued by Social Affairs Minister, ROK Army Provost Marshal, Home Minister and ROK OPI have contributed to exodus.

Since General Walker's return to Seoul, I have conferred almost daily with him about general situation. In conversation yesterday Walker expressed confidence enemy could not now push UN forces out of this area by frontal approach. Enemy might be able to maneuver UN forces out, however, by pushing in from northeast. The success of such maneuver would be contingent on ability to drive through ROK forces. ROK morale had been depressed since first encounter with CCF.

I suggested to General Walker it might be helpful for him to outline situation to Rhee and War Cabinet, pointing out military situation far from hopeless and it imperative to have revival of spirit of ROK troops and Rhee and Cabinet members, as Korean leaders, should do everything possible to bring this about.

General Walker concurred and later yesterday morning he and I met with Rhee and War Cabinet. At this meeting Walker made forthright explanation in much same way he had talked with me. Rhee, who has been nervous and jittery past few days, pressed Walker for commitments to defend Seoul and arm Korean youth. Walker replied his instructions are same today as when he arrived: "to destroy enemy". To carry out this mission, he had as first responsibility preservation of fighting ability of UN army. Rhee appeared either unwilling or unable to grasp Walker's explanation. However Embassy understands that following meeting with Walker yesterday morning, Rhee called special meeting of Cabinet yesterday afternoon and asked members to do everything possible to bolster morale of people and army.

¹ Not printed; it described the widespread uneasiness among the populace of Seoul during the past few days stemming mainly from the unfavorable turn in the military situation as a result of mass intervention by the Chinese Communists (795.00/12-750).

Among other things, he stated he planned to address mass meeting in stadium in day or two and would visit Korean army II Corps headquarters north of Seoul shortly.

Embassy understands that at his press conference this afternoon Rhee announced calling monster rally at which he would discuss defense of Seoul and related problems. President also stated he had sent instructions by cable yesterday to Korean Ambassador in Washington directing him to state that any negotiations aimed at re-establishing 38th Parallel barrier would be unacceptable to ROK Government.

On receipt here this morning of Depcirtel 256, December 9, I called on Rhee and read out pertinent excerpts. He appeared comforted by knowledge our stand re no appearement, for it is clear apprehensions of some such move had been foremost in his mind past few days.

Repeated information Tokyo unnumbered.

Gadel 177. For Gross. Fol Dept's views Delga 397:1

¹ Received at 5: 45 p.m. on December 9, p. 1488.

1. This plan or any like it must be kept to one side for the present in order not to confuse and prejudice the Rau negotiations looking to a cease-fire.

2. The approach of the plan is basically defective in attempting to spell out in detail both as to substance and timing the full disposition of the future of Korea. It is not possible to forecast, especially in point of timing, a rigid program for this purpose. Any effort to develop a plan based on this approach shild therefore be discouraged. If some del wishes to initiate cease-fire desirable method of proceeding wild be to get the cease-fire into effect then work out details of settlement in easy stages by negotiations. Of course if agreement is reached on details of settlement they cld later be confirmed by resolution.

3. As to specific paragraphs of the res Dept has fol comments for Romulo's interest and information.

2(c). While para 1 of the proposed res repudiates charges leveled by Chinese against US and re-emphasizes that US troops in Korea are UN forces fully authorized and indeed requested by UN, the body of the res, no doubt unintentionally, gives the impression that status of the US troops in Korea is no more legitimate than that of Chinese Communists. This para for example wld make it seem wrong for US troops to be in Korea. Any plan along these lines shld emphasize not withdrawal of US troops, but rather the character of UN troops which will remain.

2(d). This para referring to Formosa entirely unacceptable to US. We have made it clear that US has no designs on Formosa and wants no special interests there. We have indicated our desire for a peaceful settlement of the Formosa question, and have agreed to UN consideration of the question of Formosa at sometime after the Korean situation clears, but cannot accept any provisions dealing with Formosa in a res on the Korean settlement.

2(e). Disarmament ROK forces difficult to justify and might endanger stability ROK Govt.

2(f). The US has repeatedly expressed the hope that other nations wild contribute more forces, and particularly that forces of other nations shild carry maximum burden post-war occupation of Korea. Judging from past response it is far from clear that effective force of 50 thousand troops can be obtained from small nations for task envisaged.

2(h thru k). These paras far too detailed and seek to anticipate too far ahead. Time table attempts to be specific about matters as to which it is impossible to be this definite at this time.

Para 3. Not acceptable of course in present draft since some of the provisions which the US is called upon to accept are objectionable. Also US does not favor advance determination of circumstances in which state wld be automatically branded as an aggressor; it is always difficult to determine the facts and to examine possible justifications, and other factors which might go into a determination of whether aggression has taken place. Finally, a new para along these lines shid be directed more specifically at the Chinese Communists and the North Koreans, and not permit the possibility that it would be held to apply against other members of the UN playing some role in Korea.

Following are DelGA decisions December 11: Ambassador Gross reviewed weekend developments on Chinese Communist aggression in Korea, including available information re Rau's initiative on cease-fire order, possible terms of cease-fire, prospects for action on six-power draft, and possible subsequent action. Contents Depointel 256, December 9 noted. Mr. Cohen expressed grave concern at present situation and thought it essential carefully to define our basic objectives and not to lose sight of them. He could envisage a contingency in which the attainment of these objectives and the maintenance of UN influence might best be furthered, in the long run, by action designed to bring about a peaceful settlement rather than by action designed to place the organization on record regarding the morality of the Chinese Communist position.

Editorial Note

The First Committee of the United Nations General Assembly met on December 12 from 10:45 a.m. to 1:10 p.m.; for the record, see U.N. document A/C.1/SR.415. At the outset, the Indian Representative (Rau) introduced a thirteen power joint draft resolution sponsored by Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, and Yemen; the text of which read as follows (A/C.1/641):

"The General Assembly,

"Viewing with grave concern the situation in the Far East,

"Anxious that immediate steps should be taken to prevent the conflict in Korea spreading to other areas and to put an end to the fighting in Korea itself and that further steps should then be taken for a peaceful settlement of existing issues in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations,

"Requests the President of the General Assembly to constitute a group of three persons including himself to determine the basis on which a satisfactory cease-fire in Korea can be arranged and to make recommendations to the General Assembly as soon as possible."

After a statement explaining the position of the Government of India, Sir Benegal Rau then introduced a twelve power joint draft resolution sponsored by the above powers less the Philippines, the text of which read as follows (A/C.1/642):

"The General Assembly,

"Viewing with grave concern the situation in the Far East,

"Considering that the continuance of this situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of world peace and security, "Recommends that the representatives of the following governments, namely ______, shall as soon as possible meet and make recommendations for the peaceful settlement of existing issues in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations."

An Indian motion to give priority in the discussion to the thirteen power draft resolution (A/C.1/641) was then approved by the First Committee by a vote of 48 to 5, with 4 abstentions. The United States Representative announced during the subsequent debate that he would vote in favor of the thirteen power draft resolution.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Ward P. Allen, Adviser to the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET

[NEW YORK,] December 12, 1950.

US/A/C.1/2369

Subject: The 2 Resolutions on Korea Sponsored by Asian Delegations.

Participants: Mr. Gopala Menon, Indian Delegation

Ambassador Ernest A. Gross, United States Delegation Mr. Ward P. Allen, United States Delegation

Mr. Menon reported that Sir B. N. Rau had not been able to contact the Chinese Communist Delegation Sunday or Monday (it was not entirely clear whether this was because of their refusal or because Sir Benegal had not tried). He hoped to be able to do so this afternoon (Tuesday) or tomorrow morning in order to obtain their reactions to the 13-power cease fire resolution.

Menon expressed the view that this first resolution would be useless and unproductive without the second resolution providing a mechanism for the peaceful settlement of existing issues and indicated he had previously understood that the U.S. and U.K. would not object strongly to the second idea provided it were not linked to the cease fire in one resolution. Ambassador Gross explained our objections to the second resolution as a concomitant. He pointed out that the psychological implication of establishing any special machinery at this time was that a price was being paid on other issues in return for the cease fire. Ambassador Gross referred to the indeterminate terms of reference of the body to be set up as broadly including all "existing issues". Menon sought to find analogy in the Kashmir and other disputes before the United Nations and we sought to make clear our view of the essential basic differences—that in the present case and in a very real sense the United Nations itself is the other party to the dispute and the aggressors are challenging and threatening to destroy it. There is thus, in effect, no umpire. Ambassador Gross expressed the belief that a mistaken effort to analogize this situation to an ordinary international dispute had colored too much the attitude of certain Delegations. Menon sought to argue that the fact that the United Nations was a party made it all the more desirable for the United Nations, in accordance with the spirit of the Charter, to manifest its willingness to settle the matter peacefully by referring to specific procedures. This was desirable, he felt, even though it was pointed out that the Charter provides sufficiently for procedures and organs and that all of the relevant issues with which the Chinese are concerned are currently before the Security Council and the General Assembly.

During the conversation Mr. Menon, although granting the logic of the arguments and recognizing the United States position as explained to him, seemed to remain basically unpersuaded to our point of view.

Participants: His Excellency Sayed Hassan Ibrahim, Yemeni Delegation

Mr. Harlan B. Clark, United States Delegation

Sayed Hassan referred to our earlier conversations in regard to the Asian bloc's cease fire proposals, and asked whether the United States Delegation were satisfied with the steps which had been taken to separate the cease fire from the negotiation proposals as they had been combined in the Indian draft resolution. He seemed in good spirits and well satisfied with the morning's developments. I said that, as he knew, the United States had agreed to consider a cease fire proposal on its merits and that it only remained to be seen what the Soviet bloc's attitude would be.

Sayed Hassan said he had little fear on that score, since Sir Benegal Rau had informed him yesterday that General Wu had agreed to separation of the cease fire and negotiation proposals. In other words, he believed the Communists had been agreeable to the cease fire proposal and to the principle of negotiating subsequently on outstanding issues.

Sayed Hassan and a member of his Delegation said it appeared from the questions that had been raised in Committee One this morning that the Turks and Greeks were afraid the Asian countries were defecting from the UN. This was not true at all. What the Arab countries sought was a cessation of hostilities so that outstanding issues could be discussed. If the Communists did not abide by the cease fire, they would prove their bad faith, and we should all treat them accordingly.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Charles P. Noyes, Adviser on Security Council Affairs, United States Mission at the United Nations

SECRET

[New York,] December 12, 1950.

US/A/C.1/2357 Subject: Korea

Participants: General Carlos P. Romulo, Philippines Delegation Mr. C. P. Noves, United States Delegation

Romulo described the meeting yesterday of the Asian Group roughly as follows:

Rau had submitted his original resolution. Romulo had taken this apart. He had pointed out that the United Nations was one of the belligerents and could not call upon itself to cease fire. In connection with the cease-fire line, he had pointed out that it was absolutely essential that the United Nations should protect its own forces and that therefore it must of necessity consult the Unified Command before attempting to settle any principles or any details. As regards the third paragraph, Romulo pointed out that out of the seven nations only the United States, and possibly France, could be expected to stand up against the Communists. The USSR position was known; the United Kingdom and India had recognized Communist China; and Egypt's position was one of desiring peace at all costs. He said that this was a stacked committee; that he would have nothing to do with it. He also pointed out that the sub-items in the Indian proposal covered exactly the same ground as the terms of reference of UNCURK, and that it would be ridiculous for an Assembly to give to this new committee the same terms of reference as UNCURK. Finally, he pointed out that the final paragraph made it possible for the Chinese Communists to raise any Far Eastern issue they wanted, including Indo-China, Formosa, seating in the United Nations, the Philippines, Japanese Peace Treaty or any other issues.

Romulo stated that he urged the Group to stick to the simple ceasefire and suggested a committee appointed by the President to make the necessary arrangements if possible. He said he was supported in a number of these points by the Syrian and some of the others.

At about that point Rau was called out of the meeting and returned a minute or two later to say he had an important message from Prime Minister Attlee who favored the Indian proposal and in particular favored a single resolution which would have in it both a cease-fire and broad negotiations for peaceful settlement of existing issues. Romulo stated he told the Group he didn't care what the British position was; that he would have nothing to do with any such proposal. He was the only Representative present who had troops in Korea and as far as the Philippines were concerned, they would not be willing to tie negotiations up with a cease-fire. He added that if the Philippines were ever under Communist pressure, he would not want any of those present to be acting in a neutral manner—as they were at the present time. Thereupon he walked out of the meeting.

In general, Romulo is satisfied with the way Rau handled himself at this morning's meeting. His general view was that it would probably be possible to avoid discussing the second resolution until the Assembly had received a report from the President, and possibly until it had passed a resolution approving cease-fire arrangements.

Romulo was somewhat bitter against the British and even against some of the Asiatics.

[Enclosure]

Memorandum by the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Secretary of Defense (Marshall)

TOP SECRET

Washington, December 12, 1950.

Subject: United States Position Regarding the Terms of any United Nations General Assembly Cease-Fire Resolution for the Korean War.

- 1. This memorandum is responsive to the directive of the National Security Council issued on 11 December 1950 which called for, as a matter of urgency, the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff as to the terms, conditions, and arrangements which should be agreed to prior to United States acceptance of any United Nations cease-fire resolution for the Korean war.
- 2. The Joint Chiefs of Staff, from the military point of view, cannot concur in any United Nations cease-fire resolution which does not include the terms, conditions, and arrangements set forth in paragraphs 3, 4, and 5 below. Further, these must be agreed to by all governments and authorities concerned, including North Korea and Communist China, prior to the implementation of any cease-fire arrangement.
 - 3. The cease-fire arrangement:

a. Shall be confined to Korea:

b. Shall require all governments and authorities concerned, including North Korea and Communist China, to order a cessation of all acts of armed force; the establishment of a demilitarized area across Korea; and all ground forces to remain in position or be withdrawn to the rear except that all forces which may be in advance of the demilitarized area shall be moved to positions in the rear thereof;

c. Shall provide for supervision of the general arrangements as well as specific details by a Cease-Fire Commission designated by the General Assembly of the United Nations, which Commission shall have free and unlimited access to the whole of Korea;

d. Shall require all governments and authorities concerned to cease promptly the introduction into Korea of any reinforcing or replacement units or personnel, including volunteers, during the cease-fire period;

e. Shall require all governments and authorities to refrain from introducing additional war equipment and material into Korea. Such equipment and material will not include those supplies required for the maintenance of health and welfare and such other supplies as may be authorized by the Cease-Fire Commission; and

f. Shall continue in effect until a permanent settlement of the Korean question has been arranged.

- 4. The Joint Chiefs of Staff consider the following specific details to be essential to any cease-fire arrangement for the Korean war:
- a. The demilitarized area shall be a zone on the order of 20 miles in width, with the southern limit following generally the line of the 38th parallel.

b. The cease-fire arrangement shall apply to:

(1) All opposing ground forces in Korea, wherever located. In addition, these forces shall respect the demilitarized zone and the areas in advance thereof;

(2) All opposing naval forces in the Korean area which shall respect the waters contiguous to the land areas occupied by the opposing armed forces, to the limit of three miles off-shore. Naval units designated by the Cease-Fire Commission for sea transport, supply, evacuation, surveillance, and humanitarian purposes shall be excepted from the foregoing provision while such units are engaged in these duties; and

(3) All opposing air forces which shall respect the air space over the demilitarized zone and the areas in advance thereof. Air units designated by the Cease-Fire Commission for air transport, supply, evacuation, surveillance, and humanitarian purposes shall be excepted from the foregoing provision while such units are engaged in these duties.

c. Military observers appointed by the Cease-Fire Commission, together with such United Nations Armed Guards as may be available and considered appropriate by the Commission, shall have freedom of movement anywhere throughout all Korea;

d. Prisoners of war shall be exchanged on a one for one basis, pending final settlement of the Korean question;

e. Organized bodies of armed forces initially in advance of the demilitarized zone shall be moved back or passed through to the area of their own main forces. Guerrillas, both north and south of the demilitarized zone, shall be withdrawn and be granted safe conduct through the demilitarized area.

f. Nothing in the agreement shall preclude commanders in the field from providing for the security of their forces, supplies, and installations, except that no security forces for this purpose will be permitted within the demilitarized area.

g. The Cease-Fire Commission shall be responsible for civil government, including police functions, in the demilitarized zone.

h. Refugees shall not be allowed to migrate in either direction into or across the demilitarized area.

- 5. The Joint Chiefs of Staff feel strongly that, before the United States should accept any cease-fire arrangement, provision must be made for a competent Cease-Fire Commission which shall inspect to insure that the terms, conditions, and arrangements as agreed to in the cease-fire resolution will be carried out by all armed forces including guerrillas in Korea. This Commission shall report promptly to the General Assembly of the United Nations all violations of the cease-fire resolution. The Commission shall be provided with a sufficient number of competent military observers to enable it to carry out its duties and functions.
- 6. In connection with all of the foregoing, the Joint Chiefs of Staff would point out that execution of any United Nations cease-fire resolution will, in all probability, prevent the attainment of the United Nations objective of a free and united Korea.

For the Joint Chiefs of Staff:

The Deputy Under Secretary of State (Matthews) to the Special Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for Foreign Military Affairs and Assistance (Burns)

TOP SECRET

Washington, December 12, 1950.

My Dear General Burns: Dr. John M. Chang, the Korean Ambassador to the United States, in several recent conversations with Mr. Rusk, Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, at the instance of his Government has urged the importance, in the light of the current military situation in Korea, of arming the so-called Korean Youth Corps. The Ambassador has stated that this Youth Corps now numbers some 500,000 young men who he claims are only too eager to come to the defense of their country and to participate actively in military operations against the Chinese Communists. He has repeatedly emphasized that this additional potential manpower would not be an inconsiderable factor in redressing the military balance in Korea if the United States could provide sufficient small arms with which to equip them.

From a political standpoint, the Department of State recommends that favorable consideration be given this proposal provided that arms were given only to these Korean youths after they have been formed into organized units under the control and discipline of the military authorities in Korea.

Sincerely yours,

H. Freeman Matthews

sentation Chi mainland. Withdrawal US officials by no means closed avenues possible exploratory talks between US and Chi Commie authorities, but consistent imperious aloofness latter has made unmistakable they totally disinclined any contact with us.

On our side we have taken every opportunity give assurance our belief in inherent congruence genuine Chi and Amer interests, our lack any desire seek voice in internal affairs Chi, and our intention observe scrupulously inviolability frontier China. In face serious provocation represented by attacks on UN planes by Commie craft sallying from and returning to Manchurian sanctuary, UN Commander has exhibited exemplary restraint. We have offered compensation any confirmed damage Chi side border inflicted by US planes in ignorance their whereabouts.

For their part, Chi Commies have from start subjected us to unrelieved stream of vituperation, singling us out among all nations for most violent vilification, exhibiting utter disregard truth and absence any desire ascertain it. While not one threatening gesture made their direction by UN Commander (who, be it noted, had received and declined offer Chi Natls supply 30,000 troops Korea), Chi Commies hurled half-million men against UN forces which supported by 54 nations UN (as well as by number other free nations whose membership UN blackballed by USSR although they far more eligible to be admitted UN than Peiping regime to represent Chi in UN) and which were on point winding up campaign with declared purpose thereupon withdrawing.

Plain fact is that given Chi Commie intentions as revealed, danger present serious situation was implicit in first response by UN to unprovoked assault on ROK by No Koreans and could not have been avoided by any action on part UN or US short of acquiescence in elimination ROK, which would have destroyed finally principle collective security and have left UN moribund.

Insofar as link-up of Formosa with Korea by intervention Seventh Fleet may be adduced as factor in Chi Commie invasion Korea, important remember that Seventh Fleet was placed Formosan Strait after aggression against ROK, which incontrovertibly must have had Chi Commies acquiescence and in fact, as now known, had their active support. Commie aggression against ROK preceded isolation of Formosa. Note also US simultaneously required Natls cease all attacks against mainland. Therefore isolation Formosa cannot be considered cause of Chi Commie intervention in Korea.

US maintains position that (1) aggression in one area cannot be recompensed by rewards in another, (2) solution Korea requires cessation Chi Commie aggression, (3) end Chi aggression and settlement Korea on basis satisfactory to UN must not be connected with negotiation other issues such as UN rep and Formosa, (4) these issues are before UN, and while UN may have shortcomings, it is only agency we have for collective expression judgment of mankind, and (5) surrender to Chi Commie terrorization on these issues would speedily be followed by decisive further Chi Commie aid to Indochinese Commies, irresistible pressure on Thai Govt, advancement Chi claims to North Burma, stepped-up invasion Tibet, and tipping of now balanced scales in Malaya in favor of Chi Commie guerrillas.

US can only regard tendency adduce extenuating circumstances in conduct Peiping as testifying to success Soviet strategy. For it now unmistakable to anyone that while strains emitted by Peiping are Chi, organist is Russian and Dept is impelled to conclude that consistent singling out of US as enemy China by Peiping propaganda was essential element Soviet effort refrain from hardening attitude other countries toward Peiping and lead cleavage free world at time its greatest peril.

The Ambassador in India (Henderson) to the Secretary of State

SECRET PRIORTY New Delhi, December 12, 1950—5 p.m. [Received December 12—10:35 p.m.]

- 1459. 1. Basing myself on Depcirtel 256 December 9, 2 p. m., I outlined to Bajpai today what our thinking was as of December 9 re cease-fire, six-power resolution, possible additional resolution in GA in case Chinese Communists press attack below 38th parallel, etc. I emphasized we had been asking for cessation hostilities or encouraging others initiate move for cease-fire. I stressed how important it was that all nations of free world give full support to six-power resolution at once in case cease-fire is not arranged and explained why in our opinion UN should brand Chinese Communists as aggressors in case they press their attack below 38th Parallel.
- 2. Bajpai said that if efforts for cease-fire should fail and six-power resolution should come before GA without amendments of character which would make it fully acceptable to India, India would probably not participate in voting. If resolution should be presented to UN branding Chinese Communists as aggressors following crossing of Chinese Communists into South Korea might possibly also not participate in voting. Much would depend upon flow of events between now and time such measures should come to vote, upon contents of resolution and upon what UN might contemplate in form of sanctions, etc., following passage such resolution.

3. Bajpai said GOI received telegram from Panikkar December 11 giving Panikkar's understanding of what present Communist Chinese attitude was re cease-fire and had telegraphed immediately substance Panikkar's telegram to Rau in Lake Success. Panikkar seemed to be under impression that Communist China might be willing agree ceasefire and withdrawal Chinese forces from Korea provided: (a) North Koreans could remain in control area north 38th parallel during conversation following a cease-fire; (b) it was understood that all UN forces would withdraw from Korea following termination conversations subsequent to cease-fire; (c) conversations to cease fire would include not only question of Korea but that of Formosa and withdrawal US Fleet which had been protecting Formosa. I have perhaps made conditions upon which Panikkar thought Chinese Communists would insist for cease-fire somewhat more clear-cut than outlined to me by Bajpai. Nevertheless I believe I have stated correctly their substance. I asked Bajpai if Panikkar had not mentioned admittance into UN, recognition, or other Far East problems in their conditions and Bajpai replied in negative.

4. Bajpai said GOI had understood US would not agree to discussion such questions as Formosa and entry Communist Chinese into UN during conversations following cease-fire whereas Communist China continued insist that at least question Formosa be discussed. GOI therefore on December 10 had instructed Rau support no resolution for cease-fire in UN unless he had strong reason believe in advance such resolution would be agreeable both to US and to Communist China. GOI did not wish its delegation in Lake Success to place either US or Communist China in difficult position by presenting resolution for cease-fire containing terms which one of them could not accept. Bajpai asked that I particularly stress GOI did not wish to make any move in UN which might give appearance before world that US was primarily responsible for failure achievement cease-fire.

5. Bajpai also asked me inform my government that idea of 13 Asian powers getting together in effort effect cease-fire did not originate in Delhi and was acted upon without authorization from Delhi. GOI had however given subsequent approval. GOI had also given Rau free hand to maneuver for some kind cease-fire arrangement and to support such arrangement in form resolution provided he was sure in advance arrangement would be acceptable both to US and Communist China.

Memorandum of Conversations, by Mr. Charles P. Noyes, Adviser on Security Council Affairs, United States Mission at the United Nations

SECRET

[New York,] December 13, 1950.

US/A/C.1/2379

Subject: Korea-Conversations, separately, with:

Participants: Mr. Rajeshwar Dayal, Indian Delegation

Ambassador Ales Bebler, Yugoslav Delegation

Mr. C. P. Noyes, United States Delegation

Dayal said that the Indians had had no talks with Wu in the last day or so in regard to their cease-fire resolution. They did not know what Wu's attitude was towards the Thirteen-Power resolution. They thought it was wiser not to approach him directly on this question but to leave it to the President of the Assembly and his committee to do so.

With regard to the procedure of the Assembly, Dayal indicated that the Indians assumed that if the cease-fire resolution were passed, Committee 1 would take no further action on the Korea question until the President of the Assembly had had time to make a report. He gave no indication that the Indians were in a hurry to get consideration of the Twelve-Power resolution.

After hearing Malik's speech, Dayal said he thought it was difficult to judge whether Malik was attempting to influence the Chinese decision on the cease-fire resolution and make it almost impossible for them to accept it; or whether he was speaking in a sense on behalf of the Chinese Communists. He seemed to be very much shocked by Malik's speech and assumed there was little hope now for a successful cease-fire.

I spoke to Bebler immediately after he had held a five-minute conversation with Ambassador Rau. Bebler told me that Rau wanted to give assurances to General Wu that the President's public statement that the Seventh Fleet would be withdrawn from Formosa as soon as a peaceful solution of the Korean question was reached still stood. He said that Rau planned to make another public statement to the effect that of course the President's statement still stood since it had not been publicly withdrawn. He then hoped to point out to Wu that he was entitled to rely on the fact that this statement still stood.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Ward P. Allen, Adviser to the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET

[New York,] December 13, 1950.

Subject: Korean Problem in Committee One

Participants: Mr. Kenneth Younger, United Kingdom Delegation

Lord MacDonald of Gwaenysgor, United Kingdom

Delegation

Mr. R. M. Hadow, United Kingdom Delegation Mr. Ward Allen, United States Delegation

Mr. Younger, at lunch, took a very relaxed attitude towards Mr. Malik's speech in Committee One this morning saying he was neither surprised nor disappointed. He was reluctant to accept the view I expressed that the speech indicated Soviet intention to keep the war going in Asia under any circumstance, but preferred to believe the Soviet purpose was rather to prevent any real rapprochement between the Chinese Communists and the West. We have, of course, he said, no way of knowing whether the speech reflected Chinese Communist thinking or not but in any event neither the USSR nor Communist China, even if they were prepared to have a Cease-fire would ever admit it openly in the Committee and embrace the Resolution and so Malik could hardly have been expected to make any different sort of speech than he did. It did not necessarily mean, therefore, that no Cease-fire would come about. Mr. Younger objected to the tendency both of the press and of various delegates to take a volatile mercurial attitude towards statements by Soviet delegates and attach undue significance to them.

As to immediate tactics in the Committee, Mr. Younger felt strongly that after the Cease-fire Resolution is passed the Committee should not proceed to take up Soviet charges of US aggression against China. Notwithstanding his awareness of the problem of US public opinion and my reiteration that the fact that we are defenders in this case made our position on postponement difficult, Mr. Younger felt that the time was out of joint for Committee One to consider this propaganda charge while negotiations on the Cease-fire were in progress. To permit Wu in the Committee to make a slanderous irrelevant speech prepared in Peiping three weeks ago and to promote a Soviet Bloc to play the same record over again could do no good and might upset the applecart at this time. The UK Delegation feels that the best procedure is for Committee One to adjourn sine die after passage of the Cease-fire and for the plenary to approve some such resolution for recessing the General Assembly as the Secretariat has proposed. He thought some procedural provision or understanding could be included in the resolution to the effect that the remaining three items on Committee One's Agenda (including Formosa) would also be post-poned until after the current matter had been disposed of.

In this connection I mentioned the apparent intention of the Greek Delegation to introduce a motion, following approval of the Cease-fire resolution, to have the Committee decide the time of its next meeting and the order of the items. Mr. Younger was quite concerned and indicated it might be desirable for the UK to seek to dissuade Mr. Kyrou from this step (an idea which I did nothing to discourage).

TOP SECRET

NEW DELHI, December 13, 1950—1 p. m. [Received December 13—3:45 p. m.]

- 1466. 1. I saw Bajpai this morning at his request. He wanted again to discuss Korean problem and talked in greater detail than he had on December 12 re conversations which had been taking place in Peking between Panikkar and Communist China.
- 2. He said that on December 8 GOI had instructed Panikkar approach Communist China inquiring whether they would be willing agree cessation hostilities in Korea under conditions as follows:

(a) Cease fire, (b) drawing up demilitarized zone, (c) holding of conversations for settlement Korean problem and subsequently for settlement of Formosa problem in all of which China would have equal participation.

With respect to setting up demilitarized zone GOI had expressed its opinion that Communist forces should not move south of 38th parallel and UN forces should be withdrawn from north of 38th parallel. Re question settlement of Korea GOI thought it would be unwise for Communist China insist on withdrawal UN forces from South Korea until government of united and independent Korea been established in compliance with decisions UN. Re Formosa GOI had expressed opinion that discussions should be based on decisions at Cairo and Potsdam that Formosa should go to China. Question of when and how Formosa should be turned over to China could be subject of discussions and Communist China should bear in mind that US at present considered Formosa important to maintenance peace and security in Far East particularly Japan.

3. Panikkar had reported in telegram received in New Delhi last evening that on December 11 he had had an hour's conversation with Chou En-lai in which latter had insisted the Chinese wished peaceful settlement problems of Korea and of "Far East in general" but that before opening of conversations re future of Korea there must be preliminary announcement on part US to effect that subsequent conversations re Formosa should be based upon Cairo and Potsdam declarations and that settlement of Formosa problem would be accompanied by withdrawal of US fleet from between Formosa and mainland. Chou En-lai had pointed out that while Formosa might seem important to US it was vital to China. Chou En-lai had also made it clear that settlement Korea problems would be interlinked with problem Far East in general. During course of conversation with Panikkar, Chou En-lai had asked what assurance if any did GOI have that proposals made by GOI through Panikkar would be acceptable to US.

- 4. Bajpai told me that late last night GOI had sent text of Panikkar's telegram to Attlee since latter was acquainted with Washington's way of thinking and might be in better position to feel out attitude US towards proposals which had been made by India. He had not sent copy Panikkar's telegram to Washington and considered it unwise to give me copy since remarks of Chou En-lai re US contained in telegram were so critical that he was afraid text of telegram in US hands would do more harm than good. Nevertheless it would be extremely helpful if GOI would be able let Chou En-lai know through Panikkar whether US would be willing consider favorably proposals which GOI had made. Bajpai said he was inclined believe US would be agreeable to GOI suggestions re cease fire, establishment demilitarized zone, and participation of Communist China on equal basis in discussions re future Korea. He had some concern however lest US would not be willing go along with GOI suggestions that conversations re Formosa which would take place after future Korea had been settled would be on basis of Cario and Potsdam declarations. This concern was sharpened by fact that in announcement made following Attlee's conversations in Washington no mention was made of Cairo and Potsdam.
- 5. I promised Bajpai transmit this information to Washington but pointed out that from such information as I had received from Washington and which he would recall I had imparted to him December 12 (paragraph 1 Embtel 1459 December 12) I doubted US would be willing make any commitments at this time re Formosa other than those contained in the announcement issued following conversations between PriMin Attlee and President Truman.
- 6. Bajpai said that in any event it would be helpful to obtain US attitude but he was afraid that if US remained adamant on matter Formosa efforts GOI to bring about cease fire through diplomatic channels might fail. Bajpai indicated GOI did not place much hope on obtaining cease fire through resolution in UN until after some understanding had been reached through diplomatic channels. He said that two resolutions introduced December 12 in GA had caught GOI by surprise. He would appreciate knowing what attitude US Government was with respect to them. Rau still under instructions not to introduce resolution in UN looking towards cease fire unless he had good reason believe such resolution would be acceptable to all of great powers concerned.

584. Assuming 13-Power res is adopted and GA Pres group commences task thereunder, it is likely that other dels will seek obtain US views as to its position on negotiations with Chi Commies. Questions relating to forum, scope of agenda, and place of such negotiations and participants therein will doubtless arise. Dept does not wish at this time to adopt firm position on these questions. There fols however some preliminary and incomplete views which you may wish use in your talks with other dels.

In general our attitude shld be governed by Pres-PriMin communiqué that we are ready as we always have been to seek end to hostilities by means of negotiation and that every effort must be made achieve purposes of UN in Korea by peaceful means and to find solution of Kor problem on basis of free and independent Korea. Furthermore, our general position shld reflect necessity of carrying overwhelming majority of free world with us in further GA steps. Thus we do not wish to be subject to criticism that on question of negotiations we have been unduly intransigent or inflexible on matters which do not involve basic principle.

1. Forum. We wild be prepared to take part in negotiations respecting Korea with interested govts and authorities, including reps of Peiping regime. These negotiations cld be either inside or outside existing UN Organs or special UN Commission established for purpose. If negotiations are to be held within UN we cld not of course accept demand that as precondition for discussion, UN shld oust Nationalist delegates or seat Communist delegates. In either case our willingness negotiate with Peiping Regime wld not imply any change in our attitude towards them in regard to recognition or UN representation.

2. Agenda of negotiations. Any negotiations which are held shld deal first with question of Korea and we shld attempt to confine agenda to Korean settlement. We wld not accept a Communist demand that settlement of Kor question is connected with or depends upon settlement of other questions such as Formosa and Chi seat in UN. This does not mean that we wld reject inclusion on agenda of other questions, but we wld reject linking up of such other questions with Kor settlement. If it becomes necessary to include other questions on agenda, it shld be made clear that their inclusion is without any prior commitment with respect to our views on substance. Under these circumstances we might well insist ourselves that agenda include other Far Eastern items of interest to us, for example, Communist recognition and support of Ho Chi-minh, Tibet, treatment of US persons and property in China, etc.

3. As to place of negotiations we shld seek have them at Lake Success. We wild not however reject completely some other neutral place if it became necessary make concession on this point.

3027. USDel GA reports FonOff position, as indicated by UKDel, is that in view Art 12 UN Charter Korean question must be removed from SC agenda before GA can make recommendations in regard Chi Commie intervention Korea.

Dept strongly of view SC shld not meet at this time to remove item from agenda, for fol reasons:

(1) Attempt remove agenda item at this time entails substantial dangers. Sovs might now take position vote to remove item from agenda subj veto, and get Council into parliamentary snarl by attempting double veto. Tsiang who is presiding SC has indicated he will not rule to defeat such double veto. If action to remove item from SC agenda is instituted and fails, GA auth to take further steps re-

Korea might be challenged.

(2) In any event mtg SC at this time wld open door Sov propaganda speeches and delaying tactics. Also, public attention wld be focused on SC mtg expecting results, and public wld not understand that sole purpose mtg was to take procedural step made necessary by technicalities of Charter.

(3) In Dept's view, it can be argued SC action to remove item from agenda not necessary in this case. While SC is still exercising its functions in regard question aggression against ROK under res June 25 and 27, it is not exercising its functions in respect Chi intervention Korea having been prevented from doing so by Sov veto six-power res of Nov 10.

(4) If other friendly dels insist Art 12 does require SC take steps divest itself jurisdiction before GA can make recommendations in this case, Dept believes it highly undesirable remove entire Korean item from SC agenda. Removal entire question of Korea might raise doubts as to legality of continued UN operations under SC Res of June 25 and 27 and wld make it difficult without protracted debate to get item back on agenda in present form in event further SC action desirable. Any action by SC shld, therefore, be confined procedural decision in appropriate form that SC not dealing with that aspect of Korean case relating Chi intervention. However, for reasons indicated paras (1) and (2) above, even such partial removal by SC shid not take place at this time but shid be postponed until just before GA ready make recommendations to member states in regard Chi Commie intervention Korea.

Delga 434. Chinese Communist views re cease-fire. Following is text memo of conversation between Rau and Cohen at Plenary this morning:

"Rau said that their communications from Peiping indicated that there was a good chance of the cease-fire being accepted by Peiping if certain preliminary points could be cleared up. One was the withdrawal of foreign troops. This Rau said, would create no difficulty. Peiping would not insist on withdrawal until after the unification of Korea. The other and most sensitive point was Formosa and Peiping's desire to know that the Seventh Fleet would be withdrawn when the Korean situation was settled. Rau asked whether it would not be possible to get the President to reaffirm his statement regarding the withdrawal of the Seventh Fleet. I inquired whether what he had in mind was a reaffirmation by the President of his statement independently of any discussions with Peiping. Rau said that was what he had in mind. He thought there would be no suggestion of appeasement if the President on his own responsibility restated his own position simply to make clear that his position had not changed.

I told Rau I would speak with our people. Rau said he hoped we would be able to act promptly on his suggestion."

Mr. Arthur B. Emmons, 3rd—Officer in Charge of Korean Affairs

Mr. Peter R. G. Campbell called upon me this afternoon at three o'clock by prior appointment. He indicated that the purpose of his visit was to inform the Department of an exchange of top secret correspondence which had recently taken place between the Foreign Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of India concerning a possible solution to the Korean crisis. He pointed out that the Canadian Government wished to inform the United States Government of this exchange of correspondence in order that there would be no feeling that Canada was acting unilaterally in the present crisis behind our backs and that the correspondence was initiated by Foreign Minister Pearson on a purely personal basis. Mr. Pearson had shown a copy of his message to Nehru to Prime Minister St. Laurent before sending it to New Delhi.

Mr. Campbell showed me a summary of the contents of this exchange of correspondence which he said he could not leave with me but which was along the following lines: .

Message from Pearson to Nehru, November 30, 1950.

Mr. Pearson called attention to the possibility of an extension of the Korean conflict as a result of the Chinese Communist intervention in Korea and the violent and provocative tone adopted by Peiping which had accompanied the intervention. He referred to Mr. Nehru's unique influence and stature, both in Asia and in many western countries and felt that Nehru's personal intervention at this stage might give pause to the dangerous trend of events and provide opportunity for a peaceful settlement of the Korean conflict. He suggested that Mr. Nehru might make a public cease-fire appeal and call for a cessation of Chinese intervention so that the possibility of a peaceful settlement might be explored.

Mr. Pearson realized that it might be difficult for Mr. Nehru to make such an appeal if he did not believe that it would have wide support. While Mr. Pearson felt that he could not give assurances of such support, it was his opinion that an appeal of this kind from Mr. Nehru would get a sympathetic reception in many capitals and in the hearts of millions of people.

Nehru's Reply to Pearson, December 2, 1950.

Mr. Nehru replied to Mr. Pearson's message of November 30 by saying that he had given Mr. Pearson's suggestion his most careful consideration. He added that the Indians had always been ready to exert themselves to obtain a localization of the conflict, sometimes by offering suggestions which have brought misunderstanding and criticism, but that this is worthwhile in a cause which may involve the future of mankind. Mr. Nehru was reluctant, however, to make a public appeal unless there was a reasonable chance of a favorable response from the parties to whom it was addressed. He was by no means sure in the present situation that such would be the case.

Mr. Nehru added that, following the receipt of Mr. Pearson's message, announcement had been made that Prime Minister Attlee would visit Washington, and he thought it probably wise to await the outcome of the Attlee-Truman talks.

In conclusion, Mr. Nehru stated that he had not misunderstood Mr. Pearson's initiative and added that "it is indeed heartening to me to know that we are all thinking hard how best to save the world from the catastrophe of another major war and resolve to do our best to accomplish that purpose".

Subject: Message from Swedish Ambassador in Peiping.

Participants: Mr. Ragnvald Bagge, Minister-Counselor, Swedish Embassy

Mr. Matthews—G

In the absence of Ambassador Boheman, the Swedish Counselor, Mr. Bagge, called at 6:30 p. m. today at his request. He referred to the earlier conversations which Ambassador Boheman had had with Mr. Rusk and me concerning the approach of the Swedish Ambassador at Peiping to the Chinese Vice Foreign Minister (see my memorandum of November 17, 1950 1). He said that Ambassador Hammarstrom had been requested to visit Vice Minister Chang yesterday afternoon, Peiping time. He referred to Chang as an official one grade higher than the Vice Minister Hammarstrom had seen before. Chang referred to Hammarstrom's previous visit and asked that the following message be conveyed to the Swedish Government (this is the English translation of Hammarstrom's telegram read to me by Mr. Bagge):

"China hopes for a peaceful and early solution of the Korean conflict which was caused by the attack of the American imperialists. How is this to be brought about? The solution lies solely on the American side where nothing has been mentioned about a 'truce'. Neither the United States nor the United Nations has hitherto 'given a concrete opinion about hope for peaceful settlement.' The six-power resolution since it criticizes the justified action of Chinese volunteers would by no means be an effective means to that end, but rather would 'hamper' a peaceful solution."

Hammarstrom added "My question whether China would not advance the matter by making a positive suggestion was answered in the negative."

¹ Not printed. In it, Mr. Matthews reported that Ambassador Boheman informed him that the Swedish Ambassador in Peking had expressed to the Chinese Foreign Ministry Sweden's concern over developments in Korea and the Far East, stated that neither the United States nor the United Nations had any hostile intent against the People's Republic of China, and indicated that any Chinese concerns about frontier problems or questions relating to hydro-electric power could be solved by negotiations, in which Sweden would be glad to assist. No response was made to the Swedish offer other than to say that an answer might be forthcoming in a few days, which Ambassador Boheman took to mean that the matter had to be referred to Chou En-lai and Mao Tse-tung. Wu, taking blunt approach, said no and went on to say that CPG had nothing to do with situation in Korea. Lie reminded Wu that former was not raising point whether Chinese troops in Korea were volunteers, but was merely asking Wu for whatever assistance CPG could render in obtaining entry for IRO in POW camps. Lie then turned to question of cease-fire resolution. Wu proceeded to comment that Chinese could not participate in negotiations regarding a cease-fire under any conditions "other than those mentioned in Mr. Malik's speech yesterday". Wu then summarized conditions as involving withdrawal of "all US and UN troops out of Korea, leaving Korea for the Koreans". Wu also said that question of Taiwan must be settled in connection with any cease-fire discussions and that any negotiations concerning foregoing matters must be "on equal terms". Lie did not press Wu for explanation of what he meant by "on equal terms", but it is Lie's personal impression that this was reference to seating of CPG in UN.

Lie said that Wu, before replying to Lie's question concerning conferences with cease-fire committee, had a long talk in Chinese with his second man, Chiao, and that Wu's replies appeared to be calculated.

Lie expressed his personal judgment that it was now clear that Chinese delegation here was "under the thumb of Moscow". Lie suggested that best course would be for cease-fire committee to address a letter to Wu, forwarding copy of GA resolution and requesting a meeting in order to discuss cease-fire conditions. Lie said that he was satisfied from Wu's answers to him that there was no hope whatever now for a cease-fire and that sooner the matter was disposed of and a vote was taken on 6-power proposal and GA adjourned, the better.

Entezam, who I thought indicated some dissatisfaction with initiative taken by Lie on eve of attempts by cease-fire committee to establish contact with CPG, disagreed with Lie's suggestion that he address letter to Chinese delegation. With some warmth, Entezam said that if it was Lie's idea that cease-fire committee should be used as political tool for forcing public negative reply from Chinese, "then I am not your man". I interjected at this point view that procedures for establishing contact both with UC and with Chinese should be left to committee and I expressed personal view that it might be better not to force public response by addressing letter. Lie withdrew his suggestion.

Lie, however, with some show of annoyance, said that in any event he wanted Assembly to adjourn this week. This led to rather lengthy discussion, in which both Entezam and I expressed view that Assembly must be in a standby position at least until cease-fire committee had submitted its report in accordance with GA resolution. Lie's arguments for adjournment of Assembly this week were (1) that many delegates would be leaving this weekend, (2) in his experience Assemblies which went beyond December 1 remained on almost indefinitely, and (3) his staff was overworked.

In a confidential talk with Cordier later this afternoon latter commented that SYG was not in good mood, to some extent because he was not a member of cease-fire committee and, more particularly, since he was very anxious to go to Norway for Christmas.

Entezam undoubtedly will discuss with other members of his committee problem of duration of Assembly and I am confident that committee will insist that Assembly be in standby position until committee has reached some conclusions, whether negative or affirmative.

Editorial Note

At 10:30 p. m. on December 15, President Truman delivered a radio and television address to the American people announcing his intention to declare the existence of a state of national emergency on the following day. He stated that the United States was willing to negotiate if the Communists were, but would not yield to aggression nor engage in appearement in the face of the great danger created by the rulers of the Soviet Union. The President announced plans to increase defense production, expand the armed forces, and establish wage and price controls. On December 16, the Office of Defense Mobilization was set up to direct and coordinate the mobilization efforts of the government. (Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Harry S. TOP SECRET

Washington, December 15, 1950—2 p. m.

916. Reurtel 1466, you are authorized to inform GOI the US wld be agreeable to cease-fire, establishment of demilitarized zone north of 38th parallel, and subsequent negots to determine future settlement for Korea.

Mil arrangements for a cease-fire wld have to be worked out in some detail in order not to subject UN forces to increased dangers under the cloak of cease-fire. For example, if enemy forces are permitted to concentrate massed strength and to build up supplies on a cease-fire line without interference by UN air, the Mil position wld be seriously and fundamentally changed in favor of the enemy and wld expose UN forces to sudden enemy onslaught with or without pretext or justification. Further, cease-fire wld require observation by joint teams comprising personnel from both sides and UN Reps which wld have right of observation compliance with the cease-fire throughout Korea. We do not suggest you discuss these details with GOI except as illustrative of problems which will have to be dealt with in any effort at Lake Success to bring about cessation of hostilities.

In respect to the two resolutions introduced in the First Comite, as you know, although we took no initiative re either, we did support and vote in favor of the res adopted Dec. 13. The second res recommends that reps of Govts (not named in the res) meet to make recommendations for the peaceful settlement of existing issues. Our position with respect to that res is that discussion of it now is premature. The first step, namely, to agree upon and put into operation a cease-fire, must be completed before there can be negot of polit issues.

In the event that a cease-fire is agreed to by the Chi Commies and suitable arrangements made, and if thereafter agreement is reached concerning procedures for negots with the Chi Commies, we shid seek to have the agenda of those negots confined initially to Korea. We wild not however reject inclusion on the agenda of other questions, including Formosa, but we wild reject the linking up of such other questions to a Korean settlement and wild not make any prior commitment as to our position on the substance of such other questions.

Accordingly, you shid inform GOI that US is always willing to consider any issue through processes of peaceful settlement and wild take part in any reasonable machinery for that purpose. We are not willing to purchase a seat at the conference table by advance concessions nor are we willing to make concessions the effect of which wild be to convert a blatant act of aggression into a profitable transaction for the aggressor.

You shid feel free to emphasize with GOI the consistent record of the US over the past several years in trying to find appropriate means of pacific settlement of outstanding issues with USSR and countries under its control. The record is filled with dozens upon dozens of cases of initiative (both public and private) on the part of the democracies to open the way for peaceful settlement. But the record does not disclose instances of initiative on the part of the USSR directed toward genuinely negotiated results.

The record of wartime and postwar agreements with the Sov Union clearly shows that the Sov Union has collected the benefits which it expected to receive from such agreements, has denied, often by force, the rest of us the benefits to which we are entitled under such agreements, and then has sought to "negotiate" all over again the question of whether we get our part of the original bargain.

A striking example of this technique is shown in the Sov attitude toward the present Far Eastern situation. The very existence of a Commie regime in Chi is the result of a major breach of a wartime agreement by the Sov Union which had committed itself to support and assist the Natl Govt of Chi and to recognize it as the only govt in Chi. At the 1945 Moscow Conference USSR reaffirmed adherence to policy of noninterference in internal affairs of Chi and support for the Natl Govt (ref. Chi White Paper pp. 116-1252). The Sov violations of these several obligations were not merely dipl but were supported by energetic action on the part of the Soviet Union to bring about a Commie regime in Chi. Similarly, the Soviet Union has consistently blocked the fulfillment of that part of the Cairo Declaration which provides for the freedom and independence of Korea while at the same time it invokes that Declaration on the Formosan problem. GOI might be reminded that US took initiative in 1949 GA sponsoring res on integrity of Chi and that Sov bloc alone voted against it.

It is important that GOI understand that Commie aggression in Korea was initiated months before the attack was delivered last June. For substantiating details, see info contained Seoul's 525 Dec. 6 relayed to you as 917.3

Nehru and Bajpai shld also be reminded of the many efforts which have been made both by the US and others, both publicly and privately, both directly and indirectly, to ascertain whether Peiping is being motivated by any concern about legitimate Chi interests which cld be dealt with by processes of peaceful adjustment. Most of these efforts were merely rebuffed; the others have not disclosed a Chi desire to protect its own interests by peaceful means but rather a full partnership of Peiping in a Commie conspiracy of aggression against non-Commie areas. Refusal of Peiping's amb New Delhi to talk discreetly with you, rebuff of many Dels by Peiping Del Lake Success, Sov veto of Indian-Swedish comm to settle early charges US bombing Manchurian terr are readily available examples of efforts made to find basis peaceful settlement and of rebuffs by other side.

² Department of State, United States Relations With China, With Special Reference to the Period 1944-1949 (Washington, Government Printing Office, 1949).

³ Not printed. It contained information obtained from North Korean sources on provision of Soviet military aid to North Korea in the form of equipment and the sending of units of ethnic Koreans from the armed forces of the People's Republic of China to bulwark the North Korean army long before the outbreak of fighting in June 1950. (693.95A/12-650)

After review Korean situation, you may in your discretion wish to raise with GOI broader problem as to how Commie aggression in Asia is to be met. Massive intervention in Korea, reports of preparation of Russian-held Jap POWs for possible operation against Japan, increasingly active assistance and potential direct armed intervention in Indo-China, use of force to change historical autonomy of Tibet, reported deals for assistance between Burmese and Chi Commies, increasingly active penetration Indonesia are samples of present phase Commie aggression. It is not our purpose to exaggerate this danger in discussions with GOI for any passing political benefit. What we shid greatly appreciate is benefit GOI's thoughts on subj which must be of most serious concern to India's own security. If security of Southeast Asia is important to the US, it is absolutely vital to the freedom and independence of India. The great problem confronting the free world now is how to defend those areas, the loss of which wld be so serious to the free world. Just as defense of Japan and, eventually, of US is directly related to success or failure of aggression in Korea, defense of India is intimately concerned with stability and independence of Southeast Asia. If situation continues deteriorating, India may need help. If consideration joint action comes too late, joint action will be far more difficult, and may be impossible. We are not suggesting any formal direct talks between US and India. We shid be glad to exchange informal views about this more serious situation. If GOI prefers to consider this matter within framework Commonwealth, we wld not wish to intrude. The important thing is that GOI know that we are conscious of increasing difficulties being created for India by Chi Commie aggressiveness in Asia and that we wld be ready to exchange views in any way in which GOI thinks helpful.

In conclusion (1) we shall act with determination in Korea and shall not voluntarily give up efforts to resist aggression being committed there, (2) we are willing to accept a cease-fire with mil arrangements which adequately insure the elementary protection of UN forces, (3) we believe it wld contribute to the success of a ceasefire to establish a demilitarized zone with its southern edge along the 38th parallel, (4) it wild be expected that a cease-fire in Korea wild be immed followed by efforts to settle the Korean question in UN by peaceful means, (5) insofar as other issues are concerned the US is always ready to attempt settlement by peaceful means and not under duress, (6) the US has tried persistently to settle outstanding issues by peaceful means, (7) intl Communism has apparently embarked upon a program of aggression which raises the gravest issues for the free world, and (8) the US wld be glad to discuss these problems informally with GOI in any way which wld be helpful.

New York, December 15, 1950—6:27 р. m. [Received December 15—7:25 р. m.]

974. From Gross. Re meeting of Entezam Committee. Following is report of meeting this afternoon of Gross (representing Austin) and General Crittenberger, as military adviser, with group of three established under GA Resolution re Korea.

At outset, Gross made preliminary statement reflecting point of view of US Government that UN forces were in Korea pursuant to UN mission, whereas Chinese Communists were there as outlaws and aggressors against UN; that we assumed UN would adhere to principle that Chinese Communists must withdraw forces from Korea even though this point was not covered in formulation of indispensable conditions of a cease-fire which group of three was about to receive; and that we understood this meeting to be for purpose of outlining UC point of view re the essential elements of cease-fire within military context.

Gross then set forth points contained in Department's No. 590, December 15, as revised at meeting this a.m. of Rusk, Hickerson, Critten-berger and Gross with Austin.² Text was not left with committee, all three members of which took full notes. General reaction of three members of group was that elements outlined were fair. Gross and Crittenberger stressed that these were indispensable elements and not a point of departure for bargaining purposes. This was understood by all three members, none of whom expressed disagreement.

After some discussion of best tactics of approach of group to Chinese Communists, it was agreed that the group, upon establishing contact with Chinese Communists, would go over with them the problem raised in each of the points and ascertain reactions and viewpoints of Chinese Communists without presenting UC views as a target against which Chinese Communists might shoot.

Re Cease-fire Commission, Gross made it clear we would welcome views of group as to composition of commission or use of one-man commissioner. Pearson tentatively suggested possibility of using POC in some manner, or some designee of POC. Gross suggested possibility of using UNCURK, or some designee of UNCURK, or establishing a one-man supervisory mechanism. Gross referred to experience in cease-fire problems heretofore handled by UN and pointed out that use of one-man truce supervisor seemed to be more practicable than use of commission which frequently injected political elements. It was understood by group that we were receptive to suggestions and that this point would be discussed further after the group had considered the matter and consulted among themselves.

No opposition was taken to any of the suggested points. Question was asked what we contemplated for "administration" of demilitarized zone, to which Gross and Crittenberger replied that we had no prejudgments on this matter except appropriate provision must be made in the cease-fire arrangements with regard to civil government and police power in the demilitarized zone. We referred to experience of US government in dealing with civil affairs problems in World War II.

At request of Gross, Crittenberger made statement concerning composition of teams of observers to be designated by the Cease-fire Commission. The general feeling was that these might be composed of representatives of opposing armed forces but group of three wished to consider this matter further.

With regard to neutralizing waters off land areas occupied opposing armed forces, question arose concerning possible introduction into those waters of Soviet naval vessels. Crittenberger pointed out that this problem was not covered in draft points, which referred merely to "opposing naval forces", but that we would object to use of these waters by Soviet naval forces. Group took note of this point.

Gross advised group that we would be available at any time from now on. No political questions were raised by any member of group and in particular no reference was made to what our position would be with regard to negotiations on political issues. Formosa was not mentioned.

Group had apparently not yet decided how it would proceed to attempt to establish contact with Chinese Communists. Pearson asked whether we had suggestions or information re command situation in North Korea, that is, whether forces there were under Chinese commander, what relationship was between Chinese Commander and North Korean command, and what we knew of the status of North Korean authorities. Crittenberger advised group on confidential basis without attribution to him, that the Chinese forces in North Korea were known to be under a Chinese commander, an associate of Mao Tse-tung.

Re publicity, it was agreed that in view of delicacy of negotiations and desirability of avoiding public discussion of points raised by either side, group would limit itself to brief statement merely stating discussions had been held with representatives of UC. On our part we agreed to limit ourselves to mere statement of no comment, explaining that we consider it inappropriate to make any public comments for fear of impeding the work of the group. Entezam and his colleagues made special point requesting that all efforts be made to avoid leaks in Washington and Gross agreed to pass this comment along to Department, Crittenberger to transmit same request to Defense Department to Joint Chiefs. Members of USUN all have been instructed to refrain from any comments. [Gross.]

New York, December 16, 1950—12:43 p. m. [Received December 16—1:22 p. m.]

Delga 443. From Gross. Re Chinese Communist Delegation talks. Lie told me at midnight last night that Wu had come to see him during the evening. Wu said that the Chinese Communist Delegation had been here for about three weeks and felt that there was not much use for them to stay around any longer. Wu said that the GA "had recessed" and that the matter which the Chinese had come to discuss had been postponed many times in the committee. Therefore, Wu was planning to leave with his group on Tuesday 1 by BOAC flight and Wu asked Lie to help make arrangements for their trip.

Wu also asked Lie to set up a press conference for Wu at Lake Success at 3:00 p. m. today. Wu's apparent intention is to announce publicly pretty much what he said to Lie last night. Lie told me that he urged Wu not to take this step and that he pointed out to Wu that from the point of view of Chinese Communists themselves this would be a harmful step for them to take at the very moment the cease-fire group was attempting to establish contact with them for the purpose of discussing the basis of a satisfactory cease-fire. However, Wu repeated that he was under instructions from his government to return to Peiping and added that they wanted him back there for the Chinese New Year and that in any event Wu could return to Lake Success quickly if that seemed desirable. When Lie pressed him further to be available for a meeting with the cease-fire group, Wu replied that he had already told Rau vesterday morning at a meeting between Wu and Rau that Wu would not meet with the cease-fire group and that he considered the GA resolution illegal.

Following his meeting with Wu, Lie called together the group of three and told them of his conversation with Wu. It was decided by the group of three that Rau, on their behalf, would seek a meeting with Wu this a. m. and make an informal approach for the purpose of making arrangements for a formal meeting between the group of three and the Chinese Communist Delegation.

In order to take an independent reading of the situation, I called Pearson this a. m. The latter confirmed the substance of Lie's conversation with the group of three. However, with regard to the Rau-Wu meeting yesterday a. m., Pearson said that after the group had left Lie, Pearson taxed Rau for full information concerning his meeting with Wu. (Rau had made no mention whatever to me of the fact that he had met with Wu yesterday a. m., despite the fact that at the lengthy meeting of Crittenberger and myself with the group of three we had discussed at considerable length the procedures by which the group might go about the problem of establishing contact with the Chinese as well as the matter of approach in any such meeting.)

Pearson said that Rau did not give to him quite the same flavor of his conversation with Wu as appeared from Lie's report of the Wu-Rau conversation. Rau told Pearson that he had not lost hope as a result of anything Wu had said to him and that he did not get the impression from Wu that the latter was on the point of immediate departure from New York. However, Rau frankly admitted to Pearson that he was somewhat influenced to optimism by reason of the reports he was receiving from GOI concerning Panikkar's discussions in Peiping. It appeared from these reports, said Rau, that the Chinese in Peiping were not taking as intransigent or hard a line as Wu was taking in New York.

Pearson told me confidentially that he was preparing a message which he expected to clear with his colleagues on the group. This message would constitute a formal approach by the group to Wu and, among other things, apparently would state that the group was willing to see the Chinese Communists or North Koreans anywhere. I asked Pearson whether this meant the group was contemplating a flight to the Far East, to which Pearson replied "not necessarily", that they might request someone on the spot to see the appropriate authorities on behalf of the group.

In the meantime, Rau, if he succeeds in seeing Wu this a. m., will tell him that the reason the group had not wished to make a formal approach was out of consideration for Wu, since it seemed to the group better to make the first approach on an informal basis in an attempt to establish contact.

Pearson agreed with me that it was highly desirable for the group to send a formal communication to the Chinese Communists prior to the 3 o'clock press conference. I urged that they send such a note as soon as possible after (and if) Rau sees Wu and that I hoped that Pearson would not let himself be talked out of sending such a formal communication by any fuzzy analysis by Rau. A copy of the note, I thought, should be telegraphed to Peiping.

Pearson told me that Younger was coming to see him this a. m. and tell him about a talk which Younger had with Wu yesterday. I shall endeavor to see or talk with Younger myself later this a. m. in order to get a direct report and will communicate to Department as soon as possible.

At 11:45 a. m. today Pearson called to advise that Rau had not been able to establish contact with Wu and might see Wu tonight following the Wu press conference. Pearson agreed with me that it would be desirable for group to send formal communication to Wu prior to press conference, and Pearson will communicate at once with Entezam to make this recommendation. New York, December 16, 1950—2:30 p.m. [Received December 16—3:04 p.m.]

Delga 444. From Gross. Re Korea—cease-fire: On Thursday night I had a brief conversation with Younger in which I outlined to him in very general terms our thinking re a cease-fire and in particular our ideas re machinery for supervising such a cease-fire; arrangements for a demilitarized zone; and arrangements for withdrawal of the forces behind the zone.

Jebb called on me today to give certain comments which Bevin wished to make re certain points. Bevin agrees to the principle of the demilitarized zone which in his view should be patrolled by UN observers.

With regard to a supervisory commission, Bevin thought it should include representatives of the UC, the Chinese Commies and the NK and ROK. He felt it was particularly important that the Chinese Communists should be represented on the commission and on any other machinery set up for observing the cease-fire. I told Jebb that in our meeting with the cease-fire group we had already stated that we accepted the principle that representatives of the opposing forces would participate in the cease-fire machinery at the observer level.

Bevin had also commented that the Chinese Communists might oppose the principle of unrestricted access of the cease-fire commission to the whole of Korea. He suggested that I might be wise not to press this point at this stage and suggested language along the following lines: "The commission is appointed to supervise the cease-fire and shall be given such powers as the commission considers necessary to secure this objective."

I pointed out that this principle was an indispensable one because it was essential to the security of our forces that the Chinese Communists should not be permitted to bring in reinforcements across the Yalu River. Jebb suggested as a compromise that perhaps the commission could have access to the territory 110–150 miles north of the line but not all the way to the Yalu.

Bevin had also commented that the Chinese might regard a provision that there should be no reinforcement on either side as being favorable to the Unified Command because of the fact that they had large forces nearby.

I told Jebb that I had not given any text to the cease-fire group but had simply gone over with them the problems involved in the cease-fire and given them our views. I understand that the group did not propose to give the Chinese Communists any proposals as from the US, but, on the contrary, planned to attempt to discuss with them general problems; if they put forward any suggestions they would put them forward as their own.

Jebb reported that Younger's conference with General Wu yesterday had been most unsatisfactory. Younger had opened with a conciliatory statement and expressed the hope that the Chinese would consider a cease-fire. General Wu had stated very bluntly that the Chinese would not give consideration to any cease-fire proposal except on the terms set forth by Malik; and stated bluntly that all foreign troops must get out of Korea; that the US must withdraw the Seventh Fleet from Formosa; and that his government was entitled to China's seat in the UN. He stated that the GA cease-fire resolution was illegal and that he would not discuss a cease-fire with the three-man committee which the Assembly had set up under the resolution. [Gross.]

Delga 445. From Gross. Re developments at Lake Success re Chinese Communists. SYG Lie advised me 4:30 p. m. concerning developments at Lake Success re Chinese Communists group as follows:

After Wu's press conference,¹ Chinese Communist delegation called on Lie in order to complete travel plans. Lie unsuccessfully attempted persuade them to remain beyond Tuesday, but Wu insisted their departure plan was firm and requested Lie to give administrative assistance and telegraph to London and Prague to aid in making reservations, et cetera. Wu agreed to Lie making this information public.

Entezam group of 3 was at Lake Success for purpose of listening to Wu press conference and considering steps to be taken in light thereof. Lie advised me that group of 3 had sent note this a. m. to Wu advising Wu of desire of group to meet for purpose discussing basis of cease-fire arrangements and expressing willingness of group to meet with Chinese Communists and NK representatives at any place convenient to latter. Lie did not have text of note.² (During past 48 hours group has not kept Lie advised of their intentions and has not used Lie for administrative assistance in any way.) Lie sarcastically characterized note sent by group of 3 as a "bid for a trip to Peiping". Group of 3 sent to Peiping a telegram presumably embodying the substance of note delivered to Wu.

Lie informed Wu that group of 3 was at Lake Success and inquired whether Wu would be willing to meet with the group. After some consultation between Wu and Chiao, Wu refused to meet with group. However, at Chiao's suggestion, Wu did meet for about half an hour with Entezam as President of the GA, rather than as chairman of the cease-fire group. Lie was not invited by Entezam to remain and therefore did not know what was said.

Lie has strong view that we should press as rapidly as possible for adoption of 6-power resolution. He is convinced Chinese Communists do not intend to cooperate in any way in efforts looking toward a cease-fire. He is afraid that group of 3, particularly Rau, will now press for as much delay as possible in further UN action in the vain hope that Peiping will take position different from that taken here by Wu.

Rau is having dinner with Wu this evening, in accordance with arrangements made some days ago. Lie does not believe this of any significance. [Gross.]

asked privately by one of the correspondents, Foote said he "certainly would not assume" that cease-fire had been subject of discussion. Later, in oral briefing, Foote told correspondents that CPR delegation on Friday, December 15, had asked SYG Lie to help them arrange departure by air next Tuesday for Peiping. Foote said these arrangements were "going forward."

Continuing oral briefing, Mat Gordon (secretariat) said cease-fire committee probably would have interim report for committee 1 on Monday, December 18. Gordon said Entezam committee would continue its efforts by every possible means. Gordon "did not exclude possibility that CPR may attend committee 1 meeting." Gordon added that Rau expects to see Wu over the weekend. Gordon said that he had approached Wu after the press conference and asked him to clarify his statement CPR "willing to try to advise the Chinese volunteers to bring to an early conclusion the military operations which they have been forced to undertake with the Korean people's army in their resistance against the US armed forces of aggression." Requesting that there be no attribution to UN sources, Gordon told correspondents Wu had indicated that CPR "might be willing to withdraw volunteers if certain circumstances were met."

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] December 17, 1950.

Participants: Mr. Hickerson

Sir Keith Officer, Head of Australian U.N. Delegation

BNA-Mr. Shullaw

Sir Keith Officer, the head of the Australian U.N. Delegation, called on me today at his request to discuss U.N. strategy with respect to Korea. He said he believed it was important to give the cease-fire committee sufficient time to attempt to achieve its objectives, and that it was also important that the First Committee adjourn for a few days to provide the proper atmosphere for the committee to carry on its work. Sir Keith said that recriminations in the First Committee could damage whatever chances the cease-fire committee might have of accomplishing anything. He also said that Mr. Pearson believed that the committee should not confine itself to negotiations with General Wu's delegation but should be willing to transfer its negotiations, if need be, to Peking. In response to a question from me, he said that he thought the three negotiators might require ten days or two weeks to determine whether or not their efforts would be successful. I told Sir Keith that we would be agreeable to an adjournment of the First Committee.

In a discussion of our long range U.N. strategy on the question of Korea, I told Sir Keith that in the event cease-fire efforts failed and the Chinese Communists continued their operations in Korea, we believed it essential that they be branded as aggressors. I mentioned in this connection Mr. Spender's speech of December 10 in which he stated that we could not afford to distinguish between aggression by a small power and aggression by a large power and that we should not water down the principle of no appeasement by the terms of any agreement reached with the Chinese Communists.

I told Sir Keith that after branding the Chinese Communists as aggressors we favored requesting the Collective Measures Committee to recommend effective action which members of U.N. might take individually and collectively. I mentioned such possibilities as severance of diplomatic relations, financial measures, trade restrictions and possibly a blockade of the Chinese coast. I told Sir Keith that in the handling of this problem we had to seek a course of action between two extremes. We certainly do not intend to become involved in an all-out war with China—that is what the Russians would like to see happen. On the other hand we cannot afford to simply evacuate Korea now that a larger aggressor has joined the North Koreans, except, of course, as a result of military necessity. I said that in branding the Chinese Communists as aggressors we should also do what we have not done up to the present, expose the Soviet Union as the instigators of this aggression.

Sir Keith mentioned that he had been very much disturbed by a conversation earlier in the week between Ambassador Makin and Mr. Rusk on the question of Formosa. He said that he understood Mr. Rusk had stated that one of our interests in keeping Formosa out of Chinese Communists hands arose from our belief that Chiang Kaishek might return to the Chinese mainland by the choice of the Chinese people. He said that he was certain that Chiang Kaishek was thoroughly discredited and would never be recalled by the Chinese people. Mr. Shullaw said that he had been present at the conversation to which Sir Keith referred and that he was certain Mr. Rusk had not meant to imply that this was a major point in his review of the political, diplomatic and strategic significance of Formosa. Mr. Shullaw said that he understood it to be a casual reference and recalled that Mr. Rusk had used the phrase "choice by disgust" to describe such an eventuality.

Washington, December 18, 1950.

Subject: The Australian Prime Minister's Message Regarding the War in Korea.

1. The Joint Chiefs of Staff, from the military point of view, recommend that the reply proposed by the Department of State to the Australian Prime Minister's message of 6 December 1950 1 be changed to read as follows (changes indicated in the usual manner): 2

"I appreciate your message of December 6, 1950, conveyed to me by your Ambassador. I am sure that you will understand that the present situation in Korea does not yet lend itself to exact determination of the capabilities and intentions of the enemy. However, from in view of the great mass of troops which they have committed, it can only be assumed military operations should proceed on the assumption that the immediate military objective of the Chinese Communists is to drive all United Nations forces from Korea. While it is hoped that it will be possible to stabilize a line, the terrain and mass of the enemy may necessitate formation of beachhead bastions in which the United Nations forces can be most effectively deployed and supported. While it may be initially desirable to stabilize a welldefined line across Korea, I am sure you will appreciate the impracticability, in view of the many imponderables in a fluid military situation involving maneuver, of predicting the moves and tactics which may be found necessary. While continuing every effort to localize the present hostilities, and while at the same time strengthening United Nations abilities to resist any further onslaughts that may be planned, I consider it vital that we to the United Nations that it not permit this aggression against Korea to succeed.3 while at the same time strengthening our abilities to resist any further enslaughts that may be planned."

In giving him this memorandum I told him my statements should be considered as of oral and informal character and what I gave him in writing was merely for his convenience and to save his time in preparing memorandum of his own.
- 2. Sir Girja read memorandum carefully and when he had finished remarked that its contents were so important that he felt that he should give it at once to Prime Minister for a top secret discussion with certain members of Cabinet. He expressed particular interest in latter part of memorandum which indicated that time might be at hand when it would be advantageous for US and India to discuss broader problem as to how Communist aggression in Asia was to be met. Re question of cease-fire he said he feared hope in that direction was fast ebbing. He deeply regretted that resolutions for cease-fire had been introduced so hurriedly into UN before proper diplomatic preparations for them had been completed. He was afraid that failure of these resolutions to achieve any constructive purpose would make attaining of a cease-fire still more difficult. He was very depressed because it seemed that there was little that could be done prevent onrush war.
- 3. I told him that it was clear international situation was grave. It still seemed to me that main hope of averting war would be for all free nations to make it absolutely clear to aggressors and potential aggressors that they had no sympathy whatsoever with aggression and would throw their full weight against any power guilty of aggression.
- 4. Sir Girja said he hoped to talk to me again about this matter in few days.
- 5. I decided to have this discussion with Bajpai rather than with Prime Minister because Prime Minister has been so occupied recently with problems arising from death of Patel³ that he has not been able devote much attention to international situation and is not acquainted with latest developments.

TOP SECRET PRIORITY

New York, December 18, 1950—6:35 p.m.
[Received December 18—7:30 p.m.]

Delga 448. Re Korea: Cease-fire subcommittee, Entezam, Rau and Pearson, invited Gross to meet with them Sunday evening, December 17. Present also at meeting which lasted over two and a half hours was Jebb.

See footnote 3 to telegram 916, December 15, 2 p. m., p. 1552.

Meeting was opened by Rau. He said that although the committee had not any official contacts with Wu, he had had informal discussions with him. Wu privately reiterated the PRC feeling that the 13-power Asian resolution re cease-fire is a trap in the sense that Communists are called upon to cease hostilities without any concrete assurances that there will subsequently be broad negotiations with them on Far East problems. He added that Wu had asked Rau to keep trying, that the Communists want peace and that while he must return to Peiping on December 19, a mission could always return. Gross commented that Wu's public utterances followed entirely the Malik approach and that if the Communists wanted to settle these problems they could do so. Gross wanted the record clear that the Communists have from the beginning singled out the US for vituperation and that this tactic should be seen for what it is.

Rau continued that in the light of his contacts with Wu and after conferring with the other members of the subcommittee, they had decided that the best way to meet what might be a suspicious, but nevertheless real fear of entrapment would be by passing immediately the second Asian resolution calling for the representatives of governments not named in the resolution to make recommendations for the peaceful settlement of existing issues. During the ensuing discussion, which ended with a rejection of this idea and the strong opposition to it by Gross, the following points were covered:

(a) Calling upon the representatives of governments to meet as soon as possible would mean as soon as possible after a cease-fire were in effect and therefore the resolution might never become operative. Rau would have been willing to accept an amendment to clarify the point.

(b) The peaceful settlement of existing issues which is language from the Truman-Attlee communiqué should be taken to mean existing Far East issues and that could be explained in speeches.

(c) Gross emphasized that another difficulty with the resolution would be that its passage would indicate a quid pro quo for a cease-fire. On this, Pearson argued quite strongly that there would be no added connection between the two resolutions by calling up the second one at once.

(d) The bulk of the discussion revolved around the idea of leaving blank the names of the representatives who should be called upon to make recommendations. Rau had suggested the US, UK, Soviet Union, and Chinese Communists and three others—perhaps India, Egypt and France. All sorts of formulas were suggested, all of which involved the US, UK, USSR and Chinese Communists, and none of which provided for the interests of the ROK or Nationalist Government of China. Entezam advanced several ideas for leaving blank the governments involved for a definite or indefinite period. Rau indicated that he would not accept an amendment which would avoid the blank and provide simply that representatives of interested or directly interested governments should meet after the cease-fire became effective. At that point, the idea of adopting the resolution was discarded.

During the discussion, Gross emphasized very strongly the US interest in proceeding with the six-power resolution and the fact that we had slowed our pace simply to recognize the views of those who wished to try for a cease-fire. He gave to the group the substance of Deptel 584 of December 13, stressing that while the US is willing to negotiate with the Peiping regime, the question of the forum as raised by the blank in the Asian resolution is basic and we would not accept any demand that the UN should oust the Nationalists from such negotiations. He also pointed out the additional items which the US might wish to suggest during such negotiations.

He recalled that it is the Chinese Communists who are actually pressing an offensive and that we see the six-power resolution as the absolute minimum and the authority and future of the UN at stake. He suggested in the light of this that if some useful idea was in the second Asian resolution, perhaps it could be added as an amendment to the six-power resolution. Gross referred to strong domestic feeling in the US toward isolationism if we and our friends become separated on this question and he added that when the Communists and Russians single out the US for attack, it is only fair to expect our friends to point to the fallacy.

Pearson, asserting his concern to preserve collective security machinery, felt his government would have recognized PRC but for US view. He saw divided view in UN on true motives of that regime and felt that opinion must be respected, otherwise war in Far East without solid support could result. In same vein Jebb referred to Chiang Kaishek as "dead duck". He felt that present situation could result in some UN members being at war with China without others and he did not construe Truman-Attlee communiqué as providing that Chinese Nationalist Government should take part in negotiations over Far Eastern problems of sort envisaged in Asian draft resolution. In summing up, Gross spoke from substance of Deptel 263.1

When idea of giving priority to draft resolution and passing it was abandoned, Pearson suggested that subcommittee make an interim report reciting their informal discussions with Wu, pointing out that Asian resolution previously adopted contains in its preamble indication that further steps should be taken for peaceful settlement. Report or statement would then point out that this means negotiations not to exclude Peiping regime.² He then expressed hope that US would state in committee that Truman-Attlee communiqué indicates that these governments would not exclude Peiping regime from discussions of the type mentioned in preamble of 13-power Asian resolution. However, this was a tentative view which the members of the subcommittee themselves wished to consider further.

Gross commented that he would ask instructions and that while it is a fair interpretation of the communiqué to say that the Peiping regime should not be excluded, it would have to be read in the light of other parts of the communiqué, such as the reference to excluding any thought of appearement and the need for strong support for resistance against aggression. He also stressed the strong views of the US for proceeding with the six-power resolution and evolving policy from there.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

[Washington,] December 19, 1950.

Participants:

Secretary of Defense Marshall
Deputy Secretary of Defense Lovett
Assistant Secretary of Defense Leva
Secretary of the Navy Matthews
Secretary of the Air Force Finletter
Assistant Secretary of the Army Johnson

General Omar Bradley General Hoyt Vandenberg Admiral Forrest P. Sherman General Wade H. Haislip

Assistant Secretary of State Rusk

Secretary Marshall invited me to come to a meeting of the above Policy group to discuss in a preliminary way the security of Japan. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have received a telegram ¹ from General MacArthur asking for substantial reinforcements for the security of Japan proper.

Secretary Marshall opened the discussion by stating that he has been concerned for a week or ten days about the extreme vulnerability of Japan in the event of a sudden Russian onslaught. He said that the American people were familiar with the general problem which would be created in Europe by a Russian attack and would expect the kind of difficulty we would have in the overrunning of West Berlin, in the advance of Russian columns into Western Europe and in air attacks against the British Isles. He said that an attack on Japan, however, would disclose a degree of vulnerability which would surprise the American people and the resulting shock would produce a very serious situation. Just as he and Mr. Lovett were discussing this matter between themselves, he was brought a telegram to the Joint Chiefs of Staff from General MacArthur asking for a major reinforcement of our forces in Japan. The question which he wished to raise for discussion was whether there was any way in which we could "withdraw from Korea with honor". He stated that he had spoken to me briefly yesterday afternoon on the matter and had invited me to come over to repeat my statement of some of the political problems which are involved.

I then spoke along the lines of the attached memorandum, covered the principal points mentioned, but telescoped a few of the questions in order to illustrate the nature of the investigation which would be required by this problem. In my conclusion I strongly emphasized the need for maximum improvisation in this situation in order to make full use of Korean and Japanese manpower. I stated that the questions which were being raised were of the greatest importance and that I could only express certain preliminary views pending the Secretary's return from Brussels; ² Secretary Marshall indicated that the present discussion was entirely preliminary and exploratory.

Secretary Finletter then said that he thought we should keep in mind the great principle on which we had entered Korea and that we should continue to support that principle. The American people acted best in support of a great principle and we should not lose sight of that factor.

Secretary Matthews said that the considerations which he had put forward were very important and would have to be taken fully into account but that he was convinced that the American people would support a withdrawal from Korea if that proved to be necessary. He spoke of his recent trips around the country which had led him to that conclusion, despite the attitude of metropolitan newspapers which he doubted were representative on this point. He said he thought that the reaction of the American people would be much worse in the event of a forced withdrawal (a Dunkirk) than in the event of a voluntary withdrawal.

Assistant Secretary Johnson said that the basic benefit of the great decision which had been made in June, a decision which he thought was the right one, was that it had awakened the American people to the nature of the threat which confronts us and had unified the country behind the measures which will have to be taken to put ourselves in a position of strength. He said that we have now identified our principal enemy and are prepared to do what is necessary to meet that danger. We have stopped the downward toboggan of our military strength. Between now and the time when we can take care of ourselves, he believes we should make the necessary decisions on a purely military basis and that if these decisions are presented to the country by military leadership they would be supported by the public. He said political judgments on such questions as prestige and the effect upon the attitudes of others can vary in much the same way in which psychological reaction to stock market trends go up and down. He said such considerations are unreliable as a basis for action and that we should do what is militarily sound. He said that he did not believe that what we do will make very much difference to the other side and that our action in Korea will have very little effect upon other moves which international communism can be expected to make.

Admiral Sherman said that from a military point of view it would be desirable to withdraw from Korea. He did not favor further ground reinforcement from the United States. He said that we should play this problem "down the middle", decide what is right to do and that we would be supported by [sio]. He stated that he was convinced that Western Europe would be delighted to see us withdraw from Korea. He stated that there might be some loss of prestige and some adverse effect in Asia but that we might have to accept that and balance it off against our increased capacity to deal with the overall situation.

General Vandenberg expressed the view that, from a military point of view, it would be desirable to withdraw our ground forces from Korea and to continue operations by air and sea against China. He specifically mentioned the destruction of industrial plants and the disruption of communications. He was particularly concerned about the debacle which could ensue if the 8th Army were again outflanked and driven into a Seoul-Inchon beachhead and there subjected to persistent air and submarine attack. He said the problem of evacuating the 8th Army through Inchon would become well nigh impossible. He stated that we should give serious attention to the question of gaining time. If we now believe that the Soviet Union plans to initiate an early war, he thought the point of greatest danger would be August 1951, which he related to the completion of the European harvest. He said if that is correct, between now and August 1951 would not work in our favor since we would not improve our ground potential significantly but would in that period have given the Soviets a chance to produce additional atomic bombs. He did not say so specifically, but the implication was that it would be better for us to precipitate hostilities at an early date in order to prevent further USSR atomic buildup.

General Haislip said that he was not in favor of sending General MacArthur the large reinforcements he requested, but that if it became necessary to send him an additional division an equivalent division should be sent to the European theater. He pointed out that the divisions now in training will not have completed their basic training before March 1, and that these divisions now have in them personnel who have not yet learned how to be a basic soldier.

General Bradley said that the decision in June was a governmental decision as well as a United Nations decision, that it was taken basically for political purposes (he did not mean domestic political purposes) and that any decision to withdraw from Korea should be made as a governmental matter and perhaps as a United Nations matter. He referred to my query about instructions to United Nations forces to remain south of the 38th parallel and seemed to think there might be considerable merit in the issuance of such instructions. He did not believe we should withdraw further until we had serious indication that the enemy would in fact advance in strength south of the 38th parallel. He though it unlikely that the 8th Army would be pinned up against the Port of Inchon and thought that it would be feasible to withdraw on Pusan. He pointed out that General MacArthur had available to him some 18 divisions, of which 10 were Korean. He stated that in all directives to General MacArthur it had been pointed out that the security of Japan was paramount and that General Mac-Arthur has made his decision to reinforce Korea with that in view. He said he thought General MacArthur might well be able to spare one or two divisions from Korea for Japan without having that make the difference between success or failure in Korea. General Bradley felt that if the Chinese were really intent upon driving us out of Korea, they had the military capability to do so even if the reinforcements which General MacArthur had requested were used in Korea itself.

During the above exchange, I pointed out that we had not asked General MacArthur to defend the 38th parallel as such, or even the Seoul area, and that if further withdrawal became necessary from a military point of view we would not interpose any political objection. General Bradley thought that we should await clear enemy intentions to drive in force south of the 38th parallel and pointed to considerable criticism that our forces had withdrawn such a great distance without having been seriously engaged except at the time of the initial Chinese counter-offensive.

[Annex]

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

- 1. Political Factors Involved in a Voluntary Withdrawal from Korea:
- a. The issue of aggression. We should be confronted at once with the crucial question as to what we do about Korean and Chinese aggression. To turn away from the issue of aggression would almost certainly start a chain reaction of defeatism and disillusionment both nationally and internationally which would be difficult to halt. To withdraw from Korea, on the other hand, and take other military action against China might bring about immediate and violent reaction from the USSR which we are trying to postpone. The best way to gain time would seem to be to continue the military operation in Korea until it is clear that military necessity requires us to leave. Of course, gaining time is of little value unless the time gained is in fact used to the best advantage.

b. The commitment to the Koreans. A decision to abandon our Korean allies would have far-reaching consequences. We would voluntarily turn over some 20,000,000 anti-communists to communism. It is an important source of anti-communist military manpower from a non-American source. If we abandon the Koreans, many other present and potential allies will get a lasting impression of our reliability. This would be particularly true in Japan and the rest of Asia. It would be interpreted widely as a signal that those who are exposed had best now come to terms with communism on the best obtainable basis.

c. United States military prestige. It would be a serious thing for us to act like a defeated nation on the basis of events which have thus far transpired in Korea. In the broadest sense, our armed forces in Korea represent about 10% of our present military manpower; this 10% has not suffered heavy casualties since the beginning of the UN offensive in late November. Our comparatively small force in the field has not been seriously defeated; it has been out-maneuvered and has been set back. In any event, this force is not the measure of American power. We should not act as if we had suffered a national calamity; by doing so, it will become a national calamity.

d. Chinese military and political prestige. A voluntary withdrawal in the near future would leave Chinese military and political prestige at its peak; this would give great impetus to Chinese aggression elsewhere and to the consolidation of communism in China itself. If militarily possible, we should give the Chinese a chance to expose their weaknesses and to run up against the heavy costs of any large scale effort into south Korea. They should be forced to take a large dose of American air, sea and fire-power—even if our ultimate withdrawal from Korea becomes necessary. Hardship in Korea will produce strains on troop morale, on communist leadership and on relations between Peiping and Moscow.

- 2. Political Factors Involved in the Reinforcement of Japan:
- a. World deployment of U.S. forces for World War III. Before deploying additional forces to Japan from the United States to meet the contingency of what would be, in fact, World War III, it should be decided that this is the deployment we would want for World War III. If the Soviets attack Japan, World War III is upon us. Where do we want our available forces to be in that contingency?

b. Vital importance of holding Japan. It can be accepted that the holding of Japan (as well as Germany, Western Europe, the United Kingdom) is of vital importance to the U.S. If there is a clear choice as between Japan and Korea, priority must go to Japan.

c. Effect in Europe of major reinforcement in Japan-Korea area. The dispatch to Japan of the divisions now in training in the U.S. would have a disastrous effect upon the program for the defense of

d. Inter-relation between our position in Korea and the defense of Japan. We should not overlook the close connection between our posture in Korea and our ability to defend Japan, because of the highly important political and psychological factors involved. A determined attitude in Korea is probably essential to a capability to defend Japan with Japanese assistance.

e. There is no question but that it would be desirable to strengthen our military position in Japan; the question is how.

- 3. An approach to the problem, as seen from the political side:
- a. Political and military action to stabilize a position in Korea

(1) cease-fire along the 38th parallel

- (2) political deal calling for phased withdrawal of foreign forces from Korea
 - (3) assistance to increase effectiveness of ROK forces
 - (4) Korea to be left in hands of a UN Commission
- b. Strengthening of military position in Japan

(1) staging of 3rd Division to Japan rather than Pusan

(2) rapid increase of Japanese constabulary capability

(3) stand-by plans for immediate evacuation from Korea to Japan.

4. Questions which require examination:

a. Are there new elements in the situation now which have not been present since the Chinese Communists intervened in Korea in October?

b. Do we lack military equipment for an increased Japanese constabulary? If so, would it not be better to give a portion of the equipment now in the hands of the 4 National Guard Divisions in order to utilize Japanese manpower? We can assume that the Japanese would fight at least as well as Americans for the defense of Japan; are we not better off to keep our Americans in this country with their heavier equipment, even if we give the light equipment to the Japanese?

c. What degree of mobility can we count upon in moving our forces from Korea to Japan in the event of World War III?

d. To what extent can we improve our ability to defend Japan by increasing our air and naval power in the vicinity?

e. How far should we go in making concessions on a Korean settlement in order to remove our forces to Japan with UN blessing?

f. Assuming the increased threat of general war, what do we estimate we need for the defense of Japan, quite apart from the Korean issue?

g. How do we relate the defense of Japan to the defense of Alaska as priority demands upon our capabilities?

 \hat{h} . Can we find a way in the near future to reinforce our garrison in the Philippines?

i. In the event of World War III, would the atom bomb be available to play any role in the Japan-Korea theater of operations?

j. Does the problem of the defense of Japan suggest any modification of our priorities as to mobilization, e.g., should we put any special emphasis on aircraft carriers or any other particular types of weapons?

k. Is there any way in which we can make more effective use of Korean manpower within our own units, thereby making up in combat strength for any gap caused by deployment of certain units from Korea to Japan? Can we reinforce our units in Japan by attached Japanese?

1. Should we ask Canada, Australia or others to provide additional forces for the protection of UN air bases in Japan, in the event they could furnish partially-trained units for limited service in Japan?

Memorandum by the Ambassador at Large (Jessup) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

[Washington,] December 19, 1950.

It is suggested that Ambassador Boheman might be asked to call and that he be told we think it would be possible for the Swedish Ambassador at Peiping to speak to the Chinese Government along the following lines.

The Swedish Government has noted the statement of Vice Minister Chang to the effect that the United States had not so far given a concrete opinion about hoping for a peaceful settlement. The Chinese Government of course knows that the Swedish Government has very friendly relations with the United States. It is in a position to inform the Chinese Government that it believes that the United States desires a peaceful solution of the Korean conflict. More specifically, it believes that the United States Government would be willing for its part to support a reasonable arrangement for a cease-fire in Korea. The Swedish Government believes that the United States would not be willing to make any arrangements which were not approved through the appropriate channels of the UN but the Swedish Government, as a member of the United Nations, believes that the appropriate UN bodies would also support such an arrangement. The Swedish Government further believes that if a cease-fire could be arranged it would thereafter be possible to initiate discussions either formally or informally about the solution of other problems in the Far East. It believes it possible, for example, to consider in regard to Korea arrangements for the withdrawal from the country of all non-Korean forces provided that a UN Commission suitably composed could participate in assisting in the process. (If questioned on the point it would be possible for the Swedish Ambassador to say that he did not anticipate difficulty in having a representative of the Peiping Government included in such a Commission.) In response to other questions he could also indicate that if the negotiations were arranged there is no reason to believe that any subject would be excluded from the agenda of such talks. He would not be in a position, however, to suggest what solutions of any of the problems might be agreed to if such talks should be initiated. It would be one of the purposes of the talks to explore possibilities of agreed solutions.

[Received December 19—2:55 p. m.]

CX-51634. This is Sebald's unnumbered. Department pass Seoul. UN Command deeply disturbed by continuing reports of inhumane treatment of political prisoners by ROK. ICRC delegate Korea has sent full report on subject to Geneva and similar report being hand carried this date to President Rhee by ICRC delegate Tokyo. Complaints center around (1) atrocious conditions existing in Seoul prisons and (2) brutal and arbitrary mass executions of alleged political prisoners, including women and children, by ROK authorities. These executions reported having particularly demoralizing effect on British forces, in whose area many of killings have taken place. British troops reported on one occasion to have disarmed firing squad before execution could take place.

UN Command has regarded trial and punishment of collaborators and other political offenders as internal matter for ROK and has consequently refrained from taking any action with regard thereto beyond bringing atrocity reports to attention responsible ROK authorities. Representations of UN command and American Embassy Seoul appear from continuing reports to have had little effect, however, and it is feared these excesses may serve to cast discredit on entire UN Korean effort.

Delga 453. Following report Pearson-Ross telecon late this afternoon. Twelve-power Asian group met immediately after Committee 1 adjournment yesterday morning and thereafter expressed disappointment to three-power group that group had neither said nor done anything to reassure Chinese Communists that they would not be lured into trap by acceptance cease-fire with nothing open in way of discussions after cease-fire.

At meeting of three-power group yesterday afternoon Rau wanted to issue press statement calling attention to twelve-power resolution providing for discussions in relation to cease-fire resolution. Entezam and Pearson opposed any public statement at this time and any action pending contemplated Rau conversation with Wu this morning.

Rau saw Wu this morning and got nowhere; he reported, however, that Chinese Communists made cryptic remarks to effect they hoped to be back soon.1

Three-power group met at lunch today and were to meet again this evening to consider sending telegram probably tonight to Peiping along following lines: Three-power group anxious that there be no misunderstanding on part Chinese Communists, in considering telegram group sent last Saturday re cease-fire resolution, and no misunderstanding re twelve-Asian power resolution concerning discussions. Chinese Communists may be assured if cease-fire resolution implemented negotiations can follow at once as twelve-power resolution could be adopted by Assembly at once. It was view of twelve Asian sponsors of resolution calling for discussions as well as threepower cease-fire group that Government of CPR would participate in discussions. Group felt that adoption twelve-power resolution could provide channel for peaceful settlement outstanding issues in Far East affecting interests of US, UK, Soviet Union and China. Telegram would end on note that cease-fire must, of course, first be put into effect.

Pearson said that if telegram sent it would not commit anyone else to anything.2

With regard to procedure in Committee 1, Pearson said they had found out that three-power telegram to Peiping last Saturday was not received there until 7 o'clock yesterday morning. Pearson said that if 589. Reference Deptel 467, December 18; Embtel 561, December 11.1 Guards from West Gate and Mapo prisons, Seoul, executed total 39 prisoners tried and condemned by Seoul district court under National Emergency Law Number 1, in major cemetery area just north of Seoul on December 15. Executions were observed by British soldiers, one warrant officer making written report to this [his?] C.O. assuming executions of casual character with doubtful legality, and alleging small girl as well as two boys killed. These allegations reported to UNCURK and to foreign press, latter seeming accept at face value and cabling accordingly. UNCURK informally queries Home Minister and Justice Minister, as well as a Reuters correspondent who had not seen these executions, but who reported on some executions at Sariwon. North Korea, which were quite unrelated but which seemingly latter attempted to connect. (Both Embassy and British Legation previously had investigated Reuters reports on Sariwon, finding that anti-Communist NK guards employed by US civil assistance teams, had conducted Sariwon executions during period UN withdrawal.) Embassy informed today UNCURK has dropped question, following investigation and satisfaction executions, however badly handled, were results sentence passed by legally constituted court accordance with law.2 UNCURK had sent military observer, Colonel White, Canada, to observe exhumation bodies on December 17, which was conducted under orders Home Minister and Justice Minister. Exhumation proved allegations re shooting children wholly false.

¹ Latter not printed; it provided statistical information on the disposition of Communist collaborators in the Seoul-Inchon area by the Republic of Korea 795.00/12-1150).
For UNCURK's report following its investigation into the executions, see Facts appear to be that civil courts (Seoul district court) from October 1 to December 15, under Emergency Law Number One, promulgated Taejon June 28, convicted, sentenced 391 persons, of whom 242 have been executed, all by shooting. Prewar executions by hanging, but death house destroyed during war, never restored, and prison authorities substituted musketry for rope. Article 12 this law permits execution either by hanging or shooting. Recently, owing uncertainty security, Seoul executions speeded up, leading to these executions. These figures do not include military executions following court martial, whose prisoners are handled separately.

Emergency Law Number One, June 28, states purpose to punish anti-national criminal acts rapidly and strictly in emergency situation caused by NK "puppet group" invasion, provides in article 3 for death sentences for those committing following crimes during emergency period, which period to end when public peace restored: (1) murder, (2) arson, (3) rape, (4) destruction or damage military transportation, communications, water supply, electric or gas facilities, government facilities, maps, important documents, (5) extortion, robbery, illegal distribution munitions or other important (war) materials in large quantities, (6) acts causing jail break. Most those convicted, executed, reportedly charged under (1), (2) or (4) especially (4).

Persons executed December 14-15 had been sentenced by Seoul district court between November 15 and December 10 as being guilty violation one or more of six crimes specified in law as carrying death penalty, youngest were 21 (2) and oldest was 50.

Owing public furor caused by second day's executions (British troops threatening shoot any guards attempting execute others in their area) and foreign correspondents cabling stories of mass executions without trial (allegedly by police who actually were not involved at all), government has suspended executions for time being until can find suitable execution place and method. Justice Minister reported to cabinet could not have executions in prison area since prisoners (over 5,000 now in West Gate prison) would riot if they heard shots. Embassy officer discussed subject today with Vice Minister Justice and chief penal administration, Justice Ministry, who agreed would cause erection triple gallows enable execution remaining 151 awaiting execution within prison, would not shoot any more.

President has issued orders to Justice Minister hereafter before any one executed his family must be notified, and be permitted take custody of body after death; chaplain of desired faith must be allowed give pre-execution solace and accompany prisoner during execution if requested. This is in addition to normal practice requiring attendance executions by physician and representative public procurator. In cases reported, two physicians and two public procurators were present. President has also stated to press is preparing program for review capital sentences to see if cannot commute some of them. It is reported that President will issue amnesty list, either on Christmas or New Year's day, commuting some sentences and paroling or pardoning other prisoners.

Today Vice Minister Justice called at EUSAK headquarters and then at Embassy asking assistance arrange transportation 4700 prisoners from Seoul to Taejon, Taegu and Pusan prisons. These include 300 convicted and given life sentences, and 900 charged but not yet tried who are expected to receive life. Koreans greatly concerned that Communist-oriented prisoners should not be left in prisons for Communists to release if they should take Seoul. Last June Communists opened West Gate and Mapo prisons, armed prisoners, and many of latter became greatest scourge of Seoul citizens during Communist occupation, even more so than invading army. This memory haunts many Koreans, who are determined not to have the experience repeated.

Understand Korean Government intends issue statement explaining these facts.

Embassy believes same correspondents misunderstood President's reference to speeding up trials (Embassy officer was present). December 12, President had paid surprise visit to West Gate Prison, with Home Minister and Justice Minister, made careful inspection, left order (1) improve food and sanitation; (2) improve quality prison, hospital care; (3) speed up trial of prisoners so innocent could be released and present long delays before trial be ended. Embassy understands was reference to this which President made at press conference, rather than saying had urged speed up of executions.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Charles P. Noyes, Adviser on Security Council Affairs, United States Mission at the United Nations

CONFIDENTIAL

[New York,] December 20, 1950.

US/S/1650

Subject: Dropping Korea Question from Security Council Agenda Participants: Mr. Denis S. Laskey,

United Kingdom Delegation

Mr. C. P. Noyes,

United States Mission

Laskey reported that after the United States Embassy had discussed this question with the Foreign Office, the Foreign Office had sent them new instructions. The present position remains as previously, that it is legally very doubtful that the Assembly has the right to make recommendations to Member States on the Korean question while the matter remains on the Security Council agenda. The Foreign Office therefore continues to feel that it is important that at some time the Security Council should drop this question from its agenda.

They realize that throughout this month there are very real political difficulties. They are willing, therefore, to go on for the rest of this month without raising the issue themselves. Laskey was not sure what their position would be if other Delegations, before the end of this month, raised this issue and it became a hot potato. This would put them in a very difficult position. He thought barring this eventuality his Delegation would have no difficulty in passing any resolution implementing a cease-fire—if that were possible—or the Six-Power resolution.

In regard to the Six-Power resolution, he thought it could be made an exception on the ground that in the same resolution the Council had been prevented from passing it; also that it did not make recommendations to Member States but merely stated a policy. The British certainly would have grave difficulties with any second-step resolution which did make recommendations to Members. Laskey thought the Foreign Office would be anxious, after January 1, to have the Security Council drop the matter from its agenda so as to eliminate this difficulty. He thought this could easily be done when Quévedo is President.

Laskey indicated that the British had discussed this in Commonwealth Meeting. He thought that the point of view he had expressed was the general feeling of the Commonwealth Group.

Memorandum by Mr. Louis Henkin of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs to the Director of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs (Bancroft)

SECRET

[Washington,] December 20, 1950.

Subject: Ambassador Gross' Interpretation of Department's Views on Negotiations Concerning Korea.

Delga 448 from New York, December 18, reflects an apparent misinterpretation of the Department's views on the question of negotiations for a Korean settlement, particularly as to the forum of negotiations and the participants. I take it our position is as follows:

1. After a cease-fire is arranged, we are willing to discuss the Korean question and if necessary other Far Eastern problems.

2. We are prepared to consider these questions either in an appropriate UN organ or in diplomatic discussions of a more or less formal character.

3. In a discussion in a permanent UN organ in which China is represented we are prepared to let the Peiping regime sit at the table and participate in the discussion but we will not agree to its being seated to represent China. In such organ the Chinese seat would continue to be held by the present Chinese Delegation which could, of course, exercise full rights of discussion and vote like other members.

4. If discussions are held outside the UN we are prepared to deal directly with representatives of the Peiping regime. Though we would want to be sure that any group assembled was not "loaded" against us, we have no fixed views on what other governments might participate in such negotiations. Whether the Chinese Nationalists would also take part would depend on subject of discussion. E.g., we would not wish them to participate in a discussion of Korea; they would have to take part if Formosa were discussed.

If the above represents our position it seems highly misleading to say as Delga 448 does, "The question of the forum as raised by the blank in the Asian resolution is basic and we would not accept any demand that the UN should oust the Nationals from such negotiations."

Mr. Hickerson may want to call Ambassador Gross to clarify any misapprehensions on this matter.¹

PRIORITY

Washington, December 20, 1950—4 p. m.

602. In view of the undeniably heightened danger of general war, we should overlook no honorable possibility of bringing about a peaceful settlement in Korea. We believe it therefore wise not to become overly entangled in the procedural maze into which cease-fire and other proposals have developed and to take stock of our basic purposes.

1. The reason for United Nations action in Korea was to repel North Korean aggression against the Republic of Korea. There has now been added the aggression of China. If the Free World is to survive, we cannot voluntarily permit aggression to be rewarded. On this point we will not compromise or bargain.

2. Our objective in Korea has never varied from that of the United Nations resolutions: the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic country. We had hoped and still hope to bring that about by peaceful means under United Nations procedures. Neither we nor the United Nations were committed to bring it about by whatever force would be required; the enemy is now in fact capable of preventing a UN military success in all of Korea.

¹No record of such a telephone call has been found, but see the instructions to the U.S. Mission at the United Nations contained in telegram 602, infra, which was approved by Mr. Hickerson.

3. We have consistently desired and still desire the earliest possible withdrawal of United Nations forces from Korea; this must, as a minimum be accompanied by a cessation of North Korean attacks across the 38th parallel and withdrawal of Chinese forces. It is our earnest desire that the Entezam Group will be successful in arranging a cease-fire which could lead to a generally acceptable peaceful settlement for Korea, including acceptance by Korea's neighbors. To this end we are willing to discuss the matter in a forum or procedure which would include the Chinese Communists. Despite undoubted basic differences in ultimate purposes, there may at least be room for discussion leading to modus vivendi. If they desire, as they have stated, a cessation of hostilities and a withdrawal of foreign forces from Korea, then some accommodation might be possible and we should be able to discuss a peaceful settlement. The holding of such discussions should not depend upon prior commitments from either side as to positions to be taken in discussions, and discussion itself does not constitute appeasement.

Our obligations under the Charter and our consistent record of seeking peaceful settlement of disputes make discussions in the present instance for us a natural course of action.

Therefore, if our friends in the UN, including Entezam, Pearson and Rau, and the Chinese Communists understand our basic willingness to talk and to use peaceful methods, they may be able to work out a situation to bring this about.

We have immediately in mind a cessation of hostilities with the military situation stabilized at the 38th parallel. We believe an effort to achieve this prior to any Communist offensive across the parallel is of great importance.

We suggest that you use the foregoing as a basis for discussions with Rau, Entezam and Pearson.

If the question of negotiation on other matters is raised you should be guided by fourth paragraph of Department's 916 of December 15 to New Delhi.

Subject: Our Course of Action in Korea

1. General MacArthur has asked the Joint Chiefs of Staff for all four of the National Guard divisions now in this country in order to reinforce his position in Japan.2

2. There is attached (Tab A) a memorandum of conversation which I had with senior members of the Department of Defense on December 19. The preliminary line I took in that conversation is contained in notes (Tab B) attached to the memorandum of conversation. These notes were prepared in consultation with Messrs. Matthews, Nitze, Jessup and Armstrong.

3. At Tab C⁴ there is a proposed broad line of action for us to take in the light of the present situation in Korea. (This is not yet agreed to by all concerned.)5

4. It will be desirable to arrange a discussion with Secretary Marshall and the Joint Chiefs of Staff on this matter before Christmas.

[Annex]

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

Course of Action in Korea

1. U.S. objectives in the present situation in Korea should be

(a) to maintain the solidarity of the UN in resistance to aggression, fully exposing the character of the Communist assault upon world peace;

(b) to stabilize, if possible, a position in Korea at the 38th parallel by political means, and to reinforce this effort by military means if that can be done without risking the destruction of U.S. forces;

³ See the memorandum of conversation by Rusk, December 19, p. 1570, and the ⁴ Printed as the annex to this document. ⁵ The parenthetical statement was written in manuscript on the source text, presumably by Mr. Battle.

¹A manuscript notation on the source text by Lucius D. Battle, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State, indicated that Mr. Acheson saw this memorandum.

²On December 22, the JCS informed General MacArthur that no additional divisions would be deployed to the Far East pending a governmental decision on future U.S. courses of action in Korea (Record of the Actions Taken by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, p. 76).

(c) to prevent the extension of the hostilities in the Far East and to avoid heavier commitments of U.S. forces in that area in face of the danger of general war;

(d) to find means honorably to withdraw U.S. forces from Korea at the earliest opportunity;

- (e) to use whatever time is available to strengthen Japanese and Korean ability to contribute to their own defense.
- 2. General MacArthur's directives should be clarified in order to make clear
- (a) which major unit or units, if any, he is authorized to withdraw from Korea to Japan as a security force in Japan;

(b) that he should make the fullest possible use of Korean manpower in further fighting in Korea;

(c) that he is not required to hold any particular position in Korea regardless of cost, but that he should attempt to stabilize a position in

Korea wherever there is a reasonable chance of success;

(d) that maximum effort be made by air and sea power to punish enemy forces, and to reduce their morale and military prestige, to disclose any weakness in their ability to maintain effective forces in combat over extended supply lines;

(e) that if it becomes impracticable to stabilize any position in Korea, it is contemplated that UN forces would withdraw on Pusan and be evacuated as a matter of military necessity;

(f) that in the event of any attack or direct threat against Japan, the security of Japan continues to be regarded as paramount;

- (g) that maximum efforts be made to enable the Japanese to contribute more effectively to their own security by the further organization of mobile police reserves, coast guard protection, air field security, home guard, civilian defense, etc.
 - 3. Our political effort should be directed toward

(a) a cease-fire in the vicinity of the 38th parallel;

(b) a settlement for Korea permitting the phased withdrawal of non-Korean forces from the peninsula;

(c) a course of negotiations on Far Eastern questions, the purpose of which would be (1) to gain time, (2) to seek a modus vivendi which would bar further armed aggression by China, or (3) fully to disclose the real character of Chinese Communist aggression and to enlist the energies of non-Communist Asia to meet it:

(d) a consolidation of the free world coalition.

4. Our program in the UN should be based upon the following steps:

(a) a cease-fire, followed by negotiations on Korea and other Far Eastern questions;

(b) if there is no cease fire and a continuation of Communist offensives across the 38th parallel, the UN should promptly pass (1) the six-power resolution on Korea and (2) a further resolution naming

Participants: Mr. Erik Boheman—Swedish Ambassador Dean Rusk—Assistant Secretary of State

I asked the Swedish Ambassador to come to the Department today and told him that, despite what appeared to be a Chinese Communist rejection of a cease-fire, we wished to leave no reasonable course unexplored. It seemed to us that it might be useful if the Swedish Government thought it possible for the Swedish Ambassador at Peiping to make another effort to disclose the basic American viewpoint to the Chinese Communists and to attempt to ascertain just what their real purposes are in the present situation. I thereupon went over with him the attached memorandum, explaining that we had drafted it as a statement which might be made by the Swedish Ambassador for convenience sake. Mr. Boheman indicated that he fully appreciated this method of presenting our views.

Upon reading the memorandum Mr. Boheman thought that it was a very important and constructive step and he felt sure that his Government would wish to act immediately. He said that he would let us know of any results.

TOP SECRET

Delga 460. Re Korea—cease-fire committee. Pursuant to Department's Top Secret 602 of December 20, Ross and Hyde called upon ¹The text of the statement was identical with that in the memorandum of December 19 from Ambassador Jessup to Mr. Rusk, p. 1576, except that at the end of the antepenultimate sentence the following words were added after "such talks": "which would be appropriate for consideration by the parties involved".

Riddell, Rau and Entezam separately and thereafter had luncheon with Chauvel, Colson, Ordonneau and Laskey. Jebb joined us after luncheon.

In calling on the members of the Committee of Three we stressed the US earnest desire to see the group succeed, our realization that an attack across the 38th parallel might occur at any time and the belief that the effort to achieve cessation of hostilities prior to any such offensive is of great importance. We wanted to be certain that any questions or views of the group should be discussed and each of the three at least touched upon the question of withdrawal of UN forces. In discussing this, we developed the points contained in reftel. We added that we would like to see the group succeed rather than simply make a record.

The press had telephoned the three about a radio report that Chou En-lai had declared the Committee of Three illegal and that therefore PRC would not deal with it.

Riddell had just heard this radio report and having talked to Pearson by phone seemed discouraged. He felt that it remained only for the committee to write its report, assuming that the radio information was correct. He thought it unlikely that the committee would receive any direct communication from Peiping. He thought that the UC military terms for a cease-fire were eminently fair if only there were some way to communicate them. He felt that they were the answer to at least one point made in the radio report, that a cease-fire would trap the PRC into allowing UN forces to build up their strength. He was interested in the idea of examining the general principles which would cover the possible withdrawal of UN forces and felt this would have been very useful to use a week ago but with no channel of communication now open, he was doubtful how this approach could be communicated.

Rau had just heard the radio report and while he was waiting for a confirmation and he had not seen any text, he assumed that it was a rejection of the committee's efforts. He considers the situation very serious as offering the alternative between war with China and the sort of negotiated settlement that is not likely to occur. He considered his own role extremely responsible and felt under great tension.

Early in the conversation he brought up the subject of Formosa and the 7th Fleet. In this connection he restated what he said in the conversation with Cohen reported in our topsec 434 of December 14. We pointed out simply that we would not reject the inclusion of such an item in any conversation following a cease-fire but that we thought his line looked in the direction of at least some advance commitment on the substantive question. Rau commented simply that he wanted reaffirmation of what had previously been said by US Government officials and that that was in no sense a new element. He pressed the point that in his view the US had made a mistake which it should be willing to recognize by the restatement of its position on Formosa.

He then mentioned the withdrawal of troops as one of the things that the Chinese Communists are particularly interested in but felt this presented no real difficulty to them or us. He thought it simply would be part of an overall plan which he would like to be in a position to present to them—a cease-fire and progressive withdrawal of troops after the unification of Korea and assurances on broad discussions of FE problems.

He felt that the US was too much committed to a military solution of the problem of Korea and we corrected this view by pointing out that our objective was that of the UN resolution and that neither we nor the UN were committed to bring about a solution by force.

He was worried that he could not himself explain or understand the motivation of the PRC or the USSR. He referred to a "report from Washington" that the USSR was in fact acting as a restraining influence on the PRC and he also mentioned a rumor that the USSR had some concern that the large troop concentration in North China might be a threat to it.

He reflected general discouragement and indicated no particular ideas about what the group might do next other than verify the correctness of the radio reports and write its own report. He did mention a hint which might be developed that negotiations might be undertaken with the NK regime to carry out the fiction that they were in control of the situation and form the key toward the withdrawal of Chinese Communist "volunteers".

Entezam was gloomy, stating that he had never wanted to be involved in the Committee of Three, he thought he had acquitted himself reasonably well in the GA and then found himself faced with this task which presented great difficulties for him personally in the light of his country's situation. From the start he had not seen how the group could succeed, but he had been willing to try his best. His approach was rather more technical than the others in that he could see no point in discussing a possible cease-fire unless and until a channel is opened up to talk with the PRC. He thought the radio reports were probably true and that it therefore remained for the group simply to write the best sort of report to keep the record straight. He felt that the US is primarily interested in what happens next and therefore should think about what to do next and write off the cease-fire group. He did mention the thought that perhaps something would come of trying to find out where the NK regime is and talk to them. He also suggested that the proposed CFM could deal with this. If there were any good will or willingness to negotiate the problem of Korea, it would not in his opinion be too difficult to-work it out. He felt that the terms of the cease-fire suggested by the UC were entirely fair. He commented that of course the withdrawal of UN forces would be one of the first topics that would be taken up if a channel were opened. As far as the CFM is concerned, there would then be the problem of how to include the PRC, they being a directly interested party.

During luncheon with Chauvel and the UK advisers, we reported generally the above and Chauvel picked up at once and developed the idea of attempting to discuss the Korean question and a cease-fire in the projected CFM.2 Jebb clearly disliked the idea of getting outside of European problems and wondered how the PRC could be heard. He also asked whether Chauvel would be willing for the CFM to consider IC. Chauvel replied he had no instructions but added that he felt that that problem was being effectively handled by France itself. Chauvel attempted to interpret our discussions with the members of the group of three and our desire to have them succeed as indicating a willingness to give them some mediatory functions for some indefinite period in the future. We pointed out that while we were willing to give them every assistance, we felt that if they received no answer or an equivocal answer from the Chinese Communists in the course of the next week, their usefulness will be largely at an end. He added that at least the committee was one device which could be used to attempt a political settlement. Jebb at once picked up and commented on the possible withdrawal of UN forces from Korea, which he characterized as a reestablishment of the status quo. We replied along the lines of Deptel 602 to show the incorrectness of that characterization. He did feel that possibility of withdrawal was an important element because it would be the next step after a ceasefire and the question would be how to convey the thinking along this line to the PRC. He suggested the possibility of a resolution in Committee I attempting to formulate the withdrawal principle. Laskey pressed strongly his feeling that we could not expect to negotiate a cease-fire until after an attack across the 38th parallel. If such an attack should come and we have the military strength to meet it, then the PRC would realize the costliness of a campaign and be willing to negotiate, but until then they have no real motive.

² Telegram 612, December 27, to New York informed the U.S. Mission that the comments of Chauvel, Jebb, and Entezam reflected British and French thinking that a CFM meeting should and would be held. The Department indicated that the U.S. position was that such a meeting should be held only if preliminary talks indicated a mutually acceptable basis which would make a meeting worthwhile. The Mission was instructed to attempt to dispel the idea that a CFM meeting was certain to be held or that, if held, Far Eastern questions would as a matter of course be on the agenda. (357.AD/12-2250)

Jebb and Chauvel felt that the initiative is now with the PRC and that there is little that the rest can do. They as well as the members of the group of three all showed a tendency to sit back and wait, although they realized that the first committee must meet on or about January 2 and the next order of business is the six power resolution.

We left it with all of them that we would keep in close touch during the next few days and we emphasized the importance in our view, with which Jebb agreed, of being ready for a meeting of the first committee almost at once in the event of a sharp military attack.

Delga 461. Re Entezam committee cease-fire proposal. Following is text message dated December 23 from Chou En-lai to Entezam. Committee at present does not plan release text to press.¹

"Peking, December 23, 1950, Mr. Nasrollah Entezam, President of the Fifth Session of the United Nations General Assembly, Lake Success.

The attitude of the Central Peoples Government of the Peoples Republic of China on the so-called "three-man committee for cease-fire in Korea" and the peaceful settlement of the Korean question is to be found in my statement issued on December 22. Besides being broadcast by the Hsiu Hua News Agency on the same date, the said statement is hereby transmitted by cable for your information.

"Chou En-lai, Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Central Peoples Government of the Peoples Republic of China, Peking, December 22, 1950.

"Statement by Chou En-lai, Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Central Peoples Government of the Peoples Republic of China on the resolution concerning the 'three-man committee for cease-fire in Korea' illegally adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on December 14, 1950.

¹The text of this message from Chou En-lai was included in the report of the Cease-fire Group to the First Committee, dated January 2, 1951 (U.N. document A/C.1/643).

"The General Assembly of the United Nations illegally adopted a resolution submitted by thirteen nations concerning a so-called cease-fire in Korea. This resolution provided for the establishment of a three-man committee, consisting of the President of the current session of the United Nations General Assembly, Entezam, the Indian delegate Rau, and the Canadian delegate Pearson, both appointed by him, to conduct talks to determine whether it is possible to arrange appropriate and satisfactory conditions for a cease-fire in Korea, and then to make recommendations to the United Nations General Assembly. With reference to this resolution, Chou En-lai, Minister for Foreign Affairs of the the Central Peoples Government, the Peoples Republic of China, issues the following statement:

'1. The representative of the Peoples Republic of China neither participated in nor agreed to the adoption of the resolution concerning the so-called "three-man committee for cease-fire in Korea" by the United Nations General Assembly. Prior to this, the Central Peoples Government of the Peoples Republic of China had repeatedly declared that the Central Peoples Government of the Peoples Republic of China would regard as illegal and null and void all resolutions on major problems, especially those concerning the major problems of Asia, which might be adopted by the United Nations without the participation and concurrence of the duly appointed delegates of the Peoples Republic of China. Therefore, the government of the Peoples Republic of China and its delegates are not prepared to make any contact with the above mentioned illegal "three-man committee".

'2. The Central Peoples Government of the Peoples Republic of China has always held and still holds that the hostilities in Korea should be speedily brought to an end. In order to end the hostilities in Korea, genuine peace must be restored in Korea, and the Korean people must have genuine freedom to settle their own problems. The reason why the hostilities in Korea have not yet been put to an end is precisely because of the fact that the United States Government has despatched troops to invade Korea and is continuing and extending its policies of aggression and war. As far back as the beginning of the hostilities in Korea, we here stood for the peaceful settlement and localization of the Korean problem. For this reason, the Government of the Peoples Republic of China and that of the USSR have repeatedly proposed that all foreign troops be withdrawn from Korea, and that the Korean people be left alone to settle the Korean problem themselves. However, the United States Government not only rejected such a proposal, but also rejected negotiations for the peaceful settlement of the Korean problem. When the invading troops of the United States arrogantly crossed the 38th Parallel, at the beginning of the month of October, the United States Government, recklessly ignoring warnings from all quarters and following the provocative crossing of the border by Syngman Rhee in June, thoroughly destroyed, and hence obliterated forever this demarcation line of political geography. In the later part of November, when the representative of the Peoples Republic of China was invited to take part in the discussion by the Security Council on the charge against United States aggression in Taiwan, he again submitted the proposal that the United States and other foreign troops be withdrawn from Korea, and that the people of South and North Korea be left alone to settle their domestic affairs. But the United Nations Security Council, under the domination of the United States, rejected this reasonable peace proposal from the Government of the Peoples Republic of China. From this it is evident that since the United States Government has from the very beginning refused to withdraw its troops, it has absolutely no sincerity in ending the hostilities in Korea, still less in letting the Korean people have genuine peace and freedom.

'3. This being the case, why does the American delegate, Mr. Austin, now favour an immediate cease-fire in Korea, and why does President Truman also express willingness to conduct negotiations to settle the hostilities in Korea? It is not difficult to understand that, when the American invading troops were landing at Inchon, crossing the 38th Parallel or pressing toward the Yalu River, they did not favour an immediate cease-fire and were not willing to conduct negotiations. It is only today when the American invading troops have sustained defeat, that they favour an immediate cease-fire and the conducting of negotiations after the cease-fire. Very obviously, they opposed peace yesterday, so that the United States might continue to extend her aggression; and they favour a cease-fire today, so that the United States may gain a breathing space and prepare to attack again, or at least hold their present aggressive position in preparation for further advance. What they care about is not the interests of the Korean people and the Asian peoples, nor those of the American people. They are only interested in how American imperialists can maintain their invading troops and aggressive activities in Korea, how they can continue to invade and occupy China's Taiwan and how they can intensify the preparation for war in the capitalist world. Therefore, the representative of MacArthur's headquarters said bluntly that they could accept a cease-fire only on a military basis and without any political conditions. This means that, all the status of aggression will remain the same after the cease-fire, so that they can fight again when they are prepared. Further, they could take this opportunity to declare the existence of a state of emergency and to prepare for mobilization in the United States, in Western Europe and Japan, thus driving the peoples of the United States, Western Europe and Japan down into the abyss of war. Is this not what Messrs. Truman, Acheson, Marshall and MacArthur are doing now? With reference to the socalled proposal for cease-fire first and negotiations afterwards, irrespective of the fact that the proposal by the twelve nations had neither been adopted by the Security Council nor by the United Nations General Assembly and irrespective of what countries are to be included in the negotiating conference, and even if all these had been agreed upon, the agenda and contents of the negotiation could still be discussed endlessly after the cease-fire. If the conference is not a conference of the legal Security Council or of the legal five power conferences, or is not affiliated to them, the US Government in the last resort can still manipulate its voting machine. Thus to discuss the cease-fire and start negotiations now on the basis of the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Korea and the settling of Korean domestic affairs by the Korean people themselves is to act hypocritically and would therefore suit the designs of the US Government, and hence cannot satisfy the sincere desire of the peace-loving peoples of the world. The three-man committee—a cease-fire on the spot—peace negotiations—launching of a huge offensive; this Marshall formula is not in the least unfamiliar to the Chinese people, because in 1946, General Marshall assisted Chiang Kai-shek in this way, repeatedly for a whole year, and in the end had to admit failure and leave. Will the people of China, who had learned this lesson in 1946 and later gained victory, fall into such trap today? No, the old trick of General Marshall will not work again in the United Nations.

'4. Moreover, the present issues are definitely not confined to the Korean problem. While the United States Government was engineering the hostilities in Korea, it despatched the Seventh Fleet to invade China's Taiwan and then bombed northeast China, fired on Chinese merchant vessels and extended its aggression in east Asia. Against all this, the Central Peoples Government of the Peoples Republic of China has repeatedly lodged charges with the United Nations. But under American domination, the majority in the United Nations has not only upheld American aggression against Korea and supported American invasion and occupation of Taiwan, the bombing of northeast China, but also rejected the three proposals submitted by our representative on the charge against the United States for armed aggression against Taiwan, and shelved the charge of United States aggression against China made by the delegate of the Soviet Union. Our representative was kept waiting for a long time and until the first committee of the United Nations General Assembly was indefinitely adjourned, he was not given a chance to speak.

This attitude which was taken by the majority of the United Nations under the domination of the Anglo-American bloc, obviously violates the United Nations Charter and its purposes. They are furthering rather than checking American aggression. They are undermining rather than defending world peace.

'What particularly arouses the world's indignation is that, in spite of the fact that during the past several months the United Nations held innumerable discussions on China or on important questions concerning China, the delegates of the Peoples Republic of China, who are the only representatives of the four hundred and seventy-five million people of China, are still being kept out of the doors of the United Nations whereas the representatives of a handful of the Chinag Kai-shek reactionary remnants are still being allowed to usurp the seats of the Chinese delegation in the United Nations. To such an extent the Chinese people have been slighted and insulted!

'Therefore, the Chinese people, who, impelled by righteous indignation, have risen to volunteer in resisting the United States and helping Korea, and thus protecting their homes and defending their country are absolutely reasonable and justified in so doing. The Chinese peoples' volunteers, who have been forced to take up arms side by side with the Korean peoples' army to resist the American aggressors, under the unified command of the government of the Korean

Democratic Peoples Republic, are fighting for their own existence, fighting to aid Korea and fighting for the peace of east Asia as well as the peace of the whole world.

'5. It must be pointed out that the proposal for a peaceful settlement of the Korean problem submitted by the majority of the delegates of the thirteen Asian and Arabian nations was originally based on their desire for peace, and this is understandable. But they have failed to see through the whole intrigue of the United States Government in supporting the proposal for a cease-fire first and negotiations afterwards, and therefore they have not seriously considered the basic proposals of the Chinese Government concerning the peaceful settlement of the Korean problem.

"The original thirteen-nation resolution was not wholly palatable to the United States Government, so it was separated into two resolutions. The first resolution, or the resolution providing for the so-called "three man committee for cease-fire in Korea", which is satisfactory to the United States, was, under pressure, given priority for discussion and was consequently adopted by the United Nations General Assembly. But the second resolution, or the resolution providing for a so-called "negotiating conference" "negotiating commission", with which the United States was either not satisfied, or not quite satisfied, was therefore shelved for the time being.

'The difference between these two resolutions was remarkably demonstrated by the attitude of the Philippine delegate. The Philippine delegate, who always follows in the footsteps of the United States, only agreed to the first resolution but withdrew from the second resolution. This trick of close cooperation displayed by the Philippines in the role of demanding a cease-fire and by the United States in the role supporting it has thus been exposed.

'From this fact itself, the lesson can be drawn that if the Asian and Arabian nations wish to gain genuine peace, they must free themselves from United States pressure and must abandon the "three man committee for cease-fire in Korea", and give up the idea of cease-fire first and negotiations afterwards.

'6. The Central Peoples Government of the Peoples Republic of China solemnly declares that the Chinese people eagerly hope that the hostilities in Korea can be settled peacefully. We firmly insist that, as a basis for negotiating for a peaceful settlement of the Korean problem, all foreign troops must be withdrawn from Korea, and Korea's domestic affairs must be settled by the Korean people themselves. The American aggression forces must be withdrawn from Taiwan, and the representatives of the Peoples Republic of China must obtain a legitimate status in the United Nations. These points are not only the justified demands of the Chinese people and the Korean people; they are also the urgent desire of all progressive public opinion throughout the world. To put aside these points would make it impossible to settle peacefully the Korean problem and the important problems of Asia.'"

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

[Washington,] December 26, 1950.

Subject: Korean Cease-Fire Efforts

Participants: Mr. Hume Wrong—Canadian Ambassador Dean Rusk—Assistant Secretary of State

Ambassador Wrong came in this afternoon to bring a message from the Minister of External Affairs Pearson concerning the Korean ceasefire efforts. He said that Mr. Pearson had been in touch with Nehru and Bajpai through Canadian High Commissioner Chipman in New Delhi. Mr. Chipman had reported that Panikkar had made little progress in their discussions in Peiping. Mr. Pearson asked Ambassador Wrong to inform us that the Indian Government is attempting to secure further information about Chinese policy and intentions. He said he doubted that the cease-fire group could accomplish anything now by direct communication with Peiping. Bajpai has said that the Chinese are not likely to be impressed by U.S. assurances of post-ceasefire discussions as these assurances are couched in language too vague to be persuasive. Mr. Pearson thought that New Delhi underestimates the difficulty in going beyond the American position in the face of Chinese fighting in Korea and in face of the Chinese attitude at Lake Success and Peiping. Nevertheless, Mr. Pearson thought that if the United States could be somewhat more specific in describing the subjects which, among others, could be included in post-cease-fire discussions, it would be more difficult for the Chinese to reject this offer, assuming, of course, that Formosa and recognition were to be mentioned. Mr. Pearson said that if the Americans cannot do this, the Chinese may reject both cease-fire and discussions on the grounds that the U.S. assurances were too vague to be worth anything. Although this Chinese position might be unjustified, it might not appear so to many other countries.

Mr. Pearson also said that the Chinese may reject any proposition made to them and may be entirely insincere in referring to negotiations; their basic agreement with the Russians may be to drive us out of Korea and to create as much confusion in the rest of the world as possible.

Finally, Mr. Pearson said he doubted whether we should expect the Chinese to isolate Korea from other Far Eastern issues, especially Formosa. He thinks we might go even further than we have gone in linking up general Far Eastern discussions with the cease-fire. As long as it is clear that nothing will be done until a cease-fire arrangement is actually effective, Mr. Pearson does not think that this would amount to blackmail or "appeasement".

I told Ambassador Wrong that we had taken the position that we are prepared to talk about anything with the appropriate parties following a cease-fire. This arises from our basic commitment to employ peaceful methods of settling disputes and differences. I said I doubted that a more detailed statement of our views on the agenda would help, and it could make the situation even worse. I pointed out, for example, that if we now made it clear that we would want to talk about Indo-China, Tibet, the treatment of American citizens and property in China, the dismemberment from China of Sinkiang, Inner Mongolia and Manchuria, and Chinese fifth columns in other countries in Asia, it would not improve the atmosphere in Peiping. We would not be willing to say on our own initiative that we would specifically discuss Formosa and recognition following a cease-fire because that would imply that we were ready to make concessions on those points. A failure to make concessions later would be looked upon as bad faith. I stated that under the present circumstances the Chinese are in position to establish a cease-fire, obtain a solution for Korea which would leave that country under enormous Communist pressure, and be admitted to the UN regardless of the U.S. position. It seemed to me that our possible assenting to all-out discussions is as forthcoming as we could be under the circumstances. In any event, a further statement from us specifically pointing to discussions on Formosa or Chinese recognition would appear to go beyond a mere willingness to negotiate and would become involved with substantive concessions in exchange for a cease-fire. I further pointed out to the Ambassador that it is beyond the realm of possibility that the Chinese Communists would make their own decision about a cease-fire on the basis of the vagueness or preciseness of the expression of our willingness to negotiate. Obviously, if they decide to deliver a major attack across the 38th parallel, as now seems inevitable, they will seize every flimsy pretext for presenting their action in the best possible propaganda light. But we should not confuse cause with pretext. I told the Ambassador that we would consider Mr. Pearson's views further and let him know if there were any change.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Lucius D. Battle, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State

[Washington,] December 27, 1950.

This morning the Secretary saw Mr. Jessup, Mr. Matthews, and Mr. Rusk and reported to them what took place at the meeting at Blair House last night. He said that in addition to himself and General Marshall, Secretary Snyder, General Bradley and Mr. Short were also present. He said the President wanted to discuss the situation in Korea, whether we could hold our position there, what we should do if we could not, etc.

The Secretary said that General Marshall mentioned to the President the meetings which had been held recently between the State Department and the Defense Department people and asked the President if he would like to attend. The President said that he would and Secretary Snyder indicated he would also like to come.

Mr. Rusk suggested that it might be best to bring the President into these meetings only when they were of specific interest to him or when the participants were ready to talk to him.

Mr. Acheson said that General Marshall had asked him to open the discussion last night. He had followed the line suggested in Mr. Rusk's paper on our future course in Korea.² He said that we were clear on our big objective. That objective is to take a stand against aggression on a collective security basis and retain that position as long as we could. He said that reverses did not warrant withdrawal. He pointed out that we were not hopelessly outnumbered in Korea and that the Chinese Communists had the burden of being on the offensive. The Secretary said that we should test out the Communists and see whether they had the vast power that they were supposed to have or whether they did not have this strong power.

Mr. Acheson said that the President agreed that we should not pull out of Korea and leave our friends there to be murdered. The Secretary said that we must consider, of course, how we could eventually disentangle ourselves from this situation. He pointed out that we had never intended to keep a large force there. He also mentioned the importance of not conducting a withdrawal which would result in a loss of these forces since they represented so large a part of our strength.

Mr. Acheson asked General Marshall about the directives which have been given to General MacArthur. He said he did not understand why we had taken the Third Division out of Japan and put it back in Korea when the defense of Japan was of primary importance under existing directives. General Marshall said that there had been so many directives issued in connection with the crisis in the Far East that he feared there was some confusion about them. He said that he thought all the directives should be reconsidered and rewritten as necessary.

Mr. Acheson said that it was agreed that we should get a complete restatement of the Korean problem for the President, saying what we want done, how to proceed, etc.

General Marshall said he was worried about Japan. He also indicated his concern that if air attacks started in Korea, it might be very difficult to get our troops out. The General also said that he thought we could get our troops back to a line farther South without using [losing?] our forces or being cut off from them. He said it was important that we have a real plan for this movement so that the Pentagon would know exactly where it was going at all times.

Mr. Jessup asked at this point if we were clear that we would accept a withdrawal of the United Nations forces if the Chinese Communists withdrew. Mr. Rusk said that we would and said this was included in the October 7 Resolution.

Mr. Acheson said that in the meeting last night, the Military had said that we probably would be able to hold at the Kum River and a line going East. He said it would take all of our forces out there to hold it however.

Mr. Rusk said that FE was worried because no effort was being made to improvise in this area. He said that if we got into the matter too far, we would be interfering with the Military Establishment in its operation in Korea. He said he did feel that there were things which could be done in that area which would help out. He mentioned the desirability of getting U.S. dependents out of Japan, which would cut down our commitments out there. He also mentioned the desirability of creating a civil defense organization in Japan. He also said that we should get SCAP so that it could be moved around easily. He said that Japanese police battalions could be organized and used in the defense of airfields against possible paratroop invasion.

Mr. Acheson suggested that we make a list of these things for the Pentagon and take it up with them, stating that we assume the Pentagon is doing these things.

Mr. Rusk agreed that this was a good idea. He also said that the Military Establishment was assuming that they could go no farther on the Japanese Peace Treaty in view of the situation out there. Mr. Jessup said that we must get this question out of the JCS and get the Secretaries of the two Departments to make a decision on the matter.

Mr. Rusk felt that we should give the JCS a clear chance to come through with their views before getting the problem to the Secretarial level. Mr. Acheson said there was nothing else we could do to get a cease-fire resolution. Mr. Rusk said that we had said as much as we could to the Peiping Government in the message sent through the Swedish Government.

Mr. Jessup suggested we consider the same message to the U.S.S.R. that we did to the Chinese Communists. He said it was possible that the Chinese Communists had not told the Russians about our message, and that there might be an additional value to having it go to them through a more direct channel.

Mr. Matthews asked what the Russians had to gain from a cease fire. Mr. Rusk said that if it were possible, although he doubted it, that the Russians were trying to restrain the various Communists, this might help.

Mr. Rusk pointed out that there had been no enemy air activity over Korea recently. He said there was a greater military capability here on the part of the United Nations troops than some of the U.S. military people seemed to think. He said it would be very bad for us to come out of Korea in defeat if there were any chance of our making a better stand.

Mr. Acheson went back to the meeting at Blair House last night and said that General Bradley was concerned over what would happen to the forces in Korea if war came. Mr. Acheson said he was asked whether the United Nations would pass a resolution condemning the Chinese Communists and asking them to withdraw if the Chinese Communists launched a great attack over the 38th parallel. Mr. Acheson said that he had replied that we thought that the United Nations would pass such a resolution if this attack were launched.

Mr. Acheson then said we must consider steps that we could take to bring the fighting to an end and permit us to get out of Korea.

Mr. Rusk said there were three ways of doing this:

(1) To win a military victory in Korea and stabilize the situation.

He said this was not within our capabilities.

(2) To make it in the interest of the Chinese Communists to accept some stabilization by making it so costly for them that they could not afford not to accept.

(3) To get out in defeat voluntarily or under pressure and then to continue our harassing tactics.

Mr. Rusk said that he preferred (2) above.

The Secretary asked whether if we intended to bring about (2) the Russians would bring in air and sea power. He said that if they wanted to deny us success initially they would want to now. Mr. Jessup said he doubted that they would bring in air and sea power locally unless they were willing to do it generally because this would set off a major war.

Mr. Rusk said that they could have dealt us a heavy blow by air attack during the evacuation and that they did not do so. He said that the blow could have destroyed any possibility we had of defending Japan. He said if they had wanted to start a general war, this would have been a good way to do it. Mr. Acheson said that the Pentagon was worried over a disaster of this nature and what might happen to our general situation if such a disaster occurred. Mr. Rusk pointed out that this same sort of thing could be done at any time in Europe. He said we took the risk in June that entry into Korea would lead to general war.

Mr. Jessup asked whether we had the air capabilities of knocking out both Port Arthur and Vladivostok, to which Mr. Rusk replied that we did not except by using the atom bomb.

Mr. Rusk said that we could get solidarity in the free world by holding in Korea until the Chinese Communists' intentions became clear. If they went into Indochina and their intent in Tibet became clear, we would undoubtedly have no difficulty in getting the British and French to stay with us.

Mr. Rusk said our other alternative was to pull out of Korea, let the Chinese Communists get a seat in the United Nations and possibly withdraw the Seventh Fleet from Formosa. He said that he felt that some continuation of the Korean operation was necessary for the rest of the world to see what they are up against.

Mr. Jessup asked whether we should bomb the power plants at the Yalu River if the Chinese Communists crossed the 38th parallel in great numbers. Mr. Rusk said that he thought that if a major attack occurred, we should attack any targets anywhere in Korea. He said that they had thought in FE that we should wait and see whether we had any bargaining position for a cease fire if we left the power plants alone. He said the Military had told him that it would take three weeks of conventional bombing to destroy the plants.

Mr. Matthews said that he did not think the power plants gave us any leverage on a cease fire. Mr. Rusk said that he thought it probably did not either.

Mr. Acheson said that the matter of additional guard divisions moving into Korea [Japan?] was not mentioned at Blair House last night.

Mr. Rusk again expressed his fear that we were not exploiting the situation as much as we should. He said that perhaps we should get General Marshall and see what could be done. Mr. Jessup said that he would think that the General would want the decisions made here rather than in the field by General MacArthur.

The Secretary suggested that we take the paper which Mr. Rusk had prepared and go over it again to decide what we wanted to accomplish, how to go about it, how much time it would take and then discuss with the Military how we moved ahead.

Subject: Swedish Approach to Chinese

Participants: Mr. Erik Boheman—Swedish Ambassador Dean Rusk—Assistant Secretary of State

The Swedish Ambassador called on me at noon today to tell me that Ambassador Hammerstrom had delivered to Vice Foreign Minister Chang the views which we had suggested to Mr. Boheman on December 22. Mr. Hammerstrom reported that he was "coldly received". He said that Chang asked a few questions about the proposition of the cease-fire commission, that Chang referred to the speech which had been made by Chu-Teh outlining the Chinese position, that Chang had also mentioned the six points contained in Chou-en-lai's recent statement. Mr. Hammerstrom had the impression that he would probably hear again from Chang but that he anticipated that Chang's reply would be in the form of additional questions.

Mr. Boheman said that he would let us know if his Government received anything further. I thanked him and asked him to thank his Government for their cooperation.

SECRET NIE-12 [Washington,] December 27, 1950.

NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE ESTIMATE*

CONSEQUENCES OF THE EARLY EMPLOYMENT OF CHINESE NATIONALIST FORCES IN KOREA

Assumption: That hostilities have not spread beyond the borders of Reference is to an address made at a mass meeting in Peking on December 24, held to celebrate the recent North Korean and Chinese victories in Korea and to welcome the Chinese Peace Delegation returning from the Second World Peace Congress in Warsaw; the text of the address is printed in People's China, January 16, 1951, Supplement, p. 8.

^{*}The intelligence organizations of the Department of State, the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force participated in the preparation of this estimate, and State, Army, and Navy concur in it. A dissent by the intelligence organization of the Department of the Air Force is appended as an annex. This paper is based on information available on 23 December. [Footnote in the source text.]

Korea at the time of a decision to employ Chinese Nationalist forces in Korea.

- 1. The Chinese Nationalists have offered a task-force of 33,000 troops for service in Korea and possibly could provide a greater number without jeopardizing the security of Taiwan. Nationalist troops have undergone extensive and prolonged training, but due to inept leadership and poor living conditions there is some question of their morale. The majority of Nationalist troops on Taiwan have come from the more temperate zones of China, and a contingent for Korea probably would require training and some re-equipment before being committed to combat in cold-weather operations. In other respects, the initial Nationalist contingent for Korea would be wellequipped and could be transported to Korea in fourteen days. The Nationalist troops are experienced and familiar with Chinese Communist tactics. Nationalist units should perform comparatively efficiently under good leadership and adequate supervision, but might be susceptible to Communist propaganda and suffer a substantial number of defections if permitted to operate independently in areas beyond the immediate tactical control of UN commanders.
- 2. The presence or the absence of Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea in the limited numbers estimated to be available within the immediate future would not be a major factor affecting the ability of UN forces to establish and hold a defensive line across the peninsula against numerically vastly superior Chinese Communist forces.
- 3. If a protracted defense of a beachhead is undertaken, the presence of Chinese Nationalist forces could make a substantial contribution, provided they were operating under good leadership and adequate supervision.
- 4. Whatever the military outcome in Korea, the employment of Chinese Nationalists there would, in the eyes of other nations, further identify the US with the Chinese Nationalists and would constitute a moral commitment for continuing US support of the Chinese Nationalist regime. In addition, the employment of Chinese Nationalist forces in Korea would immediately raise difficult problems involving the feasibility of continuing the US policy of neutralization of Taiwan, particularly with respect to the employment of Nationalist naval and air forces other than in Korea and in Korean waters.

[†]Note: This estimate considers only the consequences of the immediate employment of Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea in the present situation and does not deal with the consequences of eventual employment of Chinese Nationalist troops either in Korea, in later and changed circumstances, or on the Chinese mainland as part of a larger undertaking. An estimate (NIE-10) is in preparation on the more general question. [Footnote in the source text.]

5. A majority of UN nations would probably reject a US proposal to use Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea. There is a general apprehension that the employment of Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea would give impetus or at least provide the pretext for increased militancy on the part of Communist China. This militancy would increase the danger of a general war with Communist China, which in turn might develop into a global war. In addition, the Western European nations would feel strongly that the US was jeopardizing the first-priority task of defense of the European continent by becoming involved in protracted hostilities in Asia. The employment of the Chinese Nationalists would alienate other Asiatic countries, which consider the Chinese Nationalists to be reactionary, politically incompetent, and already repudiated by their own people. Unilateral US action in using Chinese Nationalist troops would intensify these feelings.

6. The use of Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea would remove whatever chance might remain of a political solution of the Korean conflict. Although it is evident that Communist China strongly supports general Soviet strategic objectives, this support might become even stronger as a result of the use of Chinese Nationalist forces in Korea.

7. The USSR would probably welcome a unilateral US decision to use Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea as: (a) further embroiling the US in hostilities with Communist China without engaging the USSR; (b) dividing the US from its allies; and (c) providing plausibility for international Communist propaganda concerning alleged US military aggressions and support of reactionary regimes.

Annex

1. The Director of Intelligence, U.S.A.F., dissents in NIE-12.

2. In general, this estimate has emphasized the military and political disadvantages of the employment of Chinese Nationalist forces in Korea, and has failed to point out adequately the advantages which would accrue to the U.S.-U.N. campaign in Korea by the use of such forces, Specific points are as follows:

a. The discussions in this paper appear to have been governed by the acceptance of approximately 33,000 Nationalist troops as being essentially the total number available for employment in Korea. This office estimates this number to be far less than the total available.

b. The estimate does not give sufficient consideration to the fact that Chinese Nationalist Forces offer the only readily available force for major augmentation of U.N. forces in Korea. In fact, such insufficient consideration fails to give planners grounds for looking upon the availability of these forces as a factor influencing the determination as to whether or not a beachhead should be held at all.

c. Introduction of a large number of Chinese Nationalist troops could make a substantial contribution by providing much-needed infantry to the U.S.-U.N. campaign in Korea, if a beachhead were

d. This office does not believe that the reactions of all the various Asiatic nations to the employment of Nationalist troops in Korea can be assessed with sufficient accuracy to warrant the conclusion that these Asiatic nations will be irrevocably opposed to the utilization of these anti-communist forces. In this respect, more deference is paid in this paper to the attitudes of the governments, or majorities in the respective countries, than to the elements which fully recognize the Communist menace and would be encouraged by this new opposition to Communism's advance. It is not beyond the bounds of possibility that even in Europe, public opinion might learn to applaud firm opposition, whether it be in Europe or in Asia, and in fact might prefer the fight to be made in Asia.

e. The estimate indicates that the use of Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea would eliminate any remaining chance of an immediate political solution of the Korean conflict. This dissent in no way is intended to contradict this conclusion. However, it appears to this office that the law of diminishing returns has set in with respect to the probability of a satisfactory immediate political conclusion. The discussion in the paper does not warrant a sound conclusion as to whether or not utilization of Nationalist troops would prejudice or aid an eventual political solution.

- 3. The estimate implies that the employment of Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea would give impetus to, or provide the pretext for, increased militancy on the part of Communist China. It is reasonable that any increase in militancy, if such is possible (other than against Hong Kong), would be governed more by Chinese military capabilities and their own time-table than by any provocation which might result from the employment of Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea.
- 4. There appears to be insufficient data to justify the conclusion in paragraph 7 of this estimate that "the USSR would probably welcome a unilateral U.S. decision to use Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea."
 - 5. This office would revise NIE-12 as indicated below:
- a. Reference p. 1, par. 2. Revise as follows: "There is no immediate crisis in Korea requiring Chinese Nationalist troops to prevent a disaster, but this opportunity to begin the dynamic exploitation of any anti-Communist forces whose commitment could have a favorable effect on the Korean and possibly the entire Far Eastern situation should be given careful consideration. The Chinese Nationalist forces on Formosa provide the only visible means for such exploitation. The presence or absence of Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea in the limited numbers estimated to be available within the immediate near future and later would not be an important a major factor affecting the ability of UN forces to establish and hold a defensive line across the peninsula against numerically vastly superior Chinese Communist forces, unless the US-UN introduced reinforcements directly."

b. Reference p. 1, par. 3. Add at end of paragraph as follows: "An important requirement in Korea is for additional infantry. By using Nationalist infantry as a screening force, present UN forces in Korea could be used more effectively as a striking force. The defense of a beach-head requires a mobile reserve which can counterattack quickly at the points of greatest enemy pressure."

c. Reference par. 4. Amend first sentence and add a new sentence as follows: "Whatever the military outcome in Korea, the employment of Chinese Nationalists there would, in the eyes of certain other nations at the present time, further identify the US with the Chinese Nationalists and would constitute a degree of moral commitment for continuing US support of the Chinese Nationalist regime. At the same time this act would identify U.S. intentions to utilize anti-Communist forces within its capabilities, and as such might have a positive psychological effect of potentially great value upon anti-Communist forces."

d. Reference par. 5. Revise as follows: At the present time a majority of UN nations would probably reject a US proposal to use Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea. There is a general apprehension that the employment of Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea would give impetus, or at least provide the pretext, for increased militancy on the part of Communist China. Despite the repeated assurance of the US-UN to respect the Manchurian borders and the maintenance of the embargo against Chinese Nationalist operations on the mainland, Chinese Communist militancy has already reached a high level in committing the Fourth Field Army, which represents the best available Chinese Communist military force. It is difficult to see any new form which this militancy could take (other than in Hong Kong). This militancy would increase Therefore, there probably would be little increase in the danger of a general war with Communist China, which danger in turn might develop into a global war already exists. This, too, probably will have little direct effect upon the development of a global war. At least in the beginning, the Western European nations would might feel strongly that the US was jeopardizing the first-priority task of defense of the European continent by becoming involved a continued involvement in protracted hostilities in Asia. Later however, they might come to appreciate the determination of the US to take constructive action in an area of vital importance in the struggle against Soviet directed Communist aggression. The employment of the Chinese Nationalists would might alienate those elements in certain other Asiatic countries, which who consider the Chinese Nationalists to be reactionary, politically incompetent, and already repudiated by their own people. On the other hand, the employment of the Chinese anti-Communist forces could hearten the anti-Communist elements of all Asiatic countires and increase their will to resist Communist aggression. Unilateral US action in using Chinese Nationalist troops would intensify these feelings. In addition if the other nations should determine that it is necessary to make a stand in Korea, they will be more amenable when they recognize this as a method of relieving them of the necessity of providing more forces themselves."

e. Reference par. 6. Amend as follows: "At a time of delicate negotiations the use of Chinese Nationalist troops in Korea would remove whatever change might remain of might have prejudiced an immediate political solution of the Korean conflict deriving from those negotiations. Although it is evident that Communist China strongly supports general Soviet strategic objectives, this support might become even stronger as a result of the use of Chinese Nationalist forces in Korea. This would not necessarily have precluded, however, a later political settlement. It was, therefore, important that a decision to use Nationalist troops be deferred until the probabilities of obtaining an acceptable immediate political solution were gone. However, Chinese Communist intervention on a massive scale is already a fact, and an immediate political solution deriving from present negotiations now appears to have reached a point of diminishing returns.

probably welcome a unilateral - - - reactionary regime."

SECRET PRIORITY New York, December 27, 1950—6: 18 p. m. [Received December 27—8: 05 p. m.]

Delga 464. Re Korea: Following is report of Ross' conversations today with persons indicated.

Grafstrom (Sweden) telephoned to ask how we viewed present situation and whether we had decided what course we were going to follow in First Committee. Ross replied we were of course giving most careful thought to situation confronting us in light Peiping attitude toward cease-fire group and its proposals and were in closest touch with Department on these matters. Said it would be most helpful to have benefit Grafstrom's thinking. Indicated our understanding present status cease-fire group as given by Riddell yesterday.

Expressing earnest hope we would keep him very closely informed so that he would have time consult his government and get instructions, Grafstrom went on to observe he did not think it would be desirable for cease-fire group to attempt any new approaches. Said he thought very little if anything to hope for along cease-fire tack. He said of course Sweden would vote for six-power resolution but that he and his colleagues in Swedish delegation had been considering possibility of new resolution. He subsequently sent us, on understanding it was entirely confidential and personal, text quoted below of outline for such resolution. He was informed we would of course keep in closest touch with him and inform him our definitive views soon as possible.

Text of Grafstrom memorandum:

"(1) The responsibility for continued fighting rests upon the authorities commanding those troops which attack the UN forces during their fulfillment of the task given them in conformity with the Assembly resolution.

(2) On the same authorities rests the responsibility for the non-fulfillment of this task as well as the fact that the reconstruction commission may not be able, for the time being, to carry out its work.

(3) It is recalled that according to Articles 2, 5 of the Charter, every member shall refrain from giving assistance to any state against which the UN is taking preventive or enforcement action and that, consequently, a government which claims the right to represent a member state is likewise subject to this obligation.

(4) The GA maintaining the aims declared in the Assembly resolution recommends the member states not to recognize any political changes concerning Korea brought about in opposition to the principles of the Assembly resolution.

(5) The question of Korea should be maintained on the agenda."

Sunde (Norway) came in at his request and inquired our views and decisions in much same sense as Grafstrom and was given same response. He said he thought Norwegian attitude was very well summed up in sentence which he quoted from article in last week's Nation as follows: "We should learn to distinguish between processes of give and take which are essentials of all negotiations and on other hand appeasement in the Munich sense which involved buying an illusory security by giving away someone else's freedom." He said this rather exactly reflected general feeling of Norwegian Government and people. Asked to elaborate, he said that as matter of background, Norwegian Government had been very much in favor of negotiations since it was quite possible there may have been misunderstanding on both sides which could be clarified by negotiations. Further, he said he had thought great mistake had been made not to seat Chinese Communists last spring. He said he thought Russians had done everything in their power to prevent this. Said they were shrewd politicians and that it is not conceivable they would have committed the "blunders" if they had really wanted Chinese Communists in UN.

Sunde went on to say situation had of course now changed in view of Chinese Communists' attitude and insolent response to approaches of cease-fire group. He said he definitely was not in favor of seating Chinese Communists as condition of cease-fire. Said with regard to Formosa there was nothing in international law, in his opinion, which forbade US from intervening in favor of government which it recognized. He agreed with regard to matters such as Formosa and Chinese representation, aggression could not be rewarded.

Sunde said big question in his mind was whether US wanted or intended withdraw its forces from Korea. Ross replied that it seemed quite clear that UN would not wish voluntarily to withdraw UN forces from Korea or abandon objectives of unified, independent and democratic Korea.

Sunde went on to say that since we were not in position to give him our definite views today he would express his own assumption. It seemed very clear to him that in present situation US would want to proceed soon as possible with six-power resolution with strengthening amendments. Asked what sort of amendments he would consider as strengthening amendments, Sunde, emphasizing that he was speaking personally, replied he felt note would have to be taken of defiance of cease-fire group, that aggression of Chinese Communists would have to be condemned, and, of course, withdrawal provision of six-power resolution retained.

Asked whether he thought there should be any further strengthening provisions such as, for example, request to members to assist in repelling aggression, Sunde indicated he personally would find no difficulty with this, that such action with regard to Chinese Communist aggression would be analogous to SC action of June 27 with regard to NK aggression.

Sunde urged we let him know soon as possible what our decisions are so that he will have opportunity consult his government and avoid making last minute telephone calls to his FonMin.

Jamali (Iraq) at lunch expressed following views: He said that from beginning of Chinese Communist intervention in Korea he had felt it was essential to give them rope enough to hang themselves. For this reason he attached great importance to element of willingness to negotiate on outstanding FE issues after cessation of hostilities. For this reason he had felt it mistake to separate into two parts original draft of Asian resolution. This having been done he felt that Chinese Communists had been given no inducement (negotiations) to accept cease-fire. Resolution having been separated he thought it would have been better to pass second resolution calling for negotiations as extra length of rope.

Ross stated our views concerning future discussions after cessation of hostilities and called attention to fact that Chinese Communists had apparently chosen method of force rather than peaceful settlement, and pointing out in this connection Chinese Communists' unwillingness enter into real contact with established UN authority, he asked Jamali's views in light of tone and content of Chou En-lai's statements in reply cease-fire group overtures. Agreeing that Chou En-lai's statement did not seem to indicate real desire for peaceful settlement, Jamali said he viewed present situation as follows: first, it was essential that we not allow situation to deteriorate into first-class open conflict between US and China. Second, he considered it essential that we not allow US or UN to be in position of cutting rope that would hang Chinese Communists. He said we must remain true to Charter and exhaust every effort of peaceful settlement.

Asked how we would go about this in terms of parliamentary situation in First Committee, in particular his attitude toward six-power resolution, for example, Jamali said he thought that in order accomplish purposes he had in mind in light of Chou En-lai's reply, it was necessary contemplate entirely new resolution. Such resolution in general terms, he said, should be appeal set forth in terms of ultimatum. Asked how he would develop this, he said he had in mind resolution which would make one last appeal for cessation hostilities, which would indicate a willingness to discuss outstanding FE issues with Chinese Communists after cessation hostilities, and which finally, having given Chinese Communists this last chance, would make clear that if they turned down once more appeal for cessation hostilities despite assurances to discuss other matters thereafter, they would have to bear full responsibility and consequences of their refusal. If they did in fact refuse, Jamali said next step would be perfectly clear to everyone. Chinese Communists would have to be condemned as aggressors and active steps would have to be taken immediately by UN to combat the aggression.

Jamali said Rau had called meeting of Asian group last Sunday night.¹ Seven members of group attended, including India, Egypt, Iraq, Pakistan and Burma. Neither Iran nor any other Arab state was represented. At this meeting action along lines indicated by Jamali was apparently discussed. From Jamali's report it seemed fairly clear Rau was taking his familiar line re Formosa and Chinese representation. Jamali said he had stood fast against Rau and against paying reward for aggression. He had insisted, he said, that it should be made clear that negotiations on outstanding FE issues should take place only after cease-fire had been put into effect. Said he had also taken line with Rau that if UN stood fast in Korea Chinese Communists might be able to push UN out of Korea but then they would certainly lose any chance they might otherwise have of getting through negotiations Formosa or Chinese seat in UN.

Jamali said it was agreed at Sunday night's meeting that Rau would get in touch with us in order determine our attitude toward future negotiations and that he would also get in touch with Chinese Communists in order to determine whether assurance of future negotiations would induce them to cease-fire. Rau was then supposed to report back to Asian group. Jamali was surprised to learn Rau had not gotten in touch with us. He was in a mood to burn Rau up and find out why Rau had not carried out decision of group but agreed not to do this for moment. He asked us to let him know at earliest possible moment our views concerning new resolution of type he outlined which we promised to do. He said he did not have any very strong ideas about sponsorship of such resolution but he thought that psychologically and politically there was great deal to be said for such resolution being sponsored by Asian group.

Fawzi Bey (Egypt) reports that Asian group will meet tomorrow (Thursday) or at latest following day to consider what should be done about second Asian resolution (negotiations). In considering this resolution they will consider interrelationship of all three pending resolutions, namely, six-power, Soviet, and Asian resolution. He said it was very important to consider our basic attitudes and what we are prepared to have UN do. Arrangements have been made for lunch with Fawzi tomorrow before Asian group meeting.

Riddell (Canada) reports this afternoon that cease-fire group met this morning and that in fact they are just marking time for moment, (awaiting result apparently of some contact made through Delhi). He thought preparation their report would take place actively over weekend, anticipating they would make report to First Committee next Wednesday. He said they do not contemplate anything other than straightforward, factual report, although he said they might decide certain amount explanation would be necessary. (This sounded a little like Rau). He said group had really not considered question its future status. Although they did not want close door and would of course remain available, he did not think any member of group felt there was very much further for them to do.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Lucius D. Battle, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State

[Washington,] December 28, 1950.

Mr. Acheson spoke to General Marshall this morning about a suggestion which the General had made at the meeting at Blair House on Tuesday night. The suggestion was that the President attend the meetings which the Department is having with the Military and with the JCS.

Mr. Acheson said that he had some reservations about this suggestion and said that the NSC had, in the past, become a rather large meeting which resembled a town meeting and he feared if we had the President and other members of the Cabinet attending the meetings between the Department and the NME [Department of Defense] that we would get into the same situation we had been in before with the NSC. General Marshall agreed with the Secretary that this would be unwise.

The Secretary said that what we should try to do was to get to the place where the NSC became a place for real discussion and not just a meeting for approval of papers, etc. He felt that we should get the NSC so that the meetings were more working meetings.

General Marshall then mentioned a paper which he had sent over yesterday to the Department which consisted of some recommendations made by the JCS for a new directive to General MacArthur.² General Marshall said that he did not want to hold this up too long as the JCS were recommending this to the President and he felt he should not delay in acting on the JCS recommendations.

During the conversation, General Marshall said that he was aware of the important political implications of the draft directive to MacArthur and wanted to get the Secretary's wisdom on it but that he felt that it was essential that we move as quickly as possible on it.

Mr. Lovett called Mr. Acheson today regarding the draft directive and memorandum sent over yesterday by General Marshall to the Department. He said that the paper was not originally supposed to have gone to the President for a decision but what they were trying to do was to bring up to date all instructions issued to General MacArthur so that they would be in one place and not strung out in a great many telegrams.

Mr. Lovett said that the covering memorandum was somewhat colored by the fact that General MacArthur had asked for four more divisions and for the authority to use the Chinese Nationalists. He said that he would not be able to hold if he did not have these additional forces. Mr. Lovett said that what they were trying to do was to give the General some order of procedure and tell him that, in the opinion of the JCS, the time had come for withdrawal.

Mr. Lovett said that he did not like the memorandum because of the following points:

(1) First, it served notice that the "jig" was up.

(2) It was a mistake to tell General MacArthur to evacuate ROK divisions. He said that the ROK understood that it was fighting for its very life and that withdrawal of their troops would be widely misunderstood in South Korea.

(3) He had some question as to how the prisoners should be handled. He said that turning them loose in Korea to re-form would be dangerous. It was uncertain as to whether they should be evacuated.

Subject: Use of UN Aircraft over the Manchurian Border

Participants: Mr. H. A. Graves, Counselor, British Embassy

Mr. T. L. Perkins, CA

Mr. Graves called yesterday to give orally some British views on the question of "hot pursuit" by UN planes of hostile aircraft over the Manchurian border. He left a paper (copy attached), which he emphasized was not a formal document but only an aid in reporting the views he had given. Mr. Graves said that he was merely reporting on a research finding which would be of interest, particularly as to Sir Eric Beckett's comments on simpler motives which might be used as a basis for pursuit.

CONFIDENTIAL

ORAL COMMUNICATION

Arising out of a consideration of a proposal to allow a limited pursuit of hostile aircraft over the Manchurian border the doctrine of hot pursuit came under examination by Sir Eric Beckett, Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office. Sir Eric also consulted the Legal Advisers to the Canadian Department of External Affairs and the French Foreign Office.

The three Legal Advisers found themselves in agreement that the doctrine of hot pursuit is in no way applicable to the question of pursuit in the air over the Manchurian border. Sir Eric Beckett pointed out, however, that, from the purely legal angle, there do exist good grounds which could, where necessary, be invoked for the pursuit of aircraft across the border in the circumstances considered by the American authorities. The first of these grounds might be that, since the United Nations collective Police Force is engaged on a mission and is being obstructed by force in carrying out that mission, this international Police Force is legally entitled to take any action in any place which may be necessary to enable it to complete its task, and to protect itself from attacks in doing so. The second ground, which Sir Eric Beckett feels to be an even simpler legal reason on which to base a crossing of the Manchurian frontier, should it be desired that United Nations aircraft should cross it, is that while it is a principle of international law that frontiers should be inviolable, the right of any state to demand the observance of the inviolability of its own frontier entirely depends on that state observing the same principles and not sending or allowing any armed force to cross its frontiers into the territory of another state.

Quite apart from political considerations, the Legal Adviser does not, for the reasons given, consider that the invocation of the doctrine of hot pursuit would be at all applicable in the circumstances, though there might be other grounds that could be invoked to support action should this at some later stage be considered necessary.

Ambassador Wrong brought in the attached memorandum this afternoon. He said it had been sent down from Ottawa and was an attempt on their part to get the situation in perspective. I think you may be interested in glancing through it.

I told him that the difficulty I saw in their paper was that they wanted to maintain the principles of the UN but at the same time they wanted to be very slow about calling Communist China aggressive. I wondered if these two were compatible. Hume said he personally recognized this and felt if the Chinese came south of the 38th parallel there would be very little choice anyone would have and that they would have to be called aggressors.

Korea: Action in the United Nations

Events have moved fast since the beginning of this month. The military situation in Korea appears to be becoming somewhat stabilized and it would seem as if there is now a good chance that a position in Southern Korea can be held more or less indefinitely. The General Assembly has suspended action on the six-power resolution and has appointed a committee to discuss the possibility of a ceasefire in Korea. It had been generally agreed that this committee must be given ample time to try to accomplish its purpose.

Decisions as to future action in the United Nations must be taken in the light of global strategy and of the present balance of armed forces between the Soviet world and the democratic world. Given determination by the democratic world, time is on our side and we should, therefore, play for time so long as we can do so without appearing to deny our obligations under the United Nations Charter. If, despite all our efforts, the Soviet Union and China should precipitate a war, it is essential that the democratic nations should be united in their resistance to aggression and this end would be more difficult to achieve unless there had been sustained common efforts to avert a catastrophe. The door should therefore be left open until the last possible moment for a settlement with the Chinese Communists by negotiation, and every opportunity for discussion of the issues with Communist China should be explored.

The principles of the United Nations Charter must be maintained but any action taken by the United Nations to cope with the aggression in the Far East should be decided primarily in the light of the main threat to these principles in other parts of the world, particularly in Europe.

The events of the past few months have demonstrated that the leaders of the Soviet Union are prepared to embark on policies which involve a grave risk of precipitating a general war. They may well have been encouraged to take these risks by their estimate of the present relative weakness of the forces which might be arrayed against them.

In these circumstances, the acceleration of defensive rearmament programmes will shorten the period of acute danger but will make the danger during that period even more acute. With China on the march and all of Asia striking out on new paths, the strengthening of the free world which is now taking place may provoke the leaders of the Soviet Union to strike within the next few months before our defences reach the point where the Soviet leaders can no longer believe in the possibility of an easy victory in Europe and Asia.

It would therefore appear that the paramount consideration which the free nations of the world must take into account in determining their policy during the next twelve months' period of increasing strength is the necessity of doing nothing which might increase the danger of the Soviet Union precipitating a general war during this period. This means that our diplomacy must be wise and unprovocative, and that, in playing for time in which to get stronger, we must continue to be as conciliatory as possible. We shall have to make up our minds which positions are, in terms of our global strategy, essential and on which we stand firm, and where, on the other hand, we may have to accept rebuffs and local reverses.

Applying these general considerations to the situation in Korea it would seem to be unwise to decide in advance at what point it might become necessary for the United Nations to name Communist China as an aggressor. In order to leave the door open for negotiations, the United Nations has so far deliberately and wisely refrained from naming Communist China an aggressor. The United Nations should continue this careful course as long as possible.

At some point, it may become impossible for the United Nations not to name Communist China an aggressor. However, before the United Nations is asked to make such a decision, the nations principally concerned should first agree on the proposals for action which they would wish to put before the United Nations after a resolution branding Communist China as an aggressor had been adopted.

Even now a war with the Soviet Union is not inevitable. The risks of war during the next year or so, however, will be great. After that period, the strength of the free world, although still less than that of the Soviet Union, should be sufficient to deter the leaders of the Soviet Union from precipitating war. The uneasy equilibrium thus established may then make possible the working out of a modus vivendi with the Soviet Union.

There is possibility, however, that threatened attack will not occur prior to submission by Entezam group of its report and consideration thereof by First Comite at meeting now contemplated for Jan 3. Under these circumstances Dept believes USUN shid take fol position on consultation with other dels and in Comite:

1. If there is strong demand by Asian group to go through exercise of adopting 12-Power res, Dept wld acquiesce therein so long as (a) res expressly provides that meeting of proposed comite is dependent upon prior agreement on cease-fire and (b) composition of proposed comite is satisfactory. We wld regard as satisfactory a provision in res to effect that membership of comite shld be appointed by Pres of GA subject to confirmation by GA and understanding that on issues affecting China, CPR shld be represented.

2. We think 6-Power res shid be adopted with suitable modifications to make it reflect factual situation at time of adoption. Under hypothesis that Chi attack has not occurred, we wild be willing have 12-Power res adopted before 6-Power res and perhaps allow reasonable period to elapse between the two so that there cld be no complaint that Asian efforts had not been given reasonable opportunity to

New York, December 28, 1950—6:39 p. m. [Received December 28—7:48 p. m.]

Delga 465. Re Korea—Indochina. Following is report of Ross' conversations with Lacoste (France) and Fawzi (Egypt) today. In both cases conversations on our side were essentially personal and exploratory in order to draw out thinking of others rather than selling any line of our own.

Lacoste came in at his request for exchange of views in light of his recent visit to Paris. After discussing French views concerning Brussels conference which are undoubtedly familiar to Department, he said that French he saw in Paris did not have very many thoughts about current Korean situation. They professed to be completely in dark concerning military situation; they supposed there were four alternatives: (a) withdrawal altogether; (b) hold on at 38th parallel; (c) withdrawal to two beachheads (Inchon and Pusan); or (d) one beachhead (Pusan). They did not know which of these alternatives should be adopted either from military or political viewpoint. Generally they hoped very much we would not get involved even in limited war with China.

Lacoste then proceeded at his suggestion to give very gloomy analysis of situation in FE as he saw it. In this analysis he talked great deal about situation in Indochina in relation to Korea, emphasizing former much more heavily (he in fact several times turned conversation back to IC away from current situation in UN re Korea). He said so far as Korea concerned it was obvious that best available US forces were immobilized there. Best that could be hoped for would be to punish Chinese to some extent but that this would not appear to be very much relative to vast manpower resources of China. With regard to IC he had somewhat similar view. It did not appear to him that IC could be held very long against ChiCom manpower and material resources if ChiCom's decided give full-scale support to IC Communists. If IC fell he was quite certain that rest SE Asia (Nepal, Burma, Thailand, Indonesia) would fall very quickly to Communists and in turn India would not be far behind. This would mean fundamentally important loss sources of rubber, tin, sugar, petroleum, and other raw materials. US for six months past had been bearing major and highly disproportionate share of burden in Korea; France, however, had borne major share of burden in IC for last five years. Half of France's military budget was devoted to IC defense. They had been losing annually in IC flower of their officer corps at as fast rate as they could turn out officers at St. Cyr. Economic institutions such as the Banque de L'Indo-Chine had been smart enough to withdraw most their assets; there was not particular economic stake left for France in IC. Neither was there a political stake, France having signed that away in treaty with Associated States. They were therefore staying in IC only to hold line against advance of Communism throughout SE Asia and in order not to run out on Indochinese who had thrown in their lot with French and free world.

Lacoste observed that Moscow must be very pleased with situation we now find ourselves in IC and Korea. He also observed that in retrospect he felt we had probably made great mistake to go into Korea at end of June. He said when he was in Japan following 1945 he had talked with great many our military and diplomatic people and it had been his understanding that Korea was not strategic necessity to protect Japan. In light of circumstances as they have developed since end of June he wondered whether it would not have been wiser for us to have denounced NK aggression, to have taken that aggression as basis for mobilization of free world against Communist aggression but to have refrained from going back into Korea.

In view of intense gloom of Lacoste's presentation Ross asked whether Lacoste drew conclusion from his remarks that we should get out of Korea and IC as soon as we could. Lacoste hedged somewhat in response. He said we should examine very carefully whether there were any reasonable chance of holding line in IC. If so then we should probably try to hold on as long as we could. France, he said, could not possibly do this alone without very substantial help from US. It might perhaps be not altogether unfair to draw inference from all of Lacoste's remarks that we should in effect beat a strategic retreat from Korea in order to support more fully Indochinese resistance to Communist aggression as well as husbanding our resources for defense in other areas.

On other hand Lacoste recognized importance of UN and of preserving its unity and integrity to maximum possible degree as an instrument which could be a very effective one for free world in resisting Communist aggression.

With regard to current parliamentary situation in UN Lacoste's principal concern seemed to be that we should avoid participating [precipitating] a crisis before we are ready to meet it. He seemed to assume that we would consider it essential at early date to name ChiCom's as aggressors and he personally indicated that he was fully prepared to accept this as well as further steps such as economic sanctions. In giving this indication it is probable, however, that he was not reflecting views of his government nor of Chauvel; in fact he gave some indication that Chauvel's mind was running in direction of some middle course which on one hand would be perhaps somewhat stronger than six-power resolution, but on other hand perhaps not so strong as to name ChiCom's explicitly as aggressors. In context of this part of conversation Lacoste observed that he thought we would have great deal difficulty with British in getting them go along with naming of ChiCom's as aggressors.

With regard to six-power resolution Lacoste dismissed possibility of withdrawing it. He thought it was probably not adequate in its present form and he assumed we should probably proceed on basis of some modification of six-power resolution. Mentioning pending Soviet resolution and twelve-power Asian resolution (negotiations) in passing, Lacoste said there was fourth possibility in present parliamentary situation, namely, possibility of four-power talks. On latter point Ross indicated (reference topsec Deptel 612, December 27)¹ that there was of course no certainty at all that ministerial meeting would be held or that if it were held FE questions would be discussed, and that for these reasons it did not seem very fruitful to consider any possible ministerial meeting as factor in parliamentary situation which confronts us now and with which we will have to deal no later than next Wednesday.²

At lunch Fawzi took line he wanted to talk about broad principles rather than routine of pending resolutions. He talked about necessity of maintaining unity of UN and said he was opposed to hardening of any Asian bloc along lines of LA bloc. On other hand he felt Asians perhaps had psychology and a feel for situation which would be helpful in preservation unity of UN. He then raised rhetorical question whether we (UN) were ready to name ChiCom's as aggressors and accept consequences. Answering the question he said UN was not psychologically or physically prepared for this step. Psychologically he said that Asian countries, even including India, realized in their hearts they had to side with us as part of free world and in interest of their own self-preservation. On other hand they were confronted with psychological fact that westerners and particularly Americans were shooting Asians. From physical point of view Asian countries recognized their own weaknesses; beyond this they recognized physical weakness of west at this time. It was essential in view of such factors and having in mind fundamental importance of preserving unity of UN, in present situation we must play for time, even if best we could gain by playing for time would be only six weeks or six months. Naming ChiCom's as aggressors would cast the die and lose us the chance of gaining even a little time.

Turning to NE in order to illustrate what he hoped could be accomplished or at least begun in direction of psychological and physical preparedness, he referred first to Anglo-Egyptian treaty and of developing true spirit with Egypt and other Arab states of comradeship in arms. He said neither his government nor any other Arab government could relegate its people to role of trenchdiggers, campfollowers or lackeys. If a true comradeship in arms could be developed then free world would in reality have strong defense in depth in NE which would more than adequately protect our interests in that area; he mentioned bases, transportation, communication, oil.

Second, he mentioned necessity of convincing under-developed peoples of NE that western world stood for "social justice". This must be done by further steps for technical aid and economic development. Third, on question of peace with Israel he said that while it was impossible at present for Arab states to enter directly into definitive and final peace arrangements with Israel they were nevertheless fully prepared to envisage treaty system based upon tripartite declaration that would give every possible assurance of protection for Israel.

Drawing conversation back to UN, Ross emphasized the stake which smaller and weaker countries have in UN collective security system. He emphasized feeling great many Americans had that if members of UN were not willing to support it in its efforts to combat aggression, then there was not much reason for US to support it. At same time if UN ignored defiance by ChiCom's of its efforts through cease-fire group and otherwise to achieve peaceful settlement, this would greatly weaken fabric of UN.

Fawzi said he was strongly opposed to appeasement or rewarding aggression.

He said he was trying to find and steer a middle course between appeasement and slamming door on whatever possibility might remain of achieving peaceful settlement; in light of Chou En-Lai response to cease-fire group and fact that there has not yet after month been any reply to Asian appeal to ChiCom's not to cross 38th parallel, he agreed there did not seem to be much desire on part of ChiCom's for peaceful settlement. He volunteered that if ChiCom's crossed 38th parallel it would probably undoubtedly be necessary name them as aggressors. He said in order maintain integrity of UN principles and its objectives in Korea he thought there should be no voluntary withdrawal from Korea. He said he would prefer to have us "thrown out". He thought best thing would be to try to establish very strong beachhead in Pusan area as a symbol of UN determination.

Turning to pending resolutions in Committee 1, Fawzi thought six-power resolution was out-of-date. He also thought preamble of this resolution would be so obnoxious to ChiCom's that it might have effect of slamming door. He did not urge twelve-power resolution in present form but on contrary queried whether proper approach in committee would not be to proceed on basis of a modified version of twelve-power resolution. He said he was opposed to pending Soviet resolution which was simply condemnation without investigation.

Both Lacoste and Fawzi urgently requested that we let them know as soon as possible conclusions our own thinking.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Commander in Chief, Far East (MacArthur)1

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] December 29, 1950.

OPERATIONAL IMMEDIATE

[JCS 99935.] From JCS personal for MacArthur. This Message has been handled here with the ultimate of security and it is suggested that the contents thereof be confined, for the present, to you and your Chief of Staff and to General Ridgway 2 and his Chief of Staff. Message follows:

It appears from all estimates available that the Chinese Communists possess the capability of forcing United Nations forces out of Korea if they choose to exercise it. The execution of this capability might be prevented by making the effort so costly to the enemy that they would abandon it, or by committing substantial additional United States forces to that theater thus seriously jeopardizing other commitments including the safety of Japan. It is not practicable to obtain significant additional forces for Korea from other members of the United Nations. We believe that Korea is not the place to fight a major war. Further, we believe that we should not commit our remaining available ground forces to action against Chinese Communist forces in Korea in face of the increased threat of general war. However, a successful resistance to Chinese-North Korean aggression at some position in Korea and a deflation of the military and political prestige of the Chinese Communists would be of great importance to our national interests, if this could be accomplished without incurring serious losses.

Your basic directive to furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in that area requires modification in the light of the present situation.

You are now directed to defend in successive positions, as generally outlined in your CX 50635,3 inflicting such damage to hostile forces in Korea as is possible, subject to the primary consideration of the safety of your troops. Every effort should be continued to mobilize the maximum Korean contribution to sustained resistance, including both conventional and unconventional means.

Not printed. The substance of this message was rendered as follows in Record of the Actions Taken by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, p. 74:

¹ The source text is a copy of this message sent on January 2, 1951 to Mr. Rusk by Col. L. K. Ladue, Deputy Secretary of the JCS.

2 Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway had arrived in Korea on December 26 to assume command of the Eighth Army following the death of Gen. Walton H. Walker in an accident.

[&]quot;On 7 December 1950, CINCFE issued instructions for a withdrawal in successive positions, if necessary, to the Pusan area, the Eighth Army holding the Seoul area as long as possible without risking envelopment; and the X Corps withdrawing from the Hung Nam area and eventually rejoining the Eighth Army. This plan was approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff on 8 December 1950."

Since developments may force our withdrawal from Korea, it is important, particularly in view of the continued threat to Japan, to determine, in advance, our last reasonable opportunity for an orderly evacuation. It seems to us that if you are forced back to positions in the vicinity of the Kum River and a line generally eastward therefrom, and if thereafter the Chinese Communists mass large forces against your positions with an evident capability of forcing us out of Korea, it then would be necessary, under these conditions, to direct you to commence a withdrawal to Japan.

Your views are requested as to the above-outlined conditions which should determine a decision to initiate evacuation, particularly in light of your continuing primary mission of defense of Japan for which only troops of the Eighth Army are available.

Following the receipt of your views you will be given a definite directive as to the conditions under which you should initiate evacuation.

SECRET PRIORITY New York, December 29, 1950—9:07 p. m. [Received December 29—10:29 p. m.]

Delga 467. Re Korea. Following is report Ross' conversations today:

Jebb telephoned this morning to ask our views on action in UN. He said he had asked London for instructions but had received nothing from them as yet. He said he assumed we were not pressing for meeting before January 3. He assumed cease-fire group would make factual report and that committee would thereafter (probably beginning January 4) have to take some action re report if only to take note of it. He said he thought 6-power resolution was out of date and would have to be modified, question being how it should be modified. Said he guessed his people in London would be worried about a finding of aggression against ChiComs at this time for fear of precipitating war with China with resultant threat to Hong Kong and he observed he thought French would be even more worried. He said he understood Israelis were peddling resolution (with Canadians, Swedes, et cetera) which, as he had heard of it, seemed unrealistic in that it seemed to assume that elections could be held, et cetera, with armies still in field. He said he was seeing Rau this afternoon and would let us know if he found out anything of interest.

Lacoste came in at his request to explain text of resolution which Chauvel and he had drafted (sent Department as Delga 466, December 29).¹ Lacoste said Dayal had come to see him yesterday and had argued against 6-power resolution on grounds that it was out of date, that it had been presented originally in situation which had been overtaken by events, and that if it were passed now it would in effect give MacArthur free hand to bomb Manchuria. Lacoste indicated he (and, by implication, Chauvel) shared Indian view of 6-power resolution, at least to extent of believing it was quite out of date. Lacoste said that in view of development of events since 6-power resolution had originally been tabled, Chauvel had drafted last night resolution based on 6-power resolution but which was in some respects stronger and in some respects weaker. He stressed that this initiative by Chauvel was entirely personal and that it was not based on instructions or even on any indication of French Government views.

Ross, emphasizing that he was thinking out loud and speaking entirely personally, expressed view that Chauvel's effort was interesting and that we would seek advice of Department and let him know soon as possible our official reaction which Lacoste had requested.

Referring to second paragraph of draft and to phrase, noting the report of the committee of 3, Ross queried whether they were not a very weak presentation of the facts in the case. He emphasized our continuing desire to find peaceful solution of Korean question but on other hand necessity of maintaining in the process the unity and integrity of UN which was more essentially a means of protection to smaller states than in fact to US.

Admitting in effect that draft resolution was perhaps not very well balanced between these considerations, Lacoste felt that stronger references to ChiCom aggression and their defiance of UN, in particular cease-fire group, might very well slam door on any possibility of achieving peaceful settlement with ChiComs.

At lunch with Dayal he in effect confirmed what Lacoste had reported re Indian attitude toward 6-power resolution. More specifically he said that paragraph in resolution calling attention to grave danger which continued intervention by Chinese forces in Korea would entail taken in conjunction with preceding paragraph would certainly be interpreted by ChiComs and Russians either as threat to bomb Manchuria or as empty threat which we were not able to

Telegram Delga 466 not printed. The draft resolution in its second paragraph noted "that with the knowledge and consent of the PRC armed forces organized in large units and composed of Chinese subjects have crossed the Chinese border and are undertaking military operations against the forces of the U.N. in Korea." In its concluding paragraph, the draft resolution invited "the PRC to cease all assistance and encouragement of the authorities of North Korea, to prevent its subjects and all members and units of its armed forces from aiding the North Korean forces, and to recall immediately all its subjects and all members or units of its forces which may at the present moment be in Korea." (320.2–AB/12–2950) back up. Referring to a meeting Thursday night ² Dayal said press accounts were distorted. He said Rau had been delegated by group to get in touch with US and find out our attitude towards giving precedence to and passing 12 Asian power resolution. He implied very strongly that group did not want to go ahead with 12-power resolution on basis indicated without at least our acquiescence.

Emphasizing our desire to maintain unity of free world within UN, Ross drew attention to repeated indications we had given Rau and others of our willingness to seek peaceful settlement. Open defiance of cease-fire group and continued aggressive posture of ChiComs raised serious question whether UN could refuse any longer to face these simple facts. If UN refused to face these facts to what extent, if any, could UN be maintained as effective, collective security instrument, having in mind in particular security of smaller or weaker nations. From point of view of American public it must be apparent that there was strong body of opinion in this country which felt that if UN were to follow line of appeasement then US should look after its own security and allow others look out for theirs. Since the facts were so clear, would it not seem essential as minimum for UN to recognize facts.

Dayal did not disagree that facts were clear. He also recognized that survival of free nations, at least weaker ones, depended upon maintenance of UN. At same time he felt that to name ChiComs as aggressors would risk precipitating not only war with China but perhaps general war. He felt we must not give up our efforts to achieve peaceful settlement and that to name ChiComs as aggressors would in fact sacrifice what remaining chance there might be of peaceful solution.

Ross asked whether it would not be better to proceed with 6-power resolution as next step in committee. For reasons already indicated Dayal said he thought this would be very unwise.

It was clearly understood that foregoing conversation was personal and exploratory on both sides.

Grafstrom came in at his request. He said first that Israelis had been to see him with new draft resolution explaining that they want to discuss it with US but wanted get reactions from other delegations first. He said Israeli resolution had following components: (1) ceasefire; (2) declaration support objective of unified Korea involving elections, et cetera; (3) new commission in place of UNCURK on which USSR and ChiComs would be represented; (4) withdrawal by both sides; (5) reconstruction Korea under auspices UN; (6) hands-off Korea policy; (7) after foregoing accomplished, discussion outstanding issues including: (A) Formosa; (B) Chinese-Korean frontier; and (C) Chinese representation. Grafstrom said he had given Israelis no encouragement since he thought resolution quite unrealistic.

Grafstrom said he thought 6-power resolution might be all right as a quickie but that it was clearly out of date. He said in contemplating pending resolutions we were trying to ride two horses. He said he thought we should forget about cease-fire and forget about idea of negotiations and try new approach. He thought new approach might be based on reality of what UN could do and could not do in present situation. He thought it might be good idea for UN to withdraw its forces and save them for building up strength of free world. He would leave moral force of UN behind in Korea in form of UN commission stronger and bigger than UNCURK, supported by a UN guard. He said he thought there might perhaps be another body composed of US, UK, USSR and ChiComs. He said he would envisage withdrawal of ChiCom forces and the exacting of guarantees from NK's that they would collaborate with new commission and cooperate in restoration and maintenance law and order.

In substance Grafstrom said he felt we should give up Korea (leaving moral force only of UN behind) and let ChiComs find out hard way that they were not going to get Formosa or China seat in UN.

Grafstrom asked for reactions to his suggestions telegraphed Department; December 27 (Delga 464).

Padilla Nervo 3 telephoned and said he had been talking with several delegates, all of whom were worried about next steps in UN. He expressed view most important consideration was to determine action in UN on basis necessity safeguarding UN forces and what he termed prospective operations for future. Referring to various pending resolutions and modifications thereof, he said he thought we should not contemplate taking one step without knowing pretty exactly what next steps would be. In this connection he said number of delegations had commented to him on Lie statement to effect that putting responsibility on other side for general war did not meet point of necessity maintaining UN principles without endangering future of UN. He said he had talked with Urdaneta 4 who had urged taking up 6-power resolution and voting on it following report of 3. Padilla thought this was rushing matters too fast. He thought we might hear report of cease-fire group on Wednesday and then allow little time for full consultations and opportunity for delegates to get instructions in view of gravity situation before rushing headlong along some particular course.

Roberto Urdaneta Arbelaez of Colombia, Chairman of the First Committee.

⁸Dr. Luis Padilla Nervo, Mexican Permanent Representative at the United Nations.

Fawzi telephoned and gave fuller version Asian group meeting Thursday night. Said he and Rau had been delegated to ascertain views other delegates re giving priority to 12-power resolution. Fawzi indicated, however, which Dayal had not, that group contemplated amendment of 12-power resolution, making everything conditional on cease-fire. Fawzi felt giving priority to 12-power resolution amended as indicated would be wholly consistent with US statements in committee and Attlee-Truman communiqué. He argued that another chance should be given to ChiComs. If this chance refused our (UN) position would be improved not worsened. We would be strengthened, he said, in whatever next steps we would have to take. Next steps might include 6-power resolution with appropriate modifications in light of new developments. Asked what modifications of 6-power resolution he had in mind, Fawzi said he had not thought this through. He then commented in same sense as Dayal concerning present form 6-power resolution to effect that if, in light of developments, 6-power resolution were now passed, it would be giving or interpreted as giving blank check to cross frontier and hit at bases from which trouble is coming. In light Fawzi's comments it seemed quite clear Asian group has not faced up to or thought through problem of what comes next if, following passage 12-power resolution, ChiComs and Russians maintain present attitude.

Fawzi emphasized strongly Asian group desire get together with US. He hoped for our positive support giving precedence 12-power resolution, amended as he had indicated. If US could not take positive stand in favor we could abstain as long as it was understood we were not strongly opposed. On basis talks past few days with Fawzi, Jamali and Dayal, it seems clear Arabs are endeavoring to some extent at least to protect our position vis-à-vis Rau, and are thus far at least seeking maintain some flexibility in hoping reach compromise and solidarity with US.

A comprehensive estimate of relative capabilities in the Korea campaign appears to be dependent upon political-military policies yet to be formulated vis-à-vis Chinese military operations being conducted against our forces. It is quite clear now that the entire military resource of the Chinese Nation, with logistic support from the Soviet, is committed to a maximum effort against the United Nations Command. In implementation of this commitment a major concentration of Chinese force in the Korean-Manchurian area will increasingly leave China vulnerable in areas whence troops to support Korean operations have been drawn. Meanwhile under existing restrictions our naval and air potential are being only partially utilized and the great potential of Chinese Nationalist force on Formosa and guerrilla action on the Mainland are being ignored. Indeed as to the former we are preventing its employment against a common enemy by our own Naval Force.

Should a policy determination be reached by our government or through it by the United Nations to recognize the State of War which has been forced upon us by the Chinese authorities and to take retaliatory measures within our capabilities we could: (1) Blockade the coast of China; (2) Destroy through naval gun fire and air bombardment China's industrial capacity to wage war; (3) Secure reinforcements from the Nationalist garrison on Formosa to strengthen our position in Korea if we decided to continue the fight for that peninsula; and (4) Release existing restrictions upon the Formosan garrison for diversionary action (possibly leading to counter-invasion) against vulnerable areas of the Chinese Mainland. I believe that by the foregoing measures we could severely cripple and largely neutralize China's capability to wage aggressive war and thus save Asia from the engulfment otherwise facing it. I believe furthermore that we could do so with but a relatively small part of our overall military potential committed to the purpose. There is no slightest doubt but that this action would at once release the pressure upon our forces in Korea, whereupon determination could be reached as to whether to maintain the fight in that area or to effect a strategic displacement of our forces with the view to strengthening our defense of the Littoral Island chain while continuing our naval and air pressure upon China's military potential. I am fully conscious of the fact that this course of action has been rejected in past for fear of provoking China to a major war effort but we must now realistically recognize that China's commitment thereto has already been fully unequivocally made and that nothing we can do would further aggravate the situation as far as China is concerned.

Whether defending ourselves by way of military retaliation would bring in Soviet military intervention or not is a matter of speculation. I have always felt that a Soviet decision to precipitate a general war would depend solely upon the Soviets own estimate of relative strengths and capabilities, with little regard for other factors. It was because of this and the growing tensions arising from the Soviets increasing propaganda interest in Japan that for the past six months I have advocated the reinforcement of the Far East Command by a minimum of an army of four divisions. It has been my intention to commit this reinforcement to the defense of Japan and to provide a security cover for the gradual building up of Japan's own defense potential. It has never been my thought that they should be committed to the Korean campaign. Indeed, it was my understanding, in which I may have been in error, that the four National Guard divisions called to active duty in September were for the ultimate employment here should the necessity arise. If we are forced to evacuate Korea without taking military measures against China proper as suggested in your message, it would have the most adverse effect upon the peoples of Asia, not excepting the Japanese, and a material reinforcement of the forces now in this theater would be mandatory if we are to hold the Littoral Defense Chain including Japan against determined assault. Moreover it must be borne in mind that evacuation of our forces from Korea under any circumstances would at once release the bulk of the Chinese Forces now absorbed by that campaign for action elsewhere—quite probably in areas of far greater importance than Korea itself. On the other hand, the relatively small command we now have in Korea is capable of so draining the enemy's resources as to protect the areas to the south which would in itself be possibly a greater contribution to the general situation than could be made by such a force disposed in other areas for purely defense purposes, but not possessing the power to pin down and localize so massive a part of the enemy's potential as now committed in Korea. I have little doubt but that the entire ROK potential in case of our evacuation would disintegrate or become of negligible value. The loss of Korea would render the defense of Japan more vulnerable.

I understand thoroughly the demand for European security and fully concur in doing everything possible in that sector, but not to the point of accepting defeat anywhere else—an acceptance which I am sure could not fail to insure later defeat in Europe itself. The preparations for the defense of Europe, however, by the most optimistic estimate are aimed at a condition of readiness two years hence. The use of forces in the present emergency in the Far East would not in any way prejudice this basic concept. To the contrary it would insure thoroughly seasoned forces for later commitment in Europe synchronously with Europe's own development of military resource.

So far as your tactical estimate of the situation in Korea is concerned, under the conditions presently implied viz no reinforcements, continued restrictions upon Chinese Nationalist action, no military measures against China's continental military potential, and the concentration of China's military force solely upon the Korean sector it would seem to be sound. The tactical plan of a successively contracting defense line south to the Pusan beachhead is believed the only possible way in which an evacuation could be accomplished. In the execution of this plan it would not be necessary for you to make an anticipatory decision for evacuation until such time as we may be forced to that beachhead line.

The United States Representative at the United Nations (Austin) to the Secretary of State

SECRET

Delga 470. Re Korea. Ambassador Muniz (Brazil) called on me this morning at his request and said that he was anxious to know where we stood. I indicated that the first item of our agenda was the 6 power resolution and we thought that the best course of action open to us was to proceed in normal course with that resolution perhaps with some modifications. I said I understood that the Asians were still interested in their 12 power proposal. Speaking for the United States mission, I said I felt that the passage of this resolution would lower the prestige of the UN and that I thought that it was clear that the efforts of the UN to obtain a cease fire had been rejected and had been rejected in insulting terms. The UN had received two slaps in the face from the Chinese. Was it appropriate now to repeat the same process and receive a third slap in the face? I said that I did not believe that anything useful could come of such an effort and indicated that it was not clear to us that the Asian states had made up their minds to press this step. There were indications that they might not do so unless they received a favorable response from the other delegations. I said that I rather hoped that they would not put this proposal forward at all.

I indicated that we were extremely conscious of the importance of maintaining the unity of the free world in the present situation. It was of great importance to us to have all the free world, including the Asian states and the Arabs stand together. We hoped that in the present circumstances it would be possible to take a first and relatively mild step forward basing our action upon the fundamentals of the 6 power resolution. This had received very wide support heretofore. It was not provocative. It did not close any doors, nor do we intend to close any doors to negotiation. On the other hand, it would be a first action which would begin to uphold the prestige of the UN. We were quite prepared to consider amendments to this resolution which would increase its support among the members. I mentioned that some delegations were concerned that the resolution would authorize the Unified Command and MacArthur to bomb China. This was a misconception. If necessary, we were quite prepared to modify the two paragraphs which gave concern in this respect. We were also prepared to drop other paragraphs which were out of date and to try to work out with the Arabs and the Asians some additional paragraphs which might indicate that the door for negotiation was not being slammed.

I said that this was only the first step in a program. If the Communists did not withdraw or change their policy, it would, of course, be necessary to go on to firmer and stronger action. We are not yet prepared to discuss with our friends details of such a second stage. We felt, however, that it was of urgent importance that we work very closely together on this step as we had done in preparing the essentials of peace resolution. Passing the 6 power resolution now would give us the necessary time to work out the second stage resolution through diplomatic preparation so that before it was introduced we would be assured of wide support.

Ambassador Muniz expressed his appreciation and his agreement with this policy. He particularly noted the desirability of attempting to find a basis of agreement with the Asian group. It was essential in his view to have a very large vote in favor of the 6 power resolution. He agreed with my analysis of the 12 power resolution and thought that it would damage the prestige of the UN. Ambassador Muniz emphasized that in his view it was most important that we should work out an agreed program before the Wednesday meeting so that everybody would understand what was going to happen. Then there would be no public disputes. He said he would like to talk to his Latin American friends about the matter and I indicated that I would be glad to have him do so along the above lines.

Editorial Note

On December 30, Secretary of State Acheson released a statement reviewing the events of 1950 and looking toward the prospects for 1951; for the text, see Department of State Bulletin, January 15, 1951, page 83. With particular reference to Korea, the statement read:

"Regardless of threats, this country will not compromise by appearement its security or the principles by which a society of free men must live. We will not reward Communist aggression. In Korea, this means that this country will not be intimidated by the threats coming out of Peiping; but will continue under the United Nations to combat the forces of aggression."
